 PERRISS, A.—The Searchlight on the Throne. Reminiscences of an Ex-Ambassador. Cheap Edition. 2s. net.
 REEKS, H. CAULTON.—The Taming of the Terror: A Story of a Feud. 6s.
 SYMONS, MAJOR F. A.—Prince John of Strephitz. 6s.
 THOMAS, ELWYN.—The Forerunner. Cheap Edition. 1s. net.
 "W.A.F."—An Exposure of the Orton Confession of the Tichborne Claimant. 1s. net.

Mr. T. Werner Laurie.

AUTHOR OF "THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN JOHNS"—Tantalus. 6s.
 BUMPUS, FRANCIS.—The Cathedral of Southern France. 6s. net.
 DAVIDSON, GLADYS.—Stories from the Operas. 6s. net.
 HUME, FERGUS.—The Curse. 6s.
 MOORE, GEORGE HENRY.—An Irish Gentleman. 16s. net.
 PRAGA, MRS. ALFRED.—Love and £200 a Year. 2s. net.
 PRAGA, MRS. ALFRED.—Mrs. Edward's Cookery Book. 2s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Methuen & Co.

ABRAHAM, G. D.—Motor Ways in Lakeland. With Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.
 BERRIMAN, ALGERNON F.—Aviation. With 20 Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.
 BURY, PROFESSOR J. B., M.A., Litt.D. (Edited by).—Gibbon, VII. 10s. 6d. net.
 CLARK, JACKSON C.—Knocknecraven Days. With 4 Illustrations by A. E. Horne. 6s.
 CONYERS, DOROTHY.—Sandy Married. 6s.
 CORELLI, MARIE.—Boy. 1s. net.
 CRAWLEY, A. E.—The Book of the Ball: An Account of What it Does and Why (Cricket, football, golf, baseball, tennis, lawn tennis, pelota, polo, hockey, palleo, rackets, hockey, lacrosse, croquet, bowls, squash, badminton, billiards). 3s. 6d. net.
 GIBBON, PERCEVAL.—The Second Class Passenger. 6s.
 HALIFAX, ROBERT.—The White Throat. 6s.
 HARPER, C. G.—The Autocar Road Book. Vol. IV. 7s. 6d. net.
 HUGHES, C. E.—A Book of the Black Forest. 6s.
 MACNAUGHTON, S.—The Fortune of Christina M'Nab. 2s. net.
 MCCARTHY, JUSTIN HUNTY.—The Duke's Motto. 2s. net.
 MOBERLY, L. G.—Man and Woman. 6s.
 MUSSABINI, S. A.—The Complete Athletic Trainer. With many diagrams and 20 plates. 6s. net.
 NELSON, PHILIP, M.D.—Ancient Painted Glass. 7s. 6d. net.
 NESBIT, E.—The Red House. 7d. net.
 OXENHAM, JOHN.—Profit and Loss. 7d. net.
 RITTENBERG, MAX.—Swirling Waters. 6s.
 ROBERTSON, SIR G. S.—Chitral: The Story of a Minor Siege. 1s. net.
 SPRENT, MABEL.—Love's Apprenticeship. 6s.

Messrs. Mills & Boon.

CHANNON, E. M.—Miss King's Profession. 6s.
 DYSON, C. C.—Punjab Pomegranate Grove. 10s. 6d. net.
 EDGAR, GEORGE.—The Blue Bird's Eye. Cheap Edition. 1s. net.
 HOLME, CONSTANCE.—Crump Folk Going Home. 6s.
 LONDON, JACK.—Smoke Hallow. 6s.
 LONDON, JACK.—The Cruise of the Shark. 10s. 6d. net.
 PENDERED, MARY I.—Lily Magic. 6s.
 REYNOLDS, MRS. BAILLIE.—The Swashbuckler. 6s.
 REYNOLDS, ROTHAY.—The Gondola. 6s.

Mr. John Murray.

HARKER, MRS. L. ALLEN.—The Follies of Redmarley. 6s.
 HOLT, H. P.—The Mounted Police of Natal. With an Introduction by General Sir George Dartnell, K.C.B., Founder of the Corps. With Illustrations.
 MONTRESOR, MISS F. P.—The Strictly Trained Mother. 3s. 6d.
 NAPIER, LADY, OF MAGDALA.—To the Third and Fourth Generations. 6s.
 Times Series of Reprints.—Some French Cathedrals. 1s. net.
 WOOD, SIR HENRY TRUFMAN.—History of the Royal Society of Arts. With Illustrations.

Messrs. T. Nelson & Sons.

DE SEGUR, CTE. PH.—Du Rhin à Fontainebleau. French. 1s. net.
 HOPE, ANTHONY.—Simon Dale. 7d. net.
 HUGO, VICTOR.—Les Travailleurs de la Mer. 2 Vols. French. 1s. net.
 MAUD, CONSTANCE E.—Felicity in France. 1s. net.
 MERRIMAN, H. SEATON.—In Kedars' Tents. 7d. net.

Mr. Eveleigh Nash.

FLETCHER, J. S.—Perris of the Cherry Trees. 6s.
 FROEST, FRANK.—(Late Superintendent Criminal Investigation Department, Scotland Yard).—The Groll Mystery. 6s.
 STANTON, CORALIE, and HOSKEN, HEATH.—Raven, V.C. 6s.

Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co.

BLACKER, J. F.—A.B.C. of Collecting Old Continental Pottery. 3s. net.
 CUTHELL, EDITH E.—The Vagabond Courtier. 24s. net.
 GERRARD, DOROTHEA.—The City of Enticement. 6d.
 GRACE, ARMINE.—The Cloak of St. Martin. 6s.
 HARE, CHRISTOPHER.—Maximilian the Dreamer. 12s. 6d. net.
 HILL, HEADON.—The Spilt Peas. 6s.
 HORN, KATE.—The Mulberries of Daphne. 6d.
 HOWARD, E. KEBLE.—The Cheerful Knave. 1s. net.
 KING, A. I.—Everyday Economical Cookery Book. 1s. net.
 LEVY, M.—Paul's Simplicity. 1s. net.
 PEARCE, C. L.—Red Revenge. 6d.
 PERRIN, ALICE.—The Spell of the Jungle. 6d.
 RAPPOPORT, DR. A. S.—Famous Artists and Their Models. 16s. net.
 RAWSON, MAUD STEEPNEY.—The Watered Garden. 6s. 2.
 "RIIA."—Aeneas of the Ford. 6d.
 "RIIA."—Faustine. 6d.
 SABATINI, RAFAEL.—Torquemada and The Spanish Inquisition. 16s. net.
 SNOWDEN, KEIGHLEY.—Bright Shamie. 2s. net.
 WYLLARDE, DOLF.—The Riding Master. 1s. net.

Mr. F. Palmer.

HOLAM, GEORGE.—Wild Life in Wales. 10s. 6d. net.
 FOWELL, FRANK, and PALMER, FRANK.—Censorship in England: Its History from the Fifteenth Century. 7s. 6d. net.
 NORMAN, C. H.—Essays and Letters on Public Affairs. 5s. net.
 STRINDBERG, AUGUST.—By the Open Sea: Novel. 6s.
 STRINDBERG, AUGUST.—Plays. Volume II. Consisting of: "Comrades," "Facing Death," "Pariah," "Faster." 3s. 6d. net.
 WELLS, H. G.—Little Wars. 2s. 6d. net.

Sir Isaac Pitman & Son.

ASHTON, HYLEN R.—Herrot in Town. 6s.
 BERRY, A. J., M.A.—Britannia's Growth and Greatness. Profusely Illustrated. 2s.
 CREW, A., LL.B.—The Law Relating to Secret Commissions and Bribes. The Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906. 5s. net.
 GLEN, RANDOLPH A., M.A.—Local Government Case Law. Vol. III. 10s. net.
 HAMBURGH, ETHEL R.—Blackboard Diagram Drawing for Teachers of Needlecraft. 3s. 6d. net.
 JOHNSON, G., F.C.I.S.—Manufacturing Book-Keeping and Costs. 3s. 6d. net.
 KIDDELL, C. I.—Selborne Nature Reader (Senior Book). Glimpses and Gleanings. Illustrated. 1s. 9d.
 LEE, JOHN.—The Economics of Telegraphs and Telephones. 2s. 6d. net.
 LISSEFORD, L. B.—Railway (Roberts) Case Law. 10s. 6d. net.
 PERKINS, THE REV. JOCELYNE.—The Investiture in the Order of the Bath. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.
 SNAITH, A. C.—The British Empire. 1s. 8d.

Messrs. Alston Rivers.

HOLSTER, REGINALD, and O'BRIEN, MAJOR A.—The Man Who Paid. 6s.
 BOWEN, MARJORIE.—The Viper of Milan. 1s. net, cloth.
 ROWE, HOWARD C.—Mr. Whybrow's Princess. 6s.
 TREVINA, JOHN.—Fury: the Cruel. 1s. net, cloth.

Messrs. Sidgwick & Jackson.

HEMLRY, WILFRED.—The Woman Wonderful. Cloth, 1s. net.
 JANSON, GUSTAF.—Prude of War. Cloth, 1s. net.
 LYNAM, C. C., M.A.—To Norway and the North Cape in Blue Dragon II. With numerous Drawings and Photographs and Maps. In Designed Cover. 6s. net.
 MEYRICK, DIANA.—Peace Alley. Cloth, 1s. net.
 MEYRICK, DIANA.—Phyllis and Felicity. Cloth, 1s. net.
 MURRAY, ROSALIND.—Moonseed. Cloth, 1s. net.
 MURRAY, ROSALIND.—The Leading Note. Cloth, 1s. net.
 SIDGWICK, ETHEL.—Le Gentleman. Cloth, 1s. net.
 TOWGOOD, E. E.—The Goal of Fortune. Cloth, 1s. net.

Messrs. Skeffington & Son.

PALMER, WILLIAM T.—Old Corners in English Lakeland. With 15 full-page Illustrations. 2s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Swan, Sonnenschein & Co.

ALLEN, DAPHNE. Aged 14.—The Birth of the Opal. (A Child's Fancies). 5s. net.
 FORD, GEORGE.—The Hoop of Gold. 6s.

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

HENSON, MARGARET.—The Court of the King, and Other Stories. 1s. 6d.
 COLBY, MARY.—Wild Flower Preservation: A Collector's Guide. 3s. 6d. net.
 UNWIN (MRS. CORDEN, Edited by).—The Land Hunger. Life under Monopoly. 2s. net.

Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co.

ASKEW, A. and C.—Wild Sheba. 7d. net.
 BARR, ROBERT.—Lord Strangleigh Abroad. 6s.
 FORMAN, JUSTUS M.—The Open Door. 6s.
 FORMAN, JUSTUS M.—Tommy Carteret. 7d. net.
 HUME, FERGUS.—The Mystery Queen. 6d.
 HUME, FERGUS.—The Thirteenth Guest. 6s.
 LEIGHTON, MARIE C.—The Witness of the Ring. 6d.
 MITFORD, BERTRAM.—Selmin of Selmingford. 6d.
 MOBERLY, L. G.—Christina. 6d.
 MOBERLY, L. G.—Until Seventy Times Seven. 6s.
 OPPENHEIM, E. P.—False Evidence. 2s. net.
 OPPENHEIM, E. P.—World's Great Snare. 1s. net.
 TRACY, LOUIS.—The Message of Fate. 7d. net.
 TRENT, PAUL.—The Second Chance. 6s.
 WHITE, FRED M.—The Secret of the Sands. 6d.

Messrs. Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.

BARNETT, JOHN.—The New Guv'nor: A Public School Tale. 6s.
 CLAYTON, JOSEPH.—Life of Father Stanton. 1s. and 2s. net.
 GRIERSON, D.—More Ways of Entertaining Guests. 1s. 6d.
 GRIERSON, D.—Edinburgh Castle, St. Giles' Cathedral and Holyrood. 2s. 6d. net.
 STACPOOLE, H. DE VERE.—Bird Cay. 5s. net.
 WOODHOUSE, CANON F. C.—A Manual for Sundays. 1s. and 1s. 6d. net.

THE READER.

LAURENCE STERNE.

1713-1768.

By PROFESSOR GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

NOT one of the very idlest dream-problems that one may let wave themselves before the half-shut eye of the mind is, whether Sterne would or would not have liked the idea of his life being written? He had, of course, vanity in plenty; and liked few things (except philandering) better than keeping his name and himself before the public. But he was an exceedingly shrewd person: and knew very well indeed that this particular way of keeping him before the public would have its dangers. Whether there was anything really "flagitious," and therefore to be hidden, in his actual conduct may be disputed by persons who do not allow mere charity to blind or distort judgment. But he was in the habit of keeping exceedingly doubtful (or not-doubtful) company; and he was in the habit of saying, and still more writing, equally doubtful or not doubtful things. "Why will fellows write such letters?" said a good-natured critic some years ago, after a scandal of the kind. The question may be difficult to answer, save by the ancient proverb about "Needs must—". But it is certain that not a few fellows (and those not always bad fellows) seem not to be able to help it, or not to try to help it, and that this particular fellow with whom we deal was most conspicuously of their number. I have always thought that it was much to the credit of two persons who rather require additions to the credit side of their account—Hall-Stevenson and Wilkes—that they both refused the solicitations of Lydia Sterne de Medalle, to act as biographers. For they knew, better than anybody, the matter with which they would have to deal; and they knew, as well as anybody, that their hands would scarcely be likely to make any handling of it the better for his memory in the public eye. As for the wretched girl or woman herself, she has long since found her way to the particular bolgia of which Ham was the first recorded inhabitant, but which has received some denizens since—the abode of those who expose the weaknesses of their parents. But of late years—indeed for a very considerable time past—large new rummaging have been made into Sterniana; not, it is true, always without furnishing his defenders with some new materials for defence, but hardly ever without increasing the extent of the points where defence is necessary. Besides those who have dealt with such matter as was before them critically, without searching for new—from Thackeray downwards through Mr. Traill and Mr. Henley to the present writer—Mr. Percy Fitzgerald, Sir Sidney Lee, Mr. Sichel, one or two American investigators, and most recently, Mr. Lewis Melville have added to the material itself. And considering the letter-and-diary-writing and generally gossiping character of the time at which Sterne lived; the nature, manners, and relations in society of the man himself, the various atmospheres in which he lived and the extent to which he was in the French sense "spread" in this world—one could never feel the least surprise at fresh accessions, if not of knowledge, at any rate of tittle-tattle in the future. Whether the ghastly story of the recognition of his body on the dissecting-table be fact or fable, whether the gossip of the footman (not an ordinary footman either) about his last moments be genuine or "faked"—it is equally clear that here is a memory of a peculiar character, a person and personality to which things happen that do not happen to others. Sterne cultivated the bizarre, during at any rate the latter part of his life, with rather excessive devotion; but this devotion was at least returned, for the bizarre itself attached itself to him, and some of the forms which it took were certainly "not convenient." Now these inconvenient things have, in his case, had a nasty habit of reversing the great old dial motto—"impulsi et non perirent." So that one always has an uneasy feeling that, when anything fresh about Sterne leaps to light, he is only too likely to be shamed.

On the other hand, though nothing of any importance has been added, or seems in the least likely to be added, to the "Works," they require less and less defence as time goes on. It was once, no doubt, a legitimate and to a certain extent useful business to point out the so-called plagiarisms in them, because in not a few cases the books borrowed from were very little known and in some deserved to be made known, because in all

Laurence Sterne.

From the painting by Gainsborough.

Reproduced by permission of the Salford Corporation Art Gallery.

Laurence Sterne.

From a drawing by Francis Cotes, in the possession of the Rev. G. W. Blenkin, and reproduced by his kind permission.

generally. Something like an agreement that it is chose jugée ought to have been reached by this time. That it is not a beauty-spot by any means, there can be no question; his own particular defence of it is perfectly worthless, and indeed worse than worthless, for his own words can be turned against him. But, out of Doncaster or of Duncerania generally, the thing needs little specification, less discussion, and no floodgates or fireworks of rhetoric at all. Here

Laurence Sterne's Wife.

From a drawing by Francis Cotes,
in the possession of the Rev. G. W. Blenkin and reproduced by his
kind permission.

cases the filiation of literary matters, if inoffensively dealt with, is of interest. But one of the consolations for pessimists at the present moment is that the dunce's employment of the word "plagiarism," as a terrible and final sentence of condemnation, has gone a good deal out of use. Some people, at any rate, have come to recognize that most things have been said, and that practically everything has been thought, before in substance; and that the only question is whether the present sayer and thinker has shown due skill and due individuality in his manner of thought and expression. There can be little dispute as to Sterne's having passed this latter test. Moreover, some of the queer authors whom the industry of Dr. Ferriar and others has ferreted out, would not do anybody much good if he read them at first hand. Of others, such as Rabelais, even second-hand knowledge is better than none.

So, too, of the famous black (or "blue-black") spot on Sterne's work again Sterne is frequently "not convenient," and he is inconvenient in a manner rather specially disreputable. If we may judge from her short but entertaining history, so was Dr. Johnson's remarkable favourite, Bet Flint. Nevertheless, that great moralist "loved Bet Flint," and said so. It is true that he did not love Sterne, and might justly find the merriment of this parson not a little offensive. But he knew that "the man" was not "a dull fellow," and said so too.

The Old Vicarage, Coxwold,
as it is to-day.

This was Sterne's favourite living, and whilst here he wrote "The Sentimental Journey."

We, more fortunate than Johnson, are far removed from any living scandal that Sterne may have given personally, and in an even better position to appreciate his work, disinfected as it is by Time, if we choose. There is indeed a good deal in those last three words, for how few people do really choose to appreciate work as work, without dragging in all sorts of irrelevant considerations! Sterne's work is very small in bulk. The whole of the "profane"—sometimes decidedly profane—part of it will go into one volume the size of an ordinary six-shilling novel, though of course with rather thinner paper and with closer and smaller print. The "Sermons" themselves do not add much, while the "Sentimental Journey," which practically gives the whole Sterne (except the upper-shelf frippery) in little, does not by itself fill a hundred and fifty by no means crowded pages. Yet, outside of the "Sermons," there is scarcely a page that is not full, and inside them there are not many pages that are empty, of such an idiosyncrasy of genius as is hard to beat, as idiosyncrasy, anywhere. In a certain dubious sense there is no more artificial writer than Sterne in the whole of literature. To some only partially critical temperaments it may seem as if there were no end to the successive strippings off of what Shakespeare calls "lendings," as if one would never come to the real unadulterated and undisguised quiddity. Perhaps in a certain sense you never do so come. But in the process, if you are a real critic, you discover that there has been a quiddity, nay, a quintessence, saturating all these lendings, and making them, not themselves or their original author's, but Sterne's. Goethe's extraordinarily high praise of Sterne is, as it states itself, taken from such an entirely false point of view, that it has sometimes been merely dismissed as of no value, except as a curiosity, to-day. Sterne might be important to a German of Goethe's earlier time as an enemy of "the heresy of instruction" and so forth, but he certainly has never, either in his own time or since, showed himself in that light, or performed that function, to Englishmen. Yet his uniqueness exists, and it has, as a rule, been insufficiently recognised. With him, as has been said, the curtain too often is the picture: you will get at little or nothing behind it. At least for those people who know criticism from both sides—who have conjugated the verb "to criticise" in its active, passive, and middle voices—the famous "stop-watch" passage is only a superlatively clever rhetorical display, not even enshrining any genuine smart of Sterne himself at criticisms. For some who have not hard hearts, who have felt "the pity of it" in life and literature keenly and often enough, the Marias and the Lefevres, and even my Uncle Toby himself, though more and more worthy of admiration in the order named, arouse, except in the last case, very little genuine sympathy, and even in that case sympathy which is dangerously mingled with amusement of a slightly satiric kind.

Yorick and the Grisette.

From a painting by G. S. Newte
National Gallery of British Art

But how superlative the art of it all is! and how extraordinary is the admixture of some nature with that art! It may almost be said, and that without in the slightest degree contradicting what has been said already, that Sterne never fails to produce the effect at which he aims. He does not so fail with the stop-watch, or with Maria, or even with the lines of points and the marbled pages. The effect produced may not be wholly pleasing to people to-day, but it is the effect which Sterne meant to produce, and did produce, on the people of his day, and which soon will, or certainly in the usual evolution of things will some day, please again.

Elsewhere—in what we, perhaps presumptuously, call his "greater" efforts because they still please us without allowance—his artistic triumph is not in reality greater. We happen to be at the door when the clock-lock opens it, that is all. And elsewhere, again, he is certainly perennial; no coincidence of hour and audience is necessary.

If we had no tittle-tattle about Sterne; if he had left no letters; if we knew nothing about Kitty Fourmentelle and the "Bramine"; if he were unsmirched by the society of Wilkes and Stevenson and "Panty" Lascelles; if we had not that dreadful portrait, with its Asmodean suggestion—how different would the general estimate of him be! There would remain the fie-fie passages in the books; and one might say "something too much of this," going on to remark that even the something less might have been done in a healthier fashion. But no one except a fanatic of prudery and pudibundity would regard the fault as utterly damning in fact; and no one who knew his Voltaire would fail to detect at least an excuse of pattern in form. The mechanical oddities of typography and general make-up are, after all, but as the farcical or low-comedy element in other compositions; indeed, they are hardly more than properties and costume—the external presentation in which the author chooses to set forth his work, after all, very easily tolerated, and not unsuitable. The very sentimentality—rancid as it is to the novice—readily loses its evil savour when a sufficiently historic sense is brought to bear on it; and indeed can, by anyone who has acquired the most valuable of all critical faculties, be simply neglected and shut out. What remains? Why, such a microcosm of quaint humour; of refreshing contrast to reality where yet the artistically improbable is kept aloof with the cunningest super-realism; of comically presented humanity—as it will be very hard to find in the same compass anywhere else. In this preposterous extravaganza, with all its burlesque, all its horse-

Laurence Sterne.

From an original oil painting, in the possession of Mr. Theodore Blake Wirgman.

Dear Parsonage London
Sept. 24

I paid yesterday (by Becket) a hundred Guineas (or pounds) I forget well. — Post
You must remit to Mr. Sterne at Merselles in hundred Louis.
— she will reach before she leaves that place will be in 3 weeks —
— however let her know she may have the Cash upon she draws for it.

Have you got the 3rd V. of Shandy? — his liked the best of all here

I am going to publish a Sentimental Journey through France & Italy — the undertaking is professed & highly encouraged by all our Nobles.

& at the rate his subscription for will bring me a thousand guineas (an engine) — I will be an Original — in large Quarto — the Subscription half a Guinea — if you can do one process, one the honour of a few games of men of Science or Fashion — I shall thank you
— but they will appear in good Company & get all the Nobles there almost having honoured one with their names. my kind — Remembrance to Foley
— & to Mrs. Parsonage —

My daughter has an affair —
Tavernier offer just now at Merselles — he has 2000 livres — a young — much at his age — so I suppose
Mrs. with Madame de la Fayette will negotiate the affair con Effecto.

L. Sterne

A. Maffey
Messrs. Foley & Parsonage
Bancroft
Rue St. Jacques
Paris.

Reduced facsimile of a letter from Sterne.

From the collection of Mr. William Upcott.

(or at least pony-) play ; all its doubtful taste ; all its not at all doubtful licence ; with its shadows and uncompleted characters ; its non-existent, or at least, hopelessly flawed and broken stories—there is, somehow or other, something of the Universal. It was this, no doubt, that Goethe saw, though he mistook both its character and its causes when he showered on "Tristram" the, at first sight, rather amazing epithets and phrases—

"finest spirit that ever worked."

"full of freedom and beauty";

"benefactor of the nineteenth century," "able to distinguish truth from falsehood," "possessed of boundless sagacity and penetration."

When one has gasped a little ; shaken oneself ; got breath, and, so to speak, run under shelter from this storm of panegyric, one sees that what struck Goethe (what, to do him justice, generally did strike him, and made his own greatness by so doing) was the very touch of the Universal which has been mentioned. To use the word "transcendental" in connection with Sterne may seem outrageously absurd, and yet Sterne does "transcend"— by the queerest of stairs, no doubt. He is never commonplace, and he is never merely trivial in his attempts to escape commonplaceness. Almost as outrageous may it seem to mention his name in the same sentence with Shakespeare's. Yet, if you take the four great eighteenth-century novelists, though Fielding is of course, the only one who is actually in touch with Shakespeare, Sterne is nearer to the great exemplar of all human "imitations" than either Richardson or Smollett.

Nor does it require charity pushed to the point of imbecility, or the forcible suppression of our too abundant information about him, or an addiction* to the idle art of whitewashing, to improve the conception of Sterne, even as a man, very considerably. If we know too much about him on one side we know, in all fair probability, a good deal too little on the other. There seems to have been no really bad blood about him. Fatigatus et aegrotus as he was of his unlucky wife, he seems to have been very liberal to her out of no great means. Except in so far as it furnished him with reading for his miscellany, there could, perhaps, hardly have been a worse life, for such a man as Sterne, than the twenty years of sojourning in a remote country district, with alternation only to the cabals and gossip of a provincial capital and cathedral city. A larger air, a more varied society, the rubbing of shoulders with his equals in intellect, were the very things that Sterne never had till too late, and after the meaner parts of his nature had been fostered and developed, alike by solitude, by "Crazy Castle" cochonneries, and by the most undivine atmosphere of an assembly of average mid-Georgian divines.

An early acquaintance with

Johnson and a series of the more good-natured bear's hugs (which might quite conceivably have been administered to him by one who tolerated, not only Boswell, but Savage and the Herveys, Cornelius Ford, and Miss Bet Flint herself) would have been a godsend to Sterne, whose faults were after all almost wholly those of a dirty little boy, and for whom, as in the case of other dirty little boys, there could have been no such thoroughly salutary discipline as a good drubbing. The treatment must have been all the more effective inasmuch as Sterne, unlike Goldsmith, had, at least when in the painting by C. R. Leslie.

My Uncle Toby and the Widow Wadman.

South Kensington Museum

women were not concerned and he had not a pen in his hand, nearly as much common sense as he had genius, and would have been able to make full profit of this discipline without its making him intolerably uncomfortable at the time. Even short of such a drastic cure as this, larger, healthier, and more varied society could hardly have failed to produce at least a very considerable amendment in the general wholesomeness of his tone.

But we have to take things as we find them: and heaven knows, we might find things and persons much worse than Sterne the man, while Sterne the writer has the one condition of indispensableness—that he is practically unique. Methods so ostentatiously artificial as his may appear to be easily imitable, but who has ever imitated Sterne, not only with the least success, but without the most ghastly and preposterous failure? Now inimitableness is not quite an absolute and exclusive test of genius, for some geniuses have been imitable. But there never has been a not-imitable person who has not also been a genius, greater or less.

JOHN BRIGHT.*

BY RICHARD WHITEING.

IN this substantial volume illustrated and well indexed—Mr Trevelyan has done his work with fairness and care. If we were not fresh from the impression of John Bright's objection to adjectives, we should say with "great" fairness and as much care. He is impartial, yet he leaves us in no doubt as to where his own sympathies lie. An honest partiality is the salt of the subject: a biography without love on the part of the author is but the dinner of the stalled ox in the same predicament. The work bids fair to take standard rank.

The writer is fortunate in his theme. John Bright stands quite apart, in his mind and in his upbringing, from most of the great Parliamentarians of his time. He was primarily a Quaker, a man with his Bible in every fibre of his being, and with the rest of his equipment, even the genius, thrown in as a free gift of bountiful Nature. The foundation of the character was sheer common sense—things seen, even the most spiritual, as nearly as possible "just as they are," and free from all bias of self-interest or of authority. The mother dedicates him in her prayers over his cradle to "uprightness and integrity," no more: "I have no wish to see my children great or noted characters." He was drawn into public life, like most of his sect, by the sense of danger alike to the public welfare and to the peace that passeth understanding. But while, with the others, it was mostly peace for themselves, his was peace for all the nations of men. The platform was the lesser of two evils, and in the nature of a compromise, free, however, from the qualms of one of the classic cases in Quaker history. It must have been a sad dilemma when a whole company of Friends putting to sea in waters infested by privateers, had to paint port-holes for cannon on the sides of their ship, to induce the belief that there were ugly customers aboard. Yet, in the more colloquial sense of the term, Bright was capable of being a Shaker among the Quakers, a shaker-up of his own people into a more frank acceptance of the conditions of the life of their time. They needed it. They voted his sister out of their communion for her marriage out of their sect, although Duncan McLaren was her happy choice. They subsequently profited so far by her brother's teaching as to rescind the vote. Not only that: a dwindling membership has led them to repent of their isolation, if not in sackcloth and ashes, at least in reasonable hats for both sexes, and even, we believe, in occasional brass bands for devotional use.

* "The Life of John Bright." By George Macaulay Trevelyan. 15s net. (Constable).

His pet aversions were church establishments, aristocracies, and superfluous adjectives. Truth and simplicity, "few words, but the best," were all he sought in oratory; and he seems to have discovered eloquence as a personal possession pretty much as M Jourdain discovered prose. He solemnly warned his sister against irony, though, as a man of genius, he was destined to fall into its snare in many a masterpiece of public declamation.

In him, in Cobden, and in William Fox, political economy found just what it most wanted—eloquence as a driving force. Cobden, as Mr Trevelyan tells us, was argument, Bright passion, Fox rhetoric, a power never to be despised, or Shakespeare and the Bible would not be half full of it. Adam Smith and Malthus and Ricardo were not enough: their rigorous logic of doctrine still required the charm of personality. Cobden supplied this in his really Demosthenian power of hammering away at his thesis, Bright in his fine prophetic rages against all that he held wrong, Fox, not less in his own way, though, as it has proved, with less chance of reaching posterity. Bright's denunciation of the Corn Laws was but common sense in the highest. Parsons, tenant farmers and landlords had for twenty years of war enjoyed an artificial prosperity at the expense of the nation, and when peace came they clamoured for special laws to save their monopoly. The orators converted the people to the common sense of its own interests. Such errors and such conversions are the stuff of history; they change only in their forms; the arguments of Bright's finest speeches would bear close application to the political circumstances of our own time, with little but a change of name. In his opposition to the Crimean war he thunders against entangling alliances in lieu of friendship with all nations: "We are building up our Eastern policy on a false foundation—namely, on the perpetual maintenance of the most immoral and filthy of all despotisms over one of the fairest portions of the earth which it has desolated, and over a population it has degraded but has not been able to destroy." Who was right? and what was this, at the heart of it, but common sense touched by fire? We know what he had to suffer for it—the apostasy of Manchester, the insults of Tennyson:

"This broad-brimmed hawker of holy things,
Whose ear is cramm'd with his cotton, and rings
Even in dreams to the chink of his pence.

What a contrast, in the majesty of its homely truth, is one of that "hawker's" speeches delivered to a spell-bound House that meant to vote against him, but could not find the courage for a reply:

"When I look at gentlemen on that Bench, and consider all their policy has brought about within the last twelve months, I scarcely dare trust myself to speak of them, either in or out of their presence. We all know what we have lost in this House. Here, sitting near me, very often sat the member for Frome (Colonel Boyle). I met him, a short time before he went out, at Mr. Westerton's, the bookseller, near Hyde Park Corner. I asked him whether he was going out. He answered he was afraid he was; not afraid in the sense of personal fear—he knew not that, but he said, with a look and a tone I shall never forget, "It is no light matter for a man who has a wife and five little children." The stormy Luxine is his grave, his wife is a widow, his children fatherless. On the other side of the House sat a member, with whom I was not acquainted, who has lost his life, and another of whom I knew something (Colonel Blair). Who is there that does not recollect his frank, amiable and manly countenance? I doubt whether there were any men on either side of the House who were more capable of fixing the good-will and affection of those with whom they were associated. Well, but the place that knew them shall know them no more for ever."

His American policy was of the same cast. See where the justice of the quarrel lies; and if you must have a counsel of prudence, beware of making an enemy of the side that has the justice, and is sure to mature into one of the most powerful nations in the world. It is the pivot of our American policy now. So, too, in Indian affairs: Give the natives a chance. Govern wholly for their good. Treat them with personal respect and sympathy. The appeal rings clear through all the Indian speeches, and especially through one which an acute contemporary observer, Mr. Whitty, has described as one of the most eloquent of his day. "After Mr. Gladstone," he added, "Mr. Bright and Mr. Disraeli are now the two greatest personages with the two greatest futures of any men of their time." Oddly enough, the personal relations of Disraeli and Bright, men so sharply contrasted in ambition and character, were for a long time remarkably cordial. Mr. Bright seems to have sorrowed over the other as a fallen angel with "points," while Disraeli felt unbounded admiration for his opponent's wisdom and honesty. The account of a sort of midnight meeting between them, in which the arch contriver of conversions tried to gammon him into joining a Conservative ministry, is one of the most piquant things in the volume.

Shandy Hall, Coxwold, Yorkshire.

Here Sterne was living

Bright's principles triumphed even in the final settlement of the Franchise; and here he carried his point even against his lifelong friend. Cobden was for the exclusive support of his own middle class, and he mistrusted the popular appeal. It is curious to note that, Quaker as he was, Bright once came perilously near a suggestion of civil war. "It would be easy to induce many scores of thousands of men to provide themselves with arms—to form something like a great national volunteer force, which, without breaking the law, would place the peace of the country on a soil hot with volcanic fire."

He was right as to the main remedy for Irish discontent— "security of improvements in the land"; and if he failed to keep touch with his Party on Home Rule, it was mainly owing to his dread of the unknown. He had no light to walk by. "so great a question has not in my time been before us." In his heart of hearts he was a statesman ever busied with the question how is the Queen's Government to be carried on? His "Manchester School" was really a school of the philosophy of high politics far more than of mere economics; and in its leading principles he rules our spirits from his urn to this day.

THE BOOKMAN PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

JULY, 1913.

Answers to these competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing the name and address of the sender) should be forwarded not later than the 15th of the month to

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, Warwick Square, E.C.

- I.—A PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA is offered for the best original Sonnet.
- II.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this number of THE BOOKMAN. Preference will be given to quotations of a humorous nature.
- III.—A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS is offered for the best Poetical Epistle, in not more than twenty-four lines, offering advice, congratulations, or sympathy to the new Poet Laureate, whoever he may be.
- IV.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best review, in not more than one hundred words, of any recently published book. Competitors should give the names of Authors and Publishers at head of their reviews.
- V.—A copy of THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for THE BOOKMAN Competitions. The Editor reserves the right to use any suggestion submitted.

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR JUNE.

- I.—The PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA for the best original Sonnet is divided, and we award HALF A GUINEA each to Miss May Jenkinson, of 122, Palace Road, Tulse Hill, S.W., and to Miss E. M. Cooke, of the Poetry Bookshop, 35, Devonshire Street, Theobald's Road, W.C., for the following:

IN A BOOK-BINDING FACTORY.

Amid the throb of vast machinery
I seem to hear the throb of human thought,
The life and passion that the author wrought
Into his words of prose or poetry;
His inmost thoughts! Methinks if he could see
The whole prosaic process that is brought
To bear upon his words, he had not sought
To give them to the world so lavishly.

Nav, but the poet, were he standing near,
Would scorn the narrow thought our soul contrives
And bid us stoop, and 'neath the surface look:
Prosaic? See, there is a poem here
With pulsing beats; ah, God, how many lives
Go to the making of one perfect book!

MAY JENKINSON.

THE WHISTLER.

Beside the doorway of a country inn
One stood and whistled right melodiously:
He whistled as the birds, scarce dreaming why,
Save that with all fair things his heart was kin
And as he stood a-whistling, from within
The hostel, oft broke in upon the song
The uncouth voices of a rustic throng
Who marked the tale a wanton churl did spin.
The discord hushed, the melody would merge
Triumphant, clearer—sweeter than before,
Until a very rapture smote the ear
Of one who trod the long lane's dust-strewn verge:
So Love stands, making music at the door.
One lists perchance—the rest nor heed nor hear.

E. M. COOKE

We also select for printing:

REQUITAL.

"Make recompense"? And how shall that be done?
What canst thou pay in blood, or breath or tears?
Canst thou release this spirit, many years
Crucified to the Past, and slain thereon?
Give me to think clean thoughts to injure none—
Give me again my old faith, that reveres
The highest—re-instate among my peers,
Call the old dark hours, set them in the sun—

Re-build the honey in the broken comb,
And fill again with myrrh the shattered cup,
To the rough sea restore the ragged foam?—
Yea, these shall first be done, ere thou requite
A body spurned, and a soul withered up—
Art thou a God, to raise what thou didst smite?

("Silverpen," Ealing, W.)

NIGHT.

The night is very holy! Mystic-wise
She rears her altar in a secret place
Occult from wanton noon's abashless face
And the unwinking stare of vulgar eyes.
Ministrant stars about the hushful skies
As acolytes await the hour of grace;
While o'er the sleep-endrenched populace
Uplifted like the Host the moon doth rise.
All nature lends her worship to the rite,
The earth her incense, and the sounding sea
Makes music on her shores incessantly
To tuneful winds on every soaring height:
Each dewy blade bends low, and every tree
Is murmurous in prayer at midmost night!
(Fred Reynolds, St. Francis', Walmer, Kent.)

THE NEW NORTH-WEST.

AFTER A LECTURE IN OXFORD ON EMPIRE DAY, 1910, BY MISS AGNES DEANS CAMERON OF CANADA.

Oxford for England gives you thanks and praise,
Brave traveller through the spacious New North-West.
Your golden picture will severely test
The dull indifference that sadly plays
Too great a part in these commercial days.
Yet we in this old cloistered sphere compressed
Delight in high heroic venture best,
And smile when Youth seeks out Imperial ways.

Young States united by that love of yours
May stand, a sturdy help to all mankind,
Against a world of ancient misery:
Then open wide the crowded ocean doors,
Let driven men at last victorious find
An Empire's flag to-day means liberty!

(Hedley V. Storey, 21, St. James' Avenue, Brighton.)

Dear Garrick.

Upon reviewing my papers,
this morning, with some unforeseen inconveniences—I find I should set out with 20 p. & left—than a prudent man ought—will you lend me twenty pounds.
Yrs L. Sterne

Facsimile of a characteristic note from Sterne to Garrick.

RHODOPIS.

"Rhodopis was . . . very lovely."
Herodotus 2 135.

For she was very lovely: in such wise
Rhodopis walks before us still to-day
As once through Memphis' market folk away
She hurried and in every place were cries
Of insolent amaze and bold surprise:
Aside she flung them all in fond dismay
For one who laboured, old and bent and gray,
'Twas Æsop saw the sunlight in her eyes

Her kings have gone down nameless to the earth:
Dumb monuments are o'er the silent bed
Of the unknown great Shepherds of the hosts:
And she, an alien maid of little worth,
Still lives to-day because one old man said:
"The maid was very lovely." So Love boasts.

(E. J. Martin, Church Hill, Penistone, Sheffield.)

An almost bewilderingly large number of sonnets have been sent in of very varying merit, and we specially commend those received from Margaret McEvoy (Cricklewood), Ada Stow (Finchley), Harry R. King (Rathgar), Frank Dale (Saxmundham), R. B. (London, S.W.), Norman Davidge Gullick (Clifton), Elsie Mead (Burnley), Douglas C. Pearce (Red Hill), Vernon H. Porter (London, E. C.), Violet D. Chapman (Burnham), M. Bach (Seaford), David S. Wadsdon (Gorleston-on-Sea), Frank Brebner, jun. (Aberdeen), Grace Ashby (Torrington), Rev. F. Hern (Rowland's Castle), H. Young (Leeds), Anna K. Barlow (Blackheath), B. Solomon (London, N.W.), Edward S. Nightingale (Edinburgh), Amy J. Brooks (S. Merstham), S. A. Doody (Boscombe), F. Noel Bursill (Battersea Rise), Mrs. Cater (Torrington), Doris Dean (Bromley), H. McQ. Thomson (Pateley Bridge), "Green Cross" (Harrogate), G. W. T. McGown (Corstorphine), D. M. Kemode (Kenilworth), Moisey Law (Bristol), S. Urquhart (Ponders End), E. F. Parr (Clifton), Lily E. Lord (Amersham Common), Gwendolen D. Harold (High Barnet), B. M. Skeat (Sedburgh), F. O. Call (Quebec), P. M. Jones (Aberystwyth), Nona Parsons (Hull), Mrs. Ormsby (Pontypridd), G. M. Fauldring (Baywater), G. M. Mackinlay (Glasgow), Florence Bagster (Kendal), A. R. C. Eaton (Forest Gate), "Tristram" (Aberdeen), Miss M. E. Norry (Putney), Rev. E. C. Lansdown (S. Woodford), Miss J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), E. Rinnon (Hull), M. B. M. (Glasgow), Noel D. Braithwaite (Ashton-under-Lyne), H. Gallon (Upper Holloway), W. K. Fleming (Seaford), "Iris" (Stoke Newington), J. Richard Ellaway (Basingstoke), G. J. Holme (Gt. Malvern), Euphemia Dalgleish (Leith), Robert Mackay (Edinburgh), Robert W. Fenton (Birstall), K. Elsie Hunt (North Shields), Gerald Venning (London, S.W.), W. A. Lambie (Brighton), H. R. Smith (Newcastle-on-Tyne), Ernest S. Heron (Chester), "East Wind" (Co. Antrim), Eleanor Bull (Ludlow), Robert Everall (Plaistow), Margaret E. Painter (Wimbledon), Mrs. Stephen Parker (Poole), E. Irene Seaton (Boxmoor), Margaret Dunn (Hammersmith), W. Stanley Anderton (Wigan), C. R. Price (Wellington), Miss V. Gillespie (Forest Hill), "Issor" (St. John's Wood), Violet Pascoe Williams (Blackheath), Agnes E. M. Baker (W. Hampstead), R. B. Ince (Jarvis Brook), Ethel M. Dale (Crouch Hill), Margaret Rey (Bournemouth), R. A. Caswall (Forest Hill), R. W. King (Catford), Cyril G. Taylor (Heswall), Marcella Whittaker (Dewsbury), William Kerr (Stirling), Eveline Emily Ife (Plumstead Common), Beatrice Craig (Straidarran), B. Mulne (London-bridge), Miss E. Rippon (Hull), H. Wakeford (Cardiff), Hubert A. Harris (Birmingham), Miss C. P. F. Ferrier (Glasgow), Miss E. M. Herring (Weston-super-Mare), Alba Longa (Upper Norwood), Dudley Stow (Finchley), S. B. Irene Bell (London, W.C.), M. M. Burnell (Ashford), J. A. S. Wilson (Edinburgh), J. R. A. Nicoll (Glasgow), Chas. Parkin (Felling-on-Tyne), Will Loudon (Dunfermline), H. B. Dawes (Southport), F. A. Pearson (Fleet), G. G. Jackson (Northampton), Bernard McEvoy (Ilfracombe), Henry C. Suter (S. Tottenham), Grace M. Measham (Newcastle-on-Tyne), G. Duncan Grey (Weston-super-Mare), Marjorie W. Crosbie (Wolverhampton),

C. H. K. Kibblethwaite (Nottingham), Percy Haselden (New Brighton), A. Eleanor Pinnington (Ontario), Agnes R. Deans (Edinburgh), Lettie Cole (Pontrilas), W. H. Colman (West Malling), Margaret Corry (Enniskillen), Chas. Stuart (Sheffield), David Stothart (Edinburgh), Norman Boothroyd (Batley), Mark Bowman (Kingston), Harry B. King (Rathgar), W. Kitley (Derby), A. C. Loughton (Wakefield), E. J. Martin (Sheffield), Agnes Lack (Margate), B. Vickery (Bradford), Alex. R. Horne (Peterhead), C. A. Renshaw (Sheffield), E. Percy Schofield (Hull), James Mitchell (Edinburgh), E. T. Sandford (Saltash), W. H. Colman (West Malling), Elizabeth Healy (Chapelized)

II.—The PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation is awarded to Miss Irene Pollock Lalonde, of 14, Forester Road, Bath, for the following:

BECAUSE OF THE CHILD. BY CURTIS YORKE.
(Jarrold.)

" 'Bother it!' I may Occasionally say." . .

W. S. GILBERT, HMS Pinafore.

We also select for printing: "

GOSSIP IN A LIBRARY. BY E. GOSSE (Heinemann)

" . . SILENCE . . . "

HOOD, last line of Sonnet.

(Rev. Arthur Golland, 4, Kedan Street, Ipswich.)

THE SECRET OF NARCISSE BY EDMUND GOSSE.

"The colour of her hair"

SHAKESPEARE, Antony and Cleopatra.

(Miss S. M. Isaacson, 14, Gordon Place, Campden Hill.)

FIRST STEPS TO GOLF BY G. S. BROWN (Mills & Boon.)

"Give thy thoughts no tongue"

SHAKESPEARE, Hamlet I, 3.

(E. F. Thomas, 3, Rangemore, Prestwich, Manchester.)

THE SILENCE OF MEN. BY H. F. PREVOST BATTERSBY.
(Lane)

"Why don't the men propose, mamma?"

T. H. BAYLY.

(S. G. Harrison, 4, Broomgrove Road, Sheffield.)

Sterne's Grave in St. George's Burial Ground, Baywater Road.

FIRST STEPS TO GOLF. By G. S. BROWN.

"I swore."

Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyám.

(D. H. Badland, Myrtle Place, Bingley.)

SOULS IN PAWN. By LINDSEY RUSSELL.
(Ward, Lock & Co.)

"O my prophetic soul!

My uncle!"

SHAKE-PEARE, Hamlet.

(John A. Walker, 60, Grosvenor Avenue, East Sheen, S.W.)

STEPS TO PARNASSUS By J. C. SQUIRE
(Howard Latimer.)

"It's everlastin' waitin' on a everlastin' road"

RUDYARD KIPPLING. Oonts

(G. J. Baldock, "Lyeway," Ropley, Hants.)

III.—The PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS for the best twelve lines of verse giving advice to young poets against the use of false rhymes is divided, and we are sending Two NEW BOOKS to Mr. J. J. Geake, of St. Bernard's, York Road, Guildford, Surrey; Two to Mr. Hadly Ford, of 12, Priory Road, Clifton, Bristol; and Two to Miss S. M. Isaacson, of 14, Gordon Place, Campden Hill, London, for the following:

ADVICE TO YOUNG POETS AGAINST THE USE OF FALSE RHYMES.

Let those, who think the poet's song inspired,
And dream of radiant Muses sweetly
'tired,
Know that his art is not an airy thing,
Many have voices—few, indeed, can sing
And ye, who seek to climb Parnassus' height,
Think ere ye speak,—still more think ere ye write,
Guard well your words, and ponder long on each,
The imperfect pen is born of careless speech.
Who thinks great thoughts, must noble language use,—
The poet's mind is still his truest
Muse
Thus shall ye play more fair your minstrel part—
Build as a Science, finish as an Art
J J GEAKE.

ADVICE TO POETASTERS.

Lads, let me tell you, he who woos
That coy, capricious maid, the Muse,
Should be most careful lest he wound
Her ears with inharmonious sound
His vowels must be round and full
And for her pleasure he must cull
Chaste verses since her soul abhors
Cacophony and cockney flaws.
So I've committed every crime
To show him how he must not rhyme,
And should he heed this sound advice
He yet may win a Bookman Prize!

HADLY FORD.

ADVICE TO YOUNG POETS AGAINST THE USE OF FALSE RHYMES

Oh Youth, beware the Poet's snare so temptingly displayed,
A language so replete with rhymes needs not fictitious aid
There is no tongue by poets sung that wider scope affords,
Than this of ours, which oft in Verse a grateful writer lauds.

Then why should you, as now you do,
in alien pastures stray,
When every help is yours the Poet's canons to obey?

Why grieve the Miews—who holds strict views upon the point of Rhyme,
And whom you seek to glorify in rhapsodies subhyme!

Henceforth Her law transgress no maw, but strive with all your might
Her smallest rules to keep when next a Masterpiece you write.
Of faulty stuff we have enuff—pray do not swell the liased!
Or else, should your career be short, I fear you'll not be misseed.

MISS S. M. ISAACSON.

We also select for printing:

To pen a rhyme from mark of falseness free,
Its vowel sound should perfectly agree;
And differing euphony be heard to float
From its preceding consonantal note.
Succeeding consonants—if these appear—
Should with the self-same tone enchant the ear,
In emphasis the rhyme identic too
Should echoing fall, to be exact and true.
Then wed not joy with sky, nor dawn with morn,
From all such unions discord sure is born;
For while in accent showing no mistake,
All other canons 'twill be seen they break.

(Rev. Edwin C. Lansdown, The Manse, Derby Road,
South Woodford, N.E.)

ADVICE TO YOUNG POETS AGAINST FALSE RHYMES

"Spring is the season of Poetic License,"
Dear Peter, 'tis agreed, but I opine
You might have found a better word than "hy'emths"
To finish your next line

"More a humble curtsy than a low one."

Reproduced from one of Everard Hopkins's colour pictures illustrating "A Sentimental Journey."
(Williams & Norgate.)

And when you hail that maiden
Aphroditic
"Child of the Zephyrs," "Offspring of the Dawn,"
'Cold in the head, I fear'—is what a critic
Concludes from rhymes like
"sc. n."

Or when you tell how "many a mile I plodded"
To see the Sun rise, I am lost to view
In Admiration; but to say you
"added Labour to Labour"—Phew!

Dear Peter, if another Spring
you tarry
"On this terrestrial ball," go drink your fill
Where, by the kerb, "Penny a Dishon—arry"
Echoes on Ludgate Hill.

(John D. Westwood, King's Terrace, Braehead, Bo'ness,
N.B.)

Good replies have also been received from Mrs. A.
E. Wise (Leicester), Frances
A. Manks (Halifax), Miss M.
C. Barnard (London, S.W.),
Nelly Burdett (Norwich),
F. Noel Bursill (Battersea Rise), Edith M. Evans (Nottingham), W. S. A. M. M. (Liverpool), M. A. Newman (Framlingham), C. W. Rodwell (Sutton-on-Hull), Jas.
Kennedy (Belfast), R. B. Boswell (Bassett), Rev. J. A.
Stokes Little (Fraserburgh), G. J. Baldock (Ropley), John Adair (Rathmues), Ada E. Mann (St. Anne's-on-Sea), E. Sumners (Dukinfield), Constance Goodwin (Clapham), Miss G. M. Northcott (West Kirby), Ernest F.
Seymour (Kilburn), R. F. Reynolds (Llanbedr), A. S.
Barnard (Walsall), Lily E. Lord (Amersham Common),
Richard H. Tripp (Liverpool), H. McDonnell (Glasgow),
P. J. Frawley (Coventry), M. C. Haythorne (Liverpool).

IV.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best review in not more than a hundred words is awarded to Mr Cyril G. Taylor, of Farr Hall, Heswall, Cheshire, for the following:

THE OPEN WINDOW. BY F. TEMPLE THURSTON.
(Chapman & Hall)

Of the making of books there is no end, but not often, unfortunately, do we come across a book of such fragrant thought as "The Open Window." It is the veriest trifle, yet how precious a trifle may be gauged from the knowledge that as the jaded town-dweller reads these leisurely entries in the Vicar of Framlingham's diary, the songs of birds will sound in his ears, and the scents of the flower-starred countryside come sweetly stealing to his nostrils. Mr Thurston has woven no daintier work: the illustrations of Charles Robinson admirably emphasise the delicacy of its texture.

We also select for printing:

THE INFERNO. BY AUGUST STRINDBERG.
Translated by CLAUD FIFID (Rider)

Strindberg believes he escaped madness and shows he did not escape even mania. For mental specialists let everyone else toss it on the fire—this book "realistically" pictures a sensual decadent's wearisome suspicions, Alchemy-dabbings, misokyny, omen-mongering. Finally, in a lucid interval, he sees himself truly, an example of how not to live, no prophet, but mere braggart, stripped before "the God who punishes."

De Quincey's record of self-indulgence is immortal because compact of genius; there is no genius here. Why translate such moribidity when Sweden has her Selma Lagerlöf, still far too little known to English readers?

(Rev. J. A. Stokes Little, The West Manse, Fraserburgh.)

THE CROCK OF GOLD. BY JAMES STEPHENS. (Macmillan.)

Mr. Stephens, in creating this amazing kaleidoscope of Philosophers, Wives, Children, Leprecauns, Policemen, Peasants,

Laurence Sterne.

From a painting in the possession of the Marquis of Lansdowne.

Thieves and Gods, has achieved an imaginative triumph. He is by turns ancient and modern, poetic and prosaic, fantastic and sensible, joyful and sorrowful, gives us pathos and bathos, is a realist, an idealist, and—superlatively—an Irishman!

The stealing of the Leprecaun's Crock of Gold; the troubles that resulted to a Philosopher and his wife; the annihilation of time and space, from Pan and Angus Og in their caves to the modern gaol, all help to link the twentieth century with the beginning of things.

(M. B. M., Glasgow.)

OSCAR WILDE

BY ARTHUR RANSOME
(Methuen)

Mr Ransome's finely-wrought critical study of Oscar Wilde, will, in its cheaper re-issue, gain
the wider popularity it deserves.
Within its small compass the author first compactly summarizes Wilde's sadly-marred life-story, then brings a fine critical faculty to bear on the careful analysis of his work.

The book claims the attention of all who would gain, by the light of clear, well-balanced criticism, an intimate picture of the brilliant, bizarre personality whose work has enriched our drama and found a permanent niche in literature.

(Alan C. Fraser, Dodington, Bridgwater.)

LESS THAN THE DUST BY MARY AGNES HAMILTON.
(Heinemann)

It is ignoble to run down one's country, stupid to misstate facts, unimaginative to dwell only on the faults of people or things.
Miss Hamilton, a Canadian born and bred, commits all these crimes in her crude, naively-constructed novel "Less than the Dust." Calèches are unknown in Montreal. Calèches with "luggage on top" are non-existent, there being no top. Brass spittoons are not "characteristically Canadian." There are Canadians who dress and speak like civilized beings. "Bush fires," do not rage in Quebec all Autumn, and she who ignor-antly decries our splendid river and the beauty of September trees deserves to have her opinions considered "Less than the Dust."

(M. G. Cook, 49, The Ramparts, Quebec, Canada.)

We specially commend the reviews sent in by Edna Smallwood (London, N.), Leo Delicati (Cotham, Bristol), Mary A. Wallis (Purley), W. M. Lodge (Upper Norwood,
S.E.), M. C. Barnard (London, S.W.), Lucy G. Chamberlain (Llandudno), Mary Kingdom (Leamington Spa),
A. E. Gowers (Haverhill), Horace W. Walker (Beeston, Notts), Frank Dale (Saxmundham), J. F. Parr (Clifton, Bristol), Miss H. Whiting (Littlehampton), J. B. Boulkes (Mellor, Derbyshire), Miss J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool),
Frances D. Watson (Heaton Moor, Lancs.), Irene Harrison (Redland, Bristol), Margaret Rey (Bournemouth), Mary Gillott (Eastwood, Notts.), Ernest F. Seymour (Kilburn, N.W.), H. Rhoda Butt (Littlehampton), W. F. Spalding (Palmer's Green, N.), R. F. Reynolds (Llanbedr, Merioneth), Marcella Whitaker (Earlsheaton, Dewsbury), Miss E. Rippon (Hull), Ivyllis Ema (Harrow-on-the-Hill), Miss
E. T. Wright (Tunbridge Wells), Miss M. E. Bradshaw-Isherwood (Colchester), Florence G. Fidler (London, N.W.), Robert Brewin (Loughborough), Muriel M. P.
Aikman (Glasgow, W.), Dorothy M. Horne (London,
W.C.), Margaret J. Laird (Belfast), John MacLaggart (Dollar, Scotland), and Bernard Gregory (Bristol).

V.—A PRIZE OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION to THE BOOKMAN is awarded to Miss Winifred Rich, of 55, Wonfield Street, Albert Bridge, Battersea
Park, S.W., and to Horace W. Walker, of 64, High Street, Beeston, Notts.

"THE BEST OF ALL GOOD LITTLE BOYS."*

BY WALTER SICHEL.

THIS is the book of the early letters of Lord John Russell, who wrote so many letters on so much that guided or affected affairs. A Whig of the Whigs, he proved typical of a period which bridges over the gulf between the late Georgian eddies and the mid-Victorian backwater. Nor was he least Whiggish when on his majority he entered Parliament, through his father's interest.

When he was barely nine his charming mother (and he was blest also in a fascinating stepmother) penned a beautiful letter to him. It was addressed "To the best of all good little boys." And the best of all good little boys Lord John remained through a life exceptionally long, strenuous, and useful. He was not perhaps gifted (though so he may have fancied) with any very strong force of imagination. And he was certainly no poet, though "poetry" he published, cultivated Moore, dreaded Byron, and condemned Shelley. Perhaps, too, vision—that sign-manual of genius—not infrequently failed him, nor did he discern the strange issues to which a logic of retail reason and what may almost be styled his fanatical latitudinarianism would ultimately lead. Moreover, indecision often gave a semblance of obstinacy, or obstinacy a show of indecision, so that of many Cabinets he was the enfant terrible—threatening to resign—and then not resigning. But no doubt can ever exist as to his single-mindedness or distinction. If he was not big enough to be great in the sense of leadership, if sometimes theory overmastered life and his sphere was larger than his scale, in the sense of championship great he certainly was. He initiated or forwarded most of the emancipating and educational movements that grew out of his time. He deserved every prize—though never for a full year was he Prime Minister—that the Whig Academy could bestow.

The truth is that with all his endowments he was a product of that school—he tended to be didactic. Abhorring cant, politically he liked preaching. As a youth under Playfair at Edinburgh he had joined the "Speculative Society," and the habit gained on him. For him England was to prove the moraliser of the Continent—a missioner of the Whig word. The Continent never quite relishes this attitude.

What, however, makes Lord John so interesting a representative of the Russells is his comprehensiveness. Otherwise he might have been, with all his virtues, a prig. But even as the pioneer of great movements or the starter of great cries—from Repeal to Reform, from Reform to the Edinburgh Letter (outside these volumes), from that manifesto to his denunciation of Cardinal Wiseman—he combined keen contrasts. Intensely English, he was also a bit of a cosmopolitan, as befitted the brother of a diplomatist, with whom he stayed at Torres Vedras while still aide-de-camp of Wellington in the Peninsular, and one who had conversed with Napoleon at an age when most were "coaching" for a degree. Yet philanthropy never extirpated patriotism, nor did the abstract humanitarian lose his love of sport. His Puritanism was not anti-Bohemian, and directly he got out of the Parliamentary pulpit he could romp like a boy. All this belongs to the eighteenth century. Intensely Whiggish, he yet adored the great Duke, nor would he go far enough to satisfy the extreme Radicals who came to dub him "Finality Jack." On the other hand, and especially concerning Ireland and Canada, he went too far and fast for Melbourne, or even for Lord Grey. But after his militant introduction of Reform in the spring of 1831 he wished to stride no further in the direction of votes. He was firmly opposed to the ballot, to triennial Parliaments, to most of the ready-made remedies afterwards demanded by the Chartists in which perhaps Macaulay alone among the Whigs foresaw the march of anti-national Socialism. Russell always upheld a real House of Lords. "To the Constitution in all its branches," he exclaimed in 1836, "I stand pledged by feeling, by opinion, and by duty." What would he have said now, he who in 1816 regarded a high income tax as a "dreadful calamity"? By the "People" Russell clearly meant the nation at large as opposed to engrossing sections. If he could not see that the "People" meant and means different things in different mouths, if his watchwords did not always stand for ideas, they did always and admirably stand for principles. He trimmed to no popular breeze.

These pages afford many and striking sidelights on the network of intrigue that hemmed in politics from the death of George the Fourth to the close of the second Melbourne ministry. It was a strange scene with the débris of Canning alternately intermixed or parting with uncongenial surroundings. Gradually both Stanley and, later, Palmerston quitted the Whig ranks, and through all the kaleidoscope Brougham is descried dictating, hectoring, embarrassing. "I am quite vexed," he writes in the September of 1831 to Lord John, "at the lingering pace of our bill. But if the anti-reformers do stop you, at all events be loud on the grievance—that puts the saddle on the right horse. Instead of doing so, what are you all about? You praise the enemy for his candour and fairness! . . ."

I have mentioned Lord John's frequent threats of resignation. These happened in 1832 on Irish Education, in 1834 when Stanley declared that he had "upset the coach," in the November of 1837 as "Finality Jack," and twice in 1839 respecting the Colonies. ". . . be it as you please," he then wrote to Lord Melbourne, "I shall give in my resignation next week and state that I thought the destinies of our Colonial Empire could no longer be continued in their present hands without imminent peril, that nothing but the utmost energy and activity are equal to the present emergency, and that not finding them to exist where they ought to be found I am compelled to leave office." And students of his career beyond the confines of these volumes will remember how, in 1855, after the Vienna Conference, he actually scuttled out of the Cabinet.

* "Early Correspondence of Lord John Russell, 1805-1810" Edited by his Son, Kollo Russell. In 2 Vols. 21s. net. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

All these are registers of a self-willed conscience, but of a conscience that does him honour.

He lived in the full swing and splendour of the world, but was never for a moment corrupted by it. Brilliant personages defile before us, and Lord John always wins and keeps their respect. He was not a wit, but wit and wits attracted him, nor was the least strange of his likings his penchant for Tom Moore. His delightful brother Lord William, a sparkling diplomatist, writes some of the best letters in these pages, and Rogers, too, and Sydney Smith show to advantage, but there are greater names than these in missives which Tom Moore must have handed on to his admiring friend. Among these is one of intense interest from Shelley about the changes that he was constrained to make in the text of "Laon and Cynthia," and there is also an important one from Lord John to Moore (who was then writing "Byron's Life") respecting his recollections of the "Memoirs." This confirms the story of Miss Chaworth wounding him when only twelve years old by exclaiming, "What do you

Lord John Russell.

Painted by Sir George Hayter; engraved by James Bromley, published 1836.
From "Early correspondence of Lord John Russell." Edited by his son, Rollo Russell.
(Fisher Unwin.)

think I can care about that lame boy?" while it pictures him sitting naked on a rock, "looking on the port of Athens," and records that the "Giaour" was written after his return from dances in the small hours of the morning. It is odd (in a previous letter) to find Lord John deeming "Childe Harold" more "dangerous" than Cain.

Lord John's home affections were tender and unselfish, as his attached and beloved stepdaughter,— only lately vanished from our midst—rejoiced to remember. Intellectually he had the quick clearness of a Frenchman. But he lacked the power of divination. He was unintuitive. "He has not comprehended," well wrote Disraeli in 1853, "that in the last twenty years the choice is between the maintenance of those institutions and habits of thought which preserve monarchy and that gradual change into an absolute democracy towards which the tendencies of the age seemed to impel Europe." Such an "absolute democracy" Lord John Russell would have detested. Yet to it, despite himself, he was to prove an unconscious contributor.

MARY WOLLSTONECRAFT:

A Letter and some Notes.*

BY ROGER INGPEN.

THE last literary work that engaged the attention of Mary Wollstonecraft was her novel entitled "The Wrongs of Woman, or Maria," the composition of which is said to have been in progress for a period of twelve months, and although it is very short, as we reckon the length of novels nowadays, she never lived to finish it. The story, which was given the place of honour in the collection of her posthumous works published by William Godwin in 1798, is a sordid one, based on the actual facts of her sister, Mrs. Bishop's, unhappy married life, and contains not a little of her own experiences with Imlay.

Allowing for the fact that the book might have been much improved had its author survived to prepare it for the press, it is interesting as showing Mary Wollstonecraft's solicitude to the last in the cause of suffering womanhood. As a realistic, revolting record of crime and shame, it is hardly less outspoken than Defoe. The story however has had an ardent advocate in the late Miss Mathilde Blind, whose opinion is certainly worthy of consideration, she, although not insensible to the book's defects, pays a high tribute to its merits, and says: "For originality of invention, tragic incident, and a certain fiery eloquence of style, this is certainly the most remarkable and mature of her works."

Godwin tells us, in his preface to the story, that its "purpose and structure had long formed a favourite subject of meditation with its author, and she judged them capable of producing an important effect. She was anxious to do justice to her conception and recommenced and revised the MS. several times." The story, so far as she had written it, was shown only to two persons, namely, to Godwin and to George Dyson, and on receiving Dyson's opinion she wrote to him the following letter which it is believed is now printed for the first time in its entirety, although portions were quoted in the prefaces by Godwin and Mary Wollstonecraft that accompany the "Wrongs of Women" in the Posthumous Works.

From MARY WOLLSTONECRAFT GODWIN.

Monday Morning,
No. 29, Polygon,
Somerset Town.

[Written probably during the summer of 1797.]

I have been reading your remarks and I find them a little discouraging. I mean I am not satisfied with the feelings which seem to be the result of the perusal. I was perfectly aware that some of the incidents ought to be transposed and heightened by more harmonious shading; and I wished to avail myself of yours and Mr. G.'s criticism before I began to adjust my events into a story, the outline of which I had sketched in my mind at the commencement; yet I am vexed and surprised at your not thinking the situation of Maria sufficiently important, and can only account for this want of—shall I say it? delicacy of feeling by recollecting that you are a man—For my part I cannot suppose any situation more distressing than for a woman of sensibility with an improving mind to be bound, to such a man as I have described, for life—obliged to renounce all the humanizing affections, and to avoid cultivating her taste lest her perception of grace, and refinement of sentiment should sharpen to agony the pangs of disappointment. Love, in which the imagination mingles its bewitching colouring must be fostered by delicacy—I should despise, or rather call her an ordinary woman, who could endure such a husband as I have sketched—yet you do not seem to be disgusted with him!!!

* (Copyright.)

These appear to me (matrimonial despotism of heart and conduct) to be the peculiar wrongs of woman, because they degrade the mind. What are termed great misfortunes may more forcibly impress the mind of common readers, they have more of what might justly be termed stage effect; but it is the delicacy of finer sensations, which in my opinion constitutes the merit of our best novels, this is what I have in view; and to show the wrongs of different classes of women equally oppressive, though from the difference of education, necessarily various.

I write in haste, and, therefore, can only add that if you will drink tea with me Wednesday or Thursday, I should prefer Wednesday, I would converse with you on the subject. I am engaged to-morrow and Friday.

I am not convinced that your remarks respecting the style of Jemima's story is just; but will reconsider it. You seem to me to confound simplicity and vulgarity. Persons who have received a miscellaneous education, that is one educated by chance, and the energy of their own faculties, commonly display the mixture of refined and common language I have endeavoured to imitate. Besides I do not like stalking horse sentences.

One word more strong Indignation in youth at injustice &c appears to me the constant attendant of superiority of understanding.

[To] MR. GEORGE DYSON, Ironmongers' Hall,
Fenchurch Street.

[Postmark illegible.]

We do not know what Dyson had to say of the story, but Mary's little burst of displeasure is characteristic, and, as may be judged from the book, she was unlikely to receive an adverse opinion without expostulation on her part. An example of Mary's passionate temper is to be seen in a letter which she wrote to Godwin during their short married life, when he was absent from her on a short holiday in the Midlands.* Of George Dyson, to whom Mary addressed this letter, we know little, but that little leads us to think he must have been a remarkable man. Godwin says he was translator of the "Sorcerer," and mentions him among the four principal oral instructors to whom he felt his mind indebted for improvement, the others being Joseph Fawcett, Thomas Holcroft and S. T. Coleridge. Mr. Kegan Paul describes him as "a young man whose abilities promised much, and whose ardour for literature, and whose desire to do right seemed to give assurance that such promise would be realised. Unfortunately, violent passions and a vehement temper ruined these hopes." Godwin seems to have done what he could to keep him straight, but neither remonstrance nor expostulation availed, and gradually their intimacy grew cold. Dyson, however, could not have been entirely estranged from his old friend, as can be seen by the fact that Mary consulted him in regard to her story, and we read that when she lay dying he was "one of the four friends who sat up nearly the whole of the last week of her existence in the house, to be dispatched on any errand, to any part of the metropolis, at a moment's warning."†

Mary Wollstonecraft.

From a painting by John Opie, R.A., in the National Portrait Gallery.

Mary Wollstonecraft.

From a painting by John Opie, R.A., in the National Gallery

It is added that "a few of the persons she most esteemed attended the ceremony" of her burial in the Parish Churchyard of St. Pancras, and that the monument to her memory was "erected by some of her friends"; we may be sure that George Dyson was one

* "William Godwin and His Friends and Contemporaries" By C. Kegan Paul. Vol. I, p. 267. 1876

† "Godwin's Memoirs of the Author of 'A Vindication of the Rights of Women,'" 1798.

Mary Wollstonecraft.

From an engraving by Ridley after the picture by J. Opie in the National Gallery.

of those to whom allusion is here made The inscription to Mary on the tomb is as follows

TO MARY WOLLSTONECRAFT GODWIN

AUTHOR OF

A VINDICATION
OF THE RIGHTS OF WOMEN

Born 27 April 1759

Died 10 September 1797

When the Midland Railway was constructed, it involved the removal of the graves of Mary Wollstonecraft, and of Godwin, who had been laid by her side, their grandson,

Mary Wollstonecraft's Tombstone.

Formerly placed over her grave in Old St. Pancras Churchyard, now in the Public Garden.

From a drawing by Dorothy Collins.

Sir Percy Florence Shelley, caused their remains to be conveyed to their present resting place at Bournemouth. The old tombstone, however, with the inscriptions to Mary, William Godwin and his second wife, was re-stated, where it may still be seen, in the public garden into which the old churchyard of St. Pancras has been converted. Another interest is attached to this old gravestone. On an eventful day in the spring of 1814 Shelley met Mary Godwin, then a girl between sixteen and seventeen, "in St. Pancras Churchyard by her mother's grave, and he, in burning words, poured forth the tale of his wild past—how he had suffered, how he had been misled, and how, if supported by her love, he hoped in the future years to enrol his name with the wise and good who had done battle for their fellow-men, and been true through all adverse storms to the cause of humanity. Unhesitatingly she placed her hand in his, and linked her fortune with his own."*

There are two portraits extant of Mary Wollstonecraft, both by John Opie, and both of them are national property. The painting in the National Portrait Gallery is probably the earlier, and it is certainly the more attractive picture. It is well known that Opie, unlike his great contemporaries Reynolds and Gainsborough, was not sophisticated enough to flatter his sitters, and therefore we probably have, in this painting, a very good likeness of the author of "A Vindication of the Rights of Women." In connection with her picture one is reminded of an interesting word-portrait in a letter of Southey to Cottle, of March 13th, 1797, in which he says:

"Of all the lions or literati I have seen here, Mary Imlay's countenance is the best, infinitely the best:

* "Shelley Memorials,"

Love, in which the imagination mingles its witching colouring must be fostered by delirium - I should despise, or rather call her an ordinary woman, who could endure such a husband as I have sketched - yet you do not seem to disquiet him!!!
(matrimonial disposition of head & conduct)
This appears to me to be the peculiar mark woman, because they deprave the mind, the termed great misfortunes may forcibly impress the mind of com. readers, they have

Facsimile of Mary Wollstonecraft's handwriting;
a portion of her letter to George Dyson.

the only fault in it is an expression somewhat similar to what the prints of Horne Tooke display— an expression indicating superiority; not haughtiness, not sarcasm, in Mary Imlay, but still it is unpleasant. Her eyes are light brown, and although the lid of one of them is affected by a little paralysis, they are the most meaning I ever saw."

This picture was formerly in the possession of William Godwin, who hung it over the fireplace in his parlour at Skinner Street, where it was seen by Robert Lloyd in 1800. It was engraved for the frontispiece to Godwin's memoir of his wife, published in 1798, and it has since many times been reproduced. From Godwin the portrait passed to his daughter, Mary Shelley; and it was bequeathed in July, 1899, to the National Portrait Gallery by her daughter-in-law Jane, Lady Shelley.

The authenticity of the National Gallery portrait of Mary Wollstonecraft has been questioned, and little appears to be known of its history. Her hair, which is represented as grey or powdered, makes her look somewhat more than thirty-seven: for she could not have been older when it was painted.

It is reasonable to assume that this is a genuine portrait of Mary Wollstonecraft, as a reversed engraving of the picture (which we reproduce) was published in 1796, during her lifetime, in the Monthly Mirror, and neither Mary nor Opie (to whom the picture is attributed) appear to have raised any protest or objection to the print. The picture was at one time owned by Mr. William Russell, who in 1867 contributed it to the exhibition of national portraits at South Kensington. It was subsequently purchased from Mr. Russell's collection by the Trustees of the National Gallery.

MRS. MEYNELL'S COLLECTED POEMS.*

BY KATHARINE TYNAN.

THERE could be nothing more expressive, more explanatory of Mrs. Meynell's unique personality in the literature of our day than the fact that her Collected Poems fill one slender volume of 117 pages, of which 65 are taken up by those precious early poems, "Preludes," which were published in the author's young girlhood. Her additional output here covers in all forty-one poems since "Preludes." While we wonder at the fertility of other writers in our days, we offer her the greater distinction of our wonder at her reticence. Who shall say if we ought to grieve or rejoice at this reticence? Whether we should grieve for the noble numbers she has not given us, or rejoice at the perfect fruition of her genius which the Collected Poems offer us, hailing it as the fruit of abstinence and self-denial? One thing is certain with "To the Body," "Two Boyhoods," "The Modern Mother," "The Two Poets," Mrs. Meynell moves on to take her place in the starry line—not among the minor lights, but the major—a fixed star.

One might say of her as she said of her father, whose silence she has almost emulated, that from her rejections, her reticences, many poets might have been equipped. So delicate, so austere, so choice is this Muse that one has a feeling, reading her poems, as though one had stepped from the roar of London into a sunny, deserted cloister of her own Italy. Not that she is not concerned with vital topics: she is of her time, of her womanhood, of her maternity. The modern problems are looked upon by her grave eyes. But she is as still, as withdrawn, as the Muse. In a somewhat vulgar age I can imagine no more complete antidote and remedy for vulgarity than this modern Muse.

In a little prefatory note to the Poems, the later poems are spoken of as being "composed." The word is most aptly and most happily chosen. Very few things are "composed" in this age. They are made violently, whether well or ill. Composition, composure—the two words of different meaning meet in one's mind. There is composure in these poems—the composure of an ancient marble, a head of Minerva, sightless and beautiful.

"Preludes" are here almost as they were published in the poet's girlhood. The few slight alterations hardly count. I do not know any poet whose work can stand without revision as hers can. There was no immaturity in "Preludes," though there was the wistfulness of youth, of Spring looking towards the fields of corn and the Autumn and Winter she cannot discern. "Preludes" gave Mrs. Meynell her place as an exquisite poet. The later poems confirm the early verdict and enhance it. Some of the delicate lyrical quality of "Preludes"—Mrs. Meynell's poetry has never been obviously lyrical—has gone with the Spring. I think of strains of music like—

"And when some Midsummer shall be Hither will come some little one,
Dusty with bloom of flowers is he,
Sit on a ruin in the tall long sun
And flunk, one foot upon his knee.

"And where they wrought, these lives of ours,
So many-worded, many-souled,
A north-west wind will take the towers,
And dark with colour, sunny and cold,
Will range along among the flowers.

"And here or there, at our desire,
The little clamorous owl shall sit,
Through her still time; and we aspire
To make a law (and know not it)
Unto the life of a wild briar."

In this poem—"Builders of Ruins" in "Sœur Monique," in "San Lorenzo's Mother," we know this music and magic. In the later poems—not that her poems ever dance and sing, as some lyrics do—the music is more difficult. The thought is more difficult. It exacts at least a temporary exaltation in the reader towards the mind of the writer. If her kingdom is not for the violent it is still less for the sloven and the careless. It lifts one to something of its own heights or it is out of reach altogether. It takes something of discipleship to follow poetry like "To the Body," "The Two

Photo by Mr. Sherril Schell.

Mrs. Meynell.

* Poems. By Alice Meynell. The Collected Edition. 5s. net. (Burns & Oates.)

Poets" and "Two Boyhoods." In these the music is fused—beats through the great poetry. One feels one's responsibility in making that epithet. The noble pleasure of praising is so apt to carry one away when one is under delight as under spells. There is a strange music as of an Æolian harp as wistful, but stronger, in "The Two Poets."

"Whose is the speech
That moves the voices of this lonely beech
Out of the long west did this wild wind come?
Oh, strong and silent! and the tide was dumb,
Ready and dumb until
The dumb gale struck it on the darkened hill

"Two memories,
Two powers, two promises, two silences,
Closed in this cry, closed in these thousand leaves,
Articulate This sudden hour retrieves
The purpose of the past,
Separate, apart, embraced, embraced at last.

"Whose is the word?
Is it I that speak? Is it thou? Is it I that heard?
'Thine earth was solitary, yet I found thee,
Thy sky was pathless, but I caught, I bound thee'
Thou Visitant Divine,
O thou, my Voice, the word was thine, was thine."

Side by side with this beauty, that soars almost out of sight, there are simplicities. There are modernities as well as the eternal verities. This is a modern muse, for the poet is of her moment and her day. She is not lost, not out of sight in the ether in which she sings. She has the modern responsibilities which in the old days were for the priest and the poet. She has the "great grave grievful air" of Pompalia, as she is like her—

"Careful for a whole world of sin and pain."

These Collected Poems have finality. One imagines Mrs. Meynell will not collect her poems five years hence, nor ten years hence, like the too-fluent of these days. Before this time she has come to be judged by her peers. Perhaps Francis Thompson used the final and fitting phrase for her—which lovers of poetry will know for themselves. But those who delight in derivations may turn to that portrait of Mrs. Meynell's father in "The Rhythm of Life," recalling as they read Francis Thompson's

"Memnonian lips
Smitten with singing from thy mother's East."

If great men have had great mothers is it not equally true—may it not be equally true—that great women have had great fathers? Might not this which she wrote of her father be written of her with inessential alterations?

"It was a common reproach against him that he never acknowledged the obligation to any kind of restlessness. The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, but as he did none there was nothing for it but that the kingdom of heaven should yield to his leisure. The delicate, the abstinent, the reticent graces were his in the heroic degree . . . He was not inarticulate: he was only silent. He had an exquisite style from which to refrain. The things he abstained from were all exquisite."

---

New Books.

---

THE GODS ARE ATHIRST.*

In this brilliant and remarkable book Anatole France creates for us the atmosphere of the Revolution. It is a story of Paris in '93, that climax year of the Terror, and it impresses us so strongly because the author makes us see how it was that ordinary and high-minded men drifted little by little into the wildest orgies. The hero is one, Gamelin, a young painter of austere moral character, who, with the most exemplary intentions, develops into an atrocious and bloody-minded fanatic. In his personality one feels that Anatole France has given one the key to the mad suspicions of the Terror. These lovers of the State, of abstract justice, and of fraternal love, could never believe that others were as disinterested as themselves, and could never believe, moreover, that the universal peace and goodwill so desired by all could come upon earth until the last "traitor" had been sent to the guillotine. Here, in the contrast between Gamelin's private and public life, and in the clear picture we have of the progressive stages of his fanaticism, we grasp the strange and contorted reasons of the Terror. Anatole France has lifted a corner of that veil just as Dickens lifted a corner of it in "A Tale of Two Cities." For the atmosphere of both books is curiously similar to a point—and, because of that, all the more convincing.

* "The Gods are Athirst." By Anatole France. Translated by Alfred Allinson. 6s. (John Lane.)

I have called Gamelin the "hero" of the book, for the story pivots round him, but perhaps the real hero is the old doll-maker (ex-millionaire) Brotteaux. He is the sort of man very dear to the heart of Anatole France—a kindly, sceptical, voluptuous cynic, who enjoys and despises life, and whose chief remaining pleasure is reading Lucretius. Anatole France has drawn the type in various books. Brotteaux ends as, indeed, Gamelin ends, in the usual way—under the knife of the guillotine. It is a fate very apt to overtake the characters of this work, although a fair sprinkling are left alive at the close. For it is a crowded canvas and many, many people slip across its polished surface. They all help towards the general impression and some of them are in themselves full of interest. There is, for instance, Elodie, Gamelin's lover, a soft, sensuous, agreeable girl, who is both attracted and repulsed by the revolutionist; and there is Madame Rochemaure, a schemer and a profligate; and there is the old Barnabite priest Père Longuemare, a saintly old man who dies bravely and is more annoyed at being mistaken for a Capuchin than at his sentence of death; and, indeed, there are a host of others I have not space to mention.

Here, as elsewhere, Anatole France displays a wealth of minute learning. He is a master of unobtrusive detail.

It is not necessary, at this time of day, to speak of the exquisite preciseness and finish of his style. In fact, in a translation, however distinguished, it would be hardly fair to do so. But what may puzzle some English readers is his ironic attitude towards life, out of which peeps, ever and anon, a glimpse of the cloven hoof. It may puzzle them, and it may displease them, but to students of Anatole France it is a delight for ever.

RICHARD CURIE.

WILLIAM MORRIS.*

Much has been written about William Morris, but he was a man whose personality was so clearly more than any one of his activities, that a book such as Mr. Compton Rickett's is by no means a superfluous. For it is neither biography nor pure criticism, but an attempt to give what the author calls "the personal equation of Morris."

For this purpose he has divided his book into five sections, dealing respectively with "The Manner of Man," "The Poet," "The Craftsman," "The Prose Romancer," and "The Social Reformer." The first is, of course, in a manner preliminary to the others, and, with Mr. Cunningham-Graham's very characteristic introduction, forms the most interesting part of the book. It contains stories, certainly, which one has heard before, but they were worth repeating, and the effect of the whole is to confirm the impression given by Mr. Mackail and, perhaps more vividly, by Lady Burne-Jones in her life of her husband. Morris, apart from what he did, was one of the most striking of the nineteenth century personalities. More than any of them, he overtopped his achievement. It is for this reason that he has become something of a legend, and we turn to information about himself with greater zest than to his writings.

One wonders, indeed, how long Morris will outlive the personal tradition. The inevitable reaction, which will come some day, towards romance will probably lift him to a high pinnacle of fame, but it is curious that he is read as much as he appears to be by a generation which loves realism and psychological analysis. For Morris eschewed these things with a thoroughness almost unparalleled. Mr. Compton Rickett says that he took little interest in the individual, which is a remarkable characteristic for a modern artist. It was not one which he shared with Rossetti, who, for all his remoteness and the dreamlike quality of much of his poetry, could, when he chose, portray human character with relentless truth. Nor would it seem to have been innate in the author of that fine piece of analysis, "The Defence of Guenevere." It cannot be said of so sincere a worker as Morris that his work was produced on a theory, but he certainly arrived at a slightly artificial attitude towards life which affected all his activities. For Mr. Compton Rickett's book is only divided into sections for the sake of convenience. Though his work was so varied in kind, it was practically homogeneous. Primarily he was a designer, and he applied his sense of design not only to wallpapers but to poetry, and ultimately to life. The result was a certain flatness in his conception of both "The Life and Death of Jason," and "The Earthly Paradise" have often been compared to tapestries, and even "Sigurd the Volsung" is only pattern of a more vigorous rhythm. But we cannot regard wallpapers and poetry in the same way. A wallpaper or any other work of pure design is successful not when it attracts our attention, but when it becomes an enhancement, only subconsciously apprehended, of our well-being. Poetry requires not only our full attention, but also time, and when it is as voluminous as "The Earthly Paradise" a great deal of time. If one had to look at a wallpaper for as long as it takes to read "The Earthly Paradise" one would become a lifelong devotee of distemper. This, of course, is an inaccurate comparison, but it does indicate a real weakness in Morris's literary work, whether prose or poetry. The charge, admitted but justified by Mr. Compton Rickett, that there are no mountain-peaks in his poetry, cannot be lightly put aside. We require mountain-peaks in poetry.

Morris seems to have believed that by making his art impersonal he would socialise it. But the only poetry that lives is the intense expression or else the vivid portrayal of individual life. The mistake was akin to his mistake about life, which he embodied in "News from Nowhere," that charming idyll of unutterable boredom.

Nevertheless, Morris was a great man because he was a great idealist. His ideals may not be ours, but we must acknowledge their fineness. His poetry, his social theories, even his craftsmanship may grow out of date, but so long as there are men alive who knew him in the flesh, and are capable of transmitting some of their enthusiasm to the world at large, his personality will be remembered and revered. Mr. Compton Rickett's book, cavil as we may at some of the criticisms in it, contains delightful pages of personal reminiscence.

Mr. A. Compton Rickett.

Not its least valuable part for the student of the Victorian age, is the "Analytical Biography." Divided into four columns, headed "Events in Morris's Life," "Social Political, Religious," "Literature and Art"; "Comments", it forms a skeleton, which it requires only a moderate degree of imagination to clothe with flesh, of the intellectual activities of a great epoch and their effect on a mind at once receptive and creative. Some of the details given, if considered by themselves, are trivial, but they all have their significance in the scheme. It was a great age, and Morris, if not one of its greatest figures, was at any rate worthy to stand in their august assembly.

FRANCIS BICKLEY

GOLDWIN SMITH'S CORRESPONDENCE.*

Mr. Goldwin Smith was fortunate in his friends. They included many of the eminent men of his time, and with those in England—as the selection of letters collected by his literary executor shows—he maintained assiduous correspondence after he went to Toronto and settled down at The Grange. From his Canadian retreat he pronounced judgment on the affairs of the world, holding his opinions strongly and expressing them with unbounded confidence. Although the collected letters do not arouse affection for the writer, it is evident that he had the power of grappling friends. This is shown by the cordial and admiring address signed by some old Oxford friends and others, including the Duchess of Albany, on the occasion of his eightieth birthday. Most of the letters in the volume are from Goldwin Smith himself. There are only a few from the distinguished persons to whom he writes. The reason for this is obvious, and while the interest in a sense is lessened by the one-sidedness of the correspondence, it brings into unrelieved prominence the opinions of a man who had certainly great energy of mind. According to Mr. Frederic Harrison, "anything Goldwin Smith wrote for publication or of serious purpose is worth careful consideration—and that whether one agrees with his conclusion or not." This is the justification for the volume.

* "Goldwin Smith's Correspondence." Edited by Arnold Haultain. 18s. (T. Werner Laurie)

* "William Morris: A Study in Personality." By Arthur Compton Rickett. 7s. 6d. net (Herbert Jenkins)

"Assuredly," says Goldwin Smith's literary executor, "he was really a great man." Yet he was deficient in charity. It is also claimed that he was "a most far-seeing man"; yet he made confident predictions which were completely falsified. Writing in 1881 with reference to the Liberal succession he says that when Mr. Gladstone goes "it is likely that there will be a Whig Ministry in which Lord Derby, the arch bell-weather of all safe men, will be a leading personage." The description of Lord Derby is good, but the prediction was short-sighted. Goldwin Smith was mistaken also as to the fate of Canada. "Within ten years," he wrote in 1878, "unless some strange turn of the tide takes place, Canada will be where she ought to be—in the Union." "The certain end is annexation," he said in 1880; and again in 1883 he wrote of that "which must come or ought to come, and which the true interest of the English people would lead everyone to wish should come—the union of Canada with the continent of which Nature has made her a part." Thirty years have passed since then and Canada remains a loyal portion of the British Empire.

Contempt was excited in Goldwin Smith by the flunkeydom (to use his own word) which was prepared to throw itself at the feet of the Marquis of Lorne and the Princess Louise when they went to Canada. He wrote to Mr. Gladstone and others in disgust at sickening scenes of flunkeyism "Toronto," as he informed a friend in 1879, "is just now in a paroxysm of vulgar flunkeyism, called forth by the visit of the Princess and her husband. My wife proposed to me at once to fly and I readily consented, though I should rather have preferred to stay and stand aloof. We left all our neighbours (literally) practising presentation bows and curtsies for a monkeyish imitation of a 'drawing-room' which the Princess was to have." But in 1881 there is a letter from the Marquis of Lorne, thanking "Dear Professor Goldwin Smith," for "your most pleasant and interesting gift. Some of the Essays are old friends of mine and others will be companions in my mind now that you have allowed me to make their acquaintance."

Almost all our leading statesmen for two generations excited Goldwin Smith's spleen. Disraeli was "thoroughly vile," "a political sharper," "an unscrupulous trickster and liar." "You are an incorrigible Coriolanus," wrote Goldwin Smith to Lord Salisbury in 1870, and more seriously in 1881 he accused him of intemperate vituperation. Lord Randolph Churchill was "the spawn and ape of Dizzy." Goldwin Smith corresponded with Mr. Gladstone and visited him at Hawarden, but lost sympathy with him on account of his Irish policy, and exchanged sympathetic letters with his old friend, Lord Selborne, concerning the Liberal leader's loss of conscience and "senile craving for power." "Gladstone is unspeakable," he wrote in 1890. Mr. Chamberlain as a Radical seemed to him very mischievous. He saw England in 1885 "put up to Dutch auction by Lord Randolph Churchill and Mr. Joseph Chamberlain," and he deplored the "demagogic falsities which Chamberlain, Morley and Co. pour out." There is a letter from Mr. Chamberlain in 1887, saying that if he went to Canada he would look forward with pleasure to the opportunity of seeing Goldwin Smith. Subsequent events, however, led to a renewal of the censor's severe strictures. During the Boer War Goldwin Smith, in denouncing it, described Mr. Chamberlain as "an amazingly clever but a shallow and vulgar politician," and he derided "Kipling and his crew" as well as Mr. Chamberlain's "pack." Mr. Chamberlain was an "arch-intriguer," and his whole career, according to a letter to Lord Rosebery, written at the outset of the Tariff Reform Campaign, had been that of a plunger, while the writer commented to another correspondent on "the imbecility of Balfour, the weakest Prime Minister that England ever had, at all events since the Duke of Newcastle, in the time of George II." Sir Henry Campbell Bannerman for a season enjoyed his favour, but he told Lord Mount Stephen, in 1906, that though a skilful party manager "C. B." was not a statesman.

Even about contemporary authors and their books Goldwin Smith had usually something severe to say. He thought that Froude's imagination, "which particularly loves to play with matrimonial infelicities," had greatly exaggerated the Carlyle-Ashburton scandal. When Matthew Arnold wrote to him about "Natural Law in the Spiritual World" Goldwin Smith read Drummond again, "and for the second time I laid him down with the reflection that he was most ingenious, but too good to be true." Nine years later, writing to a lady who had brought Drummond's "Ascent of Man" to his notice, he said it seemed to him like Mr. Kidd's theory, to be a crude fancy which dazzled and would pass away. There are several letters from Matthew Arnold. In one, written on the eve of his resignation of school inspectorship, he said: "One or two things in verse which all my life I have wished to do, I am now probably too old to do well; but on this point I hope the inward monitor will inform me rightly if I make the attempt to do them. One of them is a Roman play, with Clodius, Milo, Lucretius, Cicero, Cæsar, in it; Arthur Stanley was always interested, dear soul, in this project."

While Goldwin Smith's letters do not lead us to love the writer or to credit him with generous mindedness, the frank comments on the events of forty years, written by one in communication with eminent contemporaries, have naturally much piquancy and some value. The date, "January 11th, 1868," at the head of the letter (on p. 11) to William Rivièrè, is evidently wrong, as it contains a reference to the election which did not take place till the end of that year, but, on the whole, the work of the editor has been done carefully. He has refrained from making too many notes. The letters as a rule, explain themselves.

A. MACKINTOSH.

OUR VILLAGE.*

Mr. W. J. Roberts has written a fresh biography of Mary Russell Mitford, because "her name is not a familiar one to this generation." There is not very much fresh material in the book, but there is some, and it is welcome. He has produced a good workmanlike biography. The illustrations are good and the book is handsomely produced. It is instructive to compare the ten portraits of the author of "Our Village." Mr. Roberts calls her life "The Tragedy of a Blue Stocking." The worthless father was the black shadow that filled the great part of her years with care and trouble. He was a handsome, kindly, selfish gambler, who skulked through life sponging on wife and daughter for a home, for the payment of the cost of his extravagant habits and for the liquidation of his gambling debts.

When she was ten years of age her father decided to buy her a lottery ticket and she selected 2224 because the

* "Mary Russell Mitford: The Tragedy of a Blue Stocking." By W. J. Roberts. 10s. 6d. net. (Melrose.)

Miss Mitford's Cottage at Three Mile Cross, as it is to-day (1913), with the sign of The Swan Inn on the one hand and Brownlow's shop on the other.

From "Life and Friendships of Mary Russell Mitford," by W. J. Roberts (Melrose).

separate figures when added together made up the number of her years. Strange to say, this ticket was drawn for the prize of £20,000. But worthy Dr. Mitford appropriated to his own uses this sum which would have secured his daughter's comfortable independence for life. She was a precocious child and read the "Théâtre de Voltaire" when she should have been engaged in harp practice. There was no real harm done, for Mary and her father both suffered from a complete incapacity for music. Her reading was as extensive as it was varied, if we may judge by the fact that in one month she drew from a circulating library fifty-five volumes of fiction, belles-lettres, travel and biography. She was then a young woman in her twenties. Like most young authors Mary Mitford began with verse. Her second book, based on the history of the mutineers of the Bounty was submitted to Coleridge whose alterations were not accepted without hesitation on the part of Mary, whilst they excited the indignation of her mother. The father's imprisonment for debt in 1811 made it increasingly important that literature should yield money. The one book that securely remains of her work is "Our Village," and yet when some of the sketches of which it is made up were submitted to Thomas Campbell for the New Monthly Magazine, he unhesitatingly rejected them! When they appeared in the Lady's Magazine, they at once sent up the circulation in a most gratifying manner. Her excursions into the drama were less successful; her "Foscari" involved much labour and repeated revision, and was rejected unconditionally by Macready's manager. Yet when, later, it was produced it was successful. "Julian" brought her £200 from an eight-days' run. Her "Rienzi" led to an attack on Macready in Blackwood, and to a serious breach with that sensitive and easily offended actor. Her "Charles I" was subnitted by the licenser of plays to the Lord Chamberlain for his judgment, and as Cromwell was not represented as merely a vulgar hypocrite, the Duke of Montrose had no hesitation in prohibiting its performance. And his successor the Duke of Devonshire felt bound by the action of his predecessor not to remove the ban! But he accepted the dedication when, after its success at the Victoria, it was printed. In 1837 she received a State pension of £100. Her father died in December, 1842, and his debts were paid by a public subscription. His wife had predeceased him and Mary was now alone. It is pleasant to think that after so many years of worry and anxiety, due, it has to be remembered, to the than of most, it may be said that her very failings endeared her, so that even the scorn for such a worthless character as her father is turned away by the warmth—the extravagance—of his daughter's filial affection.

Mr. Roberts' book is destitute of an index. Why will authors and publishers present to the reader nearly four hundred pages bristling with the names of persons, places and books, without the slightest clue to their whereabouts? It has been proposed to make an indexless book a penal offence, it is certainly an outrage on the amenities of literature. It is a melancholy fact that her biographers, Lestrangle and Chorley and J. T. Fields (who as a model publisher ought to have known better) also refrained from indexes. It is surely an elementary fact in the art of sane book production that a volume dealing with a multitude of facts should have an index, and a good one. They are blind to their real interests who neglect this duty.

Mr. Roberts refers to Miss Mitford's great "and deep-seated objection to Mrs. Beecher Stowe:

"It arose principally from disapproval of certain derogatory statements about Lord Byron and his matrimonial relations which Mrs. Stowe had expressed to friends of Miss Mitford's, and which, after Miss Mitford's death, were published in the work entitled 'Lady Byron's Vindication.' . . . Thus, when 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' was published in this country, Miss Mitford refused to give any credence to the revelations it contained."

This theory will not hold water. "Uncle Tom's Cabin" was published in book form at Boston in March, 1852, and was immediately reprinted in this country and was bought by the public as fast as the publishers could produce copies. In 1854 appeared the "Key to Uncle Tom's Cabin" which furnishes circumstantial evidence for the truth of every statement as to the horror and villainy of American slavery. Mrs. Stowe met Lady Byron in 1853, and later had an authorised communication, but it was not until 1856 that she received from her the full statement which was published in 1860. Nor was Mrs. Stowe uncharitably disposed to Byron before she heard his widow's narrative. That she did not condone his vices because of his genius is quite true, and is certainly not discreditable. It will be an evil day when it is held that obedience to the moral law is only for the stupid. "The ten commandments will not budge" even for the brightest heaven-born genius. Let us be charitable, and make every allowance for temptation, but we have no right to blur the distinction between complete selfishness of her father, whom she idolized, the latter years of her life were peaceful and happy. After more than three-score years mainly spent in strenuous toil, but sweetened by many gracious friendships, and lightened by an inveterate optimism, Mary Russell Mitford, fittingly known in her own locality as the "Kind Lady," entered into rest, leaving behind a fragrant memory. Of her, more

Right and Wrong. Miss Mitford speaks disparagingly of Mrs. Stowe from the first, could not read her book, but—condemned it. She was badly informed as to the politics of slavery in the American nation and spoke of it as "a point which all the world knows to be its chief difficulty" at a moment when the slave-holders gloried in the "peculiar institution" and defended it by the foulest methods. A price was set on the head of Garrison and "abolitionists" went in daily danger of lynching. Miss Mitford speaks of Webster's defence of slavery and of his refusal of the Presidency, when he died, as most people think, mainly of the chagrin caused by the refusal of his Party to nominate him, and of the moral indignation aroused by his attitude, an indignation that found expression in Whittier's poem of "Ichabod." Did Mary Mitford ever read those famous lines in which he laments Webster's downfall?—

"Of all we loved and honoured, naught
Save power remains, —
A fallen angel's pride of thought
Still strong in chains
All else is gone; from those great eyes
The soul has fled.
When faith is lost, when honour dies,
The man is dead!
Then pay the reverence of old days
To his dead fame;
Walk backward with averted gaze,
And hide the shame!"

Why Miss Mitford judged Mrs. Stowe adversely without reading her book is a mystery and so is her dictum that "Cranford" is a caricature. Such perversities show that even the sweetest temperaments may have their lapses into detraction.

The British Museum Catalogue records seventeen different books from the pen of Mary Mitford, not counting works of which she was the editor. There must also be many contributions to periodicals which have never been collected in book form. Her biographers do not seem to know that an early "Ode to Consumption" by her appeared in the European Magazine. The winnow of Time has scattered most of her writings into oblivion. Even "Belford Regis" is not kept in print. But one bright jewel remains, and "Our Village" endears to this generation as to its predecessors the gentle spirit of Mary Russell Mitford.

WILLIAM F. A. AXON.

NOVELISTS OF PROMISE AND PERFORMANCE.*

It is said that conscience makes cowards of us all; but I venture the proposition that there is more than one kind of conscience. There is, for instance, the literary conscience: that inward monitor which resides in the mind of the critic and forces him to express his honest opinion even in the teeth of his own former prejudices and prepossessions. And speaking only for myself, of course, such literary conscience as I possess, instead of making me a coward is more inclined to make me over-bold.

Thus I am irresistibly impelled to say that that book on my list which is the worst from one point of view is the best from another point of view.

In "The Gay Adventure" and "In Old Madras" we have the sort of typical yarn which our present-day novelists of every grade and order are turning out at the rate (I think) of dozens a week. They mostly attain a certain rather high level of workmanlike excellence. They are all worth reading—if you have nothing better to do, and the hammock in the garden, the deck-chair on the beach, or the boat on the river, call to you to bask in the sunshine and to read so long as you can keep your eyes open.

Mrs. B. M. Croker is, of course, an old hand of established reputation, from whom one always expects and as invariably gets a good story, well-told, of a kindly turn of humour, shrewd yet tender, and alive with bright dialogue. In this, her latest novel, she has to tell of a modern Quixote who went out to India on an obviously impossible quest. The book moves briskly and easily from incident to incident, always maintaining its interest, but chiefly notable—as all Mrs. Croker's stories are—for its vivid and diverting pictures of Indian life, and for its faithful presentment of the various phases and types of Anglo-Indian society. Incidentally she gets in plenty of dramatic action and one real thrill of horror toward the end. Indeed, the only thing I don't like about her book is its eccentric punctuation, which is sometimes so very eccentric as to obscure the sense of her words. Mrs. Croker scatters commas over her pages as from a pepper-pot.

* "The Drummer of the Dawn." By Raymond Paton. (Chapman & Hall).—"In Old Madras." By Mrs. B. M. Croker. (Hutchinson & Co.).—"The Gay Adventure." By Richard Bird. (Wm. Blackwood & Sons.).—"Lu of the Ranges." By Eleanor Mordaunt. (Heinemann).—"The Heart of the Hills." By John Fox. (Constable.) 6s. each.

Then there is Mr. Richard Bird—a name new to me—with his "Gay Adventure." There is, to my taste, something slightly unpleasant in the tone and flavour of this book. The hero is rather a boulder and even a bit of a cad at times. He belongs to the type that kisses and tells. And, besides, one imagines him as being far too much engrossed in a woman's lips and ankles and not sufficiently impressed by the glory of her eyes, the splendour of her soul. But this is not said in any spirit of very strong disparagement. Mr. Bird knows his business thoroughly, and has given us in this novel just the kind of story for a long hot afternoon.

"Lu of the Ranges" and "The Heart of the Hills" belong to a different school of art altogether. They are planned on epic lines, and one of them at least—"Lu of the Ranges"—only just misses greatness. There is a poignancy and a power in the art of Miss Eleanor Mordaunt which, I should say, will carry her very far in the future. She has the large view and the broad methods of a real seer of life. In the space at my disposal it is quite impossible to give you any adequate idea, not only of the scope of her story, but of its force and beauty. She has too a fine sense of character which only suffers perhaps from an occasional tendency to over-emphasis, over-elaboration. But this is after all a fault on the right side, for it is better to be too definite than too shadowy and vague. And anyway "Lu of the Ranges" is distinctly a book to buy and to treasure—as the vast majority of Mr. Heinemann's publications are.

"The Heart of the Hills," which is plainly by a well-versed and practised writer, is an American production, and has all the peculiar distinction of style and form which characterizes so much of the work of modern American novelists. This is also a good book, and yet it does not quite (as the saying goes) come off. The opening, for instance, is a little confusing and hard to follow. Too many people of the same kind are introduced in too quick succession and not clearly enough differentiated, so that it is rather difficult to sort them out. But once this preliminary obstacle is overcome I can promise you nothing but most excellent entertainment.

And now I come to the book, "The Drummer of the Dawn," which I have already described—though not out of any love of paradox for its own sake—as at once the worst and the best book on my list. It is the worst because it is the most crude; it is so obviously written by a very young man who has not yet by any means mastered the technique of his craft and who has not yet found the measure of either his strength or his weakness. And yet it is the best book because it is the most individual and therefore the most promising. In the course of about twenty years' novel-reading and novel-reviewing I have never read a book which has more deeply impressed me with a sense of its intrinsic originality. As I have hinted it is full of faults. It is now and then almost banal in its vain striving after effect. And yet I repeat that it is, notwithstanding its many and painful blemishes, stamped and gilded with the hall-mark of genius. I would just like to quote one passage in justification of this high praise.

The scene is Morocco, but only a small part of the action of the story takes place there:

"Aping-Ayres gritted his teeth, for he knew now they were going to torture him if he did not consent.

"It may have been at Chelsea, or it may have been at quiet little Orpington, seeming now so far away, that Aping-Ayres had first learned to address his Maker. His lips moved, whilst a wild prayer was silently uttered that he might have the strength to go through and die before he consented.

"Al Aarasch sneered. 'The Nazarene calls upon his God,' he thought. 'We will see if his God will help him greatly.'

"Yes, Al Aarasch, and all such as you, despite the written detractions of a few, and the professed unbelief of many, the poor tortured body of Him whom little Tinwhumpunny had called the Poet Son of the King of Kings, whose every wound has had the priceless power to uplift five continents for two thousand years, which has likewise the power to lift for ever all the cruelty, all the hideousness from the lives of women and little children, to protect them, alike with strong men, will have the power now to help this man whom you call a Nazarene, and whom you despise because he is utterly at your mercy.

"By the unutterable torture of the cross, by the deep-hammered nail-marks, and by the Holy crown of thorns will he be delivered, whatever you do to him.

"The dear White Christ was ever the Friend of the Helpless, and will abide with him, now and always.

As the discerning will observe for themselves, even this short passage has its lapses from perfect taste, its touches of extravagance and vain-glory; but, even so, it has a quality of simple dignity and elemental force which I think gives it very high rank as a piece of purely literary art.

"The Drummer of the Dawn," is mainly about a wonderful boy—little Tinwhumpunny—a boy who succeeds in being precocious without becoming boring. There is also Aping-Ayres who is saved from shame and ruin by his love for little Tinwhumpunny. There are many others, all finely and delicately and yet most strongly hinted. And above all there is one character, that of an old clothes man, as horribly haunting as anything I have ever read, even in Edgar Allan Poe. This figure stalks through the book like some ghastly spectre, some evil genius, with an effect of Greek tragedy.

But you must buy "The Drummer of the Dawn," and read it for yourself if you want to be able, a few years hence, to sit with the prophets and boast that you also were present at the debut of the new literary genius, Raymond Paton.

EDWIN PUGH

RAHEL VARNHAGEN.*

"Rahel was not a brilliant writer; no great practical achievement can be credited to her; there was nothing conspicuously romantic about her life," as Mr. Havelock Ellis says in his introduction to this book; yet she has her place among the great women who have played no small part in the social history of the world. She was the Madame de Staël of Germany; and Carlyle ranked her above Madame de Staël. Unquiet spirits of her time who were seeking after some higher way of life than that prescribed by custom and convention frequented her salon and found inspiration in her friendship. She anticipated many of the ideals and ideas that are the driving force behind the feminist movement of our own day, and the strength and originality of her character lay in a certain noble simplicity and the fearless frankness with which she gave utterance to the most unorthodox and revolutionary of her thoughts. Her opinions on marriage, her theories of morality (that squared very much with George Eliot's) must have startled the puritanical; but how are you to think anything but good of a woman whose husband could say that he had found her "the most innocent, tender, pure, delicate, upright and pious person he had ever known, the most chaste in the highest sense of the word?" He said: "the genuineness that underlay all Rahel's life and actions was so great that beside her all others appeared commonplace," that she had "acuteness, wit, imagination, sense, a pure enthusiastic view, the noblest veracity, but the innocence and naïveté of this truthful human heart are the most beautiful things my eyes have ever beheld."

It is not in her writings, but in herself, in her rare personality that the world still takes a living interest. Ellen

* "Rahel Varnhagen." By Ellen Key. With an Introduction by Havelock Ellis. Translated by A. G. Chater. 6s net. (Putnam.)

Key ranks her as "the greatest woman the Jewish race has produced; to my mind also the greatest woman Germany can call her daughter." The one book of hers which counts is that containing her letters; these without any magic of style retain so much of the charm of her personality that her biographer can say there is no other woman's book in the world's literature, except Elizabeth Barrett Browning's poems, that she would be more sorry to do without.

Photo by Bruckmann

Rahel Varnhagen in 1796.

From the bas-relief by Friedrich Tieck.

From "Rahel Varnhagen," by Ellen Key (Putnam).

Ellen Key's aim has been to give not so much a biography as a portrait of this remarkable woman, and it is an aim in which she has been brilliantly successful. Her portraiture is at once sympathetic and impartial; it explains and justifies a character that needed some explaining because of its very simplicity. We recommend the book to all who support or oppose the woman's movement, for Rahel Varnhagen was one of its pioneers, and her spirit lives in it still.

THE ROMANCE OF REPORTING.*

Nowadays, says Mr. Frank Dilnot on the first page of a very pleasant book of reminiscences, the newspaper reporter is diplomat, business organiser, detective, man of affairs and politician all in one. It is reassuring to find, in a later chapter, the opinion that he is also a humanitarian and light philosopher, that to hard ability such as that sort of plurality implies he should add the temperament of a literary artist. Diplomacy, business and politics are in constant need of critical watchfulness from what is known as the human point of view, and there is this difficulty about it, that the pluralist is first of all a piper, and the man who pays the piper calls the tune. As Mr. Dilnot says candidly, the modern reporter "has an almost religious devotion to the cause of his paper," and "puts it first at whatever cost to himself." The ideal thing would be that he should put the public interest first always, and be quite free to write his impressions. I think that, generally, he might do so with immense advantage to the public interest, for his occupation is one that ripens and balances good men uniquely. "The Adventures of a Newspaper Man" attests the fact.

Not being free, the adventurer too seldom takes life at all seriously. How should he? If ever a public wrong begins to trouble him, he is sure to be relieved of it next day or the day after. There is always something new. So he tends to become—unless a man of uncommon courage and character—the light interpreter of life from a romantic but conventional standpoint. He may "do things" in passing. Nowadays he often does. But they are not such things as make the reputation of a prophet, a poet, or even a reformer. His reward is the adventure—and his salary, which is sometimes that of the diplomat. Still, at his lightest he serves the public in a way, indispensably; not only making the daily picture of life, but by his alert intelligence enabling us to keep some check on the powers that be. Let his heart be sound, and even the cause of his paper will be kept in check sometimes, to the education of honest men and women.

The charm of Mr. Dilnot's book is due precisely to the sound heart he carries. His adventures begin in the service of Carmelite House, but hardly breathe the spirit of that emporium, being told in a leisured way very happily; indeed, they include an indulgent but quite unequivocal character sketch of its founder and sprightly despot. While working without resentment under the light masterfulness of Lord Northcliff, the author has kept an unaltered personality of his own delightfully. To my mind, he makes too much of a wonder of that variable man, and abstains too kindly from a judgment of him; for one is obliged to pass some judgment upon a busy schemer of such influence and public ambition. However, it is part of the book's merit that comment is left to the reader. An honest humanitarian and light philosopher of admirable temper, Mr. Dilnot sketches in his adventures modestly, content to show their human interest. The reader is freer than he may recognise; for it is done without a trace of that strain for effects which often marks the superficial sort of journalism, and makes it valueless. The aim is to be impersonal. One grows aware of a very broad, wise, and sunny nature, but hardly suspects the strength of it. That, if you think, is a good reason for trusting Mr. Dilnot's faculty of observation, which is singularly keen, fair and broadcast; "a little sceptical," as he says the Press worker is, "but kindly, unpretentious, and full of understanding."

* "The Adventures of a Newspaper Man." By Frank Dilnot. 3s 6d net. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

Can the interest of a reporter's life be ever made as great for others as it is for himself? Was such a book of reminiscences worth putting together? One gets at a fair answer, I suppose, by considering what would be the value and fascination of such a book dealing with the first ten years of the nineteenth century. "The Adventures of a Newspaper Man," pleasant reading now, is worth keeping for a hundred years. Its contents are intimate if trivial history. It is none the worse for including, with stories of distinguished men and pictures of Parliament and of Irish electioneering, the Moat Farm mystery, the Crippen trial, the battle of Sidney Street, ghosts and revivals in Wales, or the visit of Ohio girls. Three chapters on Russia will soon, in the natural course of things, have the kind of interest that belongs to French memoirs of the Regency, and there are numberless clear snapshots of common life in England that will some day look extremely quaint, one hopes a little shameful. The problem is, to imagine how this sort of literature, which has a permanent and increasing value, is ever to be weeded out from the mass of rubbish.

KEIGHTLEY SNOWDEN.

FRANK HARRIS'S SHORT STORIES.*

There are stories in Mr. Frank Harris's new book that will compare not only with the best in his own "Elder Conklin" volume, but with the best that have been written by any living author, and perhaps the most finished and finely pathetic of them is the shortest and the slightest. It is "The King of the Jews," and takes the form of a conversation—or, rather, two conversations—between Simon of Cyrene and his wife. They live outside Jerusalem, in the time of Christ, and Simon has a chance of obtaining a situation as doorkeeper of the Temple. His wife is anxious that he should be there in good time to see the High Priest, and sends him off with due instructions and advice. Late in the day he returns, tired, curiously distraught, and she grows irritated with questioning him and not getting any coherent reply as to where he has been and what has happened, until at length he confesses he has never been to the Temple—he had forgotten to go. Meeting her questions confusedly, he explains in a fragmentary fashion that when he reached the street leading from the Temple to Golgotha he could not cross it because there was a great crowd, and as he stood in the crowd three criminals were taken past on the way to execution, one of them a rebel who was said to be a prophet, and as this one came opposite to him he fell under the weight of the cross he was carrying, and a Roman soldier, seeing Simon looked big and strong, bade him take up the cross and carry it, and carrying it to Calvary and standing there watching what followed, he had forgotten everything else. The whole incident, the way in which this prophet had looked at him, the few words he spoke to him, had touched Simon strangely, and, as he relates it, all the man's emotion, his profound sense of the wonder of what he has seen, communicates itself as subtly to the reader as it did to Simon's wife. That is all; but it is done perfectly, with a simplicity and naturalness that make a vivid, most poignant picture of it. There is even a quiet humour in the wife's feminine reasons for her curiosity, yet the tenderness, the reverence, and the beauty of it are complete. Next to this one would place "The Miracle of the Stigmata," another story of the Christ, reverent, subtly suggestive, and vividly realised.

With the exception of "The Holy Man," which is founded on a story of Tolstoy's, the other tales are of modern life in England, but though none of them is a tale with a purpose, each has an idea behind it, a mystical, inner meaning, that adds something to the pathos or the humour of it, and gives the shrewd cynicism of one or two of them a kindly, human significance. They are the stories of a man who knows life and men and women, and has grown largely tolerant of their weaknesses, so that if he laughs at them now and then it is not without sympathy, not without knowledge of what they lose in losing their ideals and aspirations. There are nine stories in the book, and they are written with an imaginative and emotional power, an economy of words, and a delicate narrative art that in these or in any days are no common gifts.

HERE AND THERE IN MEXICO.*

It appears that Mr. Pollard had in Mexico a variety of experiences, whereof the most interesting from our point of view are those when he was acting as correspondent of an American newspaper during the latter days of Don Porfirio's term of office. Evidently Mr. Pollard is a good Maderist, who resents, as everybody should, the cold-blooded treachery of General Huerta, the provisional

"A Busy Time in Mexico" By H. B. C. Pollard. 8s. 6d. net. (Constable)

Photo by Walter Benington,
14, Conduit Street, W.

Mr. Frank Harris.

* "Unpath'd Waters." By Frank Harris. 6s. (John Lane.)

President. The most weighty paragraphs of Mr. Pollard's book are devoted to a consideration of Mexico's future and the Monroe doctrine. A few weeks ago there was printed in the Spectator an admirable article on this question, which pointed out that the United States must either be prepared to enforce law and order in these parts or else admit European nations to the task of at least protecting their nationals. Part of Mr. Pollard's book is devoted to Chiapas, in which tropical State he began his experiences; the ride to a coffee plantation is interesting, but one is a little bewildered as to how the speaker of "execrable" Spanish on p. 15 can say on p. 47, alluding to one Jackson, an American naturalist, assistant to the professor of a college at Tehuantepec, that "he knew little Spanish, and I had to interpret for him: he wanted the native name of everything in sight." All this occurred while Mr. Pollard was, for a few weeks, in Southern Mexico. The more valuable portion of his book deals with the outbreak against Diaz, of which we as yet know so little. By the way, Mr. Pollard is properly suspicious of the gentlemen equipped with mining and other concessions—it was one of the great objects of Madero's Government to investigate the legality of these—but he is even more severe on the rubber plantations. The gigantic tree under which "our director" has often been photographed is situated, we believe, in the State of Oaxaca on the way to the Valle Nacional, but down in Chiapas there is at least one extremely successful rubber plantation, owned by an American company, which began operations long before the existence of that Pan American railway which Mr. Pollard rightly does not admire. It is a pity that Mr. Pollard did not visit this plantation, where in the twilight he would have taken his ease to the music of the marimba and in the daytime he would have seen a great number of large rubber trees. Mr. Pollard's remarks as to young, inexperienced Englishmen being sent out with no particular qualifications are eminently sensible, but how many of them would fail anywhere? And the stranded book-keeper of a coffee finca, up in the mountains of tropical Mexico, may not be more unhappy than a book-keeper who toils in the city of London.

We notice that Mr. Pollard advises travellers to go by the Royal Mail instead of by the German line of steamers; this is indeed an extraordinary piece of advice, as the Royal Mail would be the first to admit. Their boats to Mexico are exclusively for cargo, and they take much longer time to reach their destination. The Hamburg-American line, on the other hand, have an excellent fleet, and in case Mr. Pollard is anti-German he can go by the French boats from St. Nazaire. He can also go from Santander on the Spanish vessels. His remarks on outfit and so forth are sensible, but it seems hardly adequate to finish off the subject of "Art and the Natives" in three pages.

Mr. Pollard left the country at the same time, though not on the same ship, as the old President, and previous to that he had participated in an attack on the rebels, which is full of interest. One thing seems to be certain; he does not describe what he did not see, for which reason we doubt whether his despatches to the American newspaper were received with joy. Orozco is not mentioned save in the appendix, although he was Madero's Chief of Staff; but Mr. Pollard when he recounts those details of the Revolution which he himself witnessed is entirely satisfactory. Chihuahua was the scene of much of the fighting, and from there he gives us one or two photographs, but no details. Perhaps Mr. Pollard is too modest to attempt an account of the whole movement, and as an unpretentious chronicle this book is distinctly meritorious. There should have been a map.

HENRY BAERLEIN.

Troops Guarding President Diaz's House in Calle Cadena.

From "A Busy Time in Mexico," by H. B. C. Pollard (Constable).

THE FRUSTRATION OF ANNA.*

Who is Angela Langer? I do not know, and Mr. Courtney does not tell me. The name is on the title-page of this remarkable book, and again, in facsimile signature, beneath the portrait-frontispiece. And the portrait is one of rare and sombre charm. It is impossible not to associate the author with her heroine, Anna. And who is Anna?

The girl who is least heard of to-day is she whose heart is to herself a timeless sanctuary, where Love is the priest of the religion of womanhood—that dateless, undoctored religion of self-reverence, self-knowledge, and self-control to which true womanhood adds an ineffable beauty, and a mysticism that we may not explore. Such is Anna. She is one of the women whose hearts flower once and perfectly, or never, who are prepared to give all or keep all; whose self-fulfilment only one event can bring, but whose self-sovereignty a thousand cannot shake. Such lives as Anna's are still lived in this age of resolved demand for all that life can give, and the value of this simple record lies in its statement that Woman can yet distil the last perfume from her last frustration.

Anna is the daughter of a struggling German shop-keeper, who begins her conscious emotional life by looking with profound respect at her father's stock of soap and candles and brushes, and by watching with joy the unpacking of his Christmas consignment of fancy chocolates and sweetmeats. Mr. Courtney does well to beg the reader not to put the book down because its earlier chapters may seem to be compact of everyday trifles. Their effect is cumulative. We read of Anna's school-gongs, her school-fellows, their games, her father's declining business, and several removals. We read of her first disillusion when her little friend Hilda utters the withering and ineffaceable judgment: "Your drawing-room looks ridiculous"; and of the dreams in which she heard the echo of the catechism: "Must all people die?" "All people must die."

* "Rue and Roses." By Angela Langer. With Introduction by W. L. Courtney, LL.D. 6s. (Heinemann.)

With Anna's growing wonders and perplexities comes the instinct to commune with herself through the medium of verse. This shopkeeper's little daughter, this future maid-of-all-work and under-nurse, this more future governess and student, forms the instinctive habit of expressing herself in poetry. In her first situation she is detected by her mistress writing her verses on the empty sugar and rice bags which are stuffed into a kitchen drawer. Her mistress demands the name of her lover, and Anna is hardly able to convince her that certain lines are addressed to a prince whom she had seen only in dreams. "'Oh!' she exclaimed, and, rising with a yawn, she left the kitchen; but at the doorway she turned round once more and said: 'As long as you know him only in your thoughts he can do you no harm.'"

These words become a tragic prophecy in Anna's career. She goes from one situation to another, is tortured by accounts of growing poverty at home, and is shocked and wearied by sordid surroundings and glimpses of evil. But she takes lessons in English, reads books, and lifts and refines herself until she reaches the status of a governess. And now she meets him. He is a young man of thirty, a friend of the family in which she is teaching, and given to sententious utterances like the first with which he favours her: "Intoxication or regret which is the greater of the two?" But his attitude to her poetry is definite; he helps her to develop it in thought and form. In a word, he is admitted to the outer temple of Anna's heart. Then:

By and by I began to think of him whether I saw him or not; his face, his figure rose like a blazing question from the midst of the strange, wistful dreams that I had dreamt all my life, and something that had lain within me, dull and senseless like a trance, woke, wondered, and trembled into joy."

It is now and onwards that the simple story gathers poignancy, and moves to a crisis not the less real because utterly divested of external drama. Advised by her friend, and helped by him, Anna comes to London, and one is touched by the outward petty difficulties of a foreign girl in London seeking straight paths and hiding intimate joys and sorrows. It is now that she begins to read English poets and to find responses to her feelings in Milton's "They also serve who only stand and wait," and in Byron's

"Ah! Love was never yet without
The pang, the agony, the doubt."

It is in the British Museum, after looking at a mummied king, that she reflects, with fast-saddening wisdom, "that there does not exist a real self that God has not finished His creation yet—that we are the means towards an object, but not the object itself."

At last Anna must put the supreme question to her friend at Buda Pesth. It disguises itself as: "Do you think I may come back?" The days creep by, and at last bring her answer:

"If you had remained here, I do not know what might have happened; if you come back, I know what will happen. But the question is, may it come thus? You are not a girl of the ordinary type; you belong to the race of Asra, the people who die when they love. And because I have known you from the first, I have done for you what I have never done for another woman yet—namely, got hold of the head of the beast within, turned it round sharply and laughed at it."

Whatever this meant in the writer, or whatever comment it deserves, its meaning for Anna is clear and final. For roses, rue; for the open door, the closed. She makes to herself a gospel of dignity and peace. At least he will never forget, will never cease to desire and lament. The cup will not be drunk, but neither will its dregs be reached. And amid the wanderings and disgusts of life he will not be able to break the thread that was never knotted. In the death of hope Anna finds at least the peace of death, but also, in however low vibrations: "A wisdom which reigned over all former wisdom, and a love which reigned over all former love." A book, you will perceive for the times, rather than of the times.

It may be that the long-drawn detail of a girl's outward and inward struggle would have gone better with the help of a drier and sharper humour, and that the end will suggest to the reader the material of a self-contained poem rather than the completion of a story; but by its naïveté and sincerity, and by a certain curious and haunting isolation, "Rue and Roses" takes a place in the memory from which it will not be dislodged.

WILFRED WHITTEN.

GOLDSMITH.*

Mr. Padraic Colum is to be congratulated on his selection from the works of Oliver Goldsmith, and it is no disparagement of it—quite the contrary, to claim that no one who has for the first time made more than a casual acquaintance with Goldsmith through this book, will be satisfied until he has made himself master of everything that Goldsmith has left to us. Mr. Colum is always stimulating and not infrequently provocative. A critic should be a judge, holding the balance of evidence evenly, and not an advocate concerned only with the defence of his client, and for some reason of late it has been deemed necessary to defend Goldsmith, already an immortal. Whether Goldsmith spoke Irish or not matters little now; what does matter is that he wrote the purest and most fascinating English of his time. That is and surely ought to be enough for us. Mr. Colum charges Goldsmith with being "unable to surmount the crisis" in "The Vicar of Wakefield"; "his only solution is to legalise the relation of a young woman to her seducer." True it is an old convention; it still exists, and Mr. Colum does not suggest an alternative. What he does not seem to realise is that natural acts, the result of natural love and passion, are not necessarily criminal. The author of "My Irish Year" should surely be aware of this and not adopt in this regard the crude morality of the Irish peasant, which owed its origin to an alien tyranny.

Mr. Colum is at pains to prove that "Sweet Auburn" was really inspired by an Irish village, and in this he fails. There is not and never was a "Sweet Auburn" as Goldsmith depicted it, in Ireland, and least of all, in the eighteenth century. But there was, and is, thank God, many a "Sweet Auburn" still in England, as he who roams the downs of Surrey or the Weald of Kent can testify. The whole poem breathes the atmosphere of the English village life, and is full of its beauties described in detail:

"The decent Church that topped the neighbouring hill,

* * * *

The whitewashed wall, the nicely-sanded floor
The varnished clock that ticked behind the door."

And again:

"Ill fares the land to hast'ning ills a prey
Where wealth accumulates and men decay."

This last quotation might be taken as conclusive proof that Goldsmith was thinking of England, whether he wrote of Ireland or not. But whether one quarrel with Mr. Colum or praise him, he has done a good work and we are grateful.

H. A. HINKSON.

THE MULBERRY TREE.†

"The Mulberry Tree" is inferior to "Letters to My Son," because Miss James, not having so much to say, must needs select, in compensation, an exotic and extraneous

* "Oliver Goldsmith." By Padraic Colum. Regent Library. 2s. 6d. net. (Herbert & Daniel.)

† "The Mulberry Tree." By Winifred James. 7s. 6d. net. (Chapman & Hall.)

perspective, by which to say it. Her new book, says the publishers' recommendation, is no ordinary record of travel. Indeed, her saunterings through Jamaica, Haiti, Costa Rica and Panama might as well have been through Bay of Water or Laputa, for all the garnerings of relevant and specific information she affords us. Except by way of the camera, she ignores geographical and ethnographical illustration, otherwise than as a pendant to a mood, a setting for a reflection and an excursus of fancy. Of course, this is no animadversion upon Miss James's material, its values and sympathies. If she chooses to savour her meditations with the spice of the tropics, that is no loss to their quality. Neither is it intrinsic gain—rather a seasoning, aromatic, but not one that leavens. Her style, her ideas, do not suffer from contact with the West Indies, but from a dearth of substance, from irrigation by only one somewhat sparsely-flowing, though hard-working, channel of thought. Miss James's work is, indeed, no criticism of life, but of temperament. It belongs, in its most prominent phases, to the autobiography of ideas, to a school, literally of self-expression and personal revelation and one which has successfully philandered with the heart of this generation. In short, she makes the most—to cite one of the hoariest clichés of the day—of "that elusive quality, that rare thing, charm." Her writing directly and consciously dramatises her personality; so that we are out of sympathy with the detractors who brand her style as artificial. It is not—and however wayward, tangential and capricious; however prone to self-conscious whimsies and quiddities, however embroidered and subject to odd divagations, it is inevitably the reflex of herself, at times of a superficial, at times of an intimate self, but always obedient to the law of that self-hood. Her pages are not stamped with a style at all; they are the receptacles of the broken meats of individuality. She serves no canons and acknowledges no traditions but her own; a factor which, as an artist, is at once her bane and her deliverance. Her mannerisms and affectations are perfectly natural to her and, in a nature so naively incapable of self-criticism, almost immaterial. She must have carte blanche for her garrulity and her vagaries and "there's an end on't."

It is a truism that the successful author will not let well alone. Like the octopus that bows to the oceanic law of supply and demand and grows an additional tentacle, so the author, yielding to the popular clamour rather than to imperious inspiration, reincarnates his talent and multiplies himself to keep his reputation swept and garnished. It would be unjust to Miss James to label "The Mulberry Tree," as an extra window-dressing to gratify the insistent customer, an encore squeezed out of her to still a ravenous applause. She is, as we said, too dependent upon her personality to be forced to mechanise it. Nevertheless, there is the element of relaxation about it. Compared with "Letters to My Son" and "Letters of a Spinster," it is little more than play, light-hearted, fanciful and slight; witty and sensible; lively and crisp. There are lacunæ in the entertainment, notably an open-minded advocacy of humaner divorce laws and an eloquent indictment of the domination of the black by the white man, expressed with penetration and freedom from prejudice. But she is soon back at her gambols—pleasantries, gossip, diversion and anecdote—all of it entertaining enough, but a little too casual and discursive. It is superfluous to carp at her lack of intellectual grasp, at a certain wulful renunciation of wisdom and knowledge, so determined is she to be taken at her own valuation, so disarming is her candour. She is a baffling exemplar of the confessional spirit in literature, the feminine diarist who at once focuses the attention and exhausts the patience. For all that, an estimate of her which neglected her independence and veracity of mind would be but partial. There is evidence in her books that the society which is her foster-parent would regard many of her dicta on social matters as anathema. And there is no more arduous and perilous a campaign than to combat current opinion.

HAROLD MASSINGHAM.

Miss Winifred James.

Frontispiece portrait from "The Mulberry Tree," by Winifred James.
(Chapman & Hall)

JANE AUSTEN.*

The attractive "Memoir" of Jane Austen, which her nephew, the Rev. James Austen-Leigh, published about forty-three years ago, is not likely to be superseded, being the work of one who, in his youth, was intimately acquainted with her. But since that book appeared a good deal of information with which he does not seem to have been familiar, or of which, at any rate, he made little use, has become accessible, as in the two volumes of "Letters" edited by her great nephew, the first Lord Brabourne, in 1881, or in other letters used for the first time in the volume now issued by the son and grandson of the author of the "Memoir."

This new life is really a bringing together of the biographical matter contained in the two publications already referred to (though not, save for quotations, in the same words), supplemented by such fresh facts or evidence as the novelist's family have been able to discover during recent years. To the keenest students of Jane Austen's history and tradition there may not be very much that is at once new and important, though there are a good many pages that fill in with events or probabilities, gaps in the life-story of one who saw perhaps less of the world than any other imaginative author of equal distinction.

Every writer on Jane Austen's personal history has, of course, devoted some attention to the question whether she was ever "in love." The present book seems to reply, for good and all, that she never was, in any serious degree. Half the tales of her love have been repeated from Sir F. H. Doyle's story, in his "Reminiscences," of a foreign tour made by Jane, with her father and sister, in 1802, during which they became acquainted, in Switzerland, with a young naval officer, between whom and Jane mutual affection speedily developed. The officer, while crossing the Alps on foot, over-tired himself, and died of brain fever. Sir F. H. Doyle's authority for this story was a lady who had heard it from a niece of Miss Austen's. The authors of the present book cannot identify any niece who could have told such a tale, and as for its truth, they have as many good reasons against it as counsel usually find in drawing a statement of defence. Firstly, no shadow of such a tradition remains in the family; secondly, the Rev. George Austen could not possibly have afforded the tour; and, thirdly, the usual change of air and scene for the Austens was enjoyed that year at Dawlish.

* "Jane Austen, Her Life and Letters. A Family Record" By William Austen-Leigh and Richard Arthur Austen-Leigh. 10s. 6d. net. (Smith, Elder.)

A much better authenticated story, now given, tells us that Jane became engaged one evening, in that same year of 1802, to a man with whose family her own had long been friendly, but that she broke off the engagement the next morning, having become convinced that she had made a mistake, and could never be happy with this old friend.

This incident was related by her niece, Caroline, who also recalled another little story, which she had heard from "Aunt Cassandra," that at some seaside place a gentleman had seemed greatly attracted by my Aunt Jane, that when they parted company he "was urgent to know where they (the Austens) would be next summer," and that "soon afterwards they heard of his death." The "impression left on Aunt Cassandra was that he had fallen in love with her sister, and was quite in earnest."

Are we not justified, with only these records to go upon, in saying that we have no evidence that she ever had a serious love affair?

Once more in these pages we are reminded, and very properly, of that typical bit of spiteful gossip, Miss Mitford's account of Jane Austen's husband-hunting ways. The author of "Our Village," tells us that her mother, before marriage, lived near the Austens, and knew Jane as "the prettiest, silliest, most affected, husband-hunting butterfly she ever remembers." As Mrs. Mitford married and left her home near the Austens when Jane was just ten years old, it would seem that neither she nor her daughter can have been very particular, the one about facts, or the other about "verifying her references."

The accounts included of the several novels are full of attractive bits of reminiscence and tradition. It is interesting to hear that when "Northanger Abbey" was first offered to a publisher (in London, and not, as has generally been supposed, in Bath), it was probably entitled "Susan," with no reference whatever to "Lady Susan," that curious novel of letters, which added so little to the author's fame, and which she herself decided not to publish. A valuable appendix on the text of the novels, several pedigrees, and a bibliography, are features of this book. As a frontispiece the "portrait of Jane Austen," attributed to Zoffany, is reproduced, so much more clearly than in the first volume of the "Letters," that one wonders if the difference between ordinary photography and photogravure is alone responsible for the change. It must be added that when Lord Brabourne gave this portrait he seemed to have no doubts as to what "Jane Austen" it represented. In the present instance we are told that there was another Jane in the family, whom the picture may represent, but that, on the whole, there is good reason to hope that it is an authentic portrait of the novelist. This doubt, also, must remain open.

W. H. HELM.

CROQUET AND CARICATURE.*

I think it was Solon who said "Count no man happy till he be dead." But I say "Count no man celebrated till he be caricatured." Most men and women in the public eye would rather be laughed at than ignored. And Mr. Crowther Smith, in the preface to this clever gallery of prominent croquet players, very neatly hints at this common passion.

* "A Croquet Alphabet." Rhymed and Pictured by H. F. Crowther Smith. Engraved and Printed by Henry Stone & Son, Banbury. 10s. 6d.

"If anyone should experience disappointment," he says, "at not finding themselves amongst the caricatured, I trust they will understand that it is not due to any lack of merit on their part, but rather to the fact that there are only twenty-six letters in the alphabet."

Mr. Crowther Smith is a genial humorist. There is no doubt a touch of cynicism in the drawing of Mr. Beaton as a wooden toy, wound-up and "making his breaks like a clockwork machine," as there may be too in that of Lord Tollemache, who is represented as playing on a lawn more fitted to golf than to croquet, though I confess that, as an honorary secretary jealous of the reputation of his lawns, I may be hypercritically reading into this last a meaning that may not have been intended. But these are mere pin-pricks which leave no lasting hurt on two such fine exponents of the game, who could, I imagine, any day turn the tables on their caricaturist by giving him a bisque or so and a beating. Certainly all interested in a game which, since its revival in "the nineties," has made such amazing advance in public favour, should invest their half-guineas on this book, for artists require encouragement as well as other people. Otherwise croquet may lose its caricaturist, and then what chance of budding Beaton or infant O'Callaghans arriving at immortality and celebrity in the future? Finally, let me say that there is almost as much instruction as amusement to be got out of this book from the stances and hand-grips of such fine players as Mr. Cyril Corbally, Mr. Izard, and Mr. Bunnell Burton, which the artist has so realistically portrayed.

G. S. LAYARD.

THE WOMEN OF TO-DAY AND YESTERDAY.*

Out of the chaos of feminist thought two separate schools are now beginning to emerge. One, led by Ellen Key, has for its objective what may be called the Greater Motherhood; the other, more revolutionary in idea, looks to the development of the individuality of the woman as the next great step in social evolution. The former, regarding the woman as the chief instrument of the life force, fixes its eyes on the race; the latter, seeing the woman as an end in herself, claims her as a human being, a gift bringer, as is the man, of achievement in thought and action. Link Action versus Individual: such is the antithesis.

Mrs. Gallichan belongs to the Link Action school: she regards the woman as the superior, the more important, sex, in the evolution of life. So far from being passive or secondary, she is the predominant partner. Throughout the lower forms of life it is the female who is almost always the guardian of progress and instigator of the creative impulse. She is usually more active and often larger and heavier than the male. In all the kingdom of nature the bee commonwealth is, of course, the great triumphant instance of female organisation. Throughout the book this is Mrs. Gallichan's view of the division of labour between the sexes: the female for organisation and conservation, the male for destruction. Among primitive tribes descent, for instance, was claimed through the woman and by "mother-right" was settled all the inheritance of property. At first, it was the male who left his own tribe to follow the female, and in the hands of the women was all the work of primitive agriculture and industry. It was merely the organisation of tribal war together with the idea of woman as property, that pushed her into the position of a slave, a being dependent on the male for her support.

In many ways it would appear that Mrs. Gallichan relies too much on the certain working of "mother-right;" but, apart from that, she is by no means clear in showing how, from such a position of power, the women sank into subservience to patriarchal rule. Some psychological cause there must have been, for if biologically woman is the organiser and conservator, why is it that all the organisation of society during the historic period has been left to man? True, such organisation as we have is chiefly for offence or defence, for war in short; yet surely commercial enterprise should have been in the hands of the women, if their primordial instincts were so definite?

* "The Truth About Woman." By C. Gasquoine Hartley Mrs. Walter Gallichan.) 7s. 6d. net. (Eveleigh Nash.)

In historic plan the book is also defective for, while the position of women in the ancient civilisations is fully discussed, there is no study whatever of the effect of mediæval Christianity on woman. It is interesting to know that 4,000 years ago the Egyptians dealt with the problem of man and woman most wisely, but it would be much more useful to learn why women are what they are to-day. And what they are to-day depends on feudalism and the Revolution times. It is in its treatment of the women of the twentieth century that "The Truth about Woman" becomes really controversial, mainly perhaps because the psychology is most debatable, being of the popular and rather superficial variety.

Thus it is taken as proved that women steer their course mainly by intuition and men by reason, whereas, if we follow the history of politics, we shall find how largely emotion under the form of prejudice enters into all judgments, whether of men or women. Logic is often invoked, but seldom answers the prayer of its worshippers. Yet Mrs. Gallichan has, of course, no difficulty in showing that if women possess intuition in a high degree, they have in their hands one of the chief elements of genius. For if intuition is "direct vision," it is precisely that which, in the last resort, produces the masterpiece. Reason states the problem; intuition solves it.

Yet women geniuses are rare, and Mrs. Gallichan dreads that, by learning to reason, women will lose their gift of intuition. Probably the truth is no more than that woman possesses a certain instinctive knowledge of character acquired during the ages when her livelihood depended on her picking out the best man to feed and protect her. For what any creature is to-day depends on the way in which it has gained its living. On this line Mrs. Gallichan brings forward the most valuable argument in her book, namely, that the economic dependence of women on men has been, and is, most injurious to the race. Freedom to choose her mate, not by considerations of money value, but by human ones, is the one great overmastering plea for the economic independence of woman. Our race is one of the most miserable failures in the whole field of evolution largely because the potential mothers of it have had to put a man's income-earning capacity before his mental or physical qualities. It is this consideration apparently which has made Mrs. Gallichan a feminist.

Yet she is afraid of many things: first, of the women "intellectuals" who refuse marriage, as she alleges, for the sake of their own individual freedom. Is it not rather, however, nearer the truth to say that our society being so badly organised, they never meet marriageable men who are in any way their equals? Precisely this freedom of choice is as yet what they cannot obtain. Worst of all, Mrs. Gallichan fears—it is a fundamental dread—to let women use their reasons; she fears, too, that as the sexes grow more alike, love will lose its ancient charm. Yet, by a curious contradiction, we find her rejoicing in the position of women in ancient Egypt where, in a race that showed very little difference in facial expression between men and women, common interests were shared by both in a way which is marvellous to later ages. In fact, "The Truth about Woman" is full of the Janus spirit that looks backward often with eyes full of longing and forward with a glance of dread. It is therefore weak on the constructive side.

For the evil of woman's present position is that for ages she has persisted in taking the line of least resistance, in living by sex. Now a revolution is wrought by two powers acting in conjunction: by force from without and upheaval from within. If the changes in society during the next few centuries are powerful enough to drive women from their dependence on the male for a livelihood, then the new woman and the new age will be brought to birth, for the new spirit is abroad. Yet it cannot work successfully alone; it depends on outward changes for a momentum. On these Mrs. Gallichan scarcely touches at all, although they are already appearing above the horizon of both national and international life.

"The Truth about Woman" is very stimulating and suggestive, but its title should have been "The Half-Way House." Nor is this to cast any reflection on the work since, in feminism, none but half-way houses can be built for many a year to come.

M. P. WILLCOCKS.

WAR AND PEACE.

It is claimed for Herr Wilhelm Lamszus that he is a great literary artist. This, of course, is a matter of opinion, however vivid and compelling his "document" * may be. To my mind his work lacks considerably the finish, the breadth and the depth of Steven's "Red Badge of Courage" and of some other books of a similar kind. But in work of this sort literary excellence or the lack of it must always take second place to ethical value. And both from this point and in the matter of good taste merely, there is much to be said against the sub-title, "Scenes from the War that is sure to come." For are we not entitled to ask: Who guarantees such a war?—which, being indefinite, is neither "the" nor "this." Is it the German manufacturers of war material who stand for the certainty of so devastating a catastrophe?—and whose machinations to that end have recently aroused a large portion of the German people to the horrible cause of scars and strained international relations. Surely there is something to be said against this needless inflaming of more or less dormant passions, particularly in connection with a masterly horrifying picture, the purpose of which is to arouse all Christian peoples, especially central Europe, to what would be the truly appalling result of a war that is not sure to come. Moreover, even if it is likely to come—Well, then, let us prepare quietly, not as irresponsible fire-aways, but as true men who know they have to fight, and who also know that the last charge will be one of victory or annihilation.

Turning again to the book itself we find that M. Alfred H. Fried (the Viennese winner of last year's Nobel peace prize) has written:

"It will become one of the holy books of humanity. I would that this book were to reach the hands of millions. Every mother ought to read it, and every man, too, whether old or young, to form his opinion of the present-day condition of things in which—an outworn atavism—war and preparations for war still continue to be the focus of political life."

This is the message of the book, a message so enormous, so altogether outnumbering the forces of war, that, if only M. Fried's "every mother," &c., could be reached and won over, war would be no more in Christendom. It is a most devout wish, one that every humane heart must echo to the full.

Here also lies the magnificent value of the book—the possibility of its moving the hearts of peoples, if it does but reach them. Its potentialities cannot be gainsaid, for it is, in a sense, as horrible a representation of a great war as written words and some natural reticence can make it. Herr Lamszus (a master at one of the big schools in Germany) writes in the first person, generally in the present tense, and loses none of the advantages, if a few of the graces, of that familiar medium. He begins by being called up as a reserve-conscrip—war has been declared. He is young, and we get a hint of the parting between him and his wife and two children. Then come quick details of the mobilisation, his comrades, the barracks and transport, the camp and front, and all the welter of shot, smoke, bayonets, blood, and mangled men that any pen could contrive within 110 pages. For the work is not crude—no, not by any means; in it there is a large husbanding of power, of the almost marvellous effect of what is little more than suggestion. Yet all the whirling hell of it all is here; and as a piece of literature merely, it had better be left alone by those who are afflicted with "nerves." Mr. Oakley Williams, the translator, seems to have done his work remarkably well.

* "The Human Slaughter-House: Scenes from the War that is sure to come." From the German of Wilhelm Lamszus. English Version by Oakley Williams. 1s. net. (Hutchinson.)

Of a vastly different kind is Mr. Perris's contribution* to the cause of peace. As secretary to different movements for the pacification of nations, and now of the British Committee that has gone to the British-American Peace Centenary, he has spent much time and care in tracing in English history, the development of the idea of peaceful arbitration in place of appealing to the force of arms. And what a slow growth it has been! As Mr. Perris says

"It is a far cry from the Heptarchy to modern England, from the blood-feud and trial by ordeal or combat to the Royal Courts of Justice and the Hague Tribunal"

and

"If a clue be found by which we can trace an ever advancing victory of order over anarchy, of tolerance and friendly co-operation over provincial hatreds, sectarian bigotry and international rivalries, throughout these ages, the annals of our country will be read with a fresh interest, and with a heightened sense of their importance in relation to our modern life"

And this is what Mr. Perris does in most excellent English. He shows us how the movement began imperceptibly, underlying the actions of rulers and people, till the day came when it rose above the surface of things, took on a form of its own and grew to be what we know it to be. Thus he has truly added a new interest to the reading of English history.

J. E. PATTERSON

TALES OF THE MERMAID TAVERN.†

Mr. Alfred Noyes has certain gifts that are lacking from most of the poets of our day. You do not go to him for the mystic vision, the magic phrase, the jewelled line; his poetry smacks of the earth and the vigorous life of men, as Chaucer's does; he has spontaneity, a richness and variety of music; he has imagination and a rare narrative power, and those fine qualities of humour and emotion without at least one of which no teller of stories can get a hold upon his audience. The humour of "Black Bill's Honey-Moon," a story put into the mouth of John Davis, is of the breeziest, gayest, most irresponsible kind, and from its first liting stanza

"Let Martin Parker at hawthorn-tide
Prattle in Devonshire lanes!
Let all his pedlar poets beside Rattle their gallows chains
A tale like mine they never shall tell
Or a merrier ballad sing,
Till the Man in the Moon pipe up the tune
And the stars play Kiss-in-the-Ring!"

it rattles along with unflagging jollity and gusto to its last. And the pathos underlying the tragedy of the squalid death of Robert Greene, related partly by Shakespeare, and partly by Marlowe, of Marlowe's fatal duel, as told by Nash; of the burial of Mary Queen of Scots, as you get it from the old sexton who comes into the "Mermaid" on a winter's night, shuffling the snow off his boots, is the truer and more poignant because of the ease and almost careless simplicity of style with which each tale is unfolded.

Incidentally, Mr. Noyes fills his poem with the atmosphere of seventeenth-century London; gives glimpses of the 'prentice riots in the streets, of the May-day revellings, the holiday processions, and, in song and anecdote, of the old city's merchant adventurers; but in the main he recreates the ancient, oak-raftered "Mermaid" tavern, and brings much of its motley, glamorous, glorious life back into it. Ben Jonson is rightly the central figure in this scene, he is a young man at the beginning, and old, and fallen on evil days at the end. One feels that Beaumont, who has left us the only eulogy we have of the things seen and done at the "Mermaid," should have had more than the merest passing mention, but it is a large and splendid fellowship that gathers here at the immortal tavern, and if Beaumont and Fletcher remain in the background, Shakespeare, Marlowe, Green, Nash, Chapman, Drayton, and Sir Walter Raleigh, are among those who play leading parts, and if they do not always talk here so wonderfully as they wrote, that is perfectly natural, too—for no man ever did—and they often say fine things, as when Marlowe ejaculates.

* "Pax Britannica: A Study of the History of British Pacification." By H. S. Perris, M.A. 5s. net. (Sidgwick & Jackson.)

† "Tales of the Mermaid Tavern." By Alfred Noyes. 5s. net. (Blackwood.)

"Ben, Ben,

I tell thee 'tis the dwarfs that find no world
Wide enough for their jostlings, while the giants,
The gods themselves, can in one tavern find
Room wide enough to swallow the wide heaven
With all its crowded solitary stars."

All through, the poem flows intermittently into glowing imaginative passages, into dainty and charmingly fanciful lyrics, into tales of the dramatists themselves, and of men and women famed in the annals of the England, or the London of that day or the day before. Perhaps the daintiest, most idyllic, and one of the most lightly pathetic of the tales is "The Companion of a Mile," in which Will Kemp, the player, tells in an airy, tripping metre, that dances as you read it, how he danced from London to Norwich and fell in love with the pretty milkmaid who danced a mile of the way with him:

"I fitted her with morrice-bells, with treble, bass and tenor bells:

The fore-bells, as I linked them at her throat, how soft they sang!

Green linnets in a golden nest, they chirped and trembled on her breast,

And faint as elm blue-bells at her nut brown ankles rang."

But if one is put to it to name the best thing in the book, then it is "Flos Mercatorum," in which the old Clerk of Bow Church, running in to escape being mobbed by the 'prentices, retells the old, old story of Dick Whittington with an amazing freshness and fulness, clothing it in a finer light of poetry than it ever wore before, and setting it to the haunting chime of his own bells:

"Clerk of the Bow Bell, four-and-twenty 'prentices,
All upon a Hallowe'en, we prithee, for our joy,
Ring a little turn again for sweet Dick Whittington, Flos Mercatorum, and a barefoot boy!—

"Children of Cheape,' did that old Clerk answer,
'You will have a peal then, for well may you know,
All the bells of London remember Richard Whittington
When they hear the voice of the big Bell of Bow! . . ."

"Whittington! Whittington! O, turn again, Whittington,
'Lord Mayor of London,' the big bell began
'Where was he born? O, at Pauntley in Gloucestershire, Hard by Cold Ashton, Cold Ashton,' it ran

"Flos Mercatorum,' mourned the bells of All Hallows,
'There was he an orphan, O, a little lad alone!'
'Then we all sang,' echoed happy St. Saviour's,
'Called him, and lured him, and made him our own

"Told him a tale as he lay upon the hillside, Looking on his home in the meadow-lands below!'
'Told him a tale,' clanged the bell of Cold Abbey,
'Told him the truth,' boomed the big Bell of Bow! . . ."

So, with interludes which give variety to the narrative and enable the Clerk to fill in more prosaic details, you have all the fascinating old romance told over again, and made new in the telling.

Others may prefer the tensely dramatic story of Raleigh's betrayal by Sir Lewis Stukeley; but Mr. Noyes is such a cunning narrator, is such an authentic singer, skilled in the lithest and happiest of metrical harmonies, and scattering so much of poetry and graceful fancy through it all, that the whole book has been read by one reviewer, at all events with the keenest interest and the keenest pleasure.

THE ROMAN ROAD.*

I am afraid those who have read with delight "The Path to Rome" and "The Old Road" will be disappointed in "Stane Street." The author has been obsessed with the technique of this great engineering feat of the Romans to such an extent that throughout the book he never deflects from the austerity of a road engineer to give us glimpses into his poet's mind. In 300 pages he does not visualise for us a single picture of the Roman legions passing along the Stane Street. Not, unfortunately, does he make it live as a modern high-road. We did hope that he would chat with us along the open road, knapsack on back, and indulge in those pleasant asides that charmed us so much in "The Path to Rome" and "The Old Road." So keen is his scent for surveying that he spares one page only to the wonderfully preserved remains of the Roman pavement at Bignor, and he never tarries even to slake our thirst for Bellocian Bacchanals on the virtues of Sussex ale. Alignments and trajectories are words which appear like ugly scaffolding on nearly every page. Occasionally though, he breaks the severity of his survey to have a fling at professional archaeologists:—

"In a word this idea that the battle of Ockley did not take place at Ockley but somewhere else, is but one more instance of that search for iconoclastic novelty at the expense of scholarship which is the very disease of Dons. It arises partly from vanity, partly from a love of local fame, more from a misconception of what history is, and means, and it is a detestable ingredient of modern writing."

Mr. Belloc claims rightly, I think, that the battle of Ockley was fought at Ockley, and not as Oman suggests at Oakley, near Basingstoke, and he adduces good evidence to show that the Roman legions passed over the old London Bridge and not as the latest school of antiquarians would have it, by ferrying between London Bridge and the Tower. Mr. Belloc shows us pretty clearly that when the road ceased to be used as a military road, and so lost its chief and practically only use (for no towns with the conjectural exception of Dorking stood in its alignment) parts of it soon fell into desuetude, and when this took place, we see in the encroachment of the public high-road the tremendous power which has always been vested in the hands of the English landed aristocracy. And to-day, in spite of the Statute of Merton, Archaeological Societies, Commons Preservation Societies, Rural District Councils and Boards of Agriculture, encroachments still go on, for on the last occasion I tramped Stane Street from Ockley to Chichester, I found a padlock put on the gate which opened on to part of the old road, still used as a track, and another portion from which the public has recently been excluded by a local landowner.

Mr. Hyde has not done justice to himself in the illustrations. One always thinks of soft crepuscular drawings of sheep on a hillside at twilight when one sees Mr. Hyde's name mentioned. But in many of these illustrations there is a hardness of line and tameness of vision which is rather commonplace. There are useful sketch maps which may possibly be more exhilarating than poems to the amateur London Bridge and the Thames.

From "Stane Street," by Hilaire Belloc (Constable)

as well as to the professional surveyor, who will no doubt find in this book a treasure-house of the scholarship of the metalled road.

F. E. GREEN.

Novel Notes.

A PRISONER IN FAIRYLAND. By Algernon Blackwood. 6s. (Macmillan)

Mr. Blackwood has travelled far in the land of spiritual adventures since he took the town by his first strange novel, "John Silence." He has thought deeply over things and felt still more deeply, and his outlook on the unseen world has softened, sweetened and widened. Little children, especially, have come to appeal very strongly to him, and he has learnt to enter into their ways of seeing life in the curiously fresh and innocent glory of the young imagination. There is much in his new frame of mind that reminds one of Blake's way of looking at things. There is the same translucent depth of insight and the same simplicity and force of statement. He also uses the perilous instrument of allegory, but with far more discretion and charm than Blake did in his later days. His new fairyland is that wonderful world of sweet human sympathy, on whose invisible foundations rest all the outward, noisy, bustling activities of our lives. It is by their lively powers of sympathy that young children feel their way about the world; a lonely child will invent invisible playmates in order to get the real knowledge of human life it requires. In his childhood, Henry Rogers invented many invisible playmates, and had a fairy train in which he used to travel with them among the stars. All this comes back to his mind when he returns in middle life, a lonely, rich business man, to the country garden in which he used to play. His mind is occupied with a charitable scheme on which he intends to spend the greater part of his fortune. But he is one of those rare men who manage to retain in manhood a childlike power of imagination. He meets some children and entertains them with his old fancies of the fairy train and invisible playmates, and, before he knows it, he is back again in fairyland and taking part in wildly beautiful adventures with his young friends. His genius for sympathy revives and develops and the results are charming and surprising. Among other things he meets in person the lady of his dreams, and his financial scheme for improving the world broadens out into something human and spiritual, and touched with a noble philosophy of life.

* "Stane Street." By Hilaire Belloc. Illustrated by William Hyde. 7s. 6d. net. (Constable.)

MY FATHER'S SON. By W. W. Penn. Edited by John Harvey. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

The present age is a quickly changing one. The outer mechanism of life, the visible wheels, have lately undergone rapid transformation. The inner mechanism, the mental attitude of citizen to citizen, of class to class, and the moral attitude of the citizen to his Maker, have also developed with breathless rapidity. Scarcely ever before have fathers found it so difficult to keep in touch with their children, to avoid falling behind. And this story is the record of a young man who in some ways has really outdistanced his father, has done so in minor things, the outer graces of life, but has not done so in greater things, in the hidden life of the spirit. He is a rather exaggerated example of a very common type, the type which has sufficient vision of the graces of life and what they may be, to rebel against a father's gracelessness, but has not sufficient vision of the realities of life to see things in their right proportion. Such is Penn, so faithfully drawn to life that nineteen out of twenty readers will feel qualms of conscience in travelling with him down the slippery path that led to exile in Honduras. He is something of a coward, more than something of a sneak; he can "never face any reality long." Extravagance gets him into endless money difficulties. It is not all his own fault. For part of these vices he is indebted by force of heredity to a graceless grandfather; for another part to our school system, which is most effective in knocking the corners off a boy, but less effective in carving anything in high relief on the smooth and lifeless surface, producing critics not enthusiasts. Penn's father and mother are drawn to the life; they exist by thousands; they are the backbone of England. What is slightly inconsistent is that a son with such an exquisite insight into his parent's religion should be so unsuccessful in beating his own music out. The racy high-bred Irish schoolmaster, a fine scholar not above setting dogs at rats, is another portrait drawn with unerring hand, while the Oxford scenes and the life at "Sparrow," the crammer's, could not be bettered. These are outstanding details, but in its general lines the book is a brilliant study of the age of change and transition, and well deserves the distinction it has already won.

V.V.'s EYES. By Henry Sydnor Harrison. 6s. (Constable)

English readers will probably have occasional difficulties with this novel, for Mr. Harrison makes a very free use of the American vernacular and many of his situations are not properly to be appreciated except by those people who have spent some time on the Atlantic sea-board of the United States. But these difficulties, real as they often are, do not materially interfere with one's general enjoyment of what is a well-told story. Dr. Vivian, or V.V. as he is affectionately known to his intimate friends, is a young man of socialistic views who carries out in a very practical manner all the philanthropic doctrines he preaches. At the moment the story opens he has concentrated his efforts upon forcing Mr. Heth, the owner of a cigar factory, to improve the conditions of his work-people. He is accidentally brought into touch with the wilful and beautiful Miss Heth, who, after at first showing some proper filial resentment at his indictment of her father's business, comes gradually to admire the man for his transparent single-heartedness. Questionings begin to arise in her complacent and self-satisfied conscience and she even brings herself to break off her engagement with the highly eligible Mr. Hugo Canning for whom she so cunningly angled. Marriage between her and V.V. is the obvious termination to the story, but Mr. Harrison, somewhat unexpectedly, disdains this happy ending and the book closes with the death of V.V., who meets with a fatal accident owing to the collapse of part of the Heth factory. If not, perhaps, quite so admirable as

"Queed," the book is fresh, strong and buoyantly written, and Mr. Harrison's study of the character of Miss Heth is particularly well worked out.

WHILE THE MUSIC LASTS. By Julia MacDonald. 6s. (Holted & Hardingham.)

This is a somewhat loosely-spun story spreading over three generations. Save for rare melodramatic lapses, it is told in a simple, unaffected style, and traces the career of a young artist, Owen Montgomery, who in the teeth of parental opposition insists on marrying a vain, shallow barmaid whose beauty has infatuated him. The disillusion is cruel and complete: the woman is incapable of love. Children are born to them, a son and two daughters, but the mother's luxury-loving heart remains unsoftened. One thing alone has the power to awaken her better nature—the magnetic violin-playing of her husband, but dreading this uncanny influence she wilfully destroys the instrument, and, as the sequel shows, dramatic changes take place in her life. Mrs. MacDonald's best work is to be found in the second part of the story, in which the characteristics and lives of the interesting children of this ill-fated marriage are handled and developed with uncommon skill.

Photo by Bonas Studios, Ilford.

Miss Julia MacDonald.

"While the Music Lasts" has a strong vein of sentiment running through its pages and—what is less usual—a quality of religious sincerity and simple faith, which gives an additional significance to the story.

MR. LAXWORTHY'S ADVENTURES. By E. Phillips Oppenheim. 3s. 6d. (Cassell.)

Mr. Laxworthy is a sort of superior detective, who is rightly described by his friends as the Man of Peculiar Gifts. He can do astonishing things; hardly any situation will find him at a loss. He has a complete knowledge of lip-language and of jiu-jitsu, marvellous powers of intuition, and a conveniently unobtrusive appearance. He is always on the side of justice, but less often on that of the law. These great talents—or Peculiar Gifts—are exercised in the pursuit of adventure, which of course—this being a sensational novel—comes immediately to hand. We like Mr. Laxworthy and his two assistants, but at the same time we feel bound to confess that they are puzzling people. In the course of an adventure Mr. Laxworthy is fond of telling his friends that the criminal will do a certain thing at a certain hour. The friends are usually incredulous; but the criminal always obliges. The assistants then lose their interest in the case and never once ask Mr. Laxworthy how he came by his wonderfully accurate knowledge. Why have they not more curiosity? It is all rather annoying, for the explanations would be well worth having. Nevertheless, there is a most attractive swing about the book, and, speaking for ourselves, we found that it had to be finished at a sitting.

THE COMMON CHORD. By Phyllis Bottome. 6s. (Secker.)

After the pleasure that it has given us we are sensible of ingratitude in describing "The Common Chord" as a love story in which everything comes right (or nearly so) in the end. Yet that is what it is. The plot, though ingenious and well worked out, is quite the worst part of the book, and those readers who demand a story—and a story only—will be well advised to pass by Miss Bottome's novel. But in almost every other respect "The Common Chord" is really excellent work. It is up-to-date—almost aggravatingly so, in fact—and humorous and pathetic by turn in a manner that can hardly fail to amuse and to move its readers. With the figure of the hero—a young French musician—Miss Bottome scores a veritable triumph, and excellent foils are supplied in a prosaic and unimaginative Englishman, who is at once his friend and rival, and a singularly fresh and attractive heroine. "The Common Chord," in fact, is a book of originality and charm.

BARRY AND A SINNER. By John Barnett. 6s. (Smith, Elder.)

This is really the comedy of a rogue's life, told by himself, with an underlying sense of the pity and pathos of it all to give an edge to its humour. Gilly Leviter is the rogue, a waster without any moral fibre, a shiftless, hopeless weakling whom nobody can save from his own inherent folly. Early in his career he has filched money from his employer, and in consequence served a term of imprisonment; after his release, when he is contemplating suicide, he comes across Barry Lincoln, an old schoolfellow who had always been kind to him, and Barry promptly takes him in hand and insists on looking after him. Shortly after their meeting, Barry inherits a fortune, which only makes him the more determined to devote himself to Gilly's regeneration. Barry himself is a delightfully unpractical idealist. He has romantic ideas of being loved wholly for himself, and not without suffering breaks off his engagement to a girl who has fascinated him when he discovers that she is aware of his wealth and is bent on marrying him for it. Later, in his anxiety to be loved wholly for himself and not for his money, he even encourages a mistake that is made when he and Gilly settle down in his native place, and will not contradict or allow Gilly to contradict the rumour that he is the waster who has been in prison, and that Gilly is an eccentric rich friend who is trying to reclaim him, and the results of this deception are a mingling of laughter and sorrow and one tragic event that robs Gilly of love and is to rob him of life, and yet does not leave him wholly unhappy. It is a lightly, cleverly written story, too fantastic perhaps to seem true, but it touches life seriously now and then and is always interesting.

THE WILDERNESS LOVERS. By E. R. Punshon. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

This is a fine and unusual romance of the wild regions of the Rocky Mountains. Mr. Punshon skilfully appeals both to English and American readers by drawing on both races for his chief characters, and we should not be surprised if his novel quickly became remarkably popular on the two sides of the Atlantic. It deals with an affair of the present day which could only happen in the wilderness he describes so well. It is an uncharted tract of mountain and salt desert as large as Britain, and in it hide two young American outlaws, who carry on a war against a powerful mining magnate, who has robbed them by legal trickery of their farm-land. A charming English girl and her husband come to the mining town to talk over a matter of business with the wicked millionaire. The Englishwoman is abducted by one of the outlaws, and the miners set out as an army of rescue. This part of the story is not merely exciting, but informed with the true spirit of drama. For by his careful characterisation Mr. Punshon prepares the reader for an amazing and yet probable vicissitude of feeling in the relations between the outlaw and the stolen lady. It would scarcely be fair to the author to summarize baldly the remarkable story he has to tell. Only in his way of telling it can the truth to human nature be preserved. His talent for character drawing is as striking as his gifts for narration.

THE STROLLING SAINT. By Rafael Sabatini. 6s. (Stanley Paul.)

A ripe knowledge of the times, a vigorous narrative style, and a nice gift of characterisation go to the successful making of Mr. Sabatini's latest story of mediæval Italy. The strolling saint is the High and Mighty Agostino D'Arguissola, Tyrant of Mondolfo, who was vowed to the cloisters by a fanatical mother. But Agostino took after his free-living soldier ancestors, and in this book we have the entertaining confession of his life and adventures until he regained his patrimony and won the beautiful Bianca. In the interval the Strolling Saint had become a very proficient man of the world, chiefly owing to the kindness of his pedagogue's wife, who had instructed him in the tender passion with the Decameron as their text-book. The story is extremely interesting and entertaining, and the autobiographical form is excellently managed. The inexperienced reader will have no doubts about the accuracy of Mr. Sabatini's vigorous reconstruction of the past. Like some greater novelists, Mr. Sabatini is much happier in describing his Beckys than his Amelias.

THE PETTICOAT COMMANDO, or Boer Women in Secret Service. By Johanna Brandt. 6s. (Mills & Boon.)

This narrative of certain events in Pretoria during that exciting period between the British occupation in June, 1900, and the proclamation of Peace two years later, must be approached from an impartial standpoint. It is written by one uncompromisingly convinced of the plenary righteousness of the Republican cause, and of the absolute injustice of British policy and methods. Nevertheless, when we have allowed for the view-point, the book is of considerable interest. It is largely from records such as this that the authentic history of the Great Boer War will one day be written. The author hates healthily, if the term may be permitted. That is to say, her rancour is seldom against the individual; even an enemy is apt to have justice done at her hands, and she does not spare the lash when those on the Republican side are under criticism. The scene is laid at Harmony, an old, romantic farmstead on the outskirts of Pretoria. Harmony was surrounded by the British lines; nevertheless, it became the intelligence exchange between the Republican inhabitants of Pretoria and the commandos of General Botha which hovered in the vicinity. Hanne van Warmelo, the heroine, is a young woman of compelling individuality and considerable charm. The circumstance that she captured a kitten from the British lines and appropriately named it "Mauser," perhaps expresses her character better than her more sensational achievements. Captain Naude, the Baden Powell of the Boers, is the hero of the tale. His exploits are thrilling enough; for instance, his visits to Harmony in the uniform of a British colonel, after strolling through the lines past the house of the Military Governor and being saluted by the sentries. Then there is "Gentleman Jim," the Zulu who, although he could speak Dutch fluently, absolutely refused to make use of the "Taal" after the British occupation. Nevertheless, Jim remained faithful to his salt. We may close with this expression of the author's healthy optimism: "the time will surely come when, in the intermarriage of our children and our children's children, will be formed a nation great and strong and purified."

THE LAW BRINGERS. By G. B. Lancaster. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

The Law Bringers are men of the mounted police who carry the reign of order into the wild places of Canada. Two of these, Sergeant Tempest and Corporal Dick Heriot, are the principal characters in one of the most arresting and powerfully realistic stories that G. B. Lancaster has ever written. They had been friends, but had fallen out for the love of a woman, and Tempest had seemed to be the successful rival. When they first meet again in the snowy Canadian wastes, Heriot still chafes under memories of the past, and it is only after he has been convinced that the woman who broke his life has broken Tempest's also and driven him into this exile that his former friendship reawakens. The widely differing characters of the two men are drawn with real insight. Tempest has held on to his ideals, and is out to live the life of a man; Heriot, a lesser, weaker spirit, has fallen into loose and shiftless habits, but he is not even yet beyond rising out of his dead self and playing the man at a crisis. There are two women who count in the story: Jennifer, married to the rascally Ducane; and the childlike, pretty, non-moral half-breed Andree. You feel it natural that such a man as Tempest should be irresistibly drawn to such a blithe, careless, charming little creature as Andree; and as natural that Andree should care nothing for him; and the tragedy that ended his love for her saved him from a tragedy that would have been greater had it ended as he wished. And it is Heriot's love for Jennifer, that looked as if it might have cast him deeper into the mire, which is the final means of his regeneration. A full and finely imagined romance, written vigorously and with ripe cunning, "The Law Bringers," should add appreciably both to the reputation and the popularity of its author.

The Bookman's Table.

EREBUS. By Evangeline Ryves. 1s. 6d. net and 1s. net.

THE RED HORIZON. By Evangeline Ryves. 1s. 6d. net and 1s. net. (Elkin Mathews.)

In a preface to the first of these volumes the publisher mentions that two-thirds of the contents have been for ten years out of print, and it was on his persuasion that the author consented to his reissuing them. It is not often that a publisher is desirous of issuing or reissuing anyone's poetry nowadays, but in this case Mr. Mathews was justified of his enthusiasm; moreover, he was not alone in his judgment. F. W. H. Myers, Herbert Trench and Mrs. Meynell have all spoken in highest praise of Miss Ryves's poetry; and when her book of "Lyrics" appeared in 1906, with no author's name on its title-page, Francis Thompson read it, we are told, and remarked to Mrs. Meynell, "Well, there's no doubt of this—the man's a poet!" That much is as evident, too, from the new book "The Red Horizon." The charm of Miss Ryves's poems lies in the simple directness of their language and the delicate, elusive fancy and emotion that play like light and shadow through them. "The Red Horizon" is a dialogue between Wayfarer and Daydreamer, two souls who were banished into night and meet on a mountain-top overlooking the sea, and they talk through the darkness until sunrise of the mysteries of life and the mysteries that lie beyond life, and in the light of a new morning the Spirit of all that had been best and highest in themselves appears and speaks to them of all that they have lost, all they have hoped and meant to be but have not been. It is a poem of fine imaginative quality, and whatever of mysticism enters into it is, like all true mysticism, beautifully simple. All that is best in these two little books has its inspiration in everyday human experience, in joys and sorrows that are common to all of us and those intimate things of the spirit that are the life behind life. Some of the poems are very slight, but within its limits Miss Ryves's gift is the real thing.

PRINCE CHARLIE'S PILOT By Evan Macleod Barron. 5s. net. (Inverness Carruthers & Sons.)

It was Lord Rosebery, our author reminds us, who described the '45 as the last burst of chivalry, and there were undeniably in that picturesque and forlorn undertaking with its romantic adventurer, and his faithful followers, all the elements of tragedy and glamour which go to the making of song and story. Many are the books that have depicted the last Jacobite Rebellion from "Waverley" onwards. Probably no historic incident has made so strong an appeal. Book, both light and serious—stirring tales such as "Kidnapped," reflective modern fiction such as "Poor Sons of a Day," or "Flemington," sensational historical research such as Lang's "Pickle the Spy," indispensable memoranda such as Blaikie's "Itinerary" or Mr. Terry's "Last Jacobite Rising from Contemporary Writers." All these and a host of others. Again and again it has been said that the field is overcrowded, but every year some new book has appeared to exemplify the endless resources of the '45. The last, and one which in our opinion deserves a wide circulation amongst those interested in sidelights upon this episode, is the history of Donald Macleod—who piloted the fugitive Prince amongst the western isles. Those who know their "Lyon in Mourning," will remember that desperate journeying, but there is so much confusion of names and facts in that wonderful book, that such a compact and individualised narrative as this is invaluable. But Mr. Barron has not merely collected and selected his material from "The Lyon in Mourning." The later period of Macleod's life when a prisoner near London, and the horrible privations and cruelties he endured—the reception he received on his release—all this makes up a complete and admirable story-life of a man, who though of humble birth and position, must be ranked amongst the noblest of the Jacobites.

KINGHAM OLD AND NEW: STUDIES IN A RURAL PARISH. By W. Warde Fowler. 5s. net. (Oxford: Blackwell.)

Mr. Warde Fowler's studies of the village in which he lives cover a very wide range of subjects, including a history of the parish before and after Domesday, sketches of old village characters, accounts of the local birds and plants, and descriptions of such recent events as the great thunderstorm of June 7th, 1910, the great drought of 1911, and the Battle of Kingham on September 15th, 1900. The careless reader may feel tempted to describe the book

The Old Manor House, Kingham.

Drawn by E. H. New.

From "Kingham Old and New," by W. Warde Fowler (Blackwell).

From SIDGWICK & JACKSON'S List.

TO NORWAY AND THE NORTH CAPE IN BLUE DRAGON II. BY C. C. LYNAM, M.A.

Illustrated with Photographs, Drawings and Maps in colour half tone and blue. In Designed Cover. Cloth gilt. Super-Royal. 6s. net.

THE MODERN SOCIAL RELIGION. A study of Baháism as the ideal religion combining Christianity and Socialism.

By HORACE HOLLEY. 7s. net.

ELLEN TERRY ON "THE RUSSIAN BALLET."

An appreciation by the famous actress. With drawings by PAMELA COLMAN SMITH. Demy. 4s. 3s. 6d. net.

(Uniform with "Sailing Ships and their Story")

SHIPS AND WAYS OF OTHER DAYS. BY E. KEBLE CHATTERTON.

With a full illustration. In Designed cover, cloth gilt and cloth. Extra Royal. 16s. net.

SIDGWICK & JACKSON'S NEW 1s. NOVEL SERIES.

FIRST 8 TITLES

LE GENTLEMAN

PRIDE OF WAR

THE LEADING NOTE

MOONSEED

THE WOMAN WONDERFUL

THE GOAL OF FORTUNE

PEACE ALLEY

PHYLLIS AND FELICITY

By F. H. SIDGWICK

By GUSTAVE JANSSEN

By ROSALIND MURRAY

By ROSALIND MURRAY

By WILLIAM HEMERY

By J. I. LOWWOOD

By DIANA MEYRICK

By DIANA MEYRICK

Drama List and complete Catalogue on application

3, ADAM STREET, ADELPHI, LONDON.

RALPH CONNORS

WORLD FAMOUS NOVELS

CORPORAL CAMERON.
THE SETTLER.
THE SKY PILOT.
BLACK ROCK.
THE DOCTOR OF CROWS NEST.
THE PROSPECTOR.
GLENGARRY DAYS.
THE MAN FROM GLENGARRY.

See how they fit.

The Bookcase in the illustration is not a fixed-size bookcase. It is a

Globe-Wernicke "Elastic" Bookcase

Built up of "Units". You can start with one, two or three Units. The Units are interlocked to form a complete bookcase, and each Unit is provided with its own dust-proof glass door. You can build up the Units in various ways and rearrange them at any time without disturbing the books inside. See Booklet No. 18 B for full particulars.

Packing free.—Orders of £2 Carriage Paid to any Goods Station in the British Isles.

The Globe-Wernicke Co.

Office and Library Turnshers,

44, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

82, Victoria Street, S.W.

98, Bishopsgate, E.C.

Published at 6/- each. Some of the volumes are also issued in Hodder & Stoughton's 1/- net Cloth Library and in Pictorial Paper Covers at 6d. each. Hodder & Stoughton Publishers, London E.C.

as small beer, but this would be a grossly inaccurate description of it. It possesses a very definite value. It gives a vivid and accurate impression of English rural life at the present time and in the recent past. At the same time Mr. Warde Fowler's writing is, as might indeed be expected, not of that wooden and uninspired variety which is usually associated with village chronicles. A trained and keen observer with a sense of humour, he is master of a fluent and attractive style, which is displayed to particular advantage in the natural history chapters and that on the local "characters" with whom he has been acquainted. It is a book to many portions of which the overworked epithet of "charming" may be justifiably applied.

THE GARDEN OF IGNORANCE. By Mrs. George Cran. 5s. net. (Herbert Jenkins)

Like many another nature-lover, Mrs. George Cran has found most garden books dull, "frightfully dull," and it has been her generous resolve in the present volume to write of gardening just as she herself would have liked to read of it on those dark days of ignorance when three unappreciated acres of shaggy ground in Surrey fell into her possession. The result is an altogether charming book free from dogma and ugly technicalities, and conveying in the lightest, pleasantest fashion an enthusiastic conception of the happiness to be got from a garden. At one time, the author tells us, her enthusiasm reached outrageous dimensions: "My presents became the scandal of the family; asked what I wanted for Christmas I said half a dozen loads of manure, for Easter as many of loam, for my birthday eight tons of 'pitching' stones to pave the terrace—and so on..." She describes how bees and bob-tails, blue Persians and pigeons form part of a garden, and dwells lovingly and amusingly on their habits and possibilities. "The Garden of Ignorance" is brimful of ideas and suggestions; it has all the charm and value of a keenly observant garden-lover who with mingled geniality and humility unfolds to you her rich store of experience in terms at once glowing and practical. The only people who should not read this enchanting volume are those that dwell in flats and wish to rest in peace.

Ph to by Frank Hill.

Mrs. George Cran.

SANCTUARY. By Laurence Morton. 2s. 6d. (Jarrold.)

To write a series of monologues upon commonplace matters, and to hold the reader's attention throughout, requires the exercise of much literary taste. The author of "Sanctuary" is to be congratulated upon a powerful handling of a difficult subject. It is perhaps the entire absence of conventionality which appeals to the reader at first sight, but he is soon drawn into a web of fanciful ideas, from which he feels no desire to escape. The writer is represented as a highly imaginative lady, who has built for herself a house of dreams in her chamber under the stars. In this peaceful room solitude is unknown; nothing is cold or hard or lifeless. Every common thing becomes imbued with a spirit of its own, in whose affinity with her own soul she finds perfect sympathy and companionship. We imagine that Maurice Maeterlinck was conscious of the same subtle attraction, when he drew forth a multitude of spirits from the simple furnishings of a peasant's kitchen. Each of the fifteen papers is addressed to a mysterious being known as a "Shadow Friend," whose personality is too vague to be described and whose presence in her room the owner herself can scarcely understand. With this silent, sympathetic guest all her inmost thoughts are shared and her pretty, quaint ideas discussed. In the company of the spirit and the shadow she is perfectly content, and her room at the top of the house is a sanctuary indeed. In a work of this kind, it is not easy to maintain throughout the same high standard of excellence. There is a lack of inspiration and a suggestion of laboriousness here and there, but the book will appeal to any whose nature responds to the charms of the fanciful.

Notes on New Books.

MESSRS. HODDER & STOUGHTON.

The Wind Before the Dawn, by Dell H. Munger (6s.) is the story of a girl, Elizabeth Farnshaw, born and bred on a homestead in the wilds of a Kansas prairie, who, working her way up to the beginning of a brilliant career, flings away all her ambition and future possibilities on a selfish, tyrannical man. Marrying him, she endeavours to mould her life to his will, and to keep house for him under the interfering supervision of his mother and himself. But her strong, vigorous character is not suited to the narrow life of the wife of an average Kansas farmer, and unhappiness inevitably follows. A hopeless love wakens and ripens between Elizabeth and Hugh Noland, her husband's partner, and how Hugh is able to sacrifice himself that the gates of liberty may be opened to her, Miss Dell H. Munger tells in a very natural, sympathetic style. It is Elizabeth herself who, at last, at the beginning of a new day of hope and reconciliation for herself and her husband, says: "There is no other way. A woman to be free must have money of her own. She must not be supported by a man." That is the secret that her suffering has taught her. It is a strong, interesting novel that will appeal to all those who prefer truth to be the chief element of fiction.

MESSRS. HEATH, CRANTON & OUSELEY.

Mr. Lewis Lusk is an authority upon the Sussex history and character, and in "Sussex Iron" (6s.) he has written a story which should appeal to everyone who hails from one of the most individual of English counties—and to a large number of other people too. The novel deals with the life of the countryside during the Tudor period, while particular stress is laid upon the life and martyrdom of the ironmaster, Richard Woodman, and on the youth of the man who "started" Shakespeare, Will Darrell, afterwards Lord Harthurst. It has a strong and cleverly constructed plot, and its historical detail is at once accurate and interesting. Altogether a very readable and attractive book.

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON & CO.

It is not exactly a series of Damon and Pythias tales which Mr. Edward Step tells in his new volume, Messmates (6s. net), but it is truly sub-titled "A Book of Strange Companionships." Mr. Step has written much about plant life and natural history in general, and here he writes of the associations of insects, fishes and plants with others of their class, not in the form of parasitism, but as helpers one of the other. Sponges and corals, ants and spiders, crabs, anemones, caterpillars and lichens, and a number of other animals and vegetables, "live and let live" in either a most shrewd or a most complacent manner. As a hint to readers we may say that he who destroys the ants in his garden goes far towards destroying the green-fly also; for the ants cosset and nurse the pest "aphides" in a most careful manner for the sake of the few drops of honey-dew they get in return. The illustrations in the book are a revelation of extraordinary friendships.

MESSRS. FRASER, ASHE & CO.

To live the "simple life" and be fond of it is not, necessarily, to be able to write books. But Mr. Andrew McCormick has evidently found so much pleasure in his surroundings in Galloway that he has recorded them on paper and put them into volume form, with a portrait of himself sleeping in the open air for frontispiece. It makes a tasteful volume, its title is Words from the Wild-Wood and it contains sixteen tales and sketches from Galloway. Mr. McCormick lives from May till October inclusive in a hut in a high field, and Galloway folk will readily read his observations and memories.

Laurence Sterne

From Gainsborough's painting, by permission of The Salford Corporation Art Gallery

The Bookman.

"I am a Bookman."—James Russell Lowell.

No. 263. VOL. XLIV.
Subscription rate 11s. per annum post free.

AUGUST, 1913.

PRICE SIXPENCE.
Published Monthly.

CONTENTS.

NEWS NOTES .. .. 187-191	Modern Barbarians. By PERCEVAL GIBBON .. 212	The Last Frontier. By W C SCULLY .. .. 222
THE BOOKSELLERS' DIARY 192	A Novel of Quality .. 213	Before the Curtain .. .. 222
THE READER—	Recent Poetry. By EDWARD THOMAS .. .. 213	NOVEL NOTES—
Baroness Orczy. By ARTHUR RUTLAND .. 193	Horace Walpole's World. By F. G. BETTANY .. 214	The Distant Drum—James Hurd—April Panhasard—
Victor Hugo. By GEORGE SAMPSON .. .. 202	Borrow's Romantic Ballads By THOMAS SECCOMBE .. 215	The Divine Folly—An Average Man—The Inside
Francis Thompson. By KATHARINE TYNAN .. 208	More People's Books By ARTHUR BURRELL .. 216	of the Cup—The Man from Nowhere—The Mystery of
PRIZE COMPETITIONS .. 201	Polly Peachum and the Beggars' Opera .. .. 217	Dr. Fu-Manchu—The Law- rensons—The Strength of
NEW BOOKS—	An Eighteenth Century Egoist By WALTER JERROLD .. 217	the Hills—The Second Chance .. .. 223-225
Philip, Duke of Wharton. By RICHARD CURIEL .. 210	Quack-Painting. By G. S. LAYARD .. .. 218	THE BOOKMAN'S TABLE—
The Renaissance and its Makers By HILDANE MACFALL .. .. 211	The Young Goethe. By WALTER SICHEL .. .. 218	Siam—Dante and Aquinas—
	The Modern Short Story Adventures Among Birds .. 220	The English Fireplace and its Accessories—Caravan-
	The Complete Gardener .. 220	ning and Camping out .. 225-226
	Oliver Onions' New Story .. 221	NOTES ON NEW BOOKS .. 226

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

News Notes.

The September BOOKMAN will be a Bernard Shaw Number, and will contain a special article on George Bernard Shaw by Dixon Scott. Other important articles in this number will be "The Shelburne Essays," by Dr. William Barry; "Crowds," by Richard Curle; "Peacock Pie," by Edward Thomas; "The Diaries of Lady Shelley," by Roger Ingpen; "Women of the Country," by Perceval Gibbon; "Recent History," by Thomas Seccombe; "The Genius of Meredith," etc.

The appointment of Dr. Bridges to the Laureate-ship has given general satisfaction. Dr. Bridges is a scholarly poet; his work has dignity, a fine technical finish, a beauty of form that few latter-day poets attempt and fewer achieve. His poems may be lacking in fire and emotion, but that they are poetry even his severest critic will not deny, and it is certain that whilst he holds the office of Laureate something of its last century distinction will be restored to it. By a happy coincidence the forthcoming number of the Quarterly Review will contain an article on "The Poetry of Robert Bridges."

Mr. George Edgar has written a new novel, "The Red Colonel," which will be published this month by Messrs. Mills & Boon in England, and by Messrs. Appleton in America.

Mr. Fifield is publishing shortly a new edition of Samuel Butler's "Essays on Life, Art and Science." The volume will include an essay on "The Humour of Homer" (which title will be used for the whole book), and a sketch of Butler's life by Mr. H. Festing Jones.

"A Fool's Tragedy," is the title of a new novel by Mr. Scott Craven that Mr. Martin Secker is publishing this autumn. Mr. Scott Craven is well-known as an actor and as a dramatist; he is also distinguished as the author of some of the cleverest humorous verse of recent years; but we believe that "A Fool's Tragedy" is his first essay in prose fiction.

Messrs. Constable are publishing shortly "Odd Numbers," a new volume of humorous verse by Dum Dum.

The Government's new educational scheme gives especial timeliness to Mr. A. J. Tillyard's "History of University Reform," which Messrs. W. Heffer & Sons are publishing early in the autumn. Mr. Tillyard gives the history of such reforms from 1800 to the present day, and supplements this with suggestions towards a complete scheme for the University of Cambridge.

Two well-known Irish novelists—the Hon. Emily Lawless and Mr. Shan F. Bullock—have collaborated in writing a novel of the Ireland of 1898—a story of character and adventure, that Mr. John Murray is publishing this autumn. Mr. Murray also makes the welcome announcement that a new novel by Miss Mary Cholmondeley, "Notwithstanding," will be ready in September.

The reception given last year to little Miss Daphne Allen's remarkable volume of drawings and paintings, "A Child's Visions," has led to the preparation of a new book by the same gifted young artist, which Messrs. George Allen & Co. will publish next month. This time Miss Daphne Allen appears in the dual rôle of artist and author, and "The Birth of the Opal," in addition to many separate drawings, will contain three nature-fantasies which she has both written and illustrated.

Mr. A. G. Gardiner, editor of the Daily News and Leader, has collected a second volume of his brilliant studies of notable personalities in contemporary art, literature, politics and social life, and as "Pillars of Society" the book will be published by Messrs. Nisbet & Co. this autumn. An announcement that will be warmly welcomed by every reader of the first volume, "Prophets, Priests and Kings," which has long been out of print.

Mrs. T. P. O'Connor's charming story, "Little Thank You" (Putnam), has run through six impressions in the seven or eight months since its first appearance, and is now listed among the best-selling books of to-day in America.

Mr. Darrell Figgis has completed a new novel, "Jacob Elthorne: The Chronicle of a Life," which Messrs. Dent are publishing this autumn.

The English Association has published as one of its pamphlets the brilliant and suggestive address that Mr. Edmund Gosse recently delivered to its members on "The Future of English Poetry." Mr. Gosse thinks that the principal danger to the future of poetry rests "in the necessity of freshness of expression," and that "with the superabundant circulation of language year after year, week after week, by a myriad careful scribes, the possibilities of freshness grow rarer and rarer." He foresees a likelihood that this condition of things will lead the poets of the future to cultivate "a patent artificiality, a forcing of the note until it ceases to rouse an echo in the human heart."

One has not to look far to see that some of our poets are already doing this in the effort after originality, and Mr. Gosse is justified in the feeling that "nothing is more dangerous to the health of poetry than the praise given by a group of irresponsible disciples to verse which transfers commonplace thought to an exaggerated, violent and involved scheme of diction," and in the apprehension with which he would view any sign of "the purely learned poet, the prosodical pedant," becoming permanently paramount amongst us. "That would indeed," as he says, "threaten the permanence of the art." Mr. Gosse is by no means pessimistic, but he utters some shrewd and timely warnings that all those interested in the progress of English poetry would do well to read and reflect upon.

Messrs. Sampson Low & Co. are publishing shortly what is, we believe, a first novel by Mr. Arthur F. Wallis, and from a glance at the advance sheets whose new book is reviewed in this Number.

Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree,

Frontispiece portrait from "Thoughts and Afterthoughts," by Herbert Beerbohm Tree (Cassell)

we should be inclined to foretell a roaring popular success for it, only that we never prophesy. It is called "Idonia," and is a romance of the London of Elizabeth's days; the author has steeped his tale in the atmosphere of its period and unfolded it with a gusto and picturesqueness of style which should appeal to that vast multitude of readers who love a good story.

One is so used to hearing America spoken of as a sort of paradise for poets that it seems strange to find that, of late years, several have deliberately deserted it and come over to settle down in the old country. Mr. Ezra Pound has been here almost long enough now to count as an Englishman; a more recent arrival is Mr. Robert Frost, whose first book of poems, "A Boy's Will," was published a few weeks ago by Mr. David Nutt. Born in San Francisco, where his father, a friend of Henry George, edited a newspaper, Mr. Frost was educated at Boston, and became an occasional contributor to the Forum, the New York Independent, and other American publications. But he disliked city life, and did not number the profitable business instincts among his gifts. After his marriage, he cut himself off from all his other belongings, and for several years lived with his wife and children on a lonely farm in a forest clearing; he was nothing much of a farmer, but contrived to make enough by it for the needs of himself and his family whilst he was giving his soul room and time to grow and developing his poetic gifts. Much of his first volume was written in those days, and reveals his love of nature and of the loneliness of the woods and fields, touches in pictures of the everyday life that lay about him, and is filled with his musings on the mysteries of existence, his dreams of what lies behind him, and his hopes of the future. His verse has a strong individual note, and is marked by an unaffected simplicity and a stark directness of utterance that breathes of austere living and the open air. Mr. Frost has completed a second volume for publication this autumn; it is to be called, "Farm Servants and Other People," and its contents, which include poems on such themes as "The Death of the Hired Man," "The Housekeeper," and a bizarre narrative in verse, "The Hundred Collars," are again drawn, for the most part, from his experiences on that farm in the remote forest clearing.

The brilliant authors of "Some Experiences of an Irish R.M.," ask us to find room for the following disclaimer:

"A review having appeared in a prominent weekly paper attributing to us the authorship of a recently-published volume of Irish stories entitled 'By the Brown Bog,' we shall be much obliged if you will kindly allow us to state in your columns that we are not the authors of this work.

"E. (E. SOMERVILLE.
"MARTIN ROSS."

Mr. Hall Caine,

whose powerful new novel is published by

'The Woman Thou Gavest Me' by Mr. Hemmings.

Once upon a time the free-lance journalist was always a man; but it is so no longer. Nowadays there are many women of that tribe, but not many who have done a greater variety of good work or made headway with less encouragement, and in face of more disadvantages, than has Miss S. Gertrude Ford. Hampered with ill-health through most of her early years, and forced to live the narrow life of the invalid, she educated herself and, following her natural bent, turned to the writing of prose and verse, at first by way of amusement, later as a means of earning a living. She confesses to have found it a hard life, full of disappointments; her experience has been that editors are very ready to encourage her with praise and promises, but too often neither the praise nor the promises bear any fruit. But perhaps those editors' sins were not so much in breaking the promises as in making them. If life were longer and the days not so quick and so crowded, we should all leave fewer promises unfulfilled. However, taking her unaided way, Miss Ford has in these last few years contributed topical articles and verse, children's stories, nature studies, and much other miscellaneous prose and poetry to the Daily News, the Contemporary Review, the Westminster Review, the Poetry Review, and other magazines and newspapers; she conducts a Poets' School of forty students in one journal, and a

Madame Calderon de la Barca,
whose famous book, "Life in Mexico," published in London and America in 1843, is about to be re-issued in Messrs. Dent's "Everyman's Library," with an Introduction by Mr. Henry Barclay Swinburn.
From a photograph in the possession of Madame de la Barca's relatives at Washington

"Critic's Chair" in another; incidentally, she has won six prizes and six first-class honours in the famous tournaments conducted by the Saturday Westminster. Lately, she has gathered a selection of her poems into a small volume, "Lyric Leaves," which has been published by Messrs. C. W. Daniel, and though, like most books of verse, it has not enjoyed any large sale, it has won golden opinions from several of our leading literary judges. Mr. Stopford Brooke in particular has given her work high praise. There is true poetic feeling and vision in this little book of hers; it covers a wide range of thought and

*Alas! the poems in her book
You ask, my dear, a sense or two
But there I have, will never do
Such fine, such things, one I want to make
That I'll encourage for your sake
If you will kindly understand
To take right things of a friend
Let us suppose that twenty years
Are gone with all their smiles & tears;
And you are pleased from thought to now
Upon the same & former path
That they were then, their path don't Change, but the same we meet.
Then to some friend I have asked
But one I hope who pleases you,
Will you one small, adventurous state
And walk & spirit all relate -
I'll give you, my friend, tell
"There was a man who loved me well
Who made me poems & said that I
Was sweet to be with him by & by
I should that accomplished creature be
That more without delight could be
But then accomplished I should simply Much more than need to please the eye."*

*He told me, whether maid or wife
There is a war that lasts for life.
At least contention will not cease.
Still our self, our quiet things, we please.
But when I loved my first -
My temper, curb, my passion, cool,
My talents & my flatterer improve,
And love where reason bids me love.
Then might I whether wife or maid,
Consider all my lady's pain,
And might I feel the pleasure share
Without their stern attendant - Care;
As now away our former peace
If we will put the throne of pleasure*

*So said the man; and then he said
There lies that one, I think, the maid
And this advice, that is too late;
How do I keep it - let me see
George Crabbe
Sidmouth 1814 -*

M. Pierre Loti,

a new edition of whose admirable travel book "Siam," published by Mr. Werner Laurie, is reviewed on page 225 emotion, and the best of the poems in it are clearly drawn from her own life and the lives of those about her. She pleads passionately for the rights of women; sings of the joys of town and country and the beauties of the changing year, of the bitterness of poverty, the pleasures of homely things, and quiet living. There is a poignancy of pathos in "The Wife's Appeal":

Photo by Edward Sweetland,
High Wycombe.

Mr. Robert Frost.

"If thou could'st know that Death would come and take me
In one short year. . . ."

and "Musa Victrix" voices her rebellion against the hardship of the Muse's service, from which yet she could never break away:

"Why should I wear thy chains, albeit of roses, Finding their thorns so many and so sharp? . . ."

Miss Ford has added to her difficulties by resolutely living up to certain rather rigid ideals. She has put divers respectable enough periodicals on a sort of black list, and neither offers them her work nor would accept commissions from them. "As an idealist," she says, "I would never submit my work to any but the purest, loftiest, most dignified papers. As a Suffragist, I gave my work free of charge to my own Society's organ, The Vote; as a missionary enthusiast I gave it free to a missionary magazine; nevertheless, in spite of these and such-like restrictions and self-denying ordinances, I have supported and am still supporting myself by my pen." It is a record in which she may justly take a modest pride; and if you think her ideals a little too stern and exacting, you will admire all the more the courage and success with which she has maintained them.

Photo by Hazel's Central Studio
Bournemouth.

Miss S. Gertrude Ford.

The Prix Langlois has been awarded by the French Academy to M. Auguste Monod and M. Henry D. Davry, for their French version of Mr. Edmund Gosse's "Father and Son."

The Booksellers' Diary.

LIST OF FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

August 1st to September 1st, 1913.

Messrs. Allen & Co.

BUCKLEY, R. R. (Editor).—Handbook to the Shakespeare Summer Festival. Paper, 1s. net.
GRAYLING, FRANCIS.—Kent Churches. In 2 vols. 2s. 6d. net per vol.
WALTERS, DR. F. R.—Sanatoria for the Tuberculous 12s. 6d.

Messrs. A. & C. Black.

HOMIE, GORDON.—What to see in England. 3s. 6d. net

Messrs. Cassell & Co.

ACKERMANN, MISS.—Australia from the Woman's Point of View
CHESLER, DR. SLOAN.—Woman, Marriage and Motherhood 6s. net.
DEEPIING, WARWICK.—The Red Saint. 1s. net
DOUGLAS, THEO.—The Grey Countess 6s.
HOSKEN, HEATH, and STANTON CORALIE.—The Dog Star 6s.
JONES, BERNARD.—Gramophones and Phonographs 1s. net
JONES, EGERTON.—Peter Piper. 6s.
NEWLIN, KATHARINE.—The Lely of the Lady 3s. 6d.
Pocket Reference Library—Miniature French English Dictionary Dictionary of Musical Terms 6d. net, and 1s. net
STEVENSON, J. H.—Religion and Temperament 3s. 6d.
WYLIE, I. A. R.—The Rajah's People 6d.

Messrs. W. & R. Chambers, Ltd.

DALY, T. A.—Madrigals 5s. net
NEIL, MARION H.—Candies and Bonbons and how to Make Them 3s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Greening & Co.

THORNE, GUY.—The Vintage of Vice. 2s. net.

Mr. Wm. Heinemann.

CAINE, HALL.—The Woman Thou Gavest Me. 6s.

Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.

"ANONYMOUS"—My Wife's Hidden Life 6s.
BEACH, REX.—The Iron Trail. 6s.
BIRMINGHAM, GEO. A.—General John Regan. 6s.
DOYLE, A. CONAN.—The Poison Belt 3s. 6d.
FOWLER, FLENN THORNTON ROFT.—Her Ladyship's Conscience 6s.
KAUFMAN, HERBERT.—The Efficient Age 2s. net
MACNAUGHTON, S.—Snow Upon the Desert 6s.
MAGNAY, SIR WM.—The Players. 6s.
OPPENHEIM, J. PHILLIPS.—The Mischief Maker 6s.
ORCZY, BARONESS.—Eborado. 6s.

Messrs. Hutchinson & Co.

CLARKE, ISAAC.—The Secret Citadel. 6s.
DURING, STELLA M.—Love's Recompense 6d.
FRASER, MRS. HUGH, and FRASER, HUGH.—Captain Corbion's Adventure. 2s. net.
HOLDSWORTH, ANNIE.—The Book of Anna 6s.
JEFFSON, EDGAR.—Garthside Gardens 6s.
MAXWELL, W. B.—The Devil's Garden 6s.
RAINE, ALLEN.—Under the Thatch 6d.
RATHIEL, JOHN N.—Up Above 6s.
SERGEANT, PHILIP W.—Dorothy Jordan 16s.
SOMERVILLE, H. B.—Ashes of Vengeance 6s.
TWEEDIE, MRS. ALICE.—America as I Saw It 16s.
WARD, MRS. WILFRID.—Horace Blake 6s.

Messrs. Jarrold & Sons.

ADAMS, MORLEY.—In the Footsteps of Borrow and Fitzgerald. Profusely Illustrated. 6s. net.
HORTON, REV. R. F. M.A., D.D.—The Hero of Heroes. New issue 2s. 6d.
MIDDLETON, REV. ROBERT.—A Message for the Times. 1s. net
PIKE, OLIVER G.—Wild Nature Wood and Woad 3s. 6d.
WATSON, KATHLEEN.—Sea Foam. The Amazing Adventures of a Doll. 1s. net.
WATSON, KATHLEEN.—The Living Horse, or what Happened to Sunny Babe and Baby Son 1s. net.
WATSON, KATHLEEN.—Tiny Wee Wun, the little Fairy of the Forest 1s. net.

Mr. T. Werner Laurie.

CARRINGTON, HERLEWARD.—Personal Experiences in Spiritualism 7s. 6d. net.
"CAVENDISH, CUTH."—Auction Bridge 2s. 6d. net
D'AUFFRIGNY, F. B.—The Night of Memory. 6s.
DAWLE, CARLTON.—The Shadow of Evil 6s.
HAMILTON-BROWN, COLONEL.—Camp Fire Yarns of the Lost Legion 12s. 6d. net
PRAGA, MRS. ALFRED.—Love and £200 a Year. 2s. net.
THOMPSON, J. S.—China Revolutionized 12s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston & Co.

ANDSLEY, G. ASHDOWN.—Gems of Japanese Art and Handicraft. With 16 Plates in Colour, Gold, and 3 in monochrome 4s. 5s. net
"S.L."—Untravelled Berkshire With 16 Illustrations 7s. 6d. net
VASEY, GILLAN (Ed. by SHIRLEY B. JEVONS).—The Great Mystery Solved 6s.

Messrs. Lynwood & Co.

BARLOW, HILARY.—The Sentence of the Judge. Cheap Edition. 2s. net
FROST, WM. ALFRED.—Bulwer Lytton. An Exposure of the Errors of His Biographers 1s. net
GREY, G. DUNCAN, LL.D.—A Venture in Variety. Poems and Essays. 2s. 6d. net.
HOLLAND, CLIVE.—A Madonna of the Poet, and Other Stories 6s.
LEITH, MRS. JESSIE.—Fashion's Woman. A Novel 6s.
OULTON, L.—Exceeding Pleasant, and Other Sketches. 10 Illustrations. 6s.
RERKS, H. CAULTON.—The Taming of the Terror. A Story of a Feud. 6s.
SYMONS, MAJOR F. A.—Prince John of Strephitz 6s.
"W.A.F."—An Exposure of the Confession of the Tichborne Claimant 1s. net.

Mr. Elkin Mathews.

HALL, W. ROBERT.—Glimpses of the Unseen (Vigo Cabinet Series.) 1s. 6d. net, and 1s. net
WHEELER, ETHEL ROSE.—Ireland's Veils, and Other Poems (Vigo Cabinet Series.) 1s. 6d. net, and 1s. net.

Messrs. Methuen & Co.

ALBANESI, E. MARIA.—Peter a Parasite. 7d. net
BENNETT, ARNOLD.—Buried Alive. 2s. net.

BRADLEY, A. G.—The Avon and Shakespeare's Country. 6s.
CRAWLEY, E. A.—The Book of the Ball. 3s. 6d. net.
DYSON, A. H.—Lutterworth. The Story of John Wycliffe's Town. 7s. 6d. net.
HARPER, C. G.—The Auto-car Road Book. Vol. IV. 7s. 6d. net.
HICHIENS, ROBERT.—The Way of Ambition. 6s.
LISLE, DAVID.—What is Love? 6s.
MARRIOTT, J. A. R.—England since Waterloo. 10s. 6d. net.
MONLAGUE, C. E.—The Morning's War. 6s.
MUSSABINI, S. A.—The Complete Athletic Trainer. 6s. net.
NORMAN, MRS. GEORGE.—The Summer Lady. 6s.
PARKER, SIR GILBERT.—The Judgment House. 6s.
RIDGEL, W. PETT.—The Remington Sentence. 6s.
SIDGWICK, MRS. A.—Below Stairs. 6s.
SURLES, R. S.—Hawthick Grange. 3s. 6d. net.
WEALE, RICHARD.—A Romance of a Few Days. 6s.
WODEHOUSE, P. G.—The Little Nugget. 6s.

Messrs. Mills & Boon.

COLE, SOPHIE.—Penelope's Doors. 6s.
EDGAR, GEORGE.—The Red Colonel. 6s.
HERRIER, TOM R.—A Motor Tour in Belgium and Germany. 10s. 6d. net.
LEFUSE, M.—Life and Times of Arabella Stuart 10s. 6d. net.
MINZIES, H. STUART.—The Beauport Hunting Diary. 10s. 6d. net, 7s. 6d. net.
PENROSE, MRS. H. H.—The Brat. 6s.
REYNOLDS, ROTHAY.—The Gondola. 6s.
TROUBRIDGE, LADY.—The Cheat. Cheap Edition 1s. net.
WYLIE, I. A. R.—The Daughter of Brahma. Cheap Edition 1s. net.

Mr. John Murray.

NAPIER OF MAGDALA, LADY.—To the Third and Fourth Generations. 6s.
PHILLIPOTS, EDEN.—Some French Cathedrals. 1s. net.
PHILLIPOTS, EDEN.—The Old Time Before Them. 6s.

Messrs. Murray & Evenden.

DE FABECK, F. M.—The Mother. A Poem. Coloured and other Plates 1s. net.
DE LA VAL, JEANNETTE.—Scarlet by Fate. With Frontispiece. 2s. net.
OSTON, M., M.D.—Born in Blunders. 6s.

Messrs. T. Nelson & Sons.

"BRADA."—Retour du Flot 1s. net
DUMAS, ALEXANDRE.—La Tulipa Noire net.
HUGO, VICTOR.—Les Hoses Vues. 1s. net
HUGO, VICTOR.—L'Année Terrible, 1<sup>re</sup> Année Funeste 1s. net
M'KAY, L. MILLER.—Return of the Emigrant 7d. net.
MUMFERY, A. J.—My Climbs in the Alps and Caucasus. 1s. net.
WELLS, H. G.—The Country of the Blind. 7d. net

Serpent Classics:

BALLANTYNE, R. M.—Coral Island.
CON, SIR G.—Fables of the Gods and Heroes.
CREASY, SIR EDWARD.—Fifteen Decisive Battles of the World.
DICKENS, CHARLES.—Christmas Books.
DICKENS, CHARLES.—Nicholas Nickleby. 2 vols.
DISRAELI, BENJAMIN.—Sybil.
DUMAS, ALEXANDRE.—Count of Monte Cristo. 2 vols.
ELLIOT, GEORGE.—Scenes of Clerical Life.
GRANT, JAMES.—First Love and Last Love
HARTE, BRET.—Tales of the West
"HAWTHORNE"—The House of the Seven Gables
MACAULAY, LORD.—Tales of Ancient Rome and Other Poems.
PALGRAVE, F. T.—The Golden Treasury
SCOTT, SIR WALTER.—The Fortunes of Nigel
THACKERAY, W. M.—The Book of Snobs, and Barry Lyndon.
TROLOPE, ANTHONY.—Barchester Towers
WOOD, MRS. HENRY.—Mrs. Halliburton's Troubles.

Mr. Frank Palmer.

RALEIGH, ALAN.—The Real America 5s. net
RALEIGH, ALAN.—National Proverbs Series, Vol. 1, England, Vol. 2, Scotland, Vol. 3, France, Vol. 4, Russia, Vol. 5, Italy, Vol. 6, Spain. 1s. net each.
STRINDBERG, AUGUST.—By the Open Sea. A Novel 6s.
STRINDBERG, AUGUST.—Lucky Fellu. A Allegorical Play 3s. 6d.

Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co.

ADAIR, CECIL.—Quadrille Court 6s.
BLACKER, J. F.—ABC of Collecting Old Continental Pottery. 5s. net
BLACKER, J. F.—Nineteenth Century English Ceramic Art 5s. net
BROADLEY and TERRILL.—The Romance of an Elderly Port 10s. 6d. net.
CUTHBERT, EDITH.—A Vagabond Courtier. 2 Vols. 24s. net
DRUMMOND, HAMILTON.—The Winds of God 6s.
GRACE, ARMINI.—The Clock of St. Martin. 6s.
HARE, CHRISTOPHER.—Maximilian the Dreamer 12s. 6d. net
HILL, HEADON.—Spirit Peas 6s.
LEVY, M.—Paul's Simple Code. 1s. net
RAPPOPORT, DR. A. S.—Famous Artists and their Models 16s. net.
RAWSON, MAUD ST. PNEY.—The Watered Garden 6s.
SAHATINI, RAFAEL.—Torquemada and the Spanish Inquisition 16s. net.
SPENS, ARCTHIBALD B.—A Winter in India 6s. net
YONALL, SIR JAMES, M.P.—More About Collecting 5s. net.

Messrs. Alston Rivers.

BOWEN, MARJORIE.—The Viper of Milan. Popular Edition. 1s. net.
KNIBBS, GEORGE HANDLEY.—Voices of the North and Echoes of Hellas. 3s. net.

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

ASKREW, ALICE and CLAUDE.—God's Clay 6s.
BENDA, JULIEN.—The Yoke of pity (L'Ordination). 5s. net.
BRYANT, SOPHIE.—The Genius of the Gael 5s. net
UNDERWOOD, JOHN J.—Alaska: An Empire in the Making. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co.

APPIAN, ARTHUR.—Her Sacrifice. 6d.
BOOTHBY, GUY.—In Nikola 7d. net.
CLARKE, B. A.—Both Sides of the Road 6s.
FLETCHER, J. S.—The Secret Cargo. 6s.
LE QUEUX, WM.—As We Forgive Them 6d.
LE QUEUX, WM.—The Room of Secrets. 6s.
LE QUEUX, WM.—Whose Findeth a Wife 1s. net.
LITTLESTONE, GILBERT.—The Nether Millstone. 6s.
OPPENHEIM, E. P.—The Missioner. 7d. net.
TRACEY, LOUIS.—Mirabel's Island. 2s. net.

THE READER.

BARONESS ORCZY.

BY ARTHUR RUTLAND.

ALL books are not meant for all readers, and there are some critics who ought never to be allowed to read novels of any kind ; they should be dieted, and novels should be forbidden to them, as physical invalids are debarred from eating venison and other dainties of the table. So fine a critic, within his limits, as Sir Leslie Stephen should not have been given the opportunity of writing such sad stuff about Dickens as that " if literary fame can be safely measured by popularity with the half-educated, he must claim the highest position among English novelists," and of reiterating that " his merits are such as suit the half-educated." That sort of opinion in itself smacks of half-education ; it indicates a narrowness of outlook, defects of taste, restrictions of sympathy and knowledge, lack of a comprehension that there may be other good things besides those that happen to appeal to one's own particular appetite ; all which are as lamentable as every other form of ignorance. I always distrust the judgment of a man who sneers at whatever is " popular." You generally find he has no ideas of his own ; he has passed his days in a world of books and, picking up all his notion of life from them, has not ing but an absurd contempt for the larger world that is not bounded by the walls of a library. Some books can never be popular ; no reasonable person expects them to be ; but there is no essential merit in unpopularity ; books, after all, are written to be read, and so far as novels are concerned, the novelist who cannot so tell his tale that it shall draw the crowd to hear it has not fully mastered his art. He may have higher gifts than that of charming the average multitude, but it is a fault in him if he has not that one also.

It is a good and enviable gift, this of popularity ; that is why even the most unpopular of us lives in hopes of acquiring it some day ; and no living novelist possesses it in fuller measure than does the Baroness Orczy. Ten years ago her name was unknown at the libraries ; but in the few years that have passed since her first book made its appearance she has achieved rapid and signal success both as a teller of stories and as a writer of plays.

Though she has a warm affection for England, the country of her adoption, the Baroness Orczy was born in Hungary, at Tarna-Eörs, an agricultural district at the heart of the most magnificent corn-land in Europe. Her parents only came to England when she was almost grown up, and she had never spoken a word of our language until she was fifteen. " I think," she says, " I must have been extraordinarily predisposed to the assimilation of the English tongue, for directly we arrived in London I, as a schoolgirl rising fifteen, was sent to a preparatory school for the purpose of learning the language, and within three months I was acting in the school play, and had passed a first-class College of Preceptors' examination with honours, winning a special prize for languages. My theosophist friends tell me," she adds whimsically, " that this fits so perfectly into the theory of reincarnation that in one of my previous existences I must certainly have been an English-woman !"

However that may be, in her tastes, her sympathies, in everything but blood, the Baroness Orczy is a brilliant and charming Englishwoman ; nobody who was unaware that she was a Hungarian by birth would guess from her speech that she was anything but English. Her father, besides being a distinguished diplomatist in his own country, was above all things a musician. His beautiful opera, " Il Rinnegato," dedicated to the late Queen of the Belgians, who was a Hungarian Princess, was performed in London, at the old Her Majesty's Theatre, with great success ; on more than one occasion he conducted his own compositions at the famous Philharmonic Concerts of the early '80's, and he several times conducted the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society, of which the late Duke of Edinburgh was an accomplished violinist. So it came about that, in her childhood, the great musical geniuses of the latter part of last century were intimate guests at the house of the Baroness Orczy's parents, and Wagner, Liszt, Gounod, Massenet, and others of that glorious company, took a kindly interest in their host's little daughter. " They would pat me on the shoulder," the Baroness remembers, " and ask if I meant to be a musician like my father ; whereto guests with a family whose chief recreation consisted in writing stories for magazines. These they would read aloud to one another, and also to us, before sending them on their weary round to various editors, for as they were really not very brilliant they were usually returned again and again with the usual thanks. One day, however, one of these products was actually accepted for publication, terms were discussed and agreed upon, and altogether there was an atmosphere in that Kensington house of the delightful sense of excitement which comes only from artistic success. Some of the excitement communicated itself to me. To be quite frank—though there was neither hatred nor malice in its composition, there was quite a little spice of jealousy in it, and later in the day I remarked to my husband, 'Look at these people who have never been outside their own limited circle—they not only write stories, but have them accepted and paid for. Now, why shouldn't I, who have been all over Europe, and have known so many notable and interesting people—why shouldn't I write stories, too?' My husband said laconically, 'Why shouldn't you?' And that was how I came to begin my literary career."

Photo by Bassano.

Baroness Orczy.

Until then she had never for a moment contemplated the possibility of such a career. But now she set to work in earnest and wrote two short stories, which were promptly accepted by Pearson's Magazine, and paid for at the rate of ten guineas each. Moreover, the editor asked for the first refusal of any other stories she wrote. This was more than encouraging; it prompted her to go on, and she found herself looking for hints and suggestions in the life about her, and discovering them everywhere. One day, for instance, travelling on top of an omnibus over one of the ugly canal bridges just beyond Westbourne Park Station, she looked down on the dismal streets thereabouts and noticed an especially dark, wretched, lonely one that borders the canal at this point, and it set her speculating on the mysterious, forgotten crimes that must be perpetrated the house in Hungary where Baroness Orczy was born, and which is described in her novel, "A Son of the People."

Tarna-Eörs,

in such-like squalid, ill-lighted London byways and are never solved and avenged by any Sherlock Holmes or other detective, and from that casual sight and this passing reflection she evolved the series of ingenious stories related by "The Old Man in the Corner." They were immensely popular when they ran serially in the Royal Magazine, and met with as favourable a reception when they appeared in book form in 1909.

But before that Baroness Orczy had published her first novel. This was the phenomenally successful story of "The Scarlet Pimpernel." It is not surprising that with her artistic temperament, her innate love of colour and the picturesque presentment of life, she should have been attracted to the great theme of the French Revolution, nor that she should have handled it with a cunning in the drawing of her characters and the portrayal of her incidents that has made this the most popular, not only of her own novels, but of any novel published in recent years. Sir Percy Blankeney, the handsome, big, apparently indolent dandy-hero of her tale, has already become one of the most familiar figures that latter-day fiction has given us, and his adroit disguises, recklessly gallant chivalry and hair-breadth escapes have thrilled and delighted the thousands who have made his acquaintance in the book or in the play. It was the play that was written first; having done this in collaboration with her husband, Baroness Orczy wrote the novel, and for all the instant popularity that accrued to it when it did get into print, the book had no ready welcome from the publishers.

The play was written, accepted, and tentatively produced at Nottingham within a year; then, in spite

Photo by Bassano.

Baroness Orczy and her husband, Mr. Montagu Barstow.

Baroness Orczy with her team of Hungarian horses—all in Hungarian harness.

Baroness Orczy and her favourite Hungarian mare, Goldi, with her colt, Eldorado.

Baroness Orczy driving a pair of Hungarian horses, Netti and Hussar.

of its pronounced success on the Nottingham stage, it was laid aside for twelve months, until Mr. and Mrs. Fred Terry were able to secure a suitable theatre for its production in London. Meanwhile, the novel was offered to a full dozen of publishers who all refused to have anything to do with it. One or two mitigated the bald "declined with thanks" with a suggestion that if the play (which had just been accepted) proved a success it might be submitted to them again. Finally, it was sent to Messrs. Greening, because as they were publishers of The Play Pictorial, the Baroness thought they might be interested in the book, since the play was then about to come out in London. She was correct in this supposition, and the novel was published by Messrs. Greening on the day that the play was produced. But whilst the book so tardily accepted was received with a chorus of acclaim by critics and public, the play that met such immediate acceptance was decried by almost all the critics, though the public hailed it with unqualified enthusiasm. It was staged at the New Theatre on the 5th January, 1905; the house, crowded in every part, witnessed it with intense excitement and applauded it without stint. But, says the Baroness, "next morning came a rude awakening!

With the exception of one or two papers (not more), the play received from the dramatic critics the soundest round of abuse that any play, to my knowledge, has ever had. It was 'melodramatic,' 'incoherent,' 'stagey,' 'the audience was made up of friends who tried to cheer the actors and loudly condemned the authors.' One well-known critic wrote: 'Even for a firstling it is too unpromising to prompt such leniency as is encouragement—the author is deficient in invention and in craft alike'; another said he 'sat out the tedious play through three weary hours, looking in vain for something to praise;' whilst one of the most widely-read of the dailies was even more thorough in its condemnation: 'The pimperl, as every countryman knows, is a little red flower that grows up and dies in one very short season. It would have been, therefore, impossible to select a more suitable title for the new romantic comedy produced last night

Photo by Hasano

Baroness Orczy.

Baroness Orczy and Mr. Montagu Barstow, with their pet dog, "Molly."

Baroness Orczy on her favourite mare, "Netti."

Baroness Orczy's Kentish home, "Bearsted," Maidstone.

1. View of the house from the hill-top.
2. The formal garden.
3. View from the second terrace.
4. The rose walk.

The house from across the park.
The lower terrace.
The Italian garden.
"Bearsted," showing studio on the right of house.

at the New Theatre. We cannot help thinking that the Baroness Orczy and her husband would have been better advised had they allowed their own particular little pimpernel to blush and die unseen . . . . The plot is not worth telling.' " Naturally, at the time, Baroness Orczy felt this harsh criticism keenly; it is so easy to criticise in that vein, and unfortunately the uncreative gentlemen who can only criticise are much too prone to demonstrate their cleverness in that rather cheap fashion. For the moment, it was the more disheartening because managers and actors, as well as the authors, suffered from the results of such hostile comments. The box-office takings dropped rapidly to next to nothing, and the

Jack Bathurst.
From "Beau Brocade."

had won the affections of an enormous public; it has justified itself by the pleasure it has given to thousands in every walk of life, and among the numerous letters of thanks for it that have reached

Hymn-of-Praise Busy.
From "The Nest of the Sparrow Hawk" managers who had spent lavishly on the production began to feel that the position was serious. But the public generally knows what it wants, and rarely takes the critics quite so seriously as they are apt to take themselves, and by degrees the fortunes of the drama rallied, and turned. Those who came to see it must have been well satisfied and recommended it to their friends; anyhow after the first set-back, day by day the box-office takings increased and went on increasing until what might have proved merely a disastrously empty pocket developed into a veritable gold mine, which is far from being worked out yet. The play was produced on a Thursday; on the Princess Neit-Akrit.

"By the Gods Beloved."

Character Studies from the novels of Baroness Orczy, by A. C. Michael.

Friday, as a consequence of the Press notices, there was not fifty pounds in the house; but within a few months the management was playing to over two thousand pounds a week. One can appreciate the satisfaction the Baroness finds in recalling this episode, but it is the sort of thing that has happened too often for one to have much hope that the recounting of it may have the effect of chastening the average dramatic reviewer and making him a little less cocksure in his judgments. Meanwhile, the book also

Cardinal d'Orsay.
From "The Emperor's Candlesticks"

the author from almost every quarter of the civilized globe there are none she values more than those that have come from patients and nurses in hospitals and nursing homes testifying to the boon it has been to many who have for the nonce forgotten their own sufferings in the varying adventures of her imaginary people.

The publication of "The Scarlet Pimpernel" was quickly followed by that of the strikingly imaginative romance, "By the Gods Beloved." This, and "I Will Repay" (another story of the French Revolution, in which the Scarlet Pimpernel makes a dramatic re-appearance), and that

A Soldier of the Terror.
From "I Will Repay."

Egyptologist; he was deeply versed in the lore of old Egypt and has recaptured much of the beauty and the mystery of it in his great canvasses. "I remember his first telling me," says the Baroness, "of the strange rites prevalent in ancient Egypt in connection with the trial of the dead, and his account of them so took my imagination that I told him if I ever poignant tale of Hungarian rural life, "A Son of the People," are, I think, the strongest and ablest of their author's eleven books—not even excepting "The Scarlet Pimpernel" itself. There is no doubt that Baroness Orczy drew something of her inspiration for "By the Gods Beloved" from her association with Edwin Long. He was a wonderfully erudite one of them having deciphered the directions on a papyrus discovered with a mummied body in a two-thousand-year-old tomb, journeyed with difficulty and danger across the vast sand dunes surrounding the Lybian desert and made their way into the strange, unknown country inhabited by the descendants of "those same people who built the Pyramid

The Earl of Wessex.
From "The Tangled Skein."

of Gihizeh and the mysterious majesty of the Sphinx."

"A Son of the People," Baroness Orczy's third romance, differs as widely from her second as that did from her first. Instead of taking you among the priests and rulers of an ancient civilisation in an eerie imaginary world, it tells a realistic story of homely men and women in a

Sir Percy Blankeney.
From "The Scarlet Pimpernel."

wrote a novel—which I had not then the faintest intention of doing—I would lay the scene of it in old Egypt and relate the incident he had given me of the trial of the dead." And the description of that trial of the dead man is one of the most arresting things in "By the Gods Beloved"—which reveals with glamorous narrative skill the bizarre experiences of two Englishmen, who, country little known to most Englishmen, but known intimately to the author, who passed her girlhood amidst the scenes she describes. The ancestral home of Bideskut pictured in "A Son of the People," is the house in which the Baroness herself was born, and the life of the territorial magnates of Hungary, which enters largely into that novel, was the life with which, in her youth, she was familiar. The agrarian riots that play such an important part in the book, in connection with the setting up of a steam-mill, occurred on her father's estate, and it was he who was the victim of the outrage that Bideskuty suffers in the story. The peasantry was furious with her father as they are with Bideskuty, for introducing the grinding of corn by an agency which they could not understand, and one night, when the corn was ready for harvest, and the weather so dry that there was no water available to check the flames, they set fire to the four corners of a twenty-acre field. She was a very small child at the time, but still retains the vividest remembrance of seeing the red sky, hearing the shouts and the trampling of feet, and being told that the corn was burning, and that the unfortunate horses and cattle were in peril in their stables. Against this background of agrarian strife runs a chequered passionate love story of unusual tenderness and power.

Andras.
From "A Son of the People."

"The Old Man in the Corner."

Of the Baroness Orczy's other novels: "Beau Brocade" (which she has also dramatized and seen successfully placed before the footlights) is a dashing romance of highwaymen and the Jacobite conspiracy; "The Emperor's Candlesticks," containing some of her ablest character studies, is an ingenious and exciting tale of Russian Nihilism; "The Elusive Pimpernel" triumphantly continues the career of that hero of her first book; "The Tangled Skein" moves among the gallantry and intrigue of Tudor times, at the Court of Queen Mary; "The Lady Molly of Scotland Yard" is a series of brilliant detective stories, with a woman detective for its leading character; and "The Nest of the Sparrow-Hawk" is a well-devised, powerful romance of the Cromwellian period. In her new book "Eldorado," which has just been published, she returns again to the great scenes of the French Revolution and unfolds a further adventure of the fascinating and evasive Pimpernel.

Photo by H. Walter Barnell.

John Orczy Barstow (otherwise Jack), the 12-year old son of the Baroness Orczy, in the character of "The Scarlet Pimpernel."

Nowadays, Baroness Orczy lives in Kent, much occupied with her beautiful garden there and her favourite horses and dogs. She has a team of five Hungarian horses which she drives herself. Often, where the width of the roads will permit—which in Kent is not very often—she drives them Hungarian fashion: two wheelers and three leaders, at lightning speed. But she regrets that the multiplicity of motor-cars has spoilt the pleasure of driving, the noise and dust of them being maddening to highly-strung animals. In her own part of the country, where aforetime the coach and four was a frequent and pleasing sight along the Ashford Road, she and her husband are now the only people who drive in that fashion, and she is sometimes saddened by a fear that they too may have to give up that last remnant of old-world charm and be contented to go about in motor-cars like the majority. She admits the utility of the motor, but declares that "to sit behind a well-appointed well-matched team, to handle the ribbons and feel that there is life at the other end of them, is the most exhilarating recreation in the world."

There may be various opinions as to which is the best of Baroness Orczy's books; I have indicated my own preferences; but there can be no question as to which has so far been the most irresistibly popular; each one of them has met with a very large share of public favour, but "The Scarlet Pimpernel" certainly leads all the rest. It set a fashion in dress, in 1906, when "The Pimpernel" skirt was the rage at one of the leading West End drapers, and that of itself is an infallible sign of popularity. The play is to be revived again this autumn and winter, both in the provinces and in London, and it is confidently anticipated that the latest Pimpernel adventure, "Eldorado," will repeat the success of her first book, or even surpass it.

Scene from
"The Scarlet Pimpernel."

(Photo by Ellis & W lery.)

Comtesse de Tournay: "Suzanne, 'I' forbid you-to speak to that woman!"

Lady Blankency, Miss Julia Neilson,

Sir Andrew Ffoulkes, Mr. Alfred Kendrick.

Suzanne, Miss Mary Mackenzie.

Comtesse de Tournay, Mrs. Walter Edwin.

Scene from "Beau Brocade."

(Photo by Foulsham & Tanfield)

Beau Brocade: "Here's for you, my gallant lobster!"

Beau Brocade, Mr. Bertram Wallis.

Lady Patience, Miss Grace Lane.

Scene from
"The Sin of William Jackson."

(Photo by Dover Street Studios.)

Mrs. Alfieri: "Don't worry, Mrs. Val, men ain't worth it."

William Jackson, Mr. Ernest Leicester.

Mrs. Tomaso Alfieri, Miss Ruth McKay

Annie Valentine, Miss Nina Bouicault.

VICTOR HUGO.*

BY GEORGE SAMPSON.

STANDS Hugo where he did? or must we turn to another quotation and write sadly of "Imperious Victor, dead and turned to clay"? Messrs. Nelson should be able to answer either question definitely, for their long and lengthening line of comely shilling volumes stretches far enough now to be a measure of the general interest in a once famous figure. We say "once famous" without malice, and without prejudice to any claim he has to the homage of posterity; for however we may correct and re-correct our impressions, this at least is certain, that Victor Hugo will never loom so large again upon the view of Europe as he did a generation or two ago. Never again will any poet with a sense of humour praise him in the vast hyperbole of the "Birthday Ode," honourable as that poem and its fellow-panegyrics are to the impetuous lover of liberty who flung them out like challenges to a smug and self-satisfied world. But Hugo may be less than the Hugo of legend and still be great. Much of his huge armada of works may be wrecked beyond salvage, and yet enough remain to carry victory into the remotest ports of posterity. Now that he has ceased to be a demi-god he has become something much better—a man and a brother, not the less lovable because his weaknesses, like his virtues, were on a scale of imperial magnitude.

* "Oeuvres Complètes de Victor Hugo." Many volumes. 1s. net each. (Nelson)

The plays, once beacons of revolt and tokens of victory, are certainly not what they were. About the theatre it is always precarious to prophesy; yet this, surely, may be said: that never will there be a time, in this country at least, when romanticism of that complexion will re-conquer the stage. The Hugoesque drama has found its level here in grand opera, and that of a kind in which the singers matter more than the music. "Ernani, involami" (thanks to Patti) is more familiar to us than any speech in the original drama; "Il Segreto" is warbled or tinkled to Donizetti's music by thousands who know nothing about Hugo's "Lucrece Borgia"; the operatic progeny of "Ruy Blas" cannot be numbered; and while "Le Roi s'amuse" seems dead and done with, "Rigoletto" simply cannot be kept off the stage. It is a fine saying of Maeterlinck's that as soon as the heroes of French tragedy cease to speak they cease to exist. Of Victor Hugo's heroes that is especially true; and even when they are most alive their magniloquent outpourings seem to matter so exceedingly little that really we would rather hear it all to the music of Verdi. Even as thrillers the plays have been surpassed, for the logical outcome of Victor Hugo is Sardou. This, of course, is a purely English view, and may be objected to on the ground that a man's work can be rightly judged only in his own country and among his own people; but, nevertheless, we may surely plead in answer that the art which produces a world drama must be rated higher than that which fails at its own frontiers. Victor Hugo wrote dramatic pieces that had their appropriate success or failure, and that made some stirring history of their own; but he wrote no "Hamlet," he wrote no "Faust,"

"The Jelly Young Waterman"

From the painting by Baroness Orczy, exhibited at the Royal Academy.

The novels, rather than the dramas, are Victor's alms for oblivion outside his own country. Everybody in every modern country reads, has read, or must read, "Notre-Dame" and Les Misérables. They belong to what Tennyson (I think) called the great stereotypes of literature, mechanically reprinting themselves from generation to generation. And they thoroughly deserve their immortality. They have the first requisite of all good novels—they tell a good story and tell it well. Victor was not always up to this level. "Han d'Islande," for instance, comes dangerously near the ridiculous; "L'Homme qui rit" is almost entirely unreadable; "Quatre-vingt-treize" is more of a harangue than any novel should be; and "Les Travailleurs de la Mer" has some bulky and tedious excrescences and digressions to be set off against such better things as the famous fight with the octopus and the tragic Gilliatt's tragic end. But the defects of "Notre-Dame" and "Les Misérables,"—defects in the one case of antiquarian elaboration, and in the other of excessive digression—are powerless against the superabundance of excellence. Their characters have become part of the general mythology. Marius and Cosette, Esmeralda and Quasimodo, the Bishop and Jean Valjean, Gringoire and Claude Frollo, are almost as familiar to us in England as the characters of our own Dickens. Victor wrote little better prose, both in restraint and in intensity, than those two synchronous scenes—the piteous execution of Esmeralda in the Place de la Grève and the dramatic struggle on the tower of Notre-Dame, where the evil archdeacon, watching the tragedy, is thrust into the abyss by Quasimodo. The antiphony between the vivid paragraphs descriptive of Frollo's agonised struggles to retain hold of the gargoyle and the simplicity of the repeated "Quasimodo pleurait et regardait la Grève"—la Grève, where perished so miserably all that the poor brute had ever loved—must surely be the finest prose effect that Hugo ever achieved. And the end, with its moving and apparently unsought pathos, is worthy of the climax. Those who are fond of tracing origins and scanning first drafts may like to be reminded of "Bug-Jargal," in which the dwarf buffoon, Habribah, not merely recalls Triboulet, Quasimodo, and other Hugonian monstrosities, but acts out the first conception of the famous struggle over an abyss, with the summit of a

"God bless you for your courage, dear."

Drawn in colour by A. C. Michael.

From "Eldorado," the new romance by Baroness Orczy, that Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton have just published.

precipice in place of Notre-Dame, and the projecting roof of an old tree instead of the archdeacon's gargoyle. The terrible intensity of the later scene will be the more appreciated after a glance at the earlier description.

Of "Les Misérables" little more need be said than that the pages—the multitudinous pages—of this book show us the Victor Hugo who is least disputably great. The spirit which informs, even more than the art which bodies forth, that work entitles Victor Hugo to the special admiration of our times. His sincerity, often to seek in many acts and pages of a crowded life, is here unimpeachable. The hand that wrote "Les Misérables" was also the hand that wrote, as a last disposition, "I give 50,000 francs to the poor. I desire to be carried to the grave in their hearse." "Les Misérables," too, has the merit of recalling Victor Hugo's public life, about which the best that we can say is that it existed. What motives of worldly ambition may have moved him need not be inquired into; the fact remains that the leading French writer of his time took a leading part in the affairs of his time. Let English authors do likewise. Legislation and administration need the best available brains, and no one has the right to assume the airs of a mugwump and retire aloof from the dust and heat of conflict. Meanwhile, we lesser people, we bookmen, must do our part by insisting that the conditions of English political service and the atmosphere of English political controversy shall never be so degraded and befouled as to keep our finest minds from politics as from an unclean thing. Victor was most things in turn; but if we remember that he began as a Royalist and Reactionary, let us not forget that in the end he was an exile for the Republic. When he ratted, at least he ratted magnificently; and much may be forgiven to the man who scarified the sorry hero of the Coup d'état in "Napoléon le Petit" and "L'Histoire d'un Crime." Hugo in the Chamber was sometimes a failure, often absurd and always melodramatic; but some of the utterances for which he was most derided read now like the aspirations of our own moderate reformers. He was the lifelong opponent of capital punishment, and it is fitting, therefore, that "Le Dernier Jour d'un Condamné" and "Claude Gueux" should be as much more readable, as they are vastly more amiable, than Wordsworth's sonnets in praise of the gallows. Victor Hugo was for Poland against Russia, for Garibaldi against the Clericals, for Abolition against Slavery in America. His vision of a "United States of Europe," jeered at by all the imperial spirits of his time, has at least as much to recommend it to humanity as the modern popular ideal of the European waters choked with battleships and the European atmosphere darkened with armed air-vessels. He preached the rights of the child at a time when the rights of men were not too well secured, and he not only urged that the physical as well as the intellectual processes of children should be cared for, but gave point to his views by a weekly dinner to poor children in the island of his exile. Much, surely, may be forgiven to such a man—and there is much to forgive, as you may read in the late Mr. Davidson's excellent biography. Diminished he may be; degraded never. Once he seemed not less than Goethe, and now he seems not much more than Dumas. Still, however dethroned, he stands secure. The best of his verse—a great part of his achievement which we have not been able even to mention here—would alone ensure him immortality. Honour to him, then, both as a favourite of the Muses and as a pioneer of progress. He often stumbled, but he never discernibly marched on the side of wrong. His head was sometimes in the clouds and his feet in the mud, but his heart was in the right place.

THE BOOKMAN PRIZE : COMPETITIONS.

AUGUST, 1913.

Answers to these competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing the name and address of the sender) should be forwarded not later than the 15th of the month to

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, Warwick Square, E.C.

- I.—A PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA is offered for the best original Lyric of not more than thirty-two lines.
- II.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this number of THE BOOKMAN. Preference will be given to quotations of a humorous nature.
- III.—A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS is offered for the best eight lines of verse with the following rhyme-endings :
- dreaming.
sight.
seeming.
night.
hollow.
broke.
follow.
woke.
- IV.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best review, in not more than one hundred words, of any recently published book. Competitors should give the names of Authors and Publishers at head of their reviews.
- V.—A copy of THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for THE BOOKMAN Competitions. The Editor reserves the right to use any suggestions submitted.

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR JULY.

- I.—The PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA for the best original Sonnet is divided, and we award HALF A GUINEA each to Mr. Norman Boothroyd, of Holmleigh, Batley, and to Mr. Hadley Ford, of 12, Priory Road, Tyndall's Park, Bristol, for the following :

CRISIS.

Peace comes at last; the intolerable pain
Of phantom visions beats a slow retreat;
The ceaseless tramping of the million feet
That shook the dim-lit caverns of my brain
So long a time—now dies, and in its train
There comes the flutter of soft wings to greet
My straining ears, as through the burning heat
Cool, restful Silence settles once again. . . .

Then through the windows of a Hall of Dreams
Far-distant murmurings of voices creep
With languorous softness; and a star, it seems,
Draws swiftly near me as I gaze, and lo!
It changes swiftly, and a face I know
Leans gently o'er me, smiling, and . . . I sleep. . . .

NORMAN BOOTHROYD.

TO A LITTLE GIRL.

Bewitching and provocative, you change
Your moods to match the ribbons in your hair,
And I shall never catch you, for you range
Beyond my grasp, intangible as air:
Now prodigal of kisses, and as soon
Aloof, perverse and wayward, you will shroud
Your tear-stained cheeks with elf-locks, like the moon
Who hides her radiance beneath a cloud,
Whence, till another fancy shall beguile
Your grief, you view the world with April eyes
And for a little space forget to smile—
Dear, when I love each variable guise
How shall I hope to paint you, or express
One half of your chameleon loveliness?

HADLEY FORD.

We also select for printing :

TO THE MUSE OF POETRY.

Come, Muse divine, down through the perfumed night,
Leaving a trail of fire upon the dark;
And on my ashy heart let fall one spark,
To kindle it anew to burning light.
Disperse the stagnant air, the chilling blight,
Make my dead soul on glowing seas embark,
Give me once more the rapture of the lark,
Dazzle with dancing stars my tear-dimmed sight.
O throbbing Muse, bring lightning, fire and rain;
I stretch my hands for aught that thou can'st give
To make life more acute, more deep, more high.
I ask for wilder rapture, sharper pain;
To feel—to feel with passion is to live,
And if we have not lived, how dare we die?
(I. Rathbone, Baycliff, Woolton, Liverpool.)

LUX IN TENEBRIS.

When o'er the earth mysterious night doth spread
Her sombre pinions, while the daylight dies,
God walketh as of old in Paradise
Than garish day a lovelier light to shed.
And though our ears are sealed to His tread,
And though His form is hidden from our eyes
(Hath not the fruit forbidden made us wise?)
We know Him near and hide ourselves in dread.
When sense gropes darkling in a mist of tears
And Death's grim shadow falls athwart the years
Surely God draweth nigh though we be blind.
Shrink we with Adam from the garden-tryst
Or entering our Gethsemane with Christ
There kneel, and light amid the darkness find?
(Thomas Sharp, 8, Broadwater Terrace, Cannon Hill Lane, Merton Park, S.W.)

4 THE SKYLARK.

Up, up! on free and fearless pinion borne,
 Beyond the narrow bounds of human sight,
 As though thou'dst pierce the mystery of light,
 And search the very birthplace of the morn!
 Sing, soaring sing! on weary hearts earth-worn,
 Pour the glad music of that azure height,
 Make every sordid soul thy proselyte,
 Taught of thee how to rise and how to scorn!
 Low is thy nest upon the daisied lea,
 A grassy nook of sweet domestic care
 Wherein to fold the slumb'ring wing at even,
 But thou to sunlit altitudes art free,
 Thy duty and thy joy alike are there,
 To link with song the sundered earth and heaven!

(Sarah J. Cole, Holly Hyrst, Sandiacre, Nottingham.)

TO LOVE.

What hast thou taught me, Love?—a thousand things—
 The truth of joy, and certainty of pain;
 The magic wonder of a moment's gain,
 When soul to soul with mutual longing springs:
 The meaning of the song the sky-lark sings;
 The power to feel with heart, and soul, and brain;
 The thrill of living with the Dawn again;
 The rapture of the silence twilight brings.
 What hast thou brought me,
 Love?—a golden peace,
 That is content alone to have thee near—
 A nameless fear of happiness too great;
 A yearning deep within, that ne'er will cease,
 For words to tell thee how
 I love thee, dear,
 While in thy hands I trusting lay my fate!

(Marjorie Winifred Croshie,
 "The Balkans," Lancaster
 Gardens, Beltinge, Herne Bay.)

We specially commend also the Sonnets sent in by Lorna Fane (St. Annes-on-Sea), E. W. Higgs (Clapton),
 "Shel" (Blackheath), Cyril
 G. Taylor (Heswall), "Sec."
 (Leamington Spa), Bernard
 Spencer (London, S.E.), Theodore Maynard (Stamford Brook), Winifred A.
 Cook (Birkenhead), Elsie
 Mead (Burnley), Robert J.
 Cruikshank (Bournemouth),
 "Preceptor" (Bromboro'),
 Ernest A. Carr (Tonbridge),
 Muriel E. George (Lewes),
 C. A. R. (Sharrow), Frank
 G. Greenwood (Bingley), E.
 Irene Seaton (Boxmoor), G.
 J. Holme (Great Malvern),
 J. L. Hardie (Coatbridge),
 Winifred Bourne Medway
 (Clifton), M. A. Newman
 (Framlingham), Miss J. A.
 Jenkins (Handsworth), G. J.
 Baldock (Ropley), E. E.
 Brazier (Ipswich), Eveline
 Emily Ife (Plumstead Common), Ernest A.

Kersten (Thornton Heath), Miss M. C. Lufkin (Sark),
 G. M. Fife (Edinburgh), Mary Wayman (Parkstone),
 Florence Bagster (Kendal), Miss E. Wood (Lewisham),
 "Aritus" (Bayswater), E. A. Galton (Brook Green), Miss E. Hearle (Tewkesbury), Constance Goodwin (Clapham), Edward Lightfoot (Liverpool), I. Downes-Martin (Leeds), Edyth S. Beves (Brighton), Clifford A. Kershaw (Gateshead-on-Tyne), R. W. Fenton (Birstall), A.
 Bertram Johnston (Leith), F. Dale (Saxmundham),
 David J. Mitchell (Glasgow), Stanley Urquhart (Ponder's End), Enoch Daniels (Newcastle), Gwendoline D. Harold (High Barnet), "Deepdene" (Catford), H. R. Smith
 (Newcastle-on-Tyne), Lily E. Lord (Amersham), A.
 Burfield (Parson's Green), Launcelot H. Stuckey (Taunton), S. T. McCabe (Patricroft), F. N. Jellicoe (Stockwell), Doris Dean (Bromley), C. Cooper (Streatham), Harold J.
 Taylor (Ramsgate), Violet D. Chapman (Burnham), B. B.
 (Hampton), Cyril G. E. Bunt (Ballham), Charles Stuart

Photo by Franz Hanesmael.

"There's Many a Slip."

From a painting by the Baroness Orczy exhibited at the Royal Academy.

(Sheffield), Alec Gleneldon (Sheffield), May Jenkinson (Tulse Hill), G. G. Jackson (Northampton), Rev. F. Hern (Rowlands Castle), Mrs. Ormsby (Pontypridd), D. M. Kermode (Kenilworth), Elspeth Carr (Hampstead), Agnes E. M. Baker (W. Hampstead), "Iris" (Stoke Newington), Arbel M. Aldous (Saffron Walden), Catharine Jameson (Sutton Coldfield), A. C. Laughton (Wakefield), G. A. MacKinlay (Glasgow), Margaret Margenson (Isle of Man), Margaret Rey (Bournemouth), R. J. Preston (Norwich), E. J. Martin (Sheffield), G. M. Northcott (West Kirby), James Davidson (Peterhead), W. McQ. Thomson (Patley Bridge), Agnes Rack (Margate), H. Douglas Hamilton (Bristol), G. W. T. McGown (Midlothian), Chas. Parkin (Felling-on-Tyne), R. H. Tripp (Liverpool), Sebastian Stuart (Sheffield), W. Kitley (Derby), Frances A. Manks (Halifax), A. Marshall Diston (Kilmany), M. C. (Enniskillen), Mrs. E. Yeo (Reigate), C. D. Pameley (Bristol), R. B. Boswell (Southampton), Algernon Warren (St. John's Wood), Keltie Dixon (Balham), Hedley V. Storey (Brighton), Miss A. M. Leitch (Cardenden), Maud Marion Burnell (Ashford), Ronald C. Ross (Nottingham), Euphemia Dalgleish (Leith), Mrs. Cater (Torrington), Marcella Whitaker (Dewsbury), Margaret K. McEvoy (Cricklewood), Beatrice Craig (Straidanan), E. Percy Schofield (Hull), Mrs. Lucie C. Temple (Southsea), E. F. Seymour (Kilburn), F. Brebner, Jun. (Aberdeen), Violet Gillespie (Forest Hill), Mrs. C. P. F. Ferrier (Glasgow), James Kello (Glasgow), "Disa" (Cape Town), Alice Wise (Leicester), Ivan Adair (Dublin), Q. E. F. (Liverpool), Rowland D. Lloyd (Bootle), R. B. Ince (Jarvis Brook), Harold Horton (Manchester), E. T. Sandford (Saltash), Rev. Edwin C. Lansdown (S. Woodford), Berwick Sayers (S. Croydon), Beatrice Medway (Clifton), W. A. Lambe (Brighton), J. A. S. Wilson (Edinburgh), G. W. J. Farquharson (Aberdeen), C. H. Morgan (Cullompton), F. Truscott Goldsworthy (Dulwich), Eric Chilman (Hull).

II.—The PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation is awarded to Mr. John A. Walker, of 69, Grosvenor Avenue, East Sheen, S.W., for the following :

THE ROMANCE OF REPORTING.

(REVIEW OF "THE ADVENTURES OF A NEWSPAPER MAN" BY FRANK DILNOT. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

"Go fetch me my bow, my longest long bow"
Ancient Ballad of Robin Hood.

We also select for printing :

OUTSIDE THE ARK. BY ADELAIDE HOLT.
(John Lane)

"Water, water, everywhere."
COLERIDGE, The Ancient Mariner.

(Mrs. Cater, Torrington, and H. Douglas Hamilton,
4, Cassell Road, Fishponds, Bristol.)

BECAUSE OF THE CHILD. BY CURTIS YORKE. (Jarrold.)

"I never use a big, big D."
W S GILBERT, H.M.S. "Pinafore."

(Irene Pollock Lalonde, 14, Forester Road, Bath.)

WHILE THE MUSIC LASTS. BY JULIA MACDONALD.
(Holden and Hardingham)

"All chatter and prate."
JAMES SMITH, The Debating Society.

(Rev. Edwin C. Lansdown, The Manse, Derby Road,
South Woodford, N.E.)

THE BEST OF ALL GOOD LITTLE BOYS. BY W. SICCA.

"With a smooth Sunday face for a mother's delight."

T. HOOD, A Parthian Glance.

(Miss M. K. Phillips, 11, Rossiter's Hill, Frome.)

LOVE AND £200 A YEAR. BY MRS. ALFRED PRAGA.
(Werner Laurie.)

"Doänt thou marry for munny, but goä wheer munny is."

TENNYSON, Northern Farmer. (New style.)

(Charles Powell, 299, Oxford Road, Manchester.)

THE AVERAGE MAN. BY R. H. BENSON. (Hutchinson.)

"Did nothing in particular
And did it very well—"

W. S. GILBERT, Iolanthe.

(Miss H. M. Barrow, All Saints' Rectory, Hastings.)

III.—A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS for the best Epistle to the New Poet Laureate, whoever he might be, is awarded to Mr. R. B. Ince, of The Hermitage, Jarvis Brook, Sussex, for the following :

ADVICE TO THE NEW POET LAUREATE.

Don't sing in praise of Kings or Kaisers
Or of His Majesty's advisers,
But warble gently on one string
Of buttercups and bees and Spring :
For Kings are often hard to please,
But anyone may sing of these.
If Ministers you wish to praise,
Be very careful of your lays—
Use whitewash with an ample brush
For fear the public cheek should blush ;
Let not your ready pen be cynical
For public men are strangely finical
And will not vote you wine or money
For gall ; they have a taste for honey.
Don't sing of Empire or the seas,
Kipling's a specialist in these,
And Raleigh and his daring boys
Can best be sung by Mr. Noyes.
Just be a mouthpiece, nothing more,
Of thoughts that have been voiced before :
Of zephyrs sighing to the trees
And hollyhocks besieged of bees.
But if these themes fit not your lute,
Then take your pension and be mute.

The Epistles have, on the whole, been rather disappointing ; the best of the many others received were sent by A. Chree (Oldham), A. Burfield (Parson's Green), John Birrell (Belfast), D. McLaren (Leith), Elijah Summers (Dukinfield), G. J. Baldock (Ropley), M. C. Newman (Framlingham), Miss E. M. Herring (Weston-super-Mare), A. C. Laughton (Wakefield), Chas. Stuart (Sheffield), C. W. Rodwell (Sutton-on-Hull), Emily Cornell (Upper Norwood), E. A. Pearson (Fleet), Marcella Whitaker (Dewsbury), J. P. Wynne (Manchester), G. F. A. Salmon (Penzance), A. B. Johnston (Leith), "Tairama" (Norwich), Hedley V. Storey (Brighton), M. B. M. (Glasgow), C. L. Alexander (Harrogate), F. N. Jellicoe (Stockwell).

IV.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best review in not more than a hundred words is awarded to Miss Frances A. S. Holbrow, of Harrietsham, near Maidstone, Kent, for the following :

A PRISONER IN FAIRYLAND. BY ALGERNON BLACKWOOD.
(Macmillan & Co.)

Mr. Blackwood has already shown that he possesses the courage to hold to his own vision of life and the skill to express it in convincing terms. Both qualities distinguish this book. Though the verses scattered throughout are merely whimsical, the prose passages often reach a high level. Purity of idea shines through an even, but never monotonous, rhythm ; beauty of thought expresses itself in simple and pertinent language. Added to the faculties of seer and craftsman, Mr. Blackwood has that rare humour which lights up with benignant laughter the quaint and the grotesque in daily life.

Among the best of the many others sent in are :

THE REAL MARTYR OF ST. HELENA. By T. DUNDAS PILLANS. (Melrose.)

Napoleon worshippers regard the exiled Emperor as the Martyr of St. Helena, but this author shows that the real martyr was Sir Hudson Lowe—the long-maligned, who had the thankless task of being governor in the rocky island in mid-Atlantic where the man who had dominated Europe chafed out his last years. Few unbiassed readers will be able to follow Mr. Pillan's narrative without being inclined to agree that Sir Hudson was the victim of misrepresentations innumerable by those who had sought to make his thankless office unendurable and to show him the Pilate of this Napoleonic Calvary.

(M. A. Newman, Framlingham, Suffolk.)

REQUITAL. By MRS. J. O. ARNOLD. (Methuen.)

This book is interesting and readable, because it introduces a variation upon an old theme, and also because it depicts, without moralising, the effect of trial and danger in the spiritual uplifting of almost every kind of character. There is nothing forced or unnatural in the circumstances, and it is good to see that the "natural" man is the "good man," in spite of all appearance to the contrary. It is a book that makes us, perforce, think more highly of human nature by seeing the "divine spark" therefrom emitted beyond all doubt and disbelief.

(Miss J. A. Jenkins, 196, Hamstead Road, Handsworth, Birmingham.)

JOHN SMITH OF HARROW: SCHOOLMASTER. By E. D. RENDALL AND G. H. RENDALL. (Smith, Elder & Co)

This is a perfect essay in the art of biography. There rises before the reader a gentle, wistful figure with humour-glancing eyes. From his humble London home to the pitiful hospital where he died he walked the whole way with God. Lovable and loving, he moved obscurely to the world, but to some few companions all-prominently. This record of his life gives to the plain name of Smith an added lustre of saintship. Henceforth John Smith has two immortalities—in the bosom of God, and in the hearts of men. All who read become his pupils.

(Harold J. Taylor, 17, Liverpool Lawn, Ramsgate.)

WAYSIDE LAMPS. By THE AUTHOR OF "ESPECIALLY WILLIAM OF GIBRALTAR, AND MARY HIS WIFE." (Longmans.)

This is a beautiful, wonderful book. One reads it as it has been written, with a smile—tears never far away, and a lump in the throat. One closes it longing for more. It is a rainbow tissue of real experiences, of suffering and heroism irradiated with tenderness and humour, bathed in the light of love. The literary touch is of the lightest: a paragraph paints a picture, a phrase gives a flash-light vision of a situation or a character. The loveliest thing in it is the unavoidable revelation of the personality of the writer, only possible under a pseudonym, shining as an Arc-light amidst these Wayside Lamps.

(Christine R. Shand, Barrymoor, Langport, Som.)

SONGS FROM LEINSTER. By W. M. LETTS. 2s. 6d. net. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

Many who have been joyfully clipping these songs out of the corners of newspapers will welcome them again in a volume. Their inspiration, if not so wealthy, is as spontaneous and distinctive as Synge's. "A Prayer for a Little Child," "Dan O'Shee," and "Boys" are full of the tenderness and whimsicality which make the Irish such a fascinating people. The comedy is broader in "The Old Wexford Woman" and "Scholars;" but even these have an undertone of tenderness and regret. The fragrance of them all is as wholesome as the brine at Waterford or "a whiff of peat-smoke."

Photo by Hassano.

Baroness Orczy.

(G. Lowther, The Bungalow, Hempsted, near Gloucester.)

BUBBLE AND SQUEAK. By WALTER EMANUEL.

(Hutchinson & Co.)

The well-known writer of the weekly "Charivaria" in Punch has here collected an enjoyable pot-pouri of his humorous pen-sketches, and with the genial help of John Hassall and George Morrow the mélange makes an excellent shillingsworth. To quote a few of the contents: There is a collection of five pieces in the Cockney dialect; some extraordinary advice is vouchsafed on the subject of pets; a certain notorious railway company is defended in an ingenious fashion; and one is given a few hints on how best to get oneself disliked. If one likes variety and clean, sparkling humour, it is here.

(C. W. Rodmell, The Croft, Sutton-on-Hull.)

ALPS AND SANCTUARIES OF PIEDMONT AND THE CANTON TICINO. By SAMUEL BUTLER. (5s. net, Fiffeld.)

This volume does not belong to the guide-book type; it is full of thoughts and side-thoughts suggested by chance sayings or sights by the way, in this writer's own distinctive manner. For Butler did not carry about with him an English standard—which he found chiefly to be distinguished for its "priggishness"—by which to praise or depreciate everything he saw. He was satisfied to look at the life of the Italians from their own point of view. The result is a descriptive volume in its way as full of perception as "Erewhom" and in its way as delightful.

(J. F. Harris, St. John's College, Cambridge.)

Very good reviews have also been received from Miss M. E. Lorry (Putney), M. W. Averay Jones; Mrs. Cater (Torrington), Lucy G. Chamberlain (Llandudno), Alan C. Frazer (Bridgwater), Miss D. E. Joyner (Parracombe), J. B. Boulkes (Derby), J. Richard Ellaway (Basingstoke), Miss B. C. Hardy (Eastbourne), Annie E. Higgins (Hoylake), Mrs. Sybilla Stirling (Glenfarg), G. E. Wakerley (West Bridgford), Percy J. Harris (Coventry), Katherine J. Wood (Birmingham), Gladys G. Mulliner (Blackheath), L. H. Cooke (Heaton Moor), S. T. McCabe (Patricroft), D. Lefebvre (Johannesburg), W. M. Lodge (Upper Norwood), E. F. Seymour (Kilburn), Miss H. R. Wood (Harrow), Susan Hardy (Salisbury), Florence G. Fidler (London, N.W.), Muriel M. B. Aikman (Glasgow), Gladys Evelyn Warren (St. John's Wood), Dorothy Nicholls (Godalming), Frances D. Watson (Stockport).

V.—A PRIZE OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO THE BOOKMAN is awarded to the Rev. R. Richard, of 33, Cranley Gardens, Muswell Hill, N.

"A Narrow Vessel" is too long to quote, but it is one of a group of poems about a girl's way; and a shorter poem will suffice.

"She was aweary of the hovering
Of Love's incessant and tumultuous wing;
Her lover's tokens she would answer not—
"Twere well she should be strange with him somewhat:
A pretty babe, this Love,—but fie on it,
That would not suffer her lay it down a whit!
Appointed tryst defiantly she balked,
And with her lightest comrade lightly walked
Who scared the chidden Love to hide apart,
And peep from some unnoticed corner of her heart.
She thought not of her lover, deem it not
(There yonder, in the hollow, that's his cot),
But she forgot not that he was forgot.
She saw him at his gate, yet stilled her tongue—
So weak she felt her, that she would feel strong,
And she must punish him for doing him wrong:
Passed, unoblivious of oblivion still;
And, if she turned upon the brow o' the hill,
It was so openly, so lightly done,
You saw she thought he was not thought-upon.

He through the gate went back in bitterness;
She that night woke and stirred, with no distress,
Glad of her doing,—sedulous to be glad,
Lest perhaps her foolish heart suspect that it was sad!"

It was one of the strange, quaint, lovable things in the poet that he was simple, and of the common clay, at home amid Heaven and the stars, yet very human and profoundly interested in human things. No one could ever impute the aloofness, the loneliness, to Francis Thompson which often belongs to the essential poet. Perhaps it was his gain from the submerged years that the human pain and the human need must always be understood of him and appeal to him. It was, perhaps, the meaning of his fate: his mortal and suffering preparation for the immortal, the purgatory before his heaven. He carried the heart of a boy out of it, and would descend from his heights to shout for the cricket or football edition of the evening papers. Mr. Meynell gives us the one fascinating scrap of cricket poetry which has survived, a fascinating thing that makes us long for more.

New Books.

THE LIFE AND WRITINGS OF PHILIP, DUKE OF WHARTON.*

There are few more fantastic histories than that of the Duke of Wharton. He was born in 1608, the only son of Lord Wharton (a barony created in 1544), and, as a youth, showed great precocity. He made a runaway marriage before he was seventeen, and a few months later succeeded his father, who had been raised to a marquissate some years previously.

The new Marquis then undertook "a grand tour" on the Continent, and meeting there with many Jacobites, became an ardent follower of "James III." Mr. Melville prints numerous letters to and about Wharton from such distinguished Jacobites as the Pretender himself, his Queen Mary, the Earl of Mar, the Duke of Ormonde, and so forth. The Marquis was now getting deep into the net of Jacobite intrigue and even visited the Pretender at Avignon (the first of various meetings in different parts of Europe). When he reached Paris, Lord Stair, the British Ambassador, was compelled to give him some friendly words of advice.

Summoned to England by his trustees, he reached London again in 1717. Here his enthusiasm for the Stuarts rapidly waned, although James, at his urgent request, went so far as to "create" him "Duke of Northumberland"—a very barren honour at best, as it had no legal validity whatsoever. The home Government, who knew about his coquetting with "the cause," thought it wise to treat it simply as a boyish freak. They realized that he was a young man of promise, and, in order to bind him definitely to the Loyalist side and to their party in politics, not only ignored his treasonable dealings but actually created him, while still a minor, Duke of Wharton. It was, as Mr. Melville remarks, "perhaps the most extraordinary bestowal of an honour that has ever been made in this country."

The Duke, who had sat for some years in the Irish House of Lords even before he reached his majority, took his seat in the English House of Lords as soon as he was twenty-one. His private life, after a short spell of respectable re-union with his wife, became notorious for its viciousness and extravagance. He is said to have lost about £120,000 in the South Sea Bubble, and his immoralities quite shocked the town—which was by no means prudish in those days. But he was also a patron of letters, bestowed a pension on the poet Young, and had numerous dedications addressed to him. He even wrote a little himself, but, if Mr. Melville's quotations are fair samples, with no particular claim to distinction.

In the House of Lords he voted Tory, in opposition to the Government who had made him a duke, but in full agreement with his character for fickleness and unreliability. He spoke several times in Parliament, and in 1723 made his famous speech in favour of Atterbury, the Jacobite Bishop of Rochester, who was being persecuted by Walpole's government. Mr. Melville prints this eloquent speech in an appendix, and it certainly proves that Wharton was decidedly a man of remarkable talent.

In 1725 the Duke again went abroad, to Vienna, having entered anew into negotiations with the Pretender, after becoming, apparently, a most loyal subject of George. The following year, unable to effect anything in Vienna, he moved on to Spain as envoy of the Pretender. His Duchess died in April, and shortly after he married an Irish maid-of-honour to the Queen of Spain. But he was now becoming unpopular amongst the Jacobites themselves, and James declined to employ him further. There was nothing for him left to do but to enter the Spanish army.

After a time he made overtures to the British Government for a pardon (they had proposed to indite him for high treason for having taken part in the attack on Gibraltar), and this would undoubtedly have been granted could he have been induced to throw himself on the King's mercy. But his pride revolted, he again went over to the Jacobites, and the Government, their patience at last exhausted, felt compelled to outlaw him. His estates were seized, and he was reduced to absolute poverty. He was now in France, and for a time lived in a convent (he had joined the Catholic Church on the occasion of his second marriage). But later he returned to his regiment in Spain, where he died near Tarragona, in a destitute state, in 1731. He was in the thirty-third year of his age.

This, in brief, is the history of the first and last Duke of Wharton. He was a man on whom Nature seemed to have poured all her gifts, but who simply insisted on his own ruin. Mr. Melville has done well to present us with a full-length portrait of this singular figure. His name is now more a by-word for debauchery than for anything else, but it is quite

* "The Life and Writings of Philip, Duke of Wharton." By Lewis Melville. With Seventeen Illustrations. *16s. net. (John Lane.)

Philip, Duke of Wharton.

From the mezzotint by Strong in the possession of A. M. Broadley, Esq.

From "Philip, Duke of Wharton," by Lewis Melville (John Lane).

obvious that he was something different from a mere rake. His intentions fluctuated like a tide, and he was obviously quite lacking in any kind of stability, but he was not really altogether unprincipled. If he had been that he would not have been so often on the unpopular side. Political morality in those days was in a very curious condition (who has ever probed all the abortive plotting of the English half-Jacobites?), and, as to private morality, he was only worse than half the peerage of his time in that he was more open. In the early part of the eighteenth century English "high life" was at a pretty low ebb. It hadn't recovered from Charles II. So one must allow a good deal for poor Wharton. Of course, nearly all that he did was utterly worthless, but one feels that with only a little more wisdom, he might have been an infinitely better man. He might even have been a respectable man eventually!

RICHARD CURLE.

THE RENAISSANCE AND ITS MAKERS.*

It is an acknowledged ungraciousness to look a gift-horse in the mouth; and a sincere book is ever a gift, if gift there be. Indeed, it is a slice out of the life of a man. This handsome volume is such a gift to the world—a rare sincerity. That it gave its authors a superb opportunity to create an artistic masterpiece can be denied as little as that they were not wholly dowered with the supreme gifts wherewith to achieve the masterpiece; but they frankly put it forth as but an ordered study of a wondrous re-awakening of the human race—and let us at once as frankly acknowledge that it is far more than that. To gather this complex age into one volume in such a form that the man in the street shall be able to understand the vast movement as a whole, this was no mean task. It has been achieved with rare skill. The authors lacked the full artistry of such a genius as that of Green in the writing of the famous "Short History of the English People": the picture is unequally painted; the phrasing has not that rich virility that brings portraiture to full life; the English is not of the power that creates the absolute illusion which we call art; but the picture as a whole is clear and precise, and at times not only is the age set before the reader with consummate finesse, but a portrait is painted with such artistic charm that the gems perhaps make one feel the lack of lustre in the lesser portraiture. But whilst the portraits are unequal, the employment of the portraiture of the great personalities about which to build the age, from rise to fall of the Renaissance, compels the age into the reader's mind in a skilful fashion that makes for pleasant reading; and this book should widely increase the general interest in one of the most important periods of the history of man—the more so when we remember that it is exactly the preciosity of many writers that has hitherto baffled the man in the street in his efforts to sift the complexities of the period. Both authors must be congratulated upon the making of a book that has been written with sincere intention to clarify what more than one man of high repute in letters has failed to clarify.

* "The Renaissance and its Makers." By J. D. Symon and S. L. Pensusan. 10s. 6d. net. Illustrated. (T. C. & E. C. Jack.)

The volume suffers from the absence of a simple sketch-map of Italy; and the omission of one or two "authorities" in the bibliography accounts for what might have given a still larger vision. But Italy, from its romance and splendour, has always held too great a position in the Renaissance.

A certain dryness of manner, and an occasional misuse of a word—such as "factitious" where "factious" is meant—must be confessed; but on the whole the presentation is clear, and often colourful. The strength of the work lies in its brilliant pageantry of great figures, whereby we come into simple and easy relation with the age; whereby, also, we get an excellent sense of the relation and proportion of the famous personalities to each other and to the peoples that produced them.

And what a strange age! How fantastic the human!

Our authors realise that the old theory of the Renaissance having come out of Greece into Italy can no longer be upheld—it does not account for the vitality and significance of the great awakening. It was largely out of the Gothic spirit invading the lands of distracted Italy that the Renaissance came to blossom. The dark and sombre soul of Dante, steeped in the mediæval threat of the Last Judgment, was never obliterated from the soul of Italy for all her toying with the Paganism of antiquity. It was in the North and the peoples of the North that the new age found its reality and achieved the freedom of man—his soul and his body. The old Latin culture was granted to Dante, but only to be transformed into a mystical part of mediævalism; yet he strides withal, scarlet-robed and tragic, towards the great awakening. Then enters Petrarch, mistaking mimicry of Latin verse for poetry, yet penning in his living Italian tongue the love of Laura, which keeps him immortal, whilst his precious Latin epics, his chief source of pride, moulder unread. Nay, did not Dante himself come near to oblivion by beginning his masterpiece in Latin, changing to the singing of his native tongue, whereby he "created" the Italian language into a splendour? Here we have the picture of it all most ably drawn. Petrarch brings the new interest in the "humanities" of antique days into the land, and stands out the first great "humanist." He frets his soul that Greek has been denied to him. Enter the "Greek" in Boccaccio, who tells his immortal tales to a bevy of aristocratic men and maids in the garden whilst, without, Florence is racked with the plague. Here is Renaissance Italy in all its heartlessness, its fine manners, its brutality, its vice, its strange admixture of Christianity and Paganism, wholly revealed. The joy of life and terror of hell-fire go hand-in-hand. The Church, aforetime the store of learning, carefully pruned to fit the scholastic ideals, yields up its learning to poet and painter; and paganism walks the streets of Italy, arrayed in costly apparel, bereft of all decency, impelling, strangely enough, to the freedom of man withal! The sweet mediæval soul of Saint Francis of Assisi has already turned to the love of all created things and the joy in them; the black scowl of Saint Dominic turns Italy into a shambles for the slaying of men that their souls may be saved; and Italy is to be rent asunder by the warring ideals. Guelph and Ghibelline, Pope's man and Emperor's man, make the stones of her streets run blood. Everywhere grows mimicry of the antique. Even genius mistakes mimicry of dead language for "style." Schools and academics arise wherein men discourse of the ancients. But the hairsplitting and verbal quibbles of mediæval "philosophy" give way to free logic. "How many angels can dance on a needle's point?" drops out of serious consideration. The great princes gather wits and philosophers and poets and painters about them. Culture becomes the fashion. Here pass before us the great figures of the Italian days—and, to the author's credit be it said, they are no lay figures. But the academies, whilst they give an impetus to learning, have the seeds of decay in their birth, and "euphemism" and "style" are digging the graves of the wits of the Renaissance. Allegory stalks the land; and the pagan gods return—whom nobody really worships or fully understands, so they are bemuddled with the saints. Great men collect libraries of ancient manuscripts; and anon the invention of printing, coming like the real Renaissance out of the North, spreads knowledge broadcast. The classic falsity of Beauty as the whole aim of art is set up, and is to plague the centuries. Here we see, out of the turmoil of Italy, the great Papal houses arise; here the great princes pass before us. Italy, missing the significance of the rise of nations, fights an internecine strife. The Spanish house of the Borgias brings forth its vast crimes and genius, giving a name to hideous living that has overwhelmed even the most famous woman of that house, the much-maligned Lucretia. Cosimo and Lorenzo and the lesser ones of the de Medici are clearly limned in their sagacity and their splendour. Venice, Florence, Milan, Naples give each their setting in turn. Criticism takes too large a share and baulks vital originality on every hand; yet genius triumphs even over this blight. Here step Chrysoloras and Pletho, importing Plato. So Italy becomes "the blundering instrument of a possible progression." Rags are made into paper; a century and a half passes and movable metal types are brought into Italy. The Church encourages printing, which is to pluck the mighty from their seats; as wilfully the Church turns upon printing and persecutes the makers of books. Out of the splendid welter, hideous as splendid, steps the pure-hearted Vittorino; goes to the court of the Gouzaga, and establishes the modern school for the training of youth; cleansing the life of boyhood in marvellous fashion; beloved and respected of all; scorning the wealth that was his for the filching; dying as lacking in monies as he began, one of the noble spirits of this strange time. Savonarola the reactionary flits his sombre day and passes to his hideous death. Machiavelli is seen in his just and true colours—indeed, a sense of justice and fair-mindedness is one of the most remarkable qualities of a remarkable book. The women of the Renaissance add their romance. Ariosto passes, singing his lays. And with an excellent survey of the Renaissance as it awakens the peoples of Europe—wherein Erasmus and Luther fall into their right perspective, for we see them in relation to their age—we end the volume with a sense of having been led through the maze by guides who have mastered their subject and been enthusiastically impelled to share their vision.

HALDANE MACFALL.

MODERN BARBARIANS.*

In his chapter entitled "An Introduction to Mexican History," which is not nearly as dull as he fears it will be, Mr. Baerlein casts his eyes backwards to "the lamentable day when I was not more versed in Mexico than most of you who read these lines," and recollects that he conceived it to be "a land of Aztec battlefields on which the modern desperadoes skulked behind the cacti when they were not killed by Diaz." Mexico has formulated itself in some such terms to most; it has counted among the lands of romance, a sort of colonial Spain as Spain was in the time of Gil Blas and Lazarillo de Tormes; its affairs were so remote from one's commonplace concerns that it stood to lose rather than to gain in colour and interest by matter-of-fact investigation. It is a strong recommendation to the reader that Mr. Baerlein is at least not matter-of-fact; that he sees with imagination and emotion; and that the Mexico in which he is now "versed" is still a land of warm colour and utter strangeness.

* "Mexico, The Land of Unrest," by Henry Baerlein.* (Herbert & Daniel.) 16s. net.

One peculiarity in the book is noteworthy and that is the evidence it affords of the author's saturation in his subject. One knows actually that he was not in the country very long, that he saw it as a visitor and journalist; yet he writes of it often as though certain things—sometimes very awful ones—were too well known to need new mention. His very allusiveness is the cause of occasional obscurity; for example, it is impossible to be sure, from what one reads on p. 204, whether the doctors at Monterrey, in Northern Mexico, actually murdered their small-pox patients by poisoning them, or whether they merely treated the disease wrongly. But in general, he sets forth his vast fund of knowledge about men and affairs not only lucidly enough, but with a wealth of anecdotal corroboration which aids one to realise alike the horror and beauty of which he was a spectator. In politics he is, of course, a partisan, not so much because he approves of any particular regime as that he disapproves, to state it feebly, of Diaz, his memory, his works and his character.

It is not surprising, in the light of what Mr. Baerlein tells us, that Diaz should have taken such a hold upon Mexico. Countries, one supposes, have the governments they deserve; a land in which political murder, torture and slavery are native, is naturally governed by those most proficient in slaughter, torment and oppression; à bon chat bon rat. "The Mexicans are descended on the one side," wrote Mr. Cunningham Graham, "from the most bloodthirsty race of Indians that the Spanish conquerors came across, and on the other side from the very fiercest elements of the Spanish race itself—elements which had just emerged from eight hundred years of warfare with the Moors." Mr. Baerlein finds them childish, but childish in the fashion of a very fiendish and perverted infant. It is hardly the word his readers will select after a perusal of his pages teeming with tales and instances of cruelty and lust. Unrest is in their blood; one doubts whether a genuine republicanism is a feasible means of governing a race so habituated to the horrid joys of civil war.

Though Diaz fell, there are yet living many of the men

How they bombard Editors in Mexico.
Office of the Heraldo Independiente.

From Mexico, the Land of Unrest, by Henry Baerlein (Herbert & Daniel).

who held office under him, chiefs of police, commissioners, judges and so on, without whose good will his infernal system could not have had effect. Diaz, in his strength and genius, was no more a typical Mexican than Napoleon was a typical Corsican; it was his underlings, the men who stabbed and hanged and stole, who set forth in their qualities the common measure of their race. Mr. Baerlein has his idyllic chapters, his moments of tenderness for the beauty of the country and its intimate life which furnish a tranquil background to its drama of ferocity and avarice; "Oaxaca's Road of Life and Death," is a sketch of much delicacy and charm. But he conveys the sense, none the less, that almost any of his vividly appreciated peasants needed only promotion to an office of authority to be a bloodthirsty and libidinous tyrant. He furnishes us in one place with a photograph of Villavicencio, a Commissary of Police—an effect of fat, avid face, heavy jowl, protuberant eyes. This ruffian had his court equipped with instruments of torture; it was ruin for a woman to be brought before him. He had once been condemned to death for a murder; though he was not executed, the sentence appears to imply that, apart from his office, he was not a man of any consideration. "The Mexican," says Mr. Baerlein, "is naturally cruel."

Naturally cruel, naturally unruly, naturally vile—that is the impression one derives of the Mexican from this, the most important book upon Mexico which has appeared for some years. It is always dangerous to generalise concerning a race of people; Villavicencio and his colleagues may be merely the fine flower, the extreme expression, of the nation's tendencies and faults. The slavery in Yucatan, which Mr. Baerlein demonstrates to exist with embellishments of flogging and forced marriage, may be peculiar to Yucatan; but that is not the effect of the book. Mexico, the land of unrest, is likewise the stronghold of inhumanity, of that hungry barbarism which is the uglier for its existence in the midst of the apparatus of civilisation. Some day, in the nature of things, this incapable and disorderly people will become subjects of the United States; it is in the interest of the world's decency and moral progress that its unrest should be quelled as soon as possible.

PERCEVAL GIBBON.

A NOVEL OF QUALITY.*

There is occasionally a fitness in the association of a particular publisher with a particular book and that of Messrs. Duckworth & Co. with "Sons and Lovers," Mr. D. H. Lawrence's latest novel, is an example of it. The book has naturally a place in a list which includes such authors as John Galsworthy, Cunninghame Graham and Charles Doughty, to name only three of the many who have enriched the literature of to-day with work which is, in some sense, esoteric, claiming acknowledgment and understanding from a limited circle of readers rather than from that general public for whose accommodation the circulating libraries have their being. It has nothing of urbanity and no trace of the humorous and faintly contemptuous patronage which is common—and probably rather difficult to avoid—in novels dealing with a particular piece of country and class of people. Its descriptions and interpretations are convincing as experience is convincing: Mr. Lawrence is on his own ground and presents it with an assured intimacy of knowledge that never fails or blurs. It is Derbyshire and Nottingham of which he writes, the Derbyshire in which the grime of coal-mines is close neighbour to open country of singular charm, and the quality of it is in the very texture of his story.

The sons and lovers of the title-page are the sons of Gertrude Morel, who married a miner and lived in the Bottoms at Bestwood, Mr. Lawrence wastes sympathy on none of his characters; it is much if he gives them an approving word; but Mrs. Morel is drawn at fullest length, as faithfully as if he loved her. Her husband, a fine and florid animal at the time of her marriage, is shallow and futile, a creature of easy appetites easily slaked; the book comes upon her at a time when she has to suffice for herself in all that side of her life which is responsible and not merely material. She was clear headed, faithful to her ideas of right, full of strength and purpose, and with it she did not lack her spice of shrewishness.

* "Sons and Lovers." By D. H. Lawrence. 6s. (Duckworth.)

It was with her children that she was successful, and chiefly so with her second son, Paul, the most notable and by far the most complex and ineffectual lover of them all. He shares with his mother the centre of Mr. Lawrence's stage; for him her harsh righteousness tones itself to a softer key. With his diffidence and fastidiousness there goes a strain of the artist; he has the makings of a painter in him; he concludes by being extraordinarily ineffectual both as a lover and a man; but it is the author's gift to show him as not the less real for that. It is impossible to summarise the tale of his emotional adventures; there is hardly anything in the book that can be conveyed at all in synopsis, the whole of it develops itself so truly that there is scarcely an episode which would not lose significance if it were detached from its context.

It is a novel of outstanding quality, singular in many respects and in none more so than in the author's constancy to his artistic purpose, which never suffers him to see his people in a dramatic or spectacular light or on a level higher or lower than his own. The fact that they exist suffices him without calling them names, whether good or bad, his business is to show them, dispassionately and accurately. He writes with a nervous pliancy which is a joy to read.

Mr. D. H. Lawrence.

P. G.

RECENT POETRY.*

Mr. Legge belongs to the class of Messrs. John Davidson, William Watson, Money-Coutts, Rowland Thirlmere and others—dignified, agnostic, rhetorical, and at once massive and shadowy. Mr. Legge is perhaps the most typical of this class, with his aristocratic, anti-popular rebelliousness, his indignation, his pride, his solid, unmistakable rhythms, and the occasional charm when he turns from this England to the one when he was a boy,

"Coming home from fishing, with a basket full of trout"

Mr. John Alford is as distinctly of a later generation, carefully nursing his individuality and telling a critic:

"O save your spite. I like myself too well
Without the insidious flattery you mete
In hating me."

* "A Symphony" By Arthur E. J. Legge. 3s. 6d. net. (John Lane.)—"Poems." By John Alford. (Poetry Bookshop.)—"Moth Wings" By Francis William Bourdillon. 3s. 6d. net. (Elkan Mathews.)—"The Hand in the Dark and Other Poems." By Ada Cambridge. 5s. net. (Heinemann.)—"The Ring of the Nibelung." An English version. By Randle Fynes. 2s. 6d. net. (Smith Elder.)—"Plays of Old Japan." The "No." By Marie C. Stopes. With translation by the same and Joji Sakurai. Preface by Japanese ambassador. Illustrated. 5s. net. (Heinemann.)—"Songs from Leinster." By W. M. Letts. 2s. 6d. net. (Smith Elder.)—"Mystic Trees." By Michael Field. 3s. 6d. net. (Evelleigh Nash.)—"John in Prison and other Poems." By E. J. Thompson. 3s. 6d. net. (Fisher Unwin.)—"Fatuous Fables and other verses." By Denis Turner. 2s. 6d. net. (Fifield.)—"Selections from Ancient Irish Poetry." By Kuno Meyer. 3s. 6d. net. (Constable.)

He prefers singing to rhetoric, and turns naturally and charmingly to the Elizabethan strain of

"I love you, sweet, and there's no reason in it."

His thought is always subsidiary to his feeling, and he nearly always disdains the massive and dignified. In fact, he has the freshness, eagerness and directness which we expect from a poet. His best piece—"A Love-song to Earth"—is a very interesting, irregularly metrical, psalm-like, unrhymed poem, suitable for chanting.

Mr. Bourdillon belongs to the older generation, before the discovery that egoism is a virtue and its own reward. His new book consists of selections from his "Ailes d'Alouette" of 1890 and 1902, and some later uncollected verses. The celebrated "Night has a Thousand Eyes" comes first and is typical. Mr. Bourdillon has done well in other ways—as in "Preludes and Romances"—but this book consists chiefly of thoughts or fancies, seldom very unexpected, put into half a dozen neat lines, as in

"Sweeter than voices in the scented hay,
Or laughing children gleaming cars astray,
Or Christmas songs that shake the snows above,
Is the first day of Spring that comes with love.
Sadder than birds on sunless summer eves,
Or drip of raindrops on the fallen leaves,
Or wail of wintry winds on frozen shore,
Is Spring that comes but brings us love no more."

The sentiment and finish of Mr. Bourdillon's epigrams—heartfelt or not—leaves little to be desired.

Miss Cambridge's poetry is expansive, and she would not be content, if she had the power, to give a graceful turn to something familiar. She prefers to advocate or attack something that is being debated. She writes a sonnet on "Fashion"; she puts a passionate lament into the mouth of a "Virgin Martyr," an old maid who has longed for children; she looks forward to

"Great Art no more the plaything of the idle,
But nurse and minister to every need;
Nature no longer cowed with bit and bridle;
Conscience enfranchised and Religion freed . . ."

She asks the dog to intercede in man's favour with the animals, and tell them

"That man is something more Than instrument of woe and death to half the creatures that have breath."

And she resembles Mr. Bourdillon in this, that verse for her is chiefly a matter of form. Neither says what could not be said in prose, but both in their degree use verse to give grace or rhetorical force to ideas. In the same way Mr. Randle Fynes writes his translation of Wagner's "Ring of the Nibelung" in verse because it is customary to render verse into verse, and the result of this is readable. So Miss Stopes uses verse in translating these beautiful antique Japanese playlets because their traditional and conventional character would be damaged and made unreal by prose.

Mr. Letts is apparently far removed by the fact that he is a singer, and the rhythm of a song adds neatness to his native exuberance, whether it is a piece like this one on a servant girl:

"Little Nellie Cassidy has got a place in town,
She wears a fine white apron,
She wears a new black gown,
An', the quarest little cap at all with strayers hanging down . . ."

or like that on J. M. Synge's grave:

"My grief! That they have laid you in the town
Within the moulder of its thousand wheels
And busy feet that travel up and down."

All his pieces have an Irish subject, with an instantaneous sentimental or humorous appeal. The best of them do all that songs need do. Their rhythmical and unmistakable emotional words are ready to combine with a melody and produce an effect like that of great poetry.

These writers can be paraphrased, but probably no living civilised person would write Michael Field's "The Captain Jewel" in prose:

"We love Thy ruddy Wounds,
We love them pout by pout."

Nor would anyone, in prose thank bees for their candle-wax, and say to them:

"Work us wax so fine, its flame
Be of God the very name."

"Gethsemane" cannot be paraphrased, as these others must not be. It begins with a garden of red roses, which "are as portions of one flower"; then the author asks:

"Why are they here? So large of volume, great—
As swans from other birds take new estate—
Magnificent! Their glow confutes,
As they had plucked up rubies by the roots."

It is written in a religious state, or in imitation of one, for which prose is not adapted. The mixture of the naïve and the recondite and of what results from the difficulties of rhyme seems to need a key, and it is a pleasant change to arrive at the lucid colloquialism of "Lively art thou on thy craft!

Mary Magdalen, no fear;
He who rules the winds is near,
Jesus Christ is sleeping aft."

which suggests religious art, not religion, as an inspiration. Religion alone could excuse her Byronic use of "lays" for "lies."

Mr. Thompson is equally far from prose, yet his religious verses are as near to prose as they are to Michael Field's. Sometimes he uses very poetical subjects and very poetical language, and both together in a poem on the marriage of the rivers Eden and Eamont:

"Let other bards the married name
Of Medway and of Thames proclaim . . ."

He is just as poetical in referring to John Davidson:

"The hapless, whom the stars,
Loving too little one so proud to take
Arms in his part against them and to lift
A heav'n-affronting forehead, drove to death Untimely."

Yet Mr. Thompson believes that his muse is "earth-bound" and has a "miry wing." His chief success is in a mad maid's song, an echo of an earlier age, but a more intelligible echo than Michael Field's. A solemn, religious, cheerful and aspiring spirit pervades the more original pages.

Mr. Turner's gift is the now widely-distributed one of being solemn on ridiculous things and ridiculous on solemn things. His vocabulary is the usual mixture of the poetical and the slangy. Some of the results are happy, as in the farewell ending thus:

"O Liddell and Scott, and Lewis and Short,
This much I declare is true;
The happiest hours I've spent were those
I ought to have spent with you."

The book is one of the prettiest compliments paid by our ancient universities to Byron, Calverley and Mr. Belloc.

"Selections from Ancient Irish Poetry" was the best volume of poetry published in 1911 for the first time. The appearance of a second edition only two years later is the next best thing to the publication of "Georgian Poetry."

EDWARD THOMAS.

HORACE WALPOLE'S WORLD.*

Everybody interested in history or literature knows that the letters of Horace Walpole contain a veritable mine of information as to the social side of the eighteenth century, but there are few readers who have either the time or the patience to work their way thoroughly through so vast a seam. In Mrs. Paget Toynbee's definitive edition this mass of correspondence bulks to the extent of sixteen stout volumes, and who in our busy times, unless he be an enthusiast of the rarest type and the utmost leisure, would care to undertake the task of mastering their contents? There are limits to curiosity, especially curiosity about the past. So that these letters, with all their vivacity and satire, their chronicles of stirring events and current scandals, their pictures of politicians and frail ladies and social celebrities, as they appeared to the eye of a typical observer of his day, must remain, in bulk at least, a sealed book to the general public. Other reasons may be mentioned to explain why they are never likely to appeal to more than a very limited class of students. The author presupposes alike in the correspondent to whom he addresses himself more immediately, and in that posterity which, it is obvious he never left very long out of his thoughts, an intimate knowledge of the personalities and the social habits of his age. Townshend and the Grenvilles, Shelburne and Bedford, must be as well-known names to you as Chatham and Fox and "Billy" Pitt if you are to follow intelligently the diary, as it were, which Horace Walpole supplies of English politics. And your familiarity with the leaders of eighteenth century society must go beyond a nodding acquaintance with a Lady Suffolk or a Duchess of Devonshire if you are to move freely in drawing-rooms and salons at this smart gossip's heels. But, besides being at home in the circles which "Horry" haunts and the century to which he belongs, you must also be content to put up for hours and hours with his company, and that means that you must tolerate the conversation of an associate who is certainly a scholar, a wit and an accomplished man of the world, but also a worshipper of rank, a believer in the divine right of autocracy, a born frivol and an amateur. Here is an author who pretends to be ashamed of authorship, a devotee of art who despises the honest work that must go to its making, and a letter-writer who by some divine miracle triumphs over his affectations and writes literature in his own despite. It is odd to think that, whereas as expert in art and as patentee of pseudo-Gothic he has passed into oblivion, whereas as dabbler in lurid romance and drama he is recognised for the amateur he was, it is just those products to which he devoted enormous pains and conscientiousness—his Memoirs and his Letters—that keep his fame alive. Such is the Nemesis which time has wreaked on the person who seemed to think that any fine gentleman who tried could beat the artist on his own ground.

* "Horace Walpole's World." By Alice D. Greenwood. 12s. 6d. net. (Geo. Bell & Sons.)

Horace Walpole, however, is excellent enough company for short spells of time and with the aid of an interpreter who uses the best of the material his letters provide for re-creating his times and making a study of their broader features. This is what Miss Alice D. Greenwood has done in her just-issued and brightly-written account of "Horace Walpole's World," and readers who tremble at the notion of absorbing him wholesale in the definitive edition will be able to get on terms with him, just to the modest extent they may desire, in her kindly appreciation of the man and his environment. They may be cautioned perhaps not to accept without reservations some of her more charitable judgments. To say, for instance, as she does, that the letter-writer "never repeats gross scandal for scandal's sake" is to make an assertion which could be easily disproved unless all the emphasis is to be laid on the adjective. Similarly, Miss Greenwood should be checked carefully when she talks of Horace as if he had a genius for friendship. That quarrel of his with Gray was never more than superficially patched up. He had disputes and parted with nearly all his earliest friends. And it may be surmised that only a lucky absence, continued for nearly fifty years, prevented a breach with Sir Horace Mann. Certainly there is something strange in the circumstance of Walpole's never having sought out the companion of his youth and the chief correspondent of his life, though he himself was addicted to travel. Did he suspect his own touchiness and intolerance of contradiction and determine to keep one chain with the past unbroken? However that may be, Miss Greenwood makes out the best case that can be made for her hero, and she has some very happy chapters on eighteenth-century taste in art, on the leading men and on the corruption of the politics of the day, on society in France, on Bath and the inns and roads of Walpole's age, and on the grandes dames whom it was his proud boast to count among his circle of intimates. Wit as well as knowledge informs her writing, and she has one chapter disposing of the legend of Charles James Fox which will amuse all who turn to it who are not Whig partisans. It is a little too cruel, possibly in tone, and now and again runs to the extreme of Tory reaction, but in its main contentions it is quite just.

Thomas Gray.

From a painting by J. A. Ferard.
From "Horace Walpole's World," by Alice D. Greenwood (G. Bell & Sons).

F. G. BLIFANY.

BORROW'S ROMANTIC BALLADS.*

When George Borrow was a raw youth in a Paternoster Row publisher's office he was considerably tormented by an experienced senior clerk of the firm, the somewhat sceptical, occasionally cynical Mr. Taggart. "'Well,' said Mr. Taggart, 'why don't you write something grand?' 'I have,' said I. 'What?' said Taggart. 'Why,' said I, 'there are those ballads.' Taggart took snuff. 'And those wonderful versions of Ab Gwilym,' Taggart took snuff again. 'You seem to be very fond of snuff,' said I, looking at him angrily. Taggart tapped his box. . . . 'We know now precisely what Taggart meant. We have the ballads, we have these wonderful versions. We realise for the first time the peculiar delicacy, acumen, and reticent charm of Mr. Taggart's methods of criticism. When Borrow was a young man metrical versions were popular. He had a singular knack of acquiring new languages after a more or less primitive fashion. When he ought to have been endorsing or engrossing in the office of the Norwich attorney his head was in his desk, poring over Danish or Welsh bards; and he stuck over them so long that he temporarily injured his eyesight. 'My eyes were rather dull,' he wrote, 'from early study'—this when he was in "The Dingle" in 1825. The fashion for translated ballads is not, perhaps, a very commendable one. The ballad depends on words strong and poetic, because they are old and were once spontaneous and sparkling as the eyes of youth. Borrow, Browning and Longfellow, among many others, enjoyed converting ballads from one speech into another. The distinctive ballad features were generally lost in the process, but the public declared itself fashionably diverted, and the ballading went gaily on. In 1823 George Borrow began to market his versions. He got introductions to editors, and his polyglot verse began to appear in Monthly and New Monthly. Whether he got anything for them or no is another question. For some reason or other he appears to have attached special value to his Gaelic, Romany and Welsh renderings; but, as Mr. Edward Thomas, who is perhaps the most capable of all writers on Borrow, observes, his translations from Ab Gwilym are not interesting, either to lovers of the poet or to lovers of the prose writer; "some are preserved in a sort of life-in-death in the pages of 'Wild Wales,'" and it does not give one pleasure to remember them. If I remember rightly, some are in quite execrable blank verse. Borrow's prose has not much distinctive prose quality to it as a rule; but his verse has no poetic quality whatever, it is declamatory, strident, rhetorical, or merely vapid. Here we have, in the 1826 volume, the "Ballad of Svend Vonved," so often referred to by Borrow as a chant or marching song. Here we have "St. Oluf" and "The Heroes of Dovrefeld," from the ancient Danish, rather more favourable specimens on the whole. Then there is "The Tournament," from the old Danish, the several lays from Oehlenslæger, and a few scattered fragments of original composition, such as the lines to honest "six foot three," in the person of the Norfolk lad, who twenty tongues could talk and sixty miles a day could walk. The original volume was published by subscription at Norwich in 1826, and the present facsimile reprint is appropriately dated "Norwich, 1913," the year of the Borrow celebration at Norwich, under the shade of the ancient cathedral in which Borrow should by rights have been buried. These poems have been much in request among collectors, and the fever of Borrowian curiosity has at length warranted their re-issue. Given the demand, the re-issue could not have been better done than it is in this facsimile reprint of Jarrold's, with a facsimile of the handwriting of George Borrow, and the variant title-pages. The old list of subscribers is in itself a curiosity. A murderer seldom figures in such a document. But we have here the name of "J. Thurtell," who must obviously have been the Thurtell referred to in "Favengro" (something of an ally of the great Don Jorge), who was hanged at Hertford early in 1824. It is to be hoped that he had paid his subscription, and that the copy was duly handed over to his heirs and assigns. Whether the legends of our writers gain by all this exploitation is another question. To be romantic an author needs a wavy horizon, a shadowy retreat, a mysterious background. To praise and reprint the inferior work of an author because he has done superior is a doubtful benefit to his fame. Borrow as a man and as a writer depended not a little upon mysteries and veils; when these are all torn asunder and the great Romancer steps forth into the fierce light of critical everyday, an appreciable portion of the glamour by which he used to be encompassed will be found to have evaporated.

* "Romantic Ballads, Translated from the Danish, and Miscellaneous Pieces." By George Borrow [Making up an issue of 800 copies in all.] A facsimile edition. 10s. 6d. net. (Norwich: Printed and Published by Jarrold & Sons.)

THOMAS SECCOMBE.

MORE PEOPLE'S BOOKS.*

Another dozen of Messrs. Jack's books is here; the subjects are manifold. Grouped, they fall into four sets; (1) Shelley and Lamb (2) Medieval Socialism, Trade Unions, Judaism, the Oxford movement (3) the problem of Truth, Ethics, Youth and Sex (4) a miscellaneous trio—the Science of Light, Gardening and British Birds (profusely illustrated). A word or two about the others is allowable before Shelley and Lamb are spoken of.

Dr. Carr's essay on Truth is noticeable for a full chapter on pragmatism; the book is close-reasoned and is less likely to attract than Dr. Rashdall's Ethics. Here the writer condenses a larger volume and is fair to intuitionism and utilitarianism; but the naturalistic school is treated of briefly. A book on dangers and safeguards for boys and girls, when written by Dr. May Scharlieb and Mr. Silby, demands careful consideration. The earnestness of the writers is evident and their knowledge admitted; but, with all our congresses, it is doubtful if we have approached the subject in the right way. This book, too, is rather lopsided; each section might borrow from the other. Perhaps we have to await the new doctor whose new training will allow him to speak where now he is silent. Of the other volumes the Oxford movement is a vivid recollection of quarrels now crystallised; Trade Unionism is historical and enumerative; and Judaism is an admittedly slight essay on an ever-present subject. But the freshest of all is the Medieval Socialism by the Rev. Bede Jarrett. This book, as one would expect from a Dominican, harks back to the great medieval divines and among the moderns Maitland and not Stubbs is referred to. The temper of it is admirable and we are away for the time from the crambs repetitula of the newspaper.

* T. C. & E. C. Jack. 6d. each volume.

Mr. Sydney Waterlow's volume on Shelley is full of facts and of an acute, if rather acid, criticism. It is but fair to remember that Shelley never published Queen Mab; that Harriet's story has not been fully told; that Shelley was in many respects his grandfather Bysshe, re-incarnated; and that the poet was clean in a dirty age, an idolised friend of the poor, religious and an incurable optimist. There is no need for anyone either in his own generation or ours to apologise for loving Shelley. The writer follows the sad and muddy facts, with an evident sympathy in the matter of political revolt. He is inclined to think Shelley was mad; and one may add that fear of incarceration by his father in said to have haunted the boy and never to have left the man; nothing can be imagined more likely to lead to deep-seated distrust and hate. The principal writings are described sometimes with admiration; but the strange autobiographical section in Julian and Maddalo is not noticed, and Hellas is praised highly to the detriment of Prometheus. Shelley considered the latter his best work, though he expected no readers; Mr. Waterlow says it has been over-praised. Todhunter, Rossetti and Miss Scudder have written on it; but even their writing is not widely known. The lyrics are always praised; but this is as it should be. Who, then, has over-praised the whole poem? In Shelley's view, curiously enough, the poetry was subservient to the teaching; and the teaching is usually disregarded. Until men give up the belief that God is the author of, and placid consent to, war, disease, slums, and all the nameless horrors of civilised cities, no progress is possible. Shelley's generation taught (so he said) that God was Hate; to-day we teach that God is Indifference, but Shelley taught and believed (and lived it) that God is Love, or, as he would say, that Love is God. This poem is his restatement of the religious position, and, as the French critic reminds us, he is the child of that fluid mysticism which everlastingly protests against the petrified mysticism of the churches. A bibliographical note is appended, but no notice is taken of Koszul's "La Jeunesse de Shelley." As a clear account of the poet, and as a correction of idolatry, the ninety pages of this book are full of common sense; but the Cor Cordium was far removed from common sense.

Of a quite different character is Miss Flora Masson's study of Charles Lamb. Quick sympathy runs through it, and the man rather than his writings attracts the author; and neither Canon Ainger nor Mr. Lucas shows a more intense realisation of the "saint's" tragedy. Nothing, except the curious Kelly letters, seems to have been omitted; but Miss Masson is in doubt about our reasons for liking Elia. She thinks it due to his human nature and his story; but surely Elia without Mary Lamb, would have won fame. He was unique, for we do not read the Anatomy and the Religio closely; literature oozes from him; his touch is firm, his criticism almost inspired; but beyond this, he was a poet who did not write many verses. There is more truly poetical stuff in Christ's Hospital and Oxford in the vacation, than in many a page of wide-margined classic verse. Above all, he did not preach. While everyone round him had a brand-new gospel, Charles Lamb had none; the old wine was good enough, and like his own sweeps he taught by his life.

This little book along with Miss R. Masson's "Wordsworth" is an example of the reconstruction of a period; and if certain additions were made, or if Professor Hudson's "Poetry and Life" could be amalgamated with such studies as these, we might see the nucleus of a history of the Literature of the English People—a book valde desiderandus.

Portraits are added. That of Lamb is apparently the Meyer portrait with the background omitted; it is a bad copy. Considering the importance of Mary Lamb, the frontispiece should have been the Cary group now in the Reference Section of the National Portrait Gallery, and very well copied in Mr. Lucas' "Life." The picture of Shelley is probably intended for Miss Curran's, but the Shelley look is left out of it.

ARTHUR BURRELL.

POLLY PEACHUM AND THE BEGGAR'S OPERA.*

Of the many romances of the stage few are more romantic than the story of Lavinia Fenton, who ended her career as the Duchess of Bolton. She was the daughter of a Charing Cross coffee-house keeper, and her brief theatrical career was limited to the playing of the part of Polly Peachum in Gay's phenomenally successful "Beggar's Opera." She created the character, and was the most popular of the many actresses who have played it, but in the first flush of her enormous vogue the Duke of Bolton fell in love with her, and took her from the stage, and she trod the boards no more. Mr. Pearce narrates her story very skilfully, sketching in some vivid pictures of life as it was lived in the London of her day, and setting the whole in a history of Gay's "Newgate Pastoral" that is the fullest and most careful account we have come across of that long-popular play. Some fifty portraits of Polly and her associates and pictures of scenes from the play and places connected with it add to the attractiveness of a very interesting volume.

AN EIGHTEENTH CENTURY EGOIST.†

He certainly was a bit of a scallavag during the first quarter of a century of his life, though there are indications that in a further instalment of his "Memoirs" we shall find him more orderly—may he in that rôle be no less interesting than he is here. William Hickey has not hitherto been known to fame, but henceforward he should be remembered among those who have revealed themselves—"warts and all"—with a delicious frankness which makes them personally interesting. If, however, he is first revealed to us by the discovery of the memoirs which he wrote in old age over a century ago, his father has long been in a sense familiar, as a fly preserved in the clear amber of Goldsmith's "Retaliation."

"Here Hickey reclines, a most blunt, pleasant creature, And slander itself must allow him good nature: He cherished his friend, and he relished a bumper Yet one fault he had, and that one was a thumper. . . . Then what was his failing? Come, tell it, and burn ye! He was, could he help it?—a special attorney?"

The youngest son of that Joseph Hickey was the William Hickey, who after a varied life in different parts of the world seems to have had a successful career in the East, to have retired when something over sixty years of age to a quiet

* "Polly Peachum and the Beggar's Opera." By Charles E. Pearce. 16s. net. (Stanley Paul.)

† "Memoirs of William Hickey (1749-1775)." Edited by Alfred Spencer. (Hurst & Blackett.)

Lavinia Fenton.
"Polly Peachum."

From an engraving by F. A. G. after J. Ellyn, in Mr. A. M. Broadley's collection.

village in England—and to have occupied a leisure which he found tedious by writing his reminiscences. How it is that the manuscript has remained so long unknown, or what chance has now brought it to light Mr. Alfred Spencer does not explain—perhaps reserving that information for the final instalment, for he does give us the gratifying news that there will be another volume or two of the Memoirs.

Young William Hickey, as revealed by himself when he had become old William Hickey, was a gay dog very early in his career, and a self-willed one as well,—as was shown when after persuading his parents to allow him to join the Navy, he refused, having reached the mature age of seven, to go and join his ship because the captain had said that once aboard the seventy-four Burford he would forget his absurd prejudices and be glad to eat fat! The year before he had revealed another side of his character—shown himself a true son of his "bumper"-loving father. Sitting on his godfather's knee he had said with a sigh: "'I wish I was a man!' 'Aye,' observed the Colonel, 'and pray why so, William?' 'To which I quickly replied: 'That I might drink two bottles of wine every day.'"

"Mr. Luttrell (afterwards Earl of Carhampton) who was a famous hard liver, pronounced that I should live to be a damned drunken dog, the rest agreeing that I should undoubtedly be a very jolly fellow! I believe, with no more than justice to myself, I may say, the latter prediction, as the milder of the two, proved nearest the truth. I certainly have at different periods drank very freely, sometimes to excess, but it never arose from the sheer love of wine. Society—cheerful companions, and lovely seducing women always delighted me, and frequently proved my bane, but intoxication for itself I detested, and invariably suffered grievously from."

The detestation apparently being a result of the suffering. In that passage we have something of a key to the story which William Hickey reveals of much of his first six-and-twenty years. From Westminster School he is withdrawn by request owing to his unsatisfactory behaviour; from a private school at Streatham he is removed owing to a series of escapades. Nor when he is apprenticed to an attorney are things any better, so that his family may well have sighed with relief when he went out to the East in the service of the East India Company—but he returned almost forthwith and by 1775, a duly authorised attorney, he set out for the West Indies with introductions from Edmund Burke and other of his father's friends. And there this instalment of the memoirs closes. Such a summary, however, can only indicate the course of the narrative; it is in its frank self-revelation, in its descriptions of life in London—frequently the most disreputable aspects of life,—in its intimate record of a voyage to the East, its accounts of an irresponsible young man's adventures in India and China, that the book engages and holds the attention. Though William Hickey appears (we shall learn whether it was so in due course) to have settled down, he did not suffer many qualms in recording the full story of his wild-oat sowing, but then as he declared he did it simply for his own entertainment. The result is a book that is a really valuable addition to our intimate knowledge of the social life of the eighteenth century as experienced by one who was a veritable Don Juan, and a piece of self-revelation which deserves to be placed with the classics of egotism.

WALTER FERROLD.

QUACK PAINTING.*

As I read this book I am inevitably reminded of a Punch "social" of five-and-thirty years ago, in which Du Maurier happily hit off the pseudo-aesthetic jargon of the period. The speakers, an Ineffable Youth and a Matter-of-Fact Party, are regarding a masterpiece by Fra Porcinello Barbaragianino. Their conversation runs thus:

"But it's such a repulsive subject."
 "Subject in Art is of no moment. The picktchah is beautiful."
 "But you will own the drawing's vile and the colours beastly."
 "I'm cullah-blind, and don't p'ofess to understand d'awing. The picktchah is beautiful!"
 "But it's all out of perspective, hang it! and so abominably untrue to Nature."
 "I don't care about Naytchah and hate perspective! The picktchah is beautiful."
 "But dash it all, man! Where the dickens is the beauty then?"
 "In the picktchah——"

Now let me justify myself by paralleling line by line these words of the Ineffable Youth with the ipsissima verba of Messrs. Albert Gleizes and Jean Metzinger, not Metzanger, I imagine, as printed on the cover.

Ineffable Youth.—"The beauty is in the picktchah."

Messrs. Gleizes and Metzinger.—"The picture bears its pretext, the reason for its existence within it. . . . It does not harmonize with this or that environment; it harmonizes with things in general, with the universe; it is an organism."

Ineffable Youth.—"Subject in Art is of no moment."

Messrs. G. and M.—"All pre-occupation in Art arises from the material employed."

Ineffable Youth.—"I don't p'ofess to understand d'awing. I don't care about Naytchah!"

Messrs. G. and M.—"The painter, eager to create, rejects the natural image directly he has made use of it."

Ineffable Youth.—"Subject in Art is of no moment."

Messrs. G. and M.—"Lucidity is unfitting. A picture is a noble enigma. Let the picture imitate nothing."

Ineffable Youth.—"I hate perspective."

Messrs. G. and M.—"The most serious infractions of the rules of perspective will by no means compromise a painted work."

Surely the analogy is complete.

Now I want to be quite fair to the Post-Impressionists, Futurists and Cubists. I sympathize deeply with them in their dissatisfaction with academic painting as we find it at the present day. I go so far as to say that they are right in reaching after the unattainable, because it is the hunting of the fox, not the fox's brush, that makes hunting the fine sport it is. But this, too, I am bound to say, that, after sparing no pains in studying their efforts for the last few years, both in Paris and in London, I have inevitably come to the conclusion that, when they have built upon the sure foundations of the best precedents (precedents, of course, totally ignored by them) they have now and again arrived at a masterpiece, whereas when they have relied upon their own empirical experiences they have never achieved more than an interesting tour de force. Let us be quite clear about this. I quote again from this book and condemn the authors out of their own mouths. They throw over precedent and yet quote in defence Leonardo da Vinci when he writes: "You must climb step by step to reach the top of a building, or you will never reach the top."

* "Cubism." By Albert Gleizes and Jean Metzinger (Translated) 5s. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

Surely that is a defence of precedent if ever there were one. Starting on the earth and rising step by step until we can hitch our chariots to a star.

I protest that the theories proclaimed in this book suggest to me nothing so much as the figure of an aeroplane, designed in the air, built in the air and flying in the air, ignoring the fact that its component parts were derved out of the earth, that it was laboriously built upon terra firma, and finally that it had to gain impetus for flight from the very ground that it so ungratefully spurns. That may be all right in a fairy tale, but it will not pass muster with us who know ourselves tied to this earth by the cable of gravitation.

I have ventured to label this review "Quack Painting," but we must remember that Empiricism has its place in the world as well as Science. For we must admit that Experiment has now and again accomplished at a bound what heavy-footed Science has not arrived at till much later—might, indeed, never have arrived at at all unless so spurred to activity. But we must also remember that revolutions beget charlatans, and we must be chary of accepting any man at his own valuation. And, so far as my opinion is worth anything, the Cubists, judged by the apologetics of Messrs. Gleizes and Metzinger as set forth in this volume, have signally failed in proving themselves worthy of consideration.

In saying so much, I must not be understood to condemn all that has been accomplished by the so-called Post-Impressionists and Futurists. However much I disagree with their theories, I am bound in fairness to them as artists, to put it on record that I have seen works by Van Gogh and Severini, to name only two, which seem to me a wholesome and successful protest against the shackling rules of a too orthodox academism.

G. S. LAYARD.

THE YOUNG GOETHE.*

This is an interesting volume. Of late fresh lights have been cast by several German books on large parts of Goethe's wonderful life and career, nor least upon that youth which he himself has called a "drunkenness without wine."

Much here presented is a summary of such illuminations, while a running comment analyses or explains them. The result perhaps is a process rather than a picture, but from the process a very vivid picture emerges. One consequence is manifest. What may be styled the tea-tray images of the young Goethe—smooth and varnished—disappear for ever. The paragon of Lewes, the moralist of Carlyle have vanished, and the young Goethe is a man again. But a portent he remains. He is not always a pleasant portent and the youthful Goethe would hardly have pleased the oracular Goethe of middle and old age. But so it is with paramount genius. The longing to create often springs from a craving to destroy which the creator himself, when his purpose is achieved, becomes the first to condemn. After Icarus has singed his wings, he may think differently of the sun.

* "The Youth of Goethe." By P. Hume Brown, LL.D., F.B.A. 8s. net. (John Murray.)

More even than other supreme artists Goethe was the theatre of his own mind and feelings. On these he concentrated himself. Till he found his pedestal as court minister, he had no outlets of public life or public spirit for his exuberant energy, and though he was a good rider and skater, there lacked the vent of games. True, he indulged in such practical jests as walking on stilts at midnight, robed in a white sheet, and peering in at the windows; but these freaks hardly counterbalanced his introspectiveness.

Into himself he looked and looked from the first, till he made an art of his emotions and friendships—of all his many loves at this period from the humble Kätchen Schönkopf to the haughty "Lili" Schönmann and the patrician Countess Stolberg, from the sweet, simple pastor's daughter Friederike, whom he loved and rode away from, to Charlotte Buff and "Maxe" Brentano. Solvitur ambulando. He was always loving—and always riding away. And these lady-loves, who were only to head a long procession, all contributed to his early efforts and to his first masterpieces. Much in these regards is here of absorbing interest, especially concerning "Werther," "Götz," "Clavigo," "Stella," and his first crayon of "Faust."

Goethe's youth was a blend of Bacchus and the Olympian Jove. Even then the Olympian Jove never deserted him, and his chequered friendships with Merck, Herdes, Wieland, and the rest, mix the reveller and the leveller with the philosophic poet. Most absorbing are the pages dealing with his "Prometheus" and "Der Ewige Jude." Nor are the inner meanings of the lyrics neglected.

Everything came to Goethe—adventures almost without action and a forbearance from those whom he most offended, including those whom he utilised in his works, and the stiff father who tried him, but to whom he must have been a sore trial. "The fellow delights in battle," wrote Knebel of him, "he has the spirit of an athlete." There was also another side to his compound character which sometimes reminds us of Joseph Surface—especially when he found two passions at a time an absolute requisite.

Space forbids many points of attraction, but we can scarcely close without citing part of the double portrait of himself which he paints in a letter of 1755. The translation of it is better than most of those scattered through these pages:

After holling up to her gaze the picture of himself "in a laced coat . . . in the idle glare of sconces and lustres, . . . the Carnival Goethe," he continues, "But there is another Goethe—one in grey beaver coat with brown silk necktie and boots—who already divines the approach of Spring in the caressing February breezes, to whom his dear wide world will again be shortly opened up, who ever living his own life, striving and working according to the measure of his powers, seems to express now the innocent feeling of youth in little poems, and the strong spice of life in various dramas; now the images of his friends . . . and his beloved household gods . . . never asking the question how much of what he has done will endure, because . . . he will let his feelings spontaneously develop into capacities."

That was it. He set out to realise himself.

WALTER SICHEL.

THE MODERN SHORT STORY.*

Of all ways of making money by writing at the present day, the framing of short tales and the weaving of novels of the sensational sort seem to be the best. The daily and weekly papers and the monthly magazines form the largest and most convenient market for the storyteller. A man who can barely earn £100 a year by devoting all his time to composing novels for immediate production in book form, may often make a decent livelihood by turning out short stories for the periodicals and writing serial novels for the Press. It is only a comparatively small number of novelists who can afford to appeal directly to the subscribers of circulating libraries and the little band of buyers of the six shilling novel.

In itself the connection with journalism does not make against the finer qualities of literature. Some of the best works of fiction first appeared in instalments, as serials now do; and in France, Maupassant and other masters of the conte wrote their tales for the daily press. Indeed, it was largely because French newspapers wanted a continual supply of briefly-told short tales, while our daily journals would not deign to entertain their readers in this manner, that the French school of short story-tellers developed and flourished. Most of our morning papers are still averse from publishing stories of this sort, but the Morning Post now gives an occasional column to a tale, and on Saturdays some of the London evening journals mingle news and fiction in an open and pleasant manner. But the success of the illustrated weeklies and monthlies of the new kind has made the short story popular in England and America, and some men of veritable genius have equalled the work of the best short story writers of France and Russia.

Yet it is notorious that our magazine tales are on the whole somewhat shoddy in texture. Some of the writers try to make up for lack of vision by a mechanical intensity of manner; this is the note of the American school of literary carpenters. The most popular of recent American magazine story writers, O. Henry, does not entirely escape from this common fault. His "Roads of Destiny" strikes me as a rather artificial thing, and though all the other tales in the volume are entertaining, some are thin in quality. Yet the editors of American papers and journals were glad to pay £200 each for some of these stories. O. Henry made his name by discovering New York, especially the Broadway, and getting something of an atmosphere of romance into tales of shorthand clerks and business girls and men. He showed his magazine public their own faces reflected in a magic mirror, and with such success that the works of Kipling are now given free to buyers of the collected edition of O. Henry's 274 stories in twelve volumes! I notice that his tales are being reprinted in some of our popular sixpenny monthlies. Everything goes to show that in the estimation of the modern magazine editors, he is the perfect story-teller of our time. Someone described Catulle Mendes as le singe de tous les maîtres. It strikes me that O. Henry played the sedulous ape very skilfully and very profitably. But Ambrose Bierce is worth a hundred of him.

He certainly knows all the tricks of working up an amusing anecdote into a saleable article of literary commerce. Sir Hugh Clifford in his "Malayan Monochromes" on the other hand, is rather lacking in craftsmanship. He is not a clever writer, and he wants subtlety and variety of style. Yet his book is fine and memorable. It contains the essential things—freshness of vision, insight into character, and a deep knowledge of the ways of men. As the men happen to be for the most part savage Malays and head-hunting tribesmen of Borneo, the work has the additional curious charm of wildly exotic life. "Monochromes" is scarcely the word for these blood-red pictures of tropical life. There is a violent death in almost every story, and often many violent deaths. White men go mad, or turn berserker and slay with an insane frenzy more horrible than that of a Malay crying amok: and all about is the hot, steaming, feverish air of the equatorial forest. Sir Hugh Clifford cannot suggest the physical and moral atmosphere of the tropics in the way that Mr. Conrad does. He is content to tell his strange tales in a plain, downright fashion; but as a delineator of Malay life and character he is incomparable.

He has the seeing eye: and so has a brilliant new writer, Mr. C. S. Evans, who also writes about barbarians in "Nash and Others." But instead of roaming the outlands of the earth, Mr. Evans has lived among Board School boys in poor parts of London, and observed these gallant and picturesque little savages with keen and yet kindly vision. Their curious codes of honour, their loyalty to their leader, and the ingenuity with which they extract romance and adventure out of the dull, grey, routine life around them, are very happily revealed. Mr. Nash ranges from farce to tragedy: but the comedy of the eternal barbarian among us chiefly attracts him. He has a delightful gift of humour, and a quietly telling way of putting things.

* "Roads of Destiny." By O. Henry. 3s. 6d. (Eveleigh Nash.)—"Malayan Monochromes." By Sir Hugh Clifford. (Murray.) 6s.—"Nash and Others." By C. S. Evans. 6s. (Arnold.)—"Through the Window." By Mary E. Mann. 6s. (Mills & Boon.)—"Sunia and Other Stories." By Maud Diver. 6s. (Blackwood.)—"The Open Window." By E. Temple Thurston. 6s. (Chapman & Hall.)—"Smoke Bellow." By Jack London. 6s. (Mills & Boon.)

There is a sombre side to the life he depicts, and he touches on it: but his heroes are naturally more eager to indulge their fresh, young joy in life than to mourn their lot; so he keeps mainly to their point of view. Miss Mary E. Mann in her latest collection of tales "Through the Window" returns to Dulditch in a lighter mood than she left it. But her new book lacks the incisive power of her earlier short stories. I am afraid that the tastes of the editors of our popular periodicals are partly responsible for the apparent decline of the remarkable talents of the chronicler of the annals of Dulditch. A tale can be light and even quiet, as Miss Wilkins has shown in her New England sketches, and still be a thing of exquisite art. But Miss Mann only once shows what sportsmen would call her old form, and that is in a ghastly little murder tale, "The Blue Beads." Miss Maud Diver's "Sunia and Other Stories" is pure magazine work. The tales give scarcely a glimpse of the power displayed in those long novels of hers that I have read. I suppose they are the 'prentice efforts of her pen: there is good, sound workmanship in many of them, but no distinction in outlook or style. They deal with native and English life in India, but have no qualities equal to those abundantly displayed by Mrs. Steel.

Mr. E. Temple Thurston's "Open Window" is fresh and charming. It is composed of a series of connected sketches of country life. A village clergyman, with whom Gilbert White would have been pleased to correspond, is the hero and nominal writer of his own story. But Mr. Temple Thurston does not deserve all the praise for this fragrant pastoral: for Mr. Charles Robinson in six score of lovely designs fully collaborates with him.

In "Smoke Bellew" Mr. Jack London continues to exploit with remarkable success the literary gold mine he discovered in the Klondyke. His new book is less a novel than a collection of short tales, but the episodes are connected by the fact that they tell of the toils, adventures and triumph of Smoke Bellew and his Bret Hartean partner, Shorty. Mr. London has often been compared to Kipling, but it is the traditions of the famous Californian writer that he carries on, and one of the gambling incidents in his latest volume is as good as anything that Bret Harte ever did.

E. W.

ADVENTURES AMONG BIRDS.*

The author of "Green Mansions" and of "A Shepherd's Life" has given us a new book. As its title says, it is a book about birds, and if you know the other books of Mr. Hudson you will know what to expect by that. For no one has ever written about birds and about the secluded country life of England as has Mr. Hudson. His minute knowledge and observation have none of the pedantry of the usual naturalist. He cares not for the dead, but for the living, and he clothes all his writing with the joy of wild and free life. His style, so limpid and so easy, is precisely fitted to his subjects. For he is famous not only as a naturalist and lover of birds but as a writer of English. His books—almost twenty in number by now—are of the highest distinction and count as amongst the classics of modern literature. For Mr. Hudson's manner of describing the rare birds and the forgotten villages of England is extraordinarily original and fascinating. He has opened a new world to us at our very doors, so to speak. And here, in the twenty-seven short chapters of "Adventures Among Birds," he has given us some of his most delightful pictures.

The book carries us from the West Country to the East, and up North as far as Derbyshire. Mr. Hudson is always upon the track of the shy dwellers in marsh, in wood, in barren hill, and in shady hollow, listening to the low note of the Dartford warbler, to the "immortal nightingale," to the ring-ouzel, or to the "honk" of the pink-footed grey goose.

* "Adventures Among Birds." By W. H. Hudson. 10s. 6d. net. (Hutchinson.)

Perhaps, indeed, it is the wild geese that winter on the Norfolk coast that he loves best of all. To them and to their lonely haunt he has devoted several of these chapters. It is strangely thrilling to read of these great flocks streaming across the sky from their feeding grounds to the safe shelter of the sands. Upon a cloudless and glorious evening of late October Mr. Hudson saw several thousand of them at one time whirling down to their roosting-place. It was, he says, "the most magnificent spectacle of wild-bird life I had ever witnessed in England." In this same chapter—"Wild Wings: a Farewell" (one of the finest chapters of the book)—occurs a little story of a wounded goose, part of which I cannot help quoting. It is perfect. Says Mr. Hudson:

"I was out on the marsh . . . when, about half-an-hour before sunset, a solitary goose came flying by me towards the sea, keeping only a foot or two above the ground. It was a wounded bird, shot somewhere on its feeding ground, and, being unable to fly with the flock, was travelling slowly and painfully for the roosting-place on the sands. When it had got about a couple of hundred yards past me a few red shanks rose from the edge of the creek and, after wheeling round once or twice, dropped down again in the same place, and no sooner had they alighted than the goose turned aside from his course and, flying straight to them, pitched on the ground at their side. That is just how a bird of social disposition will always act when forsaken by its fellows and in distress: it will try to get with others, however unlike its own species they may be—even a goose with redshanks; and this, too, in a most dangerous place for a goose to delay in, where gunners are accustomed to hide in the creeks. It was evident he was ill at ease and troubled by my presence, as after alighting he continued standing erect with head towards me. There he remained with the redshanks for full fifteen minutes, but he had not been more than two minutes on the spot before a passing hooded crow dropped down close to and began walking round him. The crow will not attack a wounded goose, even when badly wounded, but he knows when a bird is in trouble and he must satisfy his inquisitive nature by looking closely at him to find out how bad he really is. The goose, too, knows exactly what the crow's life and mind is, and no doubt despises him. I watched them intently, and every time the crow came within a couple of feet of him the goose bent down and shot out his snake-like head and neck at him. . . . And each time this gesture was made the crow hopped away a little space only to begin walking again and hopping round the goose until he had satisfied his impudent curiosity, whereupon he flew off towards his roosting-place.

"Then, after a few minutes, from a great way off in the sky came the sounds of approaching geese, and the wounded bird turned his breast towards the land and stood with his head held high to listen to and see his fellows returning uninjured with crops full of corn, boisterous in their happiness, to the roosting-place. . . ."

A quotation such as this gives more of the essence of Mr. Hudson's outlook and style than any remarks of mine could, and therefore its length will be pardoned. The truth is that in reading Mr. Hudson one feels he has really entered into the hearts of birds as well as of the humble folk that live in the little scattered villages of England. He is at once interpreter and creator. And always he is a master through the magic simplicity of his language. That, largely, is why he is so much greater than Richard Jefferies, with whom he has many apparent affinities.

Apart from my remarks on the geese I have said little in particular about this book; but it is really unnecessary to say more than that it is by Mr. Hudson and that it deals with birds and villagers. To read it is like breathing the wind upon the downs or upon the waste saltings of the Norfolk shore. What praise could be completer?

R. C.

THE COMPLETE GARDENER.*

It may be well enough to theorize about some things, but the first thing needful to the writing of a good gardening

* "The Herbaceous Garden." By Mrs. Philip Martineau. 7s. 6d. net. (Williams & Norgate.)

book is that the author should not only be one who loves a garden, but one who has worked in it and has personally done or superintended all the work from the studying of its soil and planning its laying out, to digging, planting, tending, developing and making a successful garden of it. All this Mrs. Philip Martineau has done. She has done it with a very large long-neglected garden, where a difficulty of gravelly soil had to be got over; with a small garden of half an acre, and with one smaller still.

"People often say to me, 'How did you learn?' " she writes. "I grew up in a garden, and inherited doubtless the love for it; but I began gardening in a cat-walk at the back of a small London house out of Grosvenor Place, and grew, with some success, carnations, lilacs, and a few annuals, and such herbs as parsley and chervil. My next experience was a cottage garden on stiff clay, with an acre of garden."

Here she had a factotum to help her, and bought some of her experience at a price; but all experience that is worth having has to be paid for, one way or another, and they are fortunate who can avoid the unpleasant way of acquiring it and for a few shillings get it condensed in such a book as this.

Mrs. Martineau writes of her subject as one who loves it and has the widest, most thoroughly intimate businesslike knowledge of it. She handles it in its aesthetic aspect very charmingly, but the chief value of her work lies in the well-informed minutely-detailed instruction it supplies on questions of design, fertilising, expense, soils, what to plant and when to plant it, and all the hundred and one considerations of work and material, taste and system that go to the creation of the garden beautiful. Written for amateurs by an enthusiastic and highly successful amateur this is an ideal manual for the beginner, and there are hints and suggestions in it that should be of value even to the comparatively complete gardener. Mr. W. Robinson supplies a useful introduction, and the plans and numerous illustrations in black and white and in colour are admirable.

OLIVER ONIONS' NEW STORY.*

Let us admit at once that in telling "The Story of Louie" Mr. Oliver Onions has completed in triumphant fashion a remarkable trilogy which should surely give him his rightful position at last among the foremost novelists of the day; in this—his latest—work the novelist's firm grip of motive and of feeling, his dexterity in inventing and combining essential incidents, his unrivalled sense of the picturesque in person or scene—a sense that seems to make every setting, every environment, come easy to him—have never been present in fuller measure. The great scène-faire of the story (cunningly, but not obviously, delayed till the end of the book)—the interview between Evie Soames, the girl whom Jeffries married, and Louie Causton, the girl whom he ought to have married—unerringly true as it is in every herce and riposte may perhaps be considered the high-water mark of Mr. Onions' achievement in the conduct of a stark and passionate duel of character and of emotion. Masterly too is the fashion in which the novelist links up the life of Louie, on the one hand, with those of Izzard the painter she sits to, and of Roy Lovenant-Smith, the father of her child, and on the other with those of the three girl students whom she meets at the business college in Holborn: the sheer technical difficulties involved in this matter of connecting and of re-connecting are conquered in the simplest and yet the most ingenious way. Most arresting and appealing of all are the character and career of Louie herself, a wilful, non-moral creature, who because she is the offspring of a mésalliance and in this matter we beg leave to quarrel with Mr. Onions' psychology as being partial and somewhat melodramatic—

* "The Story of Louie." By Oliver Onions. 6s. (Martin Secker.)

Yew Hedge and Trellis, Hurst Court.

From "The Herbaceous Garden, by Mrs. Alice Martineau (Williams & Norgate).

always takes it for her guiding principle in life to be ruled by the lower strain in her blood.

The first twenty-four years of Louie's life Mr. Onions has the audacity to cram into twelve pages of his book; thereafter we see Louie—always completely in the picture—as the central figure in a series of the most piquant and picturesque adventures. She appears as the rebellious daughter of a peer's sister and of a prize-fighter; as a refractory pupil at an agricultural college; as an indolent but observant student—of life rather than of "business"—at a business college; as her father's—the ex-prize-fighter's—guest at a snug little public-house somewhere Putney way; as a patient in a nursing home; as an artist's model; and in many other enlivening but precarious occupations, all of which she accepts with a fatalistic humour and courage that serve of course to heighten rather than to lighten the essentially tragic character of her story. For, as readers of "The Debt Account" know, Jim Jeffries married not Louie Causton who loved him, but Evie Soames whom he loved; while "The Story of Louie" tells the tale of a girl who, having enjoyed but two or three stolen—if innocent—meetings with the man she had lost, discovered on his death that not even love for her child could enable her to go on living any longer. The latest novel of Mr. Onions' is however not only the story of Louie Causton, it is also in many important respects the story of James Jeffries and of Evie Soames; and now that the hero is no longer telling the tale he and the girl he married are more distinctly and more ruthlessly envisaged. He, no longer described by himself but by the author, becomes more of a human being and less of a mixture of ogre and great natural force; while she, seen now not with Jeffries' but with Mr. Onions' eyes, is divested of any elusive charm she once possessed and, by a rather cruel metamorphosis, is seen as a jealous, underbred, rather common little suburban person. Those who like "modern melodrama"—to use a phrase coined by the late Mr. Hubert Crackanthorpe, himself no unpractised writer of such work—will be sure to enjoy "The Story of Louie," for it is quite the finest example of the heightened and intensive conte dealing with the life of the day that the present century has given us.

W.A.L.B.

THE LAST FRONTIER.*

An impartial opinion by a competent observer upon any question in which one is directly interested is apt to be valuable. Mr. Powell is an American, and the United States is the only one of the great powers that has not taken part in the scramble for Africa which has been such a salient feature of the last quarter century.

In spite of the many books written about it during recent years, Africa remains, and will for ages remain, the land of mystery—the Dark Continent. For many centuries Aryan and Semite have been striving to penetrate it, yet Africa still remains a tangle of unsolved riddles. Forty years ago an African map was void of intelligible detail except as regards the coastal fringe. To-day we know most of the salient physical features of the African continent and have acquired a great deal of information as to its human inhabitants. Mr. Powell's book indicates what immense and practically untouched fields for investigation still exist.

The influence exercised by Africa on Europe has never had adequate recognition. Sir Harry Johnston has recently pointed out how profoundly these continents have modified each other. Historians and more especially Mommsen have revealed the debt which European agriculture owes to the Carthaginians, and the profound impress which Christianity received from the early African Fathers is well known. But Africa, although it changes whatever is brought into contact with it, apparently itself does not change; in essentials the ethics, the ideals and the habits of the bulk of the people have not—excepting the revolution brought about by Mohammedanism—altered perceptibly from the days of Hannibal—if not of Hammurabi. The African can assimilate, but he cannot be assimilated.

According to Mr. Powell, France has been more successful than any other power in the matter of African colonization:

"Though thirty centuries have elapsed since Phœnicia first began to nibble at the Continent, it was not until 1884 that the mad rush began which ended in Africa's being apportioned among themselves by half-a-dozen European nations with as little scruple as a gang of boys would divide a stolen pie. This stealing of a Continent, lock, stock and barrel, is one of the most astounding performances in history. France emerged from the scramble with a larger slice of territory than any other power, a territory which she has so steadily and systematically expanded and consolidated that to-day her sphere of influence extends over forty-five per cent. of the land area, and twenty-four per cent. of the population of Africa."

Mr. Powell contrasts the considerate treatment of the native chiefs by the French, with the brusque, unsympathetic attitude of the British:

"Several times each year it is customary for the commandants of the French posts along the edge of the Sahara to organise fantasias in honour of the Arab sheikhs of the region, who come to attend them, followed by great retinues of burnoosed, turbaned and splendidly-mounted retainers . . . before leaving the sheikhs were presented with ornate saddles, gold-mounted rifles and, in the cases of the more important chieftains, with crosses of the Legion of Honour. . . . They go back to their homes in the desert immensely impressed with the power, the wealth and the generosity of France."

* "The Last Frontier." By E. Alexander Powell. 6s. (Longmans.)

The British system is, no doubt, the purest and on the whole the best intentioned in the world. It may seem paradoxical, and even preposterous to say so, but where that system occasionally errs is in the tacit assumption that every savage tribe appreciates strict justice above everything else. As a matter of fact this is not the case; the savage often prefers being oppressed in a manner to which he is traditionally accustomed, to being righteously treated after a pattern with which he is unfamiliar, and which he often fails to recognise as righteous.

Mr. Powell severely criticises the methods employed by the Germans in their African territorial acquisitions. Such methods appear to be rigid, unsympathetic and quite unduly severe. The result is often a wholesale exodus of population to British and French territory—and in Africa the success of any colony depends upon a copious supply of native labour being available.

"The needless severity of Germany's colonial rule is graphically illustrated by the fact that during 1911 there were 14,894 criminal convictions in German East Africa alone, or one conviction to every 637 natives; while in the adjoining protectorate of Uganda, among the same type of natives but under a British administration, the ratio of convictions was only one in 2,047. There is not a town in German East Africa where you cannot see boys of from eight to fourteen years, shackled together by chains running from iron collar to iron collar and guarded by soldiers with loaded rifles, doing the work of men under a deadly sun."

According to Mr. Powell grave difficulties lie before the Italians in the matter of the subjugating the hinterland of their newly-acquired territory. Here lies the headquarters of that strange and powerful secret society, the Senusiyeh. This society has for its object the restoration of the Mohammedan religion in its original purity, austerity, and political power. Should this cult spread southward among the Bantu clans (and there are already considerable Mohammedan settlements as far down as the shores of Lake Nyassa) the white man in Africa will be in for a bad time.

This excellent book is, of course, not without mistakes. When, for instance, the author states that the late Mr. Rhodes added Nyassaland to the British Empire, he is very wide of the mark indeed. The work is too comprehensive. Why, for instance, include Crete in a book on Africa? Admitting for the moment that the influences which at one time obtained in Crete link its history, in a sense, with Africa, there is equal warrant for including Sicily.

One may, in conclusion, note with satisfaction, that Mr. Powell takes an exceedingly sane and sagacious view of the political status quo in the South African Union.

The book is exceptionally well illustrated.

WILLIAM CHARLES SCULLY.

BEFORE THE CURTAIN.*

Sir Herbert Tree's recent adventure into Molière and his present outbreak into epigrammatic authorship compel us to observe that off the stage he is précieux and on the stage he is sometimes—well, we prefer his preciousity. We can read his volume with pleasure; but we sat through his performance of "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" uncomfortable and half-ashamed, devoutly hoping that no visitors from any intellectual centre of France or Germany were present to see such an exhibition of provincialism in the metropolis of Great Britain.

Readers need not take the essays in this volume too seriously. In most cases they are, quite naturally and justifiably, pieces of special pleading. The paper on "Hamlet," for instance, is just an actor's gloss upon the text—his marginal notes of "business" worked up into a disquisition. You agree, or you disagree, or you ignore; and that is the end of the matter; but in any case the "Hamlet" that Sir Herbert Tree discusses is not Shakespeare's play, but merely the usual selections from that play as cut down to the measure of the modern—or it would be truer to say the just out-moded stage. There is usually more in Shakespeare than in an acting edition. In "The Living Shakespeare" Sir Herbert defends his methods of staging and production by the very common undergraduate fallacy of urging that the only alternative to one extreme is another extreme. Shakespeare in the hands of literary pedants is dead, he tells us. We agree; but we by no means admit that Shakespeare in the hands of Sir Herbert Tree is therefore living. His treatment of "The Tempest," (here defended in another essay) is a case in point. He could not give us a realistic stage picture of a ship in a storm and the words of Shakespeare's first scene as well, so Shakespeare had to go. That is typical. Wherever Shakespeare interferes with the ambitions of the producer, exit Shakespeare. This may or may not be advisable, and it may be as commercially successful as many other sophistications are; but you cannot adopt this course of mutilation and then claim that your collection of remains is "the living Shakespeare." The real point of what Sir Herbert Tree dismisses as "Futurism" (and I assume that he is referring to recent experiments in the staging of Shakespeare) is not at all in the decorations, which are, as decorations to Shakespeare always will be, quite irrelevant, but in the fact that this method involves the minimum of interference with the text and the maximum of transmitted Shakespearean flavour. Other profits accrue, but that is the chief of all. Sir Herbert Tree has claimed that his own treatment of Shakespeare is "imaginative." As this consists largely in translating into visible fact what Shakespeare purposely left to the fancy, I should describe it emphatically as rank materialism.

* "Thoughts and After-Thoughts." By Herbert Beerbohm Tree. 6s. net. (Cassell.)

Sir Herbert's essays, however, are much better than the methods they defend. In them, at least, there is a noticeable elegance of phrase, and a very pleasant mixture of wit and seriousness; whereas in the least judicious developments of his recent comic "business" on the stage, Sir Herbert Tree has sacrificed all the graces on the altar of burlesque.

G. S.

Novel Notes.

THE DISTANT DRUM. By Dudley Sturrock 6s. (John Lane)

The scenes of "The Distant Drum" are laid in the smart, plutocratic set of American society; the leading dramatis personæ are wealthy young English wasters and the most rapacious sort of American grafters, male and female; the general atmosphere is that of the feverish night-life of New York, the life led by the monde and the demi-monde in the restaurants and cabarets of Broadway, and the big situations are hammered home with that stark, brutal explosion of speech and emotion which half-thrilled half-shocked the English theatre-goer in such recent American plays as "Paid in Full," "The Easiest Way" and "Bought and Paid For." We have purposely refrained from saying anything about Mr. Sturrock's heroine from consideration of the fact that the gradual evolution of her character furnishes several of the remarkable surprises which the novel holds in store for the reader. We will only remark that Yvonne Sebastin makes a very lovely and alluring heroine, and that in her person the author, Mr Dudley Sturrock, furnishes yet another instance of the power which—so the popular novelists and playwrights tell us—the almighty dollar, in whatever way acquired, seems to exercise over men, and more particularly over women, in the America of to-day. "The Distant Drum," it will be gathered, is by no means a pleasant story; it is, nevertheless, a story which is quite uncommonly absorbing and poignant.

JAMES HURD. By R. O. Prowse. 6s. (Heinemann.)

The advantages and limitations of narrative in the first person are well illustrated in this able novel. An intense psychological drama is envisaged through the medium of one Broadhurst, the intimate friend of James and Evelyn Hurd, parents of a seven-year-old boy, Warrie, a strange little gnome who posits a profound issue in ethics. The backgrounds in Sussex and in Leeds are as skilfully drawn as the characters of the sorely tried parents, moderns both in the popular fashion of excessive sensibility and introspection. They talk voluminously to Broadhurst in cogent explanations, their conversations sometimes amounting to monologue, and we long to find husband and wife face to face with their mutual problem; but such a scene is precluded by the method of narration chosen by the author. A less able and subtle writer than Mr. Prowse would have left the reader listless, when ostensibly the Gordian knot he created has been cut, and the pathetic incubus vanishes from sight. But the reader is thrilled with expectancy, for a provocative vista of psychological possibilities is then opened up, and the conclusion leaves one in a state of active interrogation about James Hurd's behaviour. Broadhurst, the recipient of the confidences, strikes one as a rather helpless looker-on at the bloodless tragedy, and as he is nowhere related to a world of his own, remains somewhat of a shadow. Readers who are more interested in psychology than in action will be held by Mr. Prowse's theme; but we deplore the fact that he did not chose a more agreeable one. To most of us a child is a symbol of delight, and some violence is done to natural feelings when a child is exhibited as a symbol of terror.

APRIL PANHASARD. By Muriel Hine. 6s. (John Lane.)

The chief attraction of Mrs Coxon's stories is their simplicity, and "April Panhasard" is no exception to the rule. It tells the history of a woman forced at last to divorce her dissolute husband, but her religious scruples prevent her from taking full advantage of her legal position. She endeavours to hide herself away in the tiny village of Coddell-in-the-Dale, and here she meets an American after her own heart; but she refuses to marry him until she is not only legally but morally free. One of the most attractive features of the tale is the platonic affection evinced by April for young Boris, and how she helps him when he falls—helps him by that blessed attribute, womanly sympathy. Although there are many striking incidents in this book the main issue is never lost sight of, for Mrs. Coxon undoubtedly wishes her readers to realize the one-sidedness of the present Divorce Laws, and in this she admirably succeeds. Books of this type are so often marred by too much sensationalism, that it is refreshing to read one which steers clear of any such pitfalls.

THE DIVINE FOLLY. By Ella MacMahon 6s. (Chapman & Hall)

"He had married a good woman because he truly admired goodness and longed after it, and forfeited her love and respect because he could not refrain from evil." This—the tragedy of Sir Laurence Adeane's marriage—is the mainspring of Miss MacMahon's new novel. The real victim of the tragedy is the proud sensitive woman who is temperamentally incapable of forgiving her erring husband. Blanche Adeane has nothing but cold contempt for Sir Lawrence, who in return treats her with a studied insolence and disregard for her feelings. This painful atmosphere is charged with fresh misery and bitterness for Blanche when she discovers that her intimate friend, Elma Fancourt, has captured her husband's butterfly affection. Elma, indeed, develops into Blanche's worst enemy, ultimately threatening to alienate—by the simple expedient of marrying him—St. John Adeane, the one invaluable friend left to the wronged wife. The outstanding feature of a novel rich in interesting characters is the clever representation of St. John Adeane and of Ruth Frere, the woman he loves. The unique spiritual influence which Ruth exercises over the more "earthy" people of the story is suggested with fine delicacy and power, and gives "The Divine Folly" a welcome note of sincerity and depth.

THE LAWRENSONS. By R. K. Weekes. 6s. (Constable.)

The Lawrensons were brothers living in a London suburb, and the conduct of the story makes it necessary for them to be Roman Catholic. Some of them were on the Stock Exchange, others were Barristers, Civil Engineers or what not; and, as Mr. Peggotty says, their manners were like to those of the rough sea porcupine. Yet in spite of their pretence at being occupied with a world of affairs, and their assumption of a forbidding exterior, life was, to the Lawrensons, nothing but an orgy of self-sacrifice. Alice loves Massey and therefore marries Clive. But Clive discovers the true state of affairs, that Alice and Massey have utterly sacrificed themselves to ensure his (Clive's) happiness. Clive does not make the discovery until after his wedding and when he is indeed on his way to Windermere with Alice upon their wedding journey; so it will be seen that the author has contrived an ingenious dilemma. Clive is a Lawrenson, however, as well as Massey, and consequently he also is an adept in self sacrifice; and after a little reflection upon the matter (still in the train for Windermere) he sees his way to going one better than Massey, if one may say so. A clever story tells how Clive succeeded in restoring Alice to Massey, and how he sacrificed himself to carry out this purpose.

THE INSIDE OF THE CUP. By Winston Churchill. 6s. net. (Macmillan.)

Mr. Winston Churchill has taken a great step forward, one that will not only enhance his reputation and bring him a legion of fresh readers, but will add a deep feeling of attachment to the more purely intellectual admiration already excited by his historical novels. It is a remarkable step, a desertion of the drama of history for the drama of life itself. The epic of the creation of America is abandoned for the epic of the eternal warfare between self and selflessness. Instead of the birth of a nation, the birth of real manhood is here discussed. The main theme is the waning power of the Christian religion over human lives, and how by reconstruction, by new methods of presentation it might regain that power. The stage at first is filled with a group of selfish wealthy Americans. Some have frankly discarded religion, others, while professing great attachment to it, contradict their professions by their lives. They rule the church as they would a trust company, all the while keeping religion at arm's length. Into this only too representative gathering is introduced a young clergyman with high aspirations. He is not a Savonarola. There are "dark corners" to his past life, but a divine discontent spurs him on. He comes into contact with the daughter of the wealthiest, the most Pharisaical of the business men. She, too, has a divine discontent; in a natural reaction against a religion that produces such men as her father, she is something of an anarchist, a revolutionary. These two earnest, inquiring spirits gradually help each other on and upward to a new and more living faith, one with "the penetrability of the ether." On the whole, the book leaves an ineffaceable impression by its earnestness and its loftiness of conception; and the crown is set on the achievement by the beautiful portrait of the man who has climbed to the conception of a broader, more spiritual Christianity, and at the same time is entirely absorbed by its spirit, the old man, Mr. Bentley.

THE MAN FROM NOWHERE. By Victor Bridges. 6s. (Mills & Boon.)

Mr. Victor Bridges has written an amazingly good adventure story in "The Man from Nowhere." It is frankly sensational, and depends upon that well-known expedient, beloved of romancists from the days of Elizabeth to Charles Dickens, of two men happening to be exactly alike in appearance. But this is as much as Mr. Bridges borrows; the rest is all his own, and is as new and original as the most jaded novel-reader could wish. From the very first chapter the story goes with a swing and a sparkle, and his ingenuity in inventing breathless situations is one of the author's most arresting qualities. The usual adventure story is lamentably deficient, not only in its character drawing, but in its dialogue. Mr. Bridges has neither of these faults. His characters are clear-cut and interesting, from the hero who tells the tale to Milford the butler, and their conversations are so natural and so well written that they give to the most unusual situations an atmosphere of actuality.

THE MYSTERY OF DR. FU-MANCHU. By Sax Rohmer. 6s. (Methuen.)

Dr. Fu-Manchu is a mysterious Chinese, possessed, apparently, of a knowledge of all the known and a great many unknown sciences, and sworn to the extermination of the entire white race. In fact, he is the Yellow Peril incarnate. He has established himself in London, and as a beginning he has set about the murder of everybody who knows too much about recent developments in China, and the kidnapping of eminent scientists and inventors, whom he ships to his native country in order that they may assist in the making of the coming Yellow Empire of the world. Mr. Nayland Smith and Dr. Petrie (who tells the story) are the only Westerners who really grasp the colossal nature of the menace embodied in Fu-Manchu. Their endeavours to thwart him, their failures and occasional successes, are well chronicled by Mr. Sax Rohmer. But the author does not seem to understand that a superfluity of violence is bound to pall on the reader, and that a succession of murders, woundings and desperate situations requires a more emphatic break than is supplied by the very mild love affair between Dr. Petrie and Karamanien, the slave of Fu-Manchu. Still, read in the right mood, "The Mystery of Dr. Fu-Manchu" may prove quite as thrilling as the author clearly intended it to be.

Photo by J. Russell &amp; Sons.

Mr. Sax Rohmer.

THE BOOKMAN TWENTY-ONE GUINEAS PRIZE POEM COMPETITION:

RESULTS.

This Competition has proved even more popular than we had anticipated. Some two thousand entries have been received for it from all parts of the world, and if one half of the poems sent in fail to reach any high average, the average merit of the other half is very satisfactory. The humorous poems, though many, are on the whole less successful than are the verses sent in for the other two sections. If we confess the truth, two or three of the worst of the sonnets, written in most evident seriousness, are distinctly funnier than nearly all the intentionally humorous efforts. It has been no light task to read and adjudicate upon this large number of poems but everything has been most carefully considered. We print in this Supplement the poems to which the prizes have been awarded, with a selection from the others, and are pleased to say that not a few of the many we have had no space to do more than honourably mention are of equal merit with some of those we have printed. As the first prize had to be divided, we have slightly increased it, and it is a little chastening to our national vanity that both the winners are Americans.

LYRICS

We have added a Guinea to this prize, and divide the sum of Six Guineas between Miss A. J. Burr, of Englewood, New Jersey, U.S.A., and Miss Constance Lindsay Skinner, of 438, West 116th Street, New York City, U.S.A., whose lyrics, widely different in kind, are the two best we have received.

HIS SONG FOR HIS WAKING.

'Tis dawn in the sky of the world,
'Tis dawn in the sky of my heart,
And earth is the bud of a rose
Whose petals are trembling apart,
So I come to your door in the dawn,
And I breathe you my life in a word,
You would smile, you would lean from your window, my queen,
If you heard—if you heard.

The air is all throbbing with life,
And I am a pulse of the flame,
All breathless the universe beats
Like a heart that is tuned to your name,
As the stars in their courses last night
Kept time to each breath that you drew
But our passion is dumb—oh, my love, you would come
If you knew—if you knew!

You would glow in the flush of the dawn
You glitter so coldly above
You would lean like a rose to his cry
Who burns to the lips of your love
You would raise him who faints at your feet
To a height that his hope never dared
You would warm the poor clod in your arms to a god,
If you cared—if you cared.

AMRITA JOSEPHINE BURR

SONG OF CRADLE MAKING

(INDIAN)

Thou hast stirred!
When I lifted thy little cradle,
The little cradle I am making for thee,
I felt thee!
The face of the beach smiled,
I heard the pine-trees singing,
In the White Sea the Dawn-lagle dipped his wing.
Oh never have I seen so much light
Through thy father's doorway!
(Wast thou pleased with thy little cradle?)

Last night I said "When the child comes,
If it is a Son—
I will trim his cradle with shells
And proudly I will bear him in his rich cradle
Past the doors of barren women
All, all, shall see my little chief
In his rich cradle!
That was last night —
Last night thou hadst not stirred!

Oh, I know not if thou be son—
Strong Chief, Great Fisher, Law of-Woman,
As thy father is
Or only Sorrow-Woman, Patient Serving Hands,
Like thy Mother
I only know I love thee —
Thou Little One under my heart!
For thou didst move, and every part of me trembled.

I will trim thy cradle with many shells,
And with cedar fringes
Thou shalt have goose feathers on thy blanket!
I will bear thee in my hands along the beach,
Singing—as the sea sings,
Because the little mouths of sand
Are ever at her breast
Oh Mother face of the Sea, how thou dost smile—
And I have wondered at thy smiling!

Ah! Thy little feet—
I felt them press me!
Lightly, lightly
I hear them coming
Like little brown leaves running over the earth—
Little running leaves, wind hastened,
On the sudden Autumn trails!
Earth loves the little running feet of leaves,
(Thy little feet)

O Kantsamigala soe, Our Praised One,
Let there be no more barren women!
May thou bring no tears, my child
When I bear thee in thy rich cradle
By the chanting sea paths where the women labor
(Thou hast stirred!)
Oh! haste, haste, little feet
Little brown feet lightly running
Down the trail of the hundred days!

The wind is white with rocking bird cradles,
Day is in the eyes of the Sea
Ah! never have I seen so much light
Through thy father's doorway

CONSTANCE LINDSAY SKINNER

NOTE — Kantsamigala soe — God that is, in His highest nature as the all encompassing, Supreme (or highest) praised One. The language is that of a British Columbian coast tribe (Kwa-kiutl).

The PRIZE OF TWO GUINEAS is awarded to Mr E. C. Buckridge of 5 Holly Village Highgate N. for

THE OLD UNREST

Like lanterned ships on ebbing tides,
The stars drift out at dawn,
And over the hills the grey dawn rides,
In splendour of veils half drawn
And the old hushed longing stirs anew,
The old faint mystery gleams,
And the star road, the wind road
Are calling in my dreams.

Here in the streets the lamps burn still,
The mist clings, white and drawn,
But my dreams are out on the windy hill,
And the white roads of the dawn,
Where the distance lures beyond, beyond,
And the old Pan magic thrills
In the sun-light, and the silence,
And the wind among the hills

For the old unrest is still untold,
That is old as the world's first breath,
Old as the sea and the stars are old,
Older than life and death,
And now as the last wind-flower that stars
The tangle of the glen—
The dawn's breath, the Spring's breath,
And the breath of dreams in men.

E. G. BUCKERIDGE.

Honourably mentioned :

LIGHT.

Sunshine might never be
Joy undefiled,
Till your love greeted me :
Then Heaven smiled.

Sleep would not set me free
Though morning broke,
Till you looked down on me :
Then I awoke.

Dark was the earth and sea,
Lonely the night,
Till you came forth to me :
Then there was light.

(V. D. Goodwin, Lyndhurst, Gillingham, Kent.)

FATA MORGANA.

I.

Close down your hatches, O my heart ;
Behold the sea begins
To sweep the decks, the timbers start,
The vessel reels and spins.

II.

Bombard us with your thunderblasts,
Wild mistres, of the gale ;
Though crack the cables, crash the masts,
Thou shalt not make us quail !

III.

Ah, Fairy false, I've used thy chart ;
Thou smilest when men drown.
Close now your hatches, O my heart ;
Undaunted we'll go down !

(Dog-Rose, 16, Winchester Road, Oxford.)

MY JEANIE.

In a' the songs that hae been sung,
An' a' that may come after—
Ye'll hear nae melodie mair sweet
Than rings in Jeanie's laughter ;
Aye, in her gentle laughter !

In a' the red gowd i' the world
That's set the misers dreaming,
Ye ne'er will find a glint sae rare
As in her ringlets gleaming ;
In her soft ringlets gleaming !

I'm wae to think how a' the lads
Maun envy me my denty ;
I've pu'd the rose : still i' the meads
There's gowans fair an' plenty ;
Nae doot there'll aye be plenty !

God fend you bonny gowden pow !
An' tune her heart to laughter !
An' I'll be feal to you, my ain,
Thro' a' this life an' after ;
Please God, thro' life—an' after !

(A. L. Beatrice Sweet, 9, Shinryudo Chs. Azabu, Tokyo.)

MY APRIL LADY.

When all the sky is black with cloud
And gone the day so fair,
I find the sun has left his rays
To glisten in her hair.

And when again the shower is past
And radiant are the skies,
I find the shining after rain
Reflected in her eyes.

(May Jenkinson, 122, Palace Road, Tulse Hill, S.W.)

NOCTURNE.

Dusk on the lake, as when I met you there
In that immortal summer long ago.
Have you forgotten that we found it fair ?

Dusk on the lake—Ah, Love, how young we were !
Hand within hand, your head held sidewise—so ;
Dusk in your eyes and twilight in your hair.

Dusk on the lake, and I alone to care
Seeing you come not through the afterglow.
Must all things be forgot that once were fair !

(Walter Adolf Roberts, 227, Waverley Place, N.Y., U.S.A.)

IF I HAD KNOWN.

If I had known that One my heart loved best
Could stab and hurt me more than words can tell
And leave me lonely, with my love confest,
If I had known—I had not loved so well !

If I had known that vows were idle air,
That smiling eyes could look with cold disdain
On what they once deemed dearest and most fair,
If I had known—I still might love again !

But there are dreams that grow and fade like flowers,
For these I live, and toil, and make no moan,
The Past is mine, and those dear, vanished hours
Had never been, O Love—if I had known !

(Hilda Newman, 18, Pitt Street, Kensington, W.)

THE SPIRIT OF NATURE.

I know how she has grown :
The fields have taken her for their own,
And the sweet open air of heaven ;
The new-ploughed earth is of her blood a part,
The rising lark in Spring is in her heart,
And in her spirit are sunset lands at even.

All things that have no soul
Of far dim cities, struggle and toil
That are nigh overcome with too much pain,
All perfect tranquil things that lend release
Unto the clouded soul and yield it peace,
Those have conjoined unto her being's gain.

Those groups of silent trees,
Fields of soft grass where quiet sheep take ease,
And those blue hills beneath the sunset glow,
The watching kine that in yon river pool
Stand dripping to the flank with waters cool,
These with her blood commingled long ago.

Yet tho' she is made one
With natural things washed by the rain and sun,
She is not alien to the world of men,
The happy fields, ah, she is still their own,
But that new tenderness, that graver tone,
These sprang from worlds of pain beyond their ken.

Those eyes of lucent grey,
Are lovelier than an Autumn day,
Clear as those stainless, starlit, southern skies,
Yet they hold too all wealth of womanhood
And pity of men that will not follow good,
And in their depths a touch of sorrow lies.

Those tender lips divine
Are crimson-stained with earth's richest wine
Crushed from the dewy fields, the ripening grain,
Yet they are sacred with all passion sweet,
Passion and tenderness within them meet,
And they are fashioned strong enough for pain.

Ah, heart divinely glad,
The world to thee cannot be wholly sad
Who hast within thee nature's own ground-tone,
The blitheness of blown grasses late in Spring,
Skylarks that o'er the young fields raptly sing,
And trees that all their tenderest green have shown.

Ah, spirit placid-still,
This earth's too restless sorrow never will Wholly withdraw from thee thy steadfast powers,
Who hast breathed deep the peace of growing things,
Even so hast learned the lesson nature brings
That thou hast touched the spirit of wild flowers.

(Philosophos, Christchurch, Canterbury, New Zealand.)

SNOWDROPS.

You sent me snow-drops, dear, the when
Your love grew cold.
Three little words: three little tears, so white
So cold and yet so kind: I knowing then,
Went to a misty land, and there grew old.

In winter time I come again, and lo—
Snowdrops, a little choir above thy head,
Sing me thy love returned, that I may know
Thou waitest for me with the Blessed Dead.

(Alex. Zealley, 11, Guilford Street, London, W.C.)

APOLOGY.

What if another made my Song,
And what if another tuned my Lyre?
Must I fetter my feeble tongue
And faint in the clasp of a dumb desire?

What though my voice may be harsh and weak—
It may yet ring true on a single tone,
May sound some note of the truth I seek
In the words of a Song that is not my own.

What though my hands on the trembling strings,
Unskilled and coarse, are a grief to me?
Sometimes a thrill of rapture rings
In the chords of a borrowed Harmony.

Poet of Might, I have sung your Song,
Laurel-crowned Bard, I have swept your Lyre.
Pardon, I pray you, my seeming wrong,
For the sake of Small Wit and a Great Desire.

(Archibald J. A. Wilson, Canigon, Oakhurst Avenue, Rondebosch, Cape Town, South Africa.)

LYRIC.

The little cares of house and home
Weighed heavy as I trod the street,
Then broke the bells of Evensong
Upon my heart in cadence sweet.

And lo! beyond the burdened trees,
Beyond the dim and fading lands,
Hung, shining, like a perfect pearl,
The House that is not made with hands.

(Ethel Ashton Edwards, 15, Brookside, Cambridge.)

SITTING ON A GATE.

Sitting on a gate in the fields that met the morning,
Watching for the cows that would pass me in the lane;
Half-an-hour to breakfast—the bell would give me warning,
Time, first, to peep at Aladdin's lamp again!
Chickens fed and pigs fed (and I had helped the feeding),
One quick run through the daisies and the dew
Brought me to the gate, with a fairy-tale for reading:
Thus, in life's dawn, the merry morning flew.

Sitting on a gate in the lane they called the Lovers',
Throned, king and queen, 'twixt the roses and the may,
Guarded from the road by the friendly beech-wood covers,
Talked we, and laughed we, the light-foot hours away.
Wreathing hat and hair with the wayside roses,
Life itself a rose that had never seen the rue,
Sharing together our poets and our posies—
Thus, in love's dawn, the happy morning grew.

Sitting on a gate in the valley that is darker,
Darker and deeper, than any vale of earth,
Sight fails and heart fails; limbs colder grow and starker,
Yet the gate will open on lands of morning mirth.
Waiting for the joy of the rosy dawn departed,
Waiting for the love that the fuller morning knew,
Glad, not sad, for the grey is golden-hearted—
Thus, in Death's dawn, the morn makes all things new.

(Diana Royds, Heather Cottage, Winton, Bournemouth.)

THE CHATELAN.

I have built one, so have you;
Paved with marble, domed with blue,
Battlement and ladies' bower,
Donjon keep and watchman's tower.

I have climbed as you have done,
To the tower at set of sun—
Crying from its parlous height,
"Watchman, tell us of the night."

I have stolen at midnight bell,
Like you, to the secret cell,
Shuddering at its charnel breath—
Left lockfast the spectre, Death.

I have used your lure to call
Choice guests to my golden hall:
Rarely welcome, rarely free
To my hospitality.

In a glow of rosy light
Hours, like minutes, take their flight—
As from you they fled away,
When, like you, I bade them stay.

Ah, the pretty flow of wit,
And the good hearts under it;
While the wheels of life go round
With a most melodious sound.

Not a vestige anywhere
Of our grim familiar, Care—
Roses! from the trees of yore
Blooming by the rivers four.

Not a jar, and not a fret;
Ecstasy and longing met.
But why should I thus define—
Is not your chateau like mine?

Scarcely were it strange to meet
In that magic realm so sweet.
So! I'll take this dreamland train
Bound for my chateau in Spain.

(Rosslyn, Grafton Book-Room, Khyber Pass.)

FAIRIES.

I can hear the fairies calling from the meadows far away,
Where the daffodils are gleaming through a veil of misty grey;
In the magic of the morning, where the joyous sea-winds blow
Over mountain-tops with golden gorse a-glow!

I can hear the fairies calling from the king-cups all a-sheen
Through a mist of white spray falling down a glen of flickering green,
Where a blue-bell-carpet covers all the ground beneath their feet,
And the black-birds call a greeting loud and sweet.

Fairies, if I heed your calling, if I take your out-stretched hands
Will you lead me through the sunrise to your mystic, golden lands?
"If your heart is as a child's heart, you shall cross the sunrise bar
And the ocean that is lighted by a star.

"Your shall see our land of gladness—hills all green and gold and grey,
You shall wander in the blue-bell glen beside the tossing spray!"
So I go to meet the fairies, childhood's joys once more to find,
With the world and care and trouble left behind!

(Mona Douglas (aged 14), 37, Bentinck Street, Birkenhead, Cheshire.)

GARDEN AND MEADOW.

I know a garden where summer breezes blow,
Where the shadows linger idle all the day,
You may hear the golden laughter of the sunbeams come and go.

'Noath the honeysuckle hedges and the may,
Where the roses love to cluster, and the bold nasturtium dwells
You may hear the fairy music of the Canterbury bells.

I know a daisy-field open to the sky—
Little birds a-swinging on the meadow-sweet—
You may rest and none shall find you where the grasses grow so high,
And clover-blossoms kiss your weary feet.
While o'er the hedge dividing float the garden sounds and smells
And the fragrant little tinkle of the Canterbury bells.

Supplement to THE BOOKMAN.

August 1913.

I know a daisy-field just at set of sun,—
 Could the very fields of Eden be more fair?—
 O to lie among the grasses when the day is nearly done
 And the meadow's hushed in radiance!—how I love to linger
 there,
 Where clover-blossoms and daisies grow in tiny hills and dells,
 And listen to the tinkle of the Canterbury bells.

(Beatrice St. Leger, George, Cape Province, S. Africa.)

We also honourably mention :

Charlotte M. Mew (London W.C.), Syned (Johannesburg),
 No Hope (Victoria, Australia), Fred. B. Wood (Newfoundland), Florence M. Bradford (London, S.W.), Ethel Weltch (Aldeburge-on-Sea), Guenn F. Newham (Wye, Kent), Emily
 A. Davidson (Glasgow) Duke Mulloy (London, N.W.), Imvemvane (New South Wales, Australia), Rydal (Lewisham), E. Jotham (Isle of Man), W. M. Lodge (Upper Norwood), A.
 H. Smith (Great Yarmouth), Granta (Cambridge), Roslyn
 (Auckland, N.Z.), T. P. Stuart (Dublin), Silver-Pen (Ealing),
 E. Lovel Langton (Burton-on-Trent), B. R. M. Hetherington
 (Carlisle), Elizabeth Eaton (Thompson, Beds.), Constance
 Lindsay (New York), Anita Lea (Liverpool), W. R. Hamilton
 (Cape Town), Emily Howson Taylor (Patricroft, Lancs.), V.
 Gillespie (London, S.E.), Florence Bagster (Kendal), E. C.
 Lansdown (London, N.E.), Furnley Maurice (Victoria, Australia), V. D. Chapman (Burnham, Somerset), Marion (London, N.E.), C. H. Whitby (Yecovil), Alton Locke
 (Yorkshire), Isaac Jackson (Greenock), E. C. C. Cunningham
 (London, E.C.), Helen Wickham (Hampstead), Goldusa
 (London, S.W.), F. A. (Maidenhead), J. H. Langlors (Leeds),
 H. Gilbert Martin (London, S.E.), Grace Ashby (N. Devon), Ethel Mary Casson (London, N.), Beatrice Craig (Co. Derry,
 Ireland), A. E. M. Baker (London, N.W.), Mangoma (S.
 Africa), Gwyn Elton (High Barnet), Sinah H. West (Plymouth), W. Morris (Cornwall), M. E. Seed (Durham), K. L. Lyon (London, S.W.), John Wilcox (Mansfield),
 Mark (Edinburgh), C. Field (London, N.W.), Forest Love
 (Shrewsbury), J. M. Owston (London, S.W.), F. P. Day (London, N. E.), Marutsa (London, W.), P. H. B. L. (Oxford), E. A. Kirsten (Thornton Heath), T. H. L. (London, N.W.), J. H. Righton (Southport), Maud Marion Burnell (Ashford), E. T. Sandford (Cornwall), John Carlton (London, N.), Thos. Platt (Newcastle-on-Tyne), Geo. A. C. MacKinlay
 (Glasgow), A. E. Wise (Leicester), Annette Heard (Swanage), Harebell (Dublin), Alena Killoran (London, S.W.), O. H. R.
 Layton (Westgate-on-Sea), P. G. Dowling (Dublin), A.
 Eastwood (Southampton), Annie G. Hopkins (London, N.), H. F. C. Skinner (London, S.E.), Julia Rose Carling (Plymouth), M. Crump, (London N.W.), D. K. Boileau (Bath),
 B. Mann (Cheltenham), E. A. Lawrence (Liverpool), Vox Harmonica (Melbourne, Australia), A. H. Legat (Sand-gate), K. L. Saxbee (London, W.C.), N. M. Cook (Lancaster), E. M. Preston (London, W.), E. Simms (Brighton), Marjorie Christmas (Sevenoaks), S. M. (Burnley), T. Scharf (London, E.), Dorothy Grant Gibbings (Derby), G. J. Baldock
 (Hants), M. T. (Torquay), David Stothart (Edinburgh),
 J. D. S. (Glasgow), R. Duffin (Belfast), Elizabeth P. Sholl (Bristol), Neville Boden (Ramsgate), G. M. Hennings (St.
 Albans), Muriel Wiles (Madras, S. India), C. E. Little (New South Wales), Muriel F. Watson (Vancouver, B. C.), Grace Hodsdon Boutelle (Minnesota), A. M. Aldous (Saffron Waldon), G. B. Smith (Staffs.), Mrs. Trevelyan Thomson (Yorks.), Doris Dean (Bromley, Kent), Alba Longa (London, S.E.), H. R. Smith (Newcastle-on-Tyne), Elaine Lorraine
 (Lancs.), E. R. (Derby), J. L. Grvin (Spennymoor), Lena Jephson (Cambridge), Grace Frankfield (Eltham, Kent), Lilian Gillespie (Isle of Wight), M. C. James (London,
 N.W.), Alice D. Neal (Yorkshire), Eliau Hughes (London,
 W.), N. Lois Healey (Preston), Chris. W. Martin (Kent), Tristan Lovelace (Oxford), Ray Browne (Hythe), W.
 Turner (Godalming), W. S. Howden (Lincoln), G. H.
 Bonner (Birmingham), Ilya (Woodford Green), J. R.
 Allardyce Nicoll (Glasgow), C. E. (Launceston), A. Newton
 (Carnarvon), G. J. Holme (Great Malvern), Louis C. Marolf
 (Iowa, U.S.A.), C. W. Kent (Manchester), James Clarence Martyn (Victoria, Australia), M. Lynn Hamilton (Victoria, Australia), Edward J. Hoar (Philadelphia, U.S.A.), Ariel
 (Johannesburg, S. Africa), Amy I. Price (Tasmania), May Berkeley (London, S.E.), Artifice (London, S.E.), Ellis Morley
 (Edinburgh), F. H. Cockle (Funbridge Wells), K. Warren
 Hall (London, N.W.), Olive Turpin (Lancs.), M. Dawes (Southport), Geo. W. Turner (Burnley), Tamar Faed (Edinburgh), Kathleen A. Foley (Salisbury), Lena McNab (Leith), Edward Gleave (St. Helens), Noel D. Brathwaite (Ashton-under-Lyne), J. Isaacs (London, N.E.), C. H. Isles (London, N.), Lettie Cole (Herefordshire), Robert David German (Cardiff), A. E. Lester (Huntingdon), Mugwump (Cardiff), John Smellie Martin (Motherwell), M. E. Painter (Wimbledon), Bernard Delorme (London, N.), A.E.B. (Birmingham), Jean
 Talbot (Birkenhead), William Thornton Brocklebank (Darlington), Mary E. Hobson (Leeds), Roger Lamson, junr.
 (North Carolina, U.S.A.), K. Lewis (Mansfield), Osav
 (Cheshire), W. H. Baily (London, S.W.), M. E. Boyle
 (Perthshire), Nemo (Wakefield), Arthur Charlton (Derby),
 William Sainfoin Chesterfield (London, W.), A. Kiel Myron
 (Johannesburg), L. J. Villiers (Melbourne, Australia),
 Mornington (Otago, N.Z.), R. P. M. Cay (Kent), Ivor Murray
 (London, S.W.), Kowhai (Wellington, N.Z.), G. Lisle Hinmarsh (Cardiff), Bassett Green (Coventry), Ambrose
 Vickers (Liverpool), Arthur Gordon (Ontario), Marcella
 Whitaker (Dewsbury), Leslie Comber (London, N.), W. E.
 Bott (Grimsby), E. W. Priest (Norwich), Theodore Maynard
 (London, W.), Maurice I. Frank (London, N.W.), Alice Edwardes (London, W.C.), Guy Pearson (British Columbia),
 T. Shaddock (Devon), Marian F. Stringer (London, N.),
 Hilda Newman (London, W.), Guy Chester (Penarth),
 Lois Payne (Edgbaston), Henry Chas. Suter (Middlesex),
 Marjorie Barnard (London, S.W.), F. J. Martin (Sheffield), John Spence (Orkney), A. F. Bell (Hove), Henrietta Pan-croft (London, N.W.), Pax (Sheffield), F. Foulger (Somerset),
 C. L. Read (Northants), Ellen Kullmann (Manchester),
 A. M. W. (Arbroath, N.B.), Augustus H. Cook (London, N.W.), F. Hern (Hants), C. H. Keith Hibblethwaite (Nottingham), S. E. H. (London, W.), James Mitchell (Edinburgh), J. Fletcher (Northampton), Emily Cornell (Up. Norwood), John P. Wynne (Manchester), Hilary Dane (South Devon), Janet Jeffrey (Midlothian), Owen Waires (Stafford),
 Ernest Adolph-Carr (Trinidad, B.W.I.), James Ormerod
 (Bolton), Femina (W. Derby), Maximus (Dublin), W. H.
 Clements (London, E.), Josephine M. Lumley (Newcastle-on-Tyne), Marjorie N. How (London, N.), Mary T. de Lautour (Hants), Mrs. Stephen Parker (Yorks.), A. E. Johnson (Sask., Canada), Poetaster (Yorks.), E. M. Theobald (Bath), M.
 Troughton (Cape Town), A. Howe (Adelaide, S. Australia),
 Dudley Stow (London, N.), Grace Gibson (Dublin), Edith
 Ives Woodworth (Minn., U.S.A.), John F. Waddington
 (Ontario, Canada), Robert Bowden (Edinburgh), G. M.
 Measham (Newcastle-on-Tyne), A. G. K. (Nottingham), J. J.
 Geake, (Guildford), A. M. Paner (Hants), Ford (Broxham, N.B.), Andax (Dover), Doris Smith (Burton-on-Trent), Frank Cox (London, S.W.), Muriel E. George (Lewes), Emily
 Lewis (Mansfield), Edmund Howard (London, S.W.),
 Edith Furniss (Birkenhead), M. McDonnell (Glasgow),
 B. M. Morris (Bath), P. V. Poore (Andover), F. L. M. Mac-
 Corkindale (Forfar), Dorothy Plimpton (London, S.W.),
 M. A. P. Price (Birmingham), Katherine A. Fletcher
 (Winchester), Jack Blaustein (London, W.C.), V. N. Solly (Harrogate), Stanley Simpson (Cheshire), Winifred Goodwin (London, S.W.), A. L. (Southport), Alan Glenn (Manchester), Horace Shipp (Gloucestershire), Editha L. Blaikley (London, N.), J. M. Jennings (Devonport), A. Maclean
 (Argyllshire), Euphemia Dalgleish (Leith), P. J. Frawley
 (Coventry), E. S. Heron (Chester), William Smith Scott
 (Birmingham), Hedley V. Storey (Brighton), J. W. Houchin
 (Essex), M. Arnold Foster (London, W.), A. R. C. Eaton
 (Forest Gate), Dorothy Isabel Smith (Gravesend), George
 Fletcher (Jarrow-on-Tyne), Harry R. King (Dublin),
 Helen K. Watts (Nottingham), A. Gordon Huntley (Ceylon),
 A. M. Bowyer-Rosman (London, W.), Albert Fuller (Cardiff),
 W. H. Puckridge (Berks.), George Henry Badger (Texas, U.S.A.), E. L. Clark (Derby), Alex. Mitchell (Edinburgh),
 C. H. P. Mayo (Harrow), Emily Kingston (Perthshire),
 I. A. C. Smith (Edinburgh), W. G. Plant (Stoke-on-Trent),
 Harry Fowler (London, N.E.), F. M. Ellerby (Herts), Ruth Herndon Burr (Conway Ark.), G. M. Measham (Newcastle-on-Tyne), J. Cartwright Frith (Kings Norton), E. Whetnall (Cheshire), Jeanne Butler (Gloucester), E. G. Hoare (Bath),
 M. Bach (Seaford), J. G. Fletcher (London, W.C.),
 C. P. Raydon (London, S.W.), R. N. Watson (Southport), Launcelot H. Stuckey (Taunton), S. B. Irene Bell (London, W.C.), Lily E. Lord (Amersham Common), A. A. Legg
 (Brighton), A. C. Welsh (Victoria, Australia), Emily Shore
 (Worthing), Frank Brebner, junr. (Aberdeen), Alex. Brown
 (Edinburgh), J. C. Church (Yorks.), Mabel Knight (Bromley)
 M. K. Wiens (London, S.E.), Janet Clunas (Nairn), Muriel
 Turner (Bournemouth), P. M. Jones (Aberystwyth), Ivan
 Adair (Dublin), Will Herford (Georgia, U.S.A.), Gladys
 Ridgway (Birmingham), E. A. Pearson (Fleet), John J.
 Gurnett (Essex), M. F. Cock (Middlesex), A. S. Middleton
 (London, S.E.), Glamerton (Aberdeen), A. B. Dawes, junr.

(Southport), E. H. Swanson (London, N.), Maura (Yorkshire), Avis (London, W.), Ardenudorus (London, N.E.), Herbert Hodder (Kingston-on-Thames), J. A. S. Wilson (Edinburgh), K. E. Hunt (North Shields), Jonathan Tate, junr. (Belfast), Muriel Kenny (Cambridge), Miss MacDonald (Bridge of Allan, N.B.), Percy Thomas (London, N.), Christina (London, S.W.), E. R. North (Bucks), D. Stuart Wilkes (Midlothian), R. W. King (London, S.E.), Chas. Parkin (Felling-on-Tyne), Andrew Patterson (Edinburgh), Robert D. Rossmale (Isle of Wight), Oswald J. Francis (Cardiff), Dalton Stone (Brighton), B. M. Grantoff (London, S.W.), H. S. S. (Sicily), E. E. Kitton (Norwich), Thos. Reid (Stirling), Wm. Jevons (London, N.E.), Bertram Newton (London, N.), H. J. Dawtre (Southport), Vivian Fisher (Cumberland), Wm. Taylor Burkitt (Bradford), Lotus (London, N.W.), V. A. Pearn (Guildford), E. H. Kenney, junr. (London, S.E.), Florence E. Briggs (S. Devon), Claude W. Cundy (Nottingham), A. K. Lewis (Newcastle-on-Tyne), W. Turner (London, S.W.), C. G. Palmer (Midlothian), Percy Haseldon (New Brighton), J. Berkley (Andover), E. M. Purkis (Gloucester), R. Hodgetts (Brierley Hill), R. F. Reynolds (Menoneth), M. C. Haythorne (Liverpool), Mark Bowman (Kingston-on-Thames), Wilfred Dale (London, S.W.), Numa (London, N.E.), Hugo Irvine (Peterhead), A. S. Barnard (Walsall), E. V. Herring (Weston-super-Mare), W. I. Collyer (Reading), F. M. Bradford (London, S.W.), Thos. Carey (Jersey City, U.S.A.), Wm. Holloway Westgate-on-Sea), L. L. Little (Washington, U.S.A.), N. A. N. Marshall (Oxford) and N. D. Gullick (Clifton).

SONNET ON SOME FAMOUS ENGLISHMAN.

The PRIZE OF FIVE GUINEAS is awarded to Mr. E. J. Martin, of 43, Church Hill, Penistone, Sheffield, for :

ROBERT GREENE, 1560 1592.

Faster the pots went round with sorry crack
The ribald laugh broke like a stick too dry :
And wenches unashamed and jauntily
For wanton gibe gave wanton answer back
One bullying voice boomed over all the wrack
From where red-bearded, bold of chin and eye,
Sprawled Hector of the pot house, in that sty
Lord of the lousy trull and coggng jack.

Till suddenly, incongruous as a prayer,
Said one, "A madrigal, Roberto Greene!"
And in a hush hell's orchestra was spent :
Faded then cut-throat, bully, knave and quean,
And floated down a lane a country air—
"Sweet are the thoughts that savour of content."

E. J. MARTIN.

The PRIZE OF TWO GUINEAS is awarded to Mr. George M. Capper, of Manchester Buildings, Melinda Street, Toronto, Canada, for :

SIR WALTER SCOTT.

Like that old prophet who in vision stood
Rapt, in the silent valley of the dead
Around him, as in charnel house, lay spread,
The dry bones of a nameless multitude,
Then spake a voice unto that Seer good,
Prophecy life. And lo, he prophesied.
Then bone to bone and flesh to flesh were wed,
And a vast army rose with life endued.

Thou wert no less a seer whose wizard pen
Uttered in thought, the resurrection word ;
And straightway from the heather and the fen,
The noise as of a coming host was heard,
And an immortal brood of maids and men,
Stood upright, by thy breath of magic stirr'd.

GEORGE M. CAPPER

Honourably mentioned :

HENRY FAWCETT

(" Sans peur et sans reproche ")

A mossy stone above the daisied mould
Beside a village church ! Is this the last
Now left us ? Nay, his memory doth hold
Our hearts in iron bonds forged strong and fast,

Chains in the white-hot mould of suffering cast :—
Like the blind singer's voice in days of old,
That echoes from the shadows of the past,
Piercing the gloom with notes of liquid gold.
What was the charm that won him every heart ?
A heart itself made strong to conquer fate :
A life whose own lost joy did but impart
Fresh zeal to serve his people and the state :
A soul in earthly darkness set apart
To catch the dawning beams from Heaven's gate.

(B. M. Skeat, Ph.D., Baliol School, Sedbergh, Yorkshire.)

SHAKESPEARE.

Shakespeare the MAN, was like most other men :
Frail as his neighbours and as prone to sin,
Wasting the product of his peerless pen
False fleeting love and worldly wealth to win.
Shakespeare the POET of the master mind,
Who touched dead lore and made it live anew,
World's wit and wisdom in one tome confined,
And mortals with immortal stylus drew :
He cannot die the whilst his labours last,
But lives for ages in his deathless rhyme,
Growing in glory till all things are past,
And Death has paid its latest toll to Time :
Till Time, like to a withered leaf, shall die
In the dense forest of Eternity.

(John H. Ingram, 1, Hollingbury Terrace, Brighton.)

MATTHEW ARNOLD.

Sad critic Poet ! Love is not for thee ;
Thy spirit's flame in mist is hid too deep,
Mist of the heights thy questing feet still keep
While we are faint for warm humanity,
And the rich failing of an ecstasy.
No wilder beauty makes out senses leap
Than that of moonlight on the roofs asleep,
Silver and sable, pearl and ivory,
Wrappings for sadness Stay, we would demand
Did thy high purpose never need the hand
Of common loves to leaven and sustain ?
Shamed of our stupid homage we refrain,
Lest you should sift its meaning with a sigh,
Probe, analyse, and, smiling slow, pass by.

(Edith Furniss, 22, Bentley Road, Birkenhead.)

SHAKESPEARE.

The light of one that lit his lustrous age
With brief bright splendour, sank ere yet the day
Caught half the glow of its triumphal ray,
Or gave to time song's perfect heritage,
And hope fell stricken, hope that should assuage
Grief, when within the tragic arms of May
Her golden melodist in silence lay
When Marlowe's light died from the English stage.
But up the clouded darkness men saw climb
The quivering splendour of a dawn supreme,
A sovereign glow that lit the face of time
With light as bright as man's most radiant dream
Conceived of Godhead, such a light sublime
As death should slay not, nor time's self unbeam

(J. B. O'Hara, South Melbourne College, Australia.)

TO FRANCIS THOMPSON.

Thou camest from afar to this dim sphere,
Rapt singer whose celestial lyre was strung
With far-resounding strings that ever rung
In tune with beauty, love, and truth austere.
For those angelic strains thou once didst hear
In groves of Paradise so sweetly sung,
Thou wouldst impart to us, with mortal tongue
Singing immortal songs to mortal ear
Vexed was thine earthly pilgrimage, thy feet
Stumbled in thorny paths, yet joy was thine,
Thy spirit soared on pinions strong and fleet.
Oh ! Fame exalts thee, Time for thee shall twine Undying laurels, poets thrill to greet
Thy Phoenix-soul consumed by fire divine

(Mrs. C. P. F. Ferrier, 10, Hamilton Park Terrace, Glasgow)

STEVENSON.

High on the lonely mountain top he lies,
Amid the verdure of an alien land;
Below his grave the warm Pacific strand
Outstretches to the hue of tropic skies;
And round these seas of old romance there plies
A fleet of craft by his wide fancy manned
With pirates bold, and treasure-seeking band,
And mutineers with wild and murd'rous cries.
From Scottish coast and reef-girt isle they sail,
To linger by this far Samoan shore,
Where lies the teller of the wild sea-tale,
Who plans their long, strange journeyings no more.
Child-heart, wise brain, spirit unquenched and gay—
Surely some fettered Ariel passed this way!

(Lilla Gormhuille McKay, Sarawai Street, Parnell, Auckland, New Zealand.)

SAMUEL RICHARDSON.

NOVELIST AND LETTER-WRITER.

All ye who seek no high experience
Of gay Romance more richly deck'd than life,
Who love the good, the pure, haters of strife
And such as cherish the soul's excellence,
To Richardson may turn with confidence,
Savour the essence of his pages, rife
With happiness of husband, child and wife
And Life's small pleasures writ with eloquence.

From Fleet Street's busy hive he looked and saw
Gay libertines and ladies of degree,
And simple rustics daz'd by London town;
Then said the honest printer, "I will draw
True portraits that all ye who read may see
A mirror held to noble, gentle, clown."

(R. B. Ince, Jarvis Brook, Sussex.)

THOMAS HOOD.

Renown awoke upon his dexterous game
Of kindling mirth from words together thrown;
Nor had he by that gay pursuit alone
From Life's grim lips unworthily won fame.
But deeper far and loftier was his claim
Upon the world the world that having known
His wit, is yet scarce reconciled to own
The poet's title in the jester's name

Dauntless as frail, through bitter faring sweet,
He challenged woe with laughter; in his heart
Fortitude's hold was charity's retreat,
And fancy lent his mind her gossamer wing;
And through his soul, that song drew not apart,
The harmony of himself rose triumphing

(J. Cartwright Frith, Charlton, King's Norton.)

DARWIN.

In humble guise Truth keeps, as oft, her state,
As in the starry heights Yet a great mind
May quail before that judge, and willing find More easy ways. Oh, Ignorance and Hate
Ye spared not Galileo old and blind!
For Socrates, whose soul ye could not bind,
The poisoned cup! When Truth and Freedom mate
All things created join their triumph fate!
Truth stood amidst us crying "If ye fail
The very stones will speak!" And, lo, they spoke
As did all living things. Oh, God we hail Thy Truth! We hail Thy servants! Such men broke Fix'd falsity. How great, yet childlike each—
Bold leaders straining for the light they reach!

(Margaret Dunn (S. Africa), 8, Melrose Gardens, Hammer-smith.)

WILLIAM WORDSWORTH.

Thine was a heart so delicately true
To what thou lovedst, that thou couldst not twine
Ear-flattering phrase, and fancy seeming new Round simple things whose meaning was Divine—
Thus from thy soul, O Prophet, breathed the song
Of happy Nature; birds whose melodies
Rang in thy heart; the leaves, that whispering throng
Of forest-children; and the surging breeze;

And skyward-smiling flowers. Here, indeed,
Thou hadst a heritage of beauty blest
By a most fervent soul, which loved to read
God in the world, and all things at their best.
To weave a halo round a flower's face,
And clothe a daisy with an angel's grace.

(Christine D. Smith, 10, Bond Street, Wakefield, Yorks.)

CAPTAIN SCOTT.

Now, while our eyes are wet with recent tears
Pride thrills our hearts, beholding a new name
In shining letters on the scroll of fame—
Our land's last hero—peer among his peers.
Steadfast of purpose, strong in face of fears
To that drear, desolate, ice-bound land he came
A hard-won, dear-bought victory to claim
Over the hidden secrets of the years.
Too great the price! we cry; but who can judge!
In God's great purposes there is no waste;
Immortal fame by death must oft be won;
What he gave freely England dare not grudge
By death his name's in deathless mem'ry placed
And to his work a nation cries "Well done!"

(A. Walton, 22, Market Street, Gainsborough.)

CARLYLE.

Grey, rugged seer, none comes as yet to claim
Thy mantle—deemed by one a thought too worn,
Too sombre by another; nay, 't is torn
By mountain vigils, scorched by leaping flame
Of fierce endeavour In thy very name
Clangs tumult and a call to arms Behold,
We sleep . . . Come thou and wake us! As of old Yearn over us, denounce, command, reclaim!
Intolerant lover of thy fellow-men,
Shall any other hand have power to free
Such cleansing winds of anger? And thy smile—
Where shall that sudden splendour burn again
As conquering sunrise on a stormy sea,
Kindling deep, weary eyes like thine, Carlyle?

(Grace Hodsdon Boutelle, Unity House, Corner 3rd Street and 17th Avenue, N. Minneapolis, Minnesota.)

BYRON.

"To our children he will be but a name to us he is still a man, young, noble, and unhappy."
Macaulay.

A name, no more? While storms uproot the tree,
While a man's arm or woman's heart be strong,
While there is wine or anger or the sea,
This master-singer shall outlast his song.
He flashed a torch in the sunken face of Rome,
O'er gleaming Venice, and she shone more bright—
Jetsam he was, a clot of bitter foam.
He laughed above the coffin of Delight.
Stainless his name should be who is but a name:
This man had frailties, lapses, vices. Yes—
Critic, out scalpel! cut to the quick of shame,
Gloat or gloss over, sift his sins and guess.
A rake who turned fool-errand at the end!
It is a young man dead Deal kindly, friend.

(Mrs. E. M. Mott, Berth, Ruthin, North Wales.)

SHELLEY.

Imperial singer, minister of light!
Far reaching as the measureless dome of sky,
Pure as the tenderness of love's first sigh,
Crowned with a nation's worship and the might
Of endless sympathy, upon a height
Where envy withers and false idols die;
Praise halts, unnerved in wonder to decry
Thy winged message in its radiant flight!

The struggle of humanity was thine,
Its dreams and aspirations sad with age,
And placid suffering heard thy trumpet call!
And in the alchemy of hues divine
Thy magic traced them on life's blotted page,
To vivify and glorify them all.

(Isidore G. Ascher, 7, Bullingham Mansions, Kensington.)

THE BROWNING LOVE LETTERS.

HE TO HER.

And this is fame! that after we are gone
Before the books that either of us wrote
These should be prized; each tender, loving note
The world would seek to snatch and gaze upon.
And some men say that I had better done
To burn them all, lest anyone should gloat
O'er sacred things, and talk of them, and quote.
I kept them; I destroyed not even one.
But you, dear, you—you know and understand
I wanted them until my latest breath.
We'll let them squabble, pry, or disapprove,
For there is something yet they have not, and
They cannot have; we two have passed through Death;
Oh! they may keep the letters; we have Love.

(May Jenkinson, 122, Palace Road, Tulse Hill.)

SIR WALTER RALEIGH.

Dreamer of dreams—pilgrim to fairy shore,
Round which the tides of ancient story moan
Of nations risen, kingdoms overthrown:
Where breezes whisper secrets of deep lore,
And souls of unsung poets, dead before
This world had birth, into men's brains instil
The charm that melts the heart and moulds the will,
And stamps fame's obverse on the evermore

Doer of deeds—we still behold thy blade
Flash from its sheath, hear still the sea-dogs' song
As thy ship westward furrows through the main,
Still see thee kneeling for the accolade
At thy Queen's hand, or, mid sad shamefaced throng,
For thy red martyr's crown at hest of Spain.

(Stevens Benyon, Belsize, Baldslow Road, Hastings.)

We also honourably mention :

W. Cameron (Brisbane), P. O'Connor (New South Wales),
St. George Best (Chicago, U.S.A.), E. P. Schofield (Hull), Dora Duder (Taunton), A. S. Cripps (S. Africa), W. L. Randall (London, W.), Joyce Jocelyn (Auckland, N.Z.), M. L. Hamilton (Ballarat, Australia), M. A. J. Crawford (Otago, N.Z.), R.
Francis (New Zealand), E. H. Auld (Adelaide, South Australia), C. C. Dugan (Tasmania), E. D. Goring (British Guiana), A. S. Bhandaskar (Bombay), A. E.
Pinnington (Ontario), Kathleen Knox (Belfast), Hyman
Edelstein (Ontario), Alec. B. Hanby (Dumfries), T. C.
Lewis (Cambridge), Diana Royds (Bournemouth), Imvemavane (New South Wales), Thos. Huffington (Leeds), D. K.
Boileau (Bath), Lettie Cole (Pontrilas), J. Smellie Martin
(Motherwell), Pax (Sheffield), W. A. Mursell (Paisley),
Frances K. Scrymgeour (Newport-on-Tay), S. A. Doody
(Boscombe), Robert Bell (Glasgow), John Gould Fletcher
(London, W.C.), E. C. Lansdown (London, N.E.), E. Parr
(Bristol), Norman David Gullick (Clifton), Collin Brooks
(Southport), Marjorie W. Crosbie (Wolverhampton), T.
McQuinn (St. Leonards-on-Sea), C. D. Smith (Wakefield), Mary M. Wilshere (London, N.E.), C. P. Raydon (London,
S.W.), D. M. Kermode (Warwickshire), Rydal (London,
S.E.), M. K. McEvoy (London, N.W.), J. Shone (Belfast),
A. I. Freeland (Leicestershire), E. Irene Seaton (Boxmoor Herts), H. F. (Yorkshire), M. C. Stevenson (Birmingham),
N. D. Braithwaite (Ashton-under-Lyne), George Higgins
(Lanca.), G. J. Holme (Gt. Malvern), Chris W. Martin
(Kent), Eslian Hughes (Ealing), E. P. Sholl (Bristol), F. A.
Manks (Halifax), J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), J. L. Girvin (Spennymoor), C. H. Burrell (London, N.), Doris Dean
(Bromley, Kent), Mrs. J. A. Johnson (Hobart, Tasmania), J. A. Atkinson (Melbourne, Australia), H. R. Smith (Newcastle-on-Tyne), D. M. Campbell (Edinburgh), Aquarius (Wallingford, Berks), R. Bennett Hughes (Bangor), Jason
Newell (London, S.W.), Arbel M. Aldous (Saffron Waldon),
G. M. Hennings (St. Albans), J. D. G. (Glasgow), David
Stothart (Edinburgh), S. M. (Burnley), J. G. Baldock (Hants), E. Simms (Brighton), W. Bassett (Bromley, Kent),
C. E. Freeman (Cambridge), A. R. Hyslop (Edinburgh),
A. H. Legat (Sandgate), May Doney (London, W.C.), Alice Drummond (Edinburgh), Frank Dale (Suffolk), Irene Ormsby (Pontypridd), Attair (Bath), A. Eastwood (Southampton), J. W. Street (Mansfield), Austen H. Pennington, (Oldburg), S. C. Corke (London, N.), Joseph Poole Addey (Surrey), Alice Wise (Leicester), G. A. C. MacKinlay (Glasgow), John Wilcox (Mansfield), E. T. Sandford (Cornwall), H. W. Walker (Notts.), F. G. Greenwood (Yorks.), H. H.

THE
POETRY BOOKSHOP

*Accurate information concerning all editions of the English Poets, ancient and contemporary,
will be sent by post promptly on application.*

Foreign and Colonial readers are invited to avail themselves of the services of the Poetry Bookshop.

*Readings of Poetry are held twice a week.
Particulars on application.*

POETRY BOOKSHOP PUBLICATIONS.

GEORGIAN POETRY 1911-12.

Edited by E.M. (An Anthology from Publications of the last two years.) Sixth Edition. Crown 8vo.
212 pp. Price 3s. 6d. net.

POEMS. By JOHN ALFORD. 2s. net.

GENERAL & REFERENCE INDEX FOR THE POETRY REVIEW,
1912. 1s. net. Also Cases for binding at 1s. 3d. The two together, 2s. Postage 3d.
extra.

THE POETRY REVIEW, 1912.

Bound in brown paper boards, cloth back, with Index and Title Page. 10s. 6d. net.

THE RHYME SHEET (No. 1).

Illustrated. 2d. net.

POETRY AND DRAMA

Edited by HAROLD MONRO

(Founder and first Editor, during 1912, of
The Poetry Review).

Poetry and Drama is the representative organ of the younger movement in English poetry.

It is published quarterly on the 15th of March, June, September, and December.
Price, 2s. 6d. net. Annual Subscription,
10s. 6d. post free to all countries.

35, DEVONSHIRE STREET.
THEOBALDS ROAD, LONDON, W.C.

Jones (Bexley Heath), C. Price (Birmingham), Hydra Girum (London, S.W.), S. Binks (Batley), G. D. Hill (Norwich), Kitty Lillian Lyon (London, S.W.), Gwyn Elton (Herts), Beatrice Craig (Co. Derry, Ireland), J. H. Langlois (Leeds), R. Richard (London, N.), Wm. Starkey (Dublin), R. D. German (Cardiff), Jean Talbot (West Kirby), Wm. Thornton Brocklebank (Darlington), Andrew W. Paterson (Glasgow), K. Lewis (Notts), W. H. Bailey (London, S.W.), Ernest F. Seymour (London, N. W.), Robert B. Boswell (Southampton), William Sainfoin Chesterfield (London, W.), A. Keil Myron (Johannesburg), A. Howe (Adelaide, S. Australia), L. J. Villiers (Melbourne, Australia), Richard R. McCoy (Kent), Laurence Tarr (Wanstead), G. Ruddle (Wilts), W. J. Chandler (London, W.), Helen (Lewis, Scotland), Susie E. Fenter (Leamington Spa), Marcella Whitaker (Dewsbury), Theodore Maynard (London, W.), M. I. Frank (London, N.W.), Guy Chester (Penarth), David Whitelaw (Paisley), Marjorie Barnard (London, S.W.), Jan Paulus (Chingford), G. S. Wilkes (Portobello), Anthony Lilse (Erdington), M. C. Williamson (Galashiels), Evelyn A. Thomas (Constantinople), J. Pendlebury (High Wycombe), Allan (Edinburgh), Edward Rinnon (Hull), A. M. W. (Arbroath, N.B.), E. I. San Garde (Accrington), G. M. Hawkes (Plymouth), E. L. Millar (Edinburgh), John P. Wynne (Manchester), Douglas C. Pearce (Surrey), H. D. Marjorie How (London, N.), E. A. Potter (Birmingham), Mrs. Stephen Parker (Yorks), A. L. Burton (London S.E.), Crystal Martyn (Victoria, Australia), Protea (Cape Town), O. M. Round (Weston-super-Mare), N. Narayanan (Tinnevely, S. India), Margaret McDonnell (Glasgow), J. W. Houchin (Shenfield), W. Albert Worgan (S. Wales), H. R. King (Dublin), E. R. North (Bucks), A. L. (Southport), F. N. B. (London, S.W.), P. J. Frawley (Coventry), P. Walton (Gainsborough), A. W. Jay (Devonport), R. T. Pugh (Notts.), W. O. Ford (London, N.W.), D. B. Knox (Belfast), Horace Shipp (Gloucestershire), Emily Lewis (Mansfield), Mary E. Boyle (Perthshire), M. K. (Oldham), F. N. Bursill (London, S.W.), M. Dunn (South Africa), Cuthbert Ellison (Launceston), Eleanor L. Clark (Co. Derry), I. F. M. Stewart (Glasgow), P. S. (Sunderland), Emily Kingston (Perthshire), M. A. Newman (Suffolk), F. Bentley (Yorks), H. M. Winter (Dublin), Lorna Fane (Lancs.), J. A. Madge (Penzance), Jessie Pugh (Notts), F. Hodgson (Leeds), E. Summers (Cheshire), Ethel Goodwin (London, S.W.), S. Holliday (Lowestoft), B. M. Grautoff (London, S.W.), Chas. Parkin (Felling-on-Tyne), G. Beathcote (Kent), E. A. Pearson (Fleet), Clifford A. Kershaw (Gateshead-on-Tyne), R. H. Kipling (Devonport), A. A. Chadwick (Derby), G. Violet McFadden (Bournemouth), Jessides (Brighton), Ethel Stack (Dublin), George Handforth (Lancs.), Geo. W. T. McGown (Midlothian), F. H. Cockles (Tunbridge Wells), M. E. Greenwood (Surrey), Robert Ferrie (Inchinnan), G. Duncan Gray (Weston-super-Mare), A. B. Deans (Edinburgh), J. R. Ellaway (Basingstoke), W. G. Fry (Bournemouth), Avis (London, W.), Gladys Ridgway (Birmingham), A. E. Lester (Huntingdon), Muriel Kenny (Cambridge), R. W. King (London, S.E.), Edward H. Kenny, Junr (London, S.E.), M. F. Cock (Middlesex), Cornelius Hughes (Bolton), C. G. Palmer (Midlothian), Tom Sefton (Bolton), R. F. Reynolds (Menoneth), M. C. Haythorne (Liverpool), D. C. Mitchell (Glasgow), V. A. Pearn (Guildford), Hugo Irvine (Peterhead), Rob (Birmingham).

HUMOROUS POEM.

The PRIZE OF FIVE GUINEAS is awarded to Mr. A. S. Barnard, of 8, Victoria Terrace, Walsall, for :

THE PANEL DOCTOR 1913

For a score of years he had to sit and wait
And he wondered if he'd ever earn a fee,
While he listened for the stranger at the gate,
And he practised spelling patients with a "c."

But the lean and hungry days are gone and past,
And he's yearning now for just a little peace
From the patients who are coming in so fast
That the sounds of bell and knocker never cease.

If he ever of the theatre should dream,
Or should plan to take his daughter to a ball,
Or a quiet little supper-party scheme,
The telephone goes B-r-r-r and spoils it all.

At bridge he leaves his partner in the lurch
When the chances are she'll trump his only ace;
They'll even come and drag him out of Church
While he's hunting through the Hymn-book for his place.

He seldom sees his wife except at meals
When it's ten to one he gets an urgent call,
And the motor-car's a-dancing on its wheels
While he's gulping down his coffee in the hall.

Little wonder that he lets his fancy stray
To the time when he shall cease to run about,
And shall only spend an hour, twice a day,
As the one-and-only Specialist on Gout.

A. S. BARNARD.

The PRIZE OF TWO GUINEAS is awarded to Mr. Philip A. Fowler, of 1, Leigh Road, Clifton, Bristol, for

THE SILVER LINING.

Radiant silver, the poets have said, lines
Every cloud; I am bound to admit
That when I read in the blackest of headlines,
"Tar in a Pillar-Box," I am not hit;
I am not tempted to write to the papers
Urging the lash for these feminine capers;
No, not a bit.

We should do better to stifle the brute in us
When an infuriate Suffragette spills
Bottles of blacking or some other glutinous
Mess in those boxes that bristle with ills
Worse than the murrain that plagued the Egyptians:
Think of the letters that tout for subscriptions!
Think of the bills!

Circulars, pressing demands from our creditors;
Are they not daily disturbing our ease?
Think of the weary, unfortunate editors
Deluged with verses as dreadful as these!
Think what a gorgeous excuse lies before us
Now, for not answering letters that bore us!
Think, if you please!

Ladies who clamour and fight for the suffrage,
Though you are acting the giddiest goat,
I will not yield to the promptings of rough rage;
If you believe it will win you the vote
You have the fullest permission to tarnish
My correspondence with oceans of varnish,
I shall but gloat!

PHILIP A. FOWLER.

Honourably mentioned:

RUBAIYAT OF TOPPAR FUZIAM.

Awake! for Morning ushers in the Day
Fixed for the Medal of the Month of May:
Sure this first Summer Month that brings the Rose
Shall take my Limit Handicap away.

Dreaming when Dawn's Left Hand was in the Sky
I heard the Voices in the Clubroom cry
"Health to the Winner of the Medal Round!"
The Winner of the Medal Round was I.

Myself when young right regularly came
To hear the Talk of Champions of the Game
About it and about; but evermore
My bloated Handicap remained the same.

Like them I take my Stance, and swing my Full,
And drive with all the Fury of a Bull;
And this is all the Harvest that I reap—
I slice like Blazes, and like Blazes pull.

The Ball no Question makes of all my Cares,
But Right or Left as strikes its Fancy fares,
And He that drove it forth upon the Links,
He stands and swears at it—He swears—He SWEARS.

How oft, how oft, in infinite surprise
I watch my Ball as out of Bounds it flies!
How painfully I reach the Green of Home
Sans Card, sans Balls, sans Temper, and—sans Prize.

But sure this Day of Days shall end my Shame,
For in my Dream I played a faultless Game;
Beating the Colonel at This Hole and That
I earned myself much Honour and much Fame.

Belovéd, fill the Coffee-Cup that clears
TO-DAY of past Defeats and future Fears—
To-morrow?—Why, my Handicap may be
The Single Figure coveted for Years.

The Dream-fed Hope I set my Heart upon
Is turned to Dust and Ashes—and anon,
Like blowing Sand upon the Bunker's Face
Filling a little Eye or two, is gone.

Alas! that Dreams should play such scurvy Tricks!
That Lies with Night's sweet Manuscript should mix!
My Handicap will still be Twenty-Four;
The Total on my Card is One One Six.

(Carp, View Street, Cottesloe, Western Australia)

THE CAILLEACH O' CULZEAN.

Jamie cam' roun' wi' his Amati fiddle,
And played a new spring on the auld clachan green,
When, houp, wi' a loup, and her hands at her middle,
Cam' dancing the Cailleach o' bonnie Culzean
She pranced and she curtsied, she faced to the playing,
She hooched, and she flang like a soople young lass
And faster and sweeter the music kept saying
"Come, bonnie young kimmer, and dance on the grass"

"Hold to it, Nancy!" cried Donald the gamie,
"Keep at it, Luckie!" laughed Sandy the wright;
And ails sae bewitching and lo'esome played Jamie,
That auld Nancy swatted and stepped it fu' light
Sae brawly she tripped it for sic an auld body,
She sprang like a lamb on her creaky auld taes;
Her gleg, gaucy face was as leesome and ruddy
As ony young hizzie's abroad on the braes

The fiddle sang on like the rippling o' waters,
It whistled like blackies a-praising the dawn,
It spoke o' the beauty o' Scotland's fair daughters,
And Nancy, fu' canty, danced merrily on
Hooch! at the turning, a clap at the steeping,
A word at the changin' o' tune and the time,
Then aff wi' a laugh the auld Cailleach went happing,
And said she was soopler than maist at their prime (William Hutcheson, 6, Dudley Drive, Hyndland, Glasgow)

THE LAST MATCH: A TRAGEDY OF ABSENT-MINDEDNESS

An orphan! Well, I think I guessed as much!
I knew that I was "almost on the rocks,"
When sudden panic seized me in its clutch
And made me shake the box!

I heard your rattle—music in my ears!—
Then all at once the world around me sped!
Supposing—but what matter my mad fears,
If you but keep your head!

For this is "miles from anywhere," I vouch:
This moorland scene which stretches to the blue,
And all I have for solace is a pouch,
A seasoned pipe and—you!

I know not how you're made—to what stout tree
Your body owes its birth, nor why a scratch
Should cause you to ignite; enough for me,
My ewe-lamb, you're a match!

And one I fondly hope that has no truck
With a prevailing fashion I dislike
I dare not count the issue if you struck
And so refused to strike!

Perish the thought!—You're made of sterner stuff!
(The saints be thanked you were not born a Swiss!)
You're not the kind to go off "in a huff,"
Or give a "safety" miss!

Within my last year's Hornburg I shall nurse
Your frail but eager glimmer into flame;
But oh! the fearful curses I shall curse
If you don't play the game!

ROBERT BROWNING'S WORKS.

CENTENARY EDITION.

In 10 vols., demy 8vo.

With Introductions by Sir FREDERIC G. KENYON, K.C.B., D.Litt., and a Portrait Frontispiece to each volume. This Edition, printed in bold type on fine paper, and limited to 500 numbered copies for sale in this Country and 250 copies for sale in the United States, is sold in sets only. £5 5s. the net set. The Special Edition of 26 numbered copies printed on Japanese Vellum, at £10 10s. net the set, has been sold out.

In 2 vols. complete, large crown 8vo, gilt top, 7s. 6d. each.

Edited and Annotated by AUGUSTINE BIRRELL, K.C., and Sir FREDERIC G. KENYON, LL.D. With Portrait Frontispiece to each Volume.

In 17 vols. illustrated, small crown 8vo, 5s. each.

The Volumes may be had lettered separately or in set binding.

In 8 Pocket Volumes, on India Paper.

Fcap 8vo, 2s. 6d. net each in cloth, or 3s. net in leather. With a Portrait Frontispiece to each volume. The 8 volumes in cloth case, 22s. 6d. net; or in leather case, 28s. 6d. net.

A Pocket Volume of Selections from the Works of Robert Browning.

Small fcap, 8vo, cut or uncut edges, 1s. (Also supplied, through Booksellers only, in leather binding.)

The Brownings for the Young.

Edited by Sir FREDERIC G. KENYON, K.C.B., D.Litt., late Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford. Small fcap 8vo. 1s.; or, with gilt edges, 1s. 4d.

MRS. BROWNING'S WORKS.

The Poetical Works of Elizabeth Barrett Browning.

Complete in 1 volume. With Portrait, large crown 8vo, bound in cloth, with gilt top, 3s. 6d.

* This Edition is uniform with the two volume edition of Robert Browning's Complete Works.

In 6 volumes. Small crown 8vo. 5s. each.

This Edition is uniform with the 17-volume edition of Mr. Robert Browning's Works. It contains five Portraits of Mrs. Browning at different periods of life, and a few Illustrations.

In 3 Pocket Volumes.

Printed upon India paper, with a Portrait Frontispiece to each Volume. Fcap 8vo. 2s. 6d. each net in limp cloth, or 3s. net in leather.

Poems by Elizabeth Barrett Browning.

Fcap 8vo. Art Linen. Cut or uncut edges. 1s. (Also supplied in leather binding.)

COMPLETE EDITION OF ROBERT BRIDGES'S POETICAL WORKS

In 7 Volumes. Small Post 8vo. 6s. each.

CONTENTS OF THE VOLUMES.

- I. Prometheus the Firegiver—Eros and Psyche—The Growth of Love—Notes.
- II. Shorter Poems—New Poems—Notes.
- III. The First Part of Nero—Achilles in Scyros—Notes.
- IV. Palicio—The Return of Ulysses—Notes.
- V. The Christian Captives—Humours of the Court—Notes.
- VI. The Feast of Bacchus—Second Part of the History of Nero—Notes.
- VII. [In Preparation.]

SOME PRESS OPINIONS.

Quarterly Review.—"A true and genuine poet, who has not only 'uttered nothing base,' but nothing empty or insincere. He possesses the gift of being able to take the set theme provided for him by an official occasion and make of it an opportunity for the production of a noble poem."

Country Life.—"Of all living poets Mr. Bridges best expresses the natural charm of the open air. He is a leisured scholar of the most fastidious taste, who is highly accomplished in the art of poetry. He is so perfect a master of technique that he delights in showing how he can dance in self imposed fetters."

Guardian.—"The new edition is as dainty a one as any poet could desire for his work, and it will no doubt win for Mr. Bridges a considerable portion of the many new readers whom he deserves."

Daily Chronicle.—"Mr. Bridges is an artist whose work cannot fail to give pleasure to all who care for artistry in English verse. . . . We find here in full measure his sane and manly spirit, his love of life, of beauty, and of England, his refinement of thought and of form, his cool and fresh lyric quality."

London: Smith, Elder & Co., 15 Waterloo Place, S.W.

Supplement to THE BOOKMAN.

August 1913.

Therefore I trust you'll prove a "matchless" friend;
Light-headed as you please, but sound of skull!
Meanwhile, I'm praying that the fates may send
The psychologic lull. . . .

The Gods are kind!—the wind—that errant foe!—
Has for the moment sought a change of clime.
My pipe's between my teeth; my Homburg, so!
And quick! now. . . . NOW'S the time!

'Tis over! There you lie, inert and charred!
A match that died before its time was ripe!
Not you to blame, but this forgetful bard
Who had not filled his pipe!

(Cyril G. Taylor, Farr Hall, Heswall, Cheshire.)

THE ESSENTIAL REQUIREMENT.

My wife (we are strangers as yet!)
Will be simply distractingly pretty,
With soft eyes of blue, a dimple or two,
And a tongue not unpleasantly witty;
She will be a most charming brunette,
With a nose just a trifle retroussé—
Not much, but a hint (I tone it for print!)
That she doesn't care tuppence what you say.

Her figure will be very chic—
A slim adaptation of Juno;
Her musical taste will be cheerful but chaste,
Embracing Paul Rubens and Gounod.
Possessed of a perfect physique,
She won't spend a fortune on clothing,
But if with herself she brings me some pelf . . .
I shan't view the lucre with loathing.

She'll applaud with approval complete
My verses when'er I declaim them—
Most people refuse to be bored by my muse,
And, somehow, I never could blame them!
Of course she will think I am SWEET!—
(On the whole not a difficult matter!)
She'll nurse me, and cherish, and see I don't perish,
And coax me, and pet me, and flatter.

But one thing must be very clear
Ere I marry this mythical Crichton—
If this she will do we'll rush the thing through,
And go honeymooning at Brighton;
It will prove that her love is sincere,
After all words are little or no test—
We'll clinch the affair if she'll solemnly swear
To clean out my pipes without protest!

(E. L. Roberts, Kenwood Bank, Sheffield.)

WITH APOLOGIES TO ALICE IN WONDERLAND.

You are old Father Bookman, the reader once cried,
And your fame is established quite.
And yet you incessantly tax our poor minds,
Do you think at your age it is right?

In my youth said the Bookman, with not the least sneer,
I feared it might injure your brain,
But now that I'm perfectly sure you have none,
Why I do it again and again.

You are old Father B. as I mentioned before,
And have offered some cheques really fat!
Indeed, I've tried hard, but I've not got one yet,
Pray what is the reason of that?

In my youth, again smiling, the Bookman replied,
All the prizes were specs at the most.
Though I've heard people say that they must "take me in,"
Yet I don't seem to mind their proud boast!

You are old Father B, as I've said more than once,
Your connection you never can sever,
And your pages are full of most excellent stuff,
What made you so awfully clever?

"I have answered three questions and that is enough"
Said the Bookman, "You're not at all nice:
I know you look forward to every new month
Be off, or I'll put up my price!"

(Hilda M. Barrow, All Saints' Rectory, Hastings.)

We also honourably mention:

G. H. Bonner (Birmingham), W. S. Howden, Western Australia), L. E. Tiddeman (London, S.W.), St. George Best (Chicago), E. H. Auld (Adelaide, South Australia), G. M. Capper (Toronto), Leander (Cape Town), J. A. Wilson (Cape Town), Kirby (Birkenhead), P. M. Jones (Aberystwith), E. Haydon (London, N.), H. H. (Carlisle), Beryl Shirley (Cardiff), M. M. Burnell (Ashford), Cedric (Derby), H. P. Cuthbert (N. Queensferry), E. R. Wild (Liverpool), Stanley Urquhart (Middlesex), T. Sharp (London, S.W.), J. K. Mackay (London, N.W.), J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), W. E. Peters (Cheshire), I. F. (London, N.W.), J. D. Smith (Glasgow), Arthur Charlton (Derby), W. G. Woodin-Spencer (London, S.W.), G. F. A. Salmon (Penzance), Wm. Kerr (Stirling), A. Beckett (Oxford), Hilda Besset (Warwickshire), R. Richard (London, N.), O. Kutzman (Queensland, Australia), W. H. Baily (London, S.W.), L. E. Rees (London, E.), W. D. P. Hill (Allahabad, India), Mrs. W. Thomson (Yorks), Ambrose Vickers (Liverpool), Mrs. Hooper (Wanstead), A. M. Slade (London, S.W.), A. P. Slade (Surrey), Ballantrae (Newport, Mon.), O. L. Rhys (Cardiff), M. C. Jobson (Co. Durham), Merlin Dombey (Liverpool), Miss Robertson (Monmouth), G. T. Lawrence (Newcastle-on-Tyne), H. K. Watts (Notts), E. L. Roberts (Sheffield), H. P. Dollman (London, S.W.), Immento (Edinburgh), E. M. Black (Seaford), W. Reed (Co. Durham), H. O. Wolfe Murray (London, N.W.), Wiberforce Jenkinson (London, S.W.), I. Lewis (Edinburgh), J. P. Addey (Kingston-on-Thames), Mark Read (Birkenhead), Malton (Brixton), T. C. Adams (S. Wales), H. E. Stone (Surrey), J. B. F. Christie (Fife), Flaccus (London, N. E.), Gladys Kearsley (Barnsley), D. M. Rawcliffe (Wigan), Pekinese (N. Cornwall), M. Thorpe (London, S.E.), Cornelia (Sheffield), Kenneth McCrae (Melbourne), E. F. Parr (Bristol), D. L. A. Jephson (Cambridge).

Photo by Bauano

Baroness Orczy

Messrs. METHUEN'S AUTUMN ANNOUNCEMENTS.

GENERAL LITERATURE

OUR ETERNITY. By MAURICE METERLINCK. Translated by A. TEIXEIRA DE MATOS. With a Photogravure Frontispiece after G. F. Watts. "Hope." Fcap. 8vo. Gilt top. 5s. net.
A much enlarged version of "Death" with an exhaustive enquiry into the communication between the living and the dead, re-incarnation, etc. A book which will appeal to an immense circle of readers.

LONDON LAVENDER. By E. V. LUCAS, Author of "Mr. Ingleside." New and Cheaper Edition. Fcap. 8vo. Gilt top. 5s.

LOITERER'S HARVEST. A New Volume of Essays. By E. V. LUCAS. Fcap. 8vo. Gilt top. 5s.

THE CHILDREN'S BLUE BIRD. By GEORGETTE LEBLANC (Madame Maurice Maeterlinck). Translated by A. TEIXEIRA DE MATOS, and illustrated by A. ROTHEMSTEIN. Fcap. 4to. Gilt top. 5s. net.
A simple story and interpretation.

THE WIND IN THE WILLOWS. By KENNETH GRAHAM, Author of "The Golden Age." A New Edition. With 8 Illustrations in Colour by PAUL BRANSON. Wide Crown 8vo. Gilt top. 7s. 6d. net.

SURATAT OF OMAR KHAYYAM. Translated by EDWARD FITZGERALD. With a Frontispiece in Colour and 75 Illustrations in Monochrome by E. J. SULLIVAN, A.R.W.S. Crown 4to. Gilt top. 15s. net.

THE OPEN ROAD. By E. V. LUCAS. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by CLAUDE A. SHEPPARDSON. Crown 4to. Gilt top. 15s. net.

WILLIAM OF GERMANY. By STANLEY SHAW, LL.D. With a Frontispiece in Photogravure. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.
A record of the Emperor's life in which special chapters are devoted to his Court and his relations to Art and Religion. A brilliant story of a great personality.

A FAIR CONSPIRATOR: Marie de Rohan, Duchesse de Chevreuse. By H. NOEL WILLIAMS, Author of "The Love Affairs of the Condés." With a Frontispiece in Photogravure and 16 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 15s. net.

THE EMPRESSES OF CONSTANTINOPLE. By JOSEPH MCCABE, Author of "The Empresses of Rome." With 8 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

MY PEOPLE. By Her Highness THE RANEE OF SARAWAK. With a Frontispiece Portrait and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

FANCIES, FASHIONS, AND FADS. By RALPH NEVILL. With a Frontispiece. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

THE SAILORS WHOM NELSON LED. By EDWARD FRASER, Author of "The Soldiers whom Wellington Led." With 12 Illustrations and 4 Maps. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

ENGLAND IN THE LATER MIDDLE AGES (1272-1485). By KENNETH H. VICKERS, M.A., Professor of Modern History in the University of Durham. With 4 Maps. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.
[Oman's History of England.]

ENGLAND SINCE WATERLOO (1815-1900). By J. A. R. MARRIOTT, Lecturer and Tutor in Modern History and Economics at Worcester College, Oxford. With 10 Maps. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.
[Oman's History of England.]

THE SIX PANICS AND OTHER ESSAYS. By F. W. HILKOT, Editor of The Economist. Fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

AVIATION. By ARCHERON E. BERRIMAN, M.I.A.E., A.F.A.S., Technical Editor of Flight. With 20 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.
The best authority of the day explains the principles of flight and the functions performed by the various parts of the aeroplane. The only scientific and complete book on the subject.

THE COMPLETE ATHLETIC TRAINER. By S. A. MUSSAMINI. With many diagrams and 20 Plates. Demy 8vo. 5s. net.
[Complete Series.]

This book explains all the details which go to make the finished article in athletic sports. Everything is described and it is indispensable to all who are interested in English Athletics.

THE COMPLETE BOXER. By G. I. BOHUN LYNCH (Captain of Oxford University Boxing Club, 1904). With a Preface by the EARL OF LONDALK. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 5s. net.
[Complete Series.]

THE BOOK OF THE BALL: An Account of What It Does and Why. (Cricket, football, golf, baseball, tennis, lawn tennis, pelota, polo, fives, pallone, racquets, hockey, lacrosse, croquet, bowls, squash, badminton, billiards). By A. E. CRAWLEY. With 80 Diagrams and Plates. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

THE CITIES OF ROMAGNA AND THE MARCHES. By EDWARD HUTTON. With 12 Illustrations in Colour by FRANK CRISP, 12 other Illustrations and a Map. Crown 8vo. 6s.
Another of Mr. Hutton's famous books on travel, dealing with Ravenna, Bologna, and other famous and romantic towns and districts.

THE BOOKLOVER'S LONDON. By A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK. With 50 Black and White Drawings by FREDERICK ADCOCK. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

The author recalls the memory of the great writers who have lived in London and have peopled it with their men and women. It is descriptive and anecdotal.

A NATURALIST IN WESTERN CHINA. By ERNEST H. WILSON, V.M.H., With an Introduction by Prof C. S. SARGENT. With a Map and 100 Illustrations. Two Volumes. Demy 8vo. 30s. net.
A splendid book by a great botanist famous all over the world. Mr. Wilson has introduced more shrubs and flowers to Europe than any other traveller living or dead.

THE DIVERSIONS OF A NATURALIST. By SIR E. RAY LANKESTER, F.R.S., Author of "Science from an Easy Chair." With a Frontispiece in Colour and other Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 6s.

Another book by this famous author, uniform with that most successful work, "Science from an Easy Chair."

FICTION

THE JUDGMENT HOUSE. By SIR GILBERT PARKER, Author of "The Seats of the Mighty." Crown 8vo. 6s.
A magnificently dramatic story of England and South Africa.

THE WAY OF AMBITION. By ROBERT HICHENS, Author of "The Garden of Allah." Crown 8vo. 6s.
A brilliant story of London and North Africa.

THE REGENT. By ARNOLD BENNETT, Author of "Clayhanger." Crown 8vo. 6s.

The famous "Card" is re-introduced and his adventures described in Mr. Bennett's most buoyant spirit.

GRANGE. By JOSEPH CONRAD, Author of "The Nigger of the 'Narcissus.'" Crown 8vo. 6s.

A strange and fascinating story of human passion and disaster. The Sea is in the book.

THE GOVERNOR OF ENGLAND. By MARJORIE BOWEN, Author of "I Will Maintain." Crown 8vo. 6s.

A dramatic story of Oliver Cromwell from the beginning of the Civil War to the Great Protector's death.

THE LODGER. By MRS. BELLOC LOWNDERS. Crown 8vo. 6s.

A thrilling story of an unsolved mystery of crime.

THE WAY HOME. By the Author of "The Wild Olive." Crown 8vo. 6s.

An engrossing story of a sinner—his life and his death. One of the deepest problems of religion is here introduced.

THE GOLDEN BARRIER. By AGNES AND FERGUSON CASTLE, Authors of "If Youth but Knew." Crown 8vo. 6s.

Here the authors solve the problem of a marriage which beginning in unhappiness passes through a conflict of will to happy peace.

THE FLYING INN. By G. K. CHESTERTON. Crown 8vo. 6s.

A romance and comedy of the time when all Western Europe has been conquered by the abstraining Moslems. It tells the story of the last Innkeeper.

THE MORNING'S WAR. By C. E. MONTAGUE, Author of "A Hind Let Loose." Crown 8vo. 6s.

The love story of a young Anglo-Irish man and woman—brilliantly written.

BELOW STAIRS. By MRS. A. SIDGWICK, Author of "Lamorna." Crown 8vo. 6s.

An unusual book, being the story of a domestic servant—her work, her love affairs and her outlook.

THE SEA CAPTAIN. By H. C. BAILEY, Author of "The Lonely Queen." Crown 8vo. 6s.

A fine and bracing tale of the great days of Elizabeth.

SANDY MARRIED. By DOROTHY CONYERS, Author of "Sally." Crown 8vo. 6s.

A rollicking story of Irish sport.

THE SECOND-CLASS PASSENGER. By PERCEVAL GIBSON, Author of "Margaret Harding." Crown 8vo. 6s.

Impressive stories, by an author whom "Punch" has called "One of the best living short story writers."

THE REMINGTON SENTENCE. By W. PETT RIDGE, Author of "Devoted Sparks." Crown 8vo. 6s.

The adventures of a country family in town, told in Mr. Pett Ridge's happy and vivacious manner.

THE SUMMER LADY. By MRS. GEORGE NORMAN, Author of "Lady Fanny." Crown 8vo. 6s.

A graceful romance somewhat after the style of the "Cardinal's Snuff Box."

THE LITTLE NUGGET. By P. G. WODEHOUSE. Crown 8vo. 6s.

The adventures of a millionaire's son, whom all the world attempts to kidnap.

THE TWO KISSES. By OLIVER ONIONS, Author of "Good Boy Seldon." Crown 8vo. 6s.

The story of a woman artist in which the life of the studios is shown as it is lived by women.

THE HARROVIAN. By ARNOLD LUNN. Crown 8vo. 6s.

The most truthful story of school life ever published. This is the real thing, and not a sentimental make-believe.

THE WHITE THREAD. By ROBERT HALIFAX, Author of "A Whistling Woman." Crown 8vo. 6s.

A story of working class life, with a heroine who will endure herself to all.

THE ROMANCE OF A FEW DAYS. By PUTNAM WILF, Author of "The Revolt." Crown 8vo. 6s.

The romantic adventures of a young Englishman in Moscow are here described.

TIDE MARKS. By MARGARET WESTRUP (Mrs. W. Sydney Stacey), Author of "Elizabeth in Retreat." Crown 8vo. 6s.

A story of love and Cornwall.

WHAT IS LOVE? By DAVID LESTER, Author of "A Painter of Souls." Crown 8vo. 6s.

A Kingdom Divided? An intimate story of theatre life in Paris.

MAN AND WOMAN. By L. G. MORTIMER. Crown 8vo. 6s.

A story of a woman who once believed that man is the enemy. She was converted.

ONCE OF THE ANGELS. By EVELYN BEACON. Crown 8vo. 6s.

A story on a delicate subject told with devotion and conviction.

THE GATE OF HORN. By BLULAH MARIE DIX. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE MYSTERY OF DR. FU-MANCHU. By SAT ROHMIR. Crown 8vo. 6s.

SWIRLING WATERS. By MAX RITTENBERG, Author of "The Mind Reader." Crown 8vo. 6s.

An exciting story of international finance.

SHALLOWS. By FREDERICK WATSON. Crown 8vo. 6s.

A romance of Jacobite times by a son of Ian MacIain.

THAT WHICH WAS WRITTEN. By SYRIL CORMACK SMITH. Crown 8vo. 6s.

MISS NOBODY. By ETHEL CARRIF, Author of "Songs of a Factory Girl." Crown 8vo. 6s.

A story of modern working class life told by one who has an intimate knowledge of it.

STEMPENYU. By SHALOM ALEICHEM. Translated from the Yiddish by HANNAH BERMAN. Crown 8vo. 6s.

A GODDESS OF STONE. By R. W. WRIGHT HENDERSON, Author of "John Goodchild." Crown 8vo. 6s.

LOVE'S APPRENTICESHIP. By MABEL SPRENT. Crown 8vo. 6s.

A story of a little wild bush girl concerned with the action and re-action between simple and sophisticated life.

KNOCKINGGREEN DAYS. By JACKSON C. CLARE. With 4 Illustrations by A. E. HORN. Crown 8vo. 6s.

An uproarious story of Irish adventure.

Interesting Books on Varied Subjects.

THE BEAUTY, HISTORY, ROMANCE AND MYSTERY OF THE CANADIAN LAKE REGION.

By WILFRED CAMPBELL, Author of "Lake Lyrics," "The Dread Voyage,"
'A Beautiful Rebel' etc. With numerous plates in colour and half tone Price 6/

There is no more beautiful, enchanting and sublime portion of the American continent than the lake region of Canada. Commencing at the Thousand Islands and extending to the extreme western shores of Lake Superior, is a continuous chain of superb lakes and noble waterways, unequalled anywhere in the world for their beauty of fresh water coast scenery and as a vast highway for inland navigation. "It has long been one of my most cherished dreams," says the author, "to give to the world in some form an account of this region and these lovely and magnificent lakes so as to celebrate, and per chance to perpetuate in literature not only their unique beauties, but also to chronicle somewhat of the prehistoric and historic tragedy and comedy, and the human vicissitudes which have been associated with this vicinity from the remotest human antiquity to the present day."

WHERE THE SUGAR MAPLE GROWS.

IDYLS OF A CANADIAN VILLAGE

By ADELINE M. TESKEY.

Illustrations by J. S. GORDON Price 6/

A charming volume of sketches. The author Adeline M. Teskey is a resident of Canada and her work will prove a revelation to those persons who claim that Canada has no literature. Miss Teskey has produced in these Idylls of a Canadian village something unique in the way of character studies equal in all respects to the quaint types of 'Beside the Bonnie Briar Bush'.

THE MASTER OF LIFE.

A ROMANCE OF THE FIVE NATIONS AND OF PREHISTORIC MONTREAL

By W. D. LIGHTHALL, F.R.S.C., Author of "The False Chevalier," etc. Price 6/-

This is a story of woods and waters and prehistoric scenes. The present book is an attempt to picture the strange ideas of the Red Man's mind, life, and melancholy. It is an aboriginal romance, without a white man in it. The Indian is here represented in the chivalrous and reverent side of his nature. To understand his philosophy it is necessary to remember that he was a mystic; yet he believed one thing firmly, that the whole world of objects was living, nothing to him was inanimate. He himself was but part of a living world and so were his dreams. And that world had one exquisite and incomparable quality to him in its state of perfect nature—its beauty.

THE BATTLE OF THE PLAINS.

THE GREATEST EVENT IN CANADIAN HISTORY By J. M. HARPER,

Author of "The Montgomery Siege," etc. Price 6/

The Battle of the Plains of Abraham stands out as a memorable event in the history of the world, being not only the most important event in the history of Canada, but an achievement of the highest moment in the military annals of the British Empire as well. And the celebration of its occurrence on the immediate outskirts of the city of Quebec, by the issue of such a volume as this cannot but be of interest to the King's subjects in every part of the British possessions.

TALES OF THE PORCUPINE TRAILS.

Poems by W. MILTON YORKE. Price 1/

Mr. Yorke writes with ease, swing, and vigour. There stands out from it all the hardy and hearty ring of the man who knows, the expressiveness of the man who appreciates the force of the man who is earnest, the fire and freedom of originality, and the enthusiasm of the patriot. . . . The poems are replete with merit, with character and with genuine interest.

PUBLISHED BY THE MUSSON BOOK COMPANY LIMITED OF TORONTO AND MANSION HOUSE CHAMBERS, QUEEN VICTORIA ST., LONDON, E.C.

A SELECTION FROM
HUTCHINSON & CO.'S
AUTUMN BOOKS.

TWO IMPORTANT TRAVEL BOOKS

The Voice of Africa

Being an account of the travels of the German Inner-African Expedition during the years 1910-12

By LEO FROBENIUS

Leader of the Expedition

Author of "The Childhood of Man," etc

With 68 full-page plates, over 200 illustrations in the text and a coloured frontispiece

In 2 large handsome volumes, 28s net

A FINE ART BOOK

The Book of Psalms

With 24 illustrations in colour

By FRANK PAPÉ

In crown 4to cloth, richly gilt and gilt top, 10s 6d net

America as I Saw It

By Mrs ALEC TWEEDIE

Author of

In demy 8vo, cloth gilt and gilt top, 16s net

With a photogravure frontispiece and numerous other illustrations, including 13 humorous cartoons, by W. K. Haselden

Unknown Mongolia

A Record of Travel and Exploration on Russo-Chinese Borderlands

By DOUGLAS CARRUTHERS

Gold Medallist of the Royal Geographical Society

With three Chapters on Sport by J H MILLER, F Z S, and an Introduction by

THE RIGHT HON EARL CURZON OF KEDLESTON K G

With Illustrations on art paper, reproduced from photographs, Panoramas, Diagrams and Maps from original surveys

In 2 vols, square demy 8vo cloth gilt and gilt top, 24s net

A SUPERB GIFT BOOK FOR CHILDREN

By H FIELDING HALL

Margaret's Book

By the Author of "The Soul of a People"

In crown 4to (9 x 6½) cloth richly gilt with burnished edges, bound, 7s 6d net

Beautifully illustrated with 12 Coloured Plates, over 30 fine Drawings, designed title page, end papers and other decorations by

CHARLES ROBINSON

Italian Yesterdays

By Mrs HUGH FRASER

Author of "A Diplomatist's Wife in Japan," etc

In demy 8vo, cloth gilt and gilt top 16s net, with numerous illustrations

TWO IMPORTANT BIOGRAPHIES

Mrs. Jordan : Child of Nature

By PHILIP W SERGEANT

Author of "Little Jennings and Fighting Dick Talbot," "My Lady Castlemaine," "The Empress Josephine Napoleon's Enchantress," etc

In demy 8vo, cloth gilt and gilt top, 16s net

With photogravure frontispiece and other illustrations

The Life of James IV

By I A TAYLOR

Author of "Mme Roland," "Queen Hortense and Her Times," etc

With an Introduction by Sir GEORGE DOUGLAS BART

In demy 8vo cloth gilt and gilt top, 10s 6d net.

With photogravure frontispiece and other illustrations

A Day in the Moon

By the ABBÉ MOREUX

In crown 8vo cloth gilt 3s 6d net

With 40 illustrations from photographs and drawings by the author

The Errand of Mercy

A History of Ambulance Work upon the Battlefield

By M MOSTYN BIRD

In crown 8vo cloth, with illustrations 3s 6d net

The Poems of Francois Villon

Translated by

H. DE VERE STACPOOLE

In fcap 4to cloth, with calligraphic title page and book 7s 6d net

Handsome binding on the cover

TWO BOOKS FOR LOVERS OF NATURE

A NEW VOLUME OF

HUTCHINSON'S NATURE LIBRARY

The Courtship of Animals.

By W. P. PYCRAFT, A L.S., F Z S.
Zoological Department, British Museum

Author of "A History of Birds," "Story of Reptile Life," etc

With numerous illustrations on art paper

A NEW VOLUME OF

POCKET NATURE BOOKS

Toadstools and Mushrooms of the Countryside

By EDWARD STEP, F L S.

Author of "Wayside and Woodland Blossoms," "Wayside and Woodland Trees," etc

With 8 coloured plates, and 128 other illustrations from photographs on art paper.

London : HUTCHINSON & CO., Paternoster Row, E.C.

MI 4SR5

HURST & BLACKETT'S

BOOKS FOR THE AUTUMN

A NEW AND IMPORTANT WORK

By the author of "Hearts of Men" "The Soul of a People," "The World Soul," etc

THE PASSING of an EMPIRE

By H FIELDING-HALL

In demy 8vo cloth gilt 10s 6d net

THE APOSTLE OF FREE LABOUR

THE LIFE STORY OF

WILLIAM COLLISON

Founder and General Secretary of the Free Labour Association

Told by HIMSELF

In demy 8vo, cloth gilt 16s net, with portrait and illustrations

RECOLLECTIONS

of an IRISH JUDGE

Press, Bar and Parliament

By M M'DONNELL BODKIN, K C

With Portraits

In demy 8vo, cloth gilt and gilt top 16s net

AN EMPIRE IN THE MAKING

THROUGH SIBERIA

By R L. WRIGHT and BASSETT DIGBY

In demy 8vo, cloth gilt with 10 illustrations 10s 6d net

NEW REVISED EDITION OF TWO IMPORTANT WORKS

AYLWIN

By THEODORE WATTS-DUNTON

With new matter by the Author

Illustrated with 4 coloured plates, including a portrait of the author, and 16 full-page pictures

In large crown 8vo cloth gilt, 6s net

By DOUGLAS SLADEN

A NEW EDITION OF

ORIENTAL CAIRO

The City of the Arabian Nights

In demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 7s 6d

Illustrated with 63 intimate pictures of life in Oriental Cairo from photographs by the Author, and with the newest map of Cairo

London :

HURST & BLACKETT, Ltd.,

Paternoster House, E.C.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW 6s. NOVELS FOR THE AUTUMN.

- THE SPANISH MARRIAGE
(Aug. 25) By Helen Mary Keynes.
- DUST OF THE ROAD
(Aug. 28) By Marjorie Patterson.
- LOVE IN THE HILLS
(Sept. 1) By F. E. Penny.
- BARBARA OF THE THORN
(Sept. 4) By Netta Syrett.
- JUSTICE—SUSPENDED
(Sept. 8) By Richard Marsh.
- THE HOUSE OF SEVEN DEVILS
(Sept. 11) By Horace W. C. Newte.
- THE PRICE PAID
(Sept. 18) By Effie Adelaide Rowlands.
- FAIRFAX AND HIS PRIDE
(Sept. 25) By Marie Van Vorst.
- THE DOOR THAT HAS NO KEY
(Oct. 2) By Cosmo Hamilton.
- THE YOUNG LOVELL
(Oct. 6) By Ford Madox Hueffer.
- PRODIGALS & SONS By John Ayscough.
(Oct. 9)

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111 St. Martin's-Lane, W.C.

FROM BELL'S LIST.

VOLUME V. NOW READY.

THE CORRESPONDENCE OF JONATHAN SWIFT

Edited by F. ELRINGTON BALL, Litt.D. With an Introduction by the Right Rev. the BISHOP OF OSSORY. To be completed in 6 Vols. Vols. I.—V. now ready. Vol. VI. in the press. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net. each.

'This is the most important venture in the literary history of our country upon which any publisher is at present engaged.'—Morning Post.

Just published. Demy 8vo. With a Photogravure Frontispiece from an unpublished Portrait of Horace Walpole, and other Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.

HORACE WALPOLE'S WORLD

A Study of Whig Society under George III.

By ALICE DRAYTON GREENWOOD, Author of "The Hanoverian Queens of England"

"'Horace Walpole's World' is a charming book. Miss Greenwood, who has already placed us in her debt by her volume on the 'Hanoverian Queens,' has written a record of eighteenth century society in England which is quite fascinating, and which, so far as its principal hero is concerned, goes far to redeem a character much maligned by the strictures of Macaulay."—Mr. W. L. Courtney in the Daily Telegraph.

Just published. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

THE JEWS OF TO-DAY

By DR. ARTHUR RUPPIN.

Translated from the German by Marjory Bentwich. With an Introduction by JOSEPH JACOBS, Litt.D.

"Dr. Ruppín's work on the present position of the Jews throughout the world, and the possibilities of their future, has already attracted so much attention that we heartily welcome this admirable translation. . . . The book is of immense value as a patient, exhaustive, and candid examination into a question the importance of which can hardly be exaggerated."—Outlook.

LONDON: G. BELL AND SONS, LTD.,
Portugal Street, Kingsway, W.C.

WYMAN & SONS LIMITED

Largest Installation of Monotype and Linotype
Machines in the Kingdom
Fine Art Miehle and other Presses for best
Bookwork

High-class Rotary Machinery for half-tone
printing and quadruple Presses producing 16, 20, 24, 28 and 32 pp. papers at 30,000 per hour, folded

Newspaper, Book and General Printers and Lithographers

Binding Plant complete, including the latest machines for Case-making and Casing-in

Books set up by Monotype, submitted entire in proof, printed and bound complete

BOOKSTALL CONTRACTORS ON LONDON & NORTH WESTERN, GREAT WESTERN AND OTHER RAILWAYS

Wholesale Booksellers and Newsagents :: Railway, Press and General Advertising Contractors

LONDON AND READING

MR. FIFIELD'S NEW LIST.*The Little Wicket Gate. By Algernon Petworth. Cloth gilt. 6s.

"His description of an ideal state is extraordinarily fascinating—it introduces us to a group of characters quite outside our experience, and yet beautifully human."—Morning Post.

The Little Wicket Gate. By Algernon Petworth. Cloth gilt. 6s.

"Most interesting allegorical vision. The author has gone to the root of things, and if his imagination has carried him a little beyond practical politics, he has the excuse of obvious sincerity, intellectual courage, and purity of aim."—Morning Post.

The Little Wicket Gate. By Algernon Petworth. Cloth gilt. 6s.

"In 'The Little Wicket Gate' a fresh effort is made to describe the happy land of nowhere. . . . Most of the author's ideas are extremely pleasant."—The Standard.

The Little Wicket Gate. By Algernon Petworth. Cloth gilt. 6s.

"The book is one highly to be recommended both to those who desire a charming story and to those who are interested in an acute analysis of the causes of discontent."—Yorkshire Observer.

The Little Wicket Gate. By Algernon Petworth. Cloth gilt. 6s.

"Both for its literary setting and for the high moral and moral ideals it aspires to, this modest volume may be most cordially recommended."—Literary World.

The Little Wicket Gate. 6s.*The Future Evolution of Man. By W. Hall Calvert, M.D. Cloth gilt. 320 pp. 5s. net, postage 4d.

"For the biological part of this book we have nothing but praise."—New Statesman.

"Many will be struck by the varied and bold lines of reasoning which this gifted medical man brings to bear on his purpose."—Freshwater.

Alps and Sanctuaries of Piedmont and Canton Ticino. By Samuel Butler.

New enlarged edition, with extra chapter and index, and 80 illustrations by the author.

Large Cr. 8vo. Cloth gilt. 5s. net, postage 4d.
Drums over with the author's swift, mocking laughter. Anyone who wishes to make Butler's acquaintance should begin with this. . . . In no other did he write with a fiercer fuller, more delicious self-abandonment."—The Times.

The Note Books of Samuel Butler.

Large Cr. 8vo. 450 pp. Cloth gilt. 6s. net, postage 4d. Second Edition.

"They defy summary or analysis; command us to live with speculation and wisdom; many a satire, puns, quips, and stories."—Walter de la Mare in Edinburgh Review.

The Nature of Woman. By Dr. Lionel Taylor. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d. net, postage 3d.

"A profound and valuable study, which no student of modern life should miss."—English Review.

Henrik Ibsen: Poet, Mystic and Moralist. By Henry Rose. Cloth gilt. 2s. 6d. net, postage 3d.

"An interesting study of the spiritual development of Ibsen."—It on on.

The Plays of Brieux. A Study. By P. V. Thomas, M.A. 2s. net.*On the Truth of Decorative Art. By Lionel de Fonseca. Cloth gilt. 2s. 6d. net, postage 3d.*Gloom and Gleam. Poems by Teresa Hooley. 1s. net.

(In Preparation)

The Humour of Homer and other Essays. By Samuel Butler, with a sketch of the life of Butler by H. F. Jones, and a portrait. Cr. 8vo. Cloth gilt. 5s. net. (Oct. 1)*The Fair Haven. By Samuel Butler. With preface by R. A. Streetfield. Cr. 8vo. Cloth gilt. 5s. net. (Oct. 1)*The Tour of a Socialist Round the World. By W. W. Moodie. Cr. 8vo. Cloth gilt. 5s. net. (Oct. 1)*The Malady of the Ideal. Essays on Mystics and Mysticism. By Van Wyck Brooks. 2s. net. (Oct. 1st)*The Discovery of the Future. By H. G. Wells. 1s. net.

London: A. C. FIFIELD, 13, Clifford's Inn, E.C.

STANLEY PAUL'S HOLIDAY NOVELS

REFEREE—"An appalling dish."

BLACK HONEY

By O. Ranger Gull

DAILY CHRONICLE—"The plot is devised with the ease and concision of a master. An excellently devised surprise. If anybody wishes to enjoy a quiet nap in the same room as a chatterbox, let him lend the latter 'Black Honey'; it may be warranted to absorb the most frivolous."

YORKSHIRE POST—"Black Honey' must claim a distinctive place."

"A WOMAN'S NOVEL."

BOUND TO BE

By Will Hugo

DAILY NEWS and LEADER—"We imagine that Will Hugo is of the same sex as George Eliot and John Oliver Hobbes. He shows so keen an insight into an ordinary woman's minor morals the things she can't do and the things she can do the nothingness that sting her sharply and the trifles that soothe 'Bound to Be' stands well out of the crowd of library novels by its whiff of reality and its brilliant common sense."

THIRD LARGE EDITION READY

THE HONOUR OF THE CLINTONS

By Archibald Marshall, Author of "Exton Manor," etc.

The THRON—"A brilliant novel told with the strength and rest of a master, the interest gripping you to the end."

DAILY NEWS—"The author is at his highest level, a wholly delightful story."

OBSERVER—"A delightful story."

SPECIALIST—"Mr. Marshall may be congratulated. His character is drawn in a most convincing and lifelike manner."

DAILY MAIL—"An admirably contrived story. A happy ending crowns a book that is sure to find a large and delighted public."

A WIFE OUT OF EGYPT

By Norma Lorimer

SECOND EDITION

DAILY TELEGRAPH—"A sound tongue and really absorbing story. Miss Lorimer knows the secret of construction in art; she has revealed it to a woman."

BOOKSITER—"Full of interest and no doubt will attract an immense and permanent success among the notable novels of the season."

SCOTSMAN—"A well constructed, brightly written and interesting novel."

Mr. DOUGLASS ADEN—"A novel."

HUNT THE SLIPPER

By OLIVER MADDOX-HUEFFER

(JANE WARDLE).

Author of "The Artistic Temperament."

DAILY MAIL GAZETTE—"It bubbles with humour. A book one has to read and enjoy to skip."

The CHRISTIAN WORLD—"It is a novel of humour and with sheer exuberance. I have found it is surely 'Hunt the Slipper'."—The Times. "I can say Mr. Hueffer continues to read off novels with such apparent ease and infectious light heartiness."

YORKSHIRE POST—"A novel of genuine power."

"Gollypots!" as he himself would say what a life to lead!

THE ADVENTURES OF MORTIMER DIXON

By Alicia Ramsey

According to The TIMES: "Are amazing"

DAILY TELEGRAPH—"A more entertaining companion one might go far to seek. A thoroughly good story full of plot energy and good humour. Mortimer Dixon himself should make many friends for his vigorous infection and his readiness of overwriting. Moreover, he is the best of good fellows without a touch of side or pretension. 'Gollypots!' as he himself would say. What a life to lead!"

CASSERLEY'S WIFE

By Esther Miller

DAILY MAIL GAZETTE—"Ivelyn makes a most human heroine. An admirable novel and one that cannot fail to be read with intense interest."

GLASGOW HERALD—"This story should certainly serve a useful purpose as a warning to young men."

THE BRAVE BRIGANDS

By May Wynne

Author of "Henry of Navarre," 7th thousand.

The WORLD—"A most excellent plot which holds the reader enthralled from first to last. Miss Wynne rises here to heights which she has hardly reached hitherto."

Other Successful Novels Now Ready, 6/- each

THE HORRIBLE MAN (Mrs. Harrod) Frances Forbes-Robertson

THE UNWORTHY PACT (Author of "Fanny Mutha") Dorothea Gerard

BRINETA AT BRIGHTON (Author of "Maggie of Margate") Gabriel Wedni

DEFIANT DIANA (Author of "The Price of Friendship") E. Ivoret-Creen

STANLEY PAUL & CO., 31, Essex St., London

READERS OUT OF REACH

of a good local bookseller, or who live abroad, are asked to write direct to London for their books, which will be sent by return of post, at lowest cash prices, on receipt of remittance with order.

German or French Books (if not obtainable in London) are posted to customers direct from Leipzig or Paris by my agents there, thus saving postage.

LONDON AGENT FOR LIBRARIES ABROAD.

ESTABLISHED
1851

ALFRED WILSON

Export and Retail Bookseller

18-19 GRACECHURCH STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Telephone: 7463 Central.

Bankers: London County & Westminster (Lombard Street).

Subscription Newspaper and Periodical Agency for British and Foreign Publications.

List of 1600 Subscription Rates free on application.

CATALOGUES SENT POST FREE

1. Reference Book Catalogue of 146 pp. of Standard Literature.
2. Remainder Catalogue of over 1000 Titles of Publishers' Remainders, in good condition as issued, at from 30% to 80% off published prices. (Out of print till September.)
3. List of Pocket Editions and 7d. Novels.
4. Price List of Subscription Rates for British Periodicals abroad, with a selection of the most popular American, French, German, and Spanish periodicals.

A NEW SERIES OF BEAUTIFUL BOOKS FOR ALL LOVERS OF FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE COLLECTION GALLIA

Edited by Dr. CHARLES SAROLLA. 18s. net per vol.

- I. BALZAC. CONTES PHILOSOPHIQUES. Introduction de Paul Bourget.
- II. L'IMITATION DE JÉSUS CHRIST. Introduction de Monseigneur R. H. Benson
- III. ALFRED DE MUSSET. POÉSIES NOUVELLES.
- IV. PENSÉES DE PASCAL. Texte de BRUNSCHVIGG. Préface de Emile Boutroux. Introduction de Victor Giraud.
- V. LA PRINCESSE DE CLEVES. Par Madame de la FAYETTE. Introduction par Madame Lucie Félix Faure-Goyau.
- VI. GUSTAVE FLAUBERT. LA TENTATION DE SAINT ANTOINE. Introduction par Emile Faguet.
- VII. MAURICE BARRÈS. L'ENNEMI DES LOIS.
- VIII. BALZAC. PÈRE GORIOT. Introduction de Emile Faguet.
- IX. ÉTIENNE LAMY. LA FEMME DE DEMAIN.
- X. LA FONTAINE. FABLES.

Bound in Cloth with Frontispiece in Photogravure. Fcap 8vo.

SEND FOR SPECIAL App. PROSPECTUS.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 28, Aldine House, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

An extraordinary anonymous chronicle One of the sensations of the autumn publishing season.

Hodder & Stoughton. 6/-

AUTHORS' AGENCY. The SURREY LITERARY AGENCY place MSS. promptly and obtain the best possible terms, because it is conducted on literary lines and business principles. SPECIAL FACILITIES FOR PLACING NOVELS, Etc. Prospectus free on application to "Strathmore," Westbury Road, New Malden, Surrey. (Kindly note new address.)

BOOKS (Secondhand). Catalogues post free. Thousands of books in stock, moderately priced. R. ATKINSON, 97, Sunderland Road, Forest Hill, London.

TYPEWRITING.—MSS. of every description Copied Accurately and Promptly, 9d. 1,000 words (postage inclusive). Testimonials from Authors, &c.—MISS JACOBS, 18, Statham Grove, Clissold Park, N. (Kindly note change of Address.)

THE SPIRITUAL DRAMA IN THE LIFE OF THACKERAY

By PROF. NATHANIEL WRIGHT STEPHENSON.

Price 6/-

"Universally acknowledged as lovable and generous in his private life, the continual accusation launched against Thackeray as a novelist is that he is cynical, holding bitter views of humanity. Professor Stephenson defends him against this charge, which he alleges to be based on one book, "Vanity Fair," with an entire disregard of the spiritual progress which is revealed in his work as a whole."

HODDER & STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, LONDON.

NISBET'S AUTUMN BOOKS

SELLING RAPIDLY.

The New Foresters

By WILLIAM CAINE.

5/- net.

A pleasant chronicle of wanderings in the heart of the New Forest by the Author of "Hoffman's Chance," etc.

Daily Telegraph: "An altogether delightful human and humorous book."

Punch: "Buy it at once."

SEPTEMBER.

Essays in Rebellion.

By HENRY W. NEVINSON, Author of "Essays in Freedom." With portrait. Post 8vo. 6/- net.

Greek Art and National Life.

By S. C. KAINES SMITH. Demy 8vo. 7/6 net. Illustrated.

The Prowlers.

By F. St. MARS, Author of "On Nature's Trail." Illustrated by Warwick Reynolds. Square Demy. 6/- net.

Did the Phœnicians Discover America?

By T. CRAWFORD JOHNSTONE. Demy. 7/6 net.

Common-sense Aids in Illness.

By SISTER JENNINGS GOODLEY. Crown 8vo. 2/- net.

OCTOBER.

The Empress Frederik: A Memoir.

With Photographs. Demy 8vo. 15/- net.

Phiz and Dickens.

By EDGAR BROWNE. With many unpublished originals. Royal 8vo. 15/- net.

EDITION DE LUXE of 175 Copies 32/- net.

Pillars of Society.

By A. G. GARDINER, Author of "Prophets, Priests and Kings." With many photographs. Demy 8vo. 7/6 net.

Africa in Transformation.

By REV. NORMAN MACLEAN. With photographs. Crown 8vo. 5/- net.

In My Study.

By REV. CANON ANTHONY DEANE. Post 8vo. 5/- net.

Attio Salt.

By REV. SELBY HENREY. Crown 8vo. 2/6 net.

Studies in Character.

By late REV. WILLIAM WATSON, D.D. Crown 8vo. With Portrait frontispiece. 3/6 net.

GIFT BOOKS AND JUVENILES.

SEPTEMBER.

The Coral Island.

By R. M. BALLANTYNE. With Preface by Sir JAMES BARRIE. Fully Illustrated in colour by Septimus Scott. 10/6 net.

The Sword of Deliverance.

By CAPTAIN CHARLES GILSON. Illustrated in colour. 6/-.

A Brave Little Royalist.

By DOROTHEA MOORE. Illustrated in colour. 5/-.

Also others at 3/6

Write for NISBET'S Autumn List.
22, BERNERS STREET, LONDON.

The Times critic said (January 16th, 1911):

"Mr. Barker has this advantage over Mr. Shaw

that he is a more accurate observer. Mr. Shaw is always in so great a hurry to give us his own peculiar explanation of facts that he will never stop to take a good look at the facts first . . . Mr. Barker, on the other hand, has an extraordinarily vivid sense of reality."

GRANVILLE BARKER'S PLAYS.

THREE PLAYS. Cloth. 5s. net.

THE MARRYING OF ANN LEETE 4th ED.

THE VOYSEY INHERITANCE - 8th "

WASTE - - - - - 8th "

THE MADRAS HOUSE - - - 3rd "

All the above, singly, cloth, 2s. net; paper, 1s. 6d. net.

SCHNITZLER-BARKER

ANATOL, a Series of

Dialogues - - - - - 4th ED.

Cloth, 2s. net; paper, 1s. 6d. net.

HOUSMAN-BARKER

PRUNELLA: or Love in a

Dutch Garden - - - - - 6th "

Pott 4to, Cloth, with Music of Serenade, 5s. net; Music separately, 1s. 6d. net; Cr 8vo Paper Edition of Play, 1s. net.

NEW PLAYS.

FOUR PLAYS. By GILBERT CANNAN. 2s. 6d. net.

THE EMANCIPATION. By LEONARD INKSTER. Cloth, 2s. net; paper, 1s. 6d. net.

THE EDUCATION OF MR. SURRAGE. By ALLAN MONKHOUSE Cloth, 2s. net, paper, 1s. 6d. net.

THE POLITICIANS. By FRANK G. LAYTON. Cloth, 2s. net, paper, 1s. 6d. net.

THE PRICE OF THOMAS SCOTT. By ELIZABETH BAKER Cloth, 2s. net; paper, 1s. 6d. net.

NEW SIXPENNY SERIES.

MISS TASSEY. By ELIZABETH BAKER.

THE LITTLE STONE HOUSE. By GEORGE CALDERON.

JOHN MASEFIELD

THE TRAGEDY OF POMPEY THE GREAT 3rd ED.

Cloth, 3s. 6d. net, paper, 1s. 6d. net.

GITHA SOWERBY

RUTHERFORD & SON 2nd "

Cloth, 2s. 6d. net, paper, 1s. 6d. net.

STANLEY HOUGHTON

HINDLE WAKES - - - 6th "

Cloth, 2s. net, paper, 1s. 6d. net.

ELIZABETH BAKER

CHAINS - - - - - 4th "

Cloth, 1s. 6d. net, paper, 1s. net.

ALLAN MONKHOUSE

MARY BROOME - - - 2nd "

Cloth, 2s. net; paper, 1s. 6d. net.

EDWARD GARNETT

THE TRIAL OF JEANNE D'ARC

Cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

MACDONALD HASTINGS

THE NEW SIN Cloth, 2s. net; paper, 1s. net.

Write for complete Descriptive List of Modern Drama published by

Adelphi. SIDGWICK & JACKSON. London

Macmillan's New Books

MR. BRYCE'S NEW BOOK.

University and Historical Addresses.

Delivered during a Residence in the United States as Ambassador of Great Britain. By the Right Hon. JAMES BRYCE, O.M. Extra Crown 8vo. 8s. 6d. net.

DAILY NEWS.—"The selection of these addresses explains in some measure the remarkable influence of Mr. Bryce. They reveal that breadth of sympathy and vitality of mind which are his conspicuous merits. No matter what the subject may be, it immediately became living and suggestive."

The Shorter Poems of Frederick Tennyson.

Edited, with an Introduction, by CHARLES TENNYSON. With Portrait. Crown 8vo. 5s. net. [Sept. 16]

STEPHEN GRAHAM'S NEW BOOK.

With the Russian Pilgrims to Jerusalem.

By STEPHEN GRAHAM. With 40 Illustrations from Photographs by the Author and a Route Map. 8vo. 7s. 6d. net. [Sept. 9]

* * The first account ever written, in any language, of this wonderful pilgrimage.

The Seine from Havre to Paris.

By SIR EDWARD THORPE, C.B., F.R.S. Illustrated. 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

THE STANDARD.—"Sir Edward Thorpe places all his knowledge and experience at the disposal of the public in a very well written and admirably illustrated book, which we have pleasure in recommending."

H. G. WELLS'S NEW NOVEL.

The Passionate Friends.

By H. G. WELLS. Extra crown 8vo. 6s. [Sept. 12]

* * Giving the love story of Stephen Stratton, a man capable of a great passion.

MAURICE HEWLETT'S NEW NOVEL.

Bendish: A Study in Prodigality.

By MAURICE HEWLETT. Extra Crown 8vo. 6s. [Sept. 19]

* * A novel of love and politics which opens in the year when William IV. became King of England.

JAMES STEPHENS'S NEW NOVEL.

Here are Ladies.

By JAMES STEPHENS, Author of "The Crock of Gold." Crown 8vo. 5s. net. [Shortly]

* * Mainly a collection of character sketches, abounding with rich Irish humour.

Vol. IV. Just Ready.

Lollardy and the Reformation in England. The Historical Survey.

By the late JAMES GAIRDNER, C.B., LL.D., D.Litt.

Vol. IV. Edited by WILLIAM HUNT, M.A., D.Litt. 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

* * Previously published. Vols. I. and II. 21s. net. Vol. III. 10s. 6d. net.

Second Edition ready Sept. 12.

Psyche's Task. A Discourse concerning The Influence of Superstition on the Growth of Institutions.

Second Edition, revised and enlarged, to which is added "The Scope of Social Anthropology." By J. G. FRAZER, D.C.L., LL.D., etc. 8vo. 5s. net.

Volume I. ready Sept. 9.

Encyclopædia of the Philosophical Sciences.

Edited by WILHELM WINDELBAND and ARNOLD RUGE. English Edition under the Editorship of Sir HENRY JONES. 8vo.

VOL. I. LOGIC: By Arnold Ruge, Wilhelm Windelband, Josiah Royce, Louis Couturat, Benedetto Croce, and Nicola Loskill. 7s. 6d. net.

* * Macmillan's Autumn Announcement List post free on application.

MACMILLAN & CO., Ltd., LONDON.

MR. HEINEMANN'S FIRST LIST OF AUTUMN PUBLICATIONS.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

Figures in French History.

Each volume Large Demy 8vo, with Illustrations. 10s. net.

MIRABEAU. By M. LOUIS BARTHON, Premier of France.

THE DUCHESSE DE CHEVREUSE.

By M. LOUIS BATTIFOL. [Shortly.]

PEDAGOGIC ANTHROPOLOGY.

By Dr. MARIA MONTESORI, author of "The Montessori Method." Demy 8vo. 14s. net.

THE RENAISSANCE:

Savonarola—Cesar Borgia Julius II.—Leo X.—Michael Angelo. By ARTHUR, COUNT GOBINEAU. English Edition edited by Dr. OSCAR LEVY. Demy 8vo, with sixteen Illustrations. 10s. net.

THE ROMANCE OF NEW-FOUNDLAND CARIBOU

By A. RADCLYFFE DUGMORE, author of "Camera Adventures in the African Wilds," etc. With numerous plates from the author's photographs. Imp. 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

FIRES AND FIRE FIGHTING.

By CHIEF KENLON, Head of the New York Fire Brigade, and ALAN LETHBRIDGE. Crown 8vo. Illustrated. 6s. net.

SOCIAL WELFARE IN NEW ZEALAND.

By HUGH H. LUSK. Crown 8vo. Illustrated. 6s. net.

POETRY.

THE DAFFODIL FIELDS. A New Poem by JOHN MASEFIELD, author of "The Everlasting Mercy." Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

THE POEMS OF JOHN HELSTON In One Volume. Demy 8vo. 5s. net.

RHYMES OF A ROUSEABOUT. By W. MONRO ANDERSON. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

FORTHCOMING 6/- FICTION.

THE DARK FLOWER. John Galsworthy

THE TRUTH ABOUT CAMILLA. Gertrude Hall

SET TO PARTNERS. Mrs. Henry Dudeney

THE GARDEN WITHOUT WALLS. Coningsby Dawson

THE MILKY WAY. F. Tennyson Jesse

DIANA AND TWO SYMPHONIES. Francis Toye

The Bookman.

"I am a Bookman."—James Russell Lowell.

No. 264. VOL. XLIV.
Subscription rate 11s. per annum post free.

SEPTEMBER, 1913.

PRICE SIXPENCE.
Published Monthly.

CONTENTS.

NEWS NOTES .. .. 227-235

THE BOOKSELLERS' DIARY
235-238

THE READER—

Bernard Shaw. By DIXON
SCOTT .. .. 239
What was the Romantic
Movement? By DR. W.
BARRY .. .. 256

PRIZE COMPETITIONS .. 253

NEW BOOKS—

More of Strindberg. By
RICHARD CURLE .. .. 258
Peacock Pic. By EDWARD
THOMAS .. .. 260
Religio Poetæ. By W. A. F.
A Painter's Pages. By D. S.
MELDRUM .. .. 262

Of Letters and the Church.
By R. BRIMLEY JOHNSON .. 262
Mark Rutherford .. .. 263
The Modern Novel. By WIL-
KINSON SHERREN .. .. 263
The Soul of the World .. 264
Crowds .. .. 265
A Feminist Compromise. .. 265
Shakespeare and the Theatre.
By DARRELL FIGGIS .. 262
The Tragedy of Education.
By M. H. H. MACARTNEY .. 266
The Land of Promises. By
STANLEY PORTAL HYATT .. 267
The Human Factor in Drama.
By ROBB LAWSON .. .. 268
The Seine .. .. 269
A Critic on Impressionism.
By HOLBROOK JACKSON .. 269
Sir Gilbert Parker's New Novel 270
The Leaders of Germany .. 270
An Ulsterman on Ireland.
By H. A. HINKSON .. .. 271

Recent History. By THOMAS
SECCOMBE .. .. 271

NOVEL NOTES .

The Eighth Year - Sandy's
Love Affair- The Sin of Eve-Discovery- Rosalindin-Arden - The Strictly-Trained Mother-Pollyanna
-Hunt the Slipper-The Harrovians - The Secret
Cargo-The Golden Woman
-The Wooings of Jezebel
Pettyfer .. .. 273-278

THE BOOKMAN'S TABLE—

The New Foresters—Chapters
at the English Lakes—Old Corners in English Lakeland
—In Praise of Winchester—
An Irish Gentleman 278-280

NOTES ON NEW BOOKS .. 280

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

News Notes.

The October BOOKMAN, our Autumn Double Number, will be also a Borrow Number, and in addition to many other articles and reviews will contain a special and fully illustrated article on Borrow by Thomas Seccombe, and the conclusion of our article on George Bernard Shaw, by Dixon Scott.

Mr. Bernard Shaw's new play, "Androcles and the Lion," is produced by Mr. Granville Barker at the St. James's Theatre to-day—September 1st. The scene is laid in ancient Rome, and the scenery and costumes have been designed by Mr. Albert Rothenstein. The costumes are by no means those of the traditional Roman of the stage; no togas are worn, and we hear rumours of ancient Romans in trousers, which is no mere attempt at originality, but is, as Mr. Rothenstein says, "realistic and archæologically correct." He has made a careful study of the period of the play, and finds that togas had then already gone out, and "my frequent use of trouserings instead of bare legs is answerable by the statement that already at that period trousers had come into fashion."

Photo by Daily Mirror.

G. Bernard Shaw.

In connection with our Bernard Shaw illustrations, we are greatly indebted to the kindness of Lieut.-Colonel Charles a'Court Repington, Mrs. F. M. Cornford, Mr. Max Beerbohm, Mr. Will Rothenstein, Mr. Will Dyson, and Mr. Joseph Simpson for the loan of drawings and permission to reproduce them. For similar permissions our thanks are due to the proprietors of The Tatler, T. P.'s Weekly, M.A.B., and The Daily Herald. Mr. D. J. Rider, the well-known bookseller of 36, St. Martin's Court, Charing Cross Road, has also been kind enough to lend us several prints, and one of our caricatures is reproduced, with his and the artist's permission, from "Three Living Lions," by Joseph Simpson—the other two lions in the book being G. K. Chesterton and H. G. Wells. Only a limited edition of this book was issued, at 7s. 6d. per volume. Mr. Rider has also a few remainder copies (at the reduced price of 12s. 6d.) of Professor Archibald Henderson's "Life of George Bernard Shaw," which was published by Messrs Hurst & Blackett.

"The Eighth Year," the new problem-novel by Mr. Philip Gibbs that Messrs. Williams & Norgate have published, was originally written as a three-act play, and will probably be produced this autumn at one of the repertory theatres. Some of the facts Mr. Gibbs uses in the argument to the book were provided by Mr. de Montmorency, who acted as Secretary to the Royal Commission on Divorce, whose conclusions went to confirm the dictum of Sir Francis Jeune that it is usually the eighth year of married life which produces the acutest nervous stress and strain.

Another book by Mr. Philip Gibbs is to be pub-

Photo by Walter Brunsdon,
14, Conduit Street, W.

Mr. Haldane Macfall,

A new edition of whose novel, "The Woolens of Jezebel Pettyfer," has been published by Messrs. Simpkin, Marshall.

Photo by G. Vandyk.

Mr. Philip Gibbs,

whose new book, "The Eighth Year" (Williams & Norgate), is reviewed on page 273.

lished next month by Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons—a book which, under the title of "The New Man," analyses some of the problems of modern life, and shows that in the last twenty-five years, during which essayists, novelists and dramatists have been dissecting the "new woman," man also has been subject to extraordinary evolution, and a new type has been produced in this country, with ideals, philosophy and mental make-up quite different from those of his father and forefathers. In analysing him, Mr. Gibbs reveals many of the hidden forces and tendencies in modern social life, and shows that, naturally, the "new woman" has had a good deal to do with the fashioning of the "new man."

Yet a third book by Mr. Philip Gibbs to be published this year is a long novel, "A Master of Life," which Messrs. Cassell will issue in the autumn. A somewhat condensed version of the story is at present running serially in the British Review.

"The Spanish Marriage," by Miss Helen Mary Keynes, which Messrs. Chatto & Windus have just published, is a remarkable first novel. It is a seventeenth-century romance woven round Buckingham and Charles's dash to Spain after the Spanish Infanta; a number of famous historical personages figure in it, and it keeps as near to fact as any imaginative work ought to. The author is only nineteen years of age, and if she fulfils the promise of this story, should go far.

Miss Leslie Moore, author of "Aunt Olive in Bohemia," etc., has nearly completed a new novel, which Messrs. Alston Rivers will publish in the autumn.

In the spring of this year Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton found themselves in a difficulty. Their 1912 Novel Competition had left them with two highly satisfactory prize-winners, and with four other manuscripts upon which the general opinion seemed to be that all were good, while the order of merit in which they were placed differed with the taste of each individual reader. After some deliberation they decided to publish all four, and to ask the public for its opinion. Accordingly they invited reviews on:

1. A GARDEN OF SPICES, by A. Keith Fraser.

2. MY FATHER'S SON, by John Harvey.
3. THE SIN OF EVE, by May Edginton, and
4. THE WILDERNESS LOVERS, by E. R. Punshon.

The competition proved very popular. The question of what the public likes, however, remains largely unsolved. The reviewers seem to have preferred "A Garden of Spices" to the other books, but its favouritism was secured by a very small number of votes. Taking that book as typifying Sentiment, it was very hard pressed by Romance (in the form of "The Sin of Eve"), with Adventure ("The

Photo by W. H. Puddicombe.

Miss Leslie Moore.

Wilderness Lovers") a good third, and Realism ("My Father's Son") a surprisingly close fourth. A dozen or so more of votes for the last-named book and it would have been first.

The First Prize of £5 5s. is awarded to the Rev. A. Capes Tarbolton, of Lavington, Crowborough, whose order of preference is 1, 3, 2, 4. The Second Prize of £3 3s. is awarded to Mr. R. Brimley Johnson, of 17 St. John's Road, Uxbridge, Middlesex, whose order of preference is 3, 4, 2, 1. The Third Prize of £2 2s. is awarded to Miss L. Wilson, of 22 Clifton Terrace, Brighton, whose order of preference is 2, 1, 4, 3. Prizes of £1 1s. each are awarded to: E. Heck, Dr. Phil., Winkelgasse, 20, Strassburg-Rupprechtsau, Germany (3, 4, 1, 2); Mr. C. G. L. Du Cann, The Hampden Club, Phoenix Street, London, N.W. (2, 1, 3, 4); Miss Lucy G. Chamberlain, Plas Brith, Llandudno, North Wales (2, 3, 4, 1); Mr. G. E. Wakerley, 19, Chaworth Road, West Bridgford, Notts (2, 3, 1, 4); and Mr. Ernest A. Carr, Lyndall, Park Crescent, Tonbridge, Kent (4, 3, 2, 1).

Miss Helen Mary Keynes.

Mrs. H. H. Penrose, whose new novel, "The Beat," Messrs. Mills & Boon are publishing.

Photo by Tesler Bros., Seaford.

Mr. Andrew Soutar,

whose new novel, "Maggie House," Messrs. Cassell are publishing.

Other reviews which were well in the running came from Mrs. Carey Morris (Newlyn, Penzance), Miss Gertrude Pitt (Hampstead, N.W.), Mrs. M. A. Pulbrook (Cricklewood, N.W.), V. Maturin (Winchfield, Hants), Herbert Dale (Oxhey, Watford), and Alan C. Fraser (Dodington, Bridgewater).

Among a large number of others the work of the following writers merits commendation:

Photo by Moffett, Chicago.

Miss Constance Lindsay Skinner, whose Lyrics, "Song of Cradle-Making" and "His Song for her Waking," won the First Lyric Prize in our Twenty-one Guinea Prize Poem Competition.

Photo by Davis &amp; Eickemeyer.

Miss A. J. Burr,

Miss Hiron (Bath), Miss Irene Harrison (Bristol), Miss Gertrude M. Elwood (Grimsby), A. L. Beal (Hammer-smith), Mrs. Charles Wright (Sutton), Mrs. A. Tobias (Hove), Miss Maud Collis (Crowborough), C. Whitwell (South Wanstead), Miss M. Noel (Maida Hill, W.), Mrs. Florence Zerheene Segrave (Maidenhead), Mrs. Eleanor Brown (Bournemouth), Mrs. Ellen F. Calvert (Buxton), Mrs. L. G. Hawkins (Downham Market), D. Meats (Nottingham), Miss Mary E. Dixon (Downham), A. Salkeld (Cardiff), W. W. Northcott (Hyde Park, W.), E. M. Howe (Downham), Francis O. Dagnall (Hampton Wick), Mrs. F. E. Whitwell (Wanstead Park, E.), Miss Drummond-Hay (Fort Augustus), Miss Irene Pollock Lalonde (Bath), Miss L. Bellard (Crowborough), Mrs. E. W. Edminson (Gravesend), Miss M. Scott (Clifton), Miss G. M. Ransom (Torquay), G. Bennett (Salcombe), Miss B. N. Melladew (London, W.), Miss May Herschel-Clarke (Woolwich), and Miss Mabel Robinson (Clapton).

Miss A. J. Burr, of New Jersey, and Miss Constance Lindsay Skinner, who divided the first prize for original Lyrics in our Twenty-One Guineas Prize Poem Competition, have both contributed a good deal of verse to the American magazines. Miss Skinner, who was born at Stanley, a little mining town in the Cariboo goldfields of British Columbia, wrote at the age of 14 the book and music of a child's operetta, which was performed for a charity and published by an English firm. At 16 she was dramatic critic and special writer for the Vancouver World, and political correspondent to two weeklies. Later, she was dramatic critic on the Examiner, at Los Angeles. She has had a play produced ("David") in California; and has written her "Personal Reminiscences of Helena Modjeska," which are to appear shortly in the Century. Before moving to Vancouver, Miss Skinner's father was a Hudson Bay Company's officer on the north Fraser river. She is not only of British birth, but her father was a cousin of Charles Reade's, and her mother's great-aunt was Lady Ann Lindsay, the author of "Auld Robin Gray."

Photo by Alfred Hughes, Strand. Mr. E. G. Buckeridge, winner of the Second Lyric Prize in our Twenty-one Guinea Prize Poem Competition.

Mr. John Masefield has written a new long poem entitled "The River," and it is to appear in the November number of The English Review.

The Montreal Gazette publishes an interview with Mr. G. B. Burgin, who has been in Canada holidaying, and looking for stories, and is now on his way back home. "Although English by birth,"

Mr. E. J. Martin, winner of the First Prize for a Sonnet on some famous Englishman

Mr. George M. Capper, winner of the Second Sonnet Prize

in our Twenty-one Guinea Prize Poem Competition

says the interviewer, "Mr. Burgin claims to be three-quarters Canadian. He has spent much of his time and most of his enjoyable moments in this country." Whence it follows that Mr. Burgin has lived an exceptionally happy life, since we know that his enjoyable moments in this country have not been few. He gave the interviewer some of his personal recollections of Dr. Drummond, whose poems of Habitant life and character are among the fine and distinctive things in Canadian literature, and remarked on the wide and growing appreciation in this country of the novel of Canadian interest—and on this subject Mr. Burgin should be a sound authority, seeing that eighteen of his own fifty novels have had the cities and outlands of Canada for their background.

Mr. W. Heinemann is publishing this autumn a biography of W. T. Stead, written by his daughter, Miss Estelle W. Stead. The book, a large part of which consists of intimate records that Mr. Stead had himself prepared, will be called "My Father: Personal and Spiritual Reminiscences."

An important book by the Rev. Norman Maclean, "Africa in Transformation," will be issued by Messrs. Nisbet about the end of October.

Photo by Whitlock & Sons.
Mr. A. S. Barnard,
winner of First Prize for a Humorous Poem
in our Twenty-one Guinea Prize Poem Competition.

Photo by W. H. Midwinter & Co., Bristol.
Mr. P. A. Fowler,
winner of Second Prize for a Humorous Poem
in our Twenty-one Guinea Prize Poem Competition.

"In the Footsteps of Borrow and FitzGerald," by Mr. Morley Adams, a book which promises some new reminiscences, will be published very shortly by Messrs. Jarrold & Sons.

A new book by Mr. F. St. Mars, "The Prowlers," will be published this month by Messrs. Nisbet. It will be illustrated by Mr. Warwick Reynolds.

Theo Douglas, whose new novel, "The Grey Countess," Messrs. Cassell are publishing, is in private life Mrs. Everett. She is the daughter of Lieut.-Colonel John Huskisson, R.M.L.I., and a grand-niece of the Rt. Hon. William Huskisson, M.P., who met his death at the opening of the Liverpool and Manchester Railway. The plot of her new book is largely concerned with Russian political intrigue, and is dominated by the sinister figure of a beautiful woman whose evil schemings bring about the disaster that makes the story's climax. Mrs. Everett has a full record of successful novels to her credit. Her first story, "A Bride Elect," was sent under the assumed name of Theo Douglas to Messrs. Macmillan, who immediately accepted and published it, after they had used it serially in Macmillan's Magazine. Since the death of her husband, Mr. J. E. Everett, in 1904, Mrs. Everett has lived in Worcestershire. The most popular of her works have been "Behind a Mask," "Iras: A Mystery," "Carr of Dimscaur," "A Lost Summer," and "Hadow of Shaws," and she is well known as a writer of serial and short stories to readers of the Graphic, Weekly Telegraph, Morning Leader, Cornhill, Quiver, the Queen, and other magazines and newspapers.

During October Mr. Grant Richards will publish Mr. Holbrook Jackson's new volume upon which that author has been at work for several years.

The book is called "The Eighteen-Nineties," and takes the form of a review of art and ideas in England during the last decade of the nineteenth century, which was one of the most interesting periods in modern art and literature. Mr. Jackson's aim has been to write an interpretative history showing the various tendencies of the time as expressed in books and pictures, and in doing so he discusses the idea of decadence, and shows in what way the period was degenerate and to what extent regenerate. There are separate chapters on such outstanding figures as Oscar Wilde, Aubrey Beardsley, John Davidson, Francis Thompson, Max Beerbohm and Bernard Shaw. Other chapters deal with special artistic phases, the scope of which may be gathered from such titles as "Shocking as a Fine Art," "The Discovery of the Celt," "Purple Patches and Fine Phrases," and "The New Dandyism." The volume will be profusely illustrated with portraits, and reproductions of the work of Aubrey Beardsley, Charles Conder, William Rothenstein, S. H. Sime, Phil May, Walter Crane, William Morris and many others.

Theo Douglas
(Mrs. Everett).

Mr. Arnold Bennett's new novel, "The Regent," will be published this month by Messrs. Methuen.

The new number of the Manchester Quarterly contains some interesting "Notes on the Portraits of Thomas De Quincey," by J. A. Green, illustrated with reproductions of some of the portraits.

Messrs. Wells, Gardner & Co. have issued the first three volumes of their "Bankside Acting Shakespeare for Schools." The books are edited by Mr. F. J. H. Darton, who successfully organised dramatic performances by L.C.C. school-children a year or two ago at the Whitechapel Art Gallery. Full directions for arranging the very simple stage that is required, directions for the actors and stage-manager as to rehearsals, costume, lighting, etc., are given in the ample introduction to each volume, which also supplies a summary of the play's plot, a list of characters, and suggestions as to the choice of actors and parts, and various useful diagrams and sketches. The plays as prepared in this series are admirably adapted to their purpose—no better acting editions for juvenile players could be desired.

"On the Face of a Star," a new volume of poems by Mr. James A. Mackereth, will be published next month by Messrs. Longman.

Mr. Edwin Pugh has completed a new novel which he is calling "The Proof of the Pudding," and Messrs. Chapman and Hall are publishing it this month.

A beautifully illustrated volume on "Stevenson's Edinburgh Days," by Miss Eve Blantyre Simpson, will be issued this month by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton. Among the many illustrations are two little-known portraits of Stevenson and an excellent portrait of his nurse, "Cummy," who died only a few weeks ago.

We are to have a complete edition of the dramatic works of Gerhart Hauptmann, edited by Mr. Edward Thomas and published by Mr. Martin Secker. The first two volumes will be published this month.

Few of our living novelists write with a finer sense of realism or a more vigorous and picturesque style than Miss Dolf Wyllarde, whose new novel, "Youth Will be Served," Mr. Stanley Paul publishes this month.

A new book by Mr. Ernest Thompson-Seton, "My Adventures among the Wild Animals of the Yellowstone," will be published this autumn by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.

The Strindberg vogue seems to be steadily increasing in this country. On another page we review five translations of his plays and stories that have been published in the last few weeks, and further volumes of the plays are in course of preparation in the edition of them that Mr. Frank Palmer publishes. Mr. Claud Field, who translated "Advent" for Messrs. Holden & Hardingham, has translated Strindberg's "Historical Miniatures" and Messrs. George Allen & Co. will publish the book forthwith.

A welcome edition to the cheap reissues of popular authors is the new "Cabinet Edition" of the works of George Eliot that Messrs. Blackwood are publishing in seventeen volumes at a shilling each. The more the critics declare that George Eliot was no great genius, and compare her unfavourably with her great contemporaries, the more the public go on buying and reading her. The time is now ripe for the critic who will recognise with enthusiasm that she was really the one supreme genius of her age. He is bound to arrive.

People of moderate incomes who want to be happy though married will look forward with interest to the appearance of Mrs. Alfred Praga's new book with the suggestive title—"Love and £200 a Year." Mr. Werner Laurie is publishing it this month.

Mr. Elkin Mathews announces a second and revised edition of Mr. Laurence Binyon's "Odes." We hear too little from Mr. Binyon nowadays, and would sooner have had a volume of new poems

Photo by I. Romanus, Paris.

Mrs. Cynthia Stockley, whose new novel, "The Dream Ship," Messrs. Constable are publishing shortly.

but failing that, a reissue of a book that contains some of his finest work is very welcome.

Another collection of Mr. A. C. Benson's essays, "Watersprings," will be issued next week by Messrs. Smith Elder.

Mr. Jack London has written the story of his recent voyaging about the world in "The Cruise of the Snark," which we are to have almost immediately from Messrs. Mills & Boon.

In the opinion of most of us Miss M. E. Braddon's two latest novels—in particular "The Green Curtain" were unquestionably two of the best if not the best two of the many novels she has written. We are glad to learn that she has completed a new story, "Miranda," for Messrs. Hutchinson, and the book is to be out in a few days.

"The Two Kisses," a new novel by Mr. Oliver Onions, will be published shortly by Messrs. Methuen.

It is seventy years since Madame Calderon de la Barca's delightful "Life in Mexico" was published in London and America; it is one of the most intimate and revealing books that have been written on the social life of that land of unrest, and has, for some years now, been out of print. Messrs. Dent

A Fruit-Seller.

Lavinia: Miss Lillah McCarthy.

Dress designs, by Albert Rothenstein, for "Androcles and the Lion," the new play by Mr. G. Bernard Shaw, that is produced to-day by Mr. Granville Barker at the St. James's Theatre.

are issuing a new edition of it in their Everyman Series, with an introduction by Mr. Henry Baerlein. Madame de la Barca was a Miss Inglis, of Edinburgh, and her book was published at the persuasion of her friend, W. H. Prescott, the historian, who wrote a short preface for it.

That quaint and interesting publication "A Broadside," compiled and illustrated by Jack B. Yeats, and published by his sister, Miss Elizabeth C. Yeats, at the Cuala Press, Dundrum, has entered upon the sixth year of its existence. The first Number of the sixth year contains "The Tin Ware Lass," a characteristic broadside ballad by P. J. McCall, with two illustrations in colour by Jack B. Yeats—one of them a particularly charming little sketch—and a vividly realistic woodcut of "The Dying Villain," by the same artist. It is all hand-done—printed in a hand-press, and then coloured by hand. Those who are interested in the revival of this curious old blend of art and literature will be delighted with the admirable work in this kind that the Cuala Press is doing.

The books by Mr. Bernard Shaw referred to in Mr. Dixon Scott's article are published by Messrs. Constable.

On October 15th we are issuing the first of a series of BOOKMAN EXTRA NUMBERS, each to be devoted entirely to some famous author. This first is a Robert Louis Stevenson Number, and contains over two hundred pages, including essays and poems on Stevenson and his work by distinguished writers, and over a hundred illustrations. Among the literary contents (a considerable part of which is reprinted from early numbers of THE BOOKMAN that are in constant demand but have long been out of print) are poems and personal or critical articles by Sir J. M. Barrie, William Watson, Edmund Gosse, C. B., Austin Dobson, Sir W. Robertson Nicoll, S. R. Crockett, Eve Blantyre Simpson, Ian Maclaren, H. C. Beeching, Alice Gordon, Charles Lowe, Y. Y., Neil Munro, and an article by Stevenson himself on "Books that Influenced Me." The illustrations comprise numerous portraits, from paintings, drawings and photographs, of Stevenson and his friends, photographs and sketches of places associated with him, and drawings of scenes from his books, including a photogravure frontispiece portrait, and eight plates beautifully reproduced in colour. The number is a well-bound, handsomely-produced volume, all the illustrations being separate from the text and printed on special art paper. The price will be 5s. net. As we anticipate a very large demand for this Number we would urge our readers to place their orders for it at once.

The Booksellers' Diary.

LIST OF FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

September 1st to October 1st, 1913.

Messrs. George Allen & Co., Ltd.

ALLEN, DAITHNE.—The Birth of the Opal. 4s. net.
FORD, GEORGE.—The Hoop of Gold. 6s. net.
GAULTIER, PAUL.—The Meaning of Art. Translated by H. and E. Baldwin. 5s. net.
GRAYLING, FRANCIS.—Kent Churches. 2 vols. ("County Churches" Series.) 2s. 6d. net, each.
KITCHIN, DARCY B.—Bergson for Beginners. 5s. net.
MAETERLINCK, MAURICE.—My Dog. New Edition. Translated by A. Teixeira de Mattos. Illustrated by Cecil Aldin. 4s. 6d. net.
MONTAGU-SMITH, F.—Railway Rate Book: 1.—For Coal and Iron Trades. 4s. 5s. net. II.—Class Rates and Exceptionals. 4s. 3s. net.
REDWOOD, ANDERSON J.—Flemish Tales. 4s. 6d. net.
ROGERS, W. T.—Dictionary of Abbreviations. 7s. 6d. net.
SABEN, GREGORY.—Born of a Woman. 6s. net.
STRINDBERG, AUGUST.—Historical Miniatures. Translated by Claud Field. 5s. net.
WALTERS, DR. F. R.—Sanatoria for the Tuberculous. Fourth Edition. Entirely re-written. 12s. 6d. net.
WEEKS, KENNETH.—Dramatic Inventions. (Five Plays.) 4s. net.

Mr. B. T. Batsford.

AMBLER, LOUIS, F.R.I.B.A.—Old Halls and Manor Houses of Yorkshire. Illustrated in a series of 120 examples on 100 Colotype plates, reproduced from Photographs specially taken, chiefly by Horace Dan, Architect. Price (approximate) £1 11s. 6d. net.
FENN, FREDERICK, and WYLLIE, B.—Old English Furniture. 94 Illustrations. 6s. net.
FRANTZ, HENRI.—French Pottery and Porcelain. 77 Illustrations (7 of which are in colour), including a series of the Marks and Monograms. 6s. net.
HOOPER, JOHN.—Handcraft in Wood and Metal. A Handbook of Training in the Practical Working of these Materials. For the use of Teachers, Students, Craftsmen, and others. With over 300 Illustrations from the Authors' Drawings and from Photographs. Price (approximate) 7s. 6d. net.
KNOWLES, W. PITCAIRN.—Dutch Pottery and Porcelain. 54 Illustrations (18 of which are in colour), including a series of the Marks. 6s. net.
RICHARDSON, A. E.—Monumental Architecture in England. As exemplified by the Neo-classic Buildings of the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries. Illustrated by 80 Plates, reproduced from specially taken Photographs and from Drawings, in addition to many Illustrations in the text. 44 4s. net.
SAGLIO, ANDRÉ.—French Furniture. 59 Illustrations. 6s. net.

Messrs. A. & C. Black.

ALLEN, PHOEBE.—Peeps at Architecture. ("The Peeps" Series.) 1s. 6d. net.
BAIKIE, REV. JAMES, F.R.A.S.—Peeps at the Royal Navy. ("The Peeps" Series.) 1s. 6d. net.
BARNARD, H. CLIVE, M.A., B.Litt.—Pictures of Famous Travel. (Books for Young People.) 1s. 6d.
BELL, R. S. WARREN.—The Mystery of Markham: A School Story. (Books for Young People.) 3s. 6d.
ELIAS, FRANK.—The Gorgeous East. ("The Peeps" Series.) 3s. 6d. net.
ELMHIRST, RICHARD, F.L.S.—Naturalist at the Sea-Shore ("The Peeps" Series.) 1s. 6d. net.
FARRER, REGINALD.—The Dolomites. 7s. 6d. net.
FAIRFORD, FORD.—Cuba. ("The Peeps" Series.) 1s. 6d. net.
FINNEMORE, JOHN.—France. (Peeps at History.) ("The Peeps" Series.) 1s. 6d. net.
FINNEMORE, JOHN.—Germany. (Peeps at History.) ("The Peeps" Series.) 1s. 6d. net.
FOORD, EDWARD, and HOME, GORDON.—England Invaded. 6s. net.
GARNETT, LUCY M. J.—Greek Wonder Tales. 6s. (Books for Young People.)
GRIERSON, ELIZABETH.—Sir Walter Scott (Peeps at Great Men.) ("The Peeps" Series.) 1s. 6d. net.
GUDGON, W. W.—British North Borneo. ("The Peeps" Series.) 1s. 6d. net.
HADATH, GUNBY.—The Feats of Foyle. Books for Young People. 3s. 6d.
HALL, REV. CHAS. A. F.R.M.S.—Reptiles and Amphibians. ("Peeps at Nature.") ("The Peeps" Series.) 1s. 6d. net.
HAMILAND, M. D.—Wild Life on the Wing. 5s. net.
HERBERT, AGNES.—The Moose. 4s. net.
HOME, BEATRICE.—Peeps at Royal Palaces of Great Britain. ("The Peeps" Series.) 1s. 6d. net.
KEESEY, WALTER M.—Cambridge ("Artists' Sketch Book" Series.) 1s. net.
MALCOLMSON, A. M., M.D.—Laws of Health for Schools. 1s. 6d. net.
MANWELL, CAPT. AYMER.—Pheasants and Covert Shooting. 7s. 6d. net.
MITTON, G. E.—In the Grip of the Wild Wa. (Books for Young People.) 3s. 6d.
MITTON, G. E.—The P. & O. (Peeps at Great Steamship Lines.) ("The Peeps" Series.) 1s. 6d. net.
MORRIS, WILLIAM.—Tales from "The Farthly Paradise" (Books for Young People.) 6s.
RICHARDS, FRED.—Oxford. ("Artists' Sketch Book" Series.) 1s. net.
SCOTT, SIR WALTER.—Waverley Novels. Portrait Edition. 25 vols. 1s. net per vol.
SCOTT, SIR WALTER.—The Arabian Nights. Illustrated in Colour. (Books for Young People.) 6s.

SHERWOOD, MRS.—The Fairchild Family. Illustrated in Colour. (Books for Young People). 6s.
TODD, PROF. JOHN A.—The Banks of the Nile. 20s. net.
WALTER, L. EDNA. B.Sc.—Norse and Lapp (Life and Legends of Other Lands.) (Books for Young People) 1s. 6d. net.
WESTERMAN, PERCY F.—The Scouts of Seal Island. (Books for Young People) 3s. 6d.
STEWART, HUGH—Provincial Russia. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. William Blackwood & Sons.

BUCHAN, JOHN.—Andrew Jameson, Lord Ardwell 5s. net.
ECCOTT, W. J.—The Mercenary: A Tale of the Thirty Years' War. 6s.
ELIOT, GEORGE.—George Eliot's Novels. New Cabinet Edition in 17 Volumes. 1s. net per volume.
CROSTHWAITE, SIR CHARLES, K.C.S.I.—Thakur Purbub Singh, and other Tales. 6s.
GILSON, C. L.—Scenes from a Subaltern's Life. 6s.
GRIER, SYDNEY C.—Writ in Water. Illustrated by A. Pearce 6s.
MUNRO, NEIL.—Fancy Farm. Uniform Edition 3s. 6d.
PURVIS, SIR ROBERT.—Sir William Arrol. A Memoir. 5s. net.
THOMSON, C. E., I.M.S., LIEUT.-COLONEL, S. J.—The Silent India. Being Tales and Sketches of the Masses. Illustrated 10s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Cassell & Co.

ASKEW, ALICE and CLAUDE.—A Preacher of the Lord 3s. 6d.
BURGOYNE, ALAN, M.P.—What of the Navy? 5s. net.
CHESTERTON, G. K.—The Evil of Eugenics. 6s. net.
COOK, W. HUBERT.—The Cragsmen 3s. 6d.
DEEPPING, WARTICK.—The White Gate 6s.
DUNCAN, F. MARTIN, I.R.M.S., F.R.P.S.—Cassell's Natural History. 9s. net.
FRASER, JOHN FOSTER.—The Land of Veiled Women 1s. net.
GARVIE, REV. ALFRED E., M.A., D.D.—Can We Still Follow Jesus? 7s. 6d. net.
GRAHAM-WHITE, CLAUDE, and HARPER, HARRY.—The An King's Treasure 3s. 6d.
HARRIS, ADMIRAL SIR R. H., K.C.M.G., K.C.B.—From Naval Cadet to Admiral. 12s. net.
HOCKING, JOSEPH.—The Spirit of the West 1s. 6d.
KNOX, GORDON D.—All About Engineering 6s.
MACWHIRTER, JOHN, R.A.—Sketches from Nature 6s. net.
SMITH, NELLIE.—The Three Gifts of Life 2s. net.
SOUTAR, ANDREW.—Maggie House 6s.
STEVENSON, ROBERT LOUIS.—Kidnapped 7s. 6d. net.
SWAN, ANNIE.—Prairie Fires 6s.
WALLACE, DR. RUSSEL.—The Revolt of Democracy. 1s. 6d.

Messrs. Chapman & Hall.

BROWN, VINCENT.—The Vulgar Lover 6s.
COKE, DESMOND.—The Chaps of Hurlton. 2s. 6d. net.
ECKEL, J. C.—A Dickens Bibliography. 10s. 6d. net, and £1 1s. net.
GOULDSBURY, COL. C. E.—Tiger Land 7s. 6d. net.
GRAHAM, BERTHA.—The Spoiling of the Broth, and other Plays. 1s. 6d. net and 2s. 6d. net.
HAMMOND, FRANCIS.—The Magic Five. 6s.
HOWARD, KFBLE.—Lord London. 6s.
HUNT, W. HOLMAN.—Pre-Raphaelitism and the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood 2 vols. £1 1s. net.
MAYNE, ETHEL COLBURN.—Gold Lace. 6s.
MOORE, CECILIA.—The Shadow of the Dragon 2s. 6d. net.
PAIN, MRS. HARRY.—The Nine of Diamonds, and other Plays. 1s. 6d. net, and 2s. 6d. net.
PUGH, EDWIN.—The Proof of the Pudding 6s.
REYNOLDS, MRS. FRED.—The Woman Plinths 6s.
SCHUSTA, ROSF.—The Road to Victory. 6s.
SIMPSON, VIOLET A.—Flower of the Golden Heart 6s.
SMITH, NOWELL.—Members One of Another. 5s. net.
THURSTON, E. TEMPLE.—Richard Fouleng 6s.
THURSTON, E. TEMPLE.—The City of Beautiful Nonsense. 6s. net.
WOODWARD, W. H.—Caesare Borgia. 12s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Chatto & Windus.

CAVZIONI, ESTHER A., and ROIDE, ELEANOR.—Piedmont. Illustrated. 21s. net and 31s. 6d. net.
HALL, BOLTON.—What Twelveton Taught 6s. net.
HAMILTON, COSMO.—The Door that has no Key. A Novel. 6s.
HUNT, VIOLET, and HUEFFER FORD MADON.—The Desirable Alien at Home in Germany. 6s.
MARSH, RICHARD.—Justice Suspended. A Novel. 6s.
NEWTE, HORACE W. C.—The Home of the Seven Devils. A Novel 6s.
PARRY, H. LLOYD.—The Founding of Exeter School 5s. net.
PENNY, F. E.—Love in the Hills. A Novel 6s.
POESLAND, JOHN.—Belshazzar. A Drama 5s. net.
ROWLANDS, EFFIE ADELAUDE.—The Price She Paid. A Novel 6s.
SPIELMANN, MRS. M. H.—The Rainbow Book. Cheaper Edition 2s. 6d. net.
SYRETT, NETTA.—Barbara of the Thorn. A Novel 6s.
VAN VORST, MARIE.—Fairfax and his Pride. A Novel 6s.

Messrs. T. & T. Clark.

AKED, REV. CHAS. F., D.D.—The Divine Drama of Job (The "Short Course" Series.) 2s. net.
ALLEN, ARCHDEACON WILLOUGHBY C., M.A., and GRESNID, REV. I. W., D.D.—Introduction to the Books of the New Testament.
CHARLES, PROF. R. H., D.Litt.—Studies in the Apocalypse.
GORDON, PROF. ALEX. R., D.Litt.—The Poetry and Wisdom of the Old Testament. (Primers for Teachers and Senior Bible Class Students.) 6d. net.
NAIRNE, PROF. ALEX., B.D.—The Epistle of Priesthood. Studies in the Epistle to the Hebrews.
SAYCE, PROF. A. H., LL.D.—The Religion of Ancient Egypt. (A Revised Edition of the first part of his work "The Religions of Ancient Egypt and Babylonia")
VAUGHAN, CANON J., M.A.—A Mirror of the Soul (The "Short Course" Series.) 2s. net.
WALKER, REV. W. L.—Christ the Creative Ideal. Studies in Colossians and Ephesians.
WELCH, PROP. ADAM C., D.D.—The Story of Joseph (The "Short Course" Series.) 2s. net.
WINSTANLEY, REV. E. W., D.D.—Jesus and the Future.

Messrs. W. B. Clive & Sons.

CHAYTOR, REV. H. J., M.A., and TRUELOVE, H. L., B.A.—Preliminary French Course.
CRACKNELL, A. G., M.A., B.Sc.—Algebra for Matriculation.
CRACKNELL, A. G., M.A., B.Sc.—Junior Geometry.
HODGKISON, E. G., B.A.—Preliminary Geography.
LOWSON, I. M., M.A., B.Sc., F.L.S., and WILLIS, MRS.—Indian Botany.
WALMSLEY, A. M., M.A.—Preliminary English Course.

Messrs. J. M. Dent & Son.

THE COLLECTION GALLIA. Edited by Dr. Charles Sarratea. 1s. net.
I.—Balzac. "Contes Philosophiques." Introduction de Paul Bourget.
II.—L'imitation de Jésus Christ. Introduction de M. de la Motte.
III.—Alfred de Musset. Poésies Nouvelles. IV.—Pensées de Pascal. Texte de Brunschvigg. Préface de Emile Montoux. Introduction de Victor Giraud.
V.—La Princesse de Clèves. Par Madame de la Fayette. Introduction par Madame Lucie Félix Faure-Govau.
VI.—Gustave Flaubert. La Tentation de Saint Antoine. Introduction de Emile Faguet.
VII.—Maurice Barres. "L'Ennemi des Loix." VIII.—Balzac. "Père Goriot." Introduction de Emile Faguet.
IX.—Etienne Lamy. "La Femme de Demain." X.—La Fontaine. Fables.

Mr. A. C. Fifield.

BROOKS, VAN WYCK.—The Malady of the Ideal. Essays on some Mystics. 2s. net.
BUTLER, SAMUEL.—The Fair Haven. New Edition. With Introduction by R. A. Streatfeild. 5s. net.
BUTLER, SAMUEL.—The Humour of Homer and Other Essays. With Portrait and Biographical Sketch. By H. Festing Jones. 5s. net.
MOODIE, W. W.—The Tour of a Socialist Round the World. 3s. net.
WELLS, H. G.—The Discovery of the Future. 1s. net.

Messrs. Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.

BARNETT, JOHN.—The New Guv'nor.
CLAYTON, JOSEPH.—Father Stanton: A Memoir. Paper, 1s. net; Cloth, 2s. net.
WALMSLEY, ELIZABETH.—A White Passion. Cloth, 6s.

Messrs. Greening & Co.

'A POPULAR NOVELIST.'—Novels from Shakespeare: The Merchant of Venice. 6s.
BRADY, CYRUS TOWNSEND.—The Blue Ocean's Daughter. 6d.
GULL, C. RANGER.—Benvenuto Cellini. 6s.
SHAW, CAPT. FRANK.—The Love Tides. 6s.

Messrs. G. G. Harrap & Co.

ANDREWS, JAMES C.—Iords' Men of Littlebourne. 2s. 6d. net.
CANTON, WILLIAM (Edited by)—Children's Savings. 1s. net.
CHAPMAN, J. D., M.A.—Horace and His Poetry. ("Poetry and Life" Series.) 1s. net.
CHASE, LEWIS N.—Poe and His Poetry ("Poetry and Life" Series.) 1s. net.
CUTHBERTSON, WILLIAM.—The Voyage of the Argonauts. Velvet Calf, 3s. 6d. net.
EDMUNDS, E. W., M.A.—Pope and His Poetry. ("Poetry and Life" Series.) 1s. net.
GALK, NORMAN.—Country Lyrics. Simili Vellum, 6d. net.
LEASK, G. A.—A Little Book of Toasts and Maxims 1s. net.
LEASK, G. A.—Stories of Some Famous Hymns. Simili Vellum, 6d. net.
NIVEDITA, SISTER, and COOMARASWAMY, ANANDA.—Myths of the Hindus and Buddhists. 15s. net.
OLCOTT, FRANCIS.—The Arabian Nights. 5s. net.
ROBERTSON, WILLIAM (Selected by).—The Golden Book of English Sonnets. 5s. 6d. net.
SMEATON, OLIPHANT, M.A.—Langfellow and His Poetry. ("Poetry and Life" Series.) 1s. net.
WEST, MICHAEL.—Claidelune 10s. 6d. net.
WEIRER, LOUIS, R.B.A.—The Story of Edinburgh Castle. 20s. net.

Messrs. Headley Bros.

BLAKE, NORA W.—Stories of Jesus (Teachers and Taught Textbooks.) 1s. net, cloth lump; 1s. 6d. net, cloth boards.
CARNIE, ETHEL.—The Lamp Girl, and other Stories.
GRAVESON, C. C., B.A.—Lessons on the Kingdom of Israel. (Teachers and Taught Textbooks.) 1s. net, cloth lump; 1s. 6d. net, cloth boards.
GRAVESON, C. C., B.A.—Lessons on the Kingdom of Judah. 1s. net, cloth lump; 1s. 6d. net, cloth boards.
GRAVESON, C. C., B.A.—Lessons on the Jewish People (Teachers and Taught Textbooks.) 1s. net, cloth lump; 1s. 6d. net, cloth boards.
HOWARD, M. C.—Amelia the Promp. 2s. 6d. net.
REYNOLDS, FLORENCE B.—Jesus, the Hero. (Teachers and Taught Textbooks.) 1s. net, cloth lump; 1s. 6d. net, cloth boards.
ROWNTREE, M. L., B.A., and HIBBERT, G. K., M.A., B.D.—The Period of the Conquest and Judges. (Teachers and Taught Textbooks.) 1s. net, cloth lump; 1s. 6d. net, cloth boards.
SALTER, JOHN H., D.Sc.—Bird Life in England.
SOPHER, GEORGE (Illustrated by)—Arabian Nights. Children's Edition. 5s.
WOOD, LLEANOR D., M.A.—Life and Ministry of Paul the Apostle. 9d. paper; 2s. 6d. cloth.
WRIGHT, WALTER P.—Garden Trees and Shrubs. 12s. 6d. net.

Mr. Wm. Heinemann.

ANDERSON, W. MONRO.—Rhymes of a Rouseabout. 3s. 6d. net.
CASEY, SADIE.—Indiscretions of Dr. Carstairs. 6s.
CASEY, SADIE.—Jobby Ann. 6s.
CATHIE, W. S.—Old Pioneers. 6s.
DAWSON, CONINGSBY.—The Garden Without Walls. 6s.
GOBINEAU, ARTHUR COUNTESS.—The Renaissance. 10s. net.
HALL, GERT RUDOLPH.—The Truth about Camilla. 6s.
HILLSTON, JOHN.—Poems.
KEATING, JOSEPH.—The Perfect Wife. 6s.
MASFILL, JOHN.—The Daffodil Fields. 1s. net.
REVERMORE, J. A.—Marrying of Heter Ramsbrook. 6s.
TOYL, FRANCIS.—Diana and Two Symphonies. 6s.
WILLOUGHBY, G.—The Victim. 6s.

Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.

KEARTON, CHERRY.—Wild Life Across the World. 20s. net.
HOOPER, L. D., CHARLES F.—The Game Fishes of the World. 20s. net.
ROUMANIA, CROWN PRINCESS OF.—The Lily of Life. 10s. 6d. net.
NICOLL, J. L. D., SIR W. R.—A Bookman's Letters. 4s. 6d. net.
STALKER, PROFESSOR JAMES.—How to Read Shakespeare. 3s. 6d.
ALDERSON, MAJOR GENERAL.—Pink and Scarlet. 15s. net.
BENNETT, ARNOLD.—The Plain Man and His Wife. 2s. 6d.
MARSHALL, H. E.—A History of Germany. 7s. 6d. net.
SIMPSON, F. B.—R. L. Stevenson's Edinburgh Days. 6s. net.
THARP, CAPTAIN THOMAS.—Red Roy. 6s. net.
KELLER, HELEN.—Out of the Dark. 5s.
CAFFIN CHARLES.—How to Study the Old Masters. 6s. net.
CAFFIN CHARLES.—How to Study Modern Painters. 6s. net.

Fiction.

MACNAUGHTAN, S.—Snow Upon the Desert.
CATHROP, DION CLAYTON.—A Trap to Catch a Dream.
OXENHAM, JOHN.—Red Wrath.
REX BEACH.—The Iron Trail.
SAUNDERS, MRS. BAILLIE.—A Prince's Shadow.
CROCKETT, S. R.—A Tatter of Scarlet.
BURGIN, G. B.—The Love that Lasts.
SWAYNE, MARTIN.—Cupid Goes North.
ADAMS, S. HOPKINS.—The Secret of Lonesome Cove.
ANONYMOUS.—My Wife's Hidden Life.
FREEMAN, AUSTIN.—The Unwilling Adventurer.
GATES, ELEANOR.—The Poor Little Rich Girl.
GERARD, MORICE.—Heart of a Hero.
MARCHMONT, A. W.—When Love Called.
MAGNAY, SIR WM.—The Players.
OPPENHEIM, E. PHILLIPS.—The Mischief Maker.
STUART, J. A.—Grip of the Past.
SUTNER, BARONESS VON.—Disarm.
MARJORIE, ROYCE.—Dinah Leaves School.

Messrs. Holden & Hardingham.

ADAM, H. L.—Police Work from Within. 6s.
BATES, E. KATHARINE.—The Boomerang. 6s.
BRETON, FARREN LE.—Fruits of Pleasure. 6s.

BYNG, HON. MRS. JULIAN.—Ann of the Marshland. 6s.
CRAIG, REV. THOMAS, LL.D.—Apostolic Religious Instruction. 6s.
CROKER, MRS. B. M.—Jungle Tales. 7d. net.
GALLICHAH, WALTER M.—Like Stars that Fall. 2s. net.
HOLLIS, GERTRUDE.—Love's Victory. 6s.
KENYON, E. C.—Ashes of Honour. 6d.
KENYON, E. C.—The Mystery of Blackstone Mine. 6d.
MACKENZIE, COL. S. F.—Wild Flowers and How to Tell Them at a Glance. Cloth, 2s. net; paper covers, 7d. net.
NEWTE, H. W. C.—The Red Rose. New Edition. 1s.
STANTON, CORALIE, and HOSKEN, HEATH.—Tears of Desire. 6d.
STANTON, CORALIE, and HOSKEN, HEATH.—The Love that Kills. 6d.
WYLLARDE, DOLF.—Where the Lotus Blooms. 7d. net.

Messrs. Hurst & Blackett.

ASKEW, ALICE and CLAUDE.—Freedom. 6s.
BODKIN, M. M'DONNELL, K.C.—Recollections of an Irish Judge. 16s. net.
BONSALL, STEPHEN.—The American Mediterranean. 12s. 6d. net.
COLLISON, WILLIAM.—The Life Story of. Told by Himself. 16s. net.
HALL, H. FIELDING.—The Passing of Empire. 10s. 6d. net.
HOLLAND, CLIVE.—The Lovers of Mademoiselle. 6s.
LEROUX, GASTON.—The Mysterious Mr. Noct. 6s.
MARRIOTT, CHARLES.—Subsoil. 6s.
McARTHY, JUSTIN HUNTLY.—Fool of April. 6s.
PAGE, GERTRUDE.—Where the Strange Roads go Down. 6s.
ROWLANDS, H. C.—The Closing Net. 6s.
SLADEN, DOUGLAS.—The Hope at Home. 1s. net.
SLADEN, DOUGLAS, and POTTER, OLAVE M.—Weeds. 6s.
WRIGHT, R. L., and DIGBY, BASSETT.—Through Siberia. 10s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Hutchinson & Co.

BARLOW, JANE.—Doings and Dealings, Observed in Ireland. 6s.
BENSON, ROBERT HUGH.—Initiation. 6s.
BRADDON, M. E.—Miranda. 6s.
CARRUTHERS, DOUGLAS.—Unknown Mongolia. With three Chapters on Sport by J. K. Miller, F.Z.S. In 2 vols. 24s. net.
EDWARDS, TICKNER.—Tansy. 6s.
EVERETT-GREEN, EVELYN.—Marcus Quayle, M.D. 6s.
FRASER, MRS. HUGH.—Italian Yesterdays. 16s. net.
FRASER, MRS. HUGH and STAHLMANN, J. I.—The Honour of the House. 6s.
FROBENIUS, LEO.—The Voice of Africa. Translated by Rudolph Blind. In 2 vols. 28s. net.
GIBBS, PHILIP.—The Custody of the Child. 6s.
HALL, H. FIELDING.—Margaret's Book. Illustrated Gift Book for Children. 7s. 6d. net.
HJESTBERG, E. W.—Athletics in Theory and Practice. 3s. 6d.
HOLDSWORTH, ANNIE E.—The Book of Anna. 6s.
HUTTEN, BARONESS VON.—Happy House. 6s.
JEPSON, EDGAR.—Garthvie Gardens. 6s.
L'HOPITAL, W. DE.—Westminster Cathedral and its Architect. 32s. net.
MALET, LUCAS.—The Education of Damianus Verity. 6s.
MOORE, F. FRANKFORT.—The Rescue of Martha. 6s.
MOREUX, THE ABBE.—A Day in the Moon. 3s. 6d.
PAPE, FRANK (Illustrated by).—The Book of Psalms. 10s. 6d. net.
RAPHAEL, JOHN N.—Up Above. 2s. net.
RHODES, KATHLYN.—The Making of a Soul. 6s.
SCHUMACHER, HENRY.—Nelson's Last Love. 6s.
SERJEANT, PHILIP W.—Mrs. Jordan's Child of Nature. 16s. net.
STACPOOLE, MRS. H. DE VERE.—London. 6s.
SOMERVILLE, H. B.—Ashes of Vengeance. 6s.
STACPOOLE, H. DE VERE.—The Children of the Sea. An Icelandic Romance. 6s.
STACPOOLE, H. DE VERE (Translator).—The Poems of François Villon. 7s. 6d.
STOCK, RALPH.—Marama. A Tale of the South Seas. 6s.
TAYLOR, T. A.—The Life of James IV. 10s. 6d. net.
TWEEDIE, MRS. ALEC.—America as I Saw It. 16s. net.
WARD, MRS. WILFRID.—Horace Blake. 6s.
WILLIAMS, OAKLEY (Edited by).—The Works of P. A. de Laszlo. With an Essay by Comte Robert de Montesquieu. Also an Edition de Luxe. With 6 extra Plates in Colour. £18 18s. net.

Messrs. Jarrold & Sons.

BARTON, FRANK TOWNEND, M.R.C.V.S.—Dogs, their Selection Keeping and Breeding. Fully Illustrated with 32 Plates. 3s. 6d. net.
BARTON, FRANK TOWNEND, M.R.C.V.S.—Some Sporting Dogs. With 12 Coloured Plates by G. Vernon Stokes. 3s. 6d. net.
BATE, JOHN.—A Cyclopædia of Moral and Religious Truths. 1,000 pages. Sixteenth Edition. 7s. 6d.
COKE, D. F.—The Dog from Clarkson's: A Novel. 2s. net.
HENDERSON, EDITH.—The Legends of the Stars. Told to the Children. Fully Illustrated. 2s. 6d. net.
JACBERNS, RAYMOND.—A Handful of Rebels. Illustrated by Charles Norman. 2s. 6d.
MACKIE, JOHN.—The Great Antarctic. Illustrated by F. F. Hiley. 3s. 6d.
PHIPSON, C. E.—The Countryside Calendar. Illustrated. 1s. net.
SAUNDERS, MARSHALL.—Beautiful Joe. Illustrated by Charles Copeland. 3s. 6d. net.
SAUNDERS, MARSHALL.—My Pets. Illustrated in Colour by Charles Copeland. 1s. 6d. net.
SEWELL, ANNA.—Black Beauty. Illustrated with 12 Plates in Colour by Maude Scrivener. 3s. 6d. net.
STABLES, GORDON.—Sable and White: the Life Story of a Show Dog. With Illustrations by Harrison Weir. 3s. 6d.
THOMPSON, L.—Rev, or Winning the Victoria Cross. Illustrated by Charles Norman. 2s. 6d.
TIDDEMAN, L. E.—Tixie and her Trio. With 5 Illustrations by Bertram Gilbert. 2s. 6d.
WARD, J. J., F.R.S.—Insect Biographies with Pen and Camera. Illustrated with nearly 200 Photographs in duo tone and Collotype taken from living specimens. 6s. net.
WESTERMAN, PERCY.—The Stolen Cruiser. Illustrated by Charles Norman. 3s. 6d.
WORTLEY, ISABEL.—The Elf and her Friends. Fully Illustrated. 3s. 6d.
YORKE, CURTIS.—A Memory Incarnate. A Novel. 2s. net.
YORKE, CURTIS.—Rungay of Handiloo. A Novel. 2s. net.
YORKE, CURTIS.—Hush: A Novel. 2s. net.

Mr. Herbert Jenkins.

"ANONYMOUS."—The Sale of Lady Davenport. 6s.
"CHEIRO."—Guide to the Hand. 2s. 6d. net.
DONOYER, ALPHONSE.—The Public Prosecutor of the Terror, Antoine Quentin Fouquier-Tinville. 12s. 6d. net.
HILL, DOCTOR ALEX.—Round the British Empire. 2s. 6d. net.
THIS, DOCTOR JENS.—Leonardo da Vinci. 42s. net.

Mr. T. Werner Laurie.

AUTHOR OF "THE ADVENTURES OF JOHN JOHNS."—Tantalus. 6s.
BRANDON, LIEUT. V. (Translated into English by).—Goethe's Hermann and Dorothea. 3s. 6d. net.
D'AUVERGNE, R. B.—The Night of Memory. 6s.
DAWE, CARLTON.—The Shadow of Evil. 6s.

HAUPTMANN, GERHART.—Atlantis. 6s.
MACDONALD, WM. M.S. Agr., Sc.D., Ph.D.—The Conquest of the Desert. 7s. 6d. net.
Mrs. Edward's Cookery Book. 2s. 6d. net.
PAVE, THOMAS NELSON.—The Land of the Spirit. 6s.
PRAGA, MRS. ALFRED.—Love and Love a Year. 2s. net.
THOMPSON, J. S.—China Revolutionized. 12s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co.

COLE, GRENVILLE A. J.—Outlines of Mineralogy for Geological Students.
JAMES, M. R., Litt.D.—Old Testament Legends, being Stories out of some of the Less-known Apocryphal Books of the Old Testament. With 10 Illustrations by H. J. Ford. 3s. 6d. net.
KEIGHLEY, T.—A Manual of Music for use in Training Colleges and Secondary Schools.
MACE, REV. J. H. B.—Henry Jodley Bromby, Hon. Canon of Bristol Cathedral and Vicar of All Saints, Clifton; sometime Dean of Hobart, Tasmania. A Memoir.
MACY, S. B.—The Hymn Book of the Ages, being the Book of Psalms with a Short Commentary. 3s. 6d. net.
MACY, S. B.—The Prince of Peace. With 21 Illustrations. 3s. 6d. net.
MARCHAND, ANNAHEILA BRUCE.—Dark South African. A Story.
M'LACHLAN, NORMAN.—Practical Mathematics for Students attending Evening and Day Technical Classes.
MOAKES, K. K.—Written English and the Way to Write. With a Preface by Sara A. Burstall.
PAGE, VERY REV. EDWARD CLARENCE, D.D. (Dean of Calgary, Canada)—Memoir of the Hon. Sir Charles Paget, G.C.H., 1778-1849. With a Short History of the Paget Family. With Illustrations. 3s. 6d. net.
SIMPSON, REV. W. J. SPARKOW, D.D.—Non-communicating Attendance.
STANISLAUS, REV. FATHER.—Life of the Viscountess de Bonnaville d'Houet Foundress of the Society of the Faithful Companions of Jesus, 1781-1858. Translated from the French. With Prefaces by His Eminence Cardinal Bouine, Archbishop of Westminster, and by the Right Rev. Abbot Gasquet, President of the English Benedictines. With 46 Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.
SWANN, FREDERIC.—A Primer of English Citizenship for use in Schools.
TEARLE, CHRISTIAN.—The Pilgrim from Chicago. being more Rambles with an American. With 24 Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.
THISTLETON, FRANK.—Modern Violin Technique: How to Acquire it, How to Teach it. With Illustrations. 4s. 6d. net.
WISE, B. R.—The Making of the Australian Commonwealth (1889-1900). 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Lynwood & Co.

BARLOW, HILARE.—The Sentence of the Judge. Cheap Edition. 1s. net.
DONEYAN, LIFUT COLONEL J. D. I., R.A.M.C.—Rag Time. Poems of Military Life. Suitable for recitation. Second and Cheap Edition. 6d. net.
FLIMING, NOEL.—Sparks that Brood: A Novel. 6s.
GREY, G. DUNCAN, LL.D.—A Venture in Variety. Poems and Essays. 2s. 6d. net.
HOLLAND, CLIVE.—A Madonna of the Poor, and Other Stories. 6s.
LEWIS, MRS. LEWIS.—Mr. Master. A Novel. Cheap Edition. 1s. net.
LEITH, MRS. DISNEY.—Lachlan's Widow. A Novel. 6s.
OULTON, I.—Exceeding Pleasant, and Other Sketches. 10 Illustrations. 6s.
REEKS, H. CAULTON.—The Taming of the Terror. A Story of a Feud. 6s.
SYMONS, MAJOR F. A.—Prince John of Streplitz. A Novel. 6s.

Mr. Elkin Mathews.

BINYON, LAURENCE.—Odes. Second Edition revised. 2s. 6d. net.
DARISHIRE, R. SHILBY.—A Holiday in Verse. 2s. 6d. net.
DAVIES, WILLIAM H.—Foliage. Various Poems. 2s. 6d. net.
HESLETTINE, MICHAEL.—Poems. 1s. net.
MASEFIELD, JOHN.—Ballads and Poems. Uniform Edition. 3s. 6d. net.
O'CONNOR, NORREYS JEPHSON.—Celtic Memories and other Poems. 1s. net, and 1s. 6d. net.
ROLT-WHEELER, ETHEL.—Ireland's Veils and other Poems. 1s. net, and 1s. 6d. net.
TAYLOR, JOHN C.—The Northern Sea: A Legend of the Norwegian Fjords and the North Cape. With 10 Illustrations. 1s. net and 1s. 6d. net.
WEAVING, WILL OUGHEY.—Poems. 2s. 6d. net.
WILLIAMS, WILLIAM CARLOS.—Tempest Poems. 1s. net.

Messrs. Methuen & Co.

ADCOCK, A. ST. JOHN.—The Booklover's London. Illustrated by Frederick Adcock. 6s.
AUTHOR OF "THE STREET (ALL) STRAIGHT"—The Way Home. 6s.
BAILLY, H. C.—The Sea Captain. 6s.
BENNETT, ARNOLD.—The Regent. 6s.
BERKMAN, ALGERNON.—Aviation. 10s. 6d. net.
BERMINGHAM, G. A.—The Search Party. 1s. net.
BOWEN, MARJORIE.—The Governor of England. 6s.
BRIDGER, A. J.—Minds in Distress. 2s. 6d. net.
CARNIE, FRIEL.—Miss Nobody. 6s.
CASTLE, AGNES and ELLIOT.—The Golden Broom. 6s.
CHANDLEY, CHAS.—Gas Testing and Air Measurement. 1s. 6d.
CONRAD, JOSEPH.—Chance. 6s.
CRAWLEY, A. F.—The Book of the Ball. 3s. 6d. net.
GIBSON, EDWARD.—Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. Edited by Prof. Bury. Vol. 7. 10s. 6d. net.
HALIFAX, ROBERT.—The White Thread. 6s.
HISLE, DAVID.—What I Love? 6s.
LITTLEWOOD, S. B.—The Times—Here and Now. 2s. 6d. net.
LOWNDES, MRS. BELLOC.—The Lodger. 6s.
LUCAS, E. V.—Harvest Home. 1s. net.
LUCAS, E. V.—The Open Road. Illustrated Edition. 13s. net.
LYNCH, J. G. BOHUN.—The Complete Boxer. 6s. net.
MOBFREY, L. G.—Man and Woman. 6s.
MUSSABINI, S. A.—The Complete Athletic Trainer. 4s. net.
NICHOLSON, D. S. H.—Poems. 2s. 6d. net.
ONIONS, OLIVER.—The Two Kisses. 6s.
RIDGE, W. PETER.—A Son of the State. 7d. net.
SHAKESPEARE, W.—As You Like It. Arden Shakespeare. 2s. 6d. net.
SHAW, DR. STANLEY.—Whim of Germany. 7s. 6d. net.
SMITH, L. E.—Odes and Other Poems. 6d. net.
STANLEY, H.—Practical Science for Engineering Students. 2s. 6d.
VICKERS, K. H.—England in the Later Middle Ages. 10s. 6d. net.
WATSON, FREDERICK.—Shadows. 6s.
WESTRUP, MARGARET.—Tide Marks. 6s.
WILLIAMS, H. NOEL.—A Fair Conspirator. 15s. net.
WILLIAMSON, C. N. and A. M.—The Golden Silence. 2s. net.

Messrs. Mills & Boon.

AUTHOR OF "MASTERING FIAMH."—My Cosmopolitan Year. 10s. 6d. net.
BUCKROSE, J. E.—Rambles in North Yorkshire Dales. 3s. 6d. net.
CHAMPION, DE CRESPIGNY, MRS. P.—Mallory's Trust. 6s.
HARDY, MARK.—Edward Racedale's Will. 6s.
JERMYN, HARRY.—The Enlightenment of Etnayn. 6s.
LONDON, JACK.—The Cruise of the Snark. 10s. 6d. net.
MACR, LOUISE.—The Marriage of Edward. 6s.
RANDOLPH, BELINA.—A Little Girl's Gardening Book. 2s. 6d. net.
SAWYER, VAUGHAN H.—The Lizard. 6s.
SIMPSON, HAROLD.—The Marriage Market. 1s. net.
VIARDOT, H. L.—Memories and Adventures. 10s. 6d. net.

Mr. John Murray.

CHOLMONDELEY, MARY.—Notwithstanding. 6s.
 GREGORY, DR. J. W.—The Nature and Origin of Florida.
 HEADLAM, REV. DR. A. C.—St. Paul and Christianity.
 HOLT, H. V.—The Mounted Police of Natal. 10s. 6d. net.
 LE SUEUR, GORDON—Cecil Rhodes: the Man and His Work.
 LYNCH, BOHUN.—Cake. 6s.
 MACKAY, THOMAS.—The Dangers of Democracy. 6s. net.
 MUNTZ, REV. DR. W. T.—Rome, St. Paul, and the Early Church. 5s. net.
 Murray's Handbook for Travellers in India, Burma and Ceylon. 20s. net.
 The Ireland of To-day (Reprinted from The Times). 10s. 6d. net.
 WEEKLEY, PROFESSOR ERNEST.—The Romance of Names.

Mr. Eveleigh Nash.

AUTHOR OF "LEAVES FROM A LIFE."—The Years' Mind Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.
 BARR, ROBERT.—A New Novel. 6s.
 HUTCHINSON, J. R.—The Press Gang, Afloat and Ashore. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.
 KAUFMANN, REGINALD WRIGHT.—Running Sands. 6s.
 LEGGE, EDWARD.—More About King Edward. Illustrated. 16s. net.
 MONTENEGRO, H.M. KING NICHOLAS OF The Empress of the Balkans: A Play in 4 Acts. 7s. 6d. net.
 NIVEN, FREDERICK.—Ellen Adair. 6s.
 PREVOST, MARCEL.—Guardian Angel. 6s.
 WALKER, A. STODART.—The Moxford Book of English Verse. 3s. 6d. net.

Messrs. T. Nelson & Sons.

BENSON, E. F.—The Osbornes. 7d. net.
 KARR, ALPHONSE.—Voyage autour de mon Jardin. (Nelson Collection) 1s. net. French.
 O'BRIEN, R. HARRY.—John Bright. 1s. net.
 SAND, GEORGE.—Mauprat (Nelson Collection) 1s. net. French.
 WHITE, STEWART E.—Rules of the Game. 7d. net.

Messrs. J. Nisbet & Co.

BALLANTYNE, R. M.—The Coral Island. 10s. 6d. net.
 GILSON, CAPT. CHARLES.—The Savail of Delirance. 6s.
 GOODLEY, SISTER JENNINGS.—Commonsense Aids in Illness. 2s. net.
 GREENFELL, DR. WILFRED.—Immortality. 1s. net.
 HADATHI, GUNBY.—Schoolboy Guit. 3s. 6d. net.
 JOHNSTONE, T. CRAFTFORD.—Did the Phenicians Discover America? 7s. 6d. net.
 MACKIE, JOHN.—Canadian Jack. 7s. 6d. net.
 MATTHEWS, REV. JAMES.—Christ's Doctrine of Salvation. 1s. net.
 MOORE, DOROTHEA.—A Brave Little Royalist. 5s.
 NEVINSON, HENRY.—Essays in Rebellion. 6s. net.
 RHODES, KATHRYN.—Daddy's School-days. 3s. 6d. net.
 SHAW, MRS. HAVERGAL.—Gems from Many Sources. 1s. net.
 SMITH, S. C. KAINES.—Greek Art and National Life. 7s. 6d. net.
 STEBBING, GRACE.—That Aggravating Schoolgirl. 3s. 6d. net.
 ST. MARS, FRANK.—The Frowlers. 6s. net.
 TORREY, REV. R. A.—Gist of the Lessons. 1s. net.

Messrs. John Ouseley, Ltd.

ALDINGTON, MAY.—The King Called Love. 6s.
 "ANON."—A Great Gothic Fane. 21s. net.
 "ANON."—Some Recollections of an Old Landscape Painter. 10s. 6d. net.
 BATEMAN, E.—Fancies and Fragments. 1s. 6d. net.
 BENSUSAN, S. L.—May Magic. 2s. net.
 BIRGE, J. C.—Awakening of the Desert. 7s. 6d. net.
 BLAKLEY, E. L.—Alone in a Crowd. 6s.
 BROADBENT, D. R.—Poetical Compendium. 6s. net.
 CHAPLIN, E. A.—Rose Book of Romance. 3s. 6d. net.
 CLERE, M. E.—Nancy Papillon. 6s.
 KARLO, JOHN.—Was She Right? 1s. net.
 KNEESHAW, J. W.—A Lancashire Cavalier. 3s. 6d. net.
 LAIMSPACH, CHARLES.—One Another's Burden. 6s.
 POOLE, EVAN.—The Age of Steel. 2s. 6d. net.
 PROCTOR, CHARLES.—An Innocent Judas. 6s.
 RICHARDSON, T. E.—An English Girl in Tokyo. 2s. net.
 ROGERS, REGINALD.—A Northern Voyage. 2s. net.
 SANDERS, E. K.—Vincent de Paul. 16s. net.
 SPENCER, F. A.—The Four Horned Altar. 6s.
 STOCK, E. E., and BRUMLEN, E.—Jackdaw of Rheims. 2s. 6d. net.
 STOCK, E. E., and BRUMLEN, E.—Magic Chest (Pandora). 2s. 6d. net.
 STOCK, E. E., and BRUMLEN, E.—Pied Piper of Hamelin. 2s. 6d. net.
 WOODGATE, M. V. (With Preface by Laurence Housman).—The World of a Child. 2s. net.
 WYNDHAM, HORACE.—For the Flag. 6s.

Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co.

ADAIR, CECIL.—Quadrille Court. 6s.
 BLACKER, J. F.—ABC of English Ceramic Art. 5s. net.
 CAFFIN, CHARLES H.—ABC Guide to Pictures. 5s. net.
 CLARKE, HELEN A.—ABC Guide to Mythology. 5s. net.
 COLE, E. W.—Comic Fun Doctor. 2s. 6d. net.
 CUTHILL, EDITH.—A Vagabond Courtier. 2 vols. 24s. net.
 GERARD, DOROTHY.—Exotic Martha. 6d.
 GRACE, ARMINA.—The Cloak of St. Martin. 6s.
 HILL, HEADON.—Split Peas. 6s.
 JERROLD, and BRADLEY.—The Romance of an Elderly Poet. 10s. 6d. net.
 KENKALY, ARABELLA.—The Painted Lady. 6s.
 LEVY, M.—Paul Simplicio. 1s. net.
 MASON, GREGORY D.—ABC Guide to Music. 5s. net.
 MITON, E. L.—Queens of Aragon. 16s. net.
 NAYLOR, STANLEY.—Gaiety and George Grossmith. 5s. net.
 PEARCE, CHARLES F.—The Eyes of Alicia. 6s.
 RAFFOORT, DR. A.—Famous Artists and their Models. 16s. net.
 "RITA."—The Lord O' Cockpen. 6d.
 "RITA."—The Code Book. 1s. net.
 SABATINI, RAFAEL.—Torquemada and the Spanish Inquisition. 16s. net.
 SNOWDON, KEIGHLEY.—Bright Shame. 2s. net.
 SPENS, ARCHIBALD.—A Winter in India. 6s. net.
 WYLLARDE, DOLF.—The Career of Beauty Darling. 2s. net.
 WYLLARDE, DOLF.—Youth Will be Served. 6s.
 YOXALL, SIR JAMES.—More About Collecting. 5s. net.

Sir Isaac Pitman & Son.

ASHTON, HELEN.—Pierrot in Town. 6s.
 CROSFIELD, A. W. E.—Telegraph Ciphers. 21s. net.
 DRAPER, F. W. M., B.A.—Junior French Commercial Reader. 1s. net.
 FLETCHER, R. A.—Travelling Palaces: Luxury in Passenger Steamships. With 54 Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.
 GIBBS, PHILIP.—The New Man: A Character Study. 3s. 6d. net.
 HOLLAND, R. W., M.A., M.Sc.—Examination Notes on Company Law. 1s. net.
 "IRISH DEMOCRAT."—Provincial Self-Government versus Home Rule. 1s. net. London Church Handbook, 1913-14. 2s. net.

McSPADDEN, J. WALKER (Edited by).—American Statesman's Year Book. 10s. 6d. net.
 PARKER, JOHN (Edited by).—Who's Who in the Theatre. New and Revised Edition. Cloth, 6s. net; leather, 8s. 6d. net.
 PERKINS, REV. JOCELYN, M.A.—The Most Honourable Order of the Bath: A Descriptive and Historical Account. With 42 Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.
 Pitman's Commercial Atlas. 60 Maps. 2s. net.
 SHAWCROSS, WALTER.—Elementary Precise Writing. 1s. net.
 STANLEY, HUBERT G., F.E.S.—Insect Life: Its Why and Wherefore. With Illustrations. 2s. 6d. net.
 WESTON, W. J., M.A., B.Sc., and CREW, A.—Dictionary of Economic and Banking Terms. 2s. 6d. net.
 WISE, HON. B. R.—Commonwealth of Australia. Second Edition, Revised ("All Red" Series). 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

BARCLAY, FLORENCE L.—The Broken Halo. 6s.
 ELLIOT, FRANCES M.—Old Court Life in Spain. 2 vols.
 GAHNAM, EMILY JAMES.—Greek Religion.
 GREGORY, LADY.—Our Irish Theatre.
 HAMILTON, LOUISE NYSTROM.—Ellen Key, Her Life and Work. 6s. net.
 KELLOGG, CLARA LOUISE.—Memoirs of a Prima Donna.
 KEY, ELLEN.—Motherhood and Education for Motherhood.
 O'CONNOR, MRS. T. J.—My Beloved South.
 OHNET, GEORGES.—The Eagles Talon. 6s.
 ORSI, PIETRO.—Cavour. 5s. net.
 PARSONS, ELSIE CLEWES.—The Old Fashioned Woman. 6s. net.
 POPE, AMY E.—A Text-Book of Anatomy and Physiology for Nurses.
 REED, MYRTLE.—Happy Women. 6s.
 REED, MYRTLE.—Threads of Grey and Gold. 6s.
 ROSE, ELSIE WHITLOCK.—Cathedrals and Cloisters of Northern France. 2 vols. 21s. net.
 WALLACE EDNA KINGSLEY.—The Quest of a Dream. 6s.

Messrs. Alston Rivers, Ltd.

BEDFORD, RUTH M.—Rosycheeks and Goldenhead. Illustrated by L. Webb. With 16 Coloured Plates. 3s. 6d. net.
 KNIBBS, GEORGE HANLEY, C.M.G.—Voices of the North and Echoes of Hellas. 5s. net.

The Walter Scott Publishing Co.

"A.W."—Thoughts for the Future. 1s. net.
 ABRAMOWSKI, O. L. M.—Eating for Health. 3s. 6d. net.
 BALLANTYNE, R. M.—Gascogne. (Million Library.) 1s. 6d.
 BALLANTYNE, R. M.—The Lifeboat. (Million Library.) 1s. 6d.
 BALLANTYNE, R. M.—The Lighthouse. (Million Library.) 1s. 6d.
 BALLANTYNE, R. M.—The World of Ice. (Million Library.) 1s. 6d.
 CHADLER, HORACE WARD.—Poems. 2s. 6d.
 COWLEY, ABRAHAM.—Essays and Selected Verse. 1s. net.
 FARRAR, FREDERIC W.—Eric, or, Little by Little. (Million Library.) 1s. 6d.
 FITZGERIBON, H. MACAULAY.—The Story of the Flute. 3s. 6d. net.
 HOPKIRK, ARTHUR F., M.D. (Jena).—Influenza. Its History, Nature, Cause, and Treatment. 3s. 6d.
 KENNEDY, JEAN.—Hearts-ease and Christmas Roses. 1s. net.
 KENNEDY, JEAN.—The Water of Youth. 6d. net.
 KINGSTON, W. H. G.—Manco, the Peruvian Chief. (Million Library.) 1s. 6d.

Mr. Martin Secker.

ABERCROMBIE, LASCELLES.—Speculative Dialogues.
 BRETT-YOUNG, F. and E.—Undergrowth.
 HEWLETT, WILLIAM.—Telling the Truth.
 HORSNELLY, HORACE.—The Bankrupt.
 SCOTT-CRAVEN, A.—The Fool's Tragedy.
 MACKENZIE, COMITON.—Smister Street.
 THOMAS, EDWARD.—Dramatic Works of Gerhart Hauptmann.
 THOMAS, EDWARD.—Walter Pater: A Critical Study.
 WILLIAMS, A. W.—A Vic de Boheme.

Messrs. Skeffington & Son.

BALL, REV. CANON C. K.—The Holy Communion in Substance and Shadow. 2s. net.
 CRAWFORD, REV. L. P.—Beyond the Gate. 2s. net.
 GILES, M.—The Ladder of Prayer. 2s. 6d. net.
 LENNARD, REV. VIVIAN R.—Our Ideals (Addresses to Men). 3s. 6d. net.
 MARTYN, KENNEDY O'HRIEN.—Jum Crow's Trip to Fairyland. For Children. 20 Illustrations. 2s. 6d. net.
 McEWEN, V.—Glimpses of the Divine Presence. 2s. net.
 STREET, LILIAN.—The Lengthening Shadows. 2s. net.

Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co.

BENSON, ARTHUR C.—Watersprings. 6s.
 BENSON, E. F.—Thorley Weir. 6s.

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

ALEXINSKY, GREGOR.—Modern Russia. 15s. net.
 BOOTH, MEYRICK.—Rudolf Eucken: His Philosophy and Influence. 3s. 6d. net.
 BURN, TRENE.—The Unforgiving Minute. 6s.
 KENNEY, ROWLAND.—Men and Rails. 6s. net.
 LEGROS, G. V.—Fabre, Poet of Science. 10s. 6d. net.
 LUCAS, J.—Our Villa in Italy. 5s. net.
 POINCARÉ, RAYMOND.—How France is Governed. 7s. 6d. net.
 SCULLY, W. C.—Further Reminiscences of a South African Pioneer. 10s. 6d. net.
 UNDERWOOD, J. I.—Alaska: An Empire in the Making. 7s. 6d. net.
 URQUHART, ALEXANDER.—Odd Homes with Nature. 5s. net.
 WRENCH, G. T.—Lord Lister: His Life and Work. 15s. net.

Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co.

BINDLOSS, HAROLD.—Beneath Her Station. 7d. net.
 BINDLOSS, HAROLD.—Hawtreys' Deputy. 6d.
 BRUCE, MARY GRANT.—Norah of Billabong. 2s. 6d.
 EVERETT-GREEN, E.—Inchfallen. 2s. 6d.
 GOODE, EVELYN.—The Childhood of Helen. 2s. 6d.
 GOODE, EVELYN.—Bible Steps. 2s. 6d.
 HOWES, EDITH.—Maoriand Fairy Tales. 3s. 6d. net.
 LEIGHTON, MARIE C.—Justice. 6d.
 LE QUEUX, WILLIAM.—The Ticknote Treasure. 2s. net.
 MARCHMONT, A. W.—By Snare of Love. 7d. net.
 MOBERLY, L. G.—His Little Girl. 6d.
 OPPENHEIM, E. P.—A Millionaire of Yesterday. 1s. net.
 OPPENHEIM, E. P.—Little Wonder Hooks. 4 sorts. 1s. each.
 ROWLANDS, EFFIE A.—Through Weal and Through Woe. 6s.
 SUTCLIFFE, HALLIWELL.—The Open Road. 6s.
 TRACY, LOUIS.—One Wonderful Night. 6s.
 TURNER, LILIAN.—Stairways to the Stars. 2s. 6d.
 WALLACE, EDGAR.—Sanders of the River. 6d.
 WHITE, FRED M.—A Royal Wrong. 6s.
 WHITE, FRED M.—The Wonder Book. 5s. and 3s. 6d.

THE READER.

BERNARD SHAW.

By DIXON SCOTT.

"Let him beware of his damned century; his gifts of insane chivalry and animated narration are just those that might be slain and thrown out like an untimely birth by the Daemon of the Epoch."

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON, in a Letter.

"He is perhaps a 'fraud,' as the Americans put it; but the first victim of Bernard Shaw's charlatanism is Bernard Shaw himself. Susceptible to impressions (as are all artists) and a philosopher at the same time, he cannot do otherwise than deceive himself."

AUGUSTE RODIN, in a Conversation.

I.

NOW here we have another example, and a splendid one, of the tyranny of technique over temperament—of the way an instrument invented for a particular need or greed will react on the fingers that use it, stiffening and striking back till it fatally deforms them, twisting their special talent awry. It may sound, indeed, just at first, that "tyranny of technique over temperament," a predicament as purely academic as the famous "deduction killed by a fact"; but really it is far fuller of thrills and alarums, of ringing human comedy and queernesses, than even the most picturesque of all the existing portraits of Shaw, the most exciting of the alternative estimates. The man's contradictions—his literary licentiousness and his personal restraint—his intellectual voracity and his physical vegetarianism—the intense earnestness and benevolence of his real aims and ideals and the daft japes and capers he cuts as he preaches them—have inspired any number of vivid interpretations, all of them with at least the life of paradox; but the best of them by far, much the noblest and the neatest, is the one which seizes all these contrasts—the purity and the perversity, the harangues and the humility, the wild lack of all resemblance between reputation and reality—and thereupon represents the man as a strange martyr who has sacrificed even the crown of martyrdom, its impressiveness—a prophet who has disguised himself as a jester to gain an audience for his message, only to find that his frantic jokes, invented so feverishly, simply exasperate his listeners instead of luring them—that they consider his levity ill-timed, his solemn touches sacrilegious, and the texts which they feel his pranks profane, and which they had hitherto accepted unsuspiciously, as being rendered henceforward and for ever quite unfitted for respectable family consumption. This martyrdom picture, as might be expected, is naturally the one Mr. Shaw favours himself. "My case is really that of Rabelais over again," he has said. "In order to gain a hearing it was necessary for me to attain the footing of a privileged lunatic, with the license of a jester. My method has therefore been to take the utmost trouble to find the right thing to say and then say it with the utmost levity. And all the time the real joke is that I am in earnest."

But there is a realler joke than that, and a very much richer. That's the merest drop-scene: the true Comedy lies behind: another second and we will ring the curtain up. Your deliberate martyr, after all, no matter how he fails, has a certain splendour that makes the Comic Spirit feel respectful; and the more undignified Shaw became for the sake of a high purpose, the more dignified would he actually appear. It is not futility, it is fatuousness, that legitimates laughter; and in Shaw's case the fun only really begins when we see that this self-sacrifice was unintentional, that the martyrdom which he now mentions with such a brave lightness and sad pride, was not only mistaken, but actually quite a mistake. It was simply to cook his own dinner that he kindled the fire that turned and tortured him. He went to Smithfield because he thought it a good market-place. The entire proceeding was a practical joke lazily played on an over-eager young innocent by the world he imagined he was taking firmly in hand. His "disguise" was a dress he slipped on as unsuspectingly as a man whose clothes have been changed overnight; and when he began to skip about in it like "a privileged lunatic," a mad mixture of harlequin and hermit, it was he who was the dupe, not society. . . .

And if someone suggests (as someone ought to do) that no practical joke falls quite so rottenly as the one that perfectly succeeds, we can still defend, with quiet dignity, our present scheme for an hour's polite mirth. It is perfectly true, indeed, that the game has gone rather far—that the joke of Shaw thinking of himself as the joker when he was actually the victim proves after all to have been made at our expense. If it had been merely a case of a mediocrity smirking self-satisfied when he ought to be feeling subdued, like an actor persuading himself that his involuntary tumble was a brilliant impromptu, then we might chuckle unchecked, undeterred by any danger of hurting the hero's complacency, and thankfully accepting his absurdity as his real contribution to the play. But this performer is such a fine one, his powers are so extraordinary, that any illusion he may suffer from, any mistake he may make, is immeasurably our loss. Our damned century has tripped him up, as Stevenson foretold, and that is no doubt very clever of our century. But it is surely a pretty silly sort of cleverness that hoodwinks its own children, fooling the very cleverest of them all to show its strength.

Photo by Lissie Caswall Smith.

Mr. G. Bernard Shaw.

Very like—but listen further; there is one thing more. How would it be if the benefits of Shaw's work were actually increased by the discovery that their author was a dupe? That is precisely what happens. There are several reasons. It removes the venom from his virulence, for one thing, reduces our resentfulness, leaves him, immensely more likable, just a poor puzzled creature like ourselves. And it also provides the perfect complement and corrective to his contribution of ideas. There is only one way to give Shaw's work any adequacy, to make his utility at all proportionate to his powers, and this is to see him as a gull. To watch the man who supremely prides himself on his freedom from illusions and on the irresistible power of pure thought being used as an idle toy by superior powers at the very moment he is triumphantly proving their non-existence, is to be the spectator of something far more than a mere final farce to send us away in good humour: it is to watch an integral scene that entirely alters and immensely deepens the meaning of those that go before. Add Shaw himself to his dramatis persona, and the latter begin to kindle and grow human; make the story of his deception an extra Act to all his plays, and they begin to teach a genial tolerance and to breathe a smiling wisdom which I fear they do not otherwise exhale. They lose that bitterness and barrenness, that hard and cruel angularity and bleak glitter, which has led to their author being denounced for inhumanity. To the array of stabbing truths with which they bristle, thrusting out at the throat of society like spears, there is added yet another, perhaps the only one omitted, which transforms the cold attack into a rescue. It sets them wavering and faltering, as in a blur of mist; and that was all they needed to make them noble and reliable. We can trust them after that, for they have lost the hard exactness which has hitherto always made them so unreal. All Shaw's work hitherto has been too precise to be accurate; it has been too exact to be true.

One point more. A glance back at the quotations at the head of this article will show the reader that two great minds, besides our own, have made this discovery of a stage behind the drop-scene. The fact will reassure some; but others it may damp: a word of comment will satisfy both. It is true that both Stevenson and Rodin pushed the curtain aside—saw the performance going on secretly behind it; but the old Frenchman went no further than that cryptic phrase about the "fraud," and the young Scotchman was compelled to leave the house abruptly before his little forecast was fulfilled. We therefore may enjoy both the sense of their patronage and the prouder one of being pioneers. We still occupy the enviable position of first-nighters. And for my own part I confess that it is with a thrill of real excitement that I now stretch out my hand and press the prompter's bell. . . .

II.

And instantly there vanishes, whipped away for ever, that striking picture of St. Bernard, the fierce Irish hermit, staining his sackcloth to make it look like motley, and using his staff and scrip, sublimely sacrilegious, as a fool's bladder and wand. It simply will not do. History won't have it. Mr. Chesterton, to be sure, has written, with much pathos, of Mr. Shaw's "narrow Puritan home"; Mr. Huneker, with more pride, has enlarged upon his hero's "humble peasant birth"; and to listen to these phrases and then turn back to the portraits that snarl so aggressively and so argumentatively sneer all over this number of THE BOOKMAN, is to recognise at once the lean, harsh, unrelenting features of the fanatic—the intellectual zealot, the merciless ascetic, harsh as the stony soil from which he sprang, made sublime by the bitter madness of the protestant. Pure hallucination! You are being bluffed by the beard. It obliterates a bland and luscious chin. And Chesterton and Huneker are humbugs. For absolutely the first and most fundamental fact about Bernard Shaw, biographically, is—that he was the son of Lucrezia Borgia.

Of Lucrezia Borgia; and of the Margaret of "Faust"; and of the Donna Anna of "Don Giovanni." For Shaw's mother was a young and beautiful Irish opera-singer (she was only twenty years her son's senior) who carried on a "blameless ménage à trois" with a famous musical genius and the feckless second cousin of a baronet (Shaw's father); and Lucrezia (Donnizetti's), Donna Anna, and Margaret were her three favourite parts.

Photo by Enery Walker.

G. B. Shaw
(1888).

It is astonishing how adroitly these romantic facts have been muffled in all the current accounts of his character. "His family was a middle-class one," says Mr. Holbrook Jackson, "with all the prejudices and habits of that class." "L'écivain a peut-être évoqué des souvenirs d'enfance," writes M. Charles Cestre, "quand il a décrit, dans le Disciple du Diable, les effarouchements et les indignations d'une famille puritaine dont le chef, le bonhomme Dudgeon, a conservé quelques faiblesses humaines au milieu de l'austérité aigre et hargneuse des siens," and goes on to speak impressively of the youth practising "sans effort une sorte d'ascétisme inné." "Austérité aigre et hargneuse," indeed! The lad's life was a voluptuous revel. He dreamed and dawdled at school, where he was only a desultory day-boy, and where he learned nothing, as he has acknowledged himself, not even (more's the pity) fives or footer; but at home, the less distracted, he simply soaked himself lusciously in the licensed orgies and ecstasies of music. Melody, grand opera melody, not only took the place of reality for him; he dissolved all his books in it as well, making it a vehicle for absorbing Scott and Poe and Victor Hugo physically, sensually, in a sumptuously bodily form. In music," he once wrote in an article we ought to have reprinted, an article describing these indulgences:

"In music you will find the body of and reality of that feeling which the mere novelist could only describe to you; there will come home to your senses something in which you can actually experience the candour and gallant impulse of the hero, the grace and trouble of the heroine, and the extracted emotional quintessence of their love."

"I gained penetrating experiences of Victor Hugo and Schiller from Donizetti, Verdi and Beethoven; of the Bible from Handel, of Goethe from Schumann, of Beaumarchais and Molière from Mozart, and of Mérimée from Bizet, besides finding in Berlioz an unconscious interpreter of Edgar Allan Poe. When I was in the schoolboy adventure vein, I could range from Vincent Wallace to Meyerbeer: I could become quite maudlin over Mendelssohn and Gounod." And this is the young gentleman who is persistently pointed to as a compatriot of the terrible Swift (who was no more an Irishman than I am, by the way), and a typical product of North of Ireland Protestantism. Elaborate these orgies with emotions greedily sought for in the Italian rooms of the Dublin Art Gallery—rooms which he haunted hungrily, weeks at a time, all through his romantic adolescence—and you have an exact statement of the way this young man began to "pratiquer" his "ascétisme inné." When Lady Wilde, a few streets away, in Merrion Square, was posing prettily as Speranza, Mrs. Shaw, in a Dublin theatre, was flinging herself passionately into the part of Azucena; and before the son of the latter was half-way through his teens, he had absorbed far more music and drained headier delights from the coloured wines of the great painters, than the former's did all his life. Nor is the "narrow Puritanism" of the picture markedly increased if we complete it by adding a sketch of Shaw's father (an amiable, weak tippler, a rather lovable snob, helplessly haughty about his kinsman the baronet) or if we extend it to include the figure of that favourite uncle who persistently declared that the revival of Lazarus was palpably a put-up job, done on the basis of a bribe.

No, no! Our London may have converted Mr. Shaw, made a sterner and a stricter man of him, part by provocation, part by precept; but when he reached us, in his twenties, he was a romantic of the purest—as little like a preacher as Bunyan before Bedford, or St. Francis in the days of his daft youth. Soaked in Gounod and Mendelssohn, dreaming of Mozart and Michelangelo, with a vague idea of being "a wicked baritone in an opera," he was still (as he has owned), "chronically ashamed and even miserable, simply because he felt he couldn't do anything." "What was wrong with me was the want of self-respect, the diffidence, the cowardice of the ignoramus and the duffer." "My destiny was to educate London, but what I knew was exactly what the educated Englishman did not know—and what he knew I either didn't know or didn't believe." He came up to London, in short, as young poets always have come: with a knowledge of life, of human nature and his own, limited to the information provided by opera libretti and the pompously distended prose of Shelley: agonised by their own awkwardness, shamed by their own innocence, desperately troubled by their unpreparedness for destiny; but upheld through it all by the dim, golden conviction that a Destiny of some distinction does await them, and that London, like an alchemist, will know the very drop to add to set their dreams showering down in a precipitate of shining tasks and clean-cut resolves. . . . In fact, just exactly the usual immortal mixture of prig, blushing schoolgirl and god. And the year (this is very important) was 1876.

Photo by Elliott & Fry.

G. B. Shaw
(1900).

III.

Now begins the baiting of Bernard. London, the old hypocrite, has one regulation ruse which she tries on all such shy heroes; she leads off languidly, feigns indifference, and so, with one stroke, restores the new-comer's self-confidence and sets his indignation briskly sparking. Apathy, an awful apathy—that is the personal quality the place always first presents to the aspirant: a slab, nightmare indifference, not to his own entrance merely (that might be a sign of her superiority—for that he is humbly prepared) but to her own powers and opportunities, her duties and beauties—to the general dazzling adventurousness and terrific irrevocableness and entrancing torment of Life. Actually, of course, the nonchalance is merely a mask; beneath it there is toleration, good nature, good form; it is the quiet of wisdom, not of woodenness—the composure, not of torpor, but of powers tested, and serene because sure; but the novice doesn't discover that till later on. What he does do is to compare this mad calm with his own keenness, and feel that his prevision of a Destiny was sound. He is different from these people, with their small talk and slackness: his excitement sets its teeth and squares its jaw. Reassured at the very moment he expected to be abashed, he sits down in a whirl of elation and contempt, and outs with his book, picture, play. London has set him to his task, very neatly, by pretending to be incapable of commands.

Nine times out of ten, therefore, the trick works to admiration; it procures us performances that the truth would freeze to death. But Shaw happened to come tenth. Remember the hour. It was the eve of the 'eighties, when the arts joined the 'isms. And Carlyle begat Ruskin, and Ruskin begat Morris, and Morris begat Cunninghame Graham,—and the Carpenters and the Cranes and the Salts: instead of a velvet jacket and a slap-dash joviality, your young artist took to saeva indignatio and sandals. It was tremendously interesting. Just why poetry and proteids should suddenly seem natural affinities; just what there was in the atmosphere then to make Jaeger and Ibsen and esoteric Buddhism appear inevitable associates; and why to eat the leek, declaring it loudly to be the only pure and blameless form of food, suddenly became the sign of mental independence;—these phenomena have never yet been adequately explained: for we are still too much involved with the traditions then established to get the full effect of their fearsome abnormality. But though the origins were intricate, the results merged in one wild rush which carried artists of all kinds, for the first time in English history, over to the side of their natural enemy, the proletariat. Instead of adoring the graces, they began denouncing disgraces. Instead of priding themselves on their immunity from politics, they began to boom and bleat like a lot of leading articles. They had a thoroughly enjoyable time. The new game gratified the vanity that is the curse of all their tribe by its flattering sense of putting everybody right; and it satisfied the disrespectfulness which is chief among their charms by giving them, as targets, every rule, religion, custom, creed, convention, and thoroughly well-established institution which had lent its maintenance to civilization by forming part of it. They were infidels, atheists, anarchists, cosmogonists, vegetarians, anti-vivisectionists, anti-vaccinationists. They revelled in a fresh field of topics and got new ideas for cartoons—founded endless societies to listen to their oratory and promoted countless papers that would print their verse and prose; it was canvas and model combined. The big men liked the feeling of doing practical spade-work at last; the little ones (and there were such a dreadful lot of these) simply loved being "intellectuals." It gave humble giants, like Morris, a chance to stoop and be chivalrous. It hoisted the pigmies on to platforms where they could strut and domineer like Hectors. It was fine.

G. Bernard Shaw.

From a drawing by Will Rothenstein.
Reproduced by kind permission of the artist.

Now this was all very well in the case of a Morris, who had already given us his "Guenevere"; and it probably couldn't damage even a Cunninghame-Graham—for he was a rebel in any case, a Highland riever by birth, and these 'isms were to him simply so many gauntlets which he could fling in the face of the fat fools he despised; when he charged the ranked policemen in Trafalga Square, for instance, ostensibly in the cause of democracy, he was really only giving expression, I am sure, to his eternal contempt for the canaille; he turned socialist because he was an aristocrat. But in the case of a youngling like Shaw, a tender emotionalist, fed hitherto wholly on the sweetstuff of opera and still viewing the world in terms of Shelley and Wagner, it simply amounted to ravishment. It meant thrusting all his soft faculties into a premature mould; it meant emphasising and petrifying and fixing for ever on his character just those quaint innocent qualities of contemptuousness and arrogance which ought, in the ordinary way, to have been softly erased by experience once their first task of setting him slogging was performed. It meant that instead of prompting him to some piece of independent creation, some proof of individual power, his boyish bumptiousness began to boast in its own name.

For of course he was helpless: face to face with such a situation, what could a poor romantic do? He yielded at a touch—fell like a shot sea-bird—was culled like a slender wayside flower. With the echoes of the hammer-song still humming in his head, he saw himself as a Sigurd among

G. B. S. at home.

Alberics—and since everywhere about him the old obvious evils spawned and sprawled, all the generous decencies of youth joined with its egotisms to make him vow to have a drive at London-Fair. "My destiny is to educate London," he assured himself; and took steps according, very solemnly. He himself has described how the final vision descended and crystallised all his vague cravings. Perceive him flutteringly approach the fateful Webb. He has strayed into one of the meetings of the myriad societies of that day, a body calling itself, for some no doubt adequate reason, The Zeletical Society, and this is the sight he beholds:

"The speaker was a young man, about twenty-one, with a profile that suggested, on account of the nose and imperial, an improvement on Napoleon the Third. He had a fine forehead, a long head, eyes that were built on top of two highly-developed organs of speech (according to the phrenologists), and remarkably thick, strong, dark hair. He knew all about the subject of the debate; knew more than the lecturer; had read everything that had ever been written on the subject; and remembered all the facts that bore on it. He used notes, read them, ticked them off one by one, threw them away, and finished with a coolness and clearness that to me, in my trembling state, seemed miraculous. This young man was the ablest man in England—Sidney Webb."

And he was exactly Shaw's own age. The flutterer was caught. He too would be a dictator, an authority, a liberator, a dogmatic and precocious oracle. This was grand opera and literature and a noble knightliness combined; it was De Resque, Ruskin, and Sigurd in one. He went into training incontinent. Nervous, unready and sensitive, with subtlety of apprehension and an ineradicable fondness for fineness the first quality of all his faculties, he was supremely unfitted for the job; but the very susceptibility that ought to have saved him made him as wax to the suggestion, and the very imagination that ought to have carried him far away from platforms to some place where it could do its own work undisturbed, flooded the dreary planks with rosy limelight—disguised and garlanded the prospect—made out that the cheap and prosy business of glib demagoguery was the very embodiment of poetry; and drove him fatuously on. "I

Lent by Mr. D. J. Rider.

Bernard Shaw at the Fabian Summer School.

From a photograph taken by himself.

vowed I would join Webb's society, go every week, speak every week, and become a speaker or perish in the attempt. And I carried out this resolution. I suffered agonies no one suspected. During the speech of the debate I resolved to follow my heart used to beat as painfully as a recruit's going under fire for the first time. I could not use my notes; when I looked at the paper in my hand I could not collect myself enough to decipher a word. And of the four or five wretched points that were my pretext for this ghastly practice of mine I invariably forgot three—the best three." Flaubert and Pater undergoing flagellation in the hope of being granted pure prose underwent far less torment than this equally fine artist did to learn the tricks of cockney repartee. He struggled for years. "I attended the Hampstead Historic Club once a fortnight, and spent a night in the alternative weeks at a private circle of economists. I made all my acquaintances think me madder than usual by the pertinacity with which I attended debating societies and haunted all sorts of hole-and-corner debates and public meetings, and made speeches at them. I was president of the Local Government Board at an amateur Parliament"—and he even turned the very novels that might have proved his salvation (by giving his creative energy a path of escape) into mimic debating societies too—not only rising up in the name of each character in turn (Connolly, Lydia Carew, Cashel, Trefusis) to deliver a short address on some selected topic, but actually turning as many of these characters as possible into working models, draft sketches, of the omniscient, incontestable, imperturbable Sigurd-Shelley-Wagner-Webb which he had resolved Bernard Shaw must become. "I am thoroughly well satisfied with myself," says Elinor McQuinch. "At last I have come out of a scene without having forgotten the right thing to say." Connolly is "concentrated and calm, making no tentative movements of any kind (even tying a white tie did not puzzle him into fumbling), but acting with a certainty of aim, and consequent economy of force, dreadful to the irresolute." These are self-reflections, it is sometimes said: looking back at Connolly now, from nineteen-thirteen, when Shaw has really grown like him, it is natural to think of him as an involuntary mirror of his maker. But it is Shaw who is the heir, Connolly the ancestor. He "looked at his programme and calculated how soon his turn to sing would come. Then he unrolled his music, and placed two copies ready to his hand upon the table. Having made these arrangements with a self-possession that quite disconcerted the clergyman, he turned to examine the rest of the company." This is the projection of a personal ideal, not involuntary self-portraiture; and "you cannot have a thing and want it too." Perfecting these little mannequins with his pen—studying their gestures—putting them into predicaments in order to learn how to behave—continually calling on them for impromptu speeches—"There by the grace of God," mutters the young author savagely, "will one day go George Bernard Shaw." His novels were indeed mirrors held up to his nature—but only to help him fix his make-up. Fate, when she began to fool him, hadn't reckoned on this solemnity. The joke was already going rather far.

Two Socialists.

Mr. Sidney Webb.

Mr. Bernard Shaw.

Drawn by John Nicholas.

Reproduced, by permission of Mr. Fisher Unwin, from M.A.B.

IV.

It went further very shortly. The result of these efforts, heroically sustained (our Sigurd being meanwhile supported, it is provoking, but right, to recall, by a radiant Mimmy in the person of that romantic young mother to whom he owed the imagination he was thwarting, and who was now melodiously earning her own living in London)—the result of these pig-headed efforts, this display of inverted idealism, was the production of one of the most remarkable verbal weapons ever forged by a literary craftsman. It was a cold-drawn instrument of expression built for cut-and-thrust conflicts—designed to fulfil every platform need or emergency that its maker's imagination could foresee; and every ancillary qualification or charm was dourly and ruthlessly threshed out of it. To get rid of these alloys and yet maintain the thing's temper meant the invention of a whole new range of prose devices; and it is the way he worked at these, the devouring adroitness he showed, the fresh formations and annealings and interlockings of language he passionately invented and perfected, that give us our first infuriating idea of the triumphs he would have brought us, the work he might have done, if only he had never been drugged and trepanned and unconsciously sold into eternal slavery whilst asleep. Much has been written in praise of his work; but of his workmanship, one feels, far too little; never yet have I seen any adequate acknowledgment of the extraordinary perfection and importance of his style. More stiletto than style, some one says, a bit sourly,—but that is only the peevishness of pedantry. It can be used to carve creatively as well as to kill—and in other hands than his it surely will be: whatever else Shaw has done, he has hung a glittering new and needed weapon in the armoury of the arts. Conditioned absolutely by the special character of the campaign he had in mind—submitting to every limitation without shuffling, and swerving shamelessly out to enjoy every licence—it is the very finest example in the whole of English letters of prose written to be uttered with a physical forcibleness on the rapid levels of men-to-men speech, and yet retaining, unsuspected, all those powers of balance, rhythm and picturesqueness whose aid must be employed before all defences can be carried, who sail into the citadel by the more important senses whilst the colloquialisms keep the common one engaged. Technically, that is its most triumphant innovation. The hour of "oratory" was over; the peroration was punctured: the purple passage was merely a red rag to rouse restiveness: hungry democrats and terrible vegetarian-anarchists wanted utterances that hit and looked like lumps of steel. And the problem, briefly, was therefore how to appear to be using this life-preserver sort of language without really relinquishing the aid of the subtler influences that used always to be summoned by the solemn ritual of rhetoric.

Well, Shaw found a way. His hearers wanted "straight talk": so he cast periods like horizontal bars. But they were bars that worked like piston-rods, all built for thrust and drive: they displayed the splendid beauty of clean speed, and at the very moment when they seemed to be discarding contemptuously all merely emotional adjuncts, they were dizzying the onlookers with that supremely sensual excitement, the intoxicating ecstasy of pace. He stripped all his sentences of those trailing wreaths and ropes of metaphor that Ruskin twined round his message for impressiveness—and then multiplied still further the effect of impetuosity thus produced by using all the energy that might have gone to making garlands in the task of fitting clause into clause so ingeniously that never a joint could be seen, so that a sentence made up of many added items lay as level as a spear, streaking past as though launched with one lunge. It is interesting to watch the first studious assemblage of the parts, and then the gradual speeding-up of the mechanism.

"Mr Reginald Harrington Lind, at the outset of his career, had no object in life save that of getting through it as easily as possible, and this he understood so little how to achieve that he suffered himself to be married at the age of nineteen to a Lancashire cotton-spinner's heiress. She bore him three children, and then eloped with a professor of spiritualism, who deserted her on the eve of her fourth confinement, in the course of which she caught scarlet fever and died. Her child survived, but was sent to a baby farm, and starved to death in the usual manner."

That is an early effort, from the laboratory called "The Irrational Knot." Already the desired effect of imperturbability is there, gained by the careful maintenance of a monotone; and the crowded middle sentence does nearly take the listener's breath away by telescoping four travails, two tragedies and a comic professor of spiritualism into a couple of level lines. But the jolts at the commas break the pace rather roughly, and although the sentences are still comparatively short, they are only kept going by making the clauses cannon, after the model of the famous House that Jack Built, instead of plunking past like a rifle-bullet, straight from stop to stop. Months of practice and experiment, on paper by day, on platforms at night, taught him how to overcome these crudities. The sentence that follows is one written for actual utterance (and written, oddly enough, in that home of the old school of rhetoric William Morris's house at Kelmscott), and the reader

Copyright U.S.A., Joseph Simpson

G. Bernard Shaw,
By Joseph Simpson, R.B.A.

Reproduced, by permission, from T.P.'s Weekly.

Copyright U. S. A., Joseph Simpson
From 'Three Living Lions' by Joseph Simpson R. B. A. by courtesy of Mr. D. J. Rider will see how perfectly the sense of precipitancy is secured to it by the simple device of dropping its successive items into the slots of a kind of eternally expanding carrier reaching forward from a single steady verb

"One can see that the Local Government Board of the future will be a tremendous affair, that foreign States will be deeply affected by the reaction of English progress, that international trade, always the really dominant factor in foreign policy, will have to be reconsidered from a new point of view when profit comes to be calculated in terms of net social welfare instead of individual pecuniary gain—that our present system of imperial aggression in which under pretext of exploration and colonization the flag follows the filibuster and trade follows the flag with the missionary bringing up the rear must collapse when the control of our military forces passes from the capitalist classes to the people, that the disappearance of a variety of classes with a variety of what are now ridiculously called 'public opinions' will be accompanied by the welding of society into one class with a public opinion of inconceivable weight, that this public opinion will make it for the first time possible effectively to control the population, that the economic independence of women and the supplanting of the head of the household by the individual as the recognised unit of the State will materially alter the status of children and the utility of the institution of the family and that the inevitable reconstitution of the State Church on a democratic basis may, for example, open up the possibility of the election of an avowed Freethinker like Mr. John Morley or Mr. Bradlaugh to the deanery of Westminster"

It is simply a series of separate statements, but they are so socketed that the result is torrential—the sentence seems to go whipping through its supporting semi-colons much as telegraph-wires do through their posts when you watch them racing past from a swift train. And further practice still, the months stretching into years, enabled him to eliminate even slotted frames and posts in the paragraph that follows, written at the height of his powers, those recurrent "thats" have been replaced by subtle piers and as the reader's mind is carried over it tastes a queer vertigo—it clutches its guide giddily, yielding him a blank subjection, like the limp obedience paid a Blondin by the fellow on his back,—far completer (at any rate till he touches honest ground again), than the reverence offered to a Fors-Clavigerating Ruskin

"I therefore do not misunderstand my plain statement of the fundamental constitution of London society as an Irishman's reproach to your nation. From the day I first set foot on this foreign soil I knew the value of the prosaic qualities of which Irishmen teach Englishmen to be ashamed as well as I knew the vanity of the poetic qualities of which Englishmen teach Irishmen to be proud. For the Irishman instinctively disparages the quality which makes the Englishman dangerous to him, and the Englishman instinctively flatters the faults that make the Irishman harmless and amusing to him. What is wrong with the prosaic Englishman is what is wrong with the prosaic men of all countries—stupidity. The vitality which places nourishment and children first—heaven and hell a somewhat remote second—and the health of society as an organic whole nowhere may muddle successfully through the comparatively tribal stages of gregariousness, but in nineteenth century nations and twentieth century empires the determination of every man to be rich at all costs and of every woman to be married at all costs must without a highly scientific social organization produce a ruinous development of poverty, celibacy, prostitution, infant mortality, adult degeneracy, and everything that wise men most dread. In short, there is no future for men,

G. B. S. sitting to Rodin.
By Will Rothenstein.

Reproduced, by permission of the artist, from a photograph kindly lent by Mrs. F. M. Comford.

however brimming with crude vitality, who are neither intelligent nor politically educated enough to be Socialists. So do not misunderstand me in the other direction either: if I appreciate the vital qualities of the Englishman as I appreciate the vital qualities of the bee, I do not guarantee the Englishman against being like the bee (or the Canaanite) smoked out and unloaded of his honey by beings inferior to himself in simple acquisitiveness, combativeness and fecundity, but superior to him in imagination and cunning."

Lightened of all adjectives—nimble with nouns—turning categories into keyboards when it wants to ripple us a run, and avoiding vowels in order to obtain the snap of consonants—it rattles at a rate that makes the best of Swift seem slow, and pelts the brain with stinging drops like driving hail. It is deliberately cold and colourless, but it produces a kind of glow—a sensual warmth that almost melts the icy argument, almost turns it into something soft and kind. For rapidity, poignancy, unanimity, promptness, and an exquisite timing and adjustment of its parts, there is no prose to be compared with it in English. And, just as an athlete is more beautiful than an aesthete, so it grows more sensuous the more cynical it becomes; it practises a bodily seduction even while seeming wholly to rely on pure intelligence. It is curious virtuosity. His passion for picturesqueness made him pick this pose of sour reasonableness;

his vivid imagination enabled him to perfect it; the result was a reputation for harsh common sense that made men and artists regard him with awe.

V

Then why bewail its acquisition? In face of all these merits, why pity the maker and propound this dark theory about him being the luckless dupe of a decoy? To that we now come. There are reasons in quantity. Hitherto we have spoken of this instrument of expression as though it were something solid and separable: as a sword, which he forged; or a flute, which he played on; a detachable piece of his equipment. That is one of the weaknesses of rhetoric. Actually it was his own mind that he put on the anvil and altered; it was his own larynx that he fitted with patent stops. The sword cut both ways, carving the hand that controlled it; the flute was a magic flute that filled the mind of the player with all the tunes that flowed from it, forcing his thoughts to keep step to its piping. The parallel bars of his prose have seemed to us thus far like a firm apparatus on which he could perform acrobatically. We now discover and have to face the fact that they are the bars of a cage, and that Shaw has shut himself and his capers inside it.

And by this something much more malignant is meant than the mere hemming-in of his mind with the wrong subjects. It is true that the man who trains himself to speak

"without notes, on Rent, Interest, Profits, Wages, Toryism, Liberalism, Socialism, Communism, Anarchism, Trade-Unionism, Co-operation, Democracy, the Division of Society into Classes, and the Suitability of Human Nature to Systems of Just Distribution," is building up his views rather badly, too hastily leasing the principal sites of his brain to a rabble of trumpery tenants. But if there had been nothing worse than this Shaw would have pulled through, after a check: he had vigour enough to make even Interest interesting and convert Rents into a human reality; he would have ultimately humanised these ill-conducted aliens much as a rich soil will rejuvenate and civilise a top-dressing of tatterdemalion settlers. The fatal thing was not the type of topic he discussed; it was the attitude he struck as he did so. It induced a spiritual deformity, a kink he will carry to his grave; you might say (I would not

George Bernard Shaw in his Library.
By Max Beerbohm.

By kind permission of the artist.

blame you) that it produced a condition of permanent hump. We have seen how he slaved to acquire a tone of icy arrogance: once found, it seemed to freeze to his tongue. The æsthetic fashion of the hour favoured contempts, tirades, antagonisms, an omniscient school-mastering of creation; instead of wearing it a moment and then tossing it aside, this man hugged it to him till it became a second skin.

And the reason for this wretched permanence, like all the causes in this comedy of errors, only makes its own result the more perverse. It was exactly Shaw's unsuitability for the surly part of pedagogue that made him cling to his Dotheboys demeanour so defiantly; it was because he was an artist, wholly swayed and governed by the artist's deep controlling sense of form, that he stuck to his beastly bitterness and rancour, and persisted in displays of conscious bad form. A weaker artist would have suffered less: our Cranes soon ceased their clamour—our Carpenters turned craftsmen, working happily at a bench instead of eternally trying to occupy one. All the genuine propagandists, too, changed their manner cheerily; the Salts of this earth, after acting as irritants for a time, sociably subsided, later on, into agreeable condiments—as Secretaries of the Humane Society and so forth. Even Olivier is a K.C.M.G.—Jeremiah mellows into a Governor of Jamaica.

But Shaw is incapable of this casualness. He is consumed by the poet's passion for consistency. He feels forced to adhere to all the attitudes of his salad-days—down even to its devotion to salad; he is incapable of confessing that those early passions for rolled oats were really only another of youth's ways of sowing wild ones. That accusation of capriciousness, so often brought against him—how heartily one wishes it were true! He lacks the courage to abandon his convictions. Like Tanner, he "never withdraws." He may advance—that is another thing; but, if he does, he takes his old opinions with him, no matter what the extra cost of carriage, ingeniously, over-eagerly, proving to himself and to us how absolutely essential they are to his equipment. He has reminded us somewhere that we all die once each eight years—but in his own case the estate is strictly entailed; he takes his ancestors with awful seriousness—fulfils their pledges if it ruins him—many of his apparently most preposterous extravagances have been simply his attempts to pay their debts. There is a kind of cowardice here—but what I want you to realise is that it is the cowardice that comes from a blind dread and horror of the wickedness of making false strokes. Shaw wouldn't a bit mind giving himself away; what he cannot bear is the knowledge of having done so. Taking life with the triple seriousness of art, Ireland, and youth, the idea of having wasted a drop of it would anguish him. All his irresponsibilities have been the result of this solemn sense of personal responsibility. It is this that makes him (for example) dwell so disproportionately on trivialities of dress and diet—his way of eating and drinking, of spelling "cigaretts" and not smoking them; and when he foams so fantastically over our refusal to conform, he is really desperately beating back any doubts as to his rightness, frantically justifying himself to himself. It is the same boyish fear that sets him eternally chattering explanations. He is often not so much trying to discover the truth as to find some further proof that he has told it. When he button-holes us so insistently outside his own plays—prefacing, promising, explaining, assuring, like a showman blarneying desperately away outside his booth before he dares to let us in, he is really not so much trying to humbug us with his harangues as to reassure and satisfy himself. He uses all the powers of his imagination to cast a spell upon those powers; his wit never displays a more wonderful agility than when it is trying to allay its own alertness. He will found a philosophy rather than admit a jest was idle*—and then write a play to prove, by the action of the characters, that the philosophy is true†—and then extend the philosophy in order to demonstrate that a dramatist's personnel are free and independent creatures, uncontrolled by the conscious will of the playwright, and that he himself is a playwright in that sense.‡ In brief, he is the kind of man who would chip corners off his character till it fitted all round rather than admit to himself that he had got into a hole.

* This, at any rate, is not rhetoric. If the reader will turn back to the eleven pages of Notes at the end of "Cæsar and Cleopatra," he will find Mr. Shaw excitedly arguing himself into the belief that the pantomime fooling with Britannus is a sober psychological study, and a piece of dignified historical portraiture. He rigs up a solemn theory of the Influence of Climate Upon Character and the Comparative Unimportance of Racial Influx to justify what is obviously only a cheap pantomime joke which we were all willing enough to laugh at and overlook till we got this portentous defence. The gravely reproduced portraits of Cæsar and General Burgoyne in the same volume, and the solemn resurrection of a contemporary print of the Pharos of Alexandria are analogous devices to deceive his soul into thinking that it has been spending its powers on work of an adequate dignity.

This—and much worse—is exactly the mutilation we now see him steadily practising. "Worse," because his thrown thoroughness, the artist's instinct perverted, made him tinker and contort the whole of the rest of humankind in order to make it fit into and match his own malformities. He had to go to the length of jerry-mandering the entire cosmic scheme in order to make it square with his early jeremiads. He began by persuading his own virtues to publicly approve his vices; he so dazed and bedazzled his native tenderness, pity, chivalry, and sweetness of heart with dialectic that they mazedly testified that harshness and arrogance and a truculent contempt were qualities they thoroughly admired. "In this world," they attested, "if you do not say a thing in an irritating way you may just as well not say it at all, since nobody will trouble themselves about anything that does not trouble them." And, again, "The fact is, there is nothing the public despises so much as an attempt to please it. Torment is its natural element; it is only the saint who has any capacity for happiness." He actually persuaded himself, this lover of lenity, that it is necessary to hurt in order to heal; that the only way to encourage men is to discourage them; that it is necessary to be disagreeable in order to get them to agree. In order to save himself from the agony of perceiving that his early attitude had been largely juvenile egregiousness, he proposed to agonize the rest of the world. He began a campaign of universal irritation; and as he set about it he kept reiterating fervently, like a missionary muttering godless prayers, that taunts and intolerance, accusations and contempt, were logically, demonstrably, and therefore quite unquestionably, much the best methods of spreading and preaching the golden gospel of The Brotherhood of Man.

And, of course, it couldn't end with that absurdity. The disguise had to get deeper, his voice had to rise louder in order to deafen his own ears. Other arguments had to radiate, flung out to balance and support the first. Once his energy got working in this accidental twig it shot out branches till it burst into a self-supporting tree, seeking a satisfying symmetry. The first corollary that ran out, to act as stay and flying buttress, and subsequently to become a parent stem of its own (so that it now sometimes seems the central pillar of them all, the very tent-pole of his patent storm-proof creed) was the formula that all men's miseries are the result of the discrepancy between the sentimental version of life fed into most of us, and life as it actually is—and that to hack away these sweetnesss and cauterise the wounds, to kill what he (wrongly) called "the romantic convention" with the cruellest acid and steel he could find, was therefore hero's work, † "John Bull's Other Island"—where the Britannus theory is dragged out again to be propped up—exhumed in order to be animated.

‡ Preface to "Man and Superman," p. xvii. Pref. to "Plays Pleasant," pp. vii. and viii. Pref. to "Major Barbara," p. 173.

hygienic work, a harsh but holy warfare, a completion of the surgery begun by old Cervantes. Now there was some of the sap of human truth in this at least—it did touch actual earth. It is a diagnosis, indeed, that we can find an instant use for, here and now, for doesn't it form the perfect definition of the source of all Shaw's own disasters?—it is because he sentimentally sees himself as a satirist and harsh realist, instead of harshly realising he is actually a romantic that he has gone so hopelessly astray. It is because he sees himself as a Cervantes when he is really a Don Quixote (down even to his personal appearance, by the way GBS and GKC—the Knight and Sancho irresistibly, and down even to the famous misadventure with the dolls—for Shaw's chief mistake about the theatre as we will see is his solemn attribution to the marionettes he found there of powers they never have possessed) that he has suffered the Don's own doom. But the vitality in this principle ironically enough only served to sustain him while he unconsciously provided a perfect demonstration of its fatal action, and, if a sudden shivering sense of its personal aptness did ever assail his subconsciousness, it simply hurried him on with the task of planting, on the other side, as a stout protection against any lurking fatuousness, the famous pair of reciprocating twin hypotheses—the hypotheses of the Artist-Philosopher and the Superman.

The urgent necessity for these will be recognised. The theory of the Superman was essentially nothing but a defence of platform-dogmatism to bully and browbeat in the name of Egalité, Fraternité was decently impossible without some such extension of the synthesis, and to the aid of the announcement that no "one having any practical experience of Proletarian Democracy has any belief in its capacity for solving great political problems or even for doing ordinary parochial work intelligently," there came that fine suggestion of the Life-force working up and up through speechless monsters, and stupid stuttering minor men seeking for a brain that could express it, till at length through the intellect of the Artist-Philosopher (another name for Sigurd-Ruskin-De-Resque) it achieved articulation, became conscious of its own desires, and delivered its commands and warnings brusquely to the unemerged remainder of its carcase.

The mysterious thing we call life organizes itself into all living shapes, bird, beast, beetle and fish, rising to the human marvel in cunning dwarfs and in laborious muscular giants, capable these last of enduring toil willing to buy love and life not with suicidal curses and renunciations but with patient manual drudgery in the service of higher powers. And these higher powers are called into existence by the same self-organization of life still more wonderfully into true persons who may by comparison be called gods, creatures capable of thought, whose aims extend far beyond the satisfaction of their bodily appetites and personal affections since they perceive it is only by the establishment of a social order founded on the common bonds of moral faith that the world can rise from mere savagery.

"Men of genius are the men selected by Nature to carry on the work of building up an intellectual consciousness of her own instinctive purpose." "The great man incarnates the philosophic consciousness of life."

"All his treatises and poems and scriptures are the struggle of Life to become divinely conscious of itself instead of stumbling blindly hither and thither in the line of least resistance." "Thus Life Force says

* "The Perfect Wagnette" p. 11

FABIANS AT HOME.

Fabian Diablonians exorcising a mediæval Christian Saint on the occasion of the debate between Belloc and Shaw. It is not officially supposed that the Millennium will be in any way unduly delayed by this debate.

Drawn by Will Dyson
Reproduced, by permission from The Daily Herald

"I have done a thousand wonderful things unconsciously by merely willing to live and following the line of least resistance: now I want to know myself and my destination and choose my path; so I have made a special brain, a philosopher's brain, to grasp this knowledge for me. And this," says the Life force to the philosopher, 'must thou strive to do for me until thou diest, when I will make another brain and another philosopher to carry on the work.'"

So were arrogance justified and self-suspicion stilled: our infatuated Don Quixote has a Dulcinea now—this stringy, sterile German spinster of a Life-force; and rides on solemnly enchanted. No lifting his hallucination now! "Metaphysic" is only "metaphor" spelt in four syllables: never yet was there a poet could resist one. Watch, now, how his conception forthwith clings and spreads—dilating organically, expanding spontaneously, exhibiting all the signs of true vitality, as all conceptions do, even the most damnable, if ever they get a purchase in an artist's generative consciousness, and suck at his divine but indiscriminating vigour. Dogma dove-tails into dogma; pedant theories flower as plays; these scatter seeds that shoot up fresher saplings to support and screen the skinny parent crook. Thus, the Superman plainly needing some solid social backing if he were going to keep the Artist-Philosopher on his feet, there spontaneously sprang to support him the now familiar Shavian doctrine (so soon, alas, to grow sadly shop-soiled) declaring the healthiness of wealthiness and the heavenliness of worldliness and the crime of being crushed.† This in turn disclosing dangers (we know the hands it played into—the greasy souls it fed with self-approval) up rose a fresh Law to protect it—the Law asserting that there is a safe Saturation-point to Human Sensuousness—that self-restraint follows indulgence, and licence observes limits, and "the road of excess leads to the palace of wisdom."

And when this too wavered dubiously (for what of our rakes in their muck?—and aren't there indulgences that go on without deepening—blisses that keep step with life cunningly, feeding on it craftily, careful to keep their prey in condition?—and aren't there satisfactions that dim the mind to soothe the body?)—when this, in turn, tottered, a last convulsive inspiration, the impulse of self-preservation hard at work, made it shoot out a further branch that caught and clung round a formula (the formula that made G. K. Sancho think Shaw an ascetic) that by a lucky loop led right back to the parent stem—the formula, namely, that men don't like happiness, that bliss only bores them,‡—thus perfectly completing the sinister circle by backing up the first defence of offensiveness, filially feeding into

† "The universal regard for money is the one hopeful fact in our civilization, the one sound spot in our social conscience." "The greatest of evils and the worst of crimes is poverty; our first duty, a duty to which every other consideration should be sacrificed, is not to be poor."

‡ "Nobody wants bliss particularly or could stand more than a very brief taste of it, if it were attainable." "The pursuit of happiness is the most miserable of human occupations."

George Bernard Shaw—Novelist, Journalist and Playwright, in his Study, at Adelphi Terrace.

Reproduced, by permission, from The Tatler.

and fortifying the faculty by which it was primarily fed.

Oh, yes—it was neat; and none the less because it turned its very neatness to account by declaring clear thinking the supreme effort of the Life Force. But those who know that the clearness of a system is a proof of incompleteness, that definition is only gained by blurring truth, mustn't allow their possession of that knowledge to prevent them from perceiving the passion and glow that lie beneath these cold, clipped, charmless, lucid leaves. For to do that is to miss the real cause of the coldness, and to make the miserable, fashionable, unforgivable mistake of seeing Shaw as a mere marvellous mental machine. The thing to remember is the central tap-root of this rigid tree of thought—that accursed grafted crab of studied sourness. It is that which diverts the good juices and chills them with gall, embittering the ultimate fruit: it is that initial, unnatural theory of the virtue of venom (as though a serpent's wisdom were communicated by its fangs!) that has governed the whole habit of the growth. It makes its pity appear pitiless, it curdles its kindness, it forces the chivalry to emerge as contempt. The exasperating thing about all Shaw's utterances isn't their surfacesavagery or cynicism; it is the sight of the sweet sap being choked and changed behind; cut through the metallic coating that covers all his leaves with that glib, repellent, acrid shine, and you get generosity, wonder, wistfulness, awe, any amount of loveliness and love. His heart is in the right place; it is only his tongue that has gone wrong: it has taken a permanent twist into his cheek. When he tries to preach gentleness, it turns the words into jeers; it makes

Photo by Daily Mirror Studios.

Scene from "Man and Superman."

Tanner: "You are not putting the situation fairly before them."

Photo by Daily Mirror Studios.

Scene from "Fanny's First Play."

Fanny, her father, and the critics discussing Fanny's play

Photo by Daily Mirror Studios.

Scene from "John Bull's Other Island."

Broadbent: "I hope you've not been anxious about me?"

him malevolent in the cause of mercy, quarrelsome in the name of peace; and when he strives to shout friendly advice this interpreter, tutored too well, changes the message into a cold snarl of disdain. He sits down to write a play (called "Widowers' Houses") pleading the cause of the oppressed; and the result makes the whole world howl him down as heartless and inhuman. He writes another ("Major Barbara") to demonstrate "the central truth of Christianity—the vanity of revenge and punishment," and his hearers shiver at the sight of its ferocity. When he tries to stop the practice of cutting up live animals he can only do so by rending the character of doctors. He believes that "every man is a temple of the Holy Ghost," and promptly calls us "shirks, duffers, malingerers, weaklings, cowards."

All his announcements are denouncements; he must attack to defend, his affirmations reach our ears as denials, all his most positive utterances seem harsh strings of no's.

And observe that always, like a prisoner tightening his knots by struggling, the curbed creativeness within him increases these grimaces, the cordial energy straining and jerking at the mask till it becomes a very nightmare of menace. For the choked delight in music and gaiety, in rhapsody and heartiness, bubbling up where it can, spends itself on ecstasies of insolence, wild arias of acrimony, arpeggios of contumely and spleen. For instance:

"... the physician is still the credulous impostor and petulant scientific coxcomb whom Molière ridiculed; the schoolmaster remains at best a pedantic child-farmer and at worst a flagellomaniac; the philanthropist is still a parasite on misery as the doctor is on disease; the miracles of priestcraft are none the less fraudulent and mischievous because they are now called scientific experiments and conducted by professors; we shake our heads at the dirt of the middle ages in cities made grimy with soot and foul and disgusting with shameless tobacco smoking; public health authorities deliberately go through incantations with burning sulphur (which they know to be useless) because the people believe in it as devoutly as the Italian peasant believes in the liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius; and straightforward public lying has reached gigantic developments, there being nothing to choose in this respect between the pickpocket at the police-station and the minister on the treasury bench, the editor in the newspaper office, the city magnate advertizing bicycle tyres that do not side-slip, the clergyman subscribing the thirty-nine articles, and the vivisector who pledges his knightly honour that no animal operated on in the physiological laboratory suffers the slightest pain. Cowardice is universal: patriotism, public opinion, parental duty discipline, religion, morality, are only fine names for intimidation, and cruelty gluttony and credulity keep cowardice in countenance. We cut the throat of a calf and hang it up by the heels to bleed to death so that our veal cutlet may be white; we nail geese to a board and cram them with food because we like the taste of liver disease; we tear birds to pieces to decorate women's hats; we mutilate domestic animals for no reason at all except to follow an instinctively cruel fashion; and we connive at the most abominable tortures in the hope of discovering some magical cure for our own diseases by them."

Photo by G. Francis Wilson.

G. Bernard Shaw
(1913).

Some people call that courage: it is really self-indulgence. It is poetry perverted, imagination amok, a pure love of harmony, gaiety, sufficiency, intoxicated by the rush of recitative and simply carried away out of joyfulness into a rising crescendo of wrath. Stifle a virtue and you always get a vice—and outbursts like these are simply the revenges taken by his temperament for being thwarted. And, regarded as revenges, their success is profound—for they utterly ruin the cause for which the sacrifice was made. No doubt at all about that. Exactly as in Ruskin's case, the piston-rod rhetoric sinks the ship it was invented to drive; the imaginations of both these men, turned into wrong channels, ruined the cases they were kidnapped to plead. Shavian rhapsodies like that either produce patronising titters, as at the newest caper of our mountebank, or else an irritation that ends in opposition. Whilst poor humanity's humblest answer to such trouncings and trades would after all be by far the most crushing: "You say I am a duffer, a weakling, a coward? My kind-heartedness merely cowardice, my morals a mush, my honour a pitiable sham? Very well. You are wiser than I am; are indeed (if I take you aright) the very Universe become articulate and aware; I am therefore bound to believe what you say. Only, if these are my qualities; then they must also be your key-board. It is upon them you must play in order to alter and guide me. Deftly adapting your message to my stupidity and cowardice, you will tactfully teach me the truth. Yet—you don't do this. I misunderstand you completely—you say so yourself. But to me, in my darkness, that seems simply a proof that—you must have misunderstood me. You say you see all my weaknesses; I appoint you my teacher; five minutes later you start flogging me like a positive Squeers for my failure to comprehend your remarks. It doesn't seem in keeping. Either there is something wrong with your voice, which you cannot possibly help; or there is something wrong with your estimate of my hearing. In either case—who is to be blamed? I feel there must be something wrong with your credentials. Perhaps your voice is not the voice of the Universe, after all. Or perhaps you are not a very good judge of other people's hearing. Myself, I favour both views. I don't fancy a Universe talking falsetto; and I don't think you are a good judge, not a particularly good judge, of other people. These thoughts are meant kindly to you. A blind leader of the blind will probably bring about disaster—but at least he will consider his poor companion's shortcomings. How much wickeded, wasteful, more shameful and ludicrous, would be the case of the clear-sighted leader who broke his client's neck because he couldn't be bothered to remember his afflictions. Good-day, Mr. Shaw. Here's your fee. We part friends."—So, in his humble way, says Everyman.

Mr. Dixon Scott's article will be continued and completed in THE BOOKMAN for next month.

And his complaint brings us naturally to the culminating scene in our Comedy—to the drama of such a man, so unfitted for the post, being compelled to claim and fill the part of dramatist.

THE BOOKMAN PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

SEPTEMBER, 1913.

Answers to these competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing the name and address of the sender) should be forwarded not later than the 15th of the month to

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, Warwick Square, E.C.

Colonial and foreign readers please note that Competitions II., IV. and V. are the same each month, and that for the next two months the 1st prize will be for the best original Lyric.

- I.—A PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA is offered for the best original Lyric.
- II.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this number of THE BOOKMAN. Preference will be given to quotations of a humorous nature.
- III.—A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS is offered for the best letter in not more than two hundred words on any volume of poems published during the last twelve months.
- IV.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best review, in not more than one hundred words, of any recently published book. Competitors should give the names of Authors and Publishers at head of their reviews.
- V.—A copy of THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for THE BOOKMAN Competitions. The Editor reserves the right to use any suggestions submitted.

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR AUGUST.

- I.—The PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA is divided and HALF A GUINEA each awarded to Miss Edith Furniss, of 21, Heron Road, Great Meols, Cheshire, and to Mrs. R. E. Markham, of 132, East Main Street, Lexington, Ky., U.S.A., for the following:

RENUNCIATION.

Away round the bend of the road you go,
Dear little feet, Goodbye!
It is only the first day of school to you—
Though you hardly slept as the night sped through
And the great Beginning nearer drew—
But it's over the edge of my heart, you know,
And we're parting, you and I.

Dear little only Baby, say,
Did it too lonely seem?
You never will grudge me these few fleet years
When you know the well of my hidden tears.
And all my impotent hopes and fears:
For I'm giving you up to Life, to-day,
And my Baby is a dream.

Wave! little hands, as you turn from my sight
Feverish to begin;
If ever I prayed it is now I pray
For all the days that must follow to-day;
God's Lamp, little feet, for your onward way;
But it's oh! when you're done with the world to-night
To my heart come creeping in. EDITH FURNISS.

THE MOTHER

Do you hear me singing to you in the twilight soft and low,
As I sang in those dear twilights long ago,
With your little head at rest 'mong the laces on my breast,
While the twilight set its crinkled locks aglow?

Oh, my fair and stately lady in your home across the sea,
With your own sweet children gathered at your knee,
Do you sometime pause to hear, through their laughter
ringing clear,
The old, old tale, that woke your childish glee?

'Tis my heart that's calling to you through the gush of April rain
And the snow of cherry-blossoms down the lane,
When the breath of other days through your palace window strays
From a springtime that will never bloom again.

Yesterday I saw a lassie in the joy o' play awhirl,
Put a flash of crimson cloak and sunny curl,
With a rush of happy tears I forgot the cruel years,
And I thought it was my own lost little girl

Sometimes when day is ended and the gloaming shadows fall,
And I hear home-going children gaily call,
I wait and hold my breath in a silence deep as death,
Listening, listening for your voice above them all

Every golden gleam of sunshine is the shimmer of your hair,
Every flower mirrors back your face so fair,
Every glimpse of summer skies is a memory of your eyes,
And your silvery laughter haunts me everywhere

When the good God makes a mother does He set apart a space
In the halls of Heaven, a cool and fragrant place,
Where the light burns soft and low, and the angels may not go—
Only Mary, with a smile upon her face?

And will you run to meet me in that crystal quietude,
Where for one sweet hour no later loves intrude?
With my darling on my breast, shall I know at last the blest
And eternal recompense of motherhood?

LULA CLARK MARKHAM.

We also select for printing:

A SONG OF SEASONS.

Green and gold on all the land, clouds that fly and follow:
A stray wind, a gay wind that sings in every tree:
Blossomed boughs on every hill, and fern in every hollow,
Sweet of all the Spring-tide, and love for you and me.

Sunny sheen and scent of rose and many a perfumed garland:
A new sky, a blue sky, that stretches to the sea:
Deep adown the forest ways a bird calls from a far land—
Summer's clasp on all the earth, and love for you and me.

Miles of yellow harvest, fruit a-ripe for falling:
A glad song, a mad song of vintagers in glee:
Autumn bringeth treasure trove—a tiny voice a-calling,
Joy that nestles in your arms, and bliss for you and me.

Cloudy spectres on the hills, rain upon the heather,
A cold wind, a bold wind that moans at our roof-tree:
Heap the blazing logs, sweetheart, and laugh at stormy weather—
Winter bringeth nothing but content to you and me.

(A. M. Bowyer-Rosman, 20, Oxford Gardens, W.)

LOOKING BACK.

O the lost loves and the dead loves,
And the loves that are buried and gone;
How the hearts shift and the years drift
And the world rolls on!

Do you think oft as you lie soft
Of the days that were merry and kind,
Of the spilt tears and the changed years,
Fallen so far behind?

O a face here and a face there,
How they beckon thro' the gloam!
We shall meet yet when the stars set
And our steps turn home!

(Miss B. C. Hardy, 19, Hartfield Square, Eastbourne.)

THE KNIGHT-AT-ARMS

No Aphrodite won from him
A golden bangle for her pride;
No Paris he, with promise fair,
But he chose Beauty for his bride.

No lauded Helen followed him
To Priam's hall and fireside,
He sheathed desire and drew his sword,
When he chose Beauty for his bride.

For her he broke a lance with Truth;
For love of her he smote his Pride;
Wisdom unhorsed him—rode him down—
Still he chose Beauty for his bride

Despair and Joy keep pace with him,
But Loneliness sleeps at his side;
He follows her nor sees her face,
Who chooses Beauty for his bride.

(Margaret Patton, Lexington, Virginia, U.S.A.)

From the numerous other Lyrics received we select for special commendation those sent in by H. F. (Ripon), Ethel Weltch (Aldeburgh), Mona Douglas (Birkenhead), Cyril G. Taylor (Heswall), James Mitchell (Edinburgh), Elizabeth P. Sholl (Yatton), M. F. W. (Maidstone), Barbara Hyla Groves (Bournemouth), E. A. Potter (Birmingham), Hilda Trevelyan Thomas (Middlesbrough), Charles Stuart (Sheffield), E. Dalton (Shepherd's Bush), G. M. Fife (Edinburgh), Chrissie G. Palmer (Midlothian), Launcelot H. Stuckey (Taunton), Robert Ferrie (Renfrew), J. C. Church (Castleford), H. R. Smith (Newcastle-on-Tyne), J. D. S. Waugh (Todding-ton), Lorna Fane (St Annes-on-Sea), M. Moore (Carlisle, Pennsylvania), E. T. Sandford (Saltash), H. Douglas Hamilton (Bristol), Lloyd St. Clare (Twickenham), S. La Forde (London, S.E.), I. Rathbone (Liverpool), Beryl May (Farnham), Fannie Hodgson (Leeds), C. A. R. (Sheffield), Grace Ashby (Torrington), G. D. M. (London, S.W.), Enoch Daniels (Newcastle), Florence M. Dyall (Birkenhead), Bernard Delorme (London, N.), Robert W. Fenton (Birdstall), D. M. Kermod (Kenilworth), May Jenkinson (London, S.W.), Violet D. Chapman (Burnham), Guenn F. Newnham (Dover), A. H. Man-nington Sayers (Monmouth), Silverpen (London, W.), Barnard R. H. Spaul (London, N.W.), Eveline Emily Ife (Plumstead Common), J. W. Shanks (Aberdeen), Doris Smith (Burton-on-Trent), J. J. Geake (Guildford), William Begg (Edinburgh), R. H. Kipling (Devonport), Gwendoline D. Harold (High Barnet), E. A. Blackman (Worthing), D. E. Baily (London, S.E.), Margot Balfour (London, W.), A. Bertram Johnston (Leith), E. W. Higgs (London, W.C.), Marjorie Ogle (Colne), M. E. Seed (Ushaw), S. R. Noyes (Deal), M. A. N. Marshall (Oxford), Florence Bagster (Kendal), Hilary Dane (Ashburton), Robert Henry Robinson (Gravesend), Cyril G. E. Blunt (London, S.W.), Denys Alsop (Bednall), Alice D. Neal (Ellans), L. Ward (Broadstairs), Dorothy M. Taylor (Aberystwyth), M. Bach (Dalwhinnie), J. M. Owston (London, S.W.), W. Morris (Bodmin), M. C. James (London, N.W.), Rosina F. Craignule (Aberdeen), Ernest F. Seymour (London, N.W.), Anita Lea (Liver-pool), Tristram (Aberdeen), Mary M. Wilshire (London, N.E.), Eleanor Littlewood (London, S.W.), S. Stuart (Sheffield), Percy Thomas (London, N.), A. C. Laughton (Wakefield), Clarence Sweetapple (Leeds), E. J. Martin (Sheffield), S. J. Walker (Sheffield), C. Cooper (London, S.W.), Elizabeth Dupuy (Washington, U.S.A.), Emma Frances Lee Smith (Washington, U.S.A.), May Knight (Axminster), Bassett Green (Coventry), Vera S. Wain-wright (Peaslake), H. B. Dawes (Birkdale), G. W. Bettany (Burton-on-Trent), Oudemia (London, W.), Robert D. Rossmale-Cocq (Sandown), Marjorie Winifred Crosbie (Herne Bay), William Hutcheson (Glasgow), Marcella Whitaker (Dewsbury), E. G. Moore (East Grinstead), G. M. Northcott (West Kirby), Daisy G. McAlpine (Epsom), Janet Jeffrey (Midlothian), Achol M. Shep-herd (London, S.E.), L. P. Stule Hutton (London, N.), Beth Vickery (Bradford), Alice Wise (Leicester), Nora Lee (London, S.W.), F. J. Popham (Annan), A. S. Bhandarkar (London, W.), Robert Norlute (Clonmel), Ianthe B. Jerrold (Hampton-on-Thames), Berwick Sayers (South Croydon), M. A. Newman (Bamlingham), E. Goodwin (London, S.W.), Constance Goodwin (Lon-don, S.W.), Norman Boothroyd (Batley), Ethel M. Cooke (Norwich), Green Cross (Harrogate), Kitty Lewis (Mans-field), Arbel M. Aldous (Saffron Walden), H. J. Taylor (Ramsgate), Lucie C. Temple (Southsea), Phyllis Tweed-dale (Birkdale), James Winter (London, W.), Annette Heard (Swanage), Josephine M. Lumly (Newcastle-on-Tyne), Alice Grant Rosman (London, W.), A. M. Bowyer Rosman (London, W.), M. M. Burnell (Ashford), Edith Furniss (Great Neots), R. W. King (London, S.E.), J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), G. L. Aldous (Harleston), Norman Davidge Gullick (Clifton), S. T. McCabe (Patricroft), Frank Brebner (Aberdeen), Jeffrey Kitley (Alvaston), David Owen (Princetown), Marie C. Lufkin (Stockport), Ernest Ashworth (Bradford), Doris Dean (Bromley), Edith Leadbeater (Birstall), Kathleen A. Foley (Salis-bury), Eveleen Pawle (Ware), Frank N. Jellicoe (London, S.W.), B. R. H. Hetherington (Carlisle), Francis (Liver-pool), G. H. G. (Longslow), S. B. I. Bell (London, W.C.), David Stothart (Edinburgh), James Young (Blyth), Jean Wilson (Clifton), P. R. Alsop (Utttoxeter), S. Saint (London, W.), J. Rosenberg (London, W.), M. C. P. (Wimbledon), May Cooper (Sevenoaks), Eric Chilman (Hull), A. Crabbe (Earl's Court, S.W.), Harold R. Lingwood (Ipswich), Thomas Sharp (Merton Park, S.W.), Albert H. Candler (Worcester), May Berkeley (Upper Norwood, S.E.), Eric L. A. Hunt-Bayes (Wal-tham Abbey), W. T. L. (Dunfermline), L. G. Johnson (Tipton, Staffs.), E. M. Walker (Mirfield, Yorks.), A. W. Jay (Devonport), Robert Cogger (Dartford), Mary E. Boyle (Cowrie, Perthshire), F. M. Nicholson (Bebing-ton, Cheshire), Mrs. Ormsley (Pontypridd), E. Summers (Dukinfield, Cheshire), Bessie Hawkins (Bath), William Thornton Brocklebank (Darlington), Enid Lorimer (London, W.C.), Betty F. Kirby (Hoylake, Cheshire), Beatrice Craig (Straidarran, Co. Derry), Miss A. M. Leitch (Cardenden, Fife), J. A. I. Wilson (Edin-burgh), Laurence Tarr (Wanstead, N.E.), J. Drummond C. Monfries (Edinburgh), Effie Philps (Largs, Fife), Wilfred J. Grout (Folkestone), E. Lewis (Mansfield), L. K. Willis (Rochester, Kent), Anna K. Barlow (Blackheath, S.E.), A. Stanley Wood (Reading), Isidore G. Ascher (Kensington), E. R. North (W. Wy-combe), Edmund Howard (Putney), Beryl Shirley (Cardiff), R. B. Ince (Jarvis Brook), Cuthbert Ellison (Launceston), Mrs. C. P. F. Ferrier (Glasgow), C. E. Staddon (Luton), Mary Wayman (Dorset), J. D. S. (Milngaie), Horace Gibson (Hull), Osav (Liscard), May Cooper (Sevenoaks), S. K. Doody (Boscombe), Miss B. C. Hardy (Eastbourne), Winifred B. Medway (Clifton), Lettie Cole (Pontillas).

II.—The PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best quota-tion is awarded to Florence K. Robinson, Gibraltar Crescent, Parnell, Auckland, New Zealand, for the following:

THE DOWNFALL OF THE GODS. BY SIR HUGH CLIFFORD.
(Murray.)

"Plucky lot she cared for idols
When I kissed her where she stood
On the Road to Mandalay."

KIPLING, Mandalay.

We select for printing:

HARD PRESSED. By FRED M. WHITE (Ward Lock)
"I had to squeeze her waist or twice"
CHAS. B. WADE, Sky and Simple.

(Rev. Edwin C. Lansdown, The Manse, Derby Road,
South Woodford, N.E.)

THE HUNDRED COLLARS By ROBERT FROST.
"And was not this enough?"
SHELLEY, Julian & Maddalo.

(Gwen Connor, 45, Rossett Road, Crosby, Liverpool.)

BURIED ALIVE. By ARNOLD BENNETT
"Alas, how easily things go wrong."
GEORGE MACDONALD.

(W. J. Nicholson, 52, Kirkland Avenue, Tranmere, Birkenhead)

"WHAT TO SEE IN ENGLAND" By GORDON HOME.
(A & C Black)
"The rain, it raineth every day"
SHAKESPIARE

(Rev. Forbes Yochey, Church of Scotland Mission, Tchang, China)

THE WAY OF AMBITION By ROBERT HICHENS
(Methuen & Co)
"My daughter, that enchanting gurl
Has just been promised to an Earl"
W. S. GIBBERI, The Bab Ballads

(Isabel Butchart, Elliscalse's, Dalton-in-Furness.)

THE SECOND CHANCE. By PAUL TRENT (Ward, Lock.)
"... two beaux to every string"
W. S. GIBBERI, Iolanthe.

(Charles Powell, 290, Oxford Road, Manchester)

THE INSIDE OF THE CUP. By WINSTON CHURCHILL
(Macmillan)
"And not a drop to drink"
COLLIERIDGE, Reminiscences of the Ancient Mariner

(Isabel I. Fogarty, 230, Upton Lane, Forest Gate, Essex.)

III —A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS for the best eight lines of verse to rhyme-endings given is awarded to Mr. G. M. Faulding, of 19, Warwick Crescent, Bayswater, W., for the following.

FONGLOVES.

Fongloves in the dingle are dreaming, are dreaming
Secret the dreams of them and hid from mortal sight
And the purple bells they shake, bells are they but in seeming,
And none have heard their chimes ring out upon the summer
night
No, for in each bell asleep thro' all the dingle's hollow
Hung and swung the tiny elves until their cradles broke
Then they tumbled gaily out and called the rest to follow,
And brownies and baby-birds and fire-flies all awoke

We specially commend the verses by Berwick Sayers
(South Croydon), Miss E. F. Parr (Clifton), Evelyn Grace
Lalonde (Bath), Ethel M. Cooke (Norwich), Mrs L.
Ward (Broadstairs), Horace Gibson (Hull), E. C. Lansdown (London, N.E.), Edith May Brill (Southport),
M. A. Newman (Framlingham), C. E. Bland (Liphook),
B. C. Hardy (Eastbourne), H. M. Barrow (Hastings),
M. M. Burnell (Ashford), Arthur R. O'Connor (Dorridge),
John A. Walker (London, S.W.), S. M. Isaacson (London,
W.), Malton (London, S.W.), Elizabeth E. Woodby
(Stowmarket), H. E. S. Kew (Ashton-upon-Mersey),
G. W. Turner (Burnley), E. Moore (Liverpool), M. C.
Haythorne (Liverpool), F. Hern (Rowlands Castle),
Euphemia Dalgleish (Leith), E. I. Seaton (Boxmoor),
Beatrice Medway (Clifton), A. H. Pennington (Oldbury), Winifred Bourne Medway (Clifton), Irene Wintle (Liverpool), Marian Millar (Bowdon), Vera Walton (Dalton-in-Furness), Emily Sunderland (Todmorden), E. D.

Berkely (London, S.E.), S. J. Hardy (Salisbury), Chas.
Powell (Manchester), N. S. (Birmingham), J. Muhlhauser (Braintree), C. W. Rodmell (Sutton-on-Hull), Winifred Marsden (Matlock), Margaret Dunn (London,
S.E.), Flora Forster (Swansea), Albert Shackleton
(Todmorden), B. J. W. Andrews (London, S.E.), Lettie
Cole (Pontilas), Constance Ken (Ashton-on-Mersey),
A. C. Laughton (Wakefield), S. J. Walker (Sheffield),
Elsie Reid (Milnathort), Cicely E. Ticehurst (Witcombe),
M. M. (Roberton, N.H.), M. S. Macfarlane (Millport), Cecily Adelaide Hallock (Worcester), Bertha Milner
(Tonbridge), Edith Pocock (London, W.), B. D. F.
(Kingstown), J. W. Houchin (Shenfield), L. M. Giffony
(Gerrard's Cross), Eleanor Bull (Ludlow), A. S. Barnard
(Walsall), G. Willoughby (Sheffield), B. S. Maxwell
(Great Crosby), W. M. Lodge (Upper Norwood), E. M.
Herring (Weston-super-Mare), Harold Horton (Manchester), May Jenkinson (Tulse Hill), Gwendoline Chave (Taunton), David Johnston (Motherwell), Lilian A.
Kerman (London, S.W.), Robert J. Cruikshank (Bournemouth), A. Bertram Johnston (Leith), E. W. Higgs (London, W.C.), M. MacArthur (Selsey West), E. L.
Jones (Woodford Green), H. Everard (Boston),
E. C. Cunningham (London, E.C.), Mrs Charles Wright
(Sutton), J. R. A. Nicoll (Glasgow), Mary Wayman
(Dorset), Mrs. Trevelyan Thomson (Middlesborough),
V. E. C. (Torrington), Rowland D. Lloyd (Bootle),
W. T. Brocklebank (Darlington), J. G. B. Mosman
(Pirrig), Eric Chulman (Hull), A. J. Buggs (Devon),
E. Lewis (Mansfield), R. S. Pollard (Manchester), Green
Cross (Harrogate), Dora Kuder (Taunton), Laurence Tarr (Wanstead), A. Miller (Thurso), G. Sutcliffe (Halifax), L. K. Willes (Rochester), Grace I. Foster (Plymouth), W. H. Usher (Warwick), A. S. Wood (Reading).

Photo by Daily Mirror.

G. Bernard Shaw.

IV.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best review in not more than a hundred words is awarded to Mr. J. F. Harris, of St. John's College, Cambridge, for the following:

"THE GREEN COCKATOO AND OTHER PLAYS."

By ARTHUR SCHNITZLER.
(Gay & Hancock.)

The work of Arthur Schnitzler, with the notable exception of the "Anatol" dialogues, is but little known in English translations. The plays in this volume show his characteristics quite pointedly. There is throughout a marked delicacy of treatment—yet a delicacy almost flippant in tone, as if the writer found life too light and trifling a thing to treat with much seriousness. His psychology within these limits is wonderfully acute; but one feels that the admirable craftsmanship is worthy of a bigger subject. The plays have an individual value as bearing the essential marks of a Viennese mode of thought.

We also select for printing:

"SONS AND LOVERS" By D. H. LAWRENCE
(Duckworth.)

The story is written—without humour indeed—but with such decided conviction, such ease, and with so much "humanness" that it is remarkably interesting. So are all its characters, each has a Soul as well as a Body. The intensity of the mother lives in her son, but owing, maybe, to differences of culture, of generation as of sex, that which is her strength becomes his weakness. And his ineffectualness is the tragedy, while his humanness is the interest of the story. It is a novel which counts.

(J. R., 65, Montem Road, Forest Hill, S.E.)

"MICHAEL FERRYS." By MRS. DE LA PASTURE
(Smith, Elder.)

Mrs. De La Pasture has made a new departure in her latest novel, "Michael Ferrys." The story deals with a young man, who, originally a sceptic, but inspired by love, sets out to discover religious truth, and his ultimate finding of it, after the loss of that love, in the Roman Catholic Church. Besides the skilful portraying of Michael's own spiritual experiences, the religious discussions throughout the book are handled in a restrained and reverent manner, seldom to be found now-a-days in modern fiction.

(Eleanor Pocock, 3, St. Stephen's Road, Ealing, W.)

"STELLA MARIS" By W. LOCKE. (The Bodley Head.)

Stella Maris, child of cloud and mystery, lying at her great window, high above the Channel, her lovely soul full of poetry and fair thoughts, her chamber decked with flowers and served with loving hands, is one of the most enchanting pictures in all

Photo by G. Francis Wilson.

G. Bernard Shaw
(1913).

(Shanklin), Margaret J. Laird (Belfast), Mary A. Kingdom (Leamington Spa), Arthur Davidson (Nairn), E. F. Seymour (Kilburn, N.W.), M. Whitaker (Earlsheaton, Dewsbury), Sybil Waller (Boscombe, Hants.), J. D. S. Waugh (Teddington, Beds.), William F. Robinson (Impington Histon, Cambridge), R. H. Kipling (Devonport), Miss L. Mugford (South Norwood Hill, S.E.), W. M. Lodge (Norwood, S.W.), Miss D. Joyner (Woody Bay, North Devon), Miss M. K. Bostock (Forest Hill, S.E.), J. Drummond; C. Monfries (Edinburgh), Alan C. Fraser (Bridgwater), Katherine A. Fletcher (Winchester), A. H. Mannington Sayers (Monmouth), Mrs. Wright (Sutton), Lucie G. Chamberlain (Llandudno), Rosa B. Froud (Southsea), Eric Chilman (Hull), Mrs. Orr (Earl's Court, S.W.), Agnes Macaulay (Great Malvern), L. H. Cooke (Heaton Moor, Lancs.), F. M. Nicholson (Bebington, Cheshire), Lottie Hoskins (Moseley, Birmingham), H. Rhoda Butt (Littlehampton), J. L. Hope (Newcastle-on-Tyne), W. F. Spalding (Palmer's Green, N.), D. Meats (Nottingham), and Mrs. Sybilla Stirling (Glenfarg).

literature. But can any life be lived in perfect proportion where sorrow is not present to qualify fortune? This doubt makes the picture, though beautiful, scarcely true, and the incursion of the world shatters its serenity, till we are plunged, beyond necessity, into sordid and harrowing detail. Stella herself however, always remains a figure of unforgettable beauty.

(Miss B. C. Hardy, 19, Nartfield Sq., Eastbourne.)

We specially commend the reviews sent in by Beryl May (Farnham), Miss J. C. Herring (Wimbledon, S.W.), Miss M. C. Barnard (London, S.W.), Bertha J. Milne (Montrose, N.B.), Elsie Reid (Milnathort, N.B.), G. M. Northcott (West Kirby), C. W. Rodmell (Sutton-on-Hull), Walter P. Poley (Baltham, S.W.), M. A. Newman (Framlingham), Harold J. Taylor (Ramsgate), Miss J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), Ernest S. Heron (Chester), Mrs. Lucy M. Peaton (Great Yarmouth), Euphemia Dalglish (Leith), L. Weibt

V.—A PRIZE OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO THE BOOKMAN is awarded to Mr. Mac M. Greig, of Mfuleni, Amalilulu, Zululand, South Africa.

WHAT WAS THE ROMANTIC MOVEMENT? *

By DR. WILLIAM BARRY.

I THINK that I understand these American Essays, although written with a minute and elegant obscurity, such as Mr. Henry James delights in. Moreover, I agree with much that their highly-cultivated author lays down, and when I disagree we could at least join issue. But on the margin my pencil has often scribbled "Fiat Lux." Great and deep as are the problems handled, in the main their outlines stand clear enough to be drawn unmistakably, if Mr. P. E. More would translate his alembicated style (pardon the word) into sound old English, as rude as you please. The book is an argument, with illustrations from a motley array of names well known to literature—Beckford, Newman, Pater, Fiona Macleod, Nietzsche—and one man of science, Huxley. All these fall under a critical touch, very surprising at first, which reveals them as specimens of "Romanticism." I quote the word, not as adopting it in this peculiar meaning, but that we may define it before we end. It is a strange galley in which Newman, Huxley, and Nietzsche tug at the labouring oar, and only a press-gang could have brought them together. Newman, I suggest, will have to be landed or thrown overboard. In the sense which Mr. More attaches to his label, the saintly Oxford teacher was not, and never could have been, a "Romantic." He travelled outside that movement and in an opposite direction. Now let us turn a few rays of common daylight on the dark places where wisdom lies hidden—for there is a treasure of it—in our American book.

* "The Drift of Romanticism." By Paul Elmer More. (Shelburne Essays. Eighth Series.) (London: Constable. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co.).

Mr. More has given his readers a preface at the beginning, and a creed in ninety articles at the end, of his dissertations on the spirit which animates the world of to-day as its "dominant tendency and admitted ideal." What does the Zeitgeist know? What does it dream? Its knowledge is called science, its dream romance. It holds by ascertained facts, and that is its merit. But it invents a theory to explain them—atoms, ethers, electrons, evolution—and that is its weakness. Precisely in the same way, when it longs for an escape from the "iron laws" which in Mill's logic were called "uniform associations," it falls back upon impulse and the innocence, or even the holiness of natural instincts, thus clearing out of its path churches, man-made laws, conventions, and in short discarding the old clothes with which humanity has adorned or disfigured itself. This revolt is Romanticism. Not without significance, in the legend of Rousseau, was Diderot, the man who impelled him to win his prize by declaring against civilisation and crying out, "Let us return to Nature." For Diderot is the true father of French, English, German rebels, risen up to pull to the ground, to trample into pieces, and to burn with fire classic models and Christian institutions.

All this, or nearly so, the present reviewer has already committed to print, in the Quarterly or in his "Heralds of Revolt." It cannot be displeasing to him that a younger and very accomplished critic—if an American, so much the better—should be now striking on the same chord with conviction, with emphasis. To diagnose the Zeitgeist, who—believer or unbeliever will deem it a superfluous undertaking? But now mark the result, so far. This new orthodoxy has brought forth a new heterodoxy. We will suppose the Christian religion slain and shovelled away into its rock-hewn tomb. Hic jacet; behold the place where they have laid it. Mr. More, a thoughtful Yankee, writes its epitaph in a single word, "Mythology." So much for that. Church and Revelation shall be dreams in a night that is past. Diderot triumphs; Darwin is the modern Moses and begins chapter one of Genesis in the latest edition. At this very moment, however, when the ancient dogmatist has a rattle in his throat, and Huxley sings "Nunc dimittis," our American remembers, not Zion, but Emerson, and "the spiritualist finds himself driven to express his faith by a series of 'scepticisms.'" O Huxley, consider and see that here is an agnostic more pronounced than ever thou wert! For he refuses credence in atoms, ethers, electrons, and evolution. To him they are Baconian "idols of the theatre," and he says, like the man in "Love's Labour's Lost," "Haud credo." From that sceptical earth no scientific artifice will dislodge him. Doggedly he distinguishes between particular facts granted, and universal laws questioned. He is a heretic to the Church of Science. But his own account of himself is "sceptic and mystic." Might I venture a guess, the grandfather of this recalcitrant was a dwarf at Königsberg with a Scotch name Germanized—Immanuel Kant.

The mystic, appealing to spiritual insight, to conscience, to the "inward check"—call it, if you will, the unexplored remainder of life in every stage—goes beyond Nature, Reason, Instinct, Phenomena, to the something over and above. He is a sceptic only as he will not let himself be cooped within the bounds of time or carried away by the flux. He is clad in triple steel against the reason of the Rationalist, the passion of the Romantic. He opposes Plato to Darwin, and the higher strain of the "Symposium" to an æsthetic which ends in Baudelaire and Oscar Wilde. He condemns the Epicurean Pater with a Greek sentence: "When anyone prefers beauty to virtue, what is this but the real and utter dishonour of the soul?" He laughs at Zarathustra the Superman, who, despite all his strugglings and clamours, remains immersed in the nature, even the human nature, he would fain escape from but never can, for he drifts along the "stream of desires and passions and impulses." Our wild Nietzsche scoffed at equality and trampled on fraternity; yet he adored Cæsar Borgia, whose equal and brother found in many a prison or asylum does not promise well for the Golden Age. What shall we conclude? That science has its mythology, more severe than the Christian? That lawless Romanticism breeds madness in the brain? We survivals from the worn-out old churches have steadfastly maintained thus much, only we did not evaporate the Gospel and the immense world of history bound up with it into what Goethe and Matthew Arnold termed a fairy tale. We were not sceptics and mystics, but mystics and dogmatists. Or, as Newman wrote, "What a veil and curtain this world of sense is! beautiful, but still a veil." And once more: "Time is nothing except as the seed of eternity." These old believers were not men of the stream but looking ever towards the shore beyond.

"Tendebantque manus ripæ ulterioris amore."

It is hardly fair, then, to charge upon them or upon us an error such as may well be cast with all Plato's magnificent irony to the account of "rationalistic" science, and of its accomplice the libertine Romanticism, that sought freedom where none could exist for the soul, and confused the "limitless" with the true Infinite. Our faith in history keeps the value of a Revelation from the world beyond time. Its facts are at once human and transcendental. The mystic also, I would observe to my good author, lives in the realm of phenomena; how does he catch "the secret," although bounded by sense and experience? Let him not scorn history, and the dogmatic believer will acknowledge the spiritual intuition without which, as we of course hold, religion would be impossible. That this intuition, not somehow realising its contents in and through the shows of man's earthly nature, by means of his fortunes and his reactions against the "weary weight" ever pressing on him—that so pure an influence will be a match for evil unless it comes down armed into the valley of the Shadow of Death, nothing in past ages or at our own day tends to persuade us. The incarnate Christ remains the one effective answer to Monism.

Monism—an ugly, indispensable word! Mr. More has laid the question of questions plainly in our sight. "Is there, or is there not, some element of man's being superior to instinct and reason, some power . . . without whose authoritative check reason herself must in the end be swept away in the dissolution of the everlasting flux?" He takes his stand, in opposed attitude to "the general drift of ideas," with "what may be called the universal church of the spirit," whose great masters have been Greeks—Socrates, Plato, Aristotle—and their true disciples Christians—like St. Augustine, St. Thomas Aquinas among philosophers, Dante and Shakespeare among poets. All these did homage to a Divine Reason, antecedent and creative of things visible. And that which in a higher sense we term Romance, but not specifically Romanticism, was the vision of this work-a-day world in the light, and suffused by the reflection upon it, of the eternal splendours. All that may be read and sung to the heavenly measures of Dante's "Paradiso."

But you, oh general and average reader, how I pity your plight! Unhappy, unconscious Monist that you are! God is not in your reckoning. Any name on the posters about railway stations sufficiently multiplied hypnotises you. Now it is Darwin, now Huxley, anon Nietzsche, or to-day Bergson. Do not answer me indignantly that names such as these are never seen on posters. All your literature is of the poster-type. Will you stone me if I tell you with a sad and serious smile that, in the sense once underlying the word Knowledge, you know nothing? But, in simple sooth, what do you know? Once you were humble and clear-eyed enough to confess your ignorance; you listened to the wise and bowed your head to their teaching. Now, will you spend an hour or two with Mr. More, and say at the end whether you assent to his indictment of the vast twin-heresy called science and romance, which ought to be pinned down, as if deadly microbes, under the tags of "super-science" and "degenerate imagination"? "Degenerate" is the medical name that fits, or "abnormal," or "anarchic." It is, let us repeat, the substitution of an infinite-seeming series for the Infinite Divine. Can you, general reader, apply this grandly simple test to erotic novels, to the transformations of Fiona Macleod (one is reminded of certain metamorphoses in Ovid and Francis Beaumont's version of them), to the Dorian Grays, and Second Mrs. Tanquerays, and Anne Veronicas, and—what is the title?—Woman Thou Gavest Me, and—but why search curiously into putrefaction? It is the flux, the stream, the limitless, the "Eternal Recurrence," the never twice the same, and universal chaotic rush into life by following instinct, against all which this American scholar, gentleman, and at the main turning-points even yet a Christian, lifts up his voice. "The romantic movement, beneath all its show of expansion and vitality," says Mr. More, "seems to me at its heart to be just such a drift towards disintegration and disease." But the present reviewer affirmed as much twenty years ago. The Roman Index of Forbidden Books anticipated both of us. It prohibited with laconic decision to orthodox readers "all the amatory fables" of Balzac and George Sand, precisely as Carlyle would have taken them out of women's hands with a phrase too Greek and uncivil for ears polite. The "literature of death" was what in milder mood he named these endless volumes. And, at last, we perceive the reduction to fact and reality on which this quarrel turns. Is our life merely a dream in the Flux, "between a sleep and a sleep," or has it some abiding power, value, significance? "To be or not to be" is ever the question.

I thank Mr. More in that he has leapt beyond "mere literature" and flung himself into the debate shirked by every-day critics, whether Romanticism be, in truth, our Bible. He replies that it is the Bible of Satan, Lord of Death, a liar from the beginning, and as I have said elsewhere, the Great Impressionist. Or, as Goethe, with profounder insight, terms him the "wondrous Son of Chaos." When Huxley veils his crest before Bergson, when Mill sinks prostrate under the strokes of Zarathustra's hammer, when scientific Agnosticism and anarchic Romanticism are seen to be obverse and reverse of the unbeliever's shield—the nineteenth century is over, the twentieth begins.

New Books.

MORE OF STRINDBERG.*

The tide of Strindberg translations (via America for the most part) is still flowing strongly. This celebrated Swede, who in England was hardly more than a name a few years since, is now known to us by a host of works. We are getting his novels, plays, and autobiographies in a really embarrassing confusion. But Strindberg was enormously productive and versatile, and the English translations of his works can as yet but have touched the fringe of his output. All the same, it would be a good thing if publishers

* "Plays." Vols. I. and II. Translated by Edith and Warner Oland. Each 3s. 6d. net. (Frank Palmer.)—"Advent," Translated by Claud Field. 1s. net. (Holden & Hardingham.)—"Easter, and Stories." Translated by V. S. Howard. 5s. net. (Grant, Richards.)—"By the Open Sea." Translated by Elle Schlessner. 6s. (Frank Palmer.)

would now give Strindberg a rest. He is not the kind of writer whose works have the highest value apart from the personality of the author, and consequently one soon wearies of reading him when one has grasped what sort of a man he was. And Strindberg, in spite of his versatility, does reveal himself as few writers do. How soon one achieves a mental picture of that morbid, subtle, and, unhappy mind! It is not an attractive picture, but it is certainly a curious and singular one. Strindberg was that mixture of strength and weakness, of anarchy and conservatism, of sanity and madness, that is almost bound to be a failure. His works are by no means those of a great artist, though they are those of a great man of letters. For not only was he far too personal, but he was far too careless. His writing shows fatal signs of haste and a certain lack of distinction is constantly marring his

Reproduced by kind permission of Lieut Col C. a'Court Repington

George Bernard Shaw.
By Will Rothenstein.

finest effects. He despised Ibsen (though his work shows many affinities), but Ibsen's fame is likely to outlive that of Strindberg by many a long year. For, quite apart from the matter of intellect, Ibsen was a supreme artist. The very eagerness of Strindberg's intelligence has militated against him—it has militated against him as an artist, and it has militated against him as a deep thinker. All the same, he is a striking man and must be carefully considered.

The volumes before us now are five in number, and we will take them in the order they appear. First come the two volumes (a third is to complete this set) of his plays. These contain the following plays: "The Father," "Countess Julie," "The Outlaw," "The Stronger," "Comrades," "Facing Death," "Pariah," "Easter."

"The Father" is one of Strindberg's blows against the influence of woman. It is the story of a man who is being driven mad by the petty, callous, and wicked conduct of his wife. The last straw comes when she hints that, for all he knows, he may not be the father of her daughter. This play was one of the first of his productions to give Strindberg a European reputation. The hero is a kind of Strindberg, apparently. Probably the play loses much in translation, for to an English reader the situation is an improbable and unconvincing one. Such pitiful weakness of character as the father displays almost warrants his wife's endeavour to prove him insane, and the actual outbreak at the end strikes one as too far-fetched.

"Countess Julie" is an unpleasant and powerful story of the seduction of a footman by the high born daughter of the house. The footman, cringing and then domineering, and the girl, haughty and then miserable and subservient, are presented with depressing reality. This is a sordid play, but one of Strindberg's real successes.

"The Outlaw" is a drama of the ancient life of Iceland. This is a poor play, without much significance. The dawn of Christianity is shown swallowing up the faith of the old gods. "The Outlaw" was one of Strindberg's earliest dramas and was written in 1870. It was the means of gaining for its author a pension from the King of Sweden.

"The Stronger" is a little play in which there are two actors but only one speaker. The actors are both women. The one who talks is the wife and the silent one is the mistress of the same man. This is an extraordinarily brilliant piece. It is no more than eight pages in length. The wife proves herself "The Stronger."

"Comrades" is a comedy whose moral or point is much the same as that of "The Father"—i.e., the inferiority of woman. It is a play written round French Bohemian life, though the figures are Swedes. An artist and his wife have both sent pictures to the Salon. The artist knows that his picture is good enough to be hung and that his wife's picture has no chance; therefore, in order to give her some pleasure, he changes the tickets on the pictures, to make it appear that she is the artist of his. She hears that her picture is accepted and his rejected. Immediately she becomes patronisingly offensive. They are giving a large party the next evening, and, to humble him to the dregs, she arranges that his refused picture shall be brought back home in the middle of it, when all the guests are assembled. Of course it is her picture that appears. The result can be imagined.

"Facing Death" is a short play about the unsuccessful keeper of a pension in Switzerland and his grown-up daughters. This, too, is a savage attack upon women—not so much upon the daughters as upon the dead wife, whose sinister influence has vitiated the daughters' opinion of their father. The final tragedy is not convincing.

"Pariah" is a much more impressive little play. This is a duologue between two elderly men—one a convicted thief and the other an upright man who has killed someone in a quarrel. The psychology of this duologue is exciting and its lack of action only enhances the atmospheric effect.

"Easter" is a long, semi-symbolic drama beginning in despair and ending in happiness. It is the story of a family ruined by the father's crimes, for which he is now in prison. The blighting touch of this one man lies upon every character except upon that of the chief creditor, to whom he had once, long ago, done a kind action. The figure of Eleonora, the half-witted girl, is one of Strindberg's most touching creations, and indeed the figures in general have a warmth that is not too common in his work.

The next book consists of the one play, "Advent." This is called a mystery play, and it is assuredly as incoherent as any mystery play ever was. It mixes real life and spirit life in a bewildering and, one might say, an almost illegitimate fashion. Moreover, its construction is weak, its meaning vague, and its interest slight. The wicked grandparents are the main figures, and they are most disagreeable old people indeed. "Advent" may have some hidden and esoteric message, but on first reading it seems little better than a bundle of nonsense.

"Easter" includes the play of that name and the volume of half-fairy stories called "Midsummertide." "Easter" we have already examined. "Midsummertide" was published a short time ago as a separate book. The stories in it are told in the easiest of language, and some of them might appeal to children. On the other hand, some are too advanced for that, and all of them have a sort of intellectual simplicity which children would probably divine and dislike. Such a book as this shows Strindberg in a new and charming light.

"By the Open Sea" is a novel of the Swedish skerries or islands. In it Strindberg attacks cultivated women and fisher-folk with an equal and scalding violence. It is the story of an intellectual man who becomes Superintendent of Fisheries in the outlying islands of the Swedish coast, and who gradually loses his reason under mental tortures. This depressing and imaginative novel was written, we believe, before Strindberg's own breakdown, but it is a kind of presage of that event. For if the hero, Axel Borg, is meant to be Strindberg himself—and he certainly gives one that impression—then Strindberg seems to have foreseen his own debâcle. "By the Open Sea" loses as a novel by its intensely self-centred and didactic atmosphere, and by its lack of unity and proportion. It reads like the work of a man without balance or perspective. Its creative force is entirely inward, and not suitable to the subject of a novel of the sea-shore. The truth is, Strindberg's genius does not shine in fiction save in that of the veiled autobiographical kind. He was no creator of personality, though he could conjure up certain types from his profound knowledge of the stupidity and baffled hopes of mankind. As a novel, "By the Open Sea" is a failure; as a chapter of Strindberg's own experience it is a painful success.

RICHARD CURLE.

PEACOCK PIE.*

How pleasant it would be only to review books when I like them—not when I think I see from afar off that they are good, but when I really like them. Yet I am not sure, because the muscles of happy praise become stiff and I shrink for the other man's sake and my own, from giving a display of ungainliness. I feel this very much after reading, "Peacock Pie." I do not suppose that Jack Horner would have been harder hit than I am, if he had been asked to extend the words "What a good boy am I," to a sonnet's length. I am continually putting in my thumb, pulling out a plum, and experiencing a sensation which cannot, I should say, be surpassed by consciousness of virtue.

The book is worthy of its name. That is to say, in the first place, it is a pie. It is something to be eaten. Furthermore it consists of pastry and of something else covered up by the crust. In the second place, that something else in the pie is discovered to be so much above the ordinary pigeon, steak and kidney, or veal and ham, that it must be called Peacock Pie. Most of it can be eaten with only one possible cause of regret, namely, this undoubted fact, first delivered by Mr. de la Mare :

* "Peacock Pie: A Book of Rhymes." By Walter de la Mare. 3s. 6d. net. (Constable.)

"It's a very odd thing—
As odd as can be—
That whatever Miss T. eats
Turns into Miss T."

Not all can be eaten, or it would not be Peacock Pie. What cannot be, what does not give precisely that feeling which, I suggest, is as pleasant as consciousness of virtue, what represents the peacock's glorious uneatable plumage, is none the worse for that. I mean the poems like "Nobody knows :

"Often I've heard the Wind sigh
By the ivied orchard wall,
Over the leaves in the dark night,
Breathe a sighing call,
And faint away in the silence,
While I, in my bed,
Wondered, 'twixt dreaming and waking,
What it said.

"Nobody knows what the Wind is,
Under the height of the sky,
Where the hosts of the stars keep far away house
And its wave sweeps by—
Just a great wave of the air,
'Tossing the leaves in its sea,
And foaming under the eaves of the roof
That covers me.

"And so we live under deep water,
All of us, beasts and men,
And our bodies are buried down under the sand,
When we go again ;
And leave, like the fishes, our shells,
And float on the Wind and away,
To where, o'er the marvellous tides of the air,
Burns day."

It is now pretty well-known that Mr. de la Mare is a master, is the master, in this style. And in the new book he gives us a variety of choice examples : I will quote one more :

"I heard a horseman
Ride over the hill ;
The moon shone clear,
The night was still ;
His helm was silver,
And pale was he ;
And the horse he rode
Was of ivory "

You cannot be said to eat these things, but to absorb them chameleon-fashion.

But except to those who saw the Christmas number of the "Poetry Review," and the fortunate ones who bought (with the deservedly less fortunate ones who borrowed and returned) "The Three Mulla Mulgars," an unrivalled romance for many sorts of children, it is perhaps not so well-known what good pastry, and what peacock flesh, succulent and spicy, Mr. de la Mare does bake—he do. It is not generally known that he sees huntsman in scarlet also :

"Three jolly gentlemen,
In coats of red,
Rode their horses
Up to bed.

"Three jolly gentlemen
Snored till morn,
Their horses champing
The golden corn.

"Three jolly gentlemen,
At break of day,
Came clitter-clatter down the stairs
And galloped away."

There is always at least a phantom of a peacock feather about your helping, but nobody else can mingle so variously jollity with magic as Mr. de la Mare can. His first book, "Songs of Childhood," contained a poem—contains a poem—called "Bunches of Grapes," differentiating three children in three verses, of which the last is :

"'Chariots of gold,' says Timothy ;
'Silvery wings,' says Elaine ;
'A bumpity ride in a wagon of hay
For me,' says Jane."

Now, I cannot be more exact than if I say that Mr. de la Mare's new book will satisfy Timothy, Elaine and Jane. Maybe Timothy will see a silveriness about his chariot horses ; the wings may sometimes carry Elaine to a region so far off and magical as to be melancholy ; Jane may have doubts whether her wagon be not winged ; but personally, I am content to travel any part of England or no man's land with this poet, on chariot of gold, silvery wings, or wagon. "Songs of Childhood" was distinguished by its chariot, "The Listeners" by its wings : "Peacock Pie" triumphs upon all three.

EDWARD THOMAS.

RELIGIO POETÆ.*

Mr. Benson presents us here with another of his fascinating, but rather baffling essays on life. His is essentially a poetic nature. He tells us as much himself, tells us how his nine years' practice of poetry has enriched his power of self-expression, enabling him to write "ornamental and elaborate prose." That seems hardly the mental condition in which to attain the practical and really prosaic end he sets before himself. That end is to teach the average man how to form "plans and designs" for his mental peace, to build a "Joyous Gard," in which he may take refuge from the cares of this world and find a renewal of strength and happiness. A poetical nature, an intense appreciation of the finer and nobler beauties of life, lead to several pleasant but distracting digressions. In the end, however, our "Joyous Gard," is built, and we reluctantly feel that it is built on air. Legions of beautiful thoughts expressed in liquid and melodious prose fill the pages, but they seem to have so little root in any great first principle. They remind us irresistibly of Shelley's line : "Driving sweet buds like flocks to feed in air." There is an undercurrent of the truest and tenderest religious feeling, but it is not brought boldly to the surface.

It is hardly to be expected that such a multitude of thoughts should all be original. Sometimes we are reminded of Marcus Aurelius, sometimes of the main theme of "Milestones," and even of Browning's insistence, in "Abt Vogler," on the objectivity of thoughts and aspirations. But we do not complain of this, because the writer is so transparently sincere, so much in earnest, in spite of the poetry in him which is always tending to lead him off the track. That is the drawback. The very poetic beauty in which these maxims are enshrined, tends to lessen their value for the work they have in charge. Each is a diamond, but diamonds do not build a wall even of "Joyous Gard."

We come to more solid work in his criticism of fellow poets. No wiser verdicts have been passed on Browning's optimism, on Ruskin's intolerance. But have we not "any idea whether Shakespeare had any religion ?" Surely we have. And is it true that "no one is condemned or censured in Shakespeare" ? What about Tago or the warring families of Verona ? But beyond all praise is the remark, worthy of Matthew Arnold, that "what we need in education is some sense of far horizons and beautiful prospects, some consciousness of the largeness and mystery and wonder of life." Here the poet speaks, and yet purer gold are the words on an exclusively poetical subject, the appeal of a sculpture gallery, "faces into which the wonder and the love and the pain of life seemed to have passed. One seemed to feel hands held out : hearts crying for understanding and affection." It is impossible to give the whole passage, which is worthy of a special place among the glories of our literature.

W. A. F.

* "Joyous Gard." By A. C. Benson. 3s. 6d. net. (Murray.)

A PAINTER'S PAGES.*

"Pages on Art" is a happily appropriate title for Mr. Charles Rickett's volume. Chapters on art are too often controlled by the chapter headings. The statement of the theme in the forefront directs all that follows, bending argument and illustration to some preconceived demonstration or pronouncement. But pages on art are free of such professional bias and ambition, or, at any rate, Mr. Rickett's pages are. Though they fall into groups, each with its labelled subject, often occasional, that only attracts into them, magnet-like, impressions, thoughts, feelings, deductions, evoked by each earlier, and already absorbed into the general art experience of the author. And so they are brought back for us enlarged and more variously endowed through this wider association.

Mr. Rickett's volume is thus extremely "personal," and it is packed with felicities of phrase and illustration. The author of the "Note on the Art of Watteau" has no cause to disparage his literary gift, and all the other chapters have passages of appreciation or exposition expressed with a similar sensitiveness. Thus, in expansion of his remark that many of Watts's portraits of men exhibit, what Fromentore defined as the art of painting, "l'art d'exprimer l'invisible par le visible," Mr. Rickett's continues:

"The invisible! the pulsations in the air about a spiritual manifestation, the peculiar rhythm belonging to 'Les gestes insolites,' the appeal to our emotions by some intuitive use of line, mass, tone, colour, or expression—this emotional gist has been at the command of his master in many of his imaginative designs. There is the unexpressed image lost on the brain between the painted gesture and the one which preceded it or must follow it."

Again, in reference to a local element in Dalon's work, and the fact that most good artists focus for us the temper of some locality or period:

"Let us for the moment grant," says Mr. Rickett, "that most art could only have been done when and where it was done. We find, nevertheless, that the major men stand above those more obvious relationships; they catch light from each other, even at a distance, and illumine the future of a great tradition, such as it has been the privilege of Italy and France, the two major civilizing nations, to produce; the masters stand out as beacons on different heights."

Or, again, of Kovior:

"Some writer has spoken of the tenderness and gaiety of his art; to me it expresses something else—his gaiety is that of buds upon huge trees; I would as soon accuse a torrent of tenderness because delicate flowers nestle by its brink; and both these comparisons might be the subject of one of his paintings."

And once more, passing over things in the chapter on "Outamaro"—too delicate to be handled from their context—take this:

"Artists like Moreau watch the past in perspective as it were, through an atmosphere coloured by the atoms of our many experiences and ways of thought—through a subtle apperception of our weakness also, become in turn a subject of interest in a half-longing return to another ideal, more youthful in its immunity from failure"—

a passage of which the paper on Gustave Moreau is an amplification.

These citations will be justified if they convey to the reader the special quality that distinguishes Mr. Rickett's "Pages." But in speaking of the non-professional character of his book, I do not mean any more than that it is free of rhetorical platitude and the customary cut-lengths of criticism. It really keeps close and particular to the selected subject-matters, and illumines them with the direct light of a practitioner. And while the writer cultivates a wide appreciation, and observes his own warning against "a disregard of the personality of the artist that may be exquisite, rare, or even great within the rules of a game in which we are not for the moment interested," he never is uncertain about what, in his view, constitutes "the game" at its highest and worthiest. Here the reader's attention may be specially directed to the chapter on Puvis de Chavannes, with its survey of the modern conception and practice of landscape painting. And one must not end without mention of his energetic attack upon post-impressionism, with its note of sharp scorn heard here and there in other "Pages"—those, for example, on the "Art of Stage Decoration."

D. S. MELDRUM.

OF LETTERS AND THE CHURCH.*

There is an essay in this volume which, short as it is, contains one of the most useful warnings on style that we can recollect ever seeing in print:

"I hate the man who wrote footnotes, they are a plague and a nuisance."

"If they are second thoughts, the author should not have been in such a hurry at first. If they are parentheses, he should have English enough to be able to manoeuvre a parenthesis without losing his way in his sentence."

We seriously advise any young author who may find himself indulging in a footnote, to rewrite that part of his text to which it refers, so as to embody the note.

And yet Mr. Ayscough confesses, with some justice, that many of his own papers are in some respects little better than parentheses; "a series of parentheses, each longer than the statement that embraces it." They were originally written, indeed, for newspapers, or magazines, in which the space was limited by authority, against which the author was powerless. But we cannot help feeling that they might, with advantage, have been rewritten and re-composed into a few longer, continuous essays. This is particularly the case with those referring to Catholic questions, in which Mr. Ayscough's zealous partizanship is reiterated with a seeming pertinacity that may affront the Protestant. Had he stated his case with equal amplitude in one duly considered statement, we should have been saved some actual repetition, and been far less tempted to accuse him of prejudice.

There is much in this matter, undoubtedly, that should be considered with care and respect. The author makes out a very good case for "The Church"; and criticises both our establishment and our dissent with much justice. The consciousness of God has been very largely crowded out of modern civilization; the ancient conception of sacrifice was ennobled by its discernment that "to give something to their gods was a higher expression of worship than merely to ask something of them"; confession "is not a laxative of conscience, but an astringent."

As a literary critic Mr. Ayscough reveals the right instinct; and has given us some very interesting "footnotes" on history. His comparison between Henry VIII. and Charles II. is extraordinarily suggestive. He has certain ideas of his own about Scott, and his enthusiasm for John Galt should prove infectious. He can quote Dickens, Thackeray, or Jane Austen with discretion, and writes with justifiable indignation on our growing indifference to, and dislike of, good books.

Perhaps, however, the most subtle, and original, essays in the whole volume are those on the distinction between "Dress and Clothing," on the lost arts of deportment, and of sitting still, "which is the A.B.C. of spirituality."

"My rule," said an American lady, "is never to walk when I can ride, and never to ride if I can drive, and never to drive if I can sit still."

"And what," demanded her brother severely, "do you suppose your legs were given you for?"

"To balance myself with when I do sit still," she replied serenely.

The fact is that Mr. Ayscough has something interesting to say on a great variety of subjects, and always writes with effect. He thinks for himself, though he believes in authority. There is an atmosphere of cultured leisure and a broad-minded outlook about "Levia Pondera," which is singularly refreshing by way of contrast to more typically modern work.

R. BRIMLEY JOHNSON.

* "Pages on Art." By Charles Ricketts. 7s. 6d. net. (Constable.)

* "Levia Pondera": An Essay Book. By JOHN AYSCOUGH. 5s. net. (Longmans.)

MARK RUTHERFORD.*

Some of us are only just beginning to realise that in Mark Rutherford we have lost one of the greatest of the great Victorian novelists. No comparison is to be drawn between his work and that of Thackeray, or Dickens, or Meredith; his style, his habit of thought, his whole attitude towards life, differed from theirs; his range was more limited, but within his limits he was the truer and finer artist. He has no eccentricities, no tricks of exaggeration, but draws his characters and the world they inhabit with the exactest fidelity. The power and effect of his stories lie in their sheer, unheightened truthfulness. He is as quietly, unaffectedly realistic as Trollope, but he had a depth of feeling, a strength of imagination, a spiritual insight and a charm of style that were no part of Trollope's equipment. One cannot readily define that charm of his style; it has no wealth of magic epithets and jewelled phrases, but is beautiful with a sort of Quaker simplicity, as clear and sharply defining as the light of dawn. That the style was the man these autobiographical notes will make plain to any who do not know it already; they indicate, too, what early influences went to the making both of the man and of his style.

Writing of his father, he says:

"There was one endowment for which he was remarkable, the purity of the English he spoke and wrote. He used to say he owed it to Cobbett, whose style he certainly admired, but this is but partly true. It was rather a natural consequence of the clearness of his own mind and of his desire to make himself wholly understood, both demanding the simplest and most forcible expression. If the truth is of serious importance to us we dare not obstruct it by phrase-making; we are compelled to be as direct as our inherited feebleness will permit. The cannon ball's path is near to a straight line in proportion to its velocity. 'My boy,' my father once said to me, 'if you write anything you consider particularly fine, strike it out.'"

His father also quoted with approval a saying of Burdett's: "Painted glass is very beautiful, but plain glass is the most useful, as it lets through the most light." No man could consciously form such a style as Mark Rutherford's by deliberately striving to act upon such precepts as these, but the precepts happened to be suited to his temperament; his way of thought and his manner of writing were alike the natural outcome of his character, his upbringing, and the youth he lived amid the surroundings and under the influences he describes so quietly but so vividly in these pages. He was born in Bedford High Street, in December, 1831. He came of a Radical and Dissenting ancestry; his father, a very active Whig in politics, was a printer and bookseller in Bedford, and had much to do in the affairs of the town, particularly in the management of the schools connected with the Bedford Charity. In his later years he was appointed door-keeper of the House of Commons, and "while he was at the door he wrote for a weekly paper his 'Inner Life of the House of Commons,' afterwards collected and published in book form."

There are glimpses of life in and about Bedford in the old coaching days, and some delightful vignettes of relatives and neighbours, such as this:

"I had an aunt in Colchester, a woman of singular originality, which none of her neighbours could interpret, and consequently they disliked it, and ventured upon distant insinuations against her. She had married a baker, a good kind of man, but tame. In summer-time she not infrequently walked at five o'clock in the morning to a pretty church about a mile and a half away, and read George Herbert in the porch. . . . She was most affectionate to me, and always loaded me with nice things whenever I went to see her. The survival in my memory of her cakes, gingerbread and kisses has done me more good, moral good—if you have a fancy for this word—than sermons or punishment."

* "The Early Life of Mark Rutherford (W. Hale White)." By Himself. 2s. 6d. net. (Humphrey Milford, Oxford University Press.)

He tells briefly of his theological difficulties, and how the unorthodoxy of certain of his views brought his study for the ministry to an end; of the effect that the reading of Wordsworth had on his religious belief; his experiments in journalism; his meeting with George Eliot, of the enthusiasm there was for literature in that Victorian age which superior persons now despise. He recalls how "'Maud' was read at six in the morning as I walked along Holborn; 'Pippa Passes' late at night in my dark little room in Serle Street, although, of course, it was long after the poem made its appearance." If the Victorian time was ugly and vulgar, it was, as he gently hints, the birth-time of greater books than we are producing nowadays.

There is no pretence in these pages at a full autobiography even of Mark Rutherford's early years. "I have been asked at seventy-eight years old," he explains at the beginning, "to set down what I remember of my early life. A good deal of it has been told before under a semi-transparent disguise, with much added which is entirely fictitious. What I now set down is fact." And, "These notes are not written for publication," he says at the end, "but to please two or three persons related to me by affection," but he made it clear to his family that he did not object to their being made public, and his son, Mr. W. Hale White, is more than justified in the belief expressed in a foreword that "they may interest a few beyond the 'two or three persons' for whom they were intended." They will interest more than a few, for though Mark Rutherford is still only on the threshold of his fame, his public is now a large and a fast increasing one.

A.

Mark Rutherford
at the age of 24.

From "The Early Life of Mark Rutherford" (W. Hale White), by Himself (Humphrey Milford)

THE MODERN NOVEL.*

Was there ever a time when there were so many able practitioners of the art of fiction as at the present day?

All the eight examples of the modern novel on my desk, exemplify the general level of excellence at which we have arrived in point of workmanlike execution. If the genius of the age does not lie in the direction of a "Comédie Humaine," that is not to say that fiction is not giving us a complete contemporary picture of life, although it is the work of several pens, and not of one only. In short, it is the age of talent, and while waiting for genius, let us be thankful for the present day harvest.

We cannot escape the specialist. His formidable thoroughness and almost disconcerting courage tend to convert the Elysian fields into a laboratory or a dissecting room. If a theme—any theme—can in the last resort be justified by its treatment, then "The Sentence of Silence" by Mr. Kauffman, cannot be cavilled at overmuch. Let it be said at once that the silence Mr. Kauffman denounces is the parental silence about the facts of life as it affected the life of Daniel Barnes, the son of an American storekeeper. The work is an earnest sociological study rather than a novel, and this idea of a scientific treatise is accentuated by the fact that every chapter represents a numbered section. What story there is becomes painfully sordid as soon as Barnes leaves home, and the ugliness of the theme is accentuated by his marriage to Judith. His old mother and Gideon, a confidential clerk, are pleasant and wholesome figures in a sincere piece of special pleading.

* "The Sentence of Silence" By Reginald Ralph Kauffman. 6s. (Howard Latimer).—"The Pot of Basil." By Bernard Capes. 6s. (Constable).—"Black Honey" By C. Ranger Gull. 6s. (Greening).—"Happy-go-Lucky." By Ian Hay. 6s. (Blackwood).—"Knockings-green Days." By Jackson C. Clark. 6s. (Methuen).—"Mr. Whybrew's Princess." By Howard C. Rowe. 6s. (Alston Rivers).—"The Red Mirage." By I. A. R. Wylie. 6s. (Mills & Boon).—"Thane Brandon." By F. Bancroft. 6s. (Hutchinson.)

In "The Pot of Basil" by Mr. Bernard Capes, the reader finds himself at once transported to Colorno, "the petty Versailles of the Dukes of Parma," a region of romance. Those curious about such things have an opportunity of trying to connect the main fabric of this wholly delightful story with Continental history. It will be judged, therefore, that the historical element is by no means obtrusive. Those who know Mr. Capes' work need no assurance that the bright face of romance is made to glow for them with that dexterous felicity which never allows the dust of the schoolmen to raise an obscuring cloud. Tiretta, like a true troubadour, is sent to sound the praises of his august and chilly master in the ears of the fair Isabella, and the reader is soon absorbed by one of those complications which belong to the Paolo and Francesca genre. The lovers and the love-making, the machinations of mean minds, and the rare beauty of Aquaviva's gardens, are realised for us with refreshing charm and skill.

Something like a distinct success has been achieved by Mr. C. Ranger Gull within the limits of the conventional field in which his latest story is laid. "Black Honey" might at any time have dropped into absurd melodrama, but the tissue of exciting incidents carries sufficient conviction "to bring about that willing suspension of disbelief which constitutes poetic faith." The story opens on board a liner, with a conventional group of people, among whom is Charles Curtis, the ship's doctor. He commands the limelight, from the moment when, at Malta, accompanied by an antiquarian, he comes across evidences of the ancient ritual of the Rosy Cross, a secret society, which General Baird, late governor of Malta, has been instrumental in breaking up. The doctor falls in love with the General's daughter, and settles down in Kent on a comfortable estate he has inherited. The story then resolves itself into a duel between the doctor and the General, and the secret society. "Black Honey" is thrillingly interesting.

If I were a doctor, there are many patients for whom I should prescribe "Happy-go-Lucky" by Mr. Ian Hay. People who despair of the British Empire, or are victimised by the hundred and one discontents of the day, ought immediately to make the acquaintance of The Freak and Tilly, of Connie Carmyle, and as merry a company of people as you are likely to find within the covers of a book this season. Dick Mainwaring, otherwise The Freak, is indeed a breezy fellow—inconsequential, good-hearted, and unspoiled by cakes and ale. How he finds and fights for the real golden girl, Tilly, the daughter of a broken-down scholar, and confronts his mother, Lady Adela, with some salutary facts in relation to life and love is imitatively told. There is no plot worth speaking of, but there is life and lively incident in riotous abundance. "Knockins-green Days" is another book that can be heartily recommended for those who are "under the weather," and like a good, rollicking story of Irish life. Carmichael, the young squire, his sister Kitty, Billy Devine, and last but not least, Jimmy McGaw, the old gardener, are characters worth knowing. There is a splendid account of a St. Patrick's Day celebration, among other good things, while the way Jimmy "holds up" his master's guests, provokes an uncomfortable amount of laughter.

As the problem of the Balkans is always in a state of settlement, any novel that traverses at all well that region of hectic possibilities, is sure to provide interesting holiday reading, even though it seems to be an echo of "The Prisoner of Zenda." Mr. Rowe handles incident and adventure with zest in "Mr. Whybrew's Princess." It is diverting to follow Mr. Tedder, the London chemist—though a prince—and his daughter, Daniel, to the little kingdom of Transiola, and the plot, fathered by Count Karstein, to put him on the throne. Thanks to the riches and devotion of Mr. Whybrew, wonders happen, and there is plenty of exciting "business" with Prince Demetrios of Transiola. The fight for the castle is really rousing, and the outcome of it all just what the sentimental reader would desire under the circumstances.

The author of "Thane Brandon," Mr. F. Bancroft, has previously done some excellent work in the South African field of fiction, and the present novel is another very able story in the same genre. The time is the close of the South African War. The conflict is seen at close quarters, and it provides a strong and moving plot. Thane Brandon, an Englishman, whose elder brother is married to a Boer, is in love with his sister-in-law, Johanna de Bruyn. Both lovers are loyalists, and she is forced to realise the struggle as "an actual living Presence that had invaded her path." They remain in opposite camps, and before peace is declared, another girl, Mabel Lane, is forced into Thane's life by the fatality of the situation. The Boer attack on the "Outspan" the home of the Brandons, and the dénouement is a graphic piece of work in a story of compelling interest.

The desert is an appropriate setting for the moving and passionate theme treated by Miss I. A. R. Wylie in "The Red Mirage." Here is no vaguely drawn environment suggesting laborious hours in the British Museum, but the hot tropical sands themselves, where the Foreign Legion, under Colonel Destin, wage their primitive warfare. The rivalry between three men for the beautiful and callous Sylvia Omney, parallels in intensity the desperate adventures of the lost men quartered at Sidi-bel-Abbès. There, by means of a well-contrived plot, are gathered Captain Arnaud, and Richard Farquhar, who are caught in Sylvia's toils before she meets Colonel Destin. All are men, not dummies. Gabrielle Smith, Sylvia's paid companion, a loyal and high-spirited creature, justifies one's best faith in womanhood. If the contrast between the two women is a little inartistic in its vividness, such strong contrast in characterisation is consonant with the colour scheme of this very human tale.

WILKINSON SHERRIN.

THE SOUL OF THE WORLD.*

"The World Soul" is an ambitious title, but then this is an ambitious book, not in any self-seeking conscious way, but with the amazing naturalness of humility. Mr. Fielding-Hall does not, however, quite stand by his title. His book is really, in its core, an examination of Christ's teachings in the light of the author's own theory of the definite and beneficent purpose of the universe. It is a very daring, very reverent, and often very beautiful humanistic interpretation of Jesus's sayings. The author gives us a psychological examination of the gospels de novo without regard to the systems that have been built upon them, and he has many striking points to make. He writes with a keen and piercing naïveté, a lucidity and humility which obviously owe much to the great exemplars—the gospels—that he has so carefully studied. He states the most heterodox views quite calmly and with something of the inconceivable conviction of the prophet. His book has an eerie effect. Rarely does one read a modern author so sure, yet so little inclined to swagger or be truculent. He does not trouble to prove the most of his statements for us, that is, he does not give us the steps in deduction and intuition which go to make up psychological proof. He says in his preface that he does not propose to do this, as such so-called proofs are only elaborations when one deals with hypotheses, and is beyond the help of fact or authority. The result gives his book a rarefied atmosphere that is very stimulating. But unfortunately, when he does treat of matters of fact, he is too apt to allow his ipse dixit.

* "The World Soul." By H. Fielding-Hall. 10s. 6d. net. (Hurst & Blackett.)

manner—acceptable enough for theories—still to command his pen. It is a curious and difficult book to criticize. Its perfect sincerity is obvious. . . It is written in charity and humility. Christ is spoken of with the greatest love, admiration, and reverence, and the author's intuitions are often vivid and illuminating. At the same time, the reader is badly irritated from time to time in his absorbed perusal. In spite of his wisdom and sanity, Mr. Fielding-Hall has an occasional trick of rant which repels us. He winds up one or two arguments rather in the vein of the captain at a Salvation Army meeting. One of the main theories which form the core round which much ingenious argument is spun is that "the world has been worshipping what it will become." This is not new of course, but Mr. Fielding-Hall's way of maintaining it is. He sees in Christ the greatest thinker and philosopher the world has ever known, but his interpretation of His life is simply a humanistic one. We are to realise the logos that was in the world from the beginning, and that is the purpose of all thought and all emotion. This is a serious and beautiful book, marred only, as I have said, by an occasional suspicion of rant.

CROWDS.*

Mr. Lee, whose "Inspired Millionaires" made quite a sensation a short time since, has given us now in "Crowds" a huge, incoherent, and optimistic study of democracy. It is really the most impossible of books to review in any detail, because it is just one enormous jumble of ordinary, fantastic, and acute ideas. Mr. Lee is American to his finger-tips, and he does not spare us an ounce of his nationality. He is cheerful, slangy, dogmatic, strenuous—and all the other things we expect from a typical American. And he is also, as I said, crammed full of all sorts of notions, which come tumbling on the heels of one another like an avalanche. His very first paragraph is a kind of trumpet-call of his beliefs; and that alone may very well prove enough for some of his readers. I give it in full.

"The best picture I know of my religion is Ludgate Hill as one sees it going down the foot of Fleet Street. It would seem to many, perhaps, like a rather strange half-heathen altar, but it has in it the three things with which I worship most my Maker in this present world—the three things which it would be the breath of religion to me to offer to a God together—Cathedrals, Crowds, and Machines."

So in these first sentences he gets started in his stride, which lasts with equal vehemence for very nearly six hundred pages. The man who wants a sustained, a logical, a clear argument, will get little out of "Crowds." It is apparently meant more as the confession of a faith than as an essay in popular philosophy. It is written with good-natured fervour, but its eloquence is too often the slave of vulgarity. For it is a "modern" book to the nth degree, and can't be bothered with the graces. It's like a great, clumsy, violent hand trying to tear out before us the vital secrets of life. An enthusiast wrote this book, and it needs an enthusiast to understand it. To speak frankly, in fact, no one but an enthusiast or a reviewer is ever likely even to get to the end. Two hundred thousand words of Mr. Gerald Stanley Lee is no joke!

And yet I don't want only to disparage this work. For, in its own way (and I don't quite know what that way is), it must be a remarkable performance. Reading it gives one an uneasy, bewildering sensation—rather like what one feels in a dream when one knows that something very important is taking place, but one can't actually realise what it is. For Mr. Lee is a regular fountain of energy. His thoughts bubble up from him almost before your eyes. You feel that he can't keep pace with them on the page. If only he would be a little more coherent, a little more critical, a little more condensed—and, may I add, a little less "modern." Disquisitions on Christ, on Pierpont Morgan, on Tom Mann, on Woodrow Wilson, on Allen Upward, on Rockefeller, on Carnegie, and on a great many other people, are jammed in amongst heaps of miscellaneous opinions, assertions, and incomprehensible doctrines. It is all the wildest cataclysm—and yet it has a certain vitality and fascination. And ever and anon Mr. Lee makes an aphorism that is well worth remembering. Here are a couple:

* "Crowds." By Gerald Stanley Lee. 6s. (Methuen.)

"When one is being pessimistic, one almost always has the feeling of being rather clever."

"Toleration is reverence. It is the first source of courage for other people."

So with this final note of qualified approval we can leave the astonishing author of "Crowds."

R. C.

A FEMINIST COMPROMISE.*

The feminist whose emotions are for ever at war with her ideas must have been strongly at work in Miss Willcocks' mind when she planned Sophie Revel. It is ours to find in the course of a full and complex story how far the author and her heroine make a compromise of the two forces in the end. The interval between Sophie's birth and the arrival of her second son is as crowded with revolts and experiences as any modern minded reader can desire. Nor could it well have been otherwise, considering her strain and her upbringing. Her mother was a Frenchwoman who forsook the English doctor she loved for fear of spoiling his career, and the curious amends she makes is to hand Sophie over for him to educate. A kind of west-country Quixote himself, he fills the girl with liberal ideas in regard to science, sex, religion, everything; and then commits suicide at finding himself the victim of a cruel suspicion on her part which he could have dispelled by a word. She has declined to save his fortunes by marrying a rich young cub of a neighbour, and then when she finds herself thrown on her own resources, she marries a man very little his superior and, except for a bent towards astronomy, a replica of him in his egotistical ideas. Marriage now means tearing Sophie from a hearty and congenial home-life with his people, and planting her among strangers in a flat, like a stipendiary mistress. Release arrives unexpectedly in the shape of his death. Blame for this attaches in part to the physician, who is acting in a fuddled condition, and actuated by an old family feud. But this widowed medico, with a daughter as old as herself, has just enough of the Quixote in him to enlist Sophie's interest, and we leave her rich in a sudden legacy, and married to a man who too much resembles her dead foster-father to make him really bearable. Two grey-haired medical visionaries are too many in one book, especially when they dabble in suicide and homicide, and we cannot but feel that, except for certain outbursts of professional devotion in these two doctors, the balance of merit is all on the feminine side. The only injustice the author does her sex is selecting too many women about her who are fat, and, indeed, the procession of bulky ladies through her pages grows monotonous. Miss Willcocks is a little arbitrary in her incidents, as we have shown, and this agrees with her frequent descent into a zigzag style of thought; but there is no mistaking the vigour of her invention and her pen, or the power of her rather frequent descriptive passages. And her handling of a quick and volatile feminine mind shows true instincts in psychology.

* "The Power Behind." By M. P. Willcocks 6s. (Hutchinson.)

Photo by Elliott & Fry.

Mr. Gerald Stanley Lee.

B. P.

SHAKESPEARE AND THE THEATRE.*

Reading through this book one realises what the steady pressure of Mr. Poel's influence must have been for many years, even to those who thought they were working independently, and who had no knowledge of these articles of his when they lay in various weekly journals or in papers read before the Elizabethan Literary Society. He, more than any other, is responsible for the simple elementary logic of the statement that Shakespeare cannot be understood justly save under the conditions for which he wrote; with the corollary that the plays produced under his name by actor-managers with gorgeous accessories and star-parts are not Shakespeare at all, but ambitions of their respective producers. It follows as a natural deduction that the conditions that were capable of producing such plays as those by Shakespeare and his colleagues and confederates are clearly better worth attention than the conditions which produce each year a host of plays that perish with their production. Respect for the dramatist as the real and only arbiter of drama would seem to be a fairly obvious state of affairs; but it has taken Mr. Poel some time to win even common attention for such an idea with regard to the greatest of all dramatists. And it is not until we have surveyed attentively the conditions created by dramatists for themselves that any progress can be made with the reform of the theatre. For the theatre is the house of drama; and drama is the desire of the dramatist. Everything else—producer, actor, scenery, whatever it be—is to the point only as an auxiliary, that mars and obstructs in the degree of its ambition to be more than an auxiliary.

This resolve to strike back to Shakespeare's own conditions is finely characteristic of Mr. Poel's whole attitude. It is not confined to, though it is primarily concerned with, the question of the stage itself. It prevails with regard to the text of the plays, and the absence or presence of definitions in the form of stage-directions. Several of us have in our independent study discovered how hopeless it is to think of understanding Shakespeare in any of the modern editions of his plays, studied as they are with the impertinencies of such eighteenth century editors as Rowe, Pope, Theobald, Warburton, and the rest. The very conception of the great gothic dramatist being harnessed and altered by the representatives of eighteenth century false classicism is a sufficient exposure of the position. It is they who have invented scene-divisions for him, devising different stage-directions to suit the altered case, whereas Shakespeare was not concerned with any locations other than the open stage of his playhouse, on which the play proceeded continuously.

* "Shakespeare and the Theatre." By William Poel. 5s. net. (Sidgwick & Jackson.)

It is not possible to see this in any modern edition. We need to strike back to the original editions. It is here that one parts company with Mr. Poel. As to his general contention there can be no disagreement. Others have independently come to the same decision in the course of study. But with regard to the respective values of the Quartos and the Folio, surely he pays them disproportionate attention. If it be true that the Folio has not Shakespeare's personal sanction, that is also true of the Quartos, many of which are clearly printed versions, the text of which was taken down from the lips of the actors. Whereas we know that Hemmings and Condell were friends of Shakespeare, that they held fellowships with him in the Globe (in modern tongue, that they were co-directors), one of whom, John Hemmings, had worked together with him since 1592 in the Rose in Southwark and in the Theatre, and both of whom lived near his lodgings in Silver Street. When these editors, therefore, included act-divisions it is fair to assume that these marked certain pivots in the production, and so in the construction. Whether these pivots were or were not intervals in the playing, we cannot say. In very few cases among Elizabethan plays need they have been; for the construction, adapted to the organisation of the stage, generally allowed the play to run continuously forward. But that they meant something in the intellectual apprehension of the fable is clear from a careful examination of Shakespeare's construction: a construction to which he is so uniformly faithful that it is possible, without reference to the text, to place the position of any incident by a discovery of its action value. We know, for instance, that the close of the third act marks the close of the crisis of the play; that the fourth act begins the counter-action, in which the antagonist reappears who disappeared near the beginning of, or before, the opening of the action in the second act; and that the play thereupon proceeds with swift pace to the climax in the fifth act. The internal evidence of the plays themselves, in this way, supports the divisions that Hemmings and Condell, who knew the playwright personally and professionally, have marked. Indeed, that some such organisation of the fable took place is obvious in the intellectual necessity of finding it an expressive form. That expressive form would find its occasion in the Folio, because the Folio made a boast in the ranks of authorship. It would not be necessary in the Quartos, even where these were authorised, because the Quartos were primarily handbooks for the playhouse.

In somewhat of the same way we may express the regret that Mr. Poel had not rewritten these articles as a book. More than once they overlap; and in several instances he could advantageously have widened the scope of some of the matter while letting other matter go that had served its turn. The book would have been better so. But, in any shape, we are glad to have these essays by the pioneer of a movement that may produce great results in the future. They are always provocative of thought; and usually they are simple and essential as clear things are when seen by a clear mind.

DARRELL FIGGIS.

THE TRAGEDY OF EDUCATION.*

The authors of those educational reforms which are at present in embryo at Whitehall, cannot, at any rate, complain of any lack of expert, if unofficial, guidance. Books lamenting the inefficiency of our national system of education are being published in a continuous stream, and Mr. Edmond

* "The Tragedy of Education." By Edmond Holmes. 2s. 6d. net. (Constable.)—"The Public Schools and the Empire." By Dr. H. B. Gray. 6s. net. (Williams and Norgate.)

Holmes and Dr. Gray are but two among many writers. But they are a pair of exceptionally weighty critics. Mr. Holmes was until recently chief inspector in the elementary schools branch of the Board of Education, and Dr. Gray was not only headmaster of Bradfield for thirty years, but has had much other valuable educational experience. The careers of the two men, not unnaturally, have led them to produce books of a widely different character. Mr. Holmes is primarily concerned with the "tragedy" of education considered in the main philosophically but with occasional special references to the training given in our public elementary schools in receipt of Government grant, while Dr. Gray is principally occupied in analysing the deficiencies of the education received by the wealthier classes in the so-called "public schools." Dr. Gray's book, indeed, goes further than this. While the "public school" is the central theme of his threnody, he links it up with a review of the conditions obtaining also at the preparatory schools and the Universities, and thus he presents a general picture ab ovo usque ad mala of the manner in which the bulk of the ruling classes are fitted, or supposed to be fitted, for the task of directing the destinies of a large portion of the British Empire. The result of this survey is expressed in terms of profound pessimism:—

I regard the existing condition of English Education with anxiety, as being chaotic, inefficient, and ill-suited to the temper of the times and country in which we live. It is out of joint with the industrial needs of the times; it is too narrow for a country which aspires to keep intact the bonds of sympathy which tie the Overseas Dominions to the Motherland. I believe, in fact, that the future destiny of the Empire is wrapped up in the immediate reform of England's Educational System.

Great as are the manifest disadvantages of such a scheme, Dr. Gray is forced to the conclusion that the State must in the near future "take over the whole conduct of the scholastic world, the Universities included," and organise the profession as a branch of the Civil Service.

But this drastic step would not of itself solve the problem, and Dr. Gray, in his concluding chapters, goes down into the more fundamental philosophical aspects of the question. And herein lies the one gleam of hope, for it is obvious that both he and Mr. Holmes are working broadly on parallel lines. Both men are opposed, on educational, ethical and physiological grounds, to the excessive regard paid to visible "results" as exemplified mainly in the tyranny of examinations, to the evils of dogmatism ("I am a blessed Glendoveer, 'Tis mine to speak, and yours to hear," are lines which apply to only too many school-masters), and to the mischief of much unnecessary competition. With such speculations, which he has already given to the world at greater length in his earlier work, "What is and what might be," Mr. Holmes' little book is mainly taken up, and that his theories are right there is little reason to doubt. But the spirit of educational reform, which he advocates so sincerely and so admirably, must perforce be of slow growth, and, indeed, on the very first principles which he advocates cannot be forced upon the country. But this at least can be said: its adoption at Whitehall would go far towards reconciling one with the assumption of all educational control by the Government.

M. H. H. MACARTNEY.

THE LAND OF PROMISES.*

"Let me frankly admit that this book has been written with a purpose. It is one that the people of South Africa will not like. . . ."

In those words, Mr. Ambrose Pratt gives us the keynote to his volume. He set out from Australia to discover the truth, and he has succeeded to this extent—he has put down in print quite a number of true things—unpleasant truths, so far as the South Africans are concerned—facts which will be the more unpalatable because there can be no questioning of them.

* "The Real South Africa." By Ambrose Pratt. 10s. 6d. net. (Holden & Hardingham.)—"Afrikanerisms." By the Rev. Charles Pettman. 12s. 6d. net. (Longmans.)

He has done very well—surprisingly well, considering how short was the time at his disposal. He is a journalist, and his book is journalism; but it is the journalism of the trained observer, and only here and there is he at fault. He bores the reader with references to a Mr. Fisher, an Australian politician, who wrote a futile preface to the volume, and, occasionally, he goes wrong on technical points, as, for instance, when he speaks of "millions of deer, eland, springbok, and other fauna" at the Victoria Falls. Deer are, of course, absolutely unknown in the sub-continent, whilst a springbok in the neighbourhood of the Falls would be as worthy of note as would be one of the Chillingham cattle in St. Paul's Churchyard.

Then, too, he overestimates the capacity of the educated Boers. No South African-born has ever yet come up to the standard which Mr. Pratt seems to imagine some of them will attain. The brains have always been supplied by the imported Hollander, a cunning being, the Afrikaner substitute for political genius. On the other hand, he is unduly severe on the "back-veld" Boers. They have certain good qualities which he has failed to notice. He has made the mistake of expecting to find them wholly civilised men. He has not allowed for the deterioration which must, inevitably, result when the race has spent some three hundred years in the wilderness, under the hardest possible conditions. Really, instead of condemning the back-veld Boers, he should pause and ask himself what the people of his own Australia will be like after three centuries.

So far as the native question is concerned, Mr. Pratt's views are quite sound. He sees, perfectly clearly, the danger of that overwhelming black population, and he has grasped the possibilities underlying that most sinister of movements, the "Ethiopian Church" propaganda, the preaching of the doctrine of "Africa for the Africans." He has met some men, and listened to their views in a spirit of sanity. Englishmen who know South Africa may be annoyed by some of his conclusions, and more still by some of his minor errors, such as the addition of a final "s" to the names of the native races, but, on the whole, they will agree with him.

South Africa is an Imperial Bad Debt—practically speaking, that is the conclusion which Mr. Pratt has reached. He is absolutely merciless in his criticisms of the soil, of the pastoral possibilities, of the mines—and absolutely just. The book will raise him up a host of enemies, both in the sub-continent and in financial circles at home; but it will also secure him many admirers, of whom I am one.

There is no false sentiment about the author—no flag-waving Imperialism, no weak-kneed pro-Boersism, no sloppiness on the subject of women. In Capetown, and in Johannesburg, the Afrikaner ladies, the local "society," will be longing for a chance to meet Mr. Pratt, to meet him with hatpins in their hands—long hatpins. Perhaps he has no idea of returning to the Land of Unfulfilled Promises; at any rate, he would be unwise so to do, after having written of the Afrikaner women:

"They must either read, sleep, or yawn themselves into a state of boredom. They claim, and enjoy, a licence unknown, save in England's 'smarter sets.' . . . Their talk is broad, exciting and subtly challenging. . . . Their eyes brood, their lips murmur veiled criticisms on their fruitless lives. . . . Such women ought not to be mothers. They are a menace to the future of the race."

It is all quite true, but truth does not always tend to make an author popular.

Certainly, "The Real South Africa" is a book to be read by all who are interested in things African. It is, as I said before, journalism; but it is such good journalism that it was worthy of being put into its present shape—into book-form.

Probably, when the Rev. Charles Pettman started to compile his elaborate glossary of Afrikaner terms, he had no idea that it would make so large a volume. He has carried out his task patiently, thoroughly, and for those who desire a work explaining the crude phrases of a crude people it will be most valuable. Personally, I find it difficult to imagine anyone being bitten with such a desire.

Still, for the casual reader, there is much of interest in "Afrikanderisms." The curiously involved, yet curiously childish, origin of many of the phrases is often fascinating. Through it all you find the influence of the native, who thinks on exactly similar lines.

The author quotes a number of writers on South Africa, but he has not been over-careful about his references. For instance—and it is a very glaring case—he puts down "Richard Hartley, Prospector," which is the work of the greatest of South African writers, Douglas Blackburn, to an unknown "Green." This happens in several places.

I should be inclined to assume that Mr. Pettman is himself an Afrikander, or that, at any rate, he is with the Afrikander people in spirit; otherwise he would not have put "Queenstown" under his name on the title page. It would be most interesting, and amusing, to hear him and Mr. Ambrose Pratt arguing publicly on the subject of "The Real South Africa."

STANLEY PORTAL HYATT.

THE HUMAN FACTOR IN DRAMA.*

The receipt of four slim volumes, on the covers of one or two of which appear an imposing array of other play-titles, impels the question—Have these authors adopted the book-method of recording their claims to rank as contributors to dramatic literature? One hazards the wild guess that some of them, in their desire to avoid the stigma of production-failure, have elected to emphasise their claims as dramatic authors by deliberately choosing the less perilous venture of book-format. It may be trite to say that the true test of a play is its qualities of appeal to an audience. Simply stated, a play is a complex collaboration of author, actors and audience. Wanting the two last-named factors, the claim of a play to rank as dramatic literature must always be in doubt. Spite of the gibes thrown at commercial drama, most plays of this description have achieved success because of their broad human appeal.

What, one may ask, is dramatic literature? I venture to say that it is reality expressed by means of dramatic technique. As with the content of all art-forms, that particular section of reality chosen by the author should be specially selected, but need not necessarily be abnormal, nor should it be so rare in its appearance as to be exceptional. It is an excellent ambition to write for a pit of philosophers, but as the author can never be certain of getting such an audience once in a hundred nights, it is safer and saner art to appeal to the public. A play should elucidate universal truths. Dealing with primary passions, its business is to exhibit these in action, and just in that measure of exactness which it succeeds in representing them, so will be the measure of its success, always provided that the number of ignoble passions it portrays is counter-balanced by a greater measure of nobler passions. An author should not allow his audience to think too meanly of human nature. Comedy, for example, should leave the auditor laughing with its characters, and not at them, for, as Meredith has already taught us, the test of true comedy is that it shall awaken thoughtful laughter. To do otherwise is to sever the sympathy of the audience from the characters and court dramatic disaster.

Mr. George Moore's incursions into drama have been intermittent, and their fortunes doubtful. In the play of "Esther Waters" he attempted too much. His characters did their own developing in the dark-room thrown open to them between the acts. His latest play shews his characters being developed by an arbitrarily-chosen plot, instead of the plot arising out of the actions of the characters. In this way the rule as to reality is transgressed. "Elizabeth Cooper" is labelled a comedy, but the plot is pure farce. That an author of the standing of Lewis Davenant should permit his secretary to go to Berlin and appear as the author of Davenant's play, with all the honours attendant thereto, does not come within the range of the Aristotelian, highly probable event. I prefer to regard "Elizabeth Cooper" as the excursion of a literary man into the regions of high farce. The soul of a comedy resides in the idea it sets out to expose. Frankly, one hears the creak of the mechanism in this plot, and the idea, however it may appeal to the dilettante, is paltry. Gabrielle, the strangely romantic Teuton lady and author worshipper, is a type pushed to the extreme of farcicality, which only the elusive witchery and charm of the actress who performed it at the Stage Society's performance made possible. Godby, "second mate aboard the brigantine, the Hannah Maria; at your service," I refuse to believe in—because that stage-type died out twenty years ago.

A perusal of "Thompson" deepens my regret at the passing of so distinguished a writer as St. John Hankin. True, Mr. George Calderon has finished this comedy with a careful pen, but it is all to his credit that he has preserved much of that characteristic clarity of phrasing and mordant wit which distinguished Hankin's work. Much of its comedy consists in the humour of the mind—the quiet, polite smile that is all charity. Thompson was engaged to Helen Vaughan, much to her parents' disgust. Thompson went away to America, and the reports of a wreck, in which another Thompson proved himself a hero and got drowned, gave Mrs. Vaughan the opportunity of informing her daughter that her fiancé had died. But the real Thompson turns up again, the coolest of cards, and to those who did not see the performance at the Royalty Theatre I recommend an early perusal of this volume, to learn for themselves the diverting happenings that arise out of the contretemps. In it, as in all Hankin's comedies, our ideals are disturbed, lovingly enough, but common sense is justified of its children in that there is an eminent sanity pervading the whole of the types represented. The comic spirit flutters overhead, and in no character is it seen at a higher flight than in that of Mrs. Vaughan, one of the most deliciously irresponsible matrons ever created by Hankin.

"The Perfidious Marriage and Other Plays" is not meant for this gallery. It is difficult to know why the book was published, save that amateur players seem to clamour for plots that are obvious and types that are stagey. These demand little creative ability in the amateur actor. The play which provides the title, and two others, are evidently meant to fill in that dreary half-hour which theatre managers utilise by staging still drearier machine-made one-act plays. Their plots and personages belong to the realms of stage-land and can have no part in a criticism that should be a record of reality. In "The Dove and the Duffer" a good idea has been petered-out by a resort to cheap stagey methods, which seems a pity, because the author evidently is possessed of some imaginative insight.

Dedicated to "all who are growing, whether children or parents," Mr. Leonard Inkster's three-act play, "The Emancipation," makes good its claim to a place in dramatic literature, in that it has already stood the test of a stage performance. It belongs to the natural history school of drama, started into life by Shaw and Barker, in that it is a clever and acute study of a human soul in process of development. Jack Arrowsmith belongs to a family of provincial Philistines, whose moral, physical and emotional equipment jars continually upon a sensitive nature, and, in consequence, his wounded spirit is in constant revolt against the tyranny of their conventions. But, as frequently happens, the sheer futility of an artistically sensitive nature struggling against the coarser-grained natures that surround it is made manifest from the beginning. Ironically enough, the young man fails to emancipate himself through his own inherent weakness. The dialogue is easy and natural, and the psychology of the characters eminently right. If the play has failed to find its way to the ranks of commercial successes, it is because the author ignored the taste of the popular audience, to whom the protagonist in this case is entirely antipathetic. The public need not be abused for this—after all, the most famous of dramatists never allowed the sympathetic plexuses of his audiences to fall into a state of atrophy.

* "Elizabeth Cooper." A Comedy, by George Moore. 2s. net. (Maunsell & Co., Ltd.)—"Thompson." A Comedy, by St. John Hankin and George Calderon. 2s. net. (Martin Secker.)—"The Perfidious Marriage and Other Plays," by Leonard Henslowe. 1s. 6d. net. (Stanley Paul & Co.)—"The Emancipation." A Play, by Leonard Inkster. 2s. net and 1s. 6d. net. (Sidgwick & Jackson.)

ROBB LAWSON.

THE SEINE FROM HAVRE TO PARIS.*

In his modest preface, the author talks of this as a "little" work, but, as it consists of 490 pages, and is full of maps and illustrations (mostly charming sketches), it seems hardly the correct adjective to apply. Sir Edward Thorpe has given us in this book a long and learned miscellany of topographical, architectural, and historical information of the Seine from its mouth as far as the city of Paris. He knows the river like a book, and is saturated through and through with its romantic associations. The story of his own cruises (taken mostly in successive long vacations) intersperses his serious descriptions, and makes the work one of a light and pleasing kind. It is a volume that should be on every boat that plies for pleasure between Havre and Paris.

Sir Everard Thorpe is decidedly a learned man, both on the tidal influences of his river and on the history of the river's banks. Nothing seems to have escaped his notice or his curiosity and his knowledge is precise as well as entertaining. His book would be useful to a mariner or an historian. There can be no doubt that Sir Edward will inspire numerous people to follow his example, and, indeed, it is obvious that this voyage must be a very fascinating one. We pass through such places as Caudebec, Jumièges, Rouen, Louviers, Nantes, Melun, Poissy, Conflans, and many another town and village, far-famed in local story. For these borders of the Seine were the home of a great civilization, and the archaeologist will find here much of high interest. Sir Edward writes of it all with enthusiasm and contagious good humour, even if without distinguished literary ability. It is a book for the holidays and has appeared at the right moment. May it have all the success it merits.

R. C.

A CRITIC ON IMPRESSIONISM.*

Very rarely does one find a critic who contrives to be interesting upon more than one art, for by its very nature criticism tends to specialism. That need not mean that the best critics are specialists, indeed the best critic ought not to be a specialist. The fact that criticism necessarily tends towards specialism is the main weakness of the function, for life can never properly speaking be separated from life in any one of its manifestations after the manner of specialism. Each of the manifestations are but illusions when viewed in segregation. It is only when they are seen in reference to the aggregate that they properly reflect the sum total of vitality. For that reason then I am always inclined to suspect the judgments of the critic of one art. The chances are that they will be probably out of proportion and of a certainty out of perspective. This is only natural because all criticism should be in the nature of interpretation, and no proper interpretation can be made of a thing merely in relation to itself. Interpretation depends also and perhaps in the main upon the relation of a thing towards the rest of life, or towards that section of life to which it corresponds. It thus happens that great critics have always held as associates one or more of the

* "The Seine from Havre to Paris." By Sir Edward Thorpe. With Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net. (Macmillan.)

* "The Pathos of Distance." By James Huneker. 7s. 6d. net. (Werner Laurie.)

Caudebec.

From "The Seine Havre to Paris" (Macmillan).

arts and some small or large view of life. Ruskin, for instance was certainly wrong as an art specialist when he criticised Whistler; but he was right in his conception of the fundamental relationship between art and life. If he had been merely an art specialist he would have remained in the memory of man as the critic who made a mistake about Whistler, but as he was a great deal more than an art specialist he is remembered as one of the modern thinkers who showed us the organic relationship between art and affairs. This same test can be applied to all notable critics of life. But there is another type of critic who is related to life in a different way. He records in his criticism the way in which life strikes him, whether it be through one art or many arts, through ideas or through actuality. He has no ulterior purpose than to record such impressions, and consequently he stands or falls by his power to interest—in the long run by the extent to which he himself is interesting. No one wants to hear about dull people; no one wants to hear about shallow people, or foolish people, or the rag tag and bobtail of dufferdom. These are only interesting when seen through the temperament of an interesting personality. Charles Dickens could enthrall us by his descriptions of all sorts of indifferent people, not because they were particularly interesting but because he was of superlative interest. Jane Austen for the same reason could translate the humdrum punctilios of conventional morality and the superficial gossip of the drawing room into magical and attractive pages. A good critic of the impressionist type ought to be able to do the same with any of the objects that attract his attention. But to do this.

it is almost essential that his interests embrace many arts besides being broad-based in experience and observation of life.

Among contemporary critics of the type few fulfil these conditions so well as Mr. James Huneker. It is not so very long ago that he was introduced to the British public by a volume called "Iconoclasts." This book contains studies of a number of modern dramatists such as Ibsen, Hauptmann, Hervieu and D'Annunzio, and we were captivated or irritated, according to our attitude or mental equipment, by the emphatic convictions and frank egotisms of this assertive American. On the title page of his book he had quoted from Max Stirner: "My truth is the truth," and throughout the volume he had been consistent in his demonstration of that conviction. Since then he has written other volumes of a similarly assertive and self-revelatory type, such as "Egoists, A Book of Supermen," and, more recently, "Promenades of an Impressionist." His latest volume, "The Pathos of Distance," contains a great variety of diversions and interpretations in the same key. Since his first book Mr. Huneker has clipped the wings of his egotism without losing any of that penetrative quality which was his earliest and most important contribution to criticism. At first sight "The Pathos of Distance" suggests scrappiness. But on better acquaintance this is found to be merely an illusion of its infinite variety. It is not easy to imagine that a writer who crams into one volume of under four hundred pages essays and notes upon such diverse subjects as George Moore and Henri Bergson, Richard Wagner and Pablo Picasso, Toulouse-Lautrec and John M. Synge, is going to say anything fresh or even anything profound about all of them. But all of these artists and writers and musicians are but details of the Hunekerian view of life. They are interesting as details because they are easily co-ordinated with that view. And above all when viewed in relation with Mr. Huneker's other books they are necessary to complete the full expression and interpretation of modern art which is the task he has, consciously or unconsciously, set himself to perform. One of the chief virtues of this writer is that it is not necessary to agree with him to be able to appreciate him. He achieves the grand result of impressionist criticism by making us interested in his own point of view. Besides this the book abounds with vivid little pictures of the personalities of the modern art world and rare glimpses into many a curious by-path of those novelties in literature and painting which nowadays are the causes of so many shocks to the unwary and so many pleasant surprises to those who are artistically awake.

There is one study in the book which reveals the many-sidedness of Mr. Huneker more than any other essay he has written and indeed more than any single one of his books. It is called "New York-Cosmopolis." The very title may be taken as symbolical of the critic's mind. It suggests at one and the same time the most modern and the most cosmopolitan of the haunts of men. Turning over the pages one finds the prose shot and dashed with the names of modern writers and painters, and with classical names both personal and geographical. And reading these pages one is convinced that one is in the presence of that fearful and wonderful thing, the American mind in all its omnivorousness and in all its eclecticism. It is the mind that has sprung from the whole world and fed upon the whole world and produced a variegated mosaic which is characteristic of itself and perhaps the only characteristic of American culture. It may be, however, what we in this country understand as American is only New Yorkist. The New York which Mr. Huneker describes so well. Speaking as a native he says:

"We fly at our music, at our theatres and pictures, as we fly after a tip on stocks. We bolt new ideas and invent new religions every season to match the gowns and hats of our wives. We swallow Beethoven and cry—What next? Wagner is speedily engulfed and we cry for Richard Strauss. After he is gone we try French and Italian sweetmeats. Ibsen is an old story, Maeterlinck a mere fable. Debussy begins to tire. What next? There must always be a 'next' in New York."

The author of "The Pathos of Distance" has put a great deal of this dynamic anticipatory temperament into criticism. And although his intelligence soars above that of the modernist art-tasters of the coterie, it reflects better than any fiction the mind of his cosmopolitan race and its age.

HOLBROOK JACKSON.

SIR GILBERT PARKER'S NEW NOVEL*

Neither publishers nor reviewers need exert themselves unduly in sounding the praises of this fine novel by Sir Gilbert Parker. Its fame is bound to spread spontaneously and rapidly through those more intimate and powerful personal channels which are always at work feeding the inquiries of the insatiable reading public. When you have read it, you will recommend "The Judgment House" to the friends who invite you to name a good story, because "The Judgment House" answers exactly to that description. It is a good story, full of dramatic movement; a story thrilling with intensity of feeling and passion; a strong story dealing with the weakness of strong men and the strength of weak women. The central figure is Jasmine Grenfel, a beautiful, talented woman whose fascinating flower-like personality enthralled more than one man in her privileged circle. Capable of great love, she is capable also of dangerous coquetry, and it is this failing which is ultimately responsible for the dramatic chaos which overwhelms her little world. Ambition for place and power to set off to their best advantage the brilliant gifts which are hers leads Jasmine to jilt Ian Stafford, an exquisitely refined diplomat who is patiently waiting for recognition, and marry Rudyard Byng, a virile millionaire from the Rand, a man somewhat coarsened by his early struggles, yet not without breadth of vision and lofty ideals. The years pass, and Jasmine, vaguely disappointed in her marriage, seeks to recapture Stafford's respect and love. Her success in this quarter and her coquetry in another quarter culminate in a tragic and momentous sequel. Of the many arresting incidents which distinguish this capable novel, two stand out in vivid, almost brutal, relief: the scene in the millionaire's Park Lane mansion when in the presence of a group of Rand magnates Byng's Hottentot-Boer servant is thrashed with the sjambok, the "symbol of progress" in South Africa; and the scene in which Stafford and Byng are brought face to face with the apparent faithlessness of the woman they both love. The last part of the book is laid in South Africa in the time of the war, and here, perhaps the machinery which distributes and collects the various characters to suit the author's purpose is a little too obliging in its willingness to round off the story. "The Judgment House" embodies Sir Gilbert Parker's highest literary qualities and gives to the world a story of quite exceptional brilliancy and power.

S. H. W.

THE LEADERS OF GERMANY.†

So vivid and forceful is the personality of the Kaiser, so various his abilities, and so truly does he constitute himself the mouth-piece of his people, that comparatively little, probably, is known by the average Englishman of those prominent Germans who have helped their Sovereign to give the Fatherland the proud position which she holds to-day in the world. Any such gap in one's knowledge will be to a great extent filled by Mr. Wile's informative book.

The book is not long, running only to 271 pages, and thirty-one different men are "appreciated" in chapters of an almost uniformly equal length (due, no doubt, to a number of the sketches having originally appeared in a somewhat similar form in the Daily Mail); but within these limitations Mr. Wile has succeeded admirably in giving the main facts about each individual whom he describes. His choice of subjects is excellent. Army officers, naval officers, politicians, bankers, men of letters, courtiers, musicians—representatives of all these and other callings jostle one another through his pages. The book opens, appropriately enough, with an account of Admiral von Tirpitz, "the real creator of the Kaiser's fleet," and we think that Mr. Wile's estimate of this really great man is considerably juster than that expressed by Mr. Price Collier in his recent volume on Germany and the Germans. Prince Fürstenberg is another excellent study.

* "The Judgment House." By Gilbert Parker. 6s. (Methuen.)

† "Men Around the Kaiser." By F. W. Wile, 6s. net.

The real power behind the throne, "Max," as he is intimately called, is a man of the most diverse attainments and of the most straightforward speech, and it speaks volumes for both men that he and the Kaiser should have been on such terms of intimacy for so many years. The chapter on Prince Henry of Prussia, too, is especially good. As Mr. Wile says, to fill the rôle of a monarch's brother is frequently a thankless part, and few have played it more worthily than "the Sailor Prince." He appears to have inherited the lovable character of the Emperor Frederick, and one or two little anecdotes about him show him in a particularly gracious light.

If one may single out yet another chapter, a special word of praise should be given to Mr. Wile's account of August Bebel. Not everybody, perhaps, will agree to-day that Bebel "was" the Social Democratic Party, but there is sufficient truth in the dictum for the average reader. It should be added that this book, which makes so timely an appearance in the Silver Jubilee year of the Kaiser's reign, is illustrated with excellent photographs of the personages described.

AN ULSTERMAN ON IRELAND.*

A pathetic interest always attaches to the last work of a man first published after the author's death, but the pathos is deepened if, as in the present case, the writer has been cut off in the prime of his intellectual vigour and with many great promises still unfulfilled. Mr. Monypenny was only forty-six when he died, yet he had crowded into his brief life more of experience and more variety of knowledge than fall to the lot of most men of affairs who have passed the allotted span of life. However opinions may differ as to his qualifications to be Disraeli's biographer, and doubtless most people take Lord Morley's view, Mr. Monypenny could claim a hereditary, as well as an individual, right to express himself on the subject of Ireland. He was born in Armagh county, where his father was a tenant-farmer, who afterwards emigrated to Canada. As a student at Trinity College he took little interest in politics, being vaguely a Unionist because he was a Protestant. His early association with The Times had the effect of crystallising his political opinions, which remained until recent years in consonance with the traditional policy of the Irish Unionist party. After he came back from South Africa he began to study Irish history, and to seek from it some explanation of the difficulties which had nonplussed and bewildered generations of able and well-meaning Englishmen. Of the student of Irish history, he writes:

"He will find England and Englishmen as often negligent as criminal, and by their blunders, as by their crimes, bringing trouble on themselves; and he will find a strangely malign fate intervening at every step to frustrate the purposes of statesmanship and prevent the growth of amity. Irish history is a constant tragedy, a tragedy in the deeper sense, not as the clash of right and wrong, but as the clash of two rights. Proximity to Great Britain forbade the free development of Ireland on her own national lines, her comparative distance and the strip of estranging sea hindered unity and fusion, and in the actual course of events no happy system of co-operation on equal terms or dependence was ever evolved. The original conquest was a conquest only in name, effective to disable the growth of the native civilization, not effective to secure its supersession by another."

* "The Two Irish Nations: An Essay on Home Rule." By W. F. Monypenny. 3s. 6d. net. (John Murray.)

To this no one who is conversant with the history of Ireland will object. Mr. Monypenny, however, does not appear quite to appreciate the effect which Catholic emancipation had on the movement for Repeal of the Union. As long as O'Connell devoted himself to obtaining Repeal he had all the Protestants in Ireland at his back; it was when he subordinated Repeal to Emancipation that the Protestants took alarm, and O'Connell lost his seat in Dublin.

The latter part of the book is taken up with criticism of the Home Rule Bill, and there is little, if anything, in it which adds to our knowledge. If the writer had lived in Ireland during his maturer years, and not viewed Irish affairs from a London office, he might have modified some of his opinions and developed a more constructive policy.

H. A. HINKSON.

RECENT HISTORY.*

The last half-year has produced a number of guides and handbooks helpful to the student-interpreter of modern history. One of the most important books from the original and documentary point of view is a biography which calls for separate treatment—I refer, of course, to Mr. Trevelyan's "Life of John Bright." But a position of the first rank must be accorded to Mr. Gooch's "History and Historians in the Nineteenth Century." This supplies a very complete survey of the whole field of modern history from Niebuhr to Maitland, it is the work of a specialist in the connoisseurship of written history, and is informed alike with enthusiasm and impartiality. The chief places are allotted, naturally, to German, French, and English historians, and the dictatorship of the republic to a German, Ranke—but space is allotted also to American, Italian, and Scandinavian writers; and the work is invaluable to historical teachers and students alike, while readable and suggestive in the highest degree to the general reader and the student of literature.

Mr. Hawkesworth, in his book on Europe from 1814 to 1910, slightly prejudices the reader by his omission in the Preface to say anything of the admirable set of French manuals that cover the period with the clearness, arrangement and impartiality which seem at times a monopoly of the best French scholastic work. He does not mention Monod or, among American books, Hazen's. There is no doubt, however, that for the student who wants a shorter book than Fyffe's and needs a resumé of events subsequent to 1878, the present volume is one of the most useful. It is written with great lucidity and keeps names and dates in proper subordination to the drift of the narrative. The writer is handicapped at the outset by the self-imposed task of keeping all narrative of the Hundred Days out of the picture; but his account of the Napoleonic and industrial transformation of Europe during the first fifteen years of the century is admirably done. The parts played by Mehemet Ali and the Czar Nicholas are very sharply drawn. The confused history of Spain between Ferdinand's restoration and that of Alfonso XII is focussed in a way that makes it possible to the beginner. Recent events in connection with the Far East and the Triple Entente exhibit well the skill of the compiler in subordinating detail to the main story or effect that he wishes to produce.

* "The Last Century in Europe—1814-1910." By C. E. M. Hawkesworth. 6s. (Arnold.)—"A Modern History of the English People—1880-1910." By R. H. Gretton. 2 Vols. 15s. (Richards.)—"La Revolution: L'Histoire de France Racontée à Tous." By Louis Madelin. (Hachette.)—"A History of Oratory in Parliament—1213-1913." By Robert Craig. 10s. 6d. net. (Heath.)—"The Genesis of Parliamentary Reform." By G. S. Veitch. 10s. 6d. net. (Constable.)—"A Short History of English Liberalism." By W. Lyon Bleasdale. 10s. 6d. net. (Unwin.)—"The Making of Modern England." By Gilbert Slater. 7s. 6d. net. (Constable.)—"Lectures on the American Civil War." By James Ford Rhodes. 5s. (Macmillan.)—"History and Historians in the Nineteenth Century." By G. P. Gooch. 10s. 6d. net. (Longmans.)—"The Evolution of Modern Germany." By H. Lichtenberger. Translated by A. M. Ludovici. 10s. 6d. net. (Constable.)—"The History of English Patriotism." By Esmé Wingfield-Stratford. 2 Vols. 25s. net. (Lane.)

For the reader who wishes to work backwards to the Revolution a word must be said in favour of Louis Madelin's book in Funck-Brentano's well-established series, "L'Histoire de France racontée à tous." The results of modern specialism are embodied in this narrative of 700 pages to an extent hitherto rare in popular summaries. The honesty of the old government is shown to be an insufficient justification for un horloge qui retarde. The anarchy preceding the fall of the throne and the indispensability for the time of something in the nature of the régime of the salut public is very clearly made out.

Mr. R. H. Gretton, in his two full volumes on the history of England from 1887 to 1910 has given us an exhibition of the minute-hand in history applied, not to the day before yesterday, as in the case of McCarthy, Spencer Walpole and Herbert Paul, but to yesterday itself. It exhibits for the first time a history based largely upon newspapers, newspaper summaries and year books, with an infusion of the pictorial gossip of the illustrated weeklies. When one reads in our annals of Jumbo, the Druce case and the Wee Frees, and the passion for ping-pong, one cannot help being afflicted to some extent with the sensation of perusing the diary of a Nobody. The frivolity of the big town populations, the ineptitude of our handling of the one big transaction of the period—the Boer War—conveys the idea rather of a nation playing at History. Mr. Gretton has not time to philosophise or to generalise as Lecky does, for instance, in his "History of England in the Eighteenth Century," for he is not eclectic as Lecky is, but tries to give a fairly complete picture or cinema as it were of national activity during a short period. The absence of perspective makes the book very difficult to assimilate. On the other hand, the author is an acute and impartial commentator with a very keen eye for the signs of the times. His work is a stimulating remembrancer and will be invaluable as a key to all kinds of cross-currents for the historian of the future. The impartiality of its judgment and the skill of the author in presentation may be judged by the following A propos of the assassination of the King and Crown Prince of Portugal, King Edward and Queen Alexandra attended not only a memorial service at St. Paul's, but also a Requiem Mass at the Roman Catholic Church of St. James's, Spanish Place.

"There was still, as we have seen in the matter of the Accession Declaration, a body of opinion in this country which regarded Rome as the Scarlet Woman; but that King Edward should be able to attend a Requiem Mass showed a considerable advance in national common-sense and national respect for the sovereign. He was extraordinarily careful of public opinion, and not at all the man to affront it in such a connection, however strong his own wishes might be. There were some who managed to regard the incident as one more sign of the general loosening of ties of authority; the bulk of the people, they said, sat so loosely to religious observances that it had ceased to matter what kind of service the King attended. It was at least equally true that a great part of the nation had infused a new life into their religion. If going to church had ceased among people of education to be a sign of respectability, if men of all classes used Sunday openly as a day of physical recreations, and stayed away from church without any sense of being outcasts, the converse of this state of things was that the people who did go to church did not go for conventional reasons, but for spiritual reasons. Hence there had arisen a new respect for all religious observances—a respect which ceased to regard them as mutually exclusive. King Edward could attend a Requiem Mass without being misunderstood."

This seems on the whole a highly judicious diagnosis. The summary and discussion of the Tariff Reform controversy shows an equally judicious mind in dealing briefly with a most thorny subject, into the abbreviation of which a good deal of thought must have been concentrated. The whole is a very ably performed piece of work, though it would have gained considerably, in our opinion, by the addition of a full synopsis of contents and by the incorporation of a greater number of biographical vignettes of the kind that Creighton and Mr. Paul elaborated and by means of which they did so much to enliven their pages.

Passing rapidly by Dr. Craig's "History of Oratory in Parliament," a rather sketchy outline of the activities of notable orators such as Pym, Walpole, Chatham, Pitt, Burke, Peel, Palmerston, Gladstone, and Disraeli, without any critical apparatus or description either of the sources of Parliamentary oratory or of the different series of debates and their relative value, the right way to use them and to appraise their representative value, we go on to three very interesting historical studies published this spring by Messrs Constable.

"The Genesis of Parliamentary Reform" embodies evidently a prolonged study of the reform movement up to and including the period of the impact made upon it by the revolutionary movement in France. Of the three great stimuli in the history of Parliamentary reform represented by the Wilkes campaigns, the Manchester school, and the activities of Gladstone, the book is mainly concerned with the first. Such compilations as those of Porritt, Erskine May and Oldfield are naturally drawn upon largely for the picture given of the representative system as it existed in Burke's time. But it may be doubted whether a more vivid picture has ever been drawn of the fantastic chaos of the franchise before 1832. The complete indifference of the nation to these anomalies before the reign of George III is instructive. The new spirit of criticism owes its origin primarily to three great changes or series of historical phenomena, represented respectively by the Industrial Revolution, the rebellious attitude of our American colonists and their cry for representation, and, thirdly, the reflections set in motion by the French Revolution of 1789. Mr. Veitch narrates with much lucidity and copious illustration the successive incidents of the campaign for a more equitable representation of the counties and the newly-formed big cities, the leaders of the movement, and the dead weight of inertia, aided by the reasoned opposition of such conservative parliamentarians as Burke, or such capricious reformers (who were irreclaimable Whigs at heart) as Charles Fox, which the new movement had to encounter. In spite of all opposition the movement seemed to be making good progress, owing to the enlightened support of Pitt and the influence which he exercised over city, country and court, when the French Revolution fell athwart its progress. Public opinion now, thanks to Burke and the war, became blindly hostile to the Associations and the Radicals, and the attempts to link the partisans of democracy in the two countries only led to the exasperation of conservatism in England. The subject, after 1795, becomes more and more difficult of exploration as the movement burrows underground.

A book which will appeal to a considerably wider public than Mr. Veitch's is Mr. Gilbert Slater's "Making of Modern England." As the author of "The English Peasantry and the Enclosure of the Common Fields," the author has already gained the ear of the public interested in modern social history. In the present work he presents us with a chart of the chief problems with which the nineteenth century has had to deal and shows us what progress the science has recorded. It is extraordinary, perhaps, when we reflect on the enormous advances made by the "wonderful century" in applied science to realise how crude are the results when we turn to what man has made of man. Man, it must seem, is far more intractable than steel or iron. Then again, at critical periods in his development the people responsible for the conduct and regulation of new powers, controls, trusts, monopolies or what not, seem to be stricken with paralysis and stand by until it is too late. When invention began to be applied to manufacture old England was turned topsyturvy in a mad scramble from the bewildering evil and injustice, of which it has by no means recovered in the course of three half-centuries. It was the same when railways began their monopolies and the motors their murders. No ruler has the nerve to interfere with insolent, triumphant power until it is too late. Much is done in a dilatory way under the name of Reform. Mr. Slater unfolds and describes with succinctness the remedial process in connection with poor laws, municipalities, factories, Protection, labour, public health, education, the workers, Ireland, and the like. The campaign for public health as narrated here is quite a romance, and we learned for the first time the name of Edwin Chadwick, who seems to have been the hero of it. The reports of the Board of Health, the narratives given in such works as "Alton Locke," "Sybil," and "Mary Barton," give us some idea of the horrible state of the poor districts in the new cities during the 'forties, and leave us an impression that England in the age of Pickwick was a good colourable imitation of hell. Enlightenment is a poor thing until we can turn out a better average class of citizen than we do at the present day. But Mr. Slater's book is at any rate a guarantee that the old dismal science is devoting a considerable amount of its energy to the amelioration of "merry England." It seems a little singular that Mr. Slater, who is Principal of Ruskin Hall at Oxford, says so little about Ruskin as a prophet of most of the ideas of social betterment now current. He says little, too, about the significant disappearance of the small trader class, a process depicted with such poignant force by Mr. Wells in his "New Ideas for Old." Nor does he touch the "Christianization of the Churches." Our author is not over sanguine about the present trend of education. Our public schools he finds cursed by the tradition of class monopoly and by the low idea of education for individual culture and private advancement. The idea of a Communitas sensitive to the desolation and misery of each individual unit which forms a part of it, is an idea that evidently has yet to make itself understood. Christianity began with it, but seems to have mislaid it. Mr. Slater gives us a picture of humanity groping, often deluded, chewing statistics in lieu of nutriment, but still groping.

A valuable book for the thoughtful reader has been made available in English in the excellent translation by Mr. Ludovici of Lichtenberg's "Evolution of Modern Germany." The book is concerned with the development of German ideals rather than with the record of material progress, and as a picture of that popular artist, Success, it is of course less popular than the abstracts of Price Collier, Sarolea, Sidgwick, or Ellis Barker. It deals largely with the conflict of conceptions—Germany's conceptions of itself. In Frederick's time Prussia was a fortress against all Europe on the open plain. Napoleon came, and Germany was slow to adopt this ideal and remained still a "kingdom in the air." But Stein and Scharnhorst and then Bismarck enabled Prussian ideas to grow. Population began to increase by leaps and bounds, and the birthrate supplied the fittest and finest soil imaginable for a capitalism on the English pattern. Capitalism generates power, and the slow, heavy, plodding, thorough, robust North German character supplied the raw product par excellence. Here was an ideal basis for capital and Krupp. The serious, strong, stubborn worker, grounded in the rigorous school of military training, was the finest imaginable unit for a nation devoting itself to the cult of power. The methodical will to power, according to our author, has been the creation of modern Germany, and the typical German loves power for its own sake. He deliberately sacrifices the old aspiration for culture and art. All these ideals cool off as appropriate rather to fine women and delicate children than to grown men. And the serious, patriotic German becomes more and more an almost idolatrous worshipper of force, not brutal, tyrannical, capricious force, but force exhibited progressively in the form of intelligent, deliberate power.

A discussion appropriate to the time of year has recently appeared in one of the French dailies as to which are the ten greatest works of fiction. A literary critic writes innocently to know whether so many as ten were known to exist. In a similar spirit one might ask of English Patriotism—if there were really enough of it to fill a book of twelve hundred pages. Amiel, I think, says that Religion is an "état de l'ame." The same might more truly be said of Patriotism. One asks oneself in vain—what is it? We thought we were patriots in 1899 when we shouted for our soldiers to go and fight the Boers, confident as we were that all would be over in three months. But the Boers were very obstinate, and it turned out that we had been duped by the money-power and had not been patriotic at all really. So throughout the history of a nation which pays fellows to fight for it, it is very difficult to distinguish the real thing from that professional kind of patriotism which Johnson denominated "scoundrelism." Of the crude patriotism of the Maoris, the Chilians, the Bulgarians, or the Japanese there is not, I should imagine, very much to be found loose among us. Were Henry V., Burleigh, Oliver Cromwell patriots? There can be no doubt about Chatham, Billy Pitt, Nelson. In literature patriotism abounds. Have we not our Lyra Heroica? But even here it is not the deliberate patriots that stir us to the depths. I can find nothing in Kipling or Newbolt to make the patriotic chord vibrate like the description in "The Trumpet Major" of how Maudy Anne saw the last of the Victory from the Chesil Beach. With such material as he has at disposal, however, Mr. Wingfield-Stratford has strung together a portentous ruminative essay on Patriotism. How many patriots will put their hands in their pockets for the twenty-five shillings necessary to purchase it remains to be seen. It is a high-class though incondite book, well-written. I predict that a good many copies of it will be available second-hand at no distant date, and that, as Disraeli might have said, and proved, it will be a "damned good book to steal from."

THOMAS SECCOMBE.

Novel Notes.

"THE EIGHTH YEAR": A VITAL PROBLEM OF MARRIED LIFE. By Philip Gibbs. 2s. net. (Williams & Norgate.)

Behold, Mr. Gibbs, our brilliant novelist and journalist, mounting the pulpit to discourse upon Marriage, its Dangerous Year, and the iniquitous selfishness of Men. The homily is divided into two parts—argument and illustration; and the text is derived from the words of the late Sir Francis Jeune, "The Eighth Year is the most dangerous year in the adventure of marriage." It is needless to say that Mr. Gibbs is eloquent, and makes the most of his particular theme. Unfortunately it is futile to generalise on marriages, because men and women are variable factors, and the same circumstances would not bring the same results with different pairs. That is a reality too little recognised by pastors or writers; and—venturing still further into the deeps—we think that Sir Francis Jeune would be surprised to see his fluent dictum made the text of such a treatise as this. Mr. Gibbs, taking it as Vox Dei, tries to prove too much. The Clare to whom he introduces us would have found out her fatuous, selfish husband long before the eighth year; and so would that ordinary couple, the Atkinson Browns. The eighth day is with some people the dangerous time; with others the forty-eighth anniversary may be passed and still find them lovers. Mr. Gibbs, of course, is striking the right note when he protests against the life in flats which causes moral indigestion, and what Mr. Roosevelt euphemistically calls race-suicide. Family life is as essential to healthy humanity as are leaves and blossom and fruit to trees. Restrict or prevent the birth of children, and moral decay must result. As the prophet did not quite say, where no infants are the people perish. It is a pity that Mr. Gibbs has given us both a treatise and a short story. The essay would have been sufficient. The story is too slight, it is merely an outline. The At-Home of the Heywoods, with the wife absent, which in Shavian or Wellsian hands would have been a scream, is a fine occasion lost. Mr. Gibbs is too earnest a missionary, too stern a Jeremiah in his denunciation of Intellectual Mansions, to have realised the opportunities of his comedy. Nevertheless, he whets the reader's curiosity; and especially we wonder why he, a novelist, makes a novelist his villain, and also why, wherever fiction is referred to, it is in terms of contumely. "The Eighth Year" will certainly set the gossips talking and supply an absorbing topic for discussion at many a holiday table.

SANDY'S LOVE AFFAIR. By S. R. Crockett. 6s. (Hutchinson.)

Sandy is introduced first as a somewhat conceited but very self-confident young man who is about to leave his home in Galloway and seek fortune in London. As he never loses any of his self-confidence nor all of his conceit it is difficult to make him sound attractive. But somehow he is; his very naïveté makes one like him—as for instance when he thought of adding to his visiting cards the words: "Late President of the Logomachic Society, for the Culture of the Individual Logos," or in some of his passages with V.V., the girl he loves. The story, indeed, eventful as it is, centres entirely around the gradual development of Sandy Pryde, and the manner in which his rugged character becomes slowly polished by contact with the world. Mr. Crockett is always spirited, but his vivacity has seldom been exploited to better purpose than in "Sandy's Love Affair," which in many ways is one of the best books he has given us.

THE SIN OF EVE. By May Edginton. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

To deserve popularity is not always to achieve it, but it will be a matter for surprise if "The Sin of Eve" does not find a very wide circle of readers, for the novel richly deserves to be known far and wide. It is a charming story of vivid human interest and emotional appeal. What is more, there is a grace of style and a happy vein of reflectiveness in the narrative, which lift it well out of the ordinary ruck of fiction. Ellen Flamartin is a fascinating heroine, and we defy the most blasé novel-reader to remain unmoved while he follows her in her brave, adventurous life, from Palmer Village in British Columbia to her beautifully contrived destiny in London. How she becomes involved in the lives of Henry L. Gibbons, a millionaire newspaper proprietor, and Max Bellamy, a "star" actor-manager-playwright, is vivaciously told, and the manner in which these rivals for the captivating Ellen are complicated in an unsuspected relationship to one another gives a well articulated backbone to the plot. "George"—her parson father—Mrs. Flamartin, Jane Wilkins, and Aunt Alice de Cordovic, and her daughters, are excellent examples of sensitive and well-realised characterisation. A good deal of hard individual thinking on questions of the day as they affect modern women has been done by the author, who makes Ellen ask her friend Jane: "Don't you wish the Lord made us women all very hard or very soft," But there are no chunks of irrelevant sententiousness to impede the flow of the narrative. Ellen's life as an ardent organiser for the W.S.P.U. is particularly well described. We fancy, however, that her ultimate development is a conclusion likely to be hotly contested by some members of that super-active organisation.

DISCOVERY. By Harold Williams. 6s. (Sidgwick & Jackson.)

Oswald Bouverie was told by a doctor in Harley Street that if he continued to live and work in London he would die in a few months. Therefore he goes away to hide himself and die. But before he disappears from London he tells the heroine he loves her, and promises to write to her at the end of a year. He does write, and as the post mark on the letter is Barnstaple the heroine follows him there; only to find that he has disappeared again. Indeed, he forgets all about the heroine until he finds she has married a successful and child-like gold miner, some years later. Then Bouverie remembers that he loves her himself. He has, however, now acquired a habit of disappearing, and finds only a short struggle with his feelings necessary before setting out in a small boat to catch a steamer at Lynton and disappear further. The boat is swamped and Bouverie is saved from being drowned by the gold miner, but unfortunately the gold miner's head is dashed against the rocks. Thus the heroine becomes a widow, and at first she expresses some surprise that Bouverie should be still intent upon leaving her to continue his career of disappearance; but probably she reflects that his inveterate habit of vanishing might be incompatible with a well regulated domestic existence, for she relinquishes such lien as she has upon him and says: "Life plays for larger stakes than we guess." And that is the end.

ROSALIND IN ARDEN. By H. B. Marriott Watson. 6s. (Dent.)

Hollis, the American millionaire whose aggressive personality is the dominating feature of Mr. Marriott Watson's new novel, belongs to a familiar class. His character is well typified by his attitude towards the game of golf. "He took to it at once. He had got to make a resisting recalcitrant ball do what he wanted. That was the game that appealed to him. He had a native instinct to get the best of something; it informed his life, and had carried him to fortune." When Hollis desires a thing he gets it—by fair means or foul. The desirable object in the present story is Westwood Park, a fine old English estate, and the plot deals largely with a series of skirmishes between the astute millionaire and the comparatively poor young man who is struggling to prove his claim to the earldom and estate of Westwood. Incidentally, the millionaire from America tries to mould an English village to his will, and learns that even the power of money has its limits. As might be expected, Hollis is incapable of understanding women in general, and his niece Rosalind in particular. It is a leisurely-moving novel, wending its way for the most part among harmless and agreeable people to a tune suggestive of the pleasant chatter and clatter of a summer picnic.

THE STRICTLY TRAINED MOTHER. By F. F. Montresor. 3s. 6d. (Murray.)

Mrs. Betterton is an old lady of a type that is more often met with than read about. Yielding and submissive, all her life she has been under somebody's thumb. At first her husband tyrannised over her, and when he died her two elder daughters filled his place. Both of them are interested in "good works" and neither has the least idea that her mother is being unduly suppressed. Nevertheless, Mrs. Betterton longs to see the child of her heart, Ellen, who has run away from home and married a literary man of whom her father did not approve; and when Ellen dies, the old lady's affections are transferred to her granddaughter, Polly, a type of the modern girl. These are the principal characters in Miss Montresor's little drama, and they are handled in a manner convincing and truthful. In humour, in fidelity to life, and in insight into character, so far as we are aware no book has been published this year that is the equal of "The Strictly Trained Mother."

POLLYANNA. By Eleanor H. Porter. 6s. (Pitman.)

"Pollyanna" is a happy, sympathetic little girl—the child of a poor minister, who, motherless and fatherless and homeless, is cast upon the none too tender mercies of a stern, unlovable, very wealthy aunt. Unwelcome, unwanted, Pollyanna determines to make the best of disagreeable circumstances, and through her own bright,

Constable's New Books.

GEORGE MEREDITH :

HIS LIFE, GENIUS & TEACHING.

From the French of Constantin Photiades.
Rendered into English by Arthur Price. 6s. net.
"No better introduction to Meredith could be desired"—
The Athenæum
"The book is a worthy book an admirable translation"
—The Glasgow Herald

THE DRIFT OF ROMANTICISM.

Being the Eighth Series of
"SHELburne ESSAYS."

By Paul Elmer More. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.
"Mr. More impresses the present reviewer deeply with the scope and penetration of his critical work and the accuracy of his craftsmanship, the reassuring confidence with which he gives his judgment."—The Athenæum
"We praise Mr. More's book without reserve"—The Daily News
"The present volume, the eighth, is in some respects the most remarkable of all. It expresses, at least, more explicitly and emphatically than any of its predecessors the real gist of the critic's thought and the fundamental drift of his mind"—The Manchester Guardian.

TEN MORE PLAYS OF SHAKESPEARE

By Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, M.A., LL.D.,
Author of "On Ten Plays of Shakespeare."

Demy 8vo. 8s. 6d. net.
"They are the work of a master craftsman"—The Glasgow Herald.
"Will stand high in favour in the literary world. It is even more interesting than his volume in 1905"—The Athenæum

SIDELIGHTS.

By Lady Blennerhasset
7s. 6d. net.
It is the combination of simplicity and distinction which gives the whole volume its very real charm, and makes it one that will appeal to all cultured readers.—The Daily Telegraph
"Lady Blennerhasset is at her best in these well considered and well-informed studies"—The Athenæum
"They are throughout informing and suggestive"—The Bookseller

NEW LETTERS OF AN IDLE MAN.

By Hermann Jackson Warner. Edited by G. E. Woodberry. Author of "European Years," etc.

7s. 6d. net
"These delightful letters the correspondence printed in this most entertaining volume is never lacking in vivacity, character and insight"—The Daily Telegraph
"Mr. Warner is very entertaining. The great charm of his letters throughout is that they were written without any suspicion of their ever coming before the public"—The Glasgow Herald
"A book that might have been expressly designed for holiday reading"—The Evening News

WALTER DE LA MARE'S PEACOCK PIE

Author of "A Child's Day," "Listeners," etc.
3s. 6d. net

"In this book he has found the kind of subject most suited to his very real genius... we are eternally in Mr. de la Mare's debt for giving us something more than echoes"—The Spectator.
"It is a book in which the sheer nonsense of Edward Lear or Lewis Carroll is combined with something of the tenderness of Stevenson"—The Daily Telegraph
"Mr. Walter de la Mare has written his songs from the child's point of view, and many a child will love them. Their simplicity and keenness are real and serious"—The Observer.

THE WORKS OF BERNARD SHAW.

NEW VOLUMES JUST PUBLISHED

THE QUINTESSENCE OF IBSENISM.

New Edition Re-written and Enlarged Cloth
3s. 6d. net

Now completed to the Death of Ibsen

A New Volume of Plays, entitled :

MISALLIANCE

Containing a Preface on Parents and Children, Misalliance, Preface on Shakespear, The Dark Lady of the Sonnets, and Fanny's First Play. Crown 8vo Cloth 6s.

Now Ready. Published separately :

THE DOCTOR'S DILEMMA.

GETTING MARRIED.

THE SHOWING UP OF BLANCO POSNET.

Paper, 1s. 6d. net Cloth, 2s. net per vol

PLAYS.

THE DOCTOR'S DILEMMA, GETTING MARRIED, and THE SHOWING UP OF BLANCO POSNET With a Preface
by the Author upon the subjects of the Medical Profession, Marriage, and the Dramatic Censorship 1 vol Crown 8vo 6s.

PLAYS (PLEASANT). With a Preface 6s.

Arms and the Man. Candida.
The Man of Destiny. You Never Can Tell.

PLAYS (UNPLEASANT). With a Preface by

Frederick H. Evans, and a Preface 6s.
Widowers' Houses. The Philanderer.
Mrs. Warren's Profession.

THREE PLAYS FOR PURITANS. With

Preface and two Illustrations 6s.
The Devil's Disciple. Caesar and Cleopatra.
Captain Brassbound's Conversion.

MAN AND SUPERMAN: A Comedy and a

Philosophy. With Epistle Dedicatory to Arthur
Bingham Walkley 6s.

Man and Superman. The Revolutionist's Handbook.

Maxims for Revolutionists.

JOHN BULL'S OTHER ISLAND & MAJOR

BARBARA. 6s.

John Bull's Other Island. How he Lied to her Husband. Major Barbara.

PRESS CUTTINGS. Paper, 1s. net

NOVELS.

THE IRRATIONAL KNOT. 6s.

CASHEL BYRON'S PROFESSION. 6s.

CRITICISM.

THE PERFECT WAGNERITE. 3s. 6d. net

DRAMATIC OPINIONS AND ESSAYS.

Selected by James Huncker, with a Preface by him
2 vols 10s. 6d. net

PLAYS in separate Editions. Cloth, 2s. net, Paper,
1s. 6d. net

Bernard Shaw's Famous Monograph

THE SANITY OF ART. 1'scap 8vo Paper cover,
1s. net, Cloth gilt, 1s. 6d. net

SELECTED PASSAGES FROM THE WORKS OF BERNARD SHAW.

Arranged
by Mrs. Bernard Shaw With a Photographic Frontispiece after the bust by Rodin Cloth, gilt extra 5s. net

Write for Constable's New Autumn Announcement List—free on application.

LONDON

sunny disposition is able to bring happiness, not only to herself, but to all she comes in contact with. It is Pollyanna's Game which helps many to find a short cut to happiness, or to bear sorrow with new courage. 'It is called the "Just Being Glad" Game, and its only rule is to find something in everything to be glad about. She and her father began it, as Pollyanna explains, on some crutches that came in a missionary barrel. Pollyanna had wanted a doll, and when there was nothing but the crutches, her father said the only thing to do was to be glad you didn't want them! So Pollyanna spreads the Game wherever she goes, till a dreadful accident threatens to rob her of the use of her legs, and in the newness of her grief she feels she will never be able to play it any more. But even her misfortune is the means of bringing long deferred happiness to those around her, and though her aunt is the last person in the book who learns to play the Game, she will be by no means the last to seek the influence of Pollyanna's cheery philosophy. It is the kind of book that will create optimists—a veritable guide to gladness, and those who are downhearted will find in these sunshiny pages help and encouragement.

HUNT THE SLIPPER. By Oliver Madox Hueffer. 6s. (Stanley Paul)

Since the death of Wilkie Collins many people have tried, but very few have succeeded, in imitating that author's peculiar form of construction, by which some half-a-dozen characters carry on the thread of a story by narrating different episodes in the first person. Oliver Madox Hueffer, in "Hunt the Slipper," must be allowed to be an exception. He has adopted this most difficult form of construction with complete success, giving to each of the six characters who tell the tale a distinct and vivacious individuality. The story is a charming one, and has this peculiarity—that not one of the characters that play a part in it, except Dago Frank, who only appears for a sentence to vanish again, is entirely disagreeable. Most of them, indeed, are delightful, from Sir Edward Fanhope, who is as lovable as Colonel Newcome, to Ivo Talboys. The story opens in England, and is thence carried to New York, where the author presents us with a most amusing picture of almost every grade of American society. His low-life scenes, quite lightly sketched though they are, are admirable, and the narrative of Kitty Williamson has caught the note of pathos. Ivo Talboy's high spirits and humour are refreshing, and it would be hard to find a more amusingly written narrative than that of his strange doings in New York. "Hunt the Slipper" is distinctly one of those books from the perusal of which one rises with a feeling of regret that the last page has been read.

THE HARROVIANS. By Arnold Lunn. 6s. (Methuen)

Mr. Lunn, in his lavish use of adolescent high spirits and a most engaging form of school slang, rather reminds us of Mr. A. A. Milne, of Punch, but in the task he has undertaken here, to have dispensed with either would have been to fail. He gives us what is better than the mere raciness of dialogue, as actual a record of Harrow life as we are ever likely to get, and need not have paraded the fact (or is it his publisher who does it?) that the material is drawn from an actual school diary of his youth. But there is a story, just the same, and a stirring story, too, of the resurrection of tradition in an old school House, and we are brought to the conclusion, in spite of ourselves, that there often survives in a man more affection for his House than the school. At least this is so with Peter O'Neill, and when he returns after ten years of Shanghai and seats him down in his old familiar places to take stock of change and the new material, we get the explanation of the subtle way in which the book keeps in easy touch with two generations. And Harrow will see to it, we think, that the book lasts more generations still, for it is of the sterling stuff compact that English lads are made of, and it bears testimony to the influence of school on the whole of their lives.

THE SECRET CARGO. By J. S. Fletcher. 6s. (Ward, Lock.)

Mr. Chandler Wickersham is a young American millionaire of an obliging and unsuspicious nature. He has decided to take a long voyage on his yacht, with St. Petersburg as his ultimate objective, and to him comes a friend who he knows as Madame Bordelaine, with a long story. She tells him that she is really the Princess Sergius Paulovitch, an exile and revolutionary. Her husband had fled to the United States with her and had died there. But in his youth he had been a friend of the Czar, who had promised him that whatever happened his heart should be buried in the soil of Holy Russia. Madame Bordelaine presents Wickersham with a casket and informs him that it contains the heart of her husband. The unsuspecting young man consents to deliver it into the hands of the Czar in person, and starts on his trip. All goes well until the yacht reaches Great Yarmouth, where the casket disappears. In despair Wickersham engages the services of Campenhaye, the famous English detective, who, with his indefatigable assistant Killingley, is soon on the scene. The remainder of this story then follows lines which are not strikingly out of the common, but it is none the less intriguing and readable. Mr. J. S. Fletcher can do this sort of thing very well, and in some of its minor details "The Secret Cargo" betrays a hand considerably more skilled than that of the average writer of detective fiction.

Photo by Will Cudby, Bow Green, Kent.

Mr. Arnold Lunn.

THE GOLDEN WOMAN. By Ridgwell Cullum. 6s. (Chapman & Hall.)

It is a matter for some doubt whether Mr. Ridgwell Cullum has chosen the best title for his new novel, in spite of the fact that here, in England, the open, free, irresponsible life of the prairie and mining districts of Western Canada is often alluded to as life in the Land of the Golden West. The truth is "The Golden Woman" to many persons will suggest a story or a musical comedy with a light and sparkling setting, whereas Mr. Cullum is nothing in this latest work of his if he is not virile and vocal and strenuous, painting his scenes in strong, convincing colours and making his characters live and move with all their instincts and emotions aflame with primitive power. Indeed, this is the weakness of his construction. He makes the pace for himself much too hot at the start,

CASSELL'S LATEST FICTION

Ready September 11th.

The White Gate

Warwick Deeping.

6s.

The story of "the way of a man with a maid"—a strong souled man, a crushed, hopeless maid, cursed with a mother "with a past" and unwholesome reputation and ways. How Richard Skelton in his masterful manner wooed and won Constance Brent, forced her to learn how to live when she only wished to die, evolved a charming womanhood from a depressingly morbid girlhood, forms a delightful story.

Ready September 4th.

The Spirit of the West

Joseph Hocking.

3s. 6d.

The story of a busy journalist from Fleet Street, who flies to Cornwall for the rest London denies him. He finds it there, finds, too, the loose threads of his own life being carefully drawn together by kindly Fate in the person of the beautiful Thirza, the product of the Romance of the Deltabio Duchy.

Just Published.

Peter Piper

D. Egerton Jones.

6s.

The heroine of this brilliant first novel is 'Peter Piper'—a girl brought up as a boy by her father in the back blocks of Australia until the age of eighteen, when she for the first time dons feminine clothing, and is launched into society as a young lady of name and fine beauty.

Ready September 4th.

Magpie House

Andrew Soutar.

6s.

This story concerns itself with the chivalry of a bu band who accumulates a fortune in finance, only to devote it entirely to the cure of his wife's affliction, and with the still greater chivalry of his brother, the simple Downs giant, who stalks stupidly, yet heroically through life singing, laughing, fighting other people's battles and strengthening himself again and again in the service of the woman whom he regards with such rare and lofty admiration.

Ready September 28th.

Prairie Fires

Annie S. Swan.

6s.

One of the most stirring of all her stories. Although the opening scene is laid in England, this soon shifts to Canada, and the author tries to show just what life on the prairie means to the Englishwoman of the middle classes. She shows the hardships and the tragedy of the life, but she also depicts the success that will come to the woman with plenty of grit, perseverance, and faith.

Just Published.

The Grey Countess

Theo Douglas.

6s.

In the new volume the author, turning to modern times, gives the plot in a mixture of Russian political intrigue, woven round the adventures of a literary man and his misadventurous love.

CASSELL & CO., LTD., LA BELLE SAUVAGE, LONDON, E.C.

A new novel by S. Macnaughtan the famous author of "A Lame Dog's Diary" "The Expensive Miss Du Cane" etc.

Hodder & Stoughton. 6/-

Alaska again! Rex Beach the famous western novelist returns to the scene of his greatest successes in "The Iron Trail" and hence we can never forget those first memorable scenes in which old Mercy Lascelles plays the crystal in her lap till, stung by the bitterness of her recollections of her loveless youth, she turns suddenly and swiftly on her niece, and tells her what is written in the globe: "The storm of disaster that brought you into the world will dog your footsteps. You are cursed with the luck that leads to disaster. Wherever you go men will bless your name, and, almost in the same breath their blessings shall be turned to the direst curses. I tell you you are a leper, a pariah, whom all men, for their own safe guarding, must shun." And the girl says truly, "The burden Fate has imposed upon me is too great. I am going to change my name and cover up my tracks." And she does that, and that is the theme of the book—for she is "The Golden Woman," but never again does she touch equally tragic heights.

Hodder & Stoughton 6/-

THE WOOLINGS OF JEZEBEL PETTYFER. By Haldane Macfall. 6s. (Simpkin, Marshall)

Mr. Haldane Macfall is known as an art critic; as the author of several brilliant books on art and letters, and of two novels, "The Woolings of Jezebel Pettyfer," and "The Masterfolk," and if these two last are not the most remarkable of his works, they are none the less among the most remarkable novels of recent years. This new and carefully revised reissue of his first book reminds one of the deservedly fine things that were said of it on its first appearance and of the instant success it achieved with the reading public of a decade or more ago. It is a wonderfully intimate and realistic tale of the West Indies, written from the personal acquaintance Mr. Macfall made with the place and its people when he held a commission in a West Indian regiment, and its vivid, minutely faithful pictures of negro character alone make it a book of more than common merit. But beyond this it unfolds an excellent story of the life of one negro in particular, in all his relations with the men and women of his own colour and of the dominant white race, and it works out a great ethical problem fearlessly, with humour and pathos and mordant irony. Mr. Macfall's creed is that though celibacy is nearly as harmful to the race as promiscuity, "the man who lives chastely and faithful to his mate, is of the elect, and the nation that holds his like holds the dominion over the world." He enforces this view ably, cunningly, with a ripe narrative skill and understanding of humanity. His psychological study of an average West Indian negro is clever and subtle, and the powerful story he weaves about him, revealing the superstitions, the good nature, the broad humour and non-moral character of his kind, touched with gayest lights and sombre shadows, is everywhere alive with interest. We welcome this new edition of an original and striking book and look to see a large access to the number of its readers.

The Bookman's Table.

THE NEW FORESTERS. By William Caine. 5s. net. (Nisbet.)

Mr. Caine has all the affinity of his namesake for the wild things of nature, and this book of his is filled with what in no offensive sense we know as paganism. It is full of sheer enjoyment of air and field, byway and woodland, especially woodland. It conducts us by divers and devious ways about the New Forest, and does it all in its own sweet way. It introduces us to Lord Montagu of Beaulieu, which gives it the character of an actual record; but it also introduces us to a woodland faun, which again promotes it to the ranks of fiction. But the author does not play as deftly with his faun as Mr. Charles Sims did in a certain academy picture, and not infrequently his method encumbers his material. He mentions a pair of riding-breeches, and then takes up a page of paragraphs in telling us needlessly how they would have affected him had he been a Buddhist, a Christian Scientist, or any other of half-a-dozen choice religions. This is whimsicality run riot, especially as the incident is slight and the sprinkling of humour wears thin.

CHAPTERS AT THE ENGLISH LAKES. By the Rev. H. D. Rawnsley. With 10 Illustrations. 5s. net. (Maclehose.)

ODD CORNERS IN ENGLISH LAKE LAND. By William T. Palmer. With 15 Illustrations. 2s. 6d. net. (Skeffington.)

With the exception of London, the Lake District has probably given rise to more books than any other part of Great Britain, but that there are still fresh topics of which to treat is proved agreeably by Canon Rawnsley's latest book. Here the author has collected a number of random chapters on the picturesque and historical aspects of portions of the district, together with longer biographical sketches dealing with Dickens in Cumberland and at the Lake District, Coleridge at the Lakes, and the Life and Death of John Wordsworth, the poet's younger brother. It goes almost without saying that readers of Canon Rawnsley's "Chapters" will find themselves in the best of company.

Mr. Palmer is more of a guide, and one of the main purposes of his really excellent little book is to give hints for excursions to "those who are not physically fit for hard walking and climbing, yet who have a keen desire to see the country outside the little mesh of much-advertised routes." The book also contains rather sketchier and less useful, but none the less attractive, chapters on other aspects of the Lake District, and particularly on its sport. It is written in a concise and workmanlike manner, and though it may not appeal particularly to the general reader, every visitor to Lakeland will find it indispensable. Of its kind it is entirely admirable.

IN PRAISE OF WINCHESTER. By A. Audrey Locke. 5s. net. (Constable.)

And we have only praise for Miss Locke. It was to be supposed that in compiling such a book on Winchester there would be no lack of material; the difficulty would presumably lie in laying one's hand on it and in helping us to do the same. The few words which Miss Locke scatters about the book, as she marshals her multitudinous host, are worthy of Mr. E. V. Lucas. And, apart from the citizens and students of Winchester, these pages will appeal, one thinks, to all those who care to live for awhile in the intimacy of a grand old town. Thomas Hardy is only the latest of her inspired singers, and, by the way, we will not quarrel with Miss Locke for including a certain amount of rather moderate verse, since the object of this book would not be served if some beloved but bad poets were omitted. Apparently it is not within the scope of this series to include old maps and plans; but if an illustrated edition of this book is called for there would be old maps enough. Would it not be pleasant to have a book by this gifted and humorous lady on the country which surrounds Winchester, with its memories of Jane Austen? This is the way in which antiquaries should present their labours; this is the way in which life may be breathed into such of the ancient records as are dead and shrivelled. It seems to us that if Sir Walter Besant, whose best fiction was done in collaboration, had in his topographical works been able to collaborate with Miss Locke, it would have been a blessing for all of us. Now and then we are left gasping, as when Miss Locke invites us to "see various chroniclers" in order to share the belief that Edgar was not crowned in Winchester Castle. We will not judge between Miss Locke and Mr. John Wooll, who asserted the contrary in 1793. We came to praise, and that is our pleasure.

AN IRISH GENTLEMAN: GEORGE HENRY MOORE. By His Son, Colonel Maurice George Moore, C.B. 16s. net. (Werner Laurie.)

This is one of the raciest, most entertaining biographies we have read for a long time. George Henry Moore was an Irish gentleman who devoted his life to travel, racing and politics, and cut a considerable figure in each of them. He was a man of marked individuality: generous, reckless, passionate—his life was full of interest and excitement, and * Ready Immediately. 2/6 net.

THE PLAIN MAN AND HIS WIFE

By

ARNOLD BENNETT

Author of

"The Old Wives' Tale," "Mental Efficiency,"

"How to Live on 24 Hours a Day,"

"The Human Machine," "Literary Taste."

THE plain man is the average decent, sensible, well-meaning citizen, who lives honestly and works hard—who, indeed, is apt to work a little too hard, and thus misses much of the pleasure of life that he works in the hope of giving himself. For such men Mr. Arnold Bennett has written a book of the shrewdest, kindest, happiest worldly wisdom, and if they do not buy it for themselves their wives should take care to buy it for them. . . . It is safe to say that "The Plain Man and His Wife" is the most brilliant book of this kind that Mr. Bennett has written, and likely to prove the most popular.

HODDER & STOUGHTON, Publishers, London.

SOME FINE NEW BOOKS

THE REAL SOUTH AFRICA

By AMBROSE PRATT

With an Introduction by the Rt. Hon. Andrew Fisher
30 columns of reviews of this book have appeared in the leading British Journals, and it has been called "one of the most remarkable" and "the most important book of the Season."

In demy 8vo Cloth, with map and illustrations. 10 6 net

An eagerly awaited novel by the Author of "Barriers" is now ready

ANNE OF THE MARSHLAND

By the Hon. Mrs. JULIAN BYNG 8/-

Also a powerful new novel by GERTRUDE HOLLIS

READ LOVE'S VICTORY

Shows the triumph of a strong man's love and sacrifice over a materialistic woman and of her conversion to his ideal

LOVE AND MY LADY

SYBIL CAMPBELL LETHBRIDGE

THE WINNING OF GWENORA

EDITH C. KENYON ("The New Allen Raine")

DAFFODIL'S LOVE AFFAIRS

LOUISE STACPOOLE-KENNY

Ready September 10th

THE BOOMERANG

By E. KATHARINE BATES

Miss Bates' many followers should order this at once to prevent disappointment

A Work of Love

Colonel J. S. F. MACKENZIE'S wonderful little book

How to know

WILD FLOWERS AT A GLANCE

SIMPLE. INTERESTING. ACCURATE. Complete

The author's wish was to have the book produced at a low price, within the reach of all, so that everyone might be enabled to know the beautiful Wild Flowers at a glance. Thousands have responded, thus proving the usefulness of the author's work 7d. paper 1s. cloth

By the same author. 5/- net

HOW TO KNOW BRITISH ORCHIDS

With many large coloured plates

MAIDS IN A MARKET GARDEN

By CIO. GRAVES

("Richard Dehan Author of the "Dop Doctor")

Cloth Illustrated 2 - net

1 - NOVELS

THE RED ROSETTE.

H. W. C. Newte

LOVE AND A WOMAN.

Charlotte Mansfield

THE BEAUTY SHOP.

Daniel Woodroffe

LIKE STARS THAT FALL (life on the stage)

W. Gallician

7d. net. Cloth

JUNGLE TALES

By B. M. Croker

6d. paper

TEARS OF DESIRE

Coralie Stanton and

THE MYSTERY OF BLACKSTONE MINE

Heath Hosken

Edith C. Kenyon

("The New Allen Raine")

POST
FREE.

WRITE FOR BEAUTIFULLY
ILLUSTRATED LIST
Now in the Press (30 illustrations).

POST
FREE.

Give important Announcements for all LIBRARY SUBSCRIBERS, &c.

HOLDEN & HARDINGHAM. ADELPHI. LONDON

his story accordingly makes very varied and lively reading. He began well by falling in love with a lady of whom his parents disapproved; but he deferred to them sufficiently to consent to go abroad and get away from the lady and forget her. His wanderings took him through Russia, Egypt, Persia, Syria, and in the Syrian desert the lady, who had gone in pursuit, overtook him. He fought his share of duels; was the keenest of sportsmen, and withal developed into one of the best of Irish landlords. Later he went into Parliament, and so gives Colonel Moore occasion for an admirable account of Irish politics between 1846 and 1870. It is mainly for its vivid and attractive picture of an uncommon and delightful personality, for its piquant anecdotes, and its sketches of life in Ireland during the middle years of last century, that "An Irish Gentleman" will be read, but it is also a book that students of nineteenth-century Irish social and political history cannot afford to overlook. Colonel Moore is to be congratulated on a valuable and distinctly clever biography. His brother, the famous novelist, contributes a whimsical, very characteristic preface, and the volume is illustrated with several excellent portraits and sketches.

Notes on New Books.

MESSRS. CONSTABLE & CO.

There is something fascinating in the mere name of "The Border." The borders of every country have been the nurseries of chivalry, but none more so than the "Debatable Land," the chosen home of ballad and romance. There is a continuous record of raid and foray for something like three centuries and it is this attractive by-way of history that Mr. Howard Pease opens up for us in his scholarly account of The Lord Wardens of the Marches of England and Scotland (10s. 6d. net). The author naturally had to eschew the more popular aspects of his subject, but the actual records which he cites are full of matter as attractive as it is valuable. Striking personalities emerge, including some of the best-known names in Scottish history. The work is finely produced, and is one that will be eagerly welcomed both by the scholar and the antiquary.

Mr. Shaw, of course, lends himself admirably to quotation, and in this book of Selected Passages from the Works of Bernard Shaw (5s. net), Mrs. Charlotte F. Shaw gives us a delightful olla-podrida of wit, philosophy, humour and satire from his novels, plays, pamphlets, essays and letters. The extracts are well chosen and well arranged, and a full table of contents makes them all easy of reference. Here you have duly classified Mr. Shaw's opinions on actors, art, anarchy, the Bible, Bunyan, Heaven, Hell, Home Rule, Ibsen, Marriage, Money, Poverty, Prayer, Romance, Shakespeare, Snobs, Style, Woman, Work, and over a hundred other subjects. It is the very quintessence of Shaw; the best of him in all his moods—but it is needless to say more of such a volume than that it is an excellent compendium of the wisest and wittiest things that have been written by one of the wisest and wittiest of living authors.

MESSRS. WILLIAM DAWSON & SONS, LTD.

Smith, of One Smith, by G. Murray Johnstone (3s. 6d.), is a soldier with a modest manner and a happy gift of spinning a yarn in homely but vivid style. It is good to sit with him in the store or by the camp fire and, over pipes and glasses, hear him recall with picturesque first-hand touches his experiences of love and war in turbulent South Africa. A born rover, Smith will tell you how he found the call of the purple blue kopjes irresistible, and how when the fighting, or "the fun" as he calls it, began he just had to be there. The story entitled "Little Jacob" gives a realistic and moving picture of the bitterness of war "in a country where in the peace days you had an open door to all the farms and knew every pretty gal in the district. It comes home to you when you ride up to that place and find the door shut in your face, and a rifle barrel takes rattling at you through the window." In "The Lone Valley" they witness the feelings of a soldier face to face with death are described with wonderful simplicity, while another story depicts with equal Christian sympathy the agony of witnessing a fellow soldier publicly dismissed from the regiment. The gentler sex play an important part in some of Smith's entertaining yarns, and in other Mr. Johnstone's book is a most agreeable contribution to South Africa.

Colonel Maurice George Moore, C.B.

Frontispiece portrait from "An Irish Gentleman" (Werner Laurie).

MESSRS. HODDER & STOUGHTON.

It is a most pleasant recipe for making a book. Ingredients: A girl, a journey, a few friends, a great number of acquaintances. Mingle these together, adding descriptions, experiences, perhaps a slight adventure or two, a souper of love, and serve with a flippant style. Miss O. Douglas's skill has, with these materials, produced a most readable chronicle, Olivia in India (6s.). The result—to drop the "recipe" metaphor—is a book which not only amuses, but teaches us more about real everyday social life in India than half a hundred lectures could do. On board ship, at Calcutta, in the jungle, in the train, Olivia is an observant and cheerful companion, and we were genuinely sorry when her journey was ended.

MR. FRANK PALMER.

Numberless readers will approve of Maida's Little Shop, by Inez Haynes Gillmore (3s. 6d. net). Children and simple-hearted grown persons will be equally delighted with it, for it offers a kind of Christmas-card sentiment, presented with a crisp American combination of reality and idealism. In the first chapter Maida is a weary uninterested little girl, languid and ill, with a multi-millionaire for a father, and two clever men for friends. To rouse the child and save her from fading out of existence they make her a little shopkeeper in Primrose Court, where she gains friends and health at the same time. In the last chapter all is well, and a magnificent Christmas party leaves every one happy. It is a simple, cheery little tale.

MESSRS. WARD, LOCK & CO.

Hidden Lives (6s.), the title which Mr. E. R. Punshon has given to his recent book, is not at all untruthful. From the very first chapter, which tells how an escaping convict was rescued and sheltered by an apparently respectable member of society, to a point near the end, you cannot possibly tell what is going to happen next—nor, we must confess, when it does happen, can you always understand the motives underlying it. Nevertheless, it is quite a good yarn as sensational stories go, and it has an attractive heroine, while the ruthless hero is of a type which is novel but not altogether sympathetic. There are some really blood-curdling situations.

GILL & REIGATE LTD THE SOHO GALLERIES.

ANTIQUES & REPRODUCTIONS.

A genuine old Green Lacquer Cabinet, on gilt stand, of exceptional quality.

Old Lacquer Furniture

We invite inspection of several exceptionally fine pieces of Old Lacquer Furniture, including a Pair of Louis XVI Cabinets with Genuine Chinese Incised Lacquer Panels of the Ming Period; a 12-fold Chinese Incised Lacquer Screen; Wardrobe with Chinese Incised Lacquer Panel Doors, etc., etc.

We shall be pleased to forward post free, photographs and full particulars of any of the pieces in this Collection, upon receipt of details of requirements.

Booklet "E27" Post free upon application.

73-85, OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.

Globe-Wernicke Elastic Bookcases

being built of 'Units' it is a very easy matter to arrange them in various ways to suit the style of room and space available.

The Illustration shows just one method of building up a Globe-Wernicke "Elastic" Bookcase. The Desk Unit (which is entirely optional) is greatly appreciated by all who like to have writing materials and books at hand.

PACKING FREE. Orders of £2 CARRIAGE PAID to any Goods Station in the BRITISH ISLES.

The Globe-Wernicke Co.

Office and Library Furnishers,

44, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

82, Victoria Street, S.W. 98, Bishopsgate, E.C.

Balkan Peace Treaty signed Aug. 10th with Waterman's (Ideal) Fountain Pen

Another Historic Triumph for this world-famous Fountain Pen

The Treaty was signed with Waterman's Ideal Fountain Pens belonging to Dr. Dillon, the distinguished Special Correspondent of a London Newspaper, who supplied, as he explains, the media for the signature of the Treaty of Portsmouth in 1905 between Japan and Russia and the Treaty of London of May 30th last between Turkey and the Allies.

Four Styles—Regular, Safety, Pump-Filling and Self-Filling, with numerous designs in each.

In Silver and Gold for Presentation. Of Stationers, Jewellers, &c. Booklet free from L. & C. HARDTMUTH, LTD. Koh-i-noor House, Kingsway, London. (New York, 171, Broadway. Paris: 6 Rue de Hanovre. Brussels: 14 Rue Pont-Neuf. Vienna, Milan, Dresden, Zurich, Barcelona.

WARD, LOCK & CO.'S POPULAR 6/- FICTION

At all Libraries and Booksellers.

THE OPENING DOOR Justus Miles Forman

LEILA AND HER LOVER Max Pemberton

EXPIATION E. Phillips Oppenheim

THE RIVER OF STARS Edgar Wallace

AVERNO Bertram Mitford

UNDER THE BLACK EAGLE
A. W. Marchmont

SOULS IN PAWN (4th Edition.) Lindsay Russell

UNTIL SEVENTY TIMES SEVEN
L. G. Moberly

LORD STRANLEIGH ABROAD
Robert Barr

THE SECOND CHANCE Paul Trent

FINE HOLIDAY FICTION.

SEE THE SEPTEMBER

WINDSOR

GERTRUDE PAGE - - - "The Pathway"

HALLIWELL SUTCLIFFE - "The Home-Coming"

C. G. D. ROBERTS - "The Runners of the High Peaks"

G. B. LANCASTER - - - "Between Four Dances"

ALBERT KINROSS - "The Fortunes of Virginia Bright"

WALTER CROTCH (Founder of the Dickens Fellowship)
"The Lawyers of Dickens."

MANY FINELY ILLUSTRATED FEATURES.

WARD, LOCK & CO., Ltd., Salisbury Square,
London, E.C.

It is several years since Booth Tarkington, the famous author of "Monsieur Beaucaire" published a new novel and there can be no doubt that "The Flint" will be in great demand.
Hodder & Stoughton 6/-

The most ingenious and best written story Jacques Futrelle ever wrote. It concerns the disappearance of a jewelled garter from the British Museum.
Hodder & Stoughton 6/-

From a photo by Lennae Caswell Smith

George Bernard Shaw

Interesting Books on Varied Subjects.

THE BEAUTY, HISTORY, ROMANCE AND MYSTERY OF THE CANADIAN LAKE REGION.

By WILFRED CAMPBELL, Author of "Lake Lyrics," "The Dread Voyage," "A Beautiful Rebel," etc. With numerous plates in colour and half-tone. Price 6/-

There is no more beautiful, enchanting and sublime portion of the American continent than the lake region of Canada. Commencing at the Thousand Islands and extending to the extreme western shores of Lake Superior, is a continuous chain of superb lakes and noble waterways, unequalled anywhere in the world for their beauty of fresh-water coast scenery and as a vast highway for inland navigation. "It has long been one of my most cherished dreams," says the author, "to give to the world in some form an account of this region and these lovely and magnificent lakes, so as to celebrate, and per- chance to perpetuate in literature not only their unique beauties, but also to chronicle somewhat of the prehistoric and historic tragedy and comedy, and the human vicissitudes which have been associated with this vicinity from the remotest human antiquity to the present day"

WHERE THE SUGAR MAPLE GROWS.

IDYLLS OF A CANADIAN VILLAGE.

By ADELINE M. TESKEY.

Illustrations by J. S. GORDON. Price 6/-

A charming volume of sketches. The author, Adeline M. Teskey, is a resident of Canada and her work will prove a revelation to those persons who claim that Canada has no literature. Miss Teskey has produced in these idylls of a Canadian village something unique in the way of character studies, equal in all respects to the quaint types of "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush"

THE MASTER OF LIFE.

A ROMANCE OF THE FIVE NATIONS AND OF PREHISTORIC MONTREAL.

By W. D. LIGHTHALL, F.R.S.C., Author of "The False Chevalier," etc. Price 6/-

This is a story of woods and waters and prehistoric scenes . . . . . The present book is an attempt to picture the strange ideas of the Red Man's mind, life, and melancholy. It is an aboriginal romance, without a white man in it. The Indian is here represented in the chivalrous and reverent side of his nature. To understand his philosophy it is necessary to remember that he was a mystic; yet he believed one thing firmly, that the whole world of objects was living—nothing to him was inanimate—he himself was but part of a living world, and so were his dreams. And that world had one exquisite and incomparable quality to him in its state of perfect nature—its beauty.

THE BATTLE OF THE PLAINS. THE GREATEST EVENT IN CANADIAN HISTORY By J. M. HARPER,

Author of "The Montgomery Siege," etc. Price 6/-

The Battle of the Plains of Abraham stands out as a memorable event in the history of the world, being not only the most important event in the history of Canada, but an achievement of the highest moment in the military annals of the British Empire as well. And the celebration of its occurrence on the immediate outskirts of the city of Quebec, by the issue of such a volume as this, cannot but be of interest to the King's subjects in every part of the British possessions

TALES OF THE PORCUPINE TRAILS.

Poems by W. MILTON YORKE. Price 4/-

Mr. Yorke writes with ease, swing, and vigour. There stands out from it all the hardy and hearty ring of the man who knows, the expressiveness of the man who appreciates, the force of the man who is earnest, the fire and freedom of originality, and the enthusiasm of the patriot. . . . . The poems are replete with merit, with character and with genuine interest.

PUBLISHED BY THE MUSSON BOOK COMPANY LIMITED OF TORONTO AND MANSION HOUSE CHAMBERS, QUEEN VICTORIA ST., LONDON, E.C.

A SELECTION FROM
HUTCHINSON & CO.'S
AUTUMN BOOKS

TWO IMPORTANT BIOGRAPHIES

Mrs. Jordan

Child of Nature

By PHILIP W. SERGEANT

In cloth gilt and gilt top, 16s. net
With photogravure frontispiece and other illustrations

The Life of James IV

By I. A. TAYLOR

With an introduction by Sir GEORGE DOUGLAS, Bart.

In cloth gilt and gilt top, 10s. 6d. net
With photogravure frontispiece and other illustrations

America as I Saw It

By Mrs ALEC TWEEDIE

Author of "Mexico as I Saw It," &c.

In cloth gilt and gilt top, 16s. net

With a portrait of the Author in colour by Percy Anderson and a photogravure portrait and numerous other illustrations, including 13 humorous cartoons, by W. E. Haselden

Italian Yesterdays

By Mrs HUGH FRASER

Author of "A Diplomatist's Wife in Japan," etc

In cloth gilt and gilt top, 16s. net,
with numerous illustrations

TWO IMPORTANT TRAVEL BOOKS

The Voice of Africa

Being an account of the travels of the German Inner-African Expedition during the years 1910-12

By LEO FROBENIUS

Leader of the Expedition

With 68 full-page plates, over 200 illustrations in the text and a coloured frontispiece

In 2 large handsome volumes, 28s. net

Unknown Mongolia

A Record of Travel and Exploration on Russo Chinese Borderlands

By DOUGLAS CARRUTHERS

Gold Medallist of the Royal Geographical Society

With three Chapters on Sport by J. H. MILLER, F.Z.S., and an Introduction by

THE RIGHT HON. EARL CURZON OF KEDLESTON, K.G.

With illustrations on art paper, reproduced from photographs, Panoramas, Diagrams and Maps from original surveys

In 3 vols., square demy 8vo, cloth gilt and gilt top, 24s. net

A FINE ART BOOK

The Book of Psalms

With 24 illustrations in colour

By FRANK PAPÉ

In crown 4to, cloth, richly gilt and gilt top, 10s. 6d. net

* There will be an edition strictly limited to 150 numbered and signed copies, bound in parchment and the plates specially mounted, 21s. net

A Day in the Moon

By the ABBÉ MOREUX

In crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. net

With 40 illustrations from Photographs and drawings by the Author

A SUPERB GIFT BOOK FOR CHILDREN

By H. FIELDING-HALL

Margaret's Book

By the Author of "The Soul of a People"

In crown 4to (9 x 6 1/2) cloth richly gilt with burnished edges, boxed, 7s. 6d. net.

Beautifully illustrated with 12 Coloured Plates, over 30 Line Drawings, designed title page, and papers and other decorations by CHARLES ROBINSON

The Poems of Francois Villon

Translated by

H. DE VERE STACPOOLE

In crown 8vo, bound with canvas back, 7s. 6d. net

Handsomely printed on fine paper

A small edition de Luxe will be published in fcap. 4to, signed by the Translator published by

HUTCHINSON & CO.

The NOVELS of the AUTUMN

THE DEVIL'S GARDEN (7th Ed.)

HORACE BLAKE (2nd Ed.)

THE CHILDREN OF THE SEA

THE POWER BEHIND (4th Ed.)

AN AVERAGE MAN (4th Ed.)

MIRANDA

THE RESCUE OF MARTHA

GARTHOYLE GARDENS

THE BOOK OF ANNA

NELSON'S LAST LOVE

ASHES OF VENGEANCE (2nd Ed.)

THE SECRET CITADEL (2nd Ed.)

SANDY'S LOVE AFFAIR (2nd Ed.)

A DAUGHTER OF LOVE (2nd Ed.)

DOINGS AND DEALINGS

MARQUE GUAYLE, M.D.

THE DOMINANT PASSION

THE GROVE

W. B. Maxwell

Mrs. Wilfrid Ward

H. de Vere Stacpoole

M. P. Willcocks

R. H. Benson

M. E. Braddon

F. Frankfort Moore

Edgar Jepson

Annie E. Holdsworth

Henry Schumacher

H. B. Somerville

Isabel C. Clarke

S. R. Crockett

Mrs. A. J. Key

Jane Barlow

E. Everett-Green

Marguerite Bryant

John N. Raphael

MESSRS

HURST & BLACKETT'S

BOOKS FOR THE AUTUMN

A NEW AND IMPORTANT WORK

By the author of "Hearts of Men," "The Soul of a People," "The World Soul," etc.

THE PASSING of EMPIRE

By H. FIELDING-HALL

In demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 10s. 6d. net

THE APOSTLE OF FREE LABOUR

THE LIFE STORY OF

WILLIAM COLLISON

Founder and General Secretary of the National Free Labour Association

Told by HIMSELF

In demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 16s. net, with a portrait of Mr. Collison and 3 illustrations

A Special Offer of an Edition de Luxe,

strictly limited to Subscribers, each copy numbered and signed by the Author

Handsomely bound in half leather, gilt top, 21s. net

RECOLLECTIONS of an IRISH JUDGE

Press, Bar and Parliament

By M. M'DONNELL BODKIN, K.C.

With Portraits

In cloth gilt and gilt top, 16s. net

AN EMPIRE IN THE MAKING

THROUGH SIBERIA

By R. L. WRIGHT and BASSETT DIGBY

In cloth gilt, with 70 illustrations, 10s. 6d. net

NEW REVISED EDITIONS OF TWO IMPORTANT WORKS

AYLWIN

By THEODORE WATTS-DUNTON

With new matter by the Author

Illustrated with 4 coloured plates, including a portrait of the author and 16 full-page pictures

In large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net

ORIENTAL CAIRO

The City of the Arabian Nights

By DOUGLAS SLADEN

In demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 7s. 6d.

Illustrated with 63 intimate pictures of life in Oriental Cairo from photographs by the Author, and with the newest map of Cairo

NEW 6/- NOVELS

WHERE THE STRANGE ROADS GO DOWN

SUBSOIL

Gertrude Page

Charles Marriott

TWO WAYS OF LOVE

Iota

THE RIVER OF DREAMS

Will Westrup

FOOL OF APRIL

Justin Huntly McCarthy

WEEDS

Douglas Sladen and Olive M. Potter

THE CLOSING NET

H. C. Rowlands

UNDREAMED WAYS

Max Egerton

THE MYSTERIOUS MR. NOEL

Caston Loreaux

THE LOVERS OF MADEMOISELLE

Clive Holland

London: HURST & BLACKETT, Ltd.

Peterborough House, E.C.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS

IN THE PRESS.

A FLORENCE-TYPE EDITION OF STEVENSON'S POEMS.

Small 4to (about 8 x 6 in.), printed upon pure rag paper, cloth gilt, 12s. 6d net; also a LARGE PAPER EDITION, limited to 500 numbered copies, printed upon Arnold's unbleached hand-made paper, fcap. 4to (about 8½ x 6½ in.), parchment, 25s. net; limp vellum, 36s. net.

STEVENSON'S POEMS:

Including UNDERWOODS, BALLADS, SONGS OF TRAVEL, A CHILD'S GARDEN OF VERSES.

This Edition de Luxe of THE COLLECTED POEMS OF ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON is printed in the beautiful FLORENCE TYPE which was designed for Messrs. CHATTO & WINDUS by Mr. HERBERT P. HORNE.

NEW BOOK BY THE JAPANESE ARTIST IN LONDON.

MY RECOLLECTIONS AND REFLECTIONS.

By YOSHIO MARKINO. With 9 Illustrations in Colour and 6 in Monochrome. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

A BEAUTIFUL ILLUSTRATED EDITION.

UNDER THE GREENWOOD TREE. A Rural

Painting of the Dutch School. By THOMAS HARDY. With 10 Illustrations in Colour by KEITH HENDERSON. Fcap. 4to, cloth, 6s. net.

THE CHARM OF EDINBURGH.

Passages Selected and Edited by ALFRED H. HYATT. With 12 Illustrations in Colour by HARRY MORLEY. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 5s. net, velvet calf gilt, 7s. 6d. net.

THE BOOK OF THE BAYEUX TAPESTRY.

By HILAIRE BELLOC. With facsimile Coloured Illustrations after the original Tapestry. Royal 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

PIEDMONT.

By ESTELLA CANZIANI and ELEANOR ROHDE. Illustrated with fifty Reproductions of Pictures and many Line Drawings by ESTELLA CANZIANI. Demy 4to, cloth decorated, 21s. net, vellum gilt, 31s. 6d. net.

A BRITISH DOG IN FRANCE.

By E. HARRISON BARKER, Author of "Wayfaring in France," etc. With numerous Illustrations by L. R. BRIGHTWELL. Demy 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

THIS REALM, THIS ENGLAND.

By GEORGE A. B. DEWAR, Author of "The Alry Way," "The Leaning Spire," etc. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, buckram, 6s. net.

SPANISH ISLAM. A History of the Moslems

in Spain. By REINHART DOZY. Translated, with a Biographical Introduction and additional Notes, by FRANCIS GRIFFIN STOKES, Translator of "Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum." With Frontispiece, Map, and Index. Royal 8vo, buckram, 21s. net.

THE DESIRABLE ALIEN at Home in

Germany. By VIOLET HUNT, Author of "The Maiden's Progress," etc. With a Preface and Two additional Chapters by FORD MADDOX HUEFFER. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

BROWNING'S HEROINES.

By ETHEL COLBURN MAYNE. With a Frontispiece in Colour and other Decorations by MAXWELL ARMFIELD. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

TALES OF HOFFMANN.

Retold from OFFENBACH'S OPERA by CYRIL FALLS. With Illustrations in Colour by A. BRANTINGHAM SIMPSON. Small 4to, cloth, 6s. net.

A CHILD'S BOOK OF STORIES.

With Illustrations after the Water-Colour Drawings of JESSIE WILLCOX SMITH. Fcap. 4to, pictorial cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

THE PAVILION ON THE LINKS.

By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. With Coloured Frontispiece, 24 full page Illustrations, Title and End-papers by GORDON BROWNE, R.I. Demy 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

THE HAPPY TESTAMENT.

By CHARLES LOUNDSBERRY. With Coloured Illustrations by RACHEL MARSHALL. Small 8vo, decorated cover, 1s. net.

THE SIRE DE MALETROIT'S DOOR.

By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. In 16mo, decorated cover, 1s. net.

THE RAINBOW BOOK.

By Mrs. M. H. SPIELMANN, Author of "Margery Redford and Her Friends," etc. With a Frontispiece in Colour and 14 Illustrations in Black and White by ARTHUR RACKHAM, A.R.W.S., and many others by HUGH THOMSON, R.I., BERNARD PARTIDGE, R.I., LEWIS BAUMER, HARRY ROUNTREE, C. WILHELM, and CARTON MOORE-PARK. Cheaper Edition. Large post 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

WHAT TOLSTOY TAUGHT.

Edited by BOLTON HALL. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

JIMMY GLOVER AND HIS FRIENDS.

By JAMES M. GLOVER, Author of "Jimmy Glover His Book." With Portraits and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net.

THE ART OF NIJINSKY.

By GEOFFREY WHITWORTH. With Illustrations in Colour by DOROTHY MULLOCK. Post 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

WHAT IS MUSIC?

By H. HEATHCOTE STATHAM. With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

FURNITURE: A History and Guide.

By ESTHER SINGLETON. With numerous Illustrations. Royal 8vo, cloth, 16s. net.

SELECTIONS FROM THE POETICAL

WORKS OF ALGERNON CHARLES

SWINBURNE. To which is appended a Sketch of the Poet's Life by HIMSELF, and a Preface With a Portrait by ROSSETTI, and a View of his Favourite Walk.

A New Edition, Reset throughout. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

BELISARIUS, GENERAL OF THE EAST.

A Drama in Four Acts. By JOHN PRESLAND,

Author of "Mary Queen of Scots," "Manin and the Defence of Venice," "Marcus Aurelius," etc. Fcap. 4to, cloth, gilt top, 5s. net.

SONGS OF CHANGING SKIES.

By JOHN PRESLAND, Author of "The Deluge, and other Poems," etc. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

NEW 6s. NOVELS at all Libraries.

LOVE IN THE HILLS. By F. R. PENNY. With Vignette in Colour by G. I. PENNY.

THE DOOR THAT HAS NO KEY. By COSMO HAMILTON.

THE YOUNG LOVELL. By FORD MADDOX HUEFFER.

BARBARA OF THE THORN. By NETTA SYRETT.

THE SPANISH MARRIAGE. By HELEN MARY KLYNES.

THE HOME OF THE SEVEN DEVILS. By H. W. C. NEWTE.

PRODIGALS AND SONS. By JOHN AYSCOUGH.

THE PRICE PAID. By EFFIE ADELAIDE ROWLANDS.

THE DUST OF THE ROAD. By MARJORIE PATTERSON. Shortly.

JUSTICE-SUSPENDED. By RICHARD MARSH.

FAIRFAX AND HIS PRIDE. By MARIE VAN VORST.

THE COMMONPLACE AND CLEMENTINE. By MABEL INCE.

With a Frontispiece.

LONDON: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, W.C.

Cassell's Announcements

Just Ready. A Colour Edition of

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON'S Kidnapped

Illustrated by W. R. S. STOTT. Price 7s. 6d. net. New Stevenson Prospectus is in preparation, and a copy will be reserved on receipt of postcard addressed to the publishers

From Naval Cadet to Admiral

By ADMIRAL SIR R. H. HARRIS KCMG KCB
With 12 pages of Illustrations Medium 8vo

Admiral Harris has much of interest to tell us in his engrossing narrative. His book teems with personal touches. There are also illuminating and interesting chapters on great events in History such as the Cretan troubles of 1897 and the last Boer War

12/-
net

The Country of Sir Walter Scott

By CHARLES E. OICOTT
Profusely Illustrated with exquisite Photographs

A delightful book for the Scott lover. By means of the beautiful photographs of mountain valley river lake waterfall castle or abbey the reader may live again through the atmosphere of Scott's poems and novels

6/-
net

Sketches from Nature

By JOHN MACWHIRTER RA
With 24 Colour Plates and 24 Sketches in Half tone on grey paper Crown 4to

A collection of Colour and Pencil Notes made in Italy and Scotland by this most popular of landscape painters. It forms a companion volume to the Macwhirter Sketch Book

6/-
net

The Revolt of Democracy

By Dr ALFRED RUSSELL WALLACE

With a short life of the Author in addition to many hitherto unpublished letters which throw fresh light upon the lives of Russell Wallace's contemporaries and two Portraits Large crown 8vo

In view of the present labour Unrest throughout the country and of the fact that the theme of this volume is Higher Wages for all the book should create something like a sensation

2/6
net

The Country of "The Ring and The Book"

By SIR FREDERICK TREVES Bart GCVO CB LL D
With Colour Frontispiece and over 80 Photographs

Not only Browning's lovers but all who love a book rich in descriptive colour will welcome Sir Frederick Treves' new work. He deals with the crime and describes the country minutely which Browning deals with in his great poem of 21 000 lines. A part of the book is devoted to a criticism which sheds quite a new light on Browning's masterpiece

15/-
net

Lady Hester Lucy Stanhope

A New Light on her Life and Love Affairs

By FRANK HAMMILL

With 20 Illustrations including Portraits Views Facsimiles of Letters etc Medium 8vo

This book will do a great deal to dispel the mystery that for so long has shrouded the name of that extraordinary character Lady Lucy Stanhope

15/-
net

Famous Paintings

(Second Series) With Text and 30 Pictures superbly reproduced by the Three Colour Process on canvas surface paper Vol 2

Among other world famous artists who are represented are Reynolds Murillo Rossetti Rubens Gainsborough Meissonier Millais Corot and Josef Israels

12/-
net

Thoughts and Afterthoughts

By HERBERT BEERBOHM TRIST

With Frontispiece Portrait of the Author by J. S. Sargent RA and Decorations by Iovet Fraser

In his new volume the most widely reviewed book of essays of the season the famous Actor Manager and possessor of His Majesty's Theatre writes with all that brilliancy of witty epigram and shrewdness of observation which have characterised most of his public utterances

6/-
net

Warwick Deeping's

Latest Romance

The White Gate

6/-

A STORY of the way of a man with a maid—a strong souled man—a crushed hopeless maid cursed with a mother with a past and unwholesome reputation and ways. How Richard Skelton in his masterful manner wooed and won Constance Brent forcing her to learn how to live when she only wished to die thus evolving a charming womanhood from a depressing morbid girlhood, forms the subject of a delightful story told in the author's best manner

All the Deeping Romances and Works are now published by The House of Cassell. These are—

THE HOUSE OF SPIES SINCERITY
FOX FARM
JOAN OF THE TOWER
THE RUST OF ROME
A WOMAN'S WAR
MAD BARBARA
THE RED SAINT
UTHUR AND IGRAINE
THE SLANDERERS
LOVE AMONG THE RUINS
BERTRAND OF BRITANY
BESS OF THE WOODS
THE SEVEN SIREMS
THE RETURN OF THE PETTICOAT

Fuller particulars are contained in a Deeping Prospectus, a copy of which will be sent on receipt of post-card
CASSELL & CO., LTD., LA BELLE SAUVAGE, LONDON, E.C.

THE CHANNELS OF ENGLISH LITERATURE

THE ENGLISH NOVEL

BY

PROF. GEO. SAINTSBURY

5/- net

EXTRACT FROM FIRST PRESS NOTICE
ATHENAEUM, SEPT. 6th

"It is somewhat curious that no complete study of this subject has previously appeared though many valuable contributions towards its history and criticism have been made (as by Prof. Raleigh and others), while a bibliography of its origins has quite recently been published by Mr. Esdaile; but we may consider ourselves fortunate that the task has at length been undertaken by Prof. Saintsbury. A lifetime spent in reading all the fine literature of the world and all the remaining literature of France and England, in writing about it and in teaching it, has given him a grasp of his subject that can hardly be equalled by any critic of to-day. He has never hesitated, when expressing his opinions, to sacrifice the dignity of the chair to a decisive raciness of pronouncement which leaves its mark once for all on the mind, and he has in this volume pretermitted that attempt at obtaining minute accuracy of expression by interpolated qualifications which has exasperated generations of readers. Rarely indeed has a more illuminating and pleasant textbook of literature been offered to the public."

OTHER BOOKS IN THE SAME SERIES

LYRIC POETRY By ERNEST RHYS

ENGLISH PHILOSOPHERS AND SCHOOLS OF PHILOSOPHY

By Prof. JAMES SEITH, M.A., University of Edinburgh.

ENGLISH EPIC & HEROIC POETRY

By Prof. W. MACNAIL DIXON, M.A., University of Glasgow.

J. M. DENT &amp; SONS, LTD., 28, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD ST., W.C.

FROM PITMAN'S EARLY AUTUMN LIST.

POLLYANNA

THE GLAD BOOK.

6/-

6/-

By ELEANOR H. PORTER.

"A VERITABLE GUIDE TO GLADNESS."

—Bookmen.

"Smileful," "Tearful," "Winsome," "Pleasant,"
"Wholesome," "Fun," "Pathos," "Ingenuous,"
"Skillful," "Engaging," etc., etc.—Vide Press.

Another Strikingly Clever Novel.

PIERROT IN TOWN

6/-

6/-

A Fantastic Comedy on the Subject of Youth and Age.

By HELEN ASHTON.

TRAVELLING PALACES. By R. A. FLETCHER, Author of "Shipships The Story of Their Development," etc., etc. Demy 8vo, 54 Illustrations, 10s. 6d. net.

THE MOST HONOURABLE ORDER OF THE BATH. A descriptive and historical account. By the Rev. JOSEPH PERKINS, M.A., Serjeant and Minor Canon of Westminster Abbey. Demy 8vo, 40 Illustrations, 7s. 6d. net.

THE NEW MAN. A Portrait Study of the Latest Type. By PHILIP GIBBS, Author of "The Eighth Year," etc., etc. 2s. 6d. net.

INSECT LIFE: Its Why and Wherefore. By HUBERT G. STANLEY, F.R.S. 25 Illustrations, 2s. 6d. net.

WHO'S WHO IN THE THEATRE. A universal biographical record of the Contemporary Stage, including Managers, Dramatists, Critics, etc. Edited by JOHN PARKER. New Edition, thoroughly revised and brought up to date. Cloth, 6s. net. 1 rather, 8s. 6d. net.

THE COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA. (In Pitman's "All Red" Series.) By the Hon. R. R. WISE. Second Edition revised. 18 Illustrations, Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE HISTORY OF BELGIUM. (1815-1868.) Waterloo to the Death of Leopold I. With Synopsis of Belgian History from Caesar to Waterloo. New Edition. By DE METRIUS C. BOULEGHE, Author of "Belgium of the Belgians," etc. 57 Illustrations, Demy 8vo, 18s. net.

THE AMERICAN STATESMAN'S YEAR BOOK. From Official Reports of the United States Government, State Reports, Consular Advice, and Foreign Documents. Edited by J. WALKER McSPADIN. Buckram. 1150 pp. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

WRITE FOR COMPLETE AUTUMN LIST.

 LONDON: SIR ISAAC PITMAN AND SONS, LTD.,
1, ABBEY CORNER, E.C. 4.

SOME IMPORTANT BOOKS

Published by Mr. WILLIAM HEINEMANN.

From "Mother Goose."

ARTHUR RACKHAM'S BOOK OF PICTURES.

Containing 44 Plates in Colour, and an Introduction by Sir A. T. QUILLER-ROUCH ("Q"). Crown 4to. 15s. net.

Also a large Paper Edition, limited to 1000 copies, numbered and signed by the Artist. £2 2s. net.

MOTHER GOOSE: The Old Nursery Rhymes.

Illustrated by ARTHUR RACKHAM. Square Crown 8vo. Cloth Gilt. 6s. net.

Also an Edition de Luxe, with specially engraved large Plates, limited to 1000 copies, numbered, and signed by the Artist. 25s. net.

OLD ITALIAN LACE. By ELISA RICCI. 2 Vols. Crown folio. With numerous Plates in Colour and Photogravure, and Half-tone. £6 6s. net.

THE CATALOGUE OF THE COLLECTION OF SIR FREDERICK COOK, Bart. Edited by HERBERT COOK, M.A., F.S.A. In Three Volumes. Demy 4to. Vol. I. Italian School. Now Ready. £6 6s. net.; or the 3 Vols. £15 net.

FRENCH COLOUR-PRINTS OF THE XVIII CENTURY. With 50 Plates in Colour and an Introductory Treatise by MALCOLM C. SALAMAN. Demy 4to. £2 2s. net.

ARS UNA—SPECIES MILLE. Each Volume Crown 8vo. With 600 Illustrations. 6s. net.

TWO NEW VOLUMES.

Art in Spain and Portugal. By MARCEL DIEULAFOY, Membre de l'Institut.

Art in Flanders. By MAX ROOSES, Curator of the Plantin-Moretus Museum, Antwerp.

From "The Catalogue of the Cook Collection."

ANNALS AND MEMOIRS OF THE COURT OF PEKIN. By EDMUND BACKHOUSE and J. O. P. BLAND, Joint-Authors of "China under the Empress Dowager." Royal 8vo. Illustrated. 16s. net.

TURKISH REMINISCENCES. By SIDNEY WHITMAN, Author of "German Memories," etc. 7s. 6d. net.

VALE. By GEORGE MOORE. 3rd volume of "Hail and Farewell." Uniform with "Ave," and "Salve" Crown 8vo. 6s.

A CONFEDERATE GIRL'S DIARY. A Diary of the American Civil War. By SARAH MORGAN DAWSON. Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 6s. net.

MY FATHER: Personal and Spiritual Reminiscences.

By ESTELLE W. STEAD. Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 10s. net.

REMINISCENCES OF MY LIFE.

By H. HOLIDAY. Illustrated in Colour and Black-and-White, from pictures by the Author. Royal 8vo. 16s. net.

The late W. T. STEAD.

EMINENT FIGURES IN FRENCH HISTORY. Each Volume Large Demy 8vo. Illustrated. 10s. net.

Mirabeau. By LOUIS BARTHOU, Premier of France.

The Duchesse de Chevreuse. By LOUIS BATTIFOL.

From MAX BEERBOHM'S "Caricatures."

FIFTY CARICATURES. By MAX BEERBOHM. Small Crown 4to. 6s. net.

THE RENAISSANCE. By ARTHUR, COUNT GOBINEAU. Demy 8vo. Illus. 10s. net.

THE COLLECTED ESSAYS OF EDMUND GOSSE, C.B., LL.D. 5 Vols. Crown 8vo. 6s. net each.

I. XVII. Century Studies. II. Gossip in a Library. III. Critical Kit-Kats. IV. French Profiles. V. Portraits and Sketches.

THE ROMANCE OF NEWFOUNDLAND

CARIBOU. By A. RADCLYFFE DUGMORE. Illustrated with Photographs by the Author. Imp. 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

Conquests of Science Series.

Each Volume Demy 8vo. With nearly 100 Plates. 6s. net.

LIGHTSHIPS AND LIGHTHOUSES. By F. A. TALBOT.

FIRE AND FIRE FIGHTING. By Chief KENLON, Head of the New York Fire Brigade, and ALAN LETHBRIDGE.

PRACTICAL CINEMATOGRAPHY. By F. A. TALBOT, Author of "Moving Pictures." Crown 8vo. With many Illustrations. 3s. 6d. net.

From "Newfoundland Caribou."

BLACKWOODS' FIRST AUTUMN LIST.

GEORGE ELIOT'S NOVELS

New Cabinet Edition, in 17 Volumes, at One Shilling net per Volume, cloth gilt.

Messrs. Blackwood are the only publishers of the complete works of George Eliot and for the first time a set of the novels is to be had at One Shilling net per Volume. For value and get up the Edition has not been excelled.

Adam Bede. 2 Vols	Scenes of Clerical Life. 2 Vols
The Mill on The Floss. 2 Vols	Romola. 2 Vols
Silas Marner.	Felix Holt. 2 Vol
The Lifted Veil. 1 Vol	Middlemarch. 3 Vols
Brother Jacob.	Daniel Deronda. 3 Vols

Sir William Arrol. A Memoir. By SIR ROBERT PURVIS M.A. LL.D., Formerly M.P. for Peterborough 5s. net

The Silent India. Being Tales and Sketches of the Masses. By TRISTRAM COLONEL S. J. THOMSON, C.I.E., I.M.S. With Illustrations 10s. 6d. net

Madame Necker. Her Family and her Friends, with some account of her Husband's three Administrations. By MARK GAMBRIER PAKKY With Illustrations 12s. 6d. net

The Shetland Pony. By CHARLES and ANNE DOUGLAS With an Appendix on The Making of the Shetland Pony. By J. COSSAR IWAKE With Gravure and other Illustrations 10s. net

Andrew Jameson, Lord Ardwall. By JOHN BUCHAN With Portrait 3s. 6d. net

The Winepress. A Tale of War. By ALFRED NOYLS 4s. 6d. net

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

Writ in Water. By SIDNEY C. GRILLER, Author of 'The Keepers of the Gate,' 'One Crowded Hour' &c With Illustration by ALFRED PHARSI

The Mercenary. A Tale of The Thirty Years' War. By W. J. COULT, Author of 'The Background' 'The Second City,' &c

Scenes from a Subaltern's Life. By C. I. GIBSON

Thakur Pertab Singh. And Other Tales. By SIR CHARLES CROSWAITE

The Pomanders. By ARTHUR F. ILLISS, Author of 'The Career of Kembole,' 'Willie in the Isle of Man (and After).'

William Blackwood & Sons, Edinburgh and London.

Some of Mr. ELKIN MATHEWS' new and forthcoming AUTUMN BOOKS

IRISH LITERARY & MUSICAL STUDIES.

By ALFRED PIRCEVAL GRAVLS, President of the Irish Literary Society Crown 8vo 250 pp 6s. net. Includes papers on Mangan, Ferguson, LeFanu, Bunting, Allingham, Petrie, Early Irish Religious Poetry, Religious Songs of Connacht, Celtic Nature Poetry, An Irish Wonder Book etc etc

COLERIDGE AND WORDSWORTH IN THE WEST COUNTRY: Their Friendship, Work, and Surroundings.

By PROF. KNIGHT, LL.D. With 18 Illustrations by Edmund H. New. Demy 8vo 256 pp 7s. 6d. net

ENJOYMENT OF POETRY. By MAX FARMAN, Lecturer at Columbia University Crown 8vo 240 pp 4s. 6d. net

This book contains a close analysis of poetic impulse in perception, in conversation and in literature, which the author holds to be one and the same. He traces the main impulses of the human mind—towards material or imaginative realisation—and illustrates them in the very beginnings of experience in the play of children in the origin and growth of language in slang and profanity in everyday conversation, and finally in books of poetry and science.

ANOTHER BOOK OF THE SIRENS. By KATHLEEN WILSON Fcap 8vo 2s. 6d. net

Mr. Wilson has the calm temperament with its gaiety, sparkle, and happy recklessness, and he has the dainty wit and fancy of the poet — Literary World

Just Ready. Uniform Edition in Three Vols., in blue dungarees. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net each.

JOHN MASEFIELD'S FAMOUS SEA-CHANTIES & YARNS

(i) SALT-WATER BALLADS. A Chiswick Press Reprint 128 pp [New Edition in the Press]

"SIR FRANK S. SHACKLETON carried to the South Pole a copy of the first edition of this rare book"

(ii) A MAINSAIL HAUL. A Revised and greatly enlarged Edition. Finely printed at the Chiswick Press 204 pp

(iii) BALLADS AND POEMS. 104 pp [Fourth Edition]

BINYON (LAURENCE). Odes. A Chiswick Press Reprint of this rare book Crown 8vo 2s. 6d. net

SACKVILLE (MARGARET). Songs of Aphrodite and other Poems. Fcap 4to 4s. 6d. net

EARLY POEMS. By M. A. Demy 12mo 3s. 6d. net

DAVIES (WILLIAM H.). Foliage: Various Poems. Fcap 8vo 1s. 6d. net

DAVIES (WILLIAM H.). New Poems. Newly imprinted Fcap 8vo 1s. 6d. net [Second Thousand]

GIBSON (WILFRID W.). Daily Bread. The Three Books, newly printed in One Volume With a new tale added Crown 8vo 3s. 6d. net

KILBURN (H.). The Apprentice at Prayer and other Poems. 5m 8vo 3s. 6d. net

WEAVING (WILLOUGHBY.). Poems. Crown 8vo 2s. 6d. net.

ASHLEY-DODD (G. L.). Fishing Rhymes. Crown 8vo (cloth 2s. net, wrapper, 1s. net)

DARBISHIRE (R. SHELBY.). A Holiday in Verse. Royal 16mo 1s. 6d. net

Savile Series. Demy 18mo. Paper boards. 1s. net. New Volumes.

HELEN'S MIRROR AND OTHER POEMS. By J. IZABETH WESTERMAIN.

POEMS. By MICHAEL HESLIHINI

REULLERA. By ISAAC GREGORY SMITH, D.D.

TEMPERS. By W. CARLOS WILLIAMS

Vigo Cabinet Series. Roy 16mo. Cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.—New Volumes.

SONGS UNDER SAIL. By C. FOX SMITH

THE NORTHERN SEA: A Legend of the Norwegian Fjords. By JOHN C. TAYLOR. With 16 Illustrations by the Author.

IRELAND'S VEILS AND OTHER POEMS. By ETHEL ROLT-WHEELER.

CELTIC MEMORIES AND OTHER POEMS. By NORREYS J. O'CONOR

GLIMPSES OF THE UNSEEN. By W. ROBERT HALL

LONDON: ELKIN MATHEWS, CORK ST., W.

SIDGWICK & JACKSON'S AUTUMN ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Uniform with "Sailing Ships and Their Story." SHIPS AND WAYS OF OTHER DAYS.

By E KEBLE CHATTERTON With over 100 Illustrations. Coloured Frontispiece by CHARLES DIXON, R.I. In designed cover Extra Royal 8vo, cloth gilt, 16s. net

TOM BROWN'S SCHOOL DAYS.

With a Preface by LORD KILBRACKIN, and an Introduction and Notes Edited by F. SIDGWICK Illustrated with Portraits and from Contemporary Views, Photogravure Frontispiece, 3 Coloured Plates, 24 other Plates, and many Drawings in the Text Large Square 8vo, buckram gilt boxed, 10s. 6d. net
Prospectus on application

THE WILD HARP.

A Selection from Irish Poetry By KATHARINE FYNAN Printed with Decorative Borders of Celtic Design to every page, and a Title page designed in 4 Colours by Miss C. M. WATTS Medium 8vo designed, cloth gilt, 7s. 6d. net

UMBRIA, PAST AND PRESENT.

By MARY LOVELL CAMLON With 26 Drawings by C. G. VENANI and 15 Photographs by C. BENFENUTI Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net

ATTA TROLL.

Translated from the German of HILFRIED by HERMAN SCHILLAUER, with an Introduction and Notes by Dr OSCAR LEVY With Illustrations by WILLY POCANY and Head and Tail pieces by HORACE TAYLOR Small Foolscap 8vo, half parchment, gilt boards, 3s. 6d. net

OLD CHINATOWN.

A Book of Pictures by ARNOLD GENTH With Text by WILL IRWIN of Photographs of Life in the Chinese Quarter of San Francisco, which was entirely destroyed in the great disaster of 1906 Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net

EDINBURGH REVISITED.

By JAMES BONI With Illustrations by HANS LIEFICHTE New edition, revised by the Author Extra Crown 8vo cloth gilt, 5s. net

New Fiction.

THE UNCONSCIOUS QUEST.

By L. R. MATHISON Crown 8vo, 6s.

PELLE THE CONQUEROR.

By MARTIN ANDERSEN LILJE Translated from the Danish Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE COCKATOO.

A School Story by MAX RITTENBERG Illustrated, 5s.

New Drama.

COLOMBINE.

A Fantasy by REGINALD ARKILL With Illustrations, 1s. net

THE PRICE OF THOMAS SCOTT.

A Play in Three Acts By ELIZABETH BAKER author of "Chains" Crown 8vo, cloth 2s. net paper 1s. 6d. net

THE EDUCATION OF Mr. SURRAGE.

A Play in Four Acts By ALLAN MONKHOUSE, author of "Mary Broom" Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. net, paper, 1s. 6d. net

THE POLITICIANS.

A Comedy in Four Acts By FRANK G. LAYTON ("Stephen Andrew") Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. net paper, 1s. 6d. net

THE EMANCIPATION.

A Play in Three Acts By LONARD INKSTLER Each, Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. net paper, 1s. 6d. net

POEMS.

By R. C. PHILLIMORE With an Introduction by JOHN MASERLIN Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net

3 ADAM STREET, ADELPHI, LONDON, W.C.

The Nelson Announcements

NOW READY.

The Marquis of Montrose JOHN BUCHAN.

With 16 full page illustrations in Photogravure, and with 11 Maps and Plans of battles

Cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net.

Mr Buchan has produced a careful study of the career of one who was probably the greatest Scottish soldier. He has told the story of Montrose as it should be told—as a straightforward narrative, which exceeds in interest the most fantastic romance. The campaigns are followed in detail, and an attempt is made to estimate Montrose's work, both as a statesman and as a soldier.

"A worthy memorial finely illustrated. He would be a dull man who would not be moved by the stirring of the pulse or an enlargement of the spirit."—Daily News and Leader

"Mr Buchan's book is a magnificent contribution to the philosophy of history. He makes his story feel the greatness of the personality of Montrose, who in all his public policy and private conduct even to the end of his barbarous execution was controlled by altruistic motives and aims."—Daily Chronicle

There is a hardly to be missed book of remembrance more attractive figure than the unhappy Marquis of Montrose. The career of such a hero of fact in the hands of such a writer of fiction as Mr Buchan could not fail to result in a book of unusual and sustained interest.—Evening Standard & St James's Gazette

The Great Armada RICHARD HALE.

Cloth, gilt top, fully illustrated, 5s. net.

In this new volume the author makes a careful historical study of the origin, progress, and defeat of the famous expedition which Philip of Spain launched against England in the "spacious times of Great Elizabeth." He deals with a subject of which patriotic Englishmen never weary, but he does so in a novel and attractive manner, taking advantage of the recent discoveries connected with the fate of the foundered ships of the Spanish fleet.

NELSON LIBRARIES.

New Volumes Just Ready.

RULES OF THE GAME

STEPHEN EDWARD WHITE 7d. net.

Collection Nelson (French).

VOYAGE AUTOUR DE MON JARDIN

ALPHONSE KARR 1s. net

HERNANI, MARION DE LORME

VICTOR HUGO 1s. net

VICTOR HUGO—RACONTÉ PAR UN

TÉMOIN DE SA VIE Vols I and II

1s. each net

Writing of the COLLECTION NELSON the Daily Chronicle says—
"These are intelligently presented books published at a net price which is not only in England but in France. Referring to a recently issued volume in this series entitled RETOUR DU FLOT, by BRADY, the writer continues—
"Brady, to call her by her pen name, which she is, well known has obtained a wide popularity in her own country by her singularly sympathetic studies of French family life as it is lived in France. In fact it is imagined by the English tourist. This new novel (Retour du Flot) should find a hearty welcome in our country."

Nelson's Encyclopædic Library.

An ENCYCLOPÆDIA of AGRICULTURE

Vols I, II, and III 1s. each, net

THOMAS NELSON & SONS,

35, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.; Parkside, Edinburgh.

GAY & HANCOCK'S AUTUMN ANNOUNCEMENTS.

THE JACKDAW OF RHEIMS.

By THOMAS INGOLDSBY, Esq.

With Twelve Illustrations in Four Colours by

CHARLES FOLKARD.

Ordinary Edition size 13½ in by 10 in Cloth gilt, extra boxed,
10s. 6d. net

Edition de Luxe (100 copies only), signed printed on hand made paper, bound in best vellum, £1 11s 6d. net

POEMS OF PASSION. POEMS OF PLEASURE.

By ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

With 20 Coloured Plates by DUDLEY TENNANT.

Size 11½ in by 9 in. 300 pages. Cloth, gilt extra. 15s. net.

500 Copies printed on Hand-made Paper, and bound in the best Vellum, Signed by the Author and Artist.
£2 2s. 0d. net

A SEA ANTHOLOGY.

By ALFRED RAWLINGS.

An attractively produced volume edited and illustrated by ALFRED RAWLINGS

Uniform with "A Flower Anthology"

Size 7 by 5½ in With Twelve 3 coloured seascapes. Limp cloth, gilt, 3s. 6d. net
Velvet persian, 6s. net

THE Stranger on the Aventine

By LETTICE MILNE RAE.

With Four Coloured Illustrations by

C. A. SHEEHAN

Cr 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net

A delightful story of a prominent Roman family who secretly listen to St Paul's teaching hoping thereby to have their little son's eyesight restored to him

ROMANTIC DAYS IN THE EARLY REPUBLIC.

By MARY C. CRAWFORD.

Demy 8vo, with 68 Half-tone Illustrations

Cloth gilt extra. 7s. 6d. net

ALLITERATIVE ANOMALIES FOR INFANTS AND INVALIDS.

By W. HAMMOND, B.A.

(Sometime Exhibitioner of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge), and JOHN COWIE, B.A.

(Sometime Scholar of Balliol College Oxford)

An exceedingly amusing Alphabet with alliterations on left hand page facing humorous drawing on right Size 9 in by 7½ in,
with 26 full-page illustrations in four colours 2s. 6d. net

NEW SERIES OF COLOUR BOOKS FOR CHILDREN THE "STORY HOUR" SERIES.

1. BIRDS' XMAS CAROL, by Kate Douglas Wiggin.
2. THE GREEN DOOR, by Mary E. Wilkins.
3. THE GOLDEN DOG, by Clara Louise Burnham.
4. FLOWER LEGENDS, by Bertha P. Standen.

Size 6½ by 5½ in 96 pp Four 3-colour illustrations
Cloth gilt picture wrapper 1s. 6d. net each

London: GAY & HANCOCK, Ltd., 12 and 13, Henrietta Street, Strand.

WYMAN & SONS LIMITED

Largest Installation of Monotype and Linotype
Machines in the Kingdom
Fine Art Mischle and other Presses for best
Bookwork

High-class Rotary Machinery for half-tone
printing and quadruple Presses producing 16, 20, 24, 28 and 32 pp. papers at 30,000 per hour, folded

Newspaper, Book and General Printers and Lithographers

Binding Plant complete, including the latest machines for Case-making and Casing-in

Books set up by Monotype, submitted entire in proof, printed and bound complete

BOOKSTALL CONTRACTORS ON LONDON & NORTH WESTERN. GREAT WESTERN AND OTHER RAILWAYS

Wholesale Booksellers and Newsagents

|| Railway, Press and General Advertising Contractors

LONDON AND READING

THE BOOKMAN.

DUCKWORTH & CO.'S AUTUMN ANNOUNCEMENTS.

THE HAPPY PRINCE, and other Stories. By OSCAR WILDE. Illustrated by Charles Robinson. Crown 4to. 12s. 6d. net. Large Paper Edition, 250 copies for sale, Japanese vellum, 30s. net

THE GATHERING OF BROTHER HILARIUS. By MICHAEL FAIRLESS, author of "The Roadmender" Illustrated by Eleanor Fortescue Brickdale. Demy 8vo. 7s 6d net

CHILDREN IN VERSE. An Anthology collected by THOMAS BURKE Illustrated by Honor C. Appleton. Demy 8vo. 5s net

THE ROLL OF THE SEASONS. By G. G. DESMOND With 12 Coloured Illustrations. Large Crown 8vo 1s net.

MEN OF MARK. A Book of Photogravure Portraits by ALVIN LANGDON COBURN 4to. Quarter bound, in leather boards. 25s. net

LOST DIARIES. By THE HON. MAURICE BARING Crown 8vo 5s net

FROM THE CONGO TO THE NIGER AND THE NILE. By THE DUKE OF BRCKLENBURG With over 500 Illustrations, 20 Coloured Plates, and a Map In 2 vols Demy 8vo. Cloth gilt, gilt top. 32s net.

GERMANY AND THE GERMANS. By PRICE COLLIER author of "England and the English," "The West in the East" Second Impression Demy 8vo Cloth Gilt, gilt top 7s 6d net

RAINBOW LIGHTS: Character Sketches of American Women. Edited by A de SILVA Crown 8vo 6s

VILLAGES OF THE WHITE HORSE. By ALFRED WILLIAMS, Author of "A Wiltshire Village" Crown 8vo. 5s net.

LUCY BETTESWORTH. By GEORGE BOURNE, author of "The Bettesworth Book," "Memoirs of a Surrey Labourer" Crown 8vo 6s

WOMEN OF THE COUNTRY. By GERTRUDE BONE With a Frontispiece by Muirhead BONE 2s 6d net

PRINCIPLE IN ART, and other Essays. By COVENTRY PATMORE "Readers' Library" 2s 6d net

THE FUGITIVE. A Play in Four Acts By JOHN GALSWORTHY. Cloth, 2s net, paper covers, 1s 6d net.

FOUR TRAGEDIES. By ALLAN MAUGHAM Crown 8vo Cloth 6s

ST. FRANCIS OF ASSISI. A Play in Five Acts By J. A. PELADON Translated by Harold John Massingham Crown 8vo 2s 6d net

THE MOTHER. A Play. By EDEN PHILLIPS Cloth 2s net paper covers, 1s 6d net

THE SHADOW. A Play By EDEN PHILLIPOTS. Cloth, 2s net paper covers 1s 6d net

BEVIS: the Story of a Boy. By RICHARD JEFFERIES Illustrated by Harry Rountree 8 Illustrations in Colour Crown 8vo 6s

LONE TREE LODGE. By CAPT OWEN VAUGHAN, author of "Old Fireproof" Illustrated by Edgar Holloway Crown 8vo 6s

THE STORY BOX: A Fund of Amusement for Boys and Girls Edited by S H HAMER With 12 Pictures in Colour, and very many in Black-and-White Royal 8vo Cloth gilt in a box 3s 6d net

ELVES AND PRINCESSES. By BERNARD DARWIN With 6 Illustrations by J R Monsell. 3s 6d

THE TWINS IN CEYLON and MORE ABOUT THE TWINS. By BELLA SYDNEY WOOLF With 12 Illustrations in Colour and 12 in Black and White 3s 6d.

WATTY: A White Puppy. By Mrs ERNEST AMES With Illustrations in Colour 4to 1s net.

THE SEQUENCE. A Novel By ELINOR GLYN With 2 Illustrations and Picture Wrapper 6s

THE SPARE ROOM. By Mrs ROMILLY FEDDEN 6s

THE ETERNAL MAIDEN. By T EVERETT HARRE 6s

SENTIMENT, and other Stories. By VINCENT O'SULLIVAN 6s

FIVE YEARS AND A MONTH. By Mrs MORRIS WOOD 6s

THE HAPPY-GO-LUCKY MORGANS. By EDWARD THOMAS 6s

THE THING IN THE WOODS. A Novel By MARGERY WILLIAMS 6s

THE BOOK OF MARTHA. By THE HON. MRS DOWDALL With a Frontispiece by Augustus John. 6s.

A Full Descriptive List of the above will be sent post free on application to DUCKWORTH & CO., 3 HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON, W.C.

From Hodder & Stoughton's Autumn List of Novels

THE WITNESS FOR THE DEFENCE. Author of "Running Water," "The Broken Road," "The Four Feathers," etc.	By A. E. W. Mason	6s.
THE POISON BELT. Author of "The Lost World," etc.	By Sir A. Conan Doyle	3s. 6d.
ELDORADO. Author of "The Scarlet Pimpernel," etc.	By the Baroness Orczy	6s.
HER LADYSHIP'S CONSCIENCE. Author of "Concerning Isabel Carnaby," etc.	By Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler	6s.
GENERAL JOHN REGAN. Author of "Spanish Gold," "The Search Party," etc.	By George A. Birmingham	6s.
THE STORY OF WAITSTILL BAXTER. Author of "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm," "Mother Carey," etc.	By Kate Douglas Wiggin	6s.
T. TEMBAROM. Author of "The Shuttle," etc.	By Frances Hodgson Burnett	6s.
A DOUBTFUL CHARACTER. Author of "The Notorious Miss Lisle," etc.	By Mrs. Baillie Reynolds	6s.
THE MISCHIEF MAKER. Author of "The Illustrious Prince," etc.	By E. Phillips Oppenheim	6s.
THE PRINCE'S SHADOW. Author of "Saints in Society," etc.	By Mrs. Baillie Saunders	6s.
SNOW UPON THE DESERT. Author of "A Lame Dog's Diary," etc.	By S. Macnaughtan	6s.
RED WRATH. Author of "Barbe of Grand Bayou," etc.	By John Oxenham	6s.
A TRAP TO CATCH A DREAM. Author of "St. Quin."	By Dion Clayton Calthrop	6s.
TESS HARCOURT: A Novel of Wagner's Ring. Author of "Tamsie."	By Rosamond Napier	6s.
MRS. DAY'S DAUGHTERS. Author of "The Patten Experiment."	By Mary E. Mann	6s.
THE IRON TRAIL. Author of "The Harrier," "The Spoilers," "The Net," "The Ne'er-do-Well," etc.	By Rex Beach	6s.
THE UNWILLING ADVENTURER. Author of "The Red Thumb Mark."	By R. Austin Freeman	6s.
THE LOVE THAT LASTS. Author of "The Shutters of Silence," etc.	By G. B. Burgin	6s.
A TATTER OF SCARLET: A Novel of the Commune. Author of "The Smugglers," etc.	By S. R. Crockett	6s.
DINAH LEAVES SCHOOL. Author of "The Unwilling Schoolgirl." Illustrated in colour.	By Marjory Royce	5s.
CUPID GOES NORTH. Author of "Lord Richard in the Pantry," "The Sporting Instinct."	By Martin Swayne	6s.
THE GRIP OF THE PAST. Author of "Wine on the Lees," "The Red Reaper," etc.	By J. A. Steuart	6s.
THE PLAYERS. Author of "The Fall of a Star," "The Red Chancellor," "Fauconberg," etc.	By Sir William Magnay	6s.
THE LEAGUE OF ST. LOUIS. Author of "The Little Hour of Peter Wells," etc.	By David Whitelaw	6s.
NOVEMBER JOE: The Detective of the Woods. Author of "Don Q."	By Hesketh Pritchard	6s.
THE HEART OF A HERO. A Novel of Wolfe of Quebec. Author of "Rose of Blenheim," etc.	By Morice Gerard	6s.
WHEN LOVE CALLED. Author of "When I was Czar."	By A. W. Marchmont	6s.
HEARTS COURAGEOUS. Author of "The Kingdom of Slender Swords."	By Hallie Erminie Rives	6s.
THE FLIRT. Author of "Monsieur Beaucaire."	By Booth Tarkington	6s.
MY LADY'S GARTER.	By Jacques Futrelle	6s.
MY WIFE'S HIDDEN LIFE.	An Extraordinary Anonymous Chronicle	6s.
BOND OR FREE? Author of "David Lyall's Love Story," etc.	By David Lyall	6s.
THE BRIDGE BUILDERS. Author of "The Fairweathers," "The Last of Their Race," etc.	By Annie S. Swan	3s. 6d.

Hodder & Stoughton invite readers of The Bookman to write to them for particulars of the above Novels. A Postcard requesting such information will be attended to without delay.

HODDER & STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

BELL'S OCTOBER LIST

Messrs. BELL'S full Autumn List will be sent post free on application.

RICHARD WAGNER: Composer of Operas

By JOHN F. RUNCIMAN, Musical Critic to the "Saturday Review." Demy 8vo. With Photogravure Frontispiece and other Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.

THE COMEDY OF MANNERS

FROM ETHEREGE TO FARQUHAR

A History. By JOHN PALMER, sometime Scholar of Balliol College, Oxford. Demy 8vo. With 12 Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.

LIFE OF NAPOLEON I.

By Dr. J. HOLLAND ROSE. New, cheaper and revised edition, in one volume. With Maps and Plans. 6s. net.

HORACE WALPOLE'S WORLD

A Study of Whig Society in the XVIIIth Century. By ALICE D. GREENWOOD. Demy 8vo. With Portraits. 12s. 6d. net.

DEMOCRACY IN NEW ZEALAND

Translated from the French of ANDRÉ SIEGFRIED. With an Introduction by DOWNIE STEWART, M.A. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

ROUND ABOUT A POUND A WEEK

A Study of Life amongst the Working Classes of South London. By Mrs. PEMBER REEVES. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

THE FUTURE OF THE THEATRE

By JOHN PALMER. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

TORYISM: A Political Dialogue

By KEITH FEILING, M.A., Fellow of All Souls. With an Introduction by F. E. SMITH, K.C., M.P. Small crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

The Future of the Women's Movement

By Mrs. H. M. SWANWICK. With an Introduction by Mrs. FAWCETT, President of the National Union of Woman's Suffrage Societies. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

TWENTY NEW VOLUMES NOW READY

Bohn's Popular Library

The Pioneer Series of Cheap Reprints in New and Distinctive format.

Tastefully bound in Cloth, ONE SHILLING NET.

"They are admirably handy; the covers are thin and slightly flexible, but strong; the paper is thin, but not flimsy; and the type is clear. . . . Such works should speak for themselves; their quality is undeniable."—Athenæum.

WRITE TO-DAY for a copy of the prospectus, containing a history of the famous "Bohn's Libraries" from their inauguration to the present day.

G. BELL & SONS, Ltd., Portugal Street, London, W.C.

GEORGE ALLEN & Co.'s

ANNOUNCEMENTS

HANS HOLBEIN, THE YOUNGER

By A. B. CHAMBERLAIN,
Assistant Keeper of the Corporation Art Gallery, Birmingham.
This exhaustive work contains 252 Illustrations, including 24 in Colour. Demy 4to. Cloth. Two Volumes. 83 3s. net.

WINTER SPORTS IN SWITZERLAND

By E. F. BENSON
With 12 Colour Plates by C. Fleming-Williams and 47 other Full-page Illustrations. Crown 4to. Cloth. 15s. net.

THE BIRTH OF THE OPAL

A Child's Fancies
By DAPHNE ALLEN (aged 14)
With 12 Illustrations in Colour and 66 in Black-and-White. Crown 4to. Picture Cover. 5s. net.

THE MEANING OF ART

By PAUL GAULTIER
Translated by H. & E. Baldwin. With 28 full-page Illustrations. Crown 8vo. Cloth. 5s. net.

THE RHESUS OF EURIPIDES
Translated by Prof. GILBERT MURRAY, LL.D., Litt.D.
Crown 8vo. Cloth, 2s. net; paper covers, 1s. net.

"The graceful rendering is something to read with pleasure and interest."
—Times
"Thoughtful, penetrating and most poetic interpretations."—Westminster Gazette

FLEMISH TALES

A Volume of Verses. By J. REDWOOD ANDERSON
Crown 8vo. Cloth. 3s. 6d. net.

County Churches Series
KENT (in Two Vols.) By FRANCIS GRAYLING
With 47 Illustrations. Pocket size. Cloth.
2s. 6d. net per Volume

TWO BOOKS by STRINDBERG

Translated by CLAUD FIELD, M.A.
Crown 8vo. Cloth. 5s. net each.

HISTORICAL MINIATURES ZONES OF THE SPIRIT

With Portrait of Strindberg.

MY DOG

By M. MAETERLINCK
Translated by A. Teixeira de Mattos. With 6 Colour Plates, by CECIL ALDIN. Pott 4to. Cloth. 3s. 6d. net.

New Novels. Crown 8vo. Cloth. 6s. each.

THE HOOP OF GOLD

By GEORGE FORD. Author of "The Larramys," &c.

BORN OF A WOMAN

By GREGORY SABEN

LONDON: GEORGE ALLEN & CO., LTD., 44-5, Rathbone Place.

Macmillan's New Books

NEW COLOUR BOOKS.

RUDYARD KIPLING

Just So Stories. By Rudyard Kipling.

With Illustrations by the Author, and 12 additional Illustrations in colour by Joseph M. Gleeson. 4to. 6s. net. [Shortly]

MRS. CRAIK—WARWICK GOBLE

The Fairy Book. The best popular

Fairy Stories, selected and rendered anew by the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman" With 32 Illustrations in Colour by Warwick Goble Crown 4to. 15s net [October 7]

TENNYSON

The Works of Tennyson. With

Notes by the Author. Edited with Memoir by Hallam, Lord Tennyson. With Portrait Extra crown 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

The special feature of this work is that the reader will get, for the first time in a single volume, not only a complete edition of Tennyson's works, but also a specially prepared Memoir written for this issue, as well as the valuable author's notes which have only hitherto appeared in the Eversley edition.

RUDYARD KIPLING

Songs from Books. By Rudyard Kipling.

Uniform with Poetical Works. Crown 8vo. 6s Pocket Edition. Fcap 8vo. Cloth, 4s. 6d. net Limp Leather, 5s net. 8vo. 10s. 6d. net. Edition de Luxe (limited to 1,000 copies)

AUTHOR OF "THE DIVINE VISION"

Collected Poems. By A. E., Author of "The Divine Vision and other Poems" Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

THE PASSIONATE FRIENDS

6s.

By H. G. WELLS.

The Daily Mail—"There is much that is extraordinarily clever, suggestive, and illuminating. Mr. Wells is not losing power."

BENDISH: A Study in Prodigality. Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

By MAURICE HEWLETT.

"A novel of love and politics which opens in the year when William IV. became King of England."

Part VI. Just Published.

The Golden Bough. A Study in

Magic and Religion. By J. G. Frazer, D.C.L., LL.D., Litt.D. Third Edition, Revised and Enlarged. 8vo.

Part VI. The Scapegoat. 10s. net.

Previously Published.

Part 1. The Magic Art and the Evolution of Kings. Two vols. 2nd impression. 20s net.

Part 2. Taboo and the Perils of the Soul. One vol. 2nd impression. 10s net.

Part 3. The Dying God. One vol. 2nd impression. 10s. net.

Part 4. Adonis, Attis, Osiris. One vol. 2nd edition. 10s. net.

Part 5. Spirits of the Corn and of the Wild. Two vols 20s. net.

* Macmillan's Autumn Announcement List sent free on application.

MACMILLAN & CO., Ltd., LONDON.

THE

SALE OF LADY DAVENTRY

The "discovery" of the Autumn Season. The booksellers and libraries have shown their faith by record first orders, and the first reviews confirm their enterprise. "Is apparently going to compete successfully with such record sellers as 'The Rosary' and 'The Broad Highway'" says one. "Its sale seems assured. Lady Daventry out-Bellas Robert Hichens' 'Bella Donna,'" says another, whilst a third compares it with the work of Charlotte Bronte. Price 6/-.

THE

GARDEN OF IGNORANCE

The Experiences of a Woman in a Garden, by Mrs. George Cran, with 23 Illustrations. 5/- net. Second Edition. "Read it, read it now!"—Daily Mail. "We can recommend this book"—Athenæum. "Capital"—Observer. "Lively, entertaining"—Daily Telegraph. "A great achievement"—Daily Express. "Charming"—Bookman. "Delightful"—Punch. "Delightfully written"—Tatler. "Fascinating"—Field.

SHEILA INTERVENES

A new novel by Stephen McKenna, whose previous book "The Reluctant Lover" was so much read last autumn, and who was proclaimed "a new novelist." 6/-.

THE PUBLIC PROSECUTOR

of the Terror. By Alphonse Dunoyer. Illustrated 12/6 net. A strange and moving story of the Reign of Terror, based upon hitherto unpublished documents. A remarkable human document that is more like a novel than an account of actual happenings.

LEONARDO DA VINCI

The Florentine days of Leonardo and Verocchio by Dr. Jens Thiis. This revolutionary book is the result of some twenty years of study. It contains upwards of 300 illustrations, and disproves the authenticity of many drawings, etc., attributed to the master. Among others 35 of the 42 drawings in the Uffizi are proved to be spurious. Large 4to. Price 42/- net.

WRITE FOR THE AUTUMN ANNOUNCEMENTS OF HERBERT JENKINS, LM., 12, ARUNDEL PLACE, SWV.

The Bookman.

"I am a Bookman."—James Russell Lowell.

No. 265. Vol. XLV.
Subscription rate 12s. per annum post free.

OCTOBER, 1913.

PRICE ONE SHILLING.
Published Monthly.

CONTENTS.

NEWS NOTES .. .. .	1-6	Five Novelists, Limited. By EDWIN PUGH .. .. .	50	Mr. Stopford Brooke on Shakespeare. By BRAU-MONT FLETCHER .. .. .	68
THE BOOKSELLER'S DIARY	6-10	A Poet in the Making. By J. H. INGRAM .. .. .	52	NOVEL NOTES—
THE BOOKMAN GALLERY—		Perceval Gibbon's Short Stories .. .. .	53	Shallows—The Spanish Marriage—The Road to Victory—The Brat—Both Sides of the Road—A Fortune at Stake—Maggie House—Love and £200 a Year—The Cloak of St. Martin—The Shadow of Evil—The Nether Millstone Below Stairs—The Broken Halo—Lily Magic—Tide Marks—The Night of Memory—The Man in the Car—The Love that Lasts—The Red Colonel—Drum's House .. .. .	69-76
Warwick Deeping .. .. .	11	The Psychology of "Hamlet" Incarnation of Attorneyism By JOSEPH CLAYTON .. .. .	54	THE BOOKMAN'S TABLE -
St. John Lucas .. .. .	13	George du Maurier. By F. E. PHILLIPS .. .. .	55	Lord Lister—Love Letters of a Worldly Woman—The Cathedrals of Southern Spain—Olivia's Latchkey—Men and Rails—Wild Life in Wales—The Soul of a Doll—In the Footsteps of Borrow and Fitzgerald .. .. .	76-82
THE READER—		On the Adriatic .. .. .	55	NOTES ON NEW BOOKS .. .. .	82
George Borrow. By THOMAS SECCOMBE .. .. .	15	Some Autumn Novelists. By RICHARD CURLE, MR. H. H. MACARINTY, F. G. BLITANY, ETC. .. .. .	56
Henri Fabre. By ALEXANDRE TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS .. .. .	31	The Birth of the Opal .. .. .	63
Bernard Shaw—Part II. By DIXON SCOTT .. .. .	36	The Genius of the Gael. By HAROLD MASSINGHAM .. .. .	63
PRIZE COMPETITIONS .. .. .	26	Things Nautical. By J. E. PATTERSON .. .. .	64
NEW BOOKS—		Kaiser Max. By FRANK A. MUMBY .. .. .	65
The Second Room. By LEWIS MELVILLE .. .. .	42	Essays in Rebellion. By PERCEVAL GIBBON .. .. .	65
The Baedeker of Constitution By WALTER SICHEL .. .. .	43	Italy in North Africa .. .. .	66
Magnificent Marksmanship .. .. .	44	The Pleasant Land of France .. .. .	66
The English Novel. By WILFRED WHITTEN .. .. .	45	The Homer of Insects .. .. .	66
A Nietzsche before the Fact. By G. S. LAYARD .. .. .	46	The Diary of Lady Shelley By ROGER INGPEN .. .. .	67
The Inquisition and Torquemada .. .. .	47	Six Poets. By EDWARD THOMAS .. .. .	68
That Comedy called History By C. E. LAWRENCE .. .. .	48
New Books and Old .. .. .	48

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

News Notes.

The November BOOKMAN will be a Galsworthy Number, and will contain a special article on John Galsworthy and his work by Richard Curle.

At the dinner during the Borrow Centenary celebrations at Norwich in July last, Mr. Herbert Jenkins read a letter he had received from that "Prince of Borrowians," Mr. Theodore Watts-Dunton. Borrow's fame has grown enormously since Mr. Watts-Dunton's first article on him appeared in the Athenæum, in 1881, but "some years before his death he was, I assure you, so far forgotten," wrote Mr. Watts-Dunton, "that his first famous book, 'The Bible in Spain,' was taken to be the work of an author long since dead." On one occasion, the letter goes on, Mr. Watts-Dunton spoke of Borrow in a brilliant gathering, including Browning, Swinburne, Russell Lowell, Fanny Kemble, and told of how he had walked with him in Richmond Park the previous Sunday. His narration was received with a curious silence, and when he called on Russell Lowell a few days later he learned that he had been suspected of drawing the long-bow and pretending to have walked in Richmond Park with a man who was long since dead. The fact was that the failure of "Lavengro" and "The Romany Rye," entirely soured Borrow; "he especially shunned all literary men," and passed so out of their knowledge that they no longer thought of him as a living contemporary. "It is largely due to Mr. Watts-Dunton's spade work," as Mr. Jenkins remarked, "that Borrow is now coming into his own."

The Norwich Public Library "Readers' Guide," for July last (which is sold for a penny) contains articles on George Borrow, by Geo. A. Stephen, and by Edward Pearke, and a full and conveniently classified bibliography, including some items not to be found in the only other published bibliography, which is that in Mr. Edward Thomas's "Life of Borrow."

The George Borrow Celebration Souvenir, from which we reproduce two of Miss Nichols' interesting etchings, is published by Messrs. Jarrold & Sons, and a few copies of it are still obtainable at half-a-crown each.

The satirical art of Mr. Bernard Shaw finds ample scope for whimsical utterance in the new Fable Play which fills half the evening bill at the St. James's Theatre. If the main object of the play is to induce laughter, loud and prolonged, there can be no doubt about its success; the magnanimous Lion himself, delightfully played, is out-roared nightly by his audience. If, on the other hand, this unconventional fable is intended to jolt the conventional outlook on what may be termed religious values, it is equally successful in this respect, and those whose susceptibilities are most severely shaken by the jolt will be the first to confess to having experienced, between their irrepressible outbursts of laughter, an invigorating mental stimulus. Androcles is presented as a Greek tailor, the meekest and gentlest of Christians—he is really most exasperatingly meek. There is much broad pantomime in the play, but there is also much shrewd characterization. The human weaknesses of Androcles' fellow martyrs, as opposed to their divine faith, are exploited with true Shavian brilliance and ruthlessness. It is a play that, always hovering daringly between the sublime and the ridiculous, sets people laughing and wincing in turn; it uplifts at one moment and prostrates the next. In a word, it is Shaw. The critics were in doubt about it, apparently, on the first night and some of the press notices were a little bewildering, but the public has taken to "Androcles and the Lion" wholeheartedly and the theatre is crowded nightly.

"The Country of the Ring and the Book," by Sir Frederick Treves, which Messrs. Cassell are publishing, contains a full and connected account of the Franceschini tragedy of 1697-9 and of all the circumstances that led up to the murder of Pompilia Franceschini, with others, in the Via Vittoria in Rome. "In this narrative," says Sir Frederick, "certain points are made clear which have been, up to the present, obscure. For example, Pompilia's wedding is supposed to have taken place in December and to have been secret. The entry of the marriage has been discovered, from which it appears that it took place in September, after the usual publication of the banns and other formalities. The method of escape of Pompilia and the priest from Arezzo by 'the hill of the Torrione' is explained. The details of the flight of the two are given from one posting station to another all along the road." The various places connected with the story are identified, described, and illustrated by photographs, and the book concludes with a précis or abstract of the poem, showing how the various characters in the story presented themselves to Robert Browning.

(Phot.) by Reginald Hames.

Sir Frederick Treves.

We reproduced last month a portrait of George Bernard Shaw, at the Fabian Summer School. Mr. A. C. Fifield asks us to mention that this portrait is the frontispiece to Mr. Shaw's "Socialism and Superior Brains," which was published by Mr. Fifield for the Fabian Society in 1910.

We are not going to discuss the Library Censorship; there has been so much on that subject already in our daily and weekly contemporaries that probably everybody who cares to know anything about it knows by now as much as he wants to know. There is something to be said on both sides, and those concerned have been saying it pretty fully. For different reasons we sympathise with the banners and the banned, though we are disposed to put in a mild protest against the naïve idea which prevails in some quarters that a really serious and thoughtful novelist must needs deal frankly with sexual matters that are common knowledge to every adult and reasonably sophisticated reader. Nobody wishes to hamper the great novelist by forcing him to write only for the young person, but when he is depicting life for mature human beings it is not necessary for him to analyse in bold terms those thoughts, feelings, emotions, of which practically all but young persons know as much as, sometimes more than, himself. The great novelist has always assumed a certain amount of knowledge in his readers, and always will. There is a fine art of saying things by leaving them

Arthur, Count Gobineau,

whose brilliant study, "The Renaissance" (Heinemann), is reviewed in this Number unsaid; and no art is really involved in the teaching of one's grandmother how to suck eggs.

Students of Bergson's philosophy will welcome Mr. Darcy B. Kitchin's general sketch and summary of it, which is intended as an introduction to the original works and their English translations. The book has just been published by Messrs. George Allen, and its scope is sufficiently indicated in its title: "Bergson for Beginners."

Miss M. E. F. Irwin, whose first book, "How Many Miles to Babylon?" was recently published by Messrs. Constable, is one of our youngest novelists. Niece to the late S. T. Irwin, for thirty-five years a master at Clifton College, and a cousin of the famous Dr. Jowett, of Balliol, she may be said to have grown up in a literary atmosphere. She was educated in England and on the Continent, and definitely took up the study of literature at Oxford. Her work shows that she possesses a real feeling for romance and gifts of imagination and style that should carry her far in the career upon which she has so successfully started. We congratulate her on the very favourable reception that has been accorded to "How Many Miles to Babylon?" both by the critics and the reading public.

Mr. A. G. Gardiner, whose new book, "Pillars of Society," Messrs. Nisbet are publishing this month

Two important and very interesting biographies that Mr. John Murray is publishing this month are "The Life and Letters of Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough," by Mr. Stuart J. Reid, with an introduction by the Duke of Marlborough; and "Life and Letters of Lady Hester Stanhope," by her niece, the Duchess of Cleveland. Mr. Reid founds his study of the character and career of the great Duchess on unpublished letters and papers at Blenheim, and gives much more agreeable impressions of both the Duchess and the Duke than Swift and Macaulay have given us. The illustrations consist chiefly of unpublished pictures and tapestries at Blenheim. The other volume tells for the first time fully and authentically the romantic life-story of William Pitt's remarkable niece. Few great ladies outside fiction had a more extraordinary, more curiously interesting career than had the Lady

Miss M. E. F. Irwin.

Canon Anthony C. Deane, whose "In my Study" will be published shortly by Messrs. Nisbet.

Golding, who should also have been mentioned as the editor of the same firm's "Little Wonder Books," and of their admirable and popular annual, "The Wonder Book."

Mrs. Walter Tibbits, who has accepted a commission from Mr. Eveleigh Nash to write a book on "The Mysteries of Asia," has just sailed with Major Tibbits for India, en route to Thibet.

Mr. Heinemann is publishing to-morrow a volume of fifty caricatures by Max Beerbohm; and on the same day will issue Mr. John Masefield's new poem, "The Daffodil Fields," and the second volume in the Collected Works of Mr. Edmund Gosse.

A correspondent, from South London, sends us the following interesting communication:

To the Editor of THE BOOKMAN:

SIR, Mr. Dixon Scott in his article on Mr. Bernard Shaw refers to the latter as having "strayed into one of the meetings of the myriad societies of that day, a body calling itself, for some no doubt adequate reason, the Zetetical Society."

Apparently Mr. Scott was unable to discover the "adequate reason;" and this is not surprising, as the actual name of the body in question was the Zetetical Society—a zetetic being, according to the erudite individual who unearthed and suggested the title, a seeker after truth. The name must, however, have been adopted with a due regard to modesty, since my impression is that the whose new novel, "Tansy," Messrs. Hutchinson are publishing majority of the members, with the confidence of youth, were firmly convinced that they had already found the truth and that their mission in life was to disseminate it.

Mr. Tickner Edwardes.

I have before me a programme of the Society for the winter session 1880-1, and observe that it includes a lecture by Mr. Sidney Webb on the elementary subject of "The Ethics of Existence." Mr. Shaw's name does not appear, so his advent must have been later; but I well remember his first speech. A lecture had been delivered by some specialist on "Art," and for once the members seemed nonplussed; and there was a painful silence until a tall, slim young man came to the rescue and aroused the greatest enthusiasm by a brilliant and fluent discourse, which left the impression (to quote what he subsequently said of Mr. Webb, as recorded by Mr. Dixon Scott) that "he knew all about the subject of the debate; knew more than the lecturer; had read everything that had ever been written on the subject; and remembered all the facts that bore on it." He may, for aught I know, have been "nervous, unready and sensitive" and "suffered agonies," but, if so, no one would have suspected it from his placid countenance and smooth delivery.

Yours, &c.

ONE OF THE ORIGINAL MEMBERS.

The sermon on George Borrow that Dr. Beeching, Dean of Norwich, preached in Norwich Cathedral during the centenary celebrations is issued by Messrs. Jarrold & Sons in pamphlet form.

The Booksellers' Diary.

LIST OF FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

October 1st to November 1st, 1913.

Messrs. George Allen & Co.

BALCH, HERBERT L., F.S.A.—Wookey Hole: Its Cave and Cave Dwellers. Period Restorations and numerous drawings by John Hassall, R.I. Cave Photographs and Diagrams by J. H. Savory. Edition limited to 750 copies. 15s. net.
BENSON, E. F.—Winter Sports in Switzerland. With 24 Plates in Colour by C. Fleming-Williams, and 47 reproductions from photographs by Mrs. Aubrey Le Blond. 15s. net.
CHAMBERLAIN, ARTHUR B.—Hans Holbein the Younger. With 24 full page illustrations in Colour and 228 in Black and White. 2 vols. £3 3s. net.

CLARKE, STANLEY.—Carols of a Card Club. 1s. net.
GRAYLING, FRANCIS.—Kent Churches. With nearly 50 Illustrations. 2 vols. 2s. 6d. net each.
HATCH, F. H., Ph.D.—The Petrology of the Igneous Rocks. Seventh Edition Revised. With many Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.
HOLT, PROF. EDWIN.—The Concept of Consciousness. 12s. 6d. net.
LORIA, PROF. ACHILLE.—The Economic Synthesis. Translated by M. Edem Paul. 15s. net.
MAETERLINCK, M.—My Dog. Translated by A. Teixeira de Mattos. With 6 Colour Plates by Cecil Aldin. New Edition. 3s. 6d. net.

PATRY, ROSE I.—Dramatic Scenes from Great Novelists (Part II). Adapted from the Works of Dickens, Thackeray, Brontë, Jane Austen, and Whyte-Melville. 6d. net.
REDWOOD-ANDERSON, J.—Flemish Tales (Verse). 3s. 6d. net.
ROGERS, W. T.—A Dictionary of Abbreviations. 7s. 6d.
SABEN, GREGORY.—Born of a Woman. Novel. 6s.
SHAW, CHARLES GRAY.—The Ego and its Place in the World. 12s. 6d. net.
VARISCO, BERNARDINO.—The Great Problems Translated by Professor R. C. Lodge. 15s. net.
WALTERS, F. RUFENACHT, M.D., M.R.C.P., F.R.C.S. Fourth Edition. Entirely rewritten. With 39 Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Appleton & Co.

BACON, J. D.—The Strange Cases of Dr. Stanchon. 6s.
BARR, AMELIA E.—All the Days of My Life. 12s. 6d. net.
CHAMBERS, ROBERT W.—The Business of Life. 6s.
DIXON, THOMAS.—The Southerner. 6s.
GIBBS, GEORGE.—The Silent Battle. 6s.
HERFORD, OLIVER, and MOYFETT, CLEVELAND.—The Bishop's Purse. 6s.
HUGHES, RUPERT.—The Amiable Crimes of Dirk Memling. 6s.
POLAK, J. O.—Obstetrics. 12s. 6d. net.
SIDIS, BORIS.—The Psychology of Laughter. 7s. 6d. net.

Mr. Edward Arnold.

ANDERSON, LIEUT.-COL. JOSEPH, C.B., K.H.—Recollections of a Peninsular Veteran. 10s. 6d. net.
BENGOUGH, MAJOR-GEN. SIR H. M., K.C.B.—Memories of a Soldier's Life. 8s. 6d. net.
CHARTERIS, HON. EVAN.—William Augustus, Duke of Cumberland, His Early Life and Times, 1721-1748. 12s. 6d. net.
COOKE, FRANCIS B.—The Cornish Yachtsman's Handbook. 10s. 6d. net.
COWEN, SIR F. H.—My Art and My Friends. 10s. 6d. net.
LOUDGE, REV. CANON H. L.—The Pastoral Teaching of St. Paul. 2s. 6d. net.
GRAHAM, HARRY.—Splendid Failures. 10s. 6d. net.
GRAHAM, HARRY.—The Motley Muse. 4s. 6d. net.
GRAY, MAXWELL.—Something Ajar. 6s. net.
HAUGHTON, CAPTAIN H. L.—Spot and Folk-Lore in the Himalaya. 12s. 6d. net.
HOLLAND, BERNARD, C.B.—The Fall of Protection. 12s. 6d. net.
MAUD, CONSTANCE, and MARY.—Shakespeare's Stories. 5s. net.
MAXWELL, RT. HON. SIR HERBERT.—Life and Letters of George Villiers, Fourth Earl of Clarendon. 30s. net.
NEVE, ARTHUR, F.R.C.S.E.—Thirty Years in Kashmir. 12s. 6d. net.
NEWTON, RT. HON. LORD.—Lord Lyons. 30s. net.
NORTON, ROBT. DOUGLAS.—Painting in East and West. 5s. net.
POTILR, M. (Translated by)—Zachary Stoyanoff. 10s. 6d. net.
REID, FORREST.—The Gentle Rover. 6s. net.
WHITE, SIR HERBERT THIRKELL, K.C.I.F.—A Civil Servant in Burma. 12s. 6d. net.

Mr. J. W. Arrowsmith.

FITZGERALD, PERCY, F.S.A.—Memories of Charles Dickens. With an account of his two journals, "Household Words" and "All the Year Round," and of the contributors thereto. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.
QUILLER-OUCH, SIR ARTHUR.—News from the Duchy. A Collection of Stories and Sketches. 6s.
WOLLASTON, G. H.—The Poet's Symphony. A Collection of Verses by some of those who in times past have loved music, and arranged for the present time by George Hyde Wollaston. 5s. net.

Mr. B. T. Batsford.

PAULDING, G. M.—Ladies. 2s. net.
FREEMAN, A. MARTIN.—Freedom. 2s. net.
GALE, NORMAN.—Solitude. 2s. net.
LEHMANN, R. C.—A Spark Dying. A Book for Animal Lovers. 2s. net.
MEYNELL, ALICE.—Childhood. 2s. net.
RHYS, FRANK.—Romance. 2s. net.

Messrs. A. & C. Black.

ARNOLD, HUGH.—Stained Glass. Painted by Lawrence B. Saint. 25s. net.
BARNARD, H. CLIVE.—Pictures of Famous Travel. 1s. 6d.
FARRER, REGINALD.—The Dolomites. Painted by L. Harrison Compton. 7s. 6d. net.
FOORD, EDWARD, and HOME, GORDON.—England Invaded. 6s. net.
GARNETT, LUCY M.—Greek Wonder Tales. 6s.
HERBERT, AGNES.—The Moose. 5s. net.
KOLBEL, W. H.—South America ("The Making of the Nations" Series). 7s. 6d. net.
MALCOLMSON, A. M., M.D.—The Laws of Health for Schools. 1s. 6d. net.
MITION, G. E.—In the Grip of the Wild Wa. 3s. 6d.
POCOCK, MRS. C. INNES.—Highways and Byways of the Zoological Gardens. 5s. net.
SCOTT, SIR WALTER.—The Portrait Edition of the "Waverley Novels." 25 vols. 1s. net each.
STEWART, HUGH.—Provincial Russia. Painted by F. de Haenen. 7s. 6d. net.
TODD, PROF. JOHN A.—The Banks of the Nile. Painted by H. H. Du Cane. 20s. net.
VILLIERS STUART, MRS. C. M.—Gardens of the Great Mughals. 12s. 6d. net.
WALTER, L. EDNA.—Ireland (The "Fascination" Series). 1s. 6d. net.

Messrs. William Blackwood & Sons.

BUCHAN, JOHN.—Andrew Jameson: Lord Anlwall. With Portrait. 3s. 6d. net.
DOUGLAS, CHARLES and ANNE, and EWART, PROFESSOR COSSAR.—The Shetland Pony. With Gravure and other Illustrations. 10s. net.
ECCOTT, W. J.—The Mercenary. A Tale of the Thirty Years' War. 6s.
ELIOT, GEORGE.—Felix Holt. 2 Vols. 1s. net each.
ELIOT, GEORGE.—Romola. 2 Vols. 1s. net each.
ELIOT, GEORGE.—Scenes of Clerical Life. 2 Vols. 1s. net each.
FETTERLESS, ARTHUR.—The Domanders. 6s.
NOYES, ALFRED.—The Winepress: A Tale of War. 4s. 6d. net.
PURVIS, SIR ROBERT.—Sir William Arrol: A Memoir. With Illustrations.

Messrs. Cassell & Co.

ASKEW, ALICE and CLAUDE.—A Preacher of the Lord. With Colour Frontispiece. 3s. 6d.
BALL, SIR ROBERT S., M.A., LL.D., F.R.S.—Star Land. New Edition. Coloured Frontispiece and Illustrations in text. 7s. 6d.
HAMEL, FRANK.—Lady Hester Lucy Stanhope, a New Light on Her Life and Love Affairs. With 20 Illustrations, including Portraits, Views Facsimiles of Letters, etc. 15s. net.

MEYER, REV. F. B., B.A., D.D.—Life and the Way Through. 3s. 6d. net.
OLCOTT, CHARLES S.—The Country of Sir Walter Scott. Profusely Illustrated with Photographs. 6s. net.
Electric Lighting.—(Cassell's Technical Manuals). With Illustrations in Text and Folding Plate. 2s. net.
PARRY, D. H.—The V.C.: Its Heroes and Their Valour. With 8 Plates. 6s.
PEMBERTON, MAX.—Millionaire's Island. Frontispiece in Colour by E. S. Hodgson. 6s.
ROWLANDS, EFFIE ADFAIR.—The Surest Bond. 6s.
SIGERSON, DORA (MRS. CLEMFNT SHORTER).—Do-Well and Do Little (A Fairy Tale). 4 Coloured Plates by Alice B. Woodward. 3s. 6d. net.
STANTON, CORALIE, and HEATH HOSKEN.—The Dog Star. 6s.
THOMAS, H. H. (Assisted by WALTER EASLEA).—The Rose Book. With 8 Lumière Photographs in Colour and 64 half-tone Illustrations. 6s. net.
TREVES, SIR FREDERICK, BART., G.C.V.O., C.B., LL.D.—The Country of "The Ring and the Book." With Colour Frontispiece, over 80 Photographs and numerous Maps. 15s. net.
VASSILL, COUNT PAUL.—Behind the Veil at the Russian Court. With 8 Photogravure Plates. 10s. net.
WADSWLEY, OLIVE.—The Flame. Coloured Frontispiece. 6s.
WALMSLEY, R. MULLINBAU, D.Sc.—Electricity in the Service of Man. (Vol. II., Set 1.) With full-page Plates and hundreds of other Illustrations in the Text. 7s. 6d. net.
WOOD, ERIC.—The Boy's Book of Battles. 4 Coloured and 1. Black and White Illustrations. 3s. 6d.
WYLIE, T. A. R.—The Paper of Portman Square. With Colour Frontispiece by A. C. Michael. 6s.

Messrs. W. & R. Chambers.

ATLALO, F. G.—Our Agreeable Friends. Cheaper Edition. Illustrated in Colour and Black-and-White by Nancy Parker. 3s. 6d.
BALDWIN, MAY.—Hilda's Experiences. With 6 Illustrations in Colour by W. Rainey. 5s.
BALDWIN, MAY.—Holly House and Ridge's Row: A Tale of London Old and New. Cheaper Edition. With 12 Illustrations in Colour and many Pen-and-Ink Sketches by M. V. Wheelhouse. 3s. 6d.
BALDWIN, MAY.—Moll Mendith, Madcap. With 6 Illustrations in Colour by W. H. C. Groome. 3s. 6d.
BALDWIN, MAY.—Troublesome Topsy and Her Friends. With 6 Illustrations in Colour by Mabel L. Attwell. 3s. 6d.
BLACKMORE, R. D.—Lorna Doone. With 13 Illustrations in Colour and a Series of Pen and Ink Sketches by Gordon Browne. 6s. net.
DALY, T. A.—Madrigals. 5s. net.
DOUGLITY, GERTRUDE.—Pam, Robin, and Stumps. Illustrated by T. J. Overnell. 2s. 6d.
DRAYTON, GRACE G.—Bunnykins. 1s. 6d. net.
DRAYTON, GRACE G.—Captain Kidd's "Spences." A Similar Volume to "Buster Brown." 3s. 6d. net.
ELLIOT, GEORGE.—Adam Bede. A Presentation Edition with 16 Illustrations in Colour and 40 Pen-and-Ink Sketches by Gordon Browne. 10s. 6d. net.
FINNEMORE, J.—A Boy Scout in the Balkans. With 6 Illustrations in Colour by W. H. C. Groome. 5s.
GRINNFIT, G. B.—Jack in the Rockies. Cheap Edition. With 8 Illustrations by E. W. Deming. 2s.
GRINNFIT, G. B.—Jack the Young Ranchman. Cheap Edition. With 8 Illustrations by E. W. Deming. 2s.
Heroes of the Farthest North and Farthest South. With Portraits, Maps, and Illustrations. 1s.
KILROY, MARGARET.—Little Torment. Cheap Edition. With 8 Illustrations by Norman Anlt. 1s. 6d.
LYNN, ESCOTT.—A Hero of the Mutiny. With 6 Illustrations in Colour by W. Rainey. 5s.
LYNN, ESCOTT.—Blair of Balalava. Cheaper Edition. With 6 Illustrations in Colour by W. H. C. Groome. 3s. 6d.
MACLEAN, J. KENNEDY.—Heroes of the Polar Seas. Cheaper Edition. Containing a Chapter upon the recent Scott Expedition. With 8 Illustrations by W. H. C. Groome, Portraits and Maps of the Arctic and Antarctic regions. 3s. 6d.
MAR, GRAHAM.—Little Tin Soldier. Cheap Edition. With 6 Illustrations by Mabel L. Attwell. 1s. 6d.
MEADE, L. T.—The Chesterton Girl Graduates. With 6 Illustrations in Colour by Harold C. Larnshaw. 5s.
MEADE, L. T.—The Girls of Abinger Close. With 6 Illustrations in Colour by Percy Tarrant. 3s. 6d.
MEADE, L. T.—The Girls of King's Royal. With 8 Illustrations in Colour by Gordon Browne. 6s.
NEIL, MARION H.—Candies and Bonbons and How to Make Them. 3s. 6d. net.
OUTCAULT, R. F.—Buster Brown the Fun Maker. 3s. 6d. net.
OXENHAM, ELSIE.—Rosdy's New School. With 4 Illustrations in Colour by J. J. Overnell. 3s. 6d.
PARKER, B. & N.—Ladder Lodge. Full of Coloured Pictures of Animals and humorous verses. 3s. 6d. net.
PARKER, B. & N.—The Browns. A Book of Bears. A Cheap Edition. 1s. 6d. net.
RLID, LIZZIE C.—Jo Maxwell, Schoolgirl. With 4 Illustrations by Percy Tarrant. 2s. 6d.
TIDDEMAN, L. J.—All About Me. Cheap Edition. With 10 Illustrations by J. Hargrave. 1s. 6d.
TIMLOW, J. W.—April Fool Twins. Cheap Edition. With 5 Illustrations by H. R. Richards. 1s. 6d.
WILLIAMS, C. A. & G. A.—Anshups that Glue Bullt. The new cut-out Book. 3s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Chapman & Hall.

ALBANIST, MADAMI.—One of a Crowd. 6s.
BERMAN, HANNAH.—Molotovna. A Romance of Russia. 6s.
ICKEL, J. A.—A Dickens Bibliography. 12s. 6d. net and £1 5s. net.
HAMMOND, FRANCIS.—The Magic Fox. 6s.
HARRIS ROWLAND, J. B.—The Grey Cat. 6s.
JAMES, WINIFRED.—Letters to My Son. 1s. net.
LEVOQUE, M. L'AVOINTE.—The Russian Novel. 7s. 6d. net.
PHILLIPS, J. B.—The Boy of Youth. A Comedy. 6s.
WARD, JAMES.—The Colour Decoration of Architecture. 10s. 6d. net.
WARREN, DAWSON.—The Paris Journal. 15s. net.
WOODWARD, W. H.—Cesare Borgia. 15s. net.

Messrs. Chatto & Windus.

AYSCOUGH, JOHN.—Prodigals and Sons. Stories. 6s.
CANZIANI, ESTELLA.—Predmont. An Illustrated Record. 21s. net and 31s. 6d. net.
DEWAR, GEORGE A. B.—This Realm, This England. 6s. net.
DOZY, RUPINHART.—Translated by STOKES, I. G.—Spanish Islam: A History. 21s. net.
FALLS, CYRIL.—Illustrated by A. BRANLINGHAM SIMPSON—Tales of Hoffman. 6s. net.
GLOVER, JAMES.—Jimmy Glover and His Friends. 7s. 6d. net.

HAMILTON, COSMO.—The Door that has no Key: A Romance. 6s.
 HARDY, THOMAS. Illustrated by KEITH HENDERSON.—Under the Greenwood Tree. Edition de luxe. 6s. net.
 HUEFFER, FORD MADOX.—The Young Lovell: A Romance. 6s.
 SINGLETON, ESTHER.—Furniture: An Illustrated History and Guide. 18s. 6d. net.
 SMITH, JESSIE WILLCOX (Illustrated by).—A Child's Book of Stories. 3s. 6d. net.
 STEVENSON, R. L.—Collected Poems, including a Child's Garden of Verses. 12s. 6d. net; large paper, 25s. and 36s. net.
 STEVENSON, R. L. Illustrated by GORDON BROWN.—The Pavilion on the Links. 3s. 6d. net.
 STEVENSON, R. L.—The Sire de Malétroit's Door. 1s. net.

Messrs. T. & T. Clark.

AKED, REV. CHARLES F., D.D. (San Francisco). The Divine Drama of Job. 2s. net.
 ALLEN, VENERABLE ARCHDEACON W. C., and GRENSTED, REV. L. W.—Introduction to the Books of the New Testament. 4s. net.
 BATTEN, PROFESSOR W. L., D.D. (New York).—Ezra and Nehemiah. New volume of "The International Critical Commentary." 12s.
 CHARLES, PROFESSOR R. H., D.Litt., D.D. (Oxford).—Studies in the Apocalypse. 4s. 6d. net.
 DRIVER, PROFESSOR S. R., D.D. (Oxford).—A New and Revised Edition of "An Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament." 12s.
 GORDON, PROFESSOR A. R., D.Litt. (Montreal).—The Poetry and Wisdom of the Old Testament. 6d. net.
 HASTINGS, REV. JAMES, D.D. (Editor).—Encyclopædia of Religion and Ethics. Vol. VI. 28s. net.
 HASTINGS, REV. JAMES, D.D. (Editor).—The Greater Men and Women of the Bible. Vol. I.: Adam to Joseph. 10s. (or subscription price for the Series 6s. net per volume).

Mr. R. Dimadale Stocker.

Author of "The Time Spirit," a survey of contemporary, spiritual and psychological tendencies, to be published by Mr. Erskine MacDonald.

LINGS, REV. JAMES, D.D. (Editor).—The Great Texts of the Bible. Two new Volumes, viz.: St. Luke and 2 Corinthians and Galatians. 10s. (or subscription price for the Series, 6s. net per volume).
 NAIKNE, PROFESSOR A. B.D. (King's College, London).—The Epistle of Priesthood. 8s. net.
 SAYCE, PROFESSOR A. H., D.D., LL.D. (Oxford). The Religion of Ancient Egypt (A New and Revised Edition of the First Part of Professor Sayce's "The Religions of Ancient Egypt and Babylonia"). 4s. net.
 VAUGHAN, REV. CANON JOHN, D.D. (Winchester).—The Mirror of the Soul. 2s. net.
 WALKER, REV. W. L.—Christ's Creative Ideal. 4s.
 WELCH, PROFESSOR ADAM C., D.D. (Edinburgh).—The Story of Joseph. 2s. net.
 WINSTANLEY, REV. E. W., D.D. (Cambridge).—Jesus and the Future. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. James Clarke & Co.

CARLILE, REV. J. C.—Christian Union in Social Service. With an Introduction by the Bishop of Croydon. 2s. 6d. net.
 CHAPLIN, GAUNTLETT.—Dante for the People. Selected Passages from the Divine Comedy in English Verse. 4s. 6d. net.
 McKILLIAM, A. E., M.A.—A Chronicle of the Archbishops of Canterbury. Photo gravure Portrait and 16 Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.
 JOWETT, J. H., M.A., D.D.—Things that Matter Most. Short Devotional Readings. 3s. 6d. net.
 DYSON, REV. W. H.—Studies in Christian Mysticism. 2s. 6d. net.
 SMYTH, DR. NEWMAN.—Constructive Natural Theology. 4s. 6d. net.
 WEYMOUTH, DR. R. F.—The New Testament in Modern Speech. Pocket Edition (without notes). 1s. 9d. net and 2s. 6d. net.

Messrs. W. B. Clive & Sons.

CRACKNELL, A. G., M.A., B.Sc., F.C.P.—Junior Geometry. 2s. 6d.
 WEEKLEY, PROFESSOR ERNEST, M.A.—School French Grammar. 2s. 6d.

Messrs. J. M. Dent & Co.

CHILDREN'S BOOKS. Edited by F. C. Tilne. 7s. 6d. net each volume. Illustrated. King Arthur and his Round Table. Robin Hood. La Fontaine's Fables. Æsop's Fables. English Fairy Tales. The Ugly Duckling and other Fairy Tales from Andersen. Perrault's Fairy Tales. Gulliver's Travels. Fairy Stories from Spain. The Story of Bayard. Each book contains eight coloured illustrations as well as others in the text, drawn by artists of note: R. Anning Bell, Arthur Rackham, the brothers Robinson, Herbert Cole, Dora Curtis, F. C. Tilney and others.

SULLIVAN, ALAN.—The Passing of Oul-i-but, and other Stories. 6s.
 THE COLLECTION GALLIA. Edited by Dr. Charles Sarras. 1s. net. Balzac. "Contes Philosophiques." Introduction de Paul Burget. "L'Imitation de Jésus Christ." Introduction de M. H. Benson. Alfred de Musset. Poésies Nouvelles. Pensées de Pascal. Texte de Brunschvigg. Préface de Emile Boutroux. Introduction de Victor Giraud. "La Princesse de Clèves." Par Madame de la Fayette. Introduction par Madame Lucie Félix Faure Goyau. Gustave Flaubert. "La Tentation de Saint Antoine." Introduction de Emile Faguet. Maurice Barrès. "L'Ennemi des Lois." Balzac. "Père Goriot." Introduction de Emile Faguet. Rétienne Lamy. "La Femme de Demain." La Fontaine. Fables.

Mr. A. C. Fifield.

BROOKS, VAN WYCK.—The Malady of the Ideal. 2s. net.
 BUTLER, SAMUEL.—The Fair Haven. New re-set Edition. Edited by R. A. Streetfield. 4s. net.
 BUTLER, SAMUEL.—The Humour of Homer, and other Essays. With a Portrait, and a short "Life," by Henry Festing Jones. 5s. net.
 GIBSON, ELIZABETH.—The Well by the Way. 6d. net.
 MOODIE, W. W.—The Tour of a Socialist Round the World (in 1912). 5s. net.
 WELLS, H. G.—The Discovery of the Future. New Revised Edition. 1s. net.

Messrs. Greening & Co.

DAUBERT, ALPHONSE.—Sappho. (Lotus Library.) 1s. 6d. net.
 FLAUBERT, GUSTAVE.—Salammbo. (Lotus Library.) 1s. 6d. net.
 GILL, C. RANGEL.—The Woman in the Case. New Edition. 1s. net.
 MANSFIELD, CHARLOTTE.—The Girl and the Gods. New Edition. 1s. net.
 MURGER, HENRY.—The Latin Quarter. (Lotus Library.) 1s. 6d. net.
 WYNNE, MAY.—The Secret of the Zenana. 6s.

Messrs. G. Harrap & Co.

KUNOS, DR. IGNACE.—Forty-four Turkish Fairy Tales. Profusely decorated and illustrated by Willy Pogány. 10s. 6d. net.
 ROLLESTON, T. W.—Lohengrin. Illustrated by Willy Pogány. 75s. net.
 ROSS, ESTELLE.—From George IV. to George V. 3s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Headley Bros.

ARMISTEAD, J. I.—Ten Years near the Arctic Circle. 3s. 6d. net.
 CLFEGG, REV. A.—Bible Within the Bible, The Part I. 6d. net.
 COMPILER OF "THE PILOT."—Life's Compass: A New Anthology. 3s. 6d. net, velvet calf; 2s. 6d. net, leather; 1s. 6d. net, cloth.
 "K.K.K."—Quaker Bonnet, The. 2s. 6d. net.
 WEBB, W. TREGO.—By Silva's Brook: Poems of the Faith. 1s. net.
 WEBSTER, A. W.—Inward Light, The, and other Verses. 2s. 6d. net.
 WILLIAMS, GEORGE.—Suggested explanations of Supposed Bible Inaccuracies. 2s. net, cloth; 1s. net, paper.
 WILLIAMS, GEORGE.—Wooden Spoon, The. 2s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Heath, Cranton & Ouseley.

ALDINGTON, MAY.—The King called Love. 6s.
 AN OFFICER'S DIARY. War and Sport in India. 15s. net.
 BENSUSAN, S. L.—May Magic. 2s. net.
 BLAKLEY, EDITHA.—Alone in a Crowd. 6s.
 C. C. I.—Hearts and Spades. 2s. 6d. net.
 CHAPLIN, A.—The Row Book of Romance. 3s. 6d. net.
 CLYMONT, J. R.—Land of False Delights. 2s. 6d. net.
 DELMER, F. SETTON.—English Literature from Beowulf to Bernard Shaw. 2s. 6d. net.
 POOLE, EVAN.—An Age of Steel. 2s. 6d. net.
 ROGERS, REGINALD.—A Northern Voyage. 2s. net.
 SPENCER, F. A.—The Four Horned Altar. 6s.
 WREN, STEWART.—Woman from the Unknown. 6s.

Mr. Wm. Heinemann.

"ANON."—The Mountain Apart. 6s.
 BEERBOHM, MAX.—Fifty Caricatures. 6s. net.
 BINYON, LAURENCE.—Auguries. 3s. 6d. net.
 GALSWORDY, JOHN.—The Dark Flower. 6s.
 GOSSE, EDMUND, C.B.—The Collected Essays. Vol. 2. 6s. net.
 GOSSE, EDMUND, C.B.—The Collected Essays. Vol. 1. 6s. net.
 HALL, GERTRUDE.—The Truth about Camilla. 6s.
 HALL, GERTRUDE.—Indiscretions of Dr. Carstairs. 6s.
 HAYWARD, RACHEL.—Letters from La-Has. 6s.
 HELSTON, JOHN.—Aphrodite and other Poems. 3s. net.
 HIND, ARTHUR M.—Fragonard. ("Great Engravers" Series.) 2s. 6d. net.
 HIND, ARTHUR M.—Hogarth. ("Great Engravers" Series.) 2s. 6d. net.
 JESSE, F. TENNYSON.—The Milky Way. 6s.
 KEATING, JOSEPH.—The Perfect Wife. 6s.
 MASEFIELD, JOHN.—The Daffodil Fields. 3s. 6d. net.
 STERL, FLORA ANNIE.—The Adventures of Akbar. 6s. net.

Messrs. Holden & Hardingham.

HATES, E. KATHARINE.—The Doormang. 6s.
 KENYON, E. C.—Ashes of Honour. 6d.
 KENYON, E. C.—The Mystery of Blackstone Mine. 6d.
 ROWCROFT, CHAS.—Brandon the Bushranger. 6d.
 WYLLARDE, DOLF.—Where the Lotus Blooms. 7d.

Messrs. Hurst & Blackett.

COLLISON, WILLIAM.—The Life Story of William Collison. 10s. net.
 EGFERTON, MAY.—Undreamed Ways. 6s.
 FIELDING-HALL, H.—The Passing of Empire. 10s. 6d. net.
 "IOTA."—Two Ways of Love. 6s.
 LEROUX, GASTON.—The Mysterious Mr. Noel. 6s.
 MARRIOTT, CHARLES.—Salsoll. 6s.
 MCCARTHY, JUSTIN HUNTLEY.—Fool of April. 6s.
 PAGE, GERTRUDE.—Where the Strange Roads Go Down. 6s.
 SLADEN, DOUGLAS, and POTTER, OLIVE M.—Weeds. 6s.
 WATTS-DUNTON, THEODORE.—The Illustrated "Arlwin." (A Second Issue.) 6s. net.
 WESTRUP, WILL.—The River of Dreams. 6s.

Messrs. Hutchinson & Co.

BARLOW, J.—Jongs and Dealings. (Observed in Ireland.) 6s.
 BRADDON, M. E.—Miranda. 6s.
 BRYANT, MARGUERITE.—The Dominant Passion. 6s.
 CARRUTHERS, DOUGLAS.—Unknown Mongolia: A Record of Travel and Exploration on Russo-Chinese Borderlands. 2 Vols. 24s. net.
 FIELDING-HALL, H.—Margaret's Book. Illustrated by Chas. Robinson. 7s. 6d. net.
 FRASER, MRS. HUGH.—Italian Yesterdays. 16s. net.
 FRASER, MRS. HUGH, and STAHLMANN, J. I.—The Honour of the House. 6s.
 FROENIUS, LEO. (Translated by R. BLIND).—The Voice of Africa. 2 Vols. 28s. net.
 GREEN, E. EVERETT.—Marcus Quale, M.D. 6s.
 HURTER, E. W.—Athletics in Theory and Practice. 3s. 6d. net.

JEFFSON, EDGAR.—Jarboyle Gardens. 6s.
 MONTESQUIOU, COMTE R. DE.—The Works of P. A. de László. With 60 Photogravure Plates. £10 10s. net.
 MONTESQUIOU, COMTE R. DE.—The Works of P. A. de László. With 60 Photogravure Plates, and 6 extra Plates in Colour. Edition de luxe. £18 18s. net.
 MOREUX, THE ABBE.—A Day in the Moon. 3s. 6d. net.
 PAPE, FRANK (Illustrated by).—The Book of Psalms. 10s. 6d. net.
 RAPHAEL, JOHN N.—Up Above. 6s.
 SERGEANT, PHILIP W.—Mrs. Jordan: Child of Nature. 16s. net.
 STACPOOLE, H. DE VERRE.—The Children of the Sea. 6s.
 STACPOOLE, H. DE VERRE (Translated).—The Poems of François Villon. 7s. 6d. net.

STOCK, RALPH.—Marama. 6s.
 TAYLOR, I. A.—The Life of James IV.—10s. 6d. net.
 TWEEDIE, Mrs. ALEC.—America as I saw it. With Photogravure Portrait and numerous other Illustrations, including 13 Humorous Cartoons by W. K. Haselden. 1 Vol. 16s. net.

Messrs. T. C. & E. C. Jack.

"BALDRY, A. LYS.—Burne-Jones. ("Masterpieces in Colour" Series.) Special Issue in Leather Yapp binding. 3s. 6d. net.
 BALDRY, A. LYS.—Leighton. ("Masterpieces in Colour" Series.) Special Issue in Leather Yapp binding. 3s. 6d. net.
 BALDRY, A. LYS.—Millais. ("Masterpieces in Colour" Series.) Special Issue in Leather Yapp binding. 3s. 6d. net.
 BLYTH, ESTELLE.—Jerusalem and the Crusades. 3s. net.
 COLERIDGE, MARY E.—Holman Hunt. ("Masterpieces in Colour" Series.) Special Issue in Leather Yapp binding. 3s. 6d. net.
 CLUTSAM, G. H.—Weber. ("Masterpieces of Music" Series.) 1s. 6d. net.
 HARE, W. LOFTUS.—Watts. ("Masterpieces in Colour" Series.) Special Issue in Leather Yapp binding. 3s. 6d. net.
 HERVEY, ARTHUR.—Rubenstein. ("Masterpieces of Music" Series.) 1s. 6d. net.
 HIND, C. LEWIS.—Constable. ("Masterpieces in Colour" Series.) Special Issue in Leather Yapp binding. 3s. 6d. net.
 HIND, C. LEWIS.—Romney. ("Masterpieces in Colour" Series.) Special Issue in Leather Yapp binding. 3s. 6d. net.
 HIND, C. LEWIS.—Turner. ("Masterpieces in Colour" Series.) Special Issue in Leather Yapp binding. 3s. 6d. net.
 ISRAELS, JOSEF.—Rembrandt. ("Masterpieces in Colour" Series.) Special Issue in Leather Yapp binding. 3s. 6d. net.
 JACK, CLARENCE H.—The Art of Laundry Work. Revised and Enlarged Edition. 2s. net.
 JACKSON, ALICE F. (Retold by).—A Tale of Two Cities. (Dickens and Scott for Boys and Girls.) Cloth, 2s. per vol., Boards, 1s. 6d. net per vol.
 JACKSON, ALICE F. (Retold by).—Barnaby Rudge. (Dickens and Scott for Boys and Girls.) Cloth, 2s. per vol., Boards, 1s. 6d. net per vol.
 MACGREGOR, MARY.—The Story of Greece. 7s. 6d. net.
 O'NEILL, Mrs. ELIZABETH.—The Story of the World. 7s. 6d. net.
 O'NEILL, H. C. (Editor).—The New Encyclopaedia. 7s. 6d. net.
 PISSARRO, LUCIEN.—Roethli. ("Masterpieces in Colour" Series.) Special Issue in Leather Yapp binding. 3s. 6d. net.
 ROTHSCHILD, MAX.—Gainsborough. ("Masterpieces in Colour" Series.) Special Issue in Leather Yapp binding. 3s. 6d. net.
 STALEY, J. EDGUM.—British Painters. Their Story and their Art. 5s. net.
 STEEDMAN, AMY.—When They Were Children. 5s. net.
 THOMAS, W. BEACH, and COLLETTI, A. K.—Autumn and Winter. 10s. 6d. net.
 WHEELER, H. F. R.—The French Revolution. 7s. 6d. net.
 WOOD, T. MARTIN.—Whistler. ("Masterpieces in Colour" Series.) Special Issue in Yapp binding. 3s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Jarrold and Sons.

BOYD, RAYLY ELIZABETH.—Alfreda Holme. 2s. net.
 BOYD, RAYLY ELIZABETH.—Zachary Brough's Adventure. 2s. net.
 BOYD, RAYLY ELIZABETH.—Forestwvke. 2s. net.
 BOYD, RAYLY ELIZABETH.—Jonathan Merle. 2s. net.
 MIDDLETON, REV. ROBERT.—Stories of Blessing. 1s. net.
 STABLES, DR. GORDON.—The Parents' Book to Children's Ailments. 1s. net.
 STABLES, DR. GORDON.—The Mother's Book of Health and Family Adviser. 1s. net.
 STABLES, DR. GORDON.—The Wife's Guide to Health and Happiness. 1s. net.
 STABLES, DR. GORDON.—The Boy's Book of Health and Strength. 1s. net.
 STABLES, DR. GORDON.—The Girl's Own Book of Health and Beauty. 1s. net.
 STABLES, DR. GORDON.—Sickness or Health, or The Danger of Trifling Ailments. 1s. net.

Mr. Herbert Jenkins.

BURKE, EDWARD.—The Bewildered Benedict: the Story of a Superfluous Uncle. 6s.
 CHEIRO, C.—Cheiro's Guide to the Hand. 2s. 6d. net.
 HILL, DR. ALEX.—Round the British Empire. Illustrated. 2s. 6d. net.
 KNOX, MAJ. GENL. SIR WM.—The Flaw in Our Armour. With Illustrations by Field Marshal Earl Roberts. 1s. net.
 LEWER, H. W.—The China Collector. Illustrated. 5s. net.
 MCKENNA, STEPHEN.—Sheila Interviews. 6s.
 RILEY, W.—Wind-ridge. New Illustrated Edition. 4s. net.
 STOKES, HUGH.—Francesco Goya: A Study of the Work and Personality of the Eighteenth Century Spanish Painter and Satirist. 48 Plates. 10s. 6d. net.
 SUFFIELD, LORD P. C., G.C.V.O.—My Memories 1837-1913. 16s. net.

Mr. T. Werner Laurie.

BRANDON, VIVIAN.—Gothie's Hermann and Dorothea. 3s. 6d. net.
 CARRINGTON, HERWARD.—Personal Experiences in Spiritualism. 7s. 6d. net.
 "CUT-CAVENDISH"—How to Win at Auction Bridge. 2s. 6d. net.
 DAVIDSON, GLADYS.—Stories from the Operas. 6s. net.
 HALL, A. NEELY.—The Handy Box. 6s. net.
 HAMILTON-BROWNE, COL.—Camp Fire Yarns of the Lost Legion. 12s. 6d. net.
 HAULTAIN, ARNOLD.—Goldwin Smith, His Life and Opinions. 18s. net.
 HAUPTMANN, GERHART.—A Gaults. 6s.
 HYATT, STANLEY PORTAL.—The Way of the Cardinals. 6s.
 MACDONALD, WILLIAM, M. S. Agr., Sc.D., Ph.D.—Conquest of the Desert. 7s. 6d. net.
 MELVILLE, FRED J.—All About Postage Stamps. 6s. net.
 NESBIT, E.—Wet Magic. 6s. net.
 PRICE, JULIUS M.—My Bohemian Days in Paris. 10s. 6d. net.
 VALLOIS, GRACE.—First Steps in Collecting. 6s. net.
 WATSON, A. GORDON.—In Spain with Peggy. 7s. 6d. net.
 Mrs. Edward's Cookery Book. 6s. net.

Messrs. John Long & Co.

"A JOURNALIST."—Bohemian Days in Fleet Street. 10s. 6d. net.
 FLEISCHMANN, HECTOR.—Robespierre and the Women he Loved. 12s. 6d. net.
 LANGLADE, EMILE.—Rose Bertin. 12s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co.

BENSON, VERY REV. MONSIGNOR ROBERT HUGH.—Paradoxes of Catholicism. Sermons preached in Rome, Easter 1913. 3s. 6d. net.
 BURTT-DAVY, JOSEPH.—Maize, its History, Cultivation, Handling and Uses, with Special Reference to South Africa. A Text-Book for Farmers, Students of Agriculture, and Teachers of Nature Study. With Frontispiece and 24 Illustrations.

CARPENTER, RIGHT REV. W. BOYD, D.D., D.C.L. (Canon of Westminster).—The Apology of Experience. 6d.

COLE, GREENVILLE A. T.—Outlines of Mineralogy for Geological Students. being the Bampton Lectures for 1911. 7s. 6d. net.

FIGGIS, JOHN NEVILLE, Litt.D.—Churches in the Modern State. HARDY, THOMAS J.—The Religious Instinct.

HUISS, MARCUS B., LL.B.—Samplers and Tapestry Embroideries. Also "The Stitchery of the Same," by MRS. HEAD; and "Foreign Samplers," by MRS. C. J. LONGMAN. With Reproductions in Colour, and other Illustrations in Monochrome. New and Revised Edition. 10s. 6d. net.

LANG, ANDREW.—The Maid of France: being the Story of the Life and Death of Jeanne d'Arc. New and Cheaper Edition.

LECKY.—Democracy and Liberty. 2 Vols. On November 15. 5s. net.
 LECKY.—History of England in the Eighteenth Century. 7 Vols.—Vols. 1-4 Ready. Vols. 5, 6, 7 in October. 2s. 6d. net.

LECKY.—History of Ireland in the Eighteenth Century. 5 Vols.—Vols. 1 and 2 on October 15. Vols. 3, 4, 5 on November 1. 2s. 6d. net.

LECKY.—Map of Life. 1 Vol.—On November 15. 2s. 6d. net.

LLOYD, G. I. H.—The Cutlery Trades.

MANSBRIDGE, ALBERT.—University Tutorial Classes: a Study in the Development of Higher Education among Working Men and Women. 2s. 6d. net.

MAPLES, ELLEN.—Personal Service: being a Short Memoir of Agnes Burton, of St. Faith's, Ritherne Park, Southampton. With Introduction by the Right Rev. the Bishop of Southampton.

POLLARD, A. F. (Introduction by).—The Reign of Henry VII. from Contemporary Sources. Narrative Extra. 6s.

SIMMONS, REV. J. G., D.D. (Canon of St. Paul's).—The Religion of the Atonement. 1s.

STORR, REV. VERNON F., M.A. (Canon of Winchester).—The Development of English Theology in the Nineteenth Century (1800-1860). 12s. 6d. net.

THOMPSON, CAPTAIN P., I.R.A.S.—Navigation: A Method of Finding a Ship's Position at Sea by One Observation only.

THORPE, SIR EDWARD, C.B., LL.D., F.R.S. (Assisted by Eminent Contributors).—A Dictionary of Applied Chemistry. Vol. V. Sodium-Z. 45s. net.

WANKLYN, W. M. C.—The Administrative Control of Smallpox. Revised and Enlarged Edition. In 4 Volumes. With numerous Illustrations.

WARD, WILFRID.—The Life of John Henry Cardinal Newman. Based on his Private Journals and Correspondence. With 2 Frontispieces. Two Volumes. New and Cheaper Edition, with New Prefatory Matter. 12s. 6d. net.

WHETHAM, W. C. D., and WHETHAM, MRS. W. C. D.—A Manor Book of Ottery St. Mary.

WILLIAMS, MAUD L.—The Sorrow Stones. An Unfinished Story. 6s.

Messrs. Lynwood & Co.

BARLOW, HILARE.—The Sentence of the Judge. Cheap Edition. 1s. net.

BURKE, EDMUND, M.A.—A Cluster of Shamrocks: Short Stories. Cheap Edition, 2s. net.

CRANSTON, DOUGLAS.—The Adventures of Master Graving, R.C. 6s.

DONOGAN, LIEUT. COL. J. D. F., R.A.M.—Rag Time: Poems of Military Life, suitable for Recitation. Cheap Edition, 6d. net.

FLEMING, NOEL.—Sparks that Brood: A Novel. 6s.

GREY, GEO. DUNCAN, LL.D.—A Venture in Variety: Essays and Verse. 2s. 6d. net.

HOLLAND, CLIVE.—A Madonna of the Poor, and Other Stories. 6s.

LEEDS, Mrs. LEWIS.—Mr. Masdter: A Novel. Cheap Edition, 2s. net.

LEITH, Mrs. DISNEY.—A Black Martinmas. Cheap Edition, 2s. net.

LEITH, Mrs. DISNEY.—Champion Sandy. Cheap Edition, 1s. net.

LEITH, Mrs. DISNEY.—Lachlan's Widow. 6s.

MUGGE, M. A.—Darts of Defiance: Sonnets and other Poems. 2s. 6d. net.

OUTLON, L.—Exceeding Pleasant, and other Sketches. With 10 Illustrations. 6s.

PUGH, GEORGE and JENNIF.—At the Back of the World: Wanderings over Many Lands and Seas. 6s.

REE, S. H. CAULTON.—The Taming of the Terror. 1s.

SYMONS, MAJOR F. A., R.A.M.C.—Prince John of Strephitz. 6s.

Mr. Erskine MacDonald.

CROMARTIE, COUNTLESS OF.—The Decey: A Romance. 12s. 6d. net.

EVEREST, A. F.—Flowers from the Fatherland, a Garland of German Poetry. Collected and Translated.

HAILE, W. C.—The Master: A Poetic Drama. With an Introduction by Stephen Phillips. 2s. 6d. net.

JE. (REV.) JANET.—The Fame Seeker, and Other Poems. 2s. 6d. net.

K'G. R. HARRY.—Sonnets. 2s. net.

MO. R. BERNARD.—Cornish Catches. 2s. 6d. net.

MOORE, HAMILTON E.—he Rut. 6s.

RUTHERFORD, C.—The Blazing Star. 6s.

STOCKER, R. DIMSDALE.—The Time Spirit: an Inquiry into the Spiritual Tendencies of our Time. 3s. 6d. net.

WILLIAMS, ALFRED.—Cor Cordium, Love Songs and Poems. 3s. 6d. net.

Mr. Elkin Mathews.

BINYON, LAURFENCE.—Odes. New Edition printed at the Chiswick Press. 2s. 6d. net.

DODD, G. L. ASHLEY.—Fishing Rhymes. Cloth, 2s. net, wrapper, 1s. net.

KILBURN, HARRITT.—The Apprentices at Traver and other Poems. 3s. 6d. net.

KNIGHT, PROF. LL.D.—Coleridge and Wordsworth in the West Country: Their Early Friendships and Surroundings. By Professor Knight, LL.D. With Illustrations by Edmund H. New. 7s. 6d. net.

"M.A."—Early Poems. 3s. 6d. net.

SACKVILLE, LADY MARGARET.—Songs of Aphrodite, and other Poems. 4s. 6d. net.

SMITH, CECILY FOX.—Songs Under Sail. Cloth, 1s. 6d. net, wrapper, 1s. net.

TAYLOR, REV. JOHN.—The Northern Sea: A Legend of the Norwegian Fiords. and the North Cape. With 16 Drawings by the author.

WESTERMAIN, ELIZABETH.—Helens Mirror, and other Poems. 1s. net.

WILLIAMS, WILLIAM CARLOS.—Tempers. 1s. net.

WILSON, RATHMILL.—Another Book of Sirens. 2s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Methuen & Co.

ADY, CECILIA M.—Plus II: The Humanist Pope. 10s. 6d. net.

BARNETT, MARY G.—Young Delinquents. 3s. 6d. net.

BEACON, EVELYN.—Once of the Angels. 6s.

BOULANGER, G. A.—The Snakes of Europe. 6s.

CHESTERTON, G. K.—The Flying Inn. 6s.

CLAUSEN, GEORGE.—Royal Academy Lectures. 4s. net.

CLAY, RUTH M.—The Hermits and Anchorites of England. 7s. 6d. net.

FFOULKES, CHAS.—Decorative Ironwork. 42s. net.

FRASER, EDWARD.—The Sailors whom Nelson Fed. 5s. net.

GIBBON, ED. (Edited by PROF. BURK).—Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. Vol. VII. 10s. 6d. net.

GRAHAME, KENNETH.—Illustrated by BRANSON, P.—The Wind in the Willows. 7s. 6d. net.

GRAY, THE REV. E. McQUEEN.—A Volume of Poems. 2s. 6d. net.

HOWELL, A. G. FERRERS.—St. Bernardino of Siena. 10s. 6d. net.

HUTTON, ED.—The Cities of Romagna and the Marches. 6s.

KHAYYAM, OMAR.—Illustrated by SULLIVAN, E. J.—The Rubaiyat. New Illustrated Edition. 15s. net.

LEBLANC, GEORGETTE.—The Children's Blue Bird. 5s. net.

LE QUEUX, WM.—The House of Whispers. 7d net.
 LUCAS, E. V.—Loiterer's Harvest 5s.
 LUCAS, E. V.—London Lavender. 5s.
 MAFTERLINCK, M.—Our Fidelity 4s net.
 MARLETT, R. R.—The Threshold of Religion. 5s net.
 McCABE, JOSEPH.—The Impresses of Constantinople. 10s 6d net.
 NELSON, PHILIP.—Ancient Painted Glass in England. 7s 6d net.
 NEVILL, RALPH.—Fancies, Fads and Fashions. 10s 6d net.
 RITCHIE, E. B.—Jip-Reading 5s net.
 ROLLE, RICHARD.—The Fire of Love and the Mending of Life. 3s 6d net.
 RYLEY, A. HERESFORD.—Old Paste. 42s net.
 SARAWAK, THE RANER OF.—My Life in Sarawak. 10s 6d net.
 SHAKESPEARE, WM.—As you Like It (Arden Shakespeare). 2s 6d net.
 SYMES, J. F.—Broad Church. 2s 6d net.
 URE, ARNOLD.—The Way. 4s net.
 VICKERS, K. H.—England in the Later Middle Ages. 10s 6d net.
 WATT, P.—R. L. S.—6s net.
 WHEELER, ETHEL ROIT.—Women of the Cell and Cloister. 5s net.
 WILLIAMS, H. NOEL.—A Fair Conspirator: Marie de Rohan. 15s net.
 WILLIAMSON, C. N. & A. M.—The Botor Chaperon 1s net.
 WILSON, ERNEST H.—A Naturalist in Western China. 10s net.
 WILDE, OSCAR.—Chamblides and other Poems. 1s net.
 WOODWARD, B. B.—The Life of the Mollusc 6s.
 WYLLARDE, DOLF.—The Pathway of a Pioneer. 2s net.

Messrs. Mills & Boon.

APPLIN, ARTHUR.—The Woman Who. 1s.
 ARMSTRONG, C. F.—Shakespeare to Shaw. 6s.
 GRANT, LADY SYBIL.—Forged on Fiction. 3s 6d net.
 GRANT, LADY SYBIL.—Ave, Spunster 1s.
 HARDY, MARK.—Edward Raveland's Will. 6s.
 JEROME, T. SPENCER.—Roman Memories 7s 6d net.
 LEBLANC, MAURICE.—Ashes of Incense 1s.
 LEBLANC, MAURICE.—The Confessions of Arsène Lupin. 1s.
 MARVIN, DARMA, and FOREST, ESME.—Within the Law. 6s.
 MENZIES, H. STUART.—The Beaufort Hunting Diary. 7s 6d and 10s 6d net.

Mr. John Murray.

ADY, MRS. JULIA.—Christina of Denmark, 1522-1590. With Illustrations. 21s net.
 BAERLEIN, H.—Abu 'L Ala the Syrian. ("Wisdom of the East" Series.) 2s net.
 BLACKWOOD, ALGERNON.—Old Ten-Minute Stories. 6s.
 BROSTER, D. K., and TAYLOR, G. W.—The Vision Splendid 6s.
 BURGONNE, ALAN H., M.P. (Edited by).—The Navy League Annual. 4s net.
 BUSIL, F. ROBERT (Edited by).—Har, Hat and Bit. Being the experiences of The Hon. Sir F. Chaudes Leigh, K.C.B., K.C. 9s net.
 CHOLMONDELEY, MISS M.—Notwithstanding. 6s.
 FIELD, DOROTHY.—The Religion of the Sikhs. ("Wisdom of the East" Series.)
 GREGORY, J. W., F.R.S., D.Sc.—Nature and Origin of Fjords. With Illustrations. 16s net.
 IRVINE, MARGARET L. (Edited by).—A Peeps of Mogul India. An Abridged Edition of Mancel's Storia del Mogor. 10s 6d net.
 LAWLESS, HON. EMILY, and BULLOCK, SHAN F.—The Race of Castlesbar. 6s.
 LYNCH BOHUN.—Cake. 6s.
 MACKAY, THOMAS.—The Dangers of Democracy. Edited by Sir Arthur Clay. 6s net.
 MANATT, J. IRVING, Ph.D., LL.D.—Agean Days, and other studies of the Isles of Greece. 12s net.
 McLAREN, MISS A.—Through Other Eyes. 6s.
 PEARSON, HENRY GREENLEAF.—James S. Wadsworth of Genesee Brevet, Major-General of United States Volunteers. 10s net.
 PEASE, SIR ALFRED, BART.—The Book of the Lion. With Illustrations. 12s net.
 STIRLING, MRS. A. M. W.—Mardonid of the Isles: A Romance of the Past and Present. With Illustrations. 12s net.
 Times Series of Subjects of Popular Interest.—The Land and the People. 1s net.
 VACHELL, H. A.—Loot 6s.
 WOOD, SIR HENRY TRUMAN.—History of the Royal Society of Arts. With Illustrations. 15s net.
 WILLIAMS, GEOFFREY.—The Magicians of Chamo. With Illustrations by Lady Carter. 6s.

Messrs. T. Nelson & Sons.

BORDEAUX, H.—La Croisec des Chemins. 1s net (French).
 BRUNETIERE.—Honneur de Balzac 1s net (French).
 BOYD, F. A. CONAN.—Memoirs of Sherlock Holmes. 7d net.
 BOYLE, A. CONAN.—Book of Social Progress. 2s net.
 PRIOR, JAMES.—Forest Folk. 7d net.
 ROWNTRIE, B. SEEBOHM.—Poverty. 1s net.

Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co.

ANDERSON, A. J.—His Magnificence. 6s.
 CAMERON, Mrs. CHARLOTTE.—A Woman's Winter in Africa. 10s 6d net.
 CROCKETT, S. R.—Young Nick and Old Nick. 6d net.
 F. K.—Everyday Vegetable Book. 1s net.
 GRAHAM, WINIFRED.—The Pit of Corruption. 6s.
 LEVY, M.—Paul's Simplified. 1s net.
 LLOYD, J. A. T.—Fedor Dostoevsky. 4s net.
 MANSFIELD, ERNEST.—Ralph Raymond. 2s net.
 RAY, P. QUINTON.—The Golden Destiny. 6d net.
 SPENCER, EDWARD.—Cakes and Ale. 2s 6d net.
 SPENCER, EDWARD.—The Flowing Bowl. 2s 6d net.
 WARDEN FLORENCE.—The Adventures of a Pretty Woman. 6d net.
 WYNNE, MAY.—The Red Fleur de Lys. 1s net.

Messrs. Kegan Paul, Trench & Co.

HUNTLY, MRS. HOPE.—The Birthright of Grimaldi.
 WORSFOLD, BASIL W.—The Reconstruction of the New Colonies under Lord Milner.

Sir Isaac Pitman & Son.

CROSFIELD, A. W. F.—Telegraph Cyphers. 21s net.
 GIBBS, PHILIP.—The New Man: A Portrait Study of the Latest Type. 3s 6d net.
 HOLLAND, R. W.—Examination Notes on Company Law. 1s net.
 HOLLAND, R. W., M.A., M.Sc., LL.B. (Edited by).—Pitman's Commercial Self Educator. To be issued in 16 fortnightly parts commencing October 8th 6d net per part.
 JOHNSON, G. F. C. S.—Book Keeping and Accountancy Problems. 2s 6d net.
 KELLER, PROF. L. ARNOLD, MADAME PAULA, and DELISLE, ARTHUR L.—Austria of the Austrians and Hungary of the Hungarians. With 35 Illustrations. 6s net.
 MACFARLANE, J. M.A.—Economic Geography. With many Maps. 4s net.
 PARKER, JOHN (Edit. 1 by).—Who's Who in the Theatre. (New Edition thoroughly Revised.) Pitman's Commercial Atlas. 2s net.
 SHAW ROSS, WALTER.—Elementary Pencil Writing. 1s net.
 STANLEY, HUMPHREY G., F.R.S.—Insect Life. Its Why and Wherefore. Illustrated. 2s 6d net.
 THE LADY DUNBAR OF MOCHUM.—The Chow Chow. Illustrated. 2s 6d net.

Messrs. G. Routledge & Sons.

CROZIER, GLADYS BEATTIE.—A New Collection of Games and Entertainments for Children.
 HARRIS, FRANCES H.—Eight Plays for the School.
 JOHNSON, DR. STANLEY.—A History of Emigration to North America.
 PERTWEE, MRS. ERNEST.—A Second Little Book of Dialogues.
 PERTWEE, GUY.—Scenes from Great Novelists.
 SPENCE, LEWIS.—A Dictionary of Medieval Romance and Romance Writers.
 WATNEY, CHAS., and LITTLE, J. A.—The Workers' Daily Round.

Mr. Robert Scott.

ALLEN, REV. ROLAND.—Missionary Principles. 2s 6d net.
 BONNEY, REV. PROF. T. G.—The Present Relations of Science and Religion. 4s net.
 BURNS, REV. JAMES.—Laws of Life and Destiny. Addresses to Men. 2s 6d net.
 BRUCE, REV. W. S., D.D.—The Wealth of the Christian Life. 1s net.
 DIXON, REV. A. C.—Through Night to Morning: Gospel Talks. 3s 6d net.
 ELIJS, J.—Stems and Twigs: Ten Minute Talks to Boys and Girls. (Eighty-seven Outline Addresses to Children.) 2s net.
 HAHN, VEN. ARCHDEACON C. T.—Confirmation Preparation: For the Use of Adults. 2s 6d net.
 HAYES, REV. W.—Confirmation and the Prayer-Book. 1s.
 HOLDEN, REV. J. STUART.—Life's Flood-Tide. 3s 6d net.
 MACNUTT, REV. CANON F. B.—Advent Certainties. 3s 6d net.
 MOODY, C. N.—Love's Long Campaign. 5s net.
 NAVILLE, REV. PROF. E.—Archæology of the Old Testament: Was the Old Testament Written in Hebrew? 5s net.
 PHILIP, REV. R. G.—A Vision and a Voice. 3s 6d net.
 PRESBYTER, AN OLD.—Considerations for the Clergy. 2s 6d net.
 REASON, REV. WILL.—What Jesus said: Talks to Boys and Girls on the Sayings of Jesus. 2s net.
 STOWELL, REV. J. H.—Faith and Reality. 3s 6d net.
 "TOOLS FOR TEACHERS" SERIES.—7 Vols.: Cyclopædia of Nature Teachings.—Lessons from Life.—Tools for Teachers.—New Cyclopædia of Illustrated Anecdote.—New Handbook of Illustration.—Topics for Teachers.—Handbook of Biblical Difficulties. 3s 6d net each.
 TREVELYAN, REV. W. B.—Apples of Gold. 2s 6d net.
 WALPOLE, RIGHT REV. G. H. S.—Scottish Liturgy Manual.
 WATTS-DITCHFIELD, REV. J. E.—The Church in Action. 2s 6d net.

The Walter Scott Publishing Co.

FITZGIBBON, H. MACAULAY.—The Story of the Flute. ("Music Story" Series). 3s 6d net.
 HOPKIRK, ARTHUR P., M.D.—Influenza: Its History, Nature, Cause, and Treatment. 1s 6d.
 HORSFALL, EDITH.—From Dewy Youth to Snowy Age. 2s 6d.
 HENSEN, HENRIK.—Prose Dramas ("Scott Library") 1s net.
 TOLSTOY, COUNT.—Short Stories. ("Scott Library") 1s net.

Mr. Martin Secker.

ABERCROMBIE, LASCRILES.—Speculative Dialogues. 5s net.
 COKE, DESMOND.—The Art of Salhouette. 10s 6d net.
 HOWE, P. P.—Dramatic Portraits 5s net.
 HUEFFER, FORD MADON.—Henry James: A Critical Study. 7s 6d net.
 SCOTT-JAMES, R. A.—Personality in Literature. 7s 6d net.
 THOMAS, EDWARD.—Walter Pater: A Critical Study. 7s 6d net.
 WILLIAMS, ORLO.—Vie de Bohème. 16s net.

Messrs. Seeley, Service & Co.

CURREY, COMMANDER E. HAMILTON, R.N.—Ian Hardy, Naval Cadet. With Coloured Illustrations. 5s.
 DOMVILLE PIFE, C. W.—Submarine Engineering of To-Day. 5s.
 FRASER, THE REV. DONALD.—Winning a Primitive People. With 27 Illustrations and 2 Maps. 4s.
 GIBSON, CHARLES R., F.R.S.E.—Wireless Telegraphy. With 25 Illustrations. 2s.
 GOLDSMITH.—The Vicar of Wakefield. With Coloured Illustrations by H. M. Brock, R.I. 2s.
 GRUBB, W. BARBROOKE.—A Church in the Wilds. With 24 Illustrations and Map. 5s.
 LOITTE, W. J.—Westminster Abbey. With many Illustrations by Herbert Railton. 6s.
 MACPHERSON, HECTOR, Junr., M.A.—The Wonders of Modern Astronomy. 2s.
 SWANN, ALFRED J.—Fighting the Slave-Hunters in Central Africa. Introduction by Sir H. H. Johnston, G.C.M.G., K.C.B. 5s.
 SYMON, JAMES D. M.A.—The Press and its Story. With 16 Illustrations. 5s.
 WILLIAMS, A. H.A.—The Wonders of Modern Invention. Revised and brought up to date by T. W. Corbin. 2s.

Mr. Elliot Stock.

ANDREWS, MISS ELIZABETH.—Ulster Folk Lore. 5s net.
 DENISON, REV. PREF. H. P.—Prayer Book Ideals. 5s net.
 HERKLOTS, REV. B.—The Future of the Evangelical Party. 3s 6d net.
 WATERIDGE, F. W.—Marriage. 6s net.
 WIGMORE, A. H.—Which Temple Ye Arr. 6s net.
 WILBERFORCE, VEN. ARCHBISHOP BASIL.—Spiritual Consciousness. 3s net.
 WOODROOFE, W.—Visit to Venice. 2s 6d net.

Mrs. T. Fisher Unwin.

BRIGGS, M. S.—Baroque Architecture. 21s net.
 CORNISH, VAUGHAN.—Waves of Sand and Snow. 10s net.
 MIALI, BERNARD.—Pierre Garat. Singer and Exquisite. 10s 6d net.
 MITFORD, E. BRUCE.—Japan's Inheritance. The Country, its People, and their Destiny. 10s 6d net.
 RENWICK, GEORGE.—Luxembourg the Grand Duchy and its People. 10s 6d net.

Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co.

HINDLOSS, HAROLD.—The Allusion Honour. 6s.
 DWYER, VERA G.—With Beating Wings. 2s 6d.
 HILL, HEADON.—Radford Shore. 6d.
 HOWARD, KEHLE.—One of the Family. 1s net.
 LEIGHTON, MARIE C.—Black Silence. 6s.
 MITFORD, BERTRAM.—An Island of Eden. 6s.
 MITFORD, BERTRAM.—Seaford's Snake. 6d.
 MOBERLY, L. G.—Hope My Wife. 7d net.
 OPPENHEIM, E. PHILLIPS.—The Peer and the Woman. 6d.
 PHILLIPOTS, EDEN.—The Lovers. 2s net.
 ROBERTS, CHARLES G. D.—Hoof and Claw. 6s.
 SNAITH, J. C.—The Wayfarers. 7d net.
 TRACEY, LOUIS.—Sylvia's Chauffeur. 6d.
 TRENT, PAUL.—The Vow. 2s net.
 WALLACE, EDGAR.—The Fourth Plague. 6s.
 WHITE, FRED M.—The Open Door. 6d.

From the painting by H. W. Phillips

George Borrow

Reproduced by permission of Mr. John Murray from the picture in his possession

THE BOOKMAN GALLERY.

WARWICK DEEPING.

AS with every serious student of life, Warwick Deeping's modesty of bearing proclaims that simplicity of spirit which stamps the artist of purpose. Youthful in appearance, bronzed by the sun (for he is an apostle of the open air and a gardening enthusiast who insists upon running personally his acre and quarter of Hastings loam), it is hard to realise that one who is yet in the early 'thirties, and so slow and careful a worker, should have compassed such a wide range of social life as is betokened by seventeen volumes.

Curiously enough, though by all the laws of heredity (there have been three generations of medical men in the Deeping family), and by his electing to start his career as a doctor, the scientific spirit should have dominated his view point, it has failed to weaken his faith in the spiritual side of things. This is as it should be in a writer of such distinction in the field of romance—in one who is before all else a romancist. It was an overwhelming sense of romance that led Warwick Deeping first into print with his now famous "Uther and Igraine," a volume which though published some years ago is still alive and selling. Acclaimed on this side as revealing a new romanticist of highest promise, "Uther and Igraine" was so highly spoken of in the United States, particularly by The Outlook, that an edition of 8,000 volumes was exhausted in a few months.

Son of an Essex man, the late Dr. George Deeping, J.P., his father's practice at Southend first provided Warwick Deeping with the inspirational source for his study of life—an excellent field, for the character of the Essex countryman has a stolid quality which has been quickened by his contact with the urban. Young Deeping whetted his powers of observation not only on the natives, but on the London crowds who swarmed into Southend in the more primitive travel-days of twenty years ago, and remembers vividly the constant locking and unlocking of the station gates to cope with the rough good-humoured Bank-holiday crowds. He still remembers too, with interest, his father engaging as locum-tenens, one who is better known to-day as the brilliant writer, Mr. H. de Vere Starcoole.

A plot to Warwick Deeping is a product of evolution. Igdrasil the Tree of Life has a harvest that ripens slowly and the ripe pods thereon crackle and burst none too often for the weary watcher. That may explain why Romance is a better god to worship—for his gifts are more generous and there are fewer barren days between. In the alembic of fancy some incident out of a rich series of experiences will suddenly assume a concrete shape taking on the colour of romance—that sense of colour which stands to the writer as the palette to the artist. The drab details of reality take on the hues of fantasy.

Talk to Warwick Deeping about his schooldays and you will find a gallant student keener to tell you of the human rather than of the pedantic side. From Merchant Taylor's School, he gravitated to Trinity College, Cambridge. Of that period what Pater might term "the white nights" of a man's youth this novelist has the sunniest recollections. To a shy, eager, sport-loving personality the sense of freedom afforded in that haunt of learning and gay spirits came with a heightened flavour—even paying debts brings its own sense of responsibility. Deeping found at Cambridge the breadth of intellectuality and that large leisure which is so essential for the study of life in the raw. Evidently, too, it imbued him with the Platonic spirit as regards the perfect citizen—the man who is perfectly attuned mentally, manually, and physically, for among Deeping's hobbies are numbered: motor-ing, metal-working, carpentry, cycling, tennis, and golf.

When a phrase becomes a commonplace it is added to the sum of everyday truths. That is why one is not ashamed to repeat the phrase about a sound body being the sign of a sound mind. For one whole year Warwick Deeping grappled with his profession as a medicine-man, after having duly walked the wards of the Middlesex Hospital. But the love of literature was luring him the while, and even in so prosaic an atmosphere as Soho, where most of his hospital practice was gained, not even the sordid atmosphere of the slums and the crude bestiality of its suffering served to blot out the blue sky that hung like a banner over the magic pavilion of Romance.

Photo by E. O. Hoffd.

Mr. Warwick Deeping.

So unique an experience—so grave an adventure may have left its mark upon the novelist's mind. It is the fortune of the literary artist with a soul that he can never be wholly impersonal. His attitude towards life unconsciously colours the treatment he metes out to his creations, and if he have a heart of grace he can never leave them like the blind puppets of Fate, butchered to make a novelist's bread. It is a calm and large philosophy that reigns throughout Deeping's work, never the jejune sentiments of a joy-at-any-price man, but the grim invincible faith in the inherent nobility of man. Moulded for good or ill, his characters follow their Socratic dæmon with mercilessly logical steps—carrying their Fate in their own weaknesses, but always that Fate is soundly motivated and forgivable in the most despicable of his men and women. Even the Devil is given his due. In "Fox Farm" for example, choosing, as an unconventional plot, the story of Jesse Falconer and his wife Kate, two incompatibles, as the jumping-off place for a trial of temperaments, he accords to the woman, who by implied action is guilty of the greatest breach of the marriage law, the justification of her own nature. These people dare and do the unconventional thing because he has invested them with a philosophy of their own, sometimes utilitarian, sometimes anarchistic, but never merely a label. And it is never the sentimental reason that drives them into action. Let those who suspect a sentimentalist in Warwick Deeping, read a few chapters of this book, especially that dealing with Falconer's blindness, and they will find the virile grip of a shrewd but imaginative man grappling with the dull mechanics of life. This part of the novelist's equipment is explained by his really scientific knowledge of psychology, a knowledge which never palls by being merely academic, but has all that sympathetic insight one expects in a lover of men. The passage describing the colours suggested to the blind Jesse by the various voices he heard is as accurate in its observation as Ribot would have wished, minus the tedious jargon of the text-book. "We are the slaves of our secretions and our excretions, and good living may be more a question of Bile than the Bible" is exemplary of an attitude that must be a salve for pseudo-sentimentality.

There is one aspect of Warwick Deeping's work that calls for note. I mention it because criticism mostly is a personal adventure. It is his love of nature. To the country-lover doomed temporarily to the prison of a city flat, a dose of Deeping might aptly be termed "country excursions by proxy." Some novelists use their scenery as a stage-manager might a set of wings and a backcloth, as mere picturesque adjuncts to glorify the movements of their characters. Deeping uses Nature as the background for the motives of his characters. Nature impinges its mood beneficently or menacingly on the minds of his creatures. Igraine, in her darkest despair, recalls her courage with the Dawn. Jesse Falconer, blinded by the hand of Fate, with an emptied world blinking Life into a negation, is recalled to the joy of life when his timorous hand clutches on a rose.

John Wolfe ("Sincerity"), an Anglicised Dr. Stockman

with a larger stock of sanity than the Norwegian zealot, finds a cooling balm in Mother Earth. And in his very latest novel "The White Gate," his heroine finds in Bordighera that balm for a hurt mind that no medicine may give. Wagner, the strenuous artist, seeking a mode of expression, had to create Music Drama. Amid the hurtling echoes of human conflict he caught the diapason of motif that ran like music through all sentient life. Whether it was the Maeterlinckean dialogue of the second degree, or the subconscious chords that sound through all human emotion, matters not—there at last he had gained the great secret. We must allow the artist his impersonality, so I am not going to saddle this novelist with the accusation of being a Pantheist. But it would seem that Warwick Deeping finds the subconscious demon that actuates men and women in Nature itself. In this he most nearly approaches Nature Drama. This at least is my impression, for none of the Deeping characters come away from their contact with Nature without being affected thereby. Nature will out. And it is so too, with human nature. I suspect that his characters start out with good intentions at the gestation of his plot, but they soon become the prey of circumstances. Indeed, Warwick Deeping has confessed as much himself and says he is sometimes powerless over their career. The quarrel I have with "The Lame Englishman" may be a sentimental one—it has no happy end. The bitter pathos of this brave little short-legged Englishman's end is pitiable, though I own to feeling its inevitability just as one does that of the final tragedy in the Œdipus. One feels that here human nature has conquered—and not the novelist.

In justice to Warwick Deeping's work, it seemed fitter to render some account of his personality and aims. But the last man to tell you about these is Deeping. When you try to draw him upon either of these subjects there always follows a deep incisive silence—a little shade of tedium passes across his face. Like Barrie and Masfield he is shyest when he comes to self. He has no purpose nor aims for exploitation. He is well content to listen at the Gates of Life and speak of what he sees and hears, clothing his record in that imaginative beauty which every real optimist cherishes. Common realism has not touched him nor has he bowed the knee to the Baal of sensationalism. A certain buoyancy of spirit and delightful naïveté endears him to many friends as witness, the dedications to his novels. Further than this there exists no other indication of either his gospel or outlook. "Humanity," he says, in his new novel, "The White Gate," "heals itself by being human." He, himself, is satisfied to be human; he has no affectations; no pose; he studies human nature because he is interested in it, and he writes of it because he finds pleasure in doing so. There is no need to pretend to any powers when one actually possesses them, and Mr. Warwick Deeping is no pretender. "The White Gate" is one of the cleverest and most interesting of his books, it is a strong and poignant story, and he has done nothing more finely sympathetic than his study in the character of its heroine, Constance Brent.

R. L.

ST. JOHN LUCAS.

ONE does not readily call to mind many living authors who are so versatile as Mr. St. John Lucas, or who have put their versatility to such excellent use. There are, of course, Mr. Galsworthy, playwright, novelist, and poet, and Mr. Masfield, poet, playwright, critic and novelist; but there can be few others. And even the two writers whom I have just named are—at least in the popular estimation—less “various” than Mr. Lucas. There is always something of the social reformer either lurking or standing boldly forth in the plays and novels of Mr. Galsworthy; and, until at any rate quite recently, it was pre-eminently with the sea and with the mercantile marine that the name of Mr. Masfield was associated. But Mr. Lucas is not so easily to be labelled, even in a rough and ready fashion. Novelist and writer of short stories, poet, critic of French and Italian poetry, Mr. Lucas has successfully invaded all these different provinces of literature in turn, and yet it would be hard to say at the present time along which path he will ultimately elect to make his main advance.

It must not be inferred from this remark that Mr. Lucas' work is lacking in distinction and personality. The contrary, indeed, is the case. Without ever obtruding himself obviously upon his readers he contrives by subtle touches, by his choice of subjects and of characters, by his style of writing, to convey a pretty distinct idea of his own history and predilections. One need not go beyond his books to realise, for example, that much of his inspiration has been derived from his years at Oxford.

“O bride arrayed in rose and gold,
O daughter of a thousand Springs,
O dear, grey city, where of old
I snared awhile joy's wayward wings.”

These lines from one of the volume of Poems which Mr. Lucas published in 1904 epitomise the passionate allegiance which he is constantly expressing for his old University. It is from Oxford that all the young men who figure in his early novel “The Absurd Repentance” hail; and, again, it is to Oxford that several of the leading characters in “The First Round” duly proceed. Now and again Mr. Lucas' reflections may induce a reference to “the Universities,” but for him clearly Oxford is a place which stands apart by itself. And it must be acknowledged that he has made an admirable use of that training which is imposed upon those who pass through the school of Lit. Hum. The more obvious expression of the enduring impression made upon him by his studies of Greek and Latin authors is to be seen in the frequency with which Mr. Lucas alludes to a passage from Theocritus or Catullus, Lucretius or Homer. Indeed, at the risk of appearing somewhat paradoxical, I might almost say that for a short time he got too much good out of his classical studies. Even though it be granted that “The Absurd Repentance” is throughout conceived upon farcical lines, yet the literary conversation of Max and his friends verges upon the precocious, and one feels that the book would have been better if its author had not been so carried away by recollections of the conversations of joyously intellectual undergraduates. But “The Absurd Repentance” was, after all, one of Mr. Lucas' earliest productions. His Plato and Theocritus may (and, in fact, do) bear recent thumb-marks, but he has realised that no imaginative writer can subsist solely upon pyrotechnic displays of academical learning. To the scholastic influence of Oxford has now been added the influence of the world, of a delight in French and Italian literature, in pictures and in music, in beautiful scenery and in the psychology of living human beings. The gulf which separates “The Absurd Repentance” from “The First Round” is immense. This latter novel, first published in 1909, not only shows a marked technical superiority—a superiority which is the more remarkable that during much of the intervening period Mr. Lucas was practising Law and was, therefore, unable to devote himself exclusively to writing—but shows also how very much wider and deeper his interests had come to be. Its success was immediate and thoroughly deserved. The sympathy of Mr. Lucas with the feelings of different types of the “human boy” is exceptionally close. The highly-strung, proud, and self-sufficient Denis Yorke, the saturnine and precocious Lenwood, the brilliant and original Tellier, the heroically massive and bovine Arbuthnot, are all admirably drawn and go to make up one of the most essentially accurate accounts that have yet been given of public school life. Nor as the characters grow up does the story fall away. Denis in a local solicitor's office, toiling away in deference to his father's wishes : Denis in revolt and plunged into the midst of the artistic world of Chelsea ; the charm of his little play-mate, Rosalind Durov, now become the beautiful young girl who gives herself body and soul to the painter of genius, Grimshaw, a man whom she could never marry : the love for Denis of the artist's model, Topsy ; the final determination of Denis to sacrifice a great opportunity of advancement in his musical career in order to go back to the father who has misunderstood him and whom he has equally misunderstood ;—all these episodes are treated in a manner which shows Mr. Lucas as a close observer of mankind and as a writer who is not afraid of the logical conclusions of his own imaginative premises.

Photo by J. Russell & Sons.

Mr. St. John Lucas.

But the association of Mr. Lucas with his writings comes out, perhaps, even more clearly in his books other than his novels. Of partially French descent, Mr. Lucas was naturally attracted towards the language, arts and life of that country. His edition of Ronsard and the anthology of French verse which he made for the Oxford University Press are both works which reveal him as possessing a measure of French scholarship which he certainly did not acquire altogether at Haileybury or at University College, Oxford. His introduction to the latter volume is especially masterly, for although it is compressed within a comparatively small compass it contrives to embody a reference to everything which is really essential, and contains often some refreshing piece of candid and original criticism. His kindred anthology of Italian verse is, perhaps, not quite so successful, and he will himself tell you quite candidly that, with the exception of Dante and one or two others, the Italian poets are not, in his estimation, nearly so charming as the French. If, however, his love for Italian poetry is qualified, the influence of the country upon him in other ways is very great.

There are a few parts of the country through which he has not tramped, and fewer still of its wonderful pictures which he has not seen. His love of pictures, in fact, it was which first drew him to Italy, and his knowledge of the old Masters is constantly apparent. The humbug of pretentious but ignorant art-critics has provided him with the subject of more than one short story, and, if one may judge from his most recent collection, "The Lady of The Canaries," this vein is by no means exhausted. It is a picture which has inspired what, in my judgment, is by far his best short story—"the Brandon Leonardo" which is included in the volume just referred to above. Did or did not the dead genius Merstham steal the Brandon Leonardo and leave a wonderful copy in its place ? That is the problem which we are asked to solve. The fundamental plot of the story is simplicity itself, but it is led up to and worked out (short of the answer to the problem being actually given) in a way which leaves nothing to be desired.

As a poet, Mr. Lucas has as yet attempted nothing on a great scale, and his output has not been large, but some of his lyrics and ballads have the genuine poetical ring about them, and they are characterised by sincerity and directness. His address to "The Woodland God" in the volume of poems already mentioned is a good example at once of his skill and of a train of thought which is often present in him in one form or another :

"God of the garden of dreams,
Mystical, voiceless, unviewed
By the casual eye ; by the rude
Incantation of men from thy streams
And holy, inviolate woods
Never evoked ; dim lord
Of the country of unspun thought,
Of the nobler knowledge unwrought
In the web of the written word ;
Almoner, giver of goods
Known but to mortals who prize
More than the obvious wealth
Of music that Nature flings
Wide, as from God-given strings
A poet his verse, the notes
That slowly and subtly rise
Ghost-like, creeping by stealth
Into the ear, till at last
Sonorous, grand as the blast
Of a myriad trumpet throats
They rush, they soar, they are hurled
From the length and the breadth of the world—
Speak ! Art thou fled as they fled
The others, the hapless Gods,
Giant Necessity's rods,
That are lost, irredeemable, dead ?"

And again there is a true lyrical daintiness in this stanza upon Oxford :

"And pearl-hued from the pearly foam
Of morning mist, I see arise
The sloping shoulders of the dome,
The sharp spire's filmy traceries."

Mr. Lucas' verse, like his prose, is marked by a careful attention to form, and with a notice of this all-pervading characteristic of his work these rather rambling remarks may be brought to a close. That disregard for structure and cohesion which Mr. H. G. Wells and many other writers of the present day display is impossible to a man who has studied Maupassant and the best French authors as carefully as Mr. Lucas has done. Without a strict regard for structure and cohesion the short story is not to be achieved, and though, perhaps, "The First Round" is the best thing that he has yet done, it is to his short stories that I personally look as the form of writing in which Mr. Lucas is most likely to establish a great reputation. In this species of composition we are far behind the French, but if Mr. Lucas can continue to write tales up to the standard of "The Brandon Leonardo" we shall soon be in a fair way towards drawing level with them. That short stories are not a "paying proposition" will not, one may be sure, influence so conscientious a workman, and one can only hope that his inclination will lead him where his artistic opportunity is greatest.

M. H. H. MACARTNEY.

THE READER.

GEORGE BORROW.

By THOMAS SECCOMBE.

1.

THE knowledge and faith of George Borrow has grown almost incredibly within the memory of men still living, and still in the youth of old age. Like fame of all kinds it is an airy fabric, the fabric that dreams are made of, and such fabrics are often blown about and scattered as rapidly as a cloud is dissolved by the sun and the wind. Yet the growth of the belief and the insertion of the Borrow clause in the literary creed of the modern bookman has proved an amusing thing to watch.

I have no sort of claim to be one of the old guard where Borrow is concerned. I can testify to the fact that one could be an omnivorous reader and subsist more or less in literary circles during the eighties and nineties of the last century without knowing anything at all about George Borrow. Almost the only person I knew at all well who manifested a deep interest in Borrow in my college days was Professor Tait, of Manchester. At his instance I read "The Bible in Spain," and liked it uncommonly, but my faith in Borrow was still rather in its infancy, for when I went on to "The Romany Rye," in complete ignorance of its relationship to "Lavengro," I found it too much for my enthusiasm. I did just dip into "Lavengro," but the only result was the discovery that gipsies and philology bored me rather easily. I hardened my heart against Borrow, and was rather sceptical about the professors of enthusiasm; he seemed to me an affected writer, and his claims to sovereign scholarship annoyed me. It was the editor of THE BOOKMAN, Sir William Robertson Nicoll, who really converted me to George Borrow. He had, I presume, just been reading Professor Knapp's prodigious Life, and he had conceived the brilliant idea of extricating the Isopel Berners episode, which is the kernel of the whole screed of Borrowian autobiography, and making an integral volume of it. Seeing that I was young and docile, and for want of anybody better at the moment, he asked me to undertake it. I was easily hypnotised by his prophetic enthusiasm about Borrow, and no doubt feigned a far deeper conversion than I momentarily felt. That year I took a holiday at Harrogate, and as I was one sunny afternoon bicycling back to my rooms from the neighbouring village of Blubberhouses, my machine ran away with me down one of the frightfully steep hills in that vicinity, and I had a bad spill, resulting in water on the knee and a round fortnight in bed. During that fortnight I read practically nothing but Borrow and about Borrow. Biography seems to be the indispensable key nowadays to literary fame, and it must always be remembered that it was the Transatlantic professor or monomaniac, William Knapp, that "massive sleuth-hound," as Mr. Thomas calls him, who first inserted the key in the lock where Borrow was concerned. It is hardly a libel to say that Knapp was a dead hand at a life where literature is concerned. But he was one of the most intrepid biographers that ever lived. He thought nothing of making bricks without straw. His dauntlessness was amazing; he marched slap-bang through the usual phalanx of outraged relatives. He got together an atmosphere of wonderment and curiosity. He put back George Borrow - the forgotten, discredited, vague Borrow of 1881 and after—upon the pedestal that he had occupied half a century before when the "Bible in Spain" first dawned upon a delighted world. The faults of Knapp were obvious to everyone. But his book was a gold mine. The Borrowian pie was opened, so to speak, the birds began to sing, and the first piper was "Isopel Berners." I wrote the Introduction, which serves well still as an introduction to beginners in the cult of Borrow, with the enthusiasm of the convert and the eagerness of the disciple. Knapp's Life was food and drink to me. It was great for a Norfolk man to hear such good things about Norwich and to know that Borrow came from East Dereham and went to the same school as Nelson. I knew the road from Lynn to East Dereham well from the lips of a school-fellow at a dame's school, who ran away regularly once a term,

George Borrow.

From a painting by Henry Wyndham Phillips.
Reproduced by permission of Mr. John Murray.

Photo by H. T. C. at East Dereham

The Birthplace of George Borrow.From The Life of George Borrow by Herbert Jenkins. By permission of Mr. John Murray.

and in his frantic attempts to get back home to Swaffham generally managed to get as far as East Dereham. At East Dereham he was intercepted and brought back, in sackcloth and ashes, to the academy in Stonegate Street. If you have escaped being steam-rollered flat by the orthodox upper middle-class public school education of to-day the fashion is to claim Celtic origin. We were all molithic once, I presume. This, at any rate, has been George Borrow's fate. The Celts have claimed him as their own. He himself was well satisfied to be a Norfolk dumpling, and always spoke of himself as English by breeding, birth and lineage. "Isopel Berners was a complete success from my point of view, as apart from the well-earned fifteen guineas which it brought its compiler, it immersed me deep in the Borrowian lake. It made me a collector of information regarding George Borrow, who was very soon to become the cynosure of every collector of biographical brick-a-brac. Borrowian knowledge and interest was relatively so scarce in the nineties that on these exceedingly easy terms I began and have hardly even yet quite ceased to be regarded as an authority on Borrowian subjects, and was much in request as a writer of notices, articles and centenary memorials. Within a brief dozen years and quite imperceptibly how things have changed! Essays, newspaper cuttings, magazine articles, introductions, studies, full-length portraits and standard biographies in library editions have tumbled over one another. In the last century it was enough to interpret Knapp. But now people have been collecting diligently, and many little additions have been made. The biographers have specialised in the several pockets of Borrow's career. Mr. Walling, in his biography, the first biography in titre, I think, to follow Knapp, has specialised upon Borrow's Cornish relations and the journey to visit his Cornish kinsmen near Liskeard in December, 1853. Mr. Jenkins, in his very elaborate and conscientious narrative, has excavated deeply in the records and has thrown much additional light upon all the circumstances attending Borrow's missionary journeys in Spain and Russia. In this of course he was greatly helped by the publication of the precise text of Borrow's letters from these countries to the Bible Society. Then came Mr. Edward Thomas, who spoke up well for Borrow's work as interpreter of the gipsies and of the Welsh. His life interprets Borrow's writings as they should, I think, be interpreted — as a very puzzling and difficult but essentially fathomable autobiography. Borrow is to me one of the greatest and most veracious of mirror-workers. His life, as I make it out, is presented to us in four panels, each as unlike the others as it is possible to be in size, shape, texture, and surface. The scale varies as much as that of the various series of Ordnance maps, now twenty-five inches to the mile, now five miles to the inch. The colours upon the palette are artfully changed, details are

Jarrold &amp; Sons

The Erpingham Gate and the Grammar School, Norwich.

We pass through the Erpingham Gate direct to the Cathedral, the Grammar School being on our left. Here it is on our right. Facing the school is a statue of Lord Nelson, who was at school here about 1768-70. Borrow was at school here 1816-28. From "George Borrow and his Circle," by C. K. Shorter (Hodder & Stoughton).

sometimes obtruded, at others significantly hidden. A casual glance obscures rather than reveals the fact that, whether he is writing of his early life and struggles ("Lavengro," chaps. 1-58), of one vivid Bohemian episode of his early manhood ("Lavengro" 59 onwards, and "Romany Rye"), of the crowning triumph of his mature manhood ("Bible in Spain"), or a vacation tour during the autumn of a disappointed life ("Wild Wales"), Borrow was always working upon the same model, with the same desperate and conscientious zeal, with the same extraordinary gusto and vigour, with the same genius, the same bias, the same limitations. Mr. Thomas has mastered and interpreted this autobiographical script wonderfully. He has penetrated, as no one else has, Borrow's sourness towards his own craft, his despair of expressing what he had next his heart, his melancholy, his misanthropy, and his at times profound hypochondria.

The present year was destined from the beginning of created things to be memorable in the story of Borrow's life after death. In 1913 Borrow's fame had become so contagious that it penetrated even to Norfolk. You would find it difficult probably to find two more unliterary capitals to-day than Norwich or Ipswich—where in the "White Horse" I have had much converse with a well-informed Suffolk man who had never even heard of Mr. Pickwick. But in July of this year the city of Norwich held a most elaborate celebration of the native of East Dereham, whose ambition it once was to repose under the shadow of its ancient cathedral. The Dean of Norwich preached a Borrow sermon, and promises to give us a contribution on Borrow to the English Men of Letters series—which I hope at some future date to have the pleasure of reviewing for THE BOOKMAN. In the meantime, Mr. Clement Shorter has given us a book on "Borrow and His Circle," in which he shows himself to be a Borrow collector of a diligence and success worthy to be associated with that of his great predecessor, Dr. Knapp.

Borrow himself, I believe, divided biographies into two kinds—one a record of the facts of a life, the other a picture of a character, the portrait of a man's soul. Like Knapp, Mr. Shorter confines himself mainly to the collection and record of biographical data—to a large extent documents. He has a brief for documents, and believes in them to the exclusion of everything else. The faith in documents may be a sound one or the reverse. It depends entirely upon two postulates. The documents must concern a person of first-rate interest and they must be interesting in themselves. There is no question either about their application or interest here. Mr. Shorter has been most fortunate in his quest, his documents are of primary interest, and he has used them deftly, with discretion and without dullness. The letters of Borrow to his wife, his dearest Carreta (Spanish, it appears, for Carrosse), are extremely interesting in themselves, and they throw much light both upon Borrow's married life and upon some of his later travels, in Hungary (1844), in Ireland, and in Scotland, in 1858 or thereabouts.

Here, for instance, is a very interesting and, so far as I know, quite new description of Borrow as he appeared in the mid-fifties to a pawky citizen of Orkney:

"In the evening Geo. Petrie called with 'Bible Borrow.' He is a man about sixty [really fifty-three] upwards of six feet in height, and of an athletic, though somewhat gaunt, frame. His hair is pure white though a bit thin on the top, his features high and handsome, and his complexion ruddy and healthy. He was dressed in black, his surtout was old, his shoes very muddy. He spoke in a loud tone of voice, knows Gaelic and Irish well, quoted Ian Lom, Duncan Ban McIntyre, etc., is publishing an account of Welsh, Irish and Gaelic bards. He travelled—on foot principally—from Inverness to Thurso, and is going on to-morrow to Zetland. He walked lately through the upper part of Badenoch, Lochaber, and the adjacent counties, and through Mull, which he greatly admired. . . . In his rambles he associated exclusively with the lower classes, and when I offered to give him letters of introduction to Wm. F. Skene, Robert Chambers, Joseph Robertson, etc., he declined to accept them. His mother died

National Portrait Gallery.

George Borrow.

From a portrait by his brother, John Thomas Borrow, taken in early youth when his hair was black.

From "George Borrow and his Circle," by C. K. Shorter.

lately, and he was travelling, he said, to divert and throw off his melancholy. He talked very freely on all subjects that one broached, but not with precision, and he appeared to me to be an amiable man and a gentleman, but, withal, something of a projector, if not an adventurer. He is certainly eccentric. I asked him to take wine, etc., and he declined. He said he was bred at the High School of Edinburgh, and that he was there in 1813, and mentioned that he was partly educated in Ireland, and that by birth and descent he is an Englishman "

And here, again, is a very interesting beginning to a long letter, here cited in full for the first time, written to Mrs. Borrow from the neighbourhood of Tokay, in the heart of Hungary, and dated July 8th, 1844 that is to say, seven years before the publication of "Lavengro" :

" Debreczen

" MY DARLING CARRETA, I write to you from Debreczen, a town in the heart of Hungary, where I have been for the last fortnight with the exception of three days, during which I was making a journey to Tokay, which is about forty miles distant. My reason for staying here so long was my liking the place where I have experienced every kind of hospitality ; almost all the people in these parts are Protestants, and they are so fond of the very name of Englishman that when one arrives they scarcely know how to make enough of him, it is well the place is so remote that very few are ever seen here, perhaps not oftener than once in ten years, for if some of our scamps and swell mob were once to find their way there the good people of Hungary would soon cease to have much respect for the English in general ; as it is, they think that they are all men of honour and accomplished gentlemen whom it becomes them to receive well in order that they may receive from them lessons in civilization. I wonder what they would think if they were to meet such fellows as Squarm and others whom I could mention. I find my knowledge of languages here of great use, and the people are astonished to hear me speak French, Italian, German, Russian and occasionally Gypsy. I have already met with several gypsies ; those who live abroad in the wildernesses are quite black, the more civilized wander about as musicians, playing on the fiddle, at which they are very expert ; they speak the same language as those in England, with slight variations, and upon the whole they understand one very well. Amongst other places I have been to Tokay, where I drank some of the wine : I am endeavouring to bring

Oulton Cottage from the Broad.

Showing the summer house on the left, from a sketch by Henrietta MacOubrey. Here, Borrow lived when "Lavengro," and "The Romany Rye" were published. From "George Borrow and his Circle," by C. K. Shorter.

two or three bottles to England, for I thought of my mother and yourself and Hen, and I have got a little wooden case made ; it is very sweet, and of pale straw colour. Whether I shall be able to manage it I do not know ; however, I shall make the attempt." At Tokay the wine is only two shillings the bottle, and I have a great desire that you should taste some of it. I sincerely hope that we shall soon all meet together in health and peace. I shall be glad enough to get home, but since I came so far it is well to see as much as possible. Would you think it, the Bishop of Debreczen came to see me the other day and escorted me about the town, followed by all the professors of the college ; this was done merely because I was an Englishman and a Protestant, for here they are almost all of the Reformed religion and full of love and enthusiasm for it. . . . "

II.

Mr. Shorter manages to compress an amazing amount into his four hundred and twenty pages, for he gives us many new letters, many citations from old sources and much about the people with whom Borrow was at one time or another in contact such as the Gurneys, Thurtell, Hasfeld, Haggart, Haydon, Phillips, Taylor, Hake, Ford, FitzGerald and the like (including much that is irrelevant about Lady Morgan and the number of Lives of that lady which adorn his library), but he does not give us much about his own adventures in Borrowian fields, and apart from one or two emphatic but unsupported statements he tells us practically nothing about his own opinions on Borrowian subjects of controversy. He has indeed given us much new material of value, and he has welded this into a lively and vigorous texture ; but he has fused little, he has hardly reacted at all upon his material, he has not given any ply of his own to the biography which he rehandles without substantially remodelling or revising at all. He allows his style at times to degenerate into great obscurity—to give one instance only out of many that I have observed, take the following : " With what distrust as we learn again and again in 'Lavengro' did Captain Borrow follow his son's inclination towards language, and especially the Irish language, in his early years, although seeing that

The Summer House, Oulton, as it is To-day.

Which, when compared with Mrs. MacOubrey's sketch, shows that it has been re-roofed and probably rebuilt altogether.

From "George Borrow and his Circle," by C. K. Shorter.

Tretherwick,
the home of the Borrows of Cornwall.

Reproduced by Mr. Murray's permission from "The Life of George Borrow," by Herbert Jenkins.

East Dereham,
where Borrow was born.

Reproduced by permission of Mr.
Murray from his definitive edition of "The Romans Rye."

East Dereham

The Swan Inn, Stafford

("My Inn -
A very large building with an archway.")

Reproduced by permission of Mr. Murray from the definitive edition of "The Romans Rye"

Sir John Bowring
in 1826.

From a portrait by John King, now in the National Portrait Gallery.

ing Borrow's last moments. Considering the value he attaches to documentation he leaves much to be desired in his own references. He seldom discriminates between new material of his own and material collected by his predecessors. The book would have gained greatly, and its value would have been augmented in every way by a more enlightened generosity in acknowledging and distributing, with care, in preface or notes (after the French fashion) the respective obligations which must have been heavy in the aggregate, to the chief previous writers on the subject, and particularly, of course, to the indispensable Dr. Knapp. Apart from documents in elucidation or expansion of points already known, he has, so far as I can ascertain, added very little to the outline of Borrow's external career. Nothing will have to be rewritten. George Borrow was born at Dereham on July 5th, 1803. The event took place in the house of his maternal grandfather at Dumpling Green, a farm-hamlet, twelve furlongs from Dereham Church. The best account of his father is given by Mr. Herbert Jenkins, and Mr. Shorter does not explain how this worthy got his commission, rather an important step. There is a good account of Borrow's mother, and of the house where he lived with her so long in Willow Lane, Norwich, and of Norwich Grammar School and its

he was well grounded in Latin." When he encounters any point of controversy, however small, he is perhaps deliberately extremely ambiguous. For instance, it is very hard to make out exactly what he believes about Borrow's relations with Thurtell, and, again, though he denounces the village gossip he does not make it in the least plain what he himself believes as to the circumstances attending celebrated by Borrow in his "Romano Lavo-Lil." No encampment survives, but I was the recipient of not a few of those suspicious oblique glances which are such strong evidence of gipsy blood. Most Norfolk people can tell you a good deal about the Gurneys, and Mr. Shorter must often have come across the name when he was at school at Downham. Then we have the oft-told tale of the Grammar School, the Taylors, the Kerrisons and the Martineaus. A characteristic trait is recorded on page 86, where we are told that Borrow in later life believed himself to be plagued to death by autograph-hunters. Borrow was by the zeal and self-denial of his father, himself of the humblest descent, articled to a substantial attorney in Norwich, but wasted the time he should have devoted to learning his profession to acquiring Irish, Welsh, German and Scandinavian languages. He had an enormous appetite for foreign vocabularies, and an almost delicious enthusiasm for northern ballads—often of very indifferent merit.

An entirely erroneous belief in the marketable value of Danish ballads, Welsh triads, Russian folk-songs and the like, in rococo English translations, after the Bowring pattern, led Borrow to exchange an attorney's office for a garret in Grub Street. His immediate ambition was something between Goldsmith's and Chatterton's. He was to produce outlandish ballads, Homeric odes, epics, plays; he was, at all hazards, to write something grand—"to be stared at, lifted on people's shoulders." He found his Griffith in Sir Richard Phillips, the radical alderman and philanthropic sweater, under whose tender mercies he rapidly developed a suicidal tendency, until in May, 1825, a windfall of £20 enabled him to break his chain and escape to the highway, and the dingle and the picturesque group of moochers and gipsies enshrined for ever in the pages of "Lavengro." The central portion of this marvellous composition is occupied by the Dingle episode, in which Lavengro (the "Word-master," Borrow's gipsy name for himself) is revealed in 1835.

John P. Hasfeld

From a portrait by an unknown artist formerly belonging to George Borrow.

William Taylor.

From a portrait by J. Thomson, painted in the year 1821, and engraved in Robbards's "Life of Taylor."

famous alumni, also some new details of Borrow's elder brother—in the details of father and elder brother there is always to me much reminiscent of Sterne and Lamb. The details of Ambrose Smith and David Haggart are very interesting. A few weeks ago I visited Yetholm, the capital of the Border Gipsies,

Four Friends of Borrow's early years.

From "George Borrow and his Circle" by C. K. Shorter. (Hodder & Stoughton).

Sir Richard Phillips.

From a portrait by James Saxon, painted in 1828, now in the National Portrait Gallery.

to us in conflict with "the flaming Tinman," and in colloquy with his Romany friend, Jasper Petulengro, with a subtle papistical propagandist, "the man in black," with the typical gipsy chi, Ursula, and with the peerless Isopel Berners. His account of his relations with her we take to be strictly and almost literally accurate. He was powerfully attracted by the magnanimity of spirit no less than by the physical charm of this Brynhildic damsel, tall, straight and blonde, with loose-flowing flaxen hair, and with a carriage, especially of the neck and shoulders, which reminded the postilion of a certain marchioness of his acquaintance. But Borrow was of a cold temperament, a despiser and mistruster of young women, whom he regarded primarily as invaluable repositories of nursery-lore, folk-song, tradition and similar toys, about which his male friends were apt to be reticent. The attraction was so strong that he had serious thoughts of emigrating with "the beauteous Queen of the Dingle," but he dallied with the idea with characteristic waywardness until it was too late. He sought to postpone awkward decisions to divert himself and amuse Isopel by making his charmer learn Armenian — the language which he happened at the time to be studying. Isopel bore with it for some time, but the imposition of the verb "to love" in Armenian convinced her that the Word-master was not only insane, but also inhuman. Love-making and Armenian do not go well together, and Belle could not feel that the man who proposed to conjugate the verb "to love" in Armenian was master of his intentions in plain English. It was even so. The man of tongues lacked speech wherewith to make manifest his passion, the vocabulary of the Word-master was insufficient to convince the workhouse girl of one of the plainest meanings a man can well have. When the distracted Borrow had reached the decision that it was high time to give over his "mocking and scoffing," and returned with this resolve to the Dingle, Isopel Berners had quitted it, never to return. She ran away to the nearest sea-port, and took ship to America. Lavengro, with some anguish, steeked his heart against following her. The scene of these transactions was a wooded glen or dingle a few miles from Willenhall, in Staffordshire, where Lavengro and Isopel were encamped in their respective tents, having as their neighbour the gipsy clan of which Jasper was the chief. Upon the whole the Dingle chapters are perhaps the most brilliant and the most enduring that Borrow ever achieved. Their interest is greatly enhanced by the fact that they are probably a naked transcript from actual fact, for Borrow was a poor hand at invention. He rarely, if ever, invented a character. His surest source of inspiration was the unadorned truth.

After the experience of a summer in the open, Borrow, who was now twenty-two, relapsed into the indifferent versification of Danish ballads and Welsh bards, was severely fleeced in obscure journeyings in Southern Europe, and so gained some experience for future use vainly sought a post, on the strength of his linguistic attainments, as an assistant in the British Museum Library, and was reduced to writing reactionary political lectures for a Norwich paper; he was, in fact, waiting, like Mr. Micawber, for something to turn up, or, in his own graphic phrase "digging holes in the sand and filling them up again."

His deliverance was effected in rather a singular manner. About 1832 he became acquainted with the Skeppers of Oulton Hall, in that splendid stretch of country which borders on the river Waveney. By Mrs. Clarke (afterwards Mrs. Borrow, the widowed sister of the owner of the Hall) he was introduced to the Rev. Francis Cunningham, rector of Pakefield, a fine type of the Evangelical clergyman of a past generation, who had married the sister of Joseph John Gurney. It seemed to this good man that Borrow's gift of tongues might well be employed in the service of the Bible Society, of which the famous Norfolk Quaker was an

The Borrow House, Norwich.

The house is situated in B. R. W. C. out formerly King Court Willenhall St. Giles's Norwich, and here B. R. W. lived at intervals in 1810 to his marriage in 1830. His mother lived there for thirty-three years until 1851, his father died there and is buried in the north wing, but B. R. W. lived there.

From "Geography of the City of Norwich."

influential member. The hour of the former would-be martyr to infidelity had now come; he was taken into the regular service of the Society upon an average salary of £250, in addition to expenses, and was employed as editor, translator, and colporteur of Bibles in strange lands. The labours of the next eight years of his life were as fruitful and honourable as those of the preceding eight had been desultory and obscure. His first commission was to go to St. Petersburg, and there edit and superintend the printing of a version done by a Russian scholar from the New Testament into Manchu. Borrow acquired the language and performed his task with an almost incredible expedition. He also learned Russian, and in the summer of 1835 proposed to the Society that he should himself distribute the work which he had seen through the press, upon the confines of the Far East. This scheme was scotched by the refusal of the Russian Government to grant him the necessary authorization and passports. But Borrow's energies were transferred to a project which scarcely, if at all, less deserves the epithet Quixotic. It was to disseminate a Castilian translation of the Vulgate (made by Father Scio at Valencia between 1790 and 1793) in Spain and Portugal. To disperse Bibles in Papua or in Park Lane were, it might be argued, an enterprise fully as hopeful as to scatter them in Galicia or La Mancha. But this is neither here nor there, and the stimulus that was lacking in other directions was abundantly supplied to the Society and their emissary by the fact that, according to the regla quinta of the old Index, all Spanish versions of the Bible, or of any part of it, were absolutely forbidden, and that, as a necessary consequence, the Bible was a book as unfamiliar in Spain as it was held to be dangerous and revolutionary. Spain was to Borrow what the Harley Ministry was to Swift. It seemed to develop in him an almost superhuman activity and power; and, fond of cant as Borrow's employers too often were, it is infinitely to their credit that they not only tolerated, but even applauded the unconventional epistles which he wrote to them of his exploits during his three long journeys in Spain, which, with two brief intervals, occupied him from November, 1835, down to April, 1840. These letters, not unadorned, however, but greatly enriched by notes from his diaries, made up "The Bible in Spain," which was published by John Murray on December 10, 1842, when "El Gitano," as the enthusiastic Ford dubbed the author, literally woke up to find himself famous. His experience for a season was that of "the man Sterne"; he dined with peers, ambassadors, and bishops, and like Major Pendennis, was particularly complacent with bishops. We might here for a moment compare his position to that of Johnson in 1763. He had gone down in the arena and fought his wild beasts, and had come up triumphant, as Johnson had done after the Dictionary. He still had difficulties to meet, and debts to face, for he had gradually become estranged from "the sub-committee," and the Bible Society suddenly found that "no sphere remained open in which his services could be utilised." Fortunately, he had provided for his future, not by obtaining a pension, but by marrying, in April, 1840, an old ally of his, Mary Clarke, a widow with a good jointure (over £400 a year), a skilful hand at dumplings and treacle posset, and "an excellent woman of business." He was now fifteen years older than when he had "lost" Isopel. The motives which prompted this scorner of matrimony to marry a woman seven or eight years his senior were similar, it may be surmised, to those which actuated Disraeli on his marriage. The compact was based upon convenience and mutual esteem, and there is no reason to doubt that it conduced not only to Borrow's comfort and security, but also to his happiness. There were no children. The "daughter" whose accomplishments Borrow celebrated in the exordium to "Wild Wales," was his step-daughter, Henrietta Clarke. He seemed now in an enviable position, with a small but agreeable freehold on the banks of Oulton Broad, able to indulge in "idleness and the pride of literature" to his heart's content. If he had had a "Club" or a Boswell about him, he might still have been tolerably happy. But he was not a Clubbable man, Borrow! Nevertheless it was during the years that followed that, like Johnson, he achieved his best title.

The Devil's Bridge.

From the drawing by A. S. Hartrick.
Reproduced by Mr. Murray's permission from the definitive edition of "Wild Wales."

From an etching by C. M. Nichols, R.E.

Staircase Doorway to Attic in Borrow's House at Norwich.

Reproduced from the "Souvenir of the George Borrow Celebration," by James Hooper.
By permission of Messrs. Jarrold & Sons, London and Norwich.

to fame, the wondrous five volumes of autobiography so capriciously planned and so strangely entitled: "Lavengro—Romany Rye." The stimulus in his case was largely, we believe, if not mainly, pecuniary. "Money is our best friend," he wrote to his wife in 1844. He wanted a purse of his own to travel and give dinners with, for the edge of episcopal hospitality was already wearing off. He desired, too, no doubt, to put a coping-stone to his fame. Already, in January, 1843, he wrote to his publishers that he had begun upon a Robinson Borrow, and Murray, Ford, and other friends threw up their caps. The publishers may have well seen a veritable gold mine in prospect. One has only to imagine the fervent curiosity which the personal element in "The Bible in Spain," so suggestive of mystery and romance, must have excited in the reading public of 1843, to perceive that any such anticipation was fully warranted by the facts of the case. Here was a book which bore upon its title-page its passport to Sunday reading as a good, serious missionary work; but for which it was manifest, as the surprised and delighted reader proceeded, that not Bishop Heber or the good Schwartz, but Mendoza and Lesage had been taken as models. May not people well have wondered (the good, pious English folk, to whom "luck" was a scandal, as the Bible Society's secretary wrote to Borrow) what manner of man this muleteer-missionary might be? The incongruity was only heightened by familiarity with Borrow's Pharaoh-like visage, abundant grey hair, and tall blonde Scandinavian figure, which reminded those who came under his spell of those roving Northmen of the days of simple mediæval devotion, who were wont to signalize their conversion from heathen darkness by a Mediterranean venture, combining the characters of a piratical cruise and a pious pilgrimage. But if publisher and client were justified in believing that they had discovered an autobiographical El Dorado, they were, none the less, to be sadly undeceived.

To whatever cause the disappointment may be attributed, it was certainly not due to any lack of pains on the part of Don Jorge. The labour which he bestowed upon his Life was immense, quite disproportionate to his previous efforts. "The Gypsies in Spain," for instance, was built up upon already existing jottings, extracts, and notes very loosely thrown together; while

"The Bible in Spain" itself was, in regard to its composition, nothing more than an olla podrida of journalized letters. But he wrote "Lavengro," as it were, with his life's blood. It cost him the same agony that parts of "David Copperfield" cost Dickens, while he had none of Dickens' trained fluency or descriptive powers. His lack of ease in writing often gives a wrong impression of insincerity or artificiality. Most of his apostrophes, even the most strained, are expressions of genuine feeling, which he could not accommodate to the Gil Blas style of the bulk of his narrative. His determination to be original and to tell the truth, to avoid all padding and second-hand ideas, kept him on the rack; yet he persevered, working hard at the Life, with intervals of discouragement, for six years and upwards. "Lavengro" eventually appeared in three volumes, after many transformations of title, in February, 1851, and was received not merely with coldness and unconcern, but with hostile carping and even derision. To understand the extent to which Borrow ran counter to the prejudices of the Bright and Cobden age, which rejected the gospel of Carlyle, is to fathom the mystery of "early Victorian." A further stumbling-block was the peculiar "dryness" of Borrow's style. Borrow could respond to the thrill of natural beauty. He could enjoy and find utterance for his mood when it came upon him, just as he could enjoy a tankard of ale or linger to gaze upon a sympathetic face; but he refused to pamper such feelings; he refused to become the creature of poetic ecstasy; he refused to identify an author with a bearded nun; he refused to indulge in the fashionable debauch of dilettante melancholy. Borrow again told his hearers nothing about the Great Wall of China, or the Fair of Nijni-Novgorod. You will find very little of the Eastern exotic in his work. Yet in it he is at his best—especially in the Dingle, in the open air, among the gipsies, with Jasper, Pakomovna, Tawno, Ursula, The Man in Black, and Belle Berners, gossips in colloquies of the greenwood, unrivalled since the heyday of the Forest of Arden.

Borrow was always contemplating the continuation and completion of his personal record, but his methods were so deliberate that the lifetime of a Methusela would have been needed to complete his autobiography. After completing the span comprised in "Lavengro—Romany

Death-Mask of George Borrow.

Copyright - Messrs. Jarrold & Sons.

Rye," he waited another ten years before issuing his record of his Welsh tour of six weeks. He wrote it on almost the same gigantic scale as in "The Romany Rye," but in a more genial and domestic mood. His sympathy for the country, its people and language, enabled him to create a feeling for "Wild Wales" as worthy as it was unfamiliar to the English of the early 'sixties. Not much new light is thrown upon the migration of Borrow to London, though we have an interesting new description of him on Westminster Bridge (Borrow was a great haunter of Thames and its bridges) in 1873. In 1865 his stepdaughter, the "Old Hen" of his letters, married William MacOubrey, and migrated to Belfast. Early in 1869 Mrs. Borrow died aged seventy-three. Borrow's existence was sadly broken. Some four or five years he lingered on in London, cheered at times by walks and talks with Gordon Hake and Watts Danton; and he then returned to Oulton—a most friendless and disillusioned man.

He bore his age badly did the dour old traveller, who had yet somehow never had his due share of exploration. In physical exercise, especially swimming, he had occasional flashes of exhilaration; he breathed again some of the old oxygen of the Bible in Spain. But he suffered terribly from the gloom of a muddled existence, and his step-daughter, though she meant well, was too literary and too little of a housewife and a manager to make him even comfortable. Cowell gives a most depressing description of the severance of his old interests. There was something of the tired berserker about his last years, though the legend of his solitude, unkemptness and uncared-for-ness has probably been exaggerated. His letters to Mrs. MacOubrey range down to 1877. Borrow died four years later. Mentally, if not physically, he had become a complete recluse in his later years. He was buried in Brompton, and very little that was formerly his remains to-day as he left it, with the exception of his works.

Mr. Shorter says somewhere in this book that if Dr. Aldis Wright had written Borrow's life there would have been no second biography. Why he says this I cannot think. The more biographies the better in a sense, so far as the curiosity about Borrow and, therefore, the stimulation of his celebrity, is concerned. Unless, therefore, Dr. Wright had discovered some artificial means of quenching all further curiosity as to Borrow I hardly see how Mr. Shorter's prediction would have been fulfilled. It can hardly be expected that he would have discovered half as much about Borrow as Dr. Knapp, a perfect monomaniac, who devoted his life and lavished his money by handfuls in pursuit of the phantom Don George. But even if he had found as much, new documents, new discoveries, new materials would still have remained for the Wallings, the Jenkinases, the Thomas's, the Shorters, and the Beechings of a later age.

Professor Cowell deprecated the idea of a biography of Borrow at all. "Surely it is best that Borrow should remain a name," and in a sense he was right. "The Romany Rye" gave us of his best, and his best is almost all autobiographical. Explicit biography only serves to dull the romance of the mysterious word-master. Biography nearly always tends in the end, it is my belief, to dull the edge of literature.

Borrow, however, does not stand exclusively for literature. His prose style is peculiar and inimitable, but it is not a good pattern; he is not a model stylist by any means. He is rather an enigma, he is a man standing athwart his period with something of the straddle of a colossus, and people will (as in the cognate case of a contemporary prophet, Carlyle) always be anxious and curious to read the riddle. There is a mystery about the fellow. He had a prescription, a narcotic, a drug, or something, capable of serving as a talisman against the "corruption" of modern civilization.

THE BOOKMAN PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

OCTOBER, 1913.

Answers to these competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing the name and address of the sender) should be forwarded not later than the 15th of the month to

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, Warwick Square, E.C.

Colonial and foreign readers please note that Competitions II., IV., and V. are the same each month, and that for the next two months the 1st prize will be for the best original Lyric.

- I.—A PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA is offered for the best original Lyric.
- II.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this number of THE BOOKMAN. Preference will be given to quotations of a humorous nature.
- III.—A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS is offered for the best photograph illustrating the title of any recent novel.
- IV.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best review, in not more than one hundred words of any recently published book. Competitors should give the names of Authors and Publishers at head of their reviews.

- V.—A copy of THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for THE BOOKMAN Competitions. The Editor reserves the right to use any suggestions submitted.

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR SEPTEMBER.

- I.—The PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA for the best original Lyric is divided and we send HALF A GUINEA each to Mr. J. J. Geake, of St. Bernards, York Road, Guildford, Surrey, and to Mr. Howard Booth, of 134, Cemetery Road, Sheffield, for the following:

LOVE.

If Love come to thee in the morn
Say "Love, why comest thou so soon?"
And, if he turn, go—sow thy corn,
And labour on until the noon.

If Love come to thee when the day
Is brightest, say "Ah! Love, 'tis sweet
To toil," and if he go away,
Go also thou, and bind thy wheat.

If Love come to thee when the sun
Goes down to meet the western sky,
Say "Love, my hours of work are done";
Then, if he hearken,—pass him by.

But, if he comes, whate'er thou ask,
And labour, singing, by thy side—
Rejoice, for Love that shares the task
Alone is Love at eventide. J. J. GEAKE.

EXILE.

God gave me the Garden of Eden
And the river that through it ran;
He gave me strength and beauty
Greater than any man;

I stood in the midst of the garden
Where none had ever trod,
And I said "O Lord, I am happy,"
But I lied in my heart to God;

For I longed for an English meadow
With a stream from the hills above,
And I hated the Garden's beauty
For there was none to love.

HOWARD BOOTH.

We also select for printing :

MY LADY'S GARDEN.

My Lady hath a garden fair,
And all herself is imaged there.

White lilies are her thoughts untold,
And bear like her, a heart of gold.

Forget-me-nots her blue, blue eyes
That borrow from the summer skies.

The blush rose nestles in her cheek,
Heart's ease I find when she doth speak;

And round about her feet there grows
Sweet Balm of Healing for men's woes.

My Lady hath two names in one;
Each sweet and dear—When day is done

I take them both away with me,
One blessed comfort—Rose-Marie.

(Miss E. A. Jowers, The Beacon Hotel, Hindhead, Surrey.)

REGRETS.

Where are the words that never were said
And the thoughts that were left unspoken?
They are buried deep down with the dreams long-dead,
In a silence for ever unbroken.

In the caverns of Memory mute they lie
Unlighted by star or sun,
Where the little grey ghosts flit mournfully by,
The phantoms of things undone.

Oh ears that are closed to the sounds of Earth
Can you hear through the harps of Heaven
The sighs of a soul that knew not Love's worth,
And forgive—be it seventy times seven?

Oh eyes that have looked on the Face of God,
Can you see through the long, long years
The road of regrets that my feet have trod,
And the slow unavailing tears?

Though Memory's ocean be wide and deep
When the sea gives up her dead
Unuttered longings shall rise from sleep
On the wings of the words unsaid.

They will whisper secrets of long ago
As you lean from the Golden Gate—
I loved you on Earth—If I tell you so
In Heaven, will it be too late?

(Violet D. Chapman, Sorrento, Burnham, Somerset.)

A LISTENER

In hammock slung beneath the boughs of knotted apple tree
I listened to the purring of the kitten on my knee;
To the whirr of little winged things, the murmur of the bee.
I listened to the twitter of the birds beneath the eaves;
The rustle that the tortoise makes in creeping through the leaves;
To all the web of wordless song that early summer weaves.

As I listened, gazing skyward, where the branches dipped apart,
A well-known football nearing broke my daydream with a start—
And then I listened only to the beating of my heart!

(Florence Andrews, 108, Grenfell Road, Maidenhead.)

Mumper's Dingle, the wooded retreat in which Borrow met Isopel Berners.

Reproduced by Mr. Murray's permission from the definitive edition of "Lavengro."

JEPHTHAH'S DAUGHTER.

O Love, that might have been!
I worship thee, and go, a little sad
To dream and not possess thy passioned wonder.
Yet for such dreams I thank God; and am glad,
For I have seen.

O Joy, not made for me!
I thrill to know thee near, yet far away,
Since flaming swords keep closed the gateway splendid.
I dare not ask of God to stoop and say
Why this should be.

O Life I may not live!
Close to Love's strength, potent to heal and save,
Clinging, yet with strange woman-power of guiding.
I need so much to feel thee, and I have
So much to give.

O Pain, thou quickening strife
Raging between dark death and life's white strength!
My lintels, Israel-like, thou shalt pass over,
And I shall never smile to bear, at length,
A little life.

Violet Gillespie, 114, Devonshire Road, Forest Hill, S.E.)

We specially commend the Lyrics sent in by Alice W.
Linford (South Tottenham), M. F. Ackman (Glasgow),
Mr. Nevill Heard (Swanage), John Carlton (Hornsey),

R. E. D. Donaldson
(Putney), W. G. Priest
(Norwich), B. Milner
(Tonbridge), Marjorie
Winifred Crosbie
(Herne Bay), Mrs.
Trevelyan Thomson
(Middlesbrough),
Kathleen Birch
(Bexhill), R. B. Ince
(Jarvis Brook), East
Wind (Antrim), Elsie
S. Mead (Burnley),
B. C. Hardy (Eastbourne), Thomas Law
(Holytown), Silverpen
(Ealing), Bernard
Spencer (London,
S.E.), Eric Dexter
(Manchester), V. D.
Goodwin (Gillingham),
J. Isaacs (Hackney),
E. W. Higgs (Clapton),
Miss Foulger (Lang-
port), Barnard R. H.
Sparell (Hampstead), Bertram J. W. Andrews (Plumstead), C.
Doriel Hay (Hampstead), Mrs. Delbridge
(Canterbury), J. R.
(Forest Hill), Louie
Howle (Handsworth
Wood), Doris Young
(Derby), A. C. Mitchell
(Glasgow), Emily Cornell (Upper Norwood), G. W. Turner
(Burnley), Emily
Sunderland (Fodmorden), Helen K. Watts
(Nottingham), Arbel
M. Aldous (Saffron
Walden), Athol M.
Shephard (Forest
Hill), Winifred M.
Offord (Enfield), A.
Mitchell (Devizes),
Mary M. Wilshire
(Victoria Park), Eric
Chilman (Hull),

Launcelot H. Stuckey (Taunton), D. A. Boland (Glasgow),
Rose Speight (Leeds), Beatrice Craig (Straidanan), F. N.
Jellicoe (Stockwell), Monica Baines (Hereford), G. J.
Holme (Great Malvern), H. B. Dawes (Birkdale), Elizabeth Hearle (Tewkesbury), A. C. Harrison (Walsall), T. H. Storm (North Shields), Mrs. G. H. Leatham (Durham), Miss A. E. Richardson (London, S.E.), E. Summers (Dukinfield), Maude Sanson Carter (Bristol), Joan A.
(Framlingham), Beryl M. May (Farnham), Rhys Raworth
(Harrogate), M. R. (Birmingham), Arthur S. Wilshire
(Dalston), M. A. Newman (Framlingham), T. Whitehead
Sefton (Bolton), E. T. Sandford (Saltash), G. M. Fife
(Edinburgh), Margaret Durmett (Liscard), Anita Lee
(Liverpool), C. Cooper (Streatham), Herbert Rogers
(Hackney), Lucie C. Temple (Southsea), Doris Smith
(Burton-on-Trent), Miss M. Peart (Tottenham), Eleanor Bull (Ludlow), R. W. King (Catford Hill), Guenn F.
Newnham (Dover), B. M. Morris (Bath), Ion A. Grundy (Liverpool), Rev. J. A. S. Wilson (Edinburgh), H. A.
Stuckey (Harrogate), Hilary Dane (Ashburton), Sinah
Helen West (Plymouth), George Murray (Laverstock),
J. R. A. Nicoll (Glasgow), Nemo (Wakefield), Dorothy M.
Rawcliffe (Haigh), Hector S. J. Hughes (Irishtown),
W. H. Colman (West Malling), T. B. Laudells (Edinburgh),
Ernest S. Heron (Chester), John Earl Rose (Bristol), Hugo
Irvine (Peterhead),
Eric (Darlington), L.
Ward (Broadstairs), Denys Alsop (Stafford), Jocelyn Ierne
Ormsby (Pontypridd),
M. K. (Axminster),
Ethel Mary Casson
(Finchley), Florence
Whitehead (Bury),
Agnes M. Bellhouse
(Borodon), Jeffery
Kisley (Alvaston),
Lucy J. Taylor (Birmingham), Mrs. H.
Welch (Aldeburgh),
Katie M. Luck (Stony Stratford), Mabel
Malet (Hull), Evelina
Ida San Garde (Accrington), Annie Ellerton (Liscard), Mrs. H.
F. Hall (Sheffield),
Harding Wood
(Canonbury), Major J.
Berkeley (Andover),
Winifred Holmden
(Ilfracombe), John D.
Smith (Glasgow),
Miss H. M. Barrow
(Hastings), M. F. W.
(Maidstone), Thomas
Carey (Jersey, U.S.A.),
A. S. Barnard (Walsall), F. J. Popham
(Annan), A. C. Poole
(Edmonton), G. M.
Northcott (West
Kirby), Marcella
Whitaker (Dewsbury), Percy Thomas (Hornsey), Alice Binks
(Westoe), C. A. R.
(Sheffield), J. S. Lewis
(Liscard), Richard
William Rogers (North Kensington), James
Omerod (Farnworth),
Laura Fane (St.
Anns-on-Sea), G. M.
Hennings (St. Albans),

Where Borrow Lived
in Madrid.

The house of Maria Diaz in the Calle del
Santiago. Borrow occupied the third floor front. A laundry is now in possession.

From "George Borrow and his Circle,"
by C. K. Shorter.

The Calle Del Principe,
Madrid.

Where Borrow opened a shop for the sale of New Testaments, which was finally shut up by the Government.

From "George Borrow and his Circle,"
by C. K. Shorter.

H. R. Smith (Newcastle-on-Tyne), A. B. Johnston (Leith), Hyman Edelstein (Ontario), Arthur A. Legg (New Brighton), W. Siebenhaar (Streatham Hill), A. W. Say (Devonport), Hall Blithe (London, S.E.), Gwendolen D. Harold (High Barnet), J. W. Houchin (Shenfield), Edwin Waters (Denmark Hill), H. Beckett (Wolverhampton), Ruth Manning Sanders (Devon), Eleanor L. Clark (Maghera), Cyril G. Taylor (Heswall), S. T. McCabe (Patricroft), Enoch Daniels (Newcastle), Eveline Swanson (East Finchley), A. E. Barnes (Beaconsfield), E. Margaret Lane (Kettering), Edmund Howard (Putney), A. Charlton (Derby), F. D. J. Waugh (Toddington), Miss E. A. Jowers (Hindhead), B. D. Goodwin (Gillingham), Agnes E. M. Baker (Kilburn), Bessie Hawkins (Bath), Warren Cranmore (Knutsford), L. Aaronson (London, E.), Julia Rose Carling (Plymouth), Arthur R. O'Connor (Dorridge), C. R. Price (Wellington), S. B. Irene Bell (London, W.C.), Mrs. A. M. Reid (Motherwell), S. R. Noyes (Pontypridd), D. K. Boileau (Bath), Eleanor Littlewood (Putney), Chanticleer (Cape Town, S. Africa), Margot Balfour (London, W.), Archibald King (Greenock), Miss E. M. Wood (Huntly), Dorothy Plimpton (London, S.W.), A. M. Mackenzie (Isle of Lewis), Edith Jotham (Isle of Man), Winifred Webb (California).

II.—The PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation is awarded to Mr. Charles Powell, of 290, Oxford Road, Manchester, for the following:

CUPID GOES NORTH. BY MARTIN SWAYNE.
(Hodder & Stoughton.)

"Not in utter nakedness!"

WORDSWORTH, Ode on the Intimations of Immortality.
(Charles Powell, 290, Oxford Road, Manchester.)

We also select for printing:

ONE SMITH. BY S. MURRAY JOHNSTONE.
(William Dawson & Sons.)

"The novelty would striking be and must attract remark."
W. S. GILBERT, Bishop of Rum ti Foo.

(Miss L. Mugford, 13, Ross Road, South Norwood Hill.)

THE POWER BEHIND. BY M. P. WILLCOCKS.
(Hutchinson)

"Perhaps it was right to dissemble your love,
But—why did you kick me downstairs?"

J. P. KEMBLE, The Panel.

(Janet M. Smith, 70, Pembroke Road, Clifton, Bristol.)

THE TWO KISSES BY OLIVER ONIONS. (Methuen.)

"The boldest held his breath,
For a time."

CAMPBELL, Battle of the Baltic.

(A. Ernest Smith, 104, Sheen Park, Richmond, S.W.)

YOUTH WILL BE SERVED. BY D. WYLLARDE
(Stanley Paul)

"An infant crying in the night"

TENNYSON, In Memoriam.

(Irene Pollock Lalonde, 14, Forester Road, Bath.)

THE MEANING OF ART. BY PAUL GAUTIER.
Translated by H. and E. BALDWIN. (Allen)

"In tingling impotence the Dauber drew
As all men draw, keen to the shaken soul
To give a hint that might suggest the whole"

JOHN MASFIELD, Dauber.

(Florence G. Fidler, 131, Abbey Road, London, N.W.)

TEARS OF DESIRE. BY CORALIE STANTON and HEATH HOSKEN. (Holden & Hardingham)

"With sobs and tears he sorted out
Those of the largest size."

LEWIS CARROL, Through the Looking Glass.

(Jocelyn Ierne Ormsby, Pontypridd.)

PRESS CUTTINGS. BY BERNARD SHAW. (Constable.)

"The trail of the serpent is over them all."

T. MOORE, Paradise and the Peri.

(R. Speight, Parkdene, Armley, Leeds.)

Toledo.

From a drawing by A. H. Hallam Murray.

Reproduced by Mr. Murray's permission from the definitive edition of "The Bible in Spain."

III.—The Prize for the best letter in not more than 200 words on any volume of poems published in the last twelve months has been divided and Two NEW BOOKS are awarded to Mr. W. H. Littlejohn, of 9, Albion Gardens, Ravenscourt Park, W., and Two NEW BOOKS to Mr. Cecil Barber, of Highnam, Burley-in-Wharfedale, for the following:

DEAR SIR,

Though Mr. William Watson has entitled his book of short poems recently published by Herbert Jenkins Ltd. "The Muse in Exile," it might be claimed that "The Muse in Many Moods" would have been an equally suitable title. The poems are at once grave and gay, genial and petulant, gentle and ponderous, reverent and—breathe the word only frivolous.

Many of the verses are exquisite in both matter and manner of expression, notably those entitled "Dublin Bay" and "Part of My Story." The former ripples with delightful music, and the latter has an atmosphere of intense reverence—almost amounting to holiness—which is surprising in so slight a work.

We find the usual grievance of the poet against the everlasting powers that " . . . turned blind eyes upon Keats " and a fearful attack on the wicked Turk, in which the lines

" . . . the little lands
Have put the mighty thrones to shame " have, in the light of recent revelations of atrocities, acquired a meaning hardly intended by their author.

"The Rash Poet" and "On Pyrrho" are samples of some of the lighter verses contained in this refreshing little book.

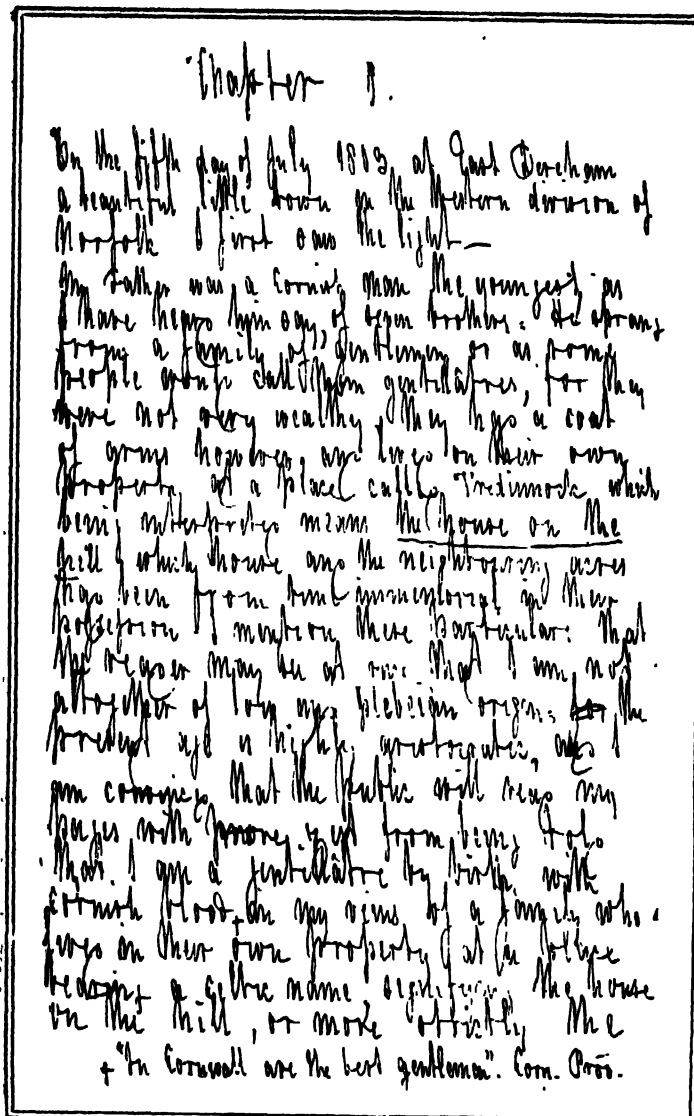

I am, Sir,

Yours faithfully,

W. H. LITTLEJOHN.

MY DEAR OLIE,

So you're head of the school now, and will leave next Midsummer and be "quite grown up." Have you read "Peacock's Pie" yet? Your auntie thinks it "drivel." Never mind. Get it. You remember those bits from an essay by Francis Thompson on Shelley I read to you the Sunday afternoon before you left? You stuck your little nose in the air, and (it might have been Auntie talking) called them "purple patches." So they are. But purple is a royal colour. Shelley himself, Blake ("Know you what it is to be a child?"), and all the rest who went to the making of Thompson, went to the making of Walter de la Mare.

Facsimile of page
from "Lavengro."

From "George Borrow and his Circle," by C. K. Shorter
(Hodder & Stoughton.)

too. Every good artist—and you say you want to be one—is a child at heart. He needs a child to understand him. So don't think you are in for a literary feast, because you aren't. Only half-a-dozen of the poems touch that high-water mark. And if you like the rest, you'll see, Ollie, why I don't want you to be in any hurry to put your hair into a hair-bob even, and why I hate for you to call me

Your old Uncle Edward.

CICIL BARBER

A good many letters have been received in this Competition and the poets chiefly recommended are William Watson, Alfred Noyes, Richard Middleton, Walter de la Mare, James Rhoades, Mrs. Meynell and John Masefield. Among the best of the letters are those by Margaret Peart (Tottenham), Marcella Whittaker (Dewsbury), Hadley Ford (Bristol), Richard Ellaway (Basingstoke), Beryl M. May (Farnham), Miss M. Escombe (Shawford), Eric Chilman (Hull), Elsie S. Mead (Burnley), G. M. Northcott (West Kirby), Stevens Binyon (Hastings), Peter R. Purdie (Birnham), Margaret McDonnell (Glasgow), Edna Smallwood (Highbury), Evelyn M. Abbott (Old Malton), Miss M. V. Woodgate (London, S.W.), Miss E. Moore (Liverpool), C. W. Rodmell (Sutton-on-Hull).

IV.—The PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best review in not more than a hundred words is awarded to Mr. J. M. M'Gregor, of 55, Talbot Road, London, W., for the following :

GEORGE MEREDITH: HIS LIFE, GENIUS AND TEACHING. From the French of CONSTANTIN PHOTIADIS. Rendered into English by ARTHUR PRICE. (Constable)

This translation is valuable partly because it enables us to study Meredith from a view-point not directly attainable by ourselves, and no less because of the light it serves to throw upon the Gallic attitude of mind. The book was written for Frenchmen—was written, indeed, to introduce its subject to French readers—hence, much of its expository matter is to us unnecessary; but for what remains, a sympathetic and acute interpretation and appreciation of the man and his work, it deserves to be widely read in England also, and should be in every Meredithian library.

We also select for printing :

IS THERE A HELL?—A SYMPOSIUM.
(Cassell & Co.)

This book embodies the opinions of sixteen modern religious teachers; and though the subject is viewed from Free-Church, Anglican, Catholic, Socialistic and Jewish standpoints, yet, broadly, the writers are unanimous in returning an affirmative answer. Furthermore, they practically all agree that Hell is a state, and not a place; and that the appalling representations of Hell as a Limbo of torture so generally taught some thirty years ago can be considered merely as a "riot of imaginative genius." Instead of insisting on the Wrath of God, these modern teachers conceive that spiritual and moral perfection are best attainable through His Love.

(Percy J. Harris, Coventry.)

THE REGENI BY ARNOLD BENNETT. (Methuen)

"The profound pessimism of Mr. Bennett" appears to be a sense of the aimlessness of living, and it is as evident in this, his latest work, as in the famous "Old Wives Tale." For the whole story of this book is a mere episode, trifling in its beginning and ending nowhere; and such, the novel seems to imply, is the stuff that life is made of. The book is remarkable also for its characterisation. Machin and his family, and his theatrical and æsthetic acquaintances in London form a gallery of distinctive portraits, drawn by a master of cruel, detached penetration.

(J. S. Lewis, 6, Wilton Street, Liscard, Cheshire.)

SMOKE BELLEW BY JACK LONDON.
(Mills & Boon)

This virile story is well worth reading—it savours of courage in dire straits, of grit and perseverance under hard conditions and of the meaning of "race" to the apparent weaklings of an old stock. The reader must perforce follow the thrilling adventures of "Smoke Bellew" with interest, and the personal is more than repaid, for the sense of reality is strong, and the tale cannot but get a grip of all who read it. The lighter "motif" is not absent, and the woman who means so much to the indefatigable "Smoke" is well portrayed as his mate.

(Miss J. A. Jenkins, Edge Hill College, Liverpool.)

We specially commend the reviews sent in by Alan C. Fraser (Bridgwater), R. W. King (Catford Hill, S.E.), Hector S. J. Hughes (Irishtown, Co. Dublin), Cyril G. Taylor (Heswall, Cheshire), Elsie Reid (Milnathort, N.B.), Irene Pollock Lalonde (Bath), Constance Ursula Kerr (Dirleton, East Lothian, N.B.), Gertrude M. Elwood (Grimshy), C. R. Price (Wellington, Somerset), F. R. Swan (Palmer's Green, N.), William F. Robinson (Histon, Cambridge), Victor Rienacker (Belsize Park, N.W.), Miss H. Harting (Chiswick, W.), Agnes Macaulay (Great Malvern), Miss L. Mugford (South Norwood Hill), M. A. Newman (Framlingham), M. J. F. Bittleston (Tilford, Surrey), Lucy G. Chamberlain (Llandudno), Katherine J. Wood (Bournbrook, Birmingham), Miss H. Barrow (Hastings), G. M. Northcott (West Kirby, Birkenhead), M. Whitaker (Dewsbury), Frances A. S. Holbron (Harrietsham, Maidstone), M. C. Jobson (Middleton-one-Row, Co. Durham), Bessie Eades (Scarborough), P. R. Purdie (Birnham, Perthshire), Frances D. Watson (Heaton Moor, Lancs.), Lottie Hoskins (Moseley), Arthur Davidson (Nairn), Eleanor Littlewood (Putney, S.W.), E. A. Pearson (Fleet), R. G. Wyatt (Wimbledon, S.W.), and Beatrix Terry (London, S.W.)

V.—A PRIZE OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO THE BOOKMAN is awarded to Miss Jocelyn Ierne Ormsby, of Pontypidd.

HENRI FABRE: HIS LIFE AND WORK.

BY ALEXANDER TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS.

I.

OF the forty million inhabitants of the British Isles, I doubt if four hundred had ever heard of Henri Fabre before the publication of Maeterlinck's essay on "The Insect's Homer." I certainly was not one of these four hundred; but the essay stimulated me to immediate enquiries. I found that, at the time, the London Entomological Society owned only a part of the volumes forming the "Souvenirs entomologiques"; that there was a complete set at the British Museum and not, as far as I could discover, anywhere else in London; and that a condensed translation of the first volume had been issued by Messrs. Macmillan, in 1901, under the title of "Insect Life." I thought that it would be a desirable and pleasant task to translate the remainder; and I was preparing to negotiate with Paris for the English and American rights of the whole work, when Messrs. Adam & Charles Black sent for me.

It appeared that this leading firm of publishers had acquired the right to issue an English edition of "La Vie des insectes," an illustrated volume of extracts from the "Souvenirs," which had lately been published in France, and that they wished me to undertake the translation. This "popular" form of publication did not exactly coincide with my views, which contemplated a complete and uniform edition of the whole series of essays, uncurtailed and figuring in their order as written; but the agreement between the French and English publishers was already signed, and I accepted the offer of the translation, which received the title of "The Life and Love of the Insect" and appeared in 1911. It was arranged that, if the same house issued the English edition of a second, similar volume, I was to translate this also; and I was a little surprised, early in the following year, to see that Mr. Fisher Unwin was announcing "Social Life in the Insect World," by Henri Fabre, translated by Bernard Miall. I was also more than a little disappointed, not so much because the work had not fallen to me—for Mr. Miall is one of our very ablest translators and his version was admirably done—but rather because this somewhat scattered method of publication threatened to frustrate my comprehensive plan of a uniform edition. It must be mentioned that the two volumes had also found different publishers in America, where they were issued by the Macmillan Company and the Century Company respectively.

I felt that, if the uniform edition was to be saved in both countries, I must take action without delay; and I accordingly entered into direct relations with M. Charles Delagrave, the French publisher of all Henri Fabre's output, who, on the strength of a very generous personal recommendation from M. Maurice Maeterlinck, ended by signing a contract that placed in my hands the sole control of the unpublished material for both England and America. I was now able to plan out my cherished scheme for a uniform edition in the English language of the "Souvenirs entomologiques" and found no difficulty in making the necessary arrangements with Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, on this side of the Atlantic, and, in New York, with Messrs. Dodd, Mead & Co., the publishers of the Collected Works of Maurice Maeterlinck. Obviously, as some forty essays had been picked at random from the ten volumes of the "Souvenirs" to form the two books of extracts, my original intention of preserving the chronological order had to be abandoned, as involving too many marked gaps in the sequence of the chapters; and I devised instead a series of volumes each of which would be devoted to a specific order of insects.

The first of these has already appeared, under the title of "The Life of the Spider," and contains all that the author has written about many different species of spiders, which, although not actually insects, are fully described in the "Souvenirs entomologiques," as is the Languedocian scorpion, the only scorpion that has come within Fabre's ken. I could speak at great length, if the space at my command allowed me, of the engrossing character presented by my task of translation and also of its technical difficulties, which are immense to one who, like myself, has had no training nor the least experience as an entomologist. These difficulties would have baffled me to some purpose if I had not been assisted in the first place by Mr. Marmaduke Langdale and afterwards by Miss Frances Rodwell and Miss Nora Power, while a young American engineer, Mr. W. S. Graff Baker, and a young English chemist, Mr. Edward Cahen, were of the greatest help to me in elucidating the mathematical and chemical technicalities that occurred in many chapters of this and the other books.

Jean Henri Fabre.

From "Fabre, Poet and Man of Science," by Dr. C. V. Legros (Fisher Unwin).

"The Life of the Spider" will be followed, in the autumn of the present year, by "The Life of the Fly," which includes all the chapters on the genus Dipteron with, interspersed in their order as first published, the ten or eleven purely autobiographical chapters, which may be numbered among the most fascinating contributions of Henri Fabre to the literature of his time. They are inserted here so that the book may be of the same length as the others, and also because I considered that Fabre's English and American readers would be well pleased to make the personal acquaintance, so to speak, of their author at this early, rather than at a later, stage of the publication. The next volume after "The Fly" will be devoted to "The Wild Bee" and will include a chapter on "The Red Ants"; and then, in due course, we shall hope to produce the life-histories of "The Beetle and the Weevil," "The Wasp," "The Grasshopper," "The Butterfly and the Moth," "The Bug" and "The Scorpion," some of which will make two volumes, while some, according to the amount of material at hand, will be collected to form one. Thus I propose that, before many years are over, the reader shall have the whole of the "Souvenirs entomologiques" at his disposal in a definite and permanent English edition issued in a worthy fashion.

II.

It is time to turn to Henri Fabre's personality and career. I have never had the advantage of meeting him. Twice within the last ten months—in November, on my way to the Mediterranean, and in April, on my journey back to England—I passed within a few miles of his home at Sérignan; but I hesitated to intrude upon the privacy of this great old man, still busily engaged upon his normal activities in his ninetieth year. I, who was wholly incompetent to discuss his special subjects with him on any sort of terms of equality, had no real claim upon his time, his interest or his kindness, save that resting upon my efforts to make him a little better known in England and America—efforts which had evidently brought me their own reward. Every minute given to me would have been a minute stolen from his work, which is the property of mankind.

Nor could Fabre, with his amply-filled but essentially simple life, have told me much about himself that I had not already learned. Fame came late to him, but it came; and with it two "Lives," partly based upon and partly supplementing the autobiographical chapters that will be read shortly—and, I venture to think, eagerly read—in "The Life of the Fly." These two Lives of J. H. Fabre are in one and two volumes respectively, and are from the pens of his friend and disciple, Dr. G. V. Legros, and of his namesake and distant kinsman, M. Augustin Fabre. They tell us how he was born on December 23rd, 1823, at Saint-Léons, a small parish in the canton of Vezins, district of Haut Rouergue, forming part of the ancient province of Guyenne, so that, though Fabre will always be regarded as a Provençal, he is not really a Provençal save by adoption. He came of peasant stock and of an exceedingly poor peasant stock, numbering no well-to-do farmers among its members, who considered themselves lucky when they held, by inheritance or marriage, a small bit of land to call their own. His paternal grandfather was one of these small farmers; his grandfather on the mother's side followed the calling of a process-server, or sheriff's officer. Henri Fabre's own father at one time had a farm, but in the author's earliest childhood became smitten with the love of town-life and kept a humble café at one provincial town or village after the other. Not many of his immediate forbears, and scarce any of the more remote, were able to spell out even a few lines of a newspaper or to write their own names. He himself cannot account for his love of learning, his love of literature, his love of nature, or his love of science by any explanation based upon the theory of heredity. He sees no "throw-back" in himself to a cultured ancestor or ancestress, however distant.

He was taught nothing at home, not even good farming, for, as I have said, the farm was abandoned in his infancy, and his sole agricultural experience seems to have been the driving of a flock of ducklings to and from the village pond. Nor did he receive any but the most haphazard education at the rustic school to which he was sent as a tiny boy, a school where the master was constantly called away by other duties and where the chickens and pigs made frequent inroads. He learnt to read mainly by his own efforts and initiative; he learnt a little arithmetic. When he had grown a year or two older, he received gratis instruction at a secondary school, in return for his services as an acolyte in church; and thus, little by little, he acquired knowledge—mostly self-taught—and the habit of learning, until at last he received his appointment as an assistant-master at Carpentras, to which was attached a wretched salary of seven hundred francs a year.

Meanwhile, his love of natural history had long asserted itself and, as he tells us, had to be suppressed, in order that he might apply himself to the study of mathematics for his degree. After a while he was promoted to the post of lecturer on physics at Ajaccio, at a salary of eighteen hundred francs, by no means a large income on which to support a wife and a growing family. Here, in Corsica, he came into contact with two travelling naturalists, Requien, of Avignon, and Moquin-Tandon, of Toulouse; and the latter perceiving the special bent of Fabre's mind, recommended him to throw mathematics overboard and "to get to the beast the plant." The young man acted on this advice, added a third degree, that of natural science, to those of mathematics and physics, and received, in 1854, his nomination to the college of Avignon.

Fabre's first notable entomological work appeared in 1855, when he was thirty-two years of age, and took the form of an essay on the cerceris-wasp, published in the "Annales des sciences naturelles." He had little time at this period for study or writing, though he had the greatest need for both, seeing that his stipend had fallen from eighteen hundred to sixteen hundred francs and remained at the latter figure during the whole of

From an etching by C M Nichols, R E

Reproduced from the "Souvenir of the George Borrow Celebrations," by James Hooper.
By permission of Messrs. Jarrold & Sons, London and Norwich

Corner of George Borrow's Bedroom at Norwich, showing a view of the city roofs.

...twenty years, which he spent as an assistant-professor, at Avignon College. Fortunately, he was endowed with a positive lust for work; and on every Sunday and every Thursday half-holiday he escaped to Carpentras, there to prosecute his observations on insects in the open-air.

You will read in "The Life of the Fly," in a chapter entitled "Industrial Chemistry," how he tried—and failed—to earn an independence at Avignon by setting up a factory for producing madder-dye; how he was sought out by Victor Duruy, the Minister of Education; how he was dragged to Paris, much against his will, presented to the Emperor Napoleon III. and decorated with the Legion of Honour. You will have read in "The Life and Love of the Insect" (London: Adam & Charles Black; New York: The Macmillan Co.) how he was visited by Pasteur; and you will read, a year hence, in "The Wild Bee," how he corresponded with Charles Darwin and assisted him by making a number of complicated experiments on his behalf. Darwin called him "the inimitable observer"; Fabre, though he refers to Darwin as "the illustrious scientist" and so on, never entirely reciprocated the older man's admiration, and, throughout the Souvenirs entomologiques displays for the English naturalist a feeling which I would venture to describe as one of good-humoured but quite friendly scorn. You may agree with him or you may not; I agree with him and you may not; but you and I alike must love and respect and revere this humble practical observer tilting with undaunted courage at the successful and self-opinionated theorists whose views on the evolution of species, in which he refuses to believe, were rapidly gaining ground. He chaffs them merrily, but never bitterly; and his witty sallies against the exponents and adherents of evolution, transformism, mimesis and the rest of the "theories" will always count among the most brilliant and delightful passages in the Souvenirs.

I have a particular reason for mentioning Fabre's relations with Darwin at this point. There is no doubt that Fabre is a supremely Christian philosopher and that his quarrels with the evolutionists are due, in no small measure, to his belief that they are too prone to leave the will of God out of their reckoning. Now the irony of fate brought about that Fabre himself, because he talked to his pupils of the beasts and the flowers and the stars and all the wonders of nature, became looked upon, by the narrow-minded inhabitants of the provincial town where he resided, as a "dangerous" and "irregular" person. It also happened that, at this time, he had lost his protector, Duruy, who had himself fallen a victim to the persistent attacks of his obscurantist adversaries. The opportunity was seized to form a local cabal against Fabre; and his enemies made tools of two maiden ladies, a pair of elderly spinsters who owned the house in which Fabre lived, and induced them to give him a month's notice to quit. He held no lease, had not the least scrap of a written agreement to show, was without remedy of any kind; and he had to submit and go.

At that moment he was so poor; so utterly denuded of all resources, that he had not even the wherewithal to pay for the removal of his belongings. The Franco-German war was devastating the country; Paris was besieged; and Fabre had ceased for the time to receive the meagre royalties which his school-manuals and his books of popular science for children were just beginning to yield. Owing to the retired life which his studious and laborious habits caused him to lead, he had no friends at Avignon; and he possessed no credit. In his distress, he turned to John Stuart Mill, with whom he had lived on terms of intimacy during the philosopher's many stays in the City of the Popes. Mill, who was now member of Parliament for Westminster, at once sent him three thousand francs, as a loan without security, to be repaid at his friend's convenience. Fabre thereupon shook off the yoke of the college, withdrew to Orange, and here, after some seeking, found a house to suit him on the outskirts of the town. He discharged his debt within two years, and to this day relates the story of Mill's kindness in terms of fervent gratitude.

Mill died at Avignon in 1873. In the same year Fabre received his dismissal as keeper of the Requien Museum, a subsidiary post which he had retained on leaving Avignon, visiting that city twice a week regularly from Orange. Such time as he could spare from the education of his children was now devoted to writing; but it was not until 1878 that he was able to collect enough of his serial essays to publish the first volume of his monumental "Souvenirs entomologiques," which, issued at rare intervals during the subsequent three decades, were to end by forming a work in ten volumes, consisting of over 3,700 pages and containing nearly 1,200,000 words.

In 1879 he left Orange for Sérignan, where he purchased a small house and garden and also the famous piece of waste ground, the wild paddock or harmas, to which such frequent reference is made in his writings. Here his wife died. His children were all grown up, some were married, the others were on the point of leaving him; and he foresaw the time when he would be left alone, with not even his aged father, the old café-keeper of Toulouse and Pierrelatte, for a companion. The son, moreover, had inherited the father's unpractical ways, his inability to cope with the exigencies of life, his domestic unfitness.

For this reason, after remaining a widower for two years, Fabre married again. He was over sixty, but physically and mentally as young as he had ever been, and he took to wife a young, industrious woman, full of life and vigour and in every way suited to satisfy that need of order, peace, calmness and moral tranquillity which was essential to his existence. Three children, a boy and two girls, were born in rapid succession and before long the youngest of his daughters by the first wife returned home. Thus a family was reconstituted to surround him with its cares in his old age.

From this time onwards, aided by his wife and children, he pursued without distraction the career of his own choosing, applying himself exclusively to the studies that have made him celebrated all over the world. He has survived his second wife, but his son and his daughters still live by his side. He has never known a state far removed above poverty, has always, even of late years, had to live very nearly from hand to mouth; but the stories of his pitiful destitution, which were promulgated so lavishly last year by a well-meaning press, are highly coloured and exaggerated. He has at no time, since the publication of the "Souvenirs entomologiques" began, been in want of the necessities of life, necessities small indeed in the case of a man of his astonishingly simple ways; nor has he ever lamented the absence of life's luxuries. What has distressed him, from the start to the approaching finish of his career, is the lack of means with which to buy the finer and more expensive scientific instruments that would have been so useful to him in the pursuit of his studies. Time after time he describes to us the apparatus employed by him in his experiments and investigations; and these appliances are mostly of a makeshift character. The reader knows how stupendous the results have been, in spite of it all.

III.

Fabre is, and will always remain, "the inimitable observer," an entomologist by the grace of God. It is an open question, however, whether posterity will not regard him rather as a mighty man of letters. There is a marvellous attraction about his style. Men more competent to judge than I, Frenchmen, have assured me that he does not write absolutely pure French, that Provençal idioms creep in here and there in his work, that he uses words occasionally in a sheer Provençal sense, that he writes, in a manner of speaking, with a southern accent. This may be so. I cannot tell. It is true that, in translating him, I have many times come upon a word which I do not find in Littré, or which Littré defines in a sense different from that which Fabre intends it to convey. But how does this affect the question of style? We all know what a prig and pedant your Frenchman is in the matter of his own language. While he looks upon it as a made and perfect implement, he will often welcome a neologism, proudly labelling it as such; but the introduction of a provincial term, however happy, however mellifluous, however robust, from east, north, west or south of Paris, shocks him as barbarous. Let him be shocked: Fabre's style remains none the less delightful. It is as simple as Victor Hugo's, as lucid as Chateaubriand's; it trips along with a graceful lilt of its own; it has ever the right word in the right place.

Fabre's work translates into excellent English; and we have always thought that this quality—the quality of being readily rendered into a foreign tongue—is a test of good writing. It is the tortuous, laboured, fantastical would-be "original" style that hampers the translator. Fabre's style is invariably straightforward, radiant and magnificent; he writes as a classic from the moment that he takes up his pen.

BERNARD SHAW: PART TWO.

BY DIXON SCOTT.

"But whatsoever the failings on his part Remember, reader, he were that good in his heart"—JOHN GARGERY.

I.

THAT, or something like it, was really the burden of the long Bernard Shaw article which bored its way through last month's BOOKMAN, and which it is the firm purpose of these new paragraphs to end. It has been called "a brilliant attack": whereas it was actually a defence. It was an honest attempt to discover the cause of the disparity between Mr. Shaw's superb powers and his performances, between the work he might have done for us—the work he wanted to do for us—and the work he has actually done; and as it groped and tapped sympathetically it did come delightedly on evidence which seemed to prove overwhelmingly that the real villain of the piece was—not the author of Androcles—but that wasteful, wanton, mocker, whose present alias is The Life Force, which actually completed its frustration of Mr. Shaw's career by sardonically setting him to work to sing its praises. There is something positively conspiratorial in the cunning logic of events which drove this splendid Irishman astray. He was plucked about like a puppet—torn out of his true place—cramped when still young and tender into an inappropriate mould, and held there while circumstance, with a diabolical deftness, screwed the die down on his features ineffaceably; and his very air of arrogance, which makes this description sound absurd, was but one of the imprints received in that hour. That the man whose deepest desire is to heal and help humanity should have become a kind of byword for mockery; that his altruism should seem egotism, his earnestness insolence, his mysticism materialism, his refusal to have living creatures slaughtered for his food a symptom, not of warm-heartedness, but of cold-bloodedness; that the man whose only quarrel with Christianity is its acquired element of cruelty, and who has preached and practised constantly an absolutely saintly code of private conduct and the strictest obedience to the Church's hardest rules, should yet be regarded as a dangerous enemy of morals and reformed (as he was by The Times itself the other morning, in a leader on "Androcles and the Lion") for ribaldry and irreverence in regard to sacred things: all these and their hundred kindred contradictions are explained when we watch his career from the beginning and perceive the frightful dexterity with which fate has always employed his best qualities to drive him along a road that must distort them. That was what we saw last month. We found the essential Shaw to be eager, idealistic, impulsive, romantic. We saw him flung, at exactly the most impressionable hour of his life, into the peculiarly priggish and self-assertive little world of the intellectual London of the eighties. We saw how his native eagerness and inexperience idealised that environment; and how his wit and his vividness and his love of picturesqueness urged and enabled him to reproduce all its elements in a single concentrated pose; and how the accent he then adopted, the attitudes he struck as he hectored the world from rebel platforms, ate back into his instincts and affected his habit of mind, until at length intolerance, arrogance, contentiousness, contradictionness, became instinctively his imagination's weapons. And finally we saw how his very earnestness and craving for consistency forced him on to the concoction of a philosophy which would justify his policy of pert exasperation; and how he gradually perfected a theory which represented irritation as the only sesame to men's consciousness, and cold clear thinking as the weapon now most needed to cut us free from our pampering illusions, and which therefore laid on the man of genius as his deepest duty this thankless task of challenge and contempt. And we watched this adventitious creed drinking up vitality from his veins, dilating till at last it shut him in—trapped in a dense grove of ideas that slowly altered him until he matched them, as dungeon walls will do a captive. . . .

And now, as promised, we come to the climax which completes the cruel process with a clang. Those two consecutive lines of disablement and development are twisted together and welded abruptly; irony receives its iron crown. For we are now going to contemplate Mr. Shaw being compelled to proclaim and believe himself a dramatist, and, at the same time, by the self-same power and process, being carefully unfitted for the rôle.

II.

The first half of this epitome, the way Shaw's early pose of rebel insolence placed him on a track which propelled him implacably towards play-writing, is easily traced by simply jotting down some dates. Recapitulate rapidly the early facts of his life in a straightforward string, and you see chronology creeping up to this crisis. In 1876, twenty years old, he crosses from Ireland to London, knowing more and thinking more of pictures and music than of anything else in the world. A couple of years later, entirely by accident, he hears a certain young Sidney Webb (exactly his own age) laying down the laws of life to an audience of awe-stricken adults; and resolves to become a platform speaker too. In pursuit of this fell purpose he permeates all the societies for scolding Society which were a feature of the London of that time, and by 1882 he has so out-woven Webb, has caught the trick of all-round truculence so perfectly, that even the most hardened and ferocious food-reformer, dress-reformer, land-reformer, reform reformer, et hoc genus omne, will blench at the mention of his name. And in 1885, at the age of twenty-nine (perhaps feeling that this fearless independence had depended on his mother long enough), he is looking out for some settled job in journalism.

Now, what would you expect to happen? Naturally, he was made a musical critic. "I have never had a programme," he once said, "I simply took the job that was given me and did it the best way I could"; but in those days of alert editors a man who knew more about pictures and music than anything else in the world, and who had learned to express himself imperiously, was journalistically a dedicated soul. He became art critic to The World in 1885, musical critic to the Star in 1888, and in 1895, following the course of nature, he was unhitched from the Star by Mr. Frank Harris and installed as dramatic critic to The Saturday.

The inevitability of all that is as evident as  $2 \times 2 = 4$ . What happens next has the same infernal neatness. It was a perfect repetition of his earlier innocent display among the societies and Socialists. He had taken rebelliousness more seriously than the rebels themselves, and played the part with an overpowering completeness. He now idolised the theatre in the same impulsive way, and was once more taken in by his own eloquence. For Shaw's besetting weakness is a certain stubborn pride of soul which cannot permit him to admit, even in a whisper to himself, that the cause he is engaged in is not crucial; and he now reacted exactly as such a character could be counted on to react, with results distinctly startling to the stage. For no sooner had Mr Harris seen him settled in his stall than he sprang up declaring it a choir-stall in a cathedral. "The theatre," said he, "is a place where two or three are gathered together, with an apostolic succession as serious and as continuously inspired as that younger institution, the apostolic succession of the Christian Church." "The theatre," he said, "is as important as the Church was in the Middle Ages, and much more important than the Church in London now." It is "a factory of thought, a prompter of conscience, an elucidator of conduct, an armoury against despair and dullness, and a temple of the Ascent of Man." Its plays were "identical with a church service as a combination of artistic ritual, profession of faith and

By Prince Paul Troubetzkoy.

A plaster bust of Shaw, made in forty minutes.

Reproduced by courtesy of the sculptor.
From "George Bernard Shaw: His Life and Work," by Archibald Henderson (Hutchinson).

sermon"; and its players, to their own immense embarrassment were hailed as "hierophants of a cult as eternal and sacred as any professed religion in the world" Our Don Quixote, dear romantic was discomfiting the marionettes by taking them with unintended seriousness

The completion of the operation will be plain Mr Shaw may never persuade us that the theatre exerts a power equal to that which established Inquisitions and curdled Europe into Crusades and shot the great frozen fountains of Chartres and Rouen into mid sky but he quickly persuaded himself Just as his first intuition made his pride produce a theory which put the case for contentiousness so confoundingly convincingly that it enthusiastically endeared him to an attitude it was only intended to excuse so now his heated declarations of the supreme importance of the drama burgeoned out into corollaries so credible that he had to believe in them himself He became convinced that Drama was the thing best worth doing It was therefore the work worthiest of his powers He was already middle aged — but no matter In 1898 he stole away from his merc stall Before the end of the year he was known to the world as the author of Plays Pleasant and Unpleasant

III

Nothing then, could be clearer than that Mr Shaw became a dramatist—not as a result of predilection—but simply because he was propelled into the part by circumstances Once one realises that one also sees the huge unlikelihood of him turning out the born dramatist he claimed to be and indeed it could easily be shown that even his power of conjuring up imaginary people in imaginary places and finding pretexts for theatrical scenes between them" (on which he plumes himself in the Preface to Plays Pleasant) is much more the novelist's dramatic knack than the playwright's, that his mere sense of the physically dramatic, taking that alone, is far from being the true sense of the theatre But these initial native deficiencies wouldn't have mattered so much if it hadn't been for that other element the grim fact that the very circumstances which had made him a dramatist had simultaneously robbed him of his best right to be one Be one that is to say, in his own high sense of it a maker of works of art depicting the daily life of the world phials filled with essence of actuality. A man of his wit and force couldn't, of course, fail to contrive stage pieces with a good deal more pith and picturesqueness about them than the majority of plays turned out by the class of brains the stage deserves; but anything bigger anything adequate to his own definition he had already forfeited the faculty to produce He was tiebly disqualified—and the first of these three handicaps stares out at us so brazenly from the record of his life that the wonder is it never warned him off so plain is it indeed that it has visibly stamped itself into the framework of his house, making an ominous writing on the walls of his home 'They say What say they? Let them say These are the words (his biographer tells us) that Mr Shaw has had carved above the fireplace in his study They are sufficiently significant Admirable enough as the motto of a callow rebel the old contemptuous border battle-cry amounts to a surrender of his sword when heard on the lips of a dramatist For, being interpreted it really means that

I the underscated owner of this hygienic hearth, boast a deliberate lack of that imaginative sympathy which is the chief credential of the interpreter of character' And by sympathy, in this sense, one does not mean a slobbering pity for pity can be as partial as contempt By imaginative sympathy one simply means the jolly power of watching with a chuckling absorption and delight the doings of every sort and size of people and of this happy gift, if ever he had it, Shaw by now had been wholly dispossessed Sympathy is something hardly to be discerned in a man who has deliberately made disdain a working principle, who has learned to study human nature in the spirit of an opponent and whose idea of a generous passion has become a 'passion of hatred' for all the 'accursed middle class institutions that have starved, thwarted, misled and corrupted us from our cradles' Tout comprendre cest tout pardonner you cannot cut your enemy and know him too That is a sort of vivisection that is fruitless And Shaw really admitted his own incapacity for play-writing when he affirmed that the average audience was a set of soppy stupid, "part of them nine tenths chapel goers by temperament, and the remainder ten tenths blackguards" For the stage at its best is only a mirror held up before the face of the watching house The big play is composed of little playgoers it must comprehend them even when they don't comprehend it

That, then, is the first of Mr Shaw's three acquired deficiencies his socialism has made him unsociable: his confirmed habit of wiping somebody out, which he formed among the Fabians because it was so effective there, becomes here a disastrous obliteration of his

Photo by Hender & Grove

G. B. Shaw,
at the age of 23.

Taken in Dublin, July 4, 1879
From "George Bernard Shaw his Life and Work," by Archibald Henderson (Hutchinson)

Photo by Alvin Langdon Coburn.

From "Man of Mark," by Alvin Langdon Coburn. (Duckworth).

George Bernard Shaw.

model: he is like an archer (not William, though!) who has set up a target with care and then discovered it has used up all the wood meant for arrows. And now, on the top of it, driving it in further, comes acquired defect number two—one that limits still further his already narrowed range of subjects, and one that is all the more mischievous because it is masked by a quality that may have done much at the outset to convince him that drama was his line. All Shaw's early efforts as a writer were given, as we have seen, to the task of forming a medium of expression apt for physical utterance—a type of diction he could debate with and dictate with dogmatically, dealing it out from his hustings or stabbing it into his societies in successive sentences as pat and purposeful as neatly planted blows. Now, that meant good dialogue: and so, long before he had ever dreamt of turning dramatist, he had perfectly acquired the great trick which so many playwrights never do learn—the art of making all his words fit live lips and leap alertly off the tongue, as slick and natural as slang, fresh with the colours of actual intercourse. But whilst his platform-work thus taught him the acoustics of the stage and how to make his characters talk like human beings, it also confirmed him in a foible which reacted on those characters to make them human beings of one particular kind. For the essence of his own speeches had been their slitting, pelting, salience: it had been his work to resolve the old vague rumblings of oratory into a rattle of definite drops—and nothing, he found, sped a period so well as a core of cute meaning, self-contained. With the result that a crisp statement soon became essential to his sentences: he could no more begin to write one without an assertion to maintain it than a cabby could go a drive without a fare.

But though this confirmed inability to ask a question, or to suggest, or appeal, or submit, or discriminate, or qualify, or use art as a means of evocation, summoning a wisdom deeper than the artist knew he controlled although this limitation was an immense asset on a platform, it obviously became a fatal barrier to completeness when the habitual asserter set to work to write a play. For it meant that the stage-door of his theatre had to be shut in the faces of a throng of very necessary characters: all the dim folk and foggy folk, the puzzled and perturbed, the groping, hoping, helpless, humble, unassertive humans, who act by instinct instead of by reason and whose deeds speak so much more clearly than their words—all these he was compelled to turn away. He couldn't employ them—for he couldn't equip them with a part. His sympathies, we have seen, were already limited—but even if he were filled with a positive affection for such characters he couldn't take them on—no, not even to take them off; for although he understood them they did not understand themselves, and for people who don't know their own minds and can't communicate the knowledge clearly, Shaw has no form of speech that will do. He can write none but definite dialogue; and definite dialogue entails definite minds; and the result is that all the members of his cast seem members of one exclusive caste. A specimen of the sensible highly educated young Englishwoman: prompt, strong, confident, self-possessed. . . . A man of cool temperament and low but clear and keen intelligence, with the imperturbability of the accurate calculator who has no illusions. . . . A vigorous, genial, popular man of forty with a sound voice which he uses with the clean athletic articulation of the practised orator. . . . A dignified man, a born chairman of directors. . . . A strong man, with a watchful face. . . . Pass them in parade, from Vivie Warren to Andrew Undershaft, and you find they have all had to be endowed with this rare faculty—a power of quick, precise and ruthless calculation and self-confidence, the necessary adjunct to the way they'll have to speak. Each has a ready point of view, bright and finished as a rapier; and the drama has to resolve itself into the ring and rattle of these weapons, the multiplex duel we get when they all unsheathe their points and prettily proceed to cross opinions. What fun it is, how exciting it can be, we all, to our happiness, well know. But we have to admit that the mirror misses much. It is odd to reflect that his democracy is the cause of this exclusiveness.

IV

Yet if these are serious handicaps I fear the third is even heavier. It was bad enough to be compelled to insist on his dramatis personæ all coming clearly provided with opinions: but what was worse was the fact that the exigencies of platform work had compelled him to add a pack of neat opinions to his own equipment, and that his haste and his innocence and the highly peculiar circle of his friends made the pack in many ways a faked one. "To be set too early," says Meredith, somewhere, "is to take the work out of the hands of the Sculptor who fashions men. A character that does not wait for circumstances to shape it is of less worth in the race that must be run." Well, Shaw set too soon. The pressure of those early days of gleeful mutiny, the need for being dogmatic, precipitated his young ideas in a premature philosophy, to which ever since he has clung; and at the same time the material out of which he had to get his ideas, the personal experiences he turned into opinions, were quite unfairly lopsided, incomplete, artificial. The idiosyncrasy of his troupe he might to some extent have counter-balanced by picking their points of view with care and then arranging these so that they partly reproduced the pattern and poise of reality: but such ingenuity availed nothing whatever against the bias of his own point of view. He might (and he did) arrange his rapiers like spokes to look like a mimic Wheel of Life—but to no purpose, for the hub was out of truth. And it was out of truth because, quite literally, what he had taken as his centre was really eccentric, and what he had accepted in his innocence as a genuine axle was actually only a crank.

For remember, once more, where he was when he formed his views: remember the New Woman and "The Woman Who Did," and The Ibsen Society and rational dress, and the general, dank, indoor, snuffy, insincere atmosphere of devotees and defiance in which he formed his first impressions and made one. It was suburban in the worst sense—under the Town, shut in and overshadowed by its mass. "I am a typical Irishman," he once said, "my family came from Yorkshire." Actually, he is a typical Cockney: he came from the country before he had learned that Middlesex wasn't the middle; and what he ought to have said was: "I am a true Metropolitan: my views are so very provincial." Shut up in one pigeon-hole, he felt he was surveying the whole room; he took it for granted that the highly specialised existence he shared was a fair sample of reality: he got his ideas of human society from the members of his societies; and innocently accepted the New Woman as woman. He knew nothing of the working north, nothing of pastoral England, nothing even of the genuine suburbs or the actual provinces, or the places where life does expand with some serenity, repeating its comeliest delights. Morris had had Kelmscott to use as a base, his grey manor with its immemorial beauties was his hub; and when he looked out from it he realised that Shaw's little London was a mere dirty splash on one of the spokes. But though Shaw took a Hertfordshire house many years later, and though a healthy Hibernian longing for the open has no doubt always been mixed with his motives, yet he never let that longing take him to his true kingdom; and his work has been far more a product of indoor dilettantism than that of Mr. Henry James. For Mr. James has travelled tirelessly, shedding old shibboleths and learning the non-existence of horizons; whereas Shaw has always remained complacently satisfied that his early contact with life was remarkably complete. He is constantly pluming himself in the breadth of his experience: "Like a greengrocer and unlike a minor poet, I have lived instead of dreaming and feeding myself with artistic confectionery." "Three times every week I could escape from artistic and literary stuff and talk seriously on serious subjects with serious people. For this reason—because I persisted in Socialist propaganda—I never once lost touch with the real world." So does he point proudly to the bars of his prison and boast of how they keep reality before him. He honestly believed that a brisk debate with Mr. Belfort Bax brought him very near to the simple heart of human nature. He felt that he understood the democracy because he knew so many democrats.

It was as a Fabian Meeting multiplied, then, that Shaw first beheld the race of man; and his views of life were largely formed to fit this fascinating vision. Let me give one example of the way he generalised, of the way he accepted a suburban experience as a symbolical episode and framed a law on the strength of it which he promptly applied to the rest of creation. Let it be his theory of the relation of the sexes—of woman as the huntress and man as the prey. It reappears constantly, for it is one of the several steel-yard rules which he can handle easier than golden ones; but its first appearance is in "The Philanderer." Now we have the assurance of Mr. Shaw's biographer that "'The Philanderer' exhibits an attitude towards women induced in Shaw by unpleasant personal relations with women prior to the time at which the play was written. . . . The first act is a more or less accurate replica of a scene in Mr. Shaw's own life." There you have it! The core of "Man and Superman" is simply a twisted point of view manufactured out of the shoddy and unreliable material circumstances brought him when he had to take what he got to make opinions. Not all the adroitness in Ireland could overcome that initial drawback. He may declare that "Ann is Everywoman" as loudly as he will, and swear that her "demonstration, that the initiative in sex transactions remains with women," is a piece of pure impartial drama, the result of "a creative process over which I have no control." We know better. Falsified from the commencement, the piece had to be a fantasy. It is one of the most delightful variety entertainments ever witnessed on the stage, but it holds no mirror up to life. What it reflects is an impatient youth of genius being impeded by a pack of spinsters who can't spin, the female intellectuals peculiar to a little patch of London (and a patch which has by now been ploughed and broken), and deciding that his predicament must be typical of Everyman's, that he has discovered a Universal Law which nobody before him has had the honesty to announce. . . .

V.

Then his plays are an imposture? Pardon me; I never said so: What I say indeed is that he has acted with perfect sincerity, that all the errors in the result must be attributed to our time. It is because they are not a fair indictment that they do become a grave one;—But then, on the other hand, it is when we realise their vices that we discover his true virtues. For the fine thing is this—and this the only use of critics' efforts—that once the limitations of the plays are realised they cease to possess any; once you see that Shaw has done the best he could for us under the circumstances, then his effort is seen in relation to those circumstances and its errors instinctively allowed for. Recognise that a passion for purity, gentleness, truth, justice and beauty is the force at the base of all his teaching, and you will find his message one of the most tonic of our time. Realise further how he has limited himself by the philosophy he has expounded, and you will escape all danger of being hurt by its deficiencies. And instead of the irritation, the bewilderment, or (what was worse) the priggish complacency with which you regarded them, you find yourself turning to them with sympathy, with comradeship and eager friendliness, able to use all their strong medicine without being embittered by the taste. It is only when you regard them, in short (and this is the summary of the whole irony), it is only when you regard them with the very sympathy they doggedly deride that you receive the help which they hunger to offer.

New Books.

THE SECOND ROOM.*

It is thirty-one years since Anthony Trollope passed away, in his sixty-eighth year, and during that period the only book that has given us any information about him is his "Autobiography," which was published a year after his death. That no one, in these days when biographies and volumes of reminiscences stream from the printing presses, has thought fit to write of Trollope the man, can be explained only by the supposition that no one thought the reading public interested in the novelist. For many years after the decease of Trollope this undoubtedly was the case, but in recent years there has been a marked revival of interest. Sir Leslie Stephen, Mr. Frederic Anthony Trollope.

* "Anthony Trollope: His Work, Associates, and Originals." By T. H. S. Escott. 12s 6d. net. (John Lane.)

From a drawing by Samuel Laurence, in the possession of Mrs. Anthony Trollope.
From "Anthony Trollope," by F. H. S. Escott (John Lane).

Harrison, and Mr. Escott were always loud in praise of Trollope, even in the period of his temporary eclipse—an eclipse due probably in great part to the fact that he was overshadowed by his great contemporaries, Thackeray, Dickens, and George Eliot, who, not only by their work, but also by their personality, bulked more largely in the public eye.

Admirer as I am of Trollope, I cannot claim for him a place among the most gigantic of literary giants. It were heresy to name him in the same breath with Fielding, Thackeray, and Jane Austen; nevertheless he has his claims, distinct, undoubted claims, to a comfortable niche in the Valhalla of letters. Dickens was the novelist of the lower classes of the Victorian era, Thackeray of the upper classes. It may be urged that Trollope was the portrait-painter of the middle classes. Mr. Herman Merivale, criticising Trollope's rather unsympathetic monograph on Thackeray, pointed out that the lesser man resented the master's want of method in his writings, and said rebukingly, "Such admirable work is often done by the unmethodical." Now, Trollope was, above all things, methodical. He wrote regularly and steadily, and had the utmost contempt for the writer who waited for "inspiration." "To me," he said, "it would not be more absurd if the shoemaker were to wait for inspiration, or the tallow-chandler for the divine moment of melting. If the man whose business it is to write has eaten too many good things, or has drunk too much, or has smoked too many cigars—as men who write will sometimes do—then his condition may be unfavourable for work; but so will be the condition of a shoemaker who has been similarly imprudent. I have sometimes thought that the inspiration wanted has been the remedy which time will give to the evil results of such imprudence. Mens sana in corpore sano. The author wants that as does every other workman—that's a habit of industry. I was once told that the surest aid to the writing of a book was a piece of cobbler's wax on my chair. I certainly believe in the cobbler's wax much more than in the inspiration." Trollope was severe on those whose methods were not his. He could—and did—write three thousand words in three hours before breakfast. Therefore, every author should write three thousand words in three hours before breakfast. To do so was virtue, not to do so vice. Nevertheless, we may supplement Mr. Merivale's dictum, by saying, Such admirable work is often done by the methodical. After all, it is merely a question of temperament. Thackeray was by nature indolent—he required the spur before he could work; Trollope was by nature industrious.

At his best Trollope was splendid, and he was often at his best. The Barsetshire Novels are magnificent, and contain an extensive portrait-gallery which few authors would disdain to have created. For my part, I have always regarded as Trollope's greatest creation, Josiah Crawley, Vicar of Hoggstock. Not a pleasant fellow, Crawley, for acute poverty had roused in him a bitter, stern, unbending pride, that apparently nothing could subdue. But his wife falls ill, and at last sweet Lucy Robarts forces her way into his house, and nurses and tends her. Then, when illness has been vanquished, the man's noble nature conquers him, and he speaks, as some fine old patriarch might have done: "May God Almighty bless you, Miss Robarts. You have brought sunshine into this house, even in the time of sickness when there was no sunshine; and He will bless you. You have been the Good Samaritan, binding up the wounds of the afflicted, pouring in oil and balm. To the mother of my children you have given life, and to me you have brought life, and comfort, and good words—making my spirit glad within me as it has not been gladdened before. All this hath come of charity, which vaunteth not itself and is not puffed up. Faith and Hope are beautiful, but Charity exceedeth them all." So far as I am concerned, the man who could work up to that scene, and then write it, may indite his books regularly or unsteadily. I am content with the result.

Mr. Escott's admirable work, based upon information given to him by the novelist, will probably revive interest in Trollope. It is an admirable record of the life of the author of the Barsetshire Novels.

LEWIS MELVILLE.

THE BAEDEKER OF CONSTITUTIONS.*

A volume by the gifted President of the most logical republic in the world bids fair to be not only a guide but a philosopher and friend. We should expect to track a maze, however intricate, by a clue at once simple and surprising. That expectation, however, is hardly realised in a volume so small compared with the subject. Moreover, the style suffers (as it will be seen that the French system has suffered also) from a combination of dissimilars. It allies lecture to melodrama. No sooner has the professor, so to speak, raised his finger, than the showman invites us to come in and admire his moving pictures—of senate, or chamber, or law courts, or the rest. The result is something between the primer and the platform. We are guided through a foreign town with a synopsis of history, a map of the surroundings, and asterisks, as it were, for the best hotels. In a word, we are tourists, and M. Poincaré is the Baedeker of Constitutions.

The crux of latter-day France is, in truth, a conflict, veiled or prominent, between the genius for centralisation, which under every régime has always distinguished France, and the orgied issues of the Revolution. Unity has overpowered individuality, and "equality" has served as mediocrity's excuse. The theoretical logic which the Revolutionists worshipped under the name of Reason has swamped, or tended to swamp, the logic of action—of effective government. The result is more and more of a machine, less and less of an organism. To make the machine more organic, more national, may well prove to be the mission of M. Poincaré himself, who has already inspired his countrymen.

* "How France is Governed." By Raymond Poincaré, of the French Academy and President of the Republic. Translated by Bernard Miall. 7s. 6d. net. (Fisher Unwin). Leipzig: Inselstrasse 20.

The real aim of France remains the same, whether now, under Louis XIV., the Revolution, the Restoration, or the Third Empire. It is, to repeat the Revolutionist phrase, "National Sovereignty." But constantly this national sovereignty has been confused with popular sovereignty, with Demos crudely predominant. Theory rhapsodises over this automaton of a Demos, and Victor Hugo could even exclaim that whenever the universal suffragist votes, the whole National France votes with him. But facts have put a less rosy and more prosy complexion on the admirably constructed, if constantly changed, wax-work. The local and sectional have abounded. And now French nationalism revives, not because of, but despite, the constitutional logic. A country of great traditions wearied of bureaucratic officialdom and yearns to reconcile real initiative with trim government, and to enlarge its career beyond the bounds of a glorified Bumble. In France, which from 1789 to 1884 has tried every electoral and mechanical experiment and expedient, the President himself has less power than influence, and little direct responsibility. The Republic, a "burnt child" always on guard against any recurrence of over-individuality, has favoured stagnation under a system that preaches what it fails to practice, which is at once doctrinaire and meddling.

It has been trenchantly observed of the French Constitution, or rather of the series of constitutions that settled down in 1884, that never was there such a complicated pagoda for so diminutive a god. It is indeed a paper pattern which the human spirit wears impatiently, a pattern over-machined. One "scrutiny" after another, delegations, all the mechanical monotonies of arrangement after arrangement—each, as it were, a fresh note to some difficult passage in a revised edition fail to secure any living representation. Indeed, the old "Estates," under kings who truly unified the nation, would appear far more really representative.

The French love of symmetry—their savoir voir—has been suffered to overwhelm their instinctive savoir-faire, and so too often the end has been obscured by the means. There is not enough vent for individual expression and self-reliance. There is too little leadership. But there are qualities in these defects of rigidity, and Trade Unionism, which was only sanctioned since 1884, can be stopped in its excesses. So again a ministry's resignation can be compelled. But on the whole an oligarchy—in the name of electoral majorities—rules without being able to govern. It is the old story. All the talk about "will of the people" only ends in the will of other people. The fact that the constitutional law of August 1884 forbids any revision of the Republican scheme—ever so keenly as the country might demand it—is one proof among many of this axiom.

That is the way with theories. M. Poincaré reminds us that the "Sovereignty" is "one and indivisible," according to the text of the Declaration of Rights, and from this he infers that "a group of citizens cannot . . . impose an imperative mandate on a representative." A few pages further, however, we read, in the capital translation, about the arrondissement-scrutiny, that it makes it easier for the electors "to supervise the execution of their mandate." And, contrasting this with the list-scrutiny in an election "by department," M. Poincaré himself deplures that the former tends to make the representative "see the interests of the country in too fragmentary a fashion." This is what comes of over-mechanism, disencouraging growth and super-stimulating regulation. He cites M. Foullys "Not being able to weigh heads, we must count them," the very dogma that provoked our Burke's finest indignation. What is this but to exalt wants above wisdom, and to deify the mob which its idolisers are ever the first to mutilate? It might have been perhaps more apposite to have cited a passage in a letter of M. Taine's which says: "Under the name of sovereignty of the people we possess an excessive centralisation, the intervention of the State in private life, a system of universal bureaucracy, with all its consequences.

Centralisation and universal suffrage—these are the two main characteristics of contemporary France, and they have given it an organisation which is both apoplectic and anæmic." Yet inherently the French are as conservative in habits as they are state-democrats in idea. But alas! they are tied and bound to the "State." Mr. Morton Fullerton, who quotes this passage, points out that of some eight million voters in France to-day, at least nine hundred thousand are employed by the State. Which things are an allegory for ourselves.

What I have ventured to term the melodramatic side of this suggestive, if sometimes superficial, book, is not without bathos. In describing the election of a President at Versailles, after bidding us to "enter the vast courtyard separated from the Place D'Armes by a golden grille," after recalling the marble reminders of historical giants, after asking us to "pass beneath the equestrian statue of Louis XIV. and advance towards the Stairs of the Princes," before, too, his picture of the tribune and the urn and the "usher with a silver chain" and "sonorous voice," he beckons us to "mount the three steps which precede the door on the left and enter. Here is a gallery of cloak-rooms. It is here that the Senators and Deputies hang up their hats and overcoats." Shade of the "Grand Monarque"! But, as in the case of Democracy itself, there is but one step from the sublime to the ridiculous. Let us be careful lest one day we trip over it.

WALTER SCHILL.

MAGNIFICENT MARKSMANSHIP.

"Men of Mark" is the title of Mr. Coburn's new book of photographs*—but the title is not Mr. Coburn's. His idea was "Men of Genus." But "No, no!" cried Mr. Arnold Bennett, all ablush, when asked to permit his own portrait to appear, "I am not a Man of Genus; I am a mere working author, I can't possibly come in unless you call your gathering something milder such as—well—let me see—why, Men of Mark." The neat name fits it to perfection. It's as good as "The Regent" for a theatre; the Card has trumped another trick. "Marked Men, by A Marksman"—it suggests associations such as that; and that is wholly right and apt and as it should be. For one of the great joys of the achievement, the plot that links the pictures all together, is the thought of this tenacious young American stalking our great men one by one—running them to earth, winning their confidence, overcoming their scruples and qualms—until at length they succumb to the extent of actually aiding him in the operation that will put him in possession of their heads. Less than ten years ago, newly out of his teens (but with a Latin Quarter beard that added lustres), Coburn landed on our shores armed with a camera like a packing-case and a careful list of all our best and brightest men. And ever since then he has been working down that list, until to-day every name on it is ticked, and he offers us his trophies, dished up from all his plates; three-and-thirty heads on one tremendous charger; a dish fit to set before a Book-club king.

Thirty-three; and of these at least one, Mr. George Moore, had never been photographed before; whilst another (George Meredith), hated cameras worse than motor-cars and plainly told Coburn, when the latter advanced against Box Hill, that he was determined never to be taken alive. Then what made them capitulate? Mr. Coburn's Preface partly explains: quaint, artless, cute, innocent, egoistic, modest, charming—when it comes to the confession "I make friends very easily," the reader feels he understands the reason why. But it is not until he turns from these opening pages to the wordless ones that follow, that the full force of Coburn's pull is explained. Personal artlessness is very engaging—but what turned all these engagements into victories was the fact that Coburn was an immensely cunning artist. When he started out to capture Meredith it was with "some prints under my arm and a song in my heart," and without at all meaning to question the sweetness of the song, we are certain that it was the prints that did the trick. His work is really astonishingly beautiful. To the layman there seem, broadly, to be two sorts of photographs. Coburn's; and the other kinds. The difference has often been accounted for technically, in terms of special processes and what not; but probably Coburn's only special process is a psychological one. We have our born violinists; why not a born photographer? a man who expresses himself most easily in Photography's three-ply alphabet of natural objects, novel patterns, and new tones? That seems this man's way. His opinions and impressions, not of the sensuous world only, spontaneously find their perfect equivalents among the shifting combinations of his craft.

* "Men of Mark" By Alvin Langdon Coburn. A Series of 33 Photographic Portraits of Eminent Authors and Artists. £1 5s. net. (Duckworth & Co.)

And they are all decided: that is one thing worth vouching for, there is no cheap mystery of muzziness; from Shaw to Matisse, every face shines firm and clear; yet within the daylight limits thus left he has found room for the expression of subtleties; out of the blend of the angle of the head with the direction of the lighting with the gradation of the gloom with the particular expression sought and caught, some special new happiness of poetry and criticism seems in practically every case to have been born. It was an obvious thought, perhaps, which posed Mr.

Henry James judiciously (looking, by the way, astonishingly like Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree); but who could have reasonably foretold that by getting Max Beerbohm in a corner, in the attitude of a man saying "Advance another step and I will ring for the police," Mr. Coburn would manage to extort a complete confession of the secrets of that perfect master's gold-point style? Mr. Coburn mentions that he is a deep admirer of Mr. George Moore's prose—and indeed his own writing sometimes has the Moorish naiveté. I suggest that when next he needs a title he might do worse than "Confessions To a Young Man."

D. S.

THE ENGLISH NOVEL.*

Amiel, in his Journal Intime, remarks on a history of poetry which he has just read: "It is a good thing to take these rapid surveys; the shifting point of view gives a perpetual freshness to the subject and to the ideas presented—a literary experience which is always pleasant and bracing. For one of my temperament, this philosophic and morphological mode of embracing and expounding literary history has a strong attraction." This is the kind of pleasure, and the kind of profit, which the reader will find in Professor Saintsbury's rapid survey of the English novel. Its rapidity, however, is in the exigencies of treatment only, the book is the fruit of a life time of novel-reading in which, apart from twenty-two years of weekly and almost daily reviewing of fiction, Professor Saintsbury has travelled the long highway of English fiction from Beowulf and the Arthurian romances downwards. The stones of the fabric he knows intimately as a matter of course, but in these pages we are stimulated and interested by his equal familiarity with the rubble, to all of which he imparts an organic interest. In this vein his account, for example, of "Emilia Wyndham," a request for which at Audie's would probably send surprise round the lending counter. Yet Mrs. Marsh-Caldwell's novel, which was published in 1845 (the year of "Vanity Fair"), would repay a reading as being, in Professor Saintsbury's opinion, the most visible "meeting and overlapping place of the old and the new novel." He cheerfully exposes its absurdities of plot, its conventionalisms, and its gasiness, but in this almost unread novel we shall find

"things very rarely to be found in any novel—even taking in Bulwer and the serious part of Dickens—up to the date. The scene between Danby and his mother, in the pretty house in Charlotte Street, when she discovers that he has been giving a hundred-pound cheque to a young lady is impressingly good. It is not absolutely unsuggestive of what Thackeray was just doing, and really not far from what Trollope was not for some years to do. There are other passages which make one think of George Eliot, who, indeed, might have been writing at the very time; there are even faint and fluttering suggestions of Ibsen's 'duty to ourselves.'"

* "The English Novel." By George Saintsbury. (Dent)

Photo by Alvin Langdon Coburn.

From "Men of Mark," by Alvin Langdon Coburn (Duckworth).

Granville Barker.

In such glimpses and provocations Professor Saintsbury's pages abound. Of Frances Sheridan's "Memoirs of Miss Sydney Biddulph" (1761) we may not have forgotten that Dr. Johnson questioned with the author, "whether she had a right, on moral principles, to make her readers suffer so much," but here we learn the nature of the heroine's ill-luck. Miss Austen's satire, in "Northanger Abbey," of the cheaply lurid imitations of Mrs. Radcliffe's romances is localised and illuminated by descriptive reference to some of these amazing works. It is here, by the way, that we find Sarah Green, a moralist of 1810, asking her contemporaries—"as has been asked about a hundred years later and was asked about a hundred years before"—"Is it not amazing that the most licentious writers of romance are women?"

But Professor Saintsbury's illustrations and citations never clog his argument, which is devoted to tracing the English novel from its sources in romance, and through its thin Elizabethan streams, until, variously deepened and freshened by Addison, Swift, and Defoe, it became strong and full in Richardson. Although Richardson's fatherhood of the English novel is a commonplace, Professor Saintsbury startles us by his reminder that the creation of the modern novel by the painter of Salisbury Court took place literally not more than two long lifetimes ago. "It is quite certain that there are now living hundreds, perhaps thousands, of persons born when others were still living who drew their first breaths in or before the year when Pamela made her modest, but very distinctly self-conscious, curtsy to the world." For before Richardson we see not the development of the novel but the development, separately, of its elements. If, before Richardson, our literature produced anything that approaches a full-bodied novel, Professor Saintsbury would unhesitatingly identify it as Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," to which he devotes several most suggestive pages. It has plot, character, description, and dialogue—pioneer dialogue. Before Bunyan, lively and life-like conversation is to seek. "Bunyan can do it as few have done it even since his time."

To follow the growth of the novel, as observed and illuminated here, were a vain endeavour. The chapter on Scott and Miss Austen to jump forward is perhaps the finest, as it is the least encumbered, in the volume. Professor Saintsbury corrects the too summary idea of Scott, now more established than ever, that he was an historical novelist only, and quotes with approval the remark of an acute French critic who said that there are many so-called "philosophical" novels which contain less keen psychology than Scott's.

The professed "Dickensian" will have to digest the following:—

"If you say that he (Dickens) cannot draw a gentleman, you are told that you are a parrot and a snob, who repeats what other snobs have told you; that gentlemen are not worth drawing; that he can draw them; and so forth. If you suggest that he is fantastic, it is reproachfully asked if poetry is not fantastic, and if you do not like poetry? If you intimate small affection for Little Nell and Little Paul, you are a brute; if you hint that his social crusades were often quite irrational, and sometimes at least as mischievous as they were beneficial, you are a parasite of aristocracy and a foe of 'the people.' If you take exception to his repetitions, his mannerisms, his tedious catch-processes of various kinds, you are a 'stop-watch critic' and worthy of all the generous wrath of the exemplary and Reverend Mr. Yorick. And yet all these assertions, objections, descriptions, are arch-true; and they can be made by persons who know Dickens and enjoy Dickens a thousand times better—who admire him in a manner a thousand times more really complimentary—than the folk who simply cry 'Great is Dickens,' and will listen to nothing but their own sweet voices."

Ardent Meredithians, also, have to deal with a critic who can fully appreciate Meredith's genius, but has no stomach for inner circles and cults. It is the first duty of a novelist to "enlist, absorb, and delight," to "let himself be read," and he finds Meredith wanting here, now and evermore: a case of genius, marred, "perhaps, by unfortunate education, certainly by undue egotism, by a certain Celtic lapage, and by a too painful and elaborate endeavour to be unlike other people."

It is curious to contrast the immense novel-reading public with the small number of those who are likely to read and study this survey of the English novel. Professor Saintsbury remarks that, for a vast number of people, "reading" simply means reading novels. He might have added that for a large proportion of these it means reading novels at the choice and recommendation of circulating library clerks, who well know that they can conserve the best novels, and their own energy, by the simple device of placing a row of second-rate volumes on the lending counter. This is lamentable, but, when all is said, criticism has not that authority in the field of fiction which it may claim elsewhere. If a man tells me he cannot read Milton I am compelled to doubt his intelligent love of poetry. If he does not relish Boswell's "Johnson," I am forced into an unfavourable opinion of his mentality. But if he tells me that he cannot abide Dickens, or Meredith, or does not want to read Smollett again, I can ask him to sit down and swap repugnances. All the more, on account of this sway of the personal equation, this haunting of fiction by Dr. Fell, is an organised and erudite survey of the English Novel welcome and corrective: this Professor Saintsbury has given us.

WILFRED WHITTEN.

A NIETZSCHE BEFORE THE FACT.*

This is a very welcome book, something of a revelation, something indeed of a portent. Whether we agree with its conclusions or not, it cannot but be read with stimulation, with searching of heart. Count Arthur de Gobineau was a Nietzschean before Nietzsche, an aristocrat of aristocrats, heretical to the democracy, of which he was the servant, heretical after the fashion of the grand heretics of the Renaissance, of whom we get so superb a revelation in the immense drama that gives its title to this volume.

Of this drama I shall here say but little, confining myself to an attempt, indirectly, to whet the appetite of the reader for his writings by rousing interest in the man and his philosophy, and confessing that, though the pen is the pen of the reviewer, the matter is boldly "lifted" from, is indeed in many cases the very text, of the able editor.

"Count Gobineau," rightly says Dr. Levy, "was one of those men, who, like mighty rocks, are only now beginning to appear above the receding waters of the nineteenth century"; one who in his day was regarded as a dreamer, but was in reality one of those rare men of robust and healthy imagination, those prophets and seers who are born before their time, and are unrecognized as such by their contemporaries; one of those columns of granite "upon which you of the New Age" (these are again Dr. Levy's words) "shall henceforth build, must build, for they alone, and not the pebbles and the sands which your forefathers thought eternal, will offer you a fitting and lasting foundation for the Palace of the Future." Fated to be a politician, and serving under de Tocqueville, that profound believer in democracies, at heart Gobineau was that apparent contradiction, a reactionary, a dreamer, and yet a man of far-reaching ideas; farsighted beyond his master, whose politics would be forgotten when his pupil's prophecies would find themselves being fulfilled. For empires vanish, but thought is immortal. He was a man, if not destined to give new blood and new beliefs to the future, destined at least to make some of us pause and think whether latter-day thought may not perhaps be leading to the everlasting bonfire, whether what we call progress may not in the end prove retrogression.

Not a mere man of letters, but a gentleman of letters, he perhaps owes the lateness of his recognition in France and England (in Germany this Frenchman is a god) to the fact that he was not given to talking overmuch of his printed offspring, by which now he stands to be judged.

* "The Renaissance [Savonarola—Cesare Borgia—Julius II.—Leo X.—Michael Angelo]." By Arthur, Count Gobineau. English Edition edited by Dr. Oscar Levy. Illustrated. 10s. net (Heinemann.)

seared in the midst of the battle which was being waged between the spiritualistic and materialistic schools of the day—the spiritualistic which considered everybody perfectible, and possibly equal to everyone else, and the materialistic, which regarded human beings as creatures of chance and environment—he had the courage to declare, in opposition to them both, that the environment scarcely mattered, that the “eternal truth”—equality—was an impotent assumption, and that everything depended upon the blood, upon the race, coming to the same conclusion as Disraeli was independently coming to—that “All is race, there is no other truth.”

For Gobineau had noticed fifty years ago what many cultured people are only now beginning to suspect—that our moral values, the values of Democracy and Socialism, even of Liberalism and Christianity, may be leading to the survival of a type of man who, if he has any right to survive, ought only to survive on an inferior plane. Let him speak for himself. “If a nation goes down,” he says, “the reason is that its blood, the race itself, is deteriorating. Now, there has only been one race that was able to create a civilization, because it alone possessed the element of order and a certain healthy imagination, and that was the white race—the Aryans,” about which, by the way, new and marvellous discoveries are but now being made in Asia. To show how refreshing a whole-hogger he is, let me quote from his essay on the Inequality of the Human Races:

“If,” he says, “there had only been Aryans on earth, humanity would have been easily and for ever perfectible. . . . But the Aryan blood, again and again rejuvenating inferior peoples, has finally exhausted itself. There is consequently nothing left in the world but half castes, cowardly and impotent people, ready to adapt themselves to any law and any master, and not minding the loss of their personality because they do not happen to possess one.”

What, then, is his solution of the difficulty, his gospel, his way out of the impasse? His answer is unmistakable, though perhaps hopeless—the Nietzschean doctrine that the world must be saved and governed by the few supermen who have persisted through the purity of their blood, and not by the mob of superficial men; that the vox populi is not the vox Dei; that union, the panacea of the weak, the gospel of the democrat, is a confession of incapability; that “the great flourishing epochs of Humanity were those when the incompetent did not crawl upon the steps of power”; that character is the thing that will tell, and that the world will only be saved by the noble men, the giants, who, realising their obligations, work out themselves, raise themselves to the highest power of good, subdue what is evil in them, stifle, or at least shelve, their worst instincts, and seize the sceptre which is being filched from them, to the destruction of Humanity, by the motley tribe of vainglorious babblers and “detestable imitations of universal degeneration.”

I have tried, inadequately enough in the short space at my command, to give some idea of the Gobineau philosophy, not by way of commendation, but by way of sending the reader to a book which no one can read without the liveliest interest, whether such interest stimulate him to antagonism or conversion. I have confined myself to a general dissertation upon the author's doctrines rather than the specific work, “The Renaissance,” of which we have here no excellent a translation, because the latter will speak for itself better than ever I can speak for it, once the reader has been induced by interest in the man to study his writings. I can only add that this is a volume of serious import, worth reading from cover to cover, a book which even a jaded reviewer closes with a sigh of regret that he has not got to read it all over again.

G. S. LAYARD.

THE INQUISITION AND TORQUEMADA.*

A more fitting title for this large volume would have been “The Inquisition and Torquemada,” because the book is chiefly an account of the rise and doings of the Inquisition, and despite Mr. Sabatini's praiseworthy and scholarly endeavour to give a living picture of Torquemada he remains abstract and shadowy. To a certain extent this is admitted by Mr. Sabatini when he says that the history of Torquemada is not so much the history of a man as of an abstract genius presiding over a gigantic and cruel engine of his own perfecting. In regard to that engine there are grim and full particulars which make it hard to bear constantly in mind the singleness of Torquemada's purpose and the fact that even the most ghastly of his devices were, in his opinion, brought to bear solely that good might be done. Descriptions of such tortures as were most popular with Torquemada and his men are, of course, not new; but Mr. Sabatini is a vitalising writer with a sharp dramatic sense; and he succeeds in giving new horror even to an account of that well-known awful engine the potro or water-torture. We read how the patient was placed head downwards on a sloping ladder, how his mouth was distended by a piece of iron, and how a long strip of linen was placed across his jaws and carried deep into his throat by the weight of water poured into his gaping mouth. As this water filtered through the cloth, the patient was subjected to all the torments of suffocation. In his struggles a little air did pass into his bursting lungs—just enough to keep him alive and conscious, but not enough to mitigate the horrible sufferings of asphyxiation, for the cloth was always wet and charged with water. Mention is also made of the torture by fire—which consisted in toasting the feet of the patient after anointing them with fat—and of victims who were made to stand with one hand nailed to an arm of a St. Andrew's Cross

* “Torquemada and the Spanish Inquisition: A History.” By Rafael Sabatini. Illustrated. 16s net. (Stanley Paul.)

Photo by Donald Macbeth.

Procession to Auto Da Fé.

From Limborch's “Historia Inquisitionis.”
From “Torquemada and the Spanish Inquisition” (Stanley Paul)

whilst sentence of death was being read to them. "As a rule, however," writes Mr. Sabatini, "both in torturing and punishing, the inquisitors avoided novelties." For "the question" they usually resorted to one of three methods—the rack, the hoist, or the water-ladder.

Typical cases tried by the Inquisition are given, and emphasis is laid on the part played by Torquemada himself. Now and again we get glimpses of the real man, but there is no telling human portrait. On certain points though, Mr. Sabatini is justifiably firm; as for instance when he tells us that whatever Torquemada's faults may have been he was perfectly consistent in them, just as he was perfectly, terribly sincere. He amassed great wealth from the confiscations that fell to his share, but that he practised his preached contempt for worldly riches seems beyond doubt. Mr. Sabatini's laborious researches do not discover that any of the wealth that accrued to Torquemada was put to any worldly uses or went in any way to benefit any member of his family. The case of his sister is cited (but obviously not as conclusive evidence) he refused to dower the lady suitably, allowing her no more than the pittance necessary to enable her to enter a convent. Torquemada himself followed a stern path of asceticism. He never ate meat, his bed was a plank, his flesh never knew the contact of linen, his garments were the white woollen habit and the black mantle of the Dominican. Dignities he might have had, but he disclaimed them. He devoted his riches entirely to what he considered to be the honour and glory of the religion which he served with such terrible zeal.

Torquemada breathed his last in his beautiful monastery of St. Thomas at Avila. "He passed away in peace," writes his dispassionate historian, "laying down the burden of life and sinking to sleep with the relief and thankfulness of the husbandman at the end of a day of diligent, arduous and conscientious toil. His honesty of purpose, his integrity, his utter devotion to the task he had taken up, are to be weighed in the balance of historic judgment against the evil that he wrought so ardently in the unflinching conviction that his work was good."

Torquemada's name has been execrated and revered at once. He has been vituperated as a fiend of cruelty, and all but worshipped as a saint. "There is bias in both judgments," concludes Mr. Sabatini "both are no better than gratifications of prejudice."

DAVID HODGE.

THAT COMEDY CALLED HISTORY.*

Dr. Dryasdust should certainly have nothing to do with the writing of history, which is far less an affair of dates, archives, and royal crownings than a comedy which sometimes soars into tragedy and frequently degenerates into farce. It has been a masque and a harlequinade, it has been many sorts of antics; it has sometimes even been dignified and serious. In these "Sidelights" Lady Blennerhassett has made study of certain picturesque aspects of human circumstance on this mad and amazing planet. She begins with the Siege of Paris by Henri Quatre in 1590, when the starvation of the people (poor wretches, they were between the devil and the deep water, the priests and the besiegers!) was such that children were chased, killed and eaten, rats and cats were devoured until none remained, and the makers of bread even endeavoured to grind the bones of the buried dead into powder for flour; and then proceeds to turn the historical kaleidoscope.

She gives us a passing study of Napoleon, emphasizing the importance of his Italian origin, his all-prevailing energy, his courage and infinite resource, his extraordinary kindness to his relatives. We have a sympathetic picture of Joshua Reynolds—there is nothing of Rossetti's "Sir Sloppity" about this portrait—uplifting the standard of art during a period of sluggishness, and with splendid industry portraying on canvas hundreds of the leading men and women of his time. With Marco Minghetti we are reminded of the war for the liberation of Italy and its unification—that unification which Cobden prophesied could never be realised. Oh, why did Richard Cobden ever prophesy; the non-fulfilment of his predictions has caused much dust of words to be showered on his devoted head! But of such is the amusement of history. Statesmen prophesy; and the gods rejoice. A consideration of Spanish literature and its influence on Europe—here is surely a department insufficiently appreciated by English publishers—is the occasion for a brief but just and happy tribute to Cervantes and his glorious Don, "the brightest and most lovable book in the literature of the world"; and then we pass to appreciations (in order other than that of her ladyship's arrangement) of the German Reinhard, who did almost as much as any man to make the France which was established on the ruins of the Revolution progressive and business-like; of Chateaubriand, whose literary ascendancy and tangled political career are helpfully explained and largely justified; of Marie Bashkirtseff, the amazing egoist, whose reputation in her own day travelled over Europe, and will probably, for some baffling, insufficient reason, prevail for years yet. She seems to have been an unpleasant young woman, though the circumstances of her birth and upbringing, rather than she, are to blame for that. The translator might note a misprint in this article. If Marie died in 1884, as we are told she did, she could hardly have been growing deaf in 1886. Then, in contrast to these luminous essays on brilliant people, we are given a bright account of Lady Dufferin's viceregal experiences in India.

We can congratulate Lady Blennerhassett on this book of varied interests. The articles contained in it were written originally for German readers, therefore in the English rendering they contain some facts and assertions to us well-known. They are, however, written with balance and an appreciation of the entertainment wrought by contrast. History, as shown by these "Sidelights," is very like a pageant in motley. Humanity has played such games in the past that there is no knowing what games and pranks it will be up to in the future. It is often—very often—beyond the scope of Dryasdust.

C. K. LAWRENCE.

NEW BOOKS AND OLD.

Whenever I go on a holiday I take plenty of books in my bag and, to provide for emergencies, arrange to have a few more sent after me. Thus I am fortified against bad weather, uncongenial company, and other misfortunes that await the pilgrim when he sojourns in strange places; for I may grow tired of walking and of talking, tired of looking at pictures and scenery, even tired sometimes of listening to music, but I never grow tired of reading, and I am so catholic and so easily entertained that it must be a very poor book indeed if I cannot read it with some sort of interest. In any event, I think that when a reader finds a book dull he should not condemn it too hastily—the dullness may be in himself; when it displeases him, it is always possible that his own sympathies may be too narrow, or his taste defective. Few readers are modest enough to realise this; therefore I am rather proud of my modesty, and cultivate it with care. I have not so many virtues that I can afford to lose one.

I am almost ashamed to say how many books I read on my latest holiday; two of them kept me indoors on days of sunshine, one held me reading when by rights I should have been asleep in bed, and none of them failed to give me some degree of pleasure. I can believe there are people who would say that "Tantalus" and "The Sale of Lady Daventry" are rather unpleasant stories, and so they are, in one sense—they are about more or less sinful, sordid and unlovable men and women, but they are written with so much ability and are so true to the phases of life they depict that you lose sight of their unpleasantness in their sheer truthfulness. In each story you have a woman selling herself to a rich husband for the sake of his wealth and those snobbish little social glories that are the fatal stars for so many moths; and in neither of them does the sorry game prove worth the candle. The cleverness and tragic power of these two novels are undeniable. In "Tantalus" it is the man whose masterful schemings end in terrible failure, though they lift him to a peerage; in "The Sale of Lady Daventry" it is the woman who, growing to love his elderly lordship, her husband, yet stoops to subtle intrigue and nameless dishonour in order to put the seal on her triumph, only to find all she has won turning to dust in her hands and bitterness in her mouth.

* "Sidelights." By Charlotte, Lady Blennerhassett. Authorised Translation by Edith Gülicher 7s. 6d. net. (Constable.)

1 "Tantalus." By the Author of "The Adventures of John Johns" 6s. (Werner Laurie.)

2 "The Sale of Lady Daventry." 6s. (Herbert Jenkins.)

Slighter in theme and pleasant in the pleasantest way is "The Flirt," by Booth Tarkington.<sup>1</sup> The story has its shadows; it walks once or twice on the verge of tragedy, but never slips over. All the members of the Madison family are admirably drawn: the placid, ordinary father and mother; the thoughtful, sympathetic elder daughter, Laura; the fascinating, wilful, irresistible younger daughter, Cora; and the natural, mischievous, tormenting son, the boy Hedrick, who delights in making inconvenient references to Cora's old suitors in the presence of a new one. For Cora is the flirt; seemingly a heartless one, till in the end she has a lesson that sends her into the arms of the man she loves, and he is not the one you had thought she preferred. It is a delightful tale, written with all the ease and sparkle and happy blend of sentiment and humour that are characteristic of Mr. Booth Tarkington's work. Like Mr. Tarkington, Miss Alice Brown is an American, and one of the most gifted of living American novelists. I like her short stories even better than her novels—which is saying a great deal—and I have not read any book of her short stories that gave me more enjoyment than I have had of her "Vanishing Points."<sup>2</sup> They are quiet tales, in the main, and it is the sentimental touch in them that is so charming; it is such a delicate touch, so charged with human feeling, so elusive and yet so effective. More robust, fuller of high colour and the melodrama of life are Richard Dehan's short stories in "The Headquarter Recruit."<sup>3</sup> These have less art than Alice Brown's, but they are ingenious, varied, and cleverly told. They are less short stories than novels in little; they are vigorously alive with incident and sensation, and make a thoroughly readable volume. Similar qualities of strong sensation and full-blooded interest mark the new romance by Rex Beach, "The Iron Trail."<sup>4</sup> Mr. Rex Beach has achieved an immense popularity in America, and is now coming rapidly into his own over here. His story, "The Barrier," has been dramatised and proved a great success on the London stage; but I think "The Iron Trail" is an abler, fresher, and even more interesting novel than "The Barrier." It is a study in character: you have for central figures two masterful men who engage in a fierce conflict of will over the laying of a new railroad through a lonely, mountainous region, and the whole story grows out of and revolves about this mighty rivalry. Into that clash of opposing interests comes a very charming love romance which gains wonderfully in charm and tenderness from the roughness and tumult of its environment. It is a realistic story of love and adventure in the actual world that lies on the skirts of our civilisation, and it is written with real imaginative power.

As interesting as any novel is M. Gastine's biography of Madame Tallien.<sup>1</sup> Here, too, is no lack of adventure and wild doings, yet, I suppose, for all the horrors that were happening in it, the Paris of the end of the eighteenth century was still in the centre of the civilised world. Madame Tallien was not the kind of woman the idealist likes to see taking a hand in any revolution or helping to shape society anywhere; but unfortunately "that in the Captain's but a choleric word which in the soldier is flat blasphemy," and it seems to be accepted that a lack of morality which would render a poor charwoman too disreputable to scrub the floors of our respectable houses, leaves the more nobly born still fit to coruscate in good society and to share in the moulding of its manners and customs. The Comtesse de Fontenay had divers love affairs before she became the wife of Jean Tallien, but it is to her credit that she subdued the harsh and hitherto merciless nature of her husband, and somewhat humanised him, and she is traditionally said to have influenced him in the bringing about of Robespierre's destruction. However much you may disapprove of her, there is no denying the interest of her story, and M. Gastine tells it fully and ably, from the excitements of the last days of the revolution to her death as Princess de Chimay in 1835.

I took away with me in my bag, too, a couple of Messrs. Sherratt and Hughes's pamphlets,<sup>2</sup> one containing a reprint of Mr. Tinsley Pratt's excellent article, from the Manchester Quarterly, on Allan Ramsay and Robert

<sup>1</sup> "Madame Tallien" By L. Gastine. Translated from the French by J. Lewis May. With seventeen illustrations. 12s. 6d. net. (John Lane.)

<sup>2</sup> "Two Scottish Poets: Ramsay and Fergusson," and "Admiral Benbow" By Tinsley Pratt. 6d. net each. (Sherratt & Hughes.)

Madame Tallien.

From a portrait by Gérard in the Musée Carnavalet.
From "Madame Tallien" (John Lane.)

<sup>1</sup> "The Flirt." By Booth Tarkington. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

<sup>2</sup> "Vanishing Points." By Alice Brown. 6s. (Constable.)

<sup>3</sup> "The Headquarter Recruit." By Richard Dehan. 6s. (Heinemann.)

<sup>4</sup> "The Iron Trail." By Rex Beach. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Pergumson, and the other a stirring broadside ballad by the same author—"Admiral Benbow." This last recaptures all the stark simplicity and rugged forcefulness of the old broadsides, and tells of one of Benbow's great fights with the French fleet when the captains of his other ships deserted him, and tells of it in the vivid, downright sailor fashion that carried the ancient broadsides straight to the popular heart. Another book of verse I had with me was Mr. J. C. Squire's "The Three Hills." We know Mr. Squire best for those brilliant parodies that he collected into his recent volume, "Steps to Parnassus," but he has a very graceful and delicate gift in this more serious vein. I like especially of these poems his "Florian's Song," the somewhat sombre "Town," and the lines beginning:

"When London was a little town
Lean by the river's margin,
The poet paced it with a frown,
He thought it very large"

There is the true thing in many of Mr. Squire's poems: they have qualities of thought, fancy, and varied melody, and the individual note that sounds through them all is a welcome thing in these days, when so many of our poets are so very derivative.

In addition, I was provided with four new editions of older works that I knew I should re-read with undiminished delight. One was Butler's "Alps and Sanctuaries"—a unique travel book, in which Butler's wit, wisdom and whimsicality, and his vivid descriptive powers, find freest play; two were those most fascinating of anthologies, Mr. A. H. Bullen's "Lyrics from Elizabethan Song-Books," and "Lyrics from the Dramatists of the Elizabethan Age," now re-issued by Messrs Sidgwick and Jackson in their dainty Pocket-Book series; and the fourth was the sumptuous new edition, in two volumes, of the Poetical Works of William Drummond of Hawthornden, edited by Professor L. E. Kastner. In an ample and scholarly introduction Mr. Kastner gives us a sufficient biography of Drummond and a careful and critical estimate of his poetry. He traces Drummond's indebtedness to the poets of France and Italy, and convicts him of conveying many of his ideas and thoughts from them and of "transplanting" some of his finest phrases from Sidney and Shakespeare, but confesses that "our researches, however, have not corroborated the suspicion we once entertained that a large number of the striking lines in his poems were stolen property, and that he had systematically, pen in hand, ransacked his favourite poets, jotting down the finest verses for incorporation in his own poetry." No poet, and Drummond was one, could write in that fashion anything much that mattered. His borrowings have gone, for the most part, into the uninspired poems that make up the major quantity of his work. Drummond lives, and will go on living, by virtue of less than a dozen of his sonnets, and these are among the great sonnets in the language.

"I know that all beneath the moon decays"
"Ah, burning Thoughts, now let me take some rest"
"Fair is my Yoke, though grievous be my Pains"
"Sleep, Silence Child, sweet Father of soft Rest"
"Fair Moon who with thy Cold and Silver Shine"
"In vain I haunt the cold and silver Springs"
"Dear Quinster who from these Shadows sends"

These and one or two other sonnets are Drummond's slender passport to immortality, but they are sufficient. Only the student will read the rest of his poetry any more, and to the student these two handsome volumes are indispensable. They give the text from the original editions,

"The Three Hills, and other Poems" By J. C. Squire. 2s. net. (Howard Latimer.)

"Alps and Sanctuaries of Piedmont and the Canton Ticino," By Samuel Butler. With extra chapter and Author's latest revisions, additions and index, and eighty-three illustrations, chiefly by the Author. Edited with Introduction by R. A. Streatfield. 5s. net. (A. C. Fifield.)

"Lyrics from the Elizabethan Song-Books," and "Lyrics from the Dramatists of the Elizabethan Age" Edited by A. H. Bullen. 2s. 6d. net each. (Sidgwick & Jackson.)

"The Poetical Works of William Drummond of Hawthornden." Edited by L. E. Kastner. 2 vols. 21s. net. (Sherratt & Hughes.)

with complete notes of all the variants, and to ensure greater accuracy the Hawthornden Manuscripts have been carefully re-examined. The illustrations include facsimiles of the title pages of many early issues of Drummond's poems, all the authentic portraits of Drummond, one hitherto unpublished, and others that are doubtful. It is a curious slip in the Introduction to say: "Among modern critics the appreciation of Charles Lamb, mainly because of the eminence of the author, deserves attention: 'The sweetest names, and which carry a perfume in the mention, are Kit Marlowe, Drayton, Drummond of Hawthornden, and Cowley.' The Laird of Hawthornden is here in good company, and the English essayist cannot be accused of meting out praise with a grudging hand." For in this passage, which occurs in his "Detached Thoughts on Books and Reading," Lamb is not praising anyone's poetry, he is merely speaking of the magic that resides in the sound of certain names. Reference is made to the admiration of Southey, Hallam, Masson, and Mr. W. C. Ward for Drummond's genius, but Hazlitt's fine praise of it should not have been overlooked. This, however, is of no great moment; what matters is that here we have the most exhaustive, the literally complete edition of Drummond. Professor Kastner has done his work ably, conscientiously, and so thoroughly that nothing remains to do, and this henceforth will count as the standard and authoritative edition of Drummond's poetry. A.

FIVE NOVELISTS. LIMITED.*

Any book is a good book which achieves within its prescribed limits the effect it has aimed at. Thus, the mere sensation-monger is successful just in so far as his story is genuinely sensational. But sensationalism in a novel of manners, or any attempts at high comedy in a sensational novel, however well done, are out of place and therefore bad. An out-and-out shocker, with no pretensions to literary grace, so long as it really shocks, is a better work of art than the most elaborately-wrought and delicately-finished romance that lacks the true romantic inspiration. I have read Family Herald Supplements that were, in their way, better things as literature than (say) "Evan Harrington," simply because they were written throughout in one key and exactly fulfilled their purpose from beginning to end. And this is perhaps the hardest lesson the neophyte has to learn: this lesson of consistency, as well in manner as in matter.

Now these five novels that I have lately been reading are all of them written by old hands, authors who should long since have mastered their technique. And four of them have mastered their technique, I think. Of the fifth it is impossible to say anything favourable. It would be easier, as it would be pleasanter, to say nothing at all, if silence were not sometimes a terrible liar. As it is I must express my amazement that any writer of any experience should have given us such a book as "The Lodger." It is a book about that homicidal maniac whose crimes horrified the world some twenty-five years ago and who was unpopularly known as "Jack the Ripper." Such a book might have been a great book. In the hands of a genius—and only a genius could deal adequately with such a theme—it might have taken rank with "Les Misérables" or "The Kreutzer Sonata": strong meat, not food for babes, but nevertheless a masterpiece. Instead it is a crude, coarse book, crude and coarse alike in conception and in execution, ill-written and ill-balanced. One can hardly think of a literary fault that it does not exhibit. It is devoid of force, colour, poignancy. The publishers claim for Mrs. Lowndes a "mastery of the art of thrilling... humour."

* "The Lodger." By Mrs. Belloc Lowndes. (Methuen.) 6s. —"The Watered Garden." By Maud Stepney Rawson. (Stanley Paul.) 6s. —"The Way of Ambition." By Robert Hichens. (Methuen.) 6s. —"The Devil's Garden." By W. B. Maxwell. (Hutchinson.) 6s. —"The White Thread." By Robert Halford. (Methuen.) 6s.

... observation of human nature ... a pretty love interest." But the book does not thrill, and it is utterly without humour. As to its observation of human nature: it is supposed to describe certain average Cockneys, but anything less like the Cockney dialect than that spoken by these impossible people I have never seen in print. And the love interest, such as it is, is not in the least pretty but baldly commonplace. But enough. The book will doubtless justify itself by having a large sale. I am glad it is not likely to be censored—as it should be—and so obtain a larger sale.

To turn from this to such an exquisite comedy as "The Watered Garden" is to feel almost as if you had passed out of a reeking butcher's shop into the cool sweet air of a bright spring morning. One has to congratulate Mrs. Stepney Rawson on a very fine novel of manners. There is something of the art, without any of the artifice, of Henry James in this smoothly-flowing story—which yet ripples with humour and sparkles with wit. It is the story of a garden and an ambitious quarterly and polite love-affairs and acroplanes and beautiful stones from Italy. It tells of real people: the kind of men and women we know, who live next door, whom we meet at our friends' houses. They are noble and ignoble, weak and strong, amusing and—no, never boresome, lovable and detestable, everything that we ourselves are, that all average, decent-living folk are. This is the first book of Mrs. Rawson's I have read; it most certainly will not be the last.

The other three novelists with whom it has been my pleasure to renew acquaintance are old friends.

I have followed (as the saying is) Mr. Robert Hichens from the days of his audacious "Green Carnation," through "Flames"—which was a poor thing, but redeemed from utter failure by that consummate study of fallen womanhood, Cuckoo Bright—into the rather unhealthy atmosphere of "The Woman with the Fan," and others, and out again into the blinding "Garden of Allah," unto this last, "The Way of Ambition," which is perhaps Mr. Hichens' best. Mr. Hichens is sufficiently well-established now to write about the things that interest him most, and clever enough to make them interesting to a public that normally is not really interested in them to any feverish extent, at any rate. So, his story tells of a great composer who was belittled by his wife's vulgar craving after notoriety. For "ambition" is almost too fine a word to apply to the mean longings of a Charman Mansfield. We are shown how a young, austere genius, living alone and aloof from the world, consecrate and dedicate to his ideals, falls a victim to an impulse, marries a woman he does not love, and is by her beguiled into prostituting his great gift of music to the low level of fashionable acclaim. And, as always happens to those who eschew the higher for the lower things of life and would barter their souls for a price, he fails even of the poor reward for which he sold himself. Incidentally the author depicts for our delight a variety of modern types, obviously studied at first-hand and drawn from the many small worlds-within-worlds that go to make up the Society world. All these people are very much alive with the peculiarly artificial liveliness characteristic of their class. But there are others—notably Madame Sennier, wife of a successful composer of grand opera, Armand Gillier, the violent, underbred, half-bred author of one sublime libretto, and the Yankee impresario, Crayford, in whom one glimpses the rich red blood and feels the heat of smouldering fires. In this book there are none of those filmy figures that drift like shadows through the pages of some of Mr. Hichens' other books, seeming to be nothing but a drawl and an eyeglass or a painted face and a languorous perfume. It would seem as if Mr. Hichens had made up his mind this time to have done with affectations, his own as well as his characters', and get at the elementals of human nature. He has succeeded, in a book which, within its rather narrow limits, is a very good book.

There is Mr. B. Maxwell. I have also "followed" from the days of his character novellette "Vivien," with which he scored his first success.

I know his work well and like it. I like it for its conscientiousness. Mr. Maxwell is never in a hurry, never slovenly, never banal. He has a sense of tragedy which only his lamentable lack of humour prevents him from expressing in more epic form. His theme is usually too big for his powers. He wants that opulence of imagination and breadth of outlook which would dignify and ennoble such really splendid stories as he always has to tell. In this his latest book for example, he comes perilously near to failure because of his poverty of invention. And toward the end after hovering precariously on the brink all through he tumbles headlong into the abyss of melodrama. Nevertheless 'The Devil's Garden' is a considerable achievement and judged by any but the highest standards would be worthy of much praise. Mr. Maxwell has only his own heavy-handedness to blame for his quite justifiable banning by the librarians.

Mr. W. B. Maxwell.

Photo by Elsie & Fry.

Mr. Robert Hichens.

Of a former book by Mr. Robert Halifax which I reviewed in these columns about a year ago I said that it rather failed of authenticity, but that the author would very likely astonish us all some day as he certainly seemed to have the root of the matter in him. I am pleased to be able to say now that in his new novel 'The White Thread,' Mr. Halifax has done much to justify my high hopes of his future. This is a better book than 'A Slice of Life,' because it is more coherent and more probable. Its parts adhere more closely together and there is a more sure effect of inevitableness in the movement and firm and clear. The Cockney dialect is very cleverly managed indeed, being not too meticulously phonetic, and yet achieving verisimilitude. There is, perhaps, a little too much talk all the characters talk at inordinate length; but, after all, it is good talk, packed with wit and humour and a genial philosophy. And there is one delicious episode in which a sort of unlicensed pawnbroker is hoist with his own petard, which is imitatively done. The character of this sort of unlicensed pawnbroker, by the way, suggests another reflection in regard to Mr. Halifax's art. His people are all very human mixtures of good and bad. Bob Kingdom, in particular, is the sort of man who keeps you wondering all the time whether he is mostly rogue, fool, or saint, and finally leaves you—as people do leave you in real life—still wondering. Altogether a very creditable book, and withal an entertaining book, even though it has for its central motif so ghastly a theme as hereditary insanity.

EDWIN PUGH.

A POET IN THE MAKING.*

No volume of this handy little series has a better justification for its appearance than Dr. Chase's monograph on Poe. Although in his later life when he had got a firm grip on his works, Poe's poetry was wrought by rule and its spontaneity curbed by technicality, in his younger days he resigned himself to his impulses and wrote as he felt. A poet who sings what he feels naturally betrays or confesses his mental history. Dr. Chase is, therefore, justified in drawing many of his quotations from Poe's juvenile and less-known verse, as representative of the man. Poe's boyish and too much neglected 'Al Aaraaf' not only contains some of its author's finest lyrical work but is replete with autobiographical revelation so it is fitting that Dr. Chase should make good use of it. But no reason is given for ignoring 'Politian' in which some of its author's prominent idiosyncrasies are displayed. Monsieur Hughes, in his translation of this drama has pointed out how, comme tous les grands écrivains Poe prête aux personnages qu'il met en scène ses sensations et ses sentiments personnels and numerous passages might be quoted in confirmation of the assertion.

Although his poetry may throw sidelights upon a man's mental story, other documentary evidence is needed to fill up the gaps in biography and then his correspondence is the best testimony available. Robert Browning has said "Letters and poems may be used indifferently as the basement of our opinion upon the writer's character" both being acts of the same mind and supplementary to one another. Dr. Chase for his part gives but slight extracts from Poe's correspondence in some cases perhaps deterred by copyright limitations but there seems to be no reason why he should not have availed himself more largely of the poet's letters to F. W. Thomas as they furnish a view of their writer's nature quite unknown to the general reader. In their unshackled language Poe divests himself of the mysterious melancholia he donned of purpose when addressing his public and displays himself as an almost conventional man of the world as a genial friend, as fond of domestic life and as a natural hard-working man of letters. Of course, during the greater part of his life, Poe had to endure more than man's usual share of trouble and sorrow, but when he was in the society of congenial spirits, he could shake off, or rather forget to assume the character of a 'lost soul' and be as realistic and unaffected as his neighbours. Like Byron and other sons of song, he was wont to hide his natural disposition under a mask of romantic sadness such things being part of the poet's trappings.

For a work on Poe's mental and physical career, 'Marginalia' is invaluable, yet, outside French literature, no one appears to have made use of this rich storehouse of philosophical thought. It has not been used for French, yet 'Marginalia' supplies an index to many of the complicated problems of its author's mind.

* 'Poe and his Poetry' By Lewis N. Clark
'Poetry and Life' Series is net (Harrap)

Mr. Robert Halifax.

development of the story. It is a book with a purpose a purpose which may best be defined perhaps in these words quoted from a Blue Book by an incidental character in the story, 'Dr. Dempsey.' It is an admitted fact that, considering the population of London relatively there is more drink crime and inherited lunacy as a direct consequence of the former than in any city in the civilized world. And the doctor adds 'Keeping to the London figures alone we find that sixty six per cent. or two thirds of its lunacy is due to heredity. And the tainting process goes on unchecked. That is to say that slowly but surely, the mental cancer is permeating and absorbing the whole of society. You may trace it as you trace the wavering white thread in a block of mushroom spawn. And you can break the block scarcely anywhere without finding the thread. In short the book is in passing an indictment of our present Lunacy Laws which allow a person after he has been certified as insane and confined in an asylum, to re-enter the outside world again marry or renew marital relations, and so help to bring children into the world who are almost sure to be mentally deficient. But apart from this—I might almost say in spite of this Mr. Halifax's book is a piece of literature. The character-drawing is Unlike so many of Poe's critics, Dr Chase evinces a desire to do justice to the poet's character, and frequently cites evidence in his favour, yet in too many instances, trusting to tainted testimony and malicious libels, he makes assertions which must jar upon the feelings of Poe's admirers. In one page he acknowledges that "Poe in daily routine was of simple, childlike habits and tastes, living for months at a time with apparent contentment upon frugal fare. He was never an habitual drunkard, but rather a regular abstainer with irregular lapses." In other parts of his works, in reliance upon fabricated statements, he tries to prove that the poet, whilst a boy at Charlottesville, "drank in gulps to get the effect, with as little of the taste as possible—a habit he kept up through life", and again, referring to his career at West Point Military Academy, he refers to Poe smuggling liquor to his rooms, "probably with the attendant consequence of drinking to excess more frequently than heretofore." This is not the time or place for an analysis of such refutable legends, but the matter should not be passed by without a protest.

There are other more easily preventable errors into which the author has fallen. Poems are placed out of chronological order which somewhat disturbs the continuity of the story. Statements are attributed to Poe which he never made, and the ascription to Mrs. Whitman at p. 73, of a remark made by Mrs. Osgood has a ludicrous air for those acquainted with the facts of the case. These matters, however, will not trouble the generality of Dr Chase's readers, who will welcome the interesting, portable little volume with its many new incidents and wealth of poetic quotations, although it is a pity the latter should include the conventional lines "Gratitude" which are not by Poe notwithstanding positive assertions to the contrary. The raison d'être of the book is truly summed up in its author's last words. Taken for all in all no nineteenth-century man of letters using English as his medium has influenced so extensively the technique of succeeding writers.

JOHN H. INGRAM

PERCEVAL GIBBONS SHORT STORIES.*

So far, Mr. Perceval Gibbon has put his strongest work into his short stories and the fifteen in "The Second-Class Passenger" include some of the ablest he has ever written, but we are still waiting for the big novel we are convinced he has it in him to write. "Salvator" was good, "Margaret Harding" was better, but they did not equal the grim power of "Souls in Bondage", and did not satisfy anyone who has followed Mr. Gibbon's career and judges of what he can do by what he has done. He has travelled and seen much of life in familiar and in strange places; he has imagination and insight; he has studied human character and has a subtle skill in portraying it; he has a vigorous, picturesque style and such an instinct for the value of words that he never wastes nor misplaces any. He has all the equipment of the great artist, and proves himself one in the writing of these miniatures, it is the very force and brilliance and narrative cunning that have gone to the making of these which make one think that he has gifts which will carry him beyond anything he has yet achieved, high as those achievements are.

There are plenty of stories that are interesting but not art, there was never an artistic story that was not interesting, for the triumph of the highest and rarest arts in this kind is that it subdues the reader to its spell and holds him absorbed. And Mr. Gibbon's stories are no lies in amber, no merely dead things preserved in an exquisite style, they are poignantly human, intensely alive—they are vividly real stories of vividly real men and women. There is rarely much of a plot in them; they are studies of character and temperament and are fashioned out of such incidents as make up actual though perhaps not common life.

* "The Second-Class Passenger" By Perceval Gibbon (Methuen.)

THE BOOKMAN

Mr. Perceval Gibbon.

Take the one that gives its title to the book. Miss Paterson had bought a little Japanese idol in Mozambique and had entrusted it to Dawson who left it behind at the hotel. She is so disappointed that Dawson undertakes to go back for it and return in time to catch the boat. He goes, and strays into adventures that are not only exciting and thrilling in themselves but serve to bring out for the interval, a primitive underside of Dawson's character. And the manner of its telling delights you no less than the tale that is told. Read this description of how Dawson thinking to take a short cut loses himself that dark night in the filth-choked unlighted alleys of Mozambique.

Ten minutes sufficed to overwhelm him in an intricacy of blind ways. He groped by a wall to a turning, fired cautiously to pass it, found a blank wall opposite him, and was lost. His sense of direction left him, and he had no longer any idea of where the street lay and where the sea. He floundered in gross darkness, inept and persistent. It took some time, many turnings, and a tumble in the mud to convince him he was lost. And then the rain came down in earnest.

It roared, it pelted, it stamped on him. It was not rain, as he knew it; it was a cascade, a vehement and malignant assault by all the wetness in heaven. It whipped, it stung, it thrashed; he was drenched in a moment as though by a trick. He could see nothing but groped blind and frightened under it, feeling along the wall with one hand still carrying the bronze image by the head with the other. Once he dropped it, and would have left it but with an impulse like an effort of self-respect he searched for it, groping elbow deep in the slush and water, found it and stumbled on. Another corner prevented itself; he came round it and almost at once a light showed itself. It was a slit of brightness below a door, and without a question the drenched and bewildered Dawson lifted the image and hammered on the door with it.

That in its way, is the perfection of realism, and the bizarre incidents that happen in the house and after Dawson and the woman have fled from it are as curiously in keeping with the wild night and the strange place as the quiet, casually natural ending of it all is true to the character of Dawson and the ordinary way life has of doing things. I shall not say that "The Second-Class Passenger" is the best story in the volume only because "The Trader of Last Notch," "The Sense of Climax," "The Murderer," "The Poor in Heart" are equally good in widely different sorts, it is sufficient to say not in any moment of enthusiasm but deliberately, that except Kipling no living master of the short story touches a higher level than Mr. Gibbon maintains in this collection.

C. W.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF "HAMLET."*

More than one acute critic has attempted to sum up in a single phrase the problem of "Hamlet." One thinks of Goethe's "the effects of a great action laid upon a soul unfit for the performance of it"; of what Coleridge, Schlegel, Hazlitt, Lowell, Raleigh, Lee and Bradley have had to say. It is mainly on the lines followed by such commentators as these, and in the light of recent developments in psychology, that Mr Trench has written this absorbing, brilliant, if in some respects debatable, study. He has nothing to do with "origins," with Saxo Grammaticus, François de Belleforest, or Thomas Kyd. Textual criticism concerns him—incidentally, not as it concerns the philologists so sternly castigated by Professor Churton Collins. He is not to be confounded with those satirised in the lines of Young:

"Commentators each dark passage scan,
And hold their farthing candles to the sun"

It is the psychology that interests him; he only alludes to textual matters when he thinks the meaning of the author has been missed or misinterpreted. And the psychology is more intimate than comparative, though there is a comparison between Gertrude and Catharine of Aragon, also a curious reference to a King Akhnaton, who flourished in Egypt in the 14th century B.C.; and Hamlet is conceived as a possible collaborator with old Robert Burton in the compilation of "The Anatomy of Melancholy." Again and again Mr. Trench implores the reader to keep the text before him: "No right understanding of Hamlet will be attained," he says, "without first forgetting much of modern criticism and resolving to meditate afresh upon the text." Again, "The text is unexhausted; its content is vast; for just one thing more immeasurable there is than the heart of Hamlet, and that is the heart of his creator, Shakespeare." He holds that no intellect is alert enough to follow all the meaning except by study of the actual words. Shakespeare's dramatic effect is another thing than histrionic effect; and Shakespeare has little regard to the mere intellectual convenience of the spectator. A forgotten critic—Kames—hit appositely on the reason of Shakespeare's pre-eminence when he drew attention to the fact that where others have described passion Shakespeare shows it in action. Kames held, as Mr. Trench holds, that Shakespeare is not so much writing about a character as himself impersonating a character, and that the poet's beauties cannot be truly relished but by those who dive deep into human nature. In one of his most illuminating passages Lowell declared that, "Praise art as we will, that which the artist did not mean to put into his work, but which found itself there by some generous process of Nature of which he was as unaware as the blue river is of the rhyme with the blue sky, has somewhat in it that snatches us into sympathy with higher things than those which come by plot and observation." And on the point where Mr. Trench differs from Lowell, that of Hamlet's sanity, the latter really comes near the earlier commentator when he says, apropos to the weakening of will under the stress of circumstances being a form of insanity, "I can suppose someone asking, 'Do you mean to say that Shakespeare meant all this?' The answer is No; but I mean to say that what Shakespeare has written means all this." Mr. Trench throws considerable light on the relations between characterisation and plot construction. He believes Shakespeare agreed that the principles governing art are the same as those governing life. He analyses the plot arrangement, and contends that Act III. should end with our Act IV. sc. ii., on the ground that Act III. sc. iii.-iv. are the central scenes. He writes impressively of Shakespeare's irony, and no less thoughtfully of Shakespeare's benignity. He shows how Ophelia in describing Hamlet is actually describing herself; he makes acute comments on Gertrude's fear of both Hamlet and Laertes; he devotes much attention to the sub-play, and, by way of contrast to other critics, he does not hesitate to suggest that Shakespeare has given enough material to expand into a new play—"Hamlet" with the Prince of Denmark almost left out, and the Ghost altogether left out." But the book is more than all provocative of thought and discussion in its meticulous analysis of Hamlet's mental processes. It makes one echo the author's "we may not feel very sure what it is that constitutes sanity." Indirectly Mr. Trench's volume reminds us that if man has no heredity of knowledge individually, heredity of knowledge belongs to man collectively; and the light gathered by individual students in varied walks of learning is preserved for the ultimate illumination of Truth.

* "Shakespeare's 'Hamlet': A New Commentary. With a Chapter on First Principles." By Wilbraham Fitzjohn Trench, M.A. (Dublin), Late Professor of English Literature in the National University of Ireland. 6s. net. (Smith, Elder.)

W. F. A.

INCARNATION OF ATTORNEYISM.*

"Incarnation of Attorneyism!"—thus Carlyle sums up against Fouquier-Tinville, finding him with more hatred than accuracy "rat-eyed" and "ferret-visaged." Restless and attentive eyes they were, M. Dunoyer notes in his admirably clear account of Fouquier, and the glance "dark and oblique, so fixed that others could not hold out against it." At bottom, Carlyle was right in dwelling with emphasis on the attorneyism of this terrible instrument of the Terror. "An arbitrary, violent man, ill at ease within the narrow limits of a tribunal. A despotic character." Yes, but the strain of work night and day, often only three hours sleep, after the law of the 22nd of Prairial, would have made any man in his place arbitrary and violent.

"He had the education, all the education and habits of a lawyer, of a procurator, of a man brought up and trained in legal chicanery and procedure.

"He wanted to win his cases at whatever cost. He confused his part as Public Prosecutor with his old quibbling habits. He wanted to win his cases, and he won them all with a high hand during the Terror and until the 9th of Thermidor. But he lost one case, his own, and that in spite of a vehement defence, full of talent, in which he confronted an entire Government."

Thus M. Dunoyer. And what did this vehement defence amount to? "I was the agent of the Committees of Government. What else could I have done than what I did?" Fouquier's only defence, M. Dunoyer rightly says, is in those words. As agent of the Revolutionary Committees he drew the indictment against Marie Antoinette, hastened the deaths of Danton and the Dantonists (and this despite the fact that it was to Camille Desmoulins, a distant relative, that Fouquier appealed, humbly enough, in 1792 for some post under Danton, then Minister of Justice), was equally in earnest for the execution of Robespierre, Saint Just, Couthon and the other victims of the 9th of Thermidor, and had sent to the guillotine a long line of men and women, old and young, and of all ranks and professions. "And on the 14th of Thermidor he was preparing to be Public Prosecutor under the Thermidorian faction." If he had lived and kept his place, he would have been a diligent Public Prosecutor under the Directory, and he would willingly have made an Imperial Procurator under Napoleon. Others so survived and held office. Notably Barras, Tallien, and Sieyès. But Fouquier was not to escape. "Public vengeance was waiting for him. Too much blood had been shed." By his own indictments was Fouquier condemned. And by investigation of these indictments, carefully preserved in the National Archives in Paris, can we learn the truth of Fouquier's passionate haste for the death sentence, and his willingness to see conspirators and counter-revolutionists—fit only for the guillotine—in the simplest offenders. We may learn, too, that Fouquier could show pity and have mercy at times, and that he loved his wife. The book has all the high excellence of the French historian. The illustrations are well reproduced. The translation has been done with the skill and careful accuracy that Mr. Evans has so often displayed.

JOSEPH CLAYTON.

* "The Public Prosecutor of the Terror: Antoine Quentin Fouquier-Tinville." Translated from the French of Alphonse Dunoyer by A. W. Evans. 12s. 6d. net. (Herbert Jenkins.)

Fouquier-Tinville.

From "The Public Prosecutor of the Terro-
French of Alphonse Dunoyer by A. W. I.

(adapted from the Robert Jenkins)

GEORGE DU MAURIER.*

When du Maurier turned novelist at sixty years of age he wrote his autobiography in "Peter Ibbetson," in "Trilby," and "The Martian." "Peter Ibbetson" used to dream of an old château "dim and indistinct, as though seen by near-sighted eyes at the close of a grey misty afternoon in late autumn through a blurred window pane, with busy but silent shadows moving about." It was the Château le Maurier that "Peter Ibbetson" saw in his fantastic dreams, a château built in the fifteenth century and standing still; and the shades were the ancestors of George du Maurier who dwelt once upon a time in Maine and Anjou, and who belonged to a small provincial nobility, but were concerned with an industry too. This was glass-blowing, an art as well as an industry and one considered to be a monopoly of the well-born, we are informed. George du Maurier's grandfather was the last of the race described as Gentilhomme Verrier, and in the troubled times of the French Revolution when monopolies were swept away he was obliged to take refuge in England. His descendants were not wholly English, and George du Maurier was born in Paris in 1834. "Du Maurier says fellows write to him 'de Maurier,'" says a colleague of the artist on "Punch" in later years; "'give the devil his du.'"

Du Maurier received his due. He only knew ups and downs in life while he was yet too young to have entered upon his real career; and when he found himself he found prosperity also. His father started him in life as a mining engineer and the business came to nothing, so that at the time of his father's death George du Maurier was very poor, very dull, and very miserable. But he was only twenty-two years old and free to follow his own bent and join the elect company in those Paris studios he was to write about so jovially in the after years.

Nowadays, we understand, there is no Quartier Latin left; even the Boul' Miché is changed and later studios of Montparnasse are now no more; so the Paris of "Trilby" must be a matter of ancient history indeed. Du Maurier:

* "George du Maurier." By T. Martin Wood. 7s. 6d. net. (Chatto & Windus.)

was already successful in London in 1863 when he married "on his prospects," that were so good and so comfortably realised he never knew financial trouble more. We are all familiar with his success as an author finally, and can recall the great "boom" of "Trilby."

The secrets of his popularity and his success are discussed by his present biographer in a critical essay so able, that one regrets the occasional intrusion of generalities that are not felicitous about the Victorian Age.

We know that Mesopotamia was a blessed word, but there are words not blessed; as suburban, for instance, a word to be highly suspect; and pedestrian, that somehow savours of affectation; and Victorian, that too often induces us to expect something feeble will be said, and something shallow.

It is significant that some of du Maurier's best work was done in his early illustrations of Mrs. Gaskell's book, "Wives and Daughters"; for this was described on the title-page as an everyday story, and when du Maurier had portrayed Mrs. Gibson, and Cynthia and Molly, he went on to depict other characters in a great story of everyday life which he unfolded in the now historic pages of "Punch." Week by week, as what his biographer aptly terms "The Tale of the House," appeared in "Punch," du Maurier captured our affections with his charming pictures of childhood, and was always genial in his satire. There was no bitterness in the inventions of Sir Gorgias Midas and the mimitable Mrs. Ponsonby de Tompkins.

The style was indeed the man. In du Maurier's life there was a tragic element, for he was threatened with blindness, and this apprehension always in the background might have poisoned the artist's well of happiness; but as his biographer admirably says:

"It was noticed of Charles Lamb that the very fact of preserving the little pleasures of everyday life only under a lease which Fate at any moment might refuse to renew, caused him to be the very poet of such pleasures, experiencing them with an acuteness that became to him an inspiration. Du Maurier had the genius for keeping tragedy at bay, for enduring such a dark cloud without claiming pity."

And perhaps he was endeared to us for this simple reason that he found the common daylight sweet, and never faltered at what Robert Louis Stevenson calls "Life's great task of Happiness."

F. L. PHILLIPS

ON THE ADRIATIC.*

There is hardly any point of contact between these books, except that both of them are concerned with towns upon or near the Adriatic. In the monumental works of Mr. Jackson, R.A., we have been given a complete and very satisfying architectural survey of the Austrian and Italian shores. Now we have Mr. Hutton devoting himself to one town, while Mr. Goldring touches on many. Mr. Hutton is serious, as befits Ravenna, he is deep in the lore of that wonderful place, and it must be acknowledged that his manner of writing is, even to the least antiquarian among us, a more charming manner than is the less serious method of Mr. Goldring. But the books are so utterly unlike that it is inartistic, it is too natural that we should let them be spoken of in one breath. Except in the hands of a master, the psychology of A and B, who jostle on another in Piccadilly, is not to be described, although a lesser master may be capable of doing justice to either one of these or the other, and it requires a very great master adequately to compare the two. And if we could make this claim for ourselves we should not shrink from comparing the student who is Edward Hutton with the butterfly who is Douglas Goldring.

When the writer of a book knows everything that is to be known about his subject, then the critic must confine himself to the tracking out of slips or printer's errors, or he may adopt the attitude which he has often been reminded is the proper attitude of critics. He may applaud. It seems as if with Mr. Hutton he need have no compunction.

* "Ravenna. A Study." By Edward Hutton. 10s. 6d. net. (Dent.)—"Dream Cities." By Douglas Goldring. 8s. 6d. net. (Unwin.)

in playing this part. From the earliest times, and through the long years of her moving history, Mr. Hutton has recorded, in very appropriate language, the tale of Ravenna, whose decaying and imperishable splendour is the very theme for such a pen. If it be urged that he devotes too much space to ancient history, he may reply that Ravenna is not as many other ancient towns; owing to her geographical situation and other causes she has remained a portion of those ages. All books should be a labour of love to their writers, and it is not open to doubt but that this has been the case with Mr. Hutton. And in his various volumes on Italian towns we cannot think of any place which is more fitted for his pen.

Montenegro has been of late very much in the public eye, and Mr. Goldring gives a good description of the little capital. He is a very subjective traveller, which is rather perilous: we shall either be enchanted or impatient. The amorous episodes do not rival those of Sterne; we should advise Mr. Goldring to omit them from his next book. Sometimes, as at Budua, he brings out well the character of the place, which is so romantic as to seem artificial. But we do not care for the analysis of all the personages whom Mr. Goldring met. The old Englishman of Antivari will doubtless still be there, but why does Mr. Goldring say that we have no Minister at Cetinje? The most courteous gentleman who now holds that office was there at the time of Mr. Goldring's visit, and a good deal of his day was being spent, in company of an English architect, on the scaffolding of the Legation which is being built. "We have that intense dislike of each other's peculiarities," says the author, "which is one of the great charms of friendship," and we hope that in his next book he will write more in this strain and not refer quite so much to his own lackadaisical methods. He has it in him, we are sure, to write a good book of travels.

II. B.

SOME AUTUMN NOVELISTS.

SIR A. CONAN DOYLE

"The Poison Belt." 3s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton)

Not even in "The Lost World" did Sir A. Conan Doyle write with such imaginative daring or with a more cunning command of the weird, the mysterious, and the terrible, than he writes in "The Poison Belt." Here you have "The Lost World's" little group: Professor Challenger, Professor Summerlee, Lord John Roxton, and the journalist of the Daily Gazette, with the addition of Challenger's wife, brought together in Challenger's house to make a last desperate fight for life against the deadly effects of a poison belt of ether, that has closed around the world and is death to all who breathe it. Foreseeing the general spread of this devastating force from the first manifestations of it, Challenger gathers those friends of his under his roof, and in an air-tight room, well supplied with tubes of oxygen, he makes all preparations to hold out until this fateful belt of evil atmosphere shall dissipate and pass.

They see for themselves the beginnings of this dreadful plague; and after they are shut up in readiness to resist its effects they have news over the telephone from terrified people in London of its awful progress, till at length towns and cities are desolate, the streets strewn and the houses filled with dead, and it looks as if all the world is to be depopulated. The whole narrative is unfolded with a minute, matter-of-fact realism, a plausibility and exactitude of detail, that have nothing to compare with them outside the pages of Defoe. The little company shut in their guarded room are pictured with an amazing vividness; you are made to realise how the danger gathers more ominously about their stronghold, how their confidence wavers and fails, and their dread of the end that seems inevitable increases on them, and all the while the resolute, indomitable Challenger towers superior to every alarm, even when at length the situation appears to be passing beyond his control, when the supply of oxygen gives out, and there is nothing for it but to stifle in the air-tight compartment, or throw open the windows and let the airs of death blow in.

Photo by F. O. Huppé

Mr. Oliver Onions.

It is a thrilling situation, and Sir A. Conan Doyle's powers of invention are triumphantly vindicated in the amount of variety he gets into it, and the unfailing skill with which he keeps the excitement and suspense of his characters, and of his readers, at high tension from start to finish. He has given us many romances, but none more charged with mystery and dramatic sensation than this.

OLIVER ONIONS.

"The Two Kisses." 6s. (Methuen)

For a writer who "does not advertise" Mr. Oliver Onions has a singularly keen eye for the uses of advertisement. He it was who—in "Good Boy Seldom," if we remember aright—first suggested this form of publicity as a medium of political propaganda; and he, again, it is who, in his new book, "The Two Kisses," makes a present to the big storekeepers of a colossal advertising scheme, a scheme which ought to earn him the eternal gratitude of any firm that is enterprising enough to adopt it. But Mr. Onions' "comedy of a very modern courtship" presents aspects other than those that are likely to catch the eye of Mr. Higham and his confrères. We get, for instance, an account of a second rate boarding-house's quaint menagerie, which is as droll and as convincing as anything of the kind that Mr. Arnold Bennett has described. We find a sketch of a female art-student, turned fashion-plate artist, which depicts that ingenuous fraud, "the economically independent woman," to the very life. While finally—as the novel's main clou—we are told the story of two art-students, who, being followers of "the new morality," fondly imagine that by chattering frankly about marriage, eugenics, and the white slave trade, they are helping to bring about the Emancipation of Woman, to inaugurate the New Age, and to found the New Jerusalem. It will be gathered that his latest novel—veritable little masterpiece though it is—makes no claim to rank as one of its author's bigger achievements; it cannot, that is to say, be put in the same flight with such a satire as "Good Boy Seldom," with such a collection of contes as "Pedlar's Pack," or with that great trilogy that has given Mr. Onions his rightful place at last among our leading novelists.

"The Two Kisses," indeed, is a tale which will rank with the same writer's story of "Little Devil Doubt." Both books diagnose a deep-seated social malady with unsparing thoroughness, the former scarifying "the day nurseries of the children of the well-to-do middle classes"—to quote Mr Onions' caustic phrase—in much the same witty and high-spirited fashion as the latter attacked the devious morality of Yellow Journalism. Himself a capable black-and-white artist and an art critic of no little distinction, Mr. Onions knows what he is talking about when he deplors the art schools' ever increasing output of artists who read instead of doing their jobs and living their lives, artists who chatter about Tchekoff and Strindberg as aimlessly as Matthew Arnold's blues noires chattered about Shelley.

"There's too much paper in their lives [says the Professor at the McGrath school] They read too much. Draw too much. Especially reading Lord, the books they get hold of! Weeks and months together I've heard 'em. Myers says this, and Galton says that, and Tolstoi says the other, and they make up a sort of world out of all that, and think it's the real one, and go on living in it, and never get out of it."

It must be admitted, however, that in his latest work Mr Onions makes no pretence of presenting his new men and new women with serene detachment or rigid impartiality. In dealing with poseurs and suffragists his is far too robust an intelligence, far too masculine a temperament, to err on the side of undue sympathy.

EDEN PHILLPOTTS

"The Old Time Before Them" 6s (Murray)

Fifteen short stories of Dartmoor and its folk, by Eden Phillpotts, who, as Mr Murray tells us on the loose cover of the volume, "has a unique knowledge of the romance—the humour and the tragedy—of that region. No one will hold the contrary opinion. These fifteen stories are all pitched in a sombre key and all deal with the stuff of life—life that dances to the same tunes on Dartmoor as in London town or Khatmandhu. Love, hatred, jealousy, simple faith, good courage, temptation, weakness, anguish, triumph and despair, are all among the themes upon which Mr Phillpotts works, and he is never trivial or lacking in understanding. The simple farm labourer whose harvest thanks giving piece is rejected by the proud curate and given the place of honour on the altar by the wiser rector; the elderly husband who tyrannised over his wife and nagged until despair over his baby brought him to his senses; the humane hangman, the coward who loved valour above all things but without ever losing his cowardice, and found a wife of surpassing courage: these tales are told with a veve and distinctness that are rare. Among the best is the tale of the little girl of seven, who, when a still smaller child in her charge was bitten by an adder far away from help, cut off her own finger to encourage the other to face the mutilation necessary to save her life.

Mr Phillpotts is a conscientious and laborious artist. He has in this book adopted what seems a needlessly difficult way of writing. Each story is told by Tom Turtle, the scene is always a Dartmoor inn, and is the setting for a tale told by Johnny Rowland, the landlord. Mr Phillpotts' aim may be to avail himself of the Dartmoor speech, virile, meaningful, musical. But even from behind the doubled mask we hear the authentic voice of Mr Phillpotts, and we cannot feel that he has attained the lovely melodious speech that was Synge's triumph for Ireland. And very often the character, the mask, is wholly forgotten.

I M A

COMPTON MACKENZIE.

"Sinister Street" 6s (Martin Secker)

Mr Compton Mackenzie is to be congratulated upon the best study of "The Human Boy" which has appeared for many years. In an apologetic dedication, he explains that this volume, which carries Michael Fane from early life up to the eve of his going up to Oxford, is only one half of the complete story, (the second half of which is to be published early next year), and he urges in extenuation of his prolixity that a thousand pages are not too long for 25 years of a man's life, if one considers that "childhood makes the instrument, youth tunes the strings, and early manhood plays the melody." But no apology is needed for Mr Compton Mackenzie's leisurely treatment. His handling of his subject is from first to last both sympathetic and masterly, and his description of the great London public school, which is so thinly veiled under the name of St James', is so pitilessly worked out that there is certain to be an outburst of indignation from "Old Jacobean" and supporters of Dr Brownjohn.

The circumstances of the Fane family are tragic, in the strict Aristotelian sense. A cloud of mystery hangs over the heads of Michael and his sister Stella and though we can guess pretty confidently the sad story of their paternity, it is only at the end of the book that Mrs Fane explains to her children that Lord Saxby who has just died in South Africa was their father. The situation is worst for Michael. His sister was discovered in early childhood to be a musical genius and her life was almost entirely given up to her art but he robbed of the comradeship of his mother and sister is thrown back largely upon his own resources and plunges into one after another of those experiences which he ready to an imaginative youth, during those years when in John Keats words "the soul is in a ferment the character undecided the way of life uncertain the ambition thick sighted." For such a boy as Michael the English public school has little real attraction, and being a day boy he has unusual opportunities for indulging in all the love affairs and hankerings after ritualistic religion and decadent aestheticism by which he is successively enthralled. Fortunately however, Michael is a boy of strong personality and is endowed with a capacity for making friends among not only the less desirable specimens of mankind but among people of clean sane common sense and thus though his ship is often driven upon her beam ends by the gusts of his temperamental hurricanes, she always manages to right herself again and one never has any lasting fear that he will utterly disgrace himself.

Photo by E. O. Hoppe

Mr. Compton Mackenzie.

Michael, of course, is the protagonist of the story, but Mr. Compton Mackenzie has set him among a number of other excellent characters, each of whom is treated with skill and distinction. The beautiful and gracious Mrs. Fane, the kindly Carthew family, Alan and a host of the other boys at St. James', Lily the heroine of his most enduring passion, the tipsy cook who sat in St. Paul's Cathedral "eating nuts as peaceful as if we was in a real church"—all these characters are worked out with a power of pathos, humour, and acute observation that will enhance Mr. Compton Mackenzie's reputation. And to say that of the author of "Carnival" is to make a statement which cannot be put forward lightly.

M H H MACARTNEY.

H. G. WELLS.

"The Passionate Friends," 6s. (Macmillan)

Mr. Wells' new novel will disappoint his admirers. "The Passionate Friends" is not only rather poor as a story, but it is even rather poor as a pamphlet. It suffers from the worst of all artistic errors—lack of interest. The bright genius of "Tono Bungay" and "Marriage" suffers a severe eclipse in these drawn-out pages. Indeed, "The Passionate Friends" comes uncommonly near to being a positively dull book. The fact is, Mr. Wells seems to have fallen between two stools. Incident in his novel is so attenuated that he means, apparently, to concentrate interest upon the characters of the two chief actors, Stratton and Lady Mary Justin, and upon their ideas of life and society, but in that he has largely failed, because neither Stratton nor Lady Mary are particularly convincing, nor their views particularly striking.

"The Passionate Friends" reads like a book written in a hurry, and with a purpose that bored the author before he was through with it. It is an inert and lifeless book in its later pages. The earlier ones, on the contrary, contain many delightful and subtle things, typical of the swift mind of Mr. Wells. But the whole effect is of failure. The story is one of two people, the passionate friends, Stratton and Lady Mary. There are other figures, of course, such as Stratton's wife and Lady Mary's husband, but they are entirely subsidiary to the central two. Stratton and Lady Mary have played together as children, and have become lovers in due course. But when, in fiction, or, perhaps, real life, did the clergyman's son have a chance of marrying the earl's daughter? So Stratton's heart is torn while Lady Mary is led to the altar by the millionaire. The result is unhappiness for both, a liaison, discovery, more unhappiness, long silence, turgid correspondence, a further (innocent but incriminating) meeting, divorce proceedings, suicide on the lady's part, ultimate family peace for Stratton. Stratton's world-travel and his marriage to Rachel (whom he conveniently loves in one way while he loves Mary in another) are interwoven with the main love theme, but they do not excite one. They are credible enough, but humdrum. But, indeed, though the other affair may be rather incredible, still it, too, is somewhat dreary. The story is artistic and false. Lady Mary, in particular, does not hold together. She is entrancing as a shy girl, but as a woman she is not only "impossible" but hopelessly unreal. She speaks and thinks with a sort of mediocre and emancipated vulgarity that is absolutely nauseating. She is simply no relation to the delicious girl of seventeen Stratton used to meet in the park of Burnmore. But, in truth, one cannot take either her or Stratton seriously once they are mature. One soon begins to look upon them merely as mouthpieces through which Mr. Wells may enunciate views—not necessarily his own.

In its own line "The Passionate Friends" is as great a failure as was "Ann Veronica." There is a hasty crudeness about it astonishing in the author of half a dozen masterpieces. The whole coincidence of Stratton's meeting with Lady Mary in the Swiss mountains is surely inexcusable. Coincidences do happen in real life, but they must not happen in novels. That is a proper and recognised convention. But, in spite of its fundamental weakness, this book gives many glimpses of Mr. Wells' real power. Stratton's story of his relations with his little son are acutely touching, and the early love making between Stratton and Lady Mary is very effective. As for the manly and strictly conventional curate, Mr. Siddons, we get too little of him, as we got too little of Mr. Pope in "Marriage."

What is curious about "The Passionate Friends" is not so much that it is a failure as that it does not even strike one as a very ambitious failure. One has an uncomfortable feeling that the author's heart is not in it. Perhaps that is the main reason of its not gripping one's attention. Mr. Wells could not help being remarkable up to a point but he has seldom scored more doubtfully than in "The Passionate Friends."

RICHARD CURLE.

ARNOLD BENNETT.

"The Regent" 6s. (Methuen.)

Not so very long ago Mr. Arnold Bennett made the by no means too acceptable announcement that he was putting a term to his famous series of chronicles of the "Five Towns." With the completion of his "Clayhanger" trilogy, the author of this, and that equally astonishing piece of realism, "The Old Wives' Tale," which evokes with no less success the manners and customs, the fashions and thoughts, the types and the ideals of life in the Midlands as it was lived in the Victorian era, was to bid, we were told, a lasting farewell to the scenes and to the sort of characters with which his art has attained its most convincing and masterly expression. Naturally all of us who admire Mr. Bennett for doing superlatively well with his "Five Towns" what no other English novelist can do much more than tolerably with a similar milieu, grieved over his decision, and begged him not to cut himself off too hastily from what has proved his surest inspiration. His answer has been to postpone for the present his record of the married life of Hilda Lessways and her husband, and to try his hand at showing that lighter side of the world of the Midlands which he has already exploited in some of his short stories. It is only past phases of this district of his birth that he seems able to associate with the deeper emotions and problems of humanity, and, in especial, that problem which always attracts him in his more serious vein—the problem of youth's quarrel with age; whereas the Five Towns, as he sees them to day, stir in him the comic spirit and set him smiling, if also admiring. A certain class of business man of those parts

Mr. Alfred Wareing.

From a caricature by George Whittell.
Mr. Wareing is the original of Mr. Marrier, the theatrical manager, in "The Regent."

Mr. Arnold Bennett.

particularly affects and tickles his fancy. He at once likes and huckles over the Midlander who can use his wits to make a fortune and keep them after it is made, the man who combines impudence and not too much scruple with genuine commercial genius, yet is so little of a snob that he retains his local patriotism: is so shrewd and hard-headed that not all the temptations of wealth and luxury can rob him of the virtues that have lifted him from mediocrity. Such a self-made adventurer we had most genuinely and dashinglly portrayed for us in "The Card", and Mr. Bennett, it appears, fell so much in love with the hero of his invention that he has felt it impossible just for the nonce to submit to his self-denying ordinance. So William Henry Machin, transferred to London, there to enlarge the field of his operations, but still remaining faithful at heart to the town which has given him honour and fame, once more figures as the protagonist of a Bennett novel; and its author, for all his threats of shaking off the dust of the Potteries from his feet, still lingers there in the story of "The Regent."

Boisterous jollity no less than a knack of attracting adventures seems to be part of the atmosphere of the "Card," so that it will surprise no one who has read that book to learn that its sequel is a rattling farce. Never has Mr. Bennett revealed more exuberant spirits or a keener sense of fun than in his account of the risks and the luck which attended the Alderman while undertaking the business of London theatrical management. The whole episode is marked by daring; and yet the "Card's" "cheek" carries him through. He buys the option of a site; he builds a new theatre; he manages to get a good run for a play that is feebly poetic, and he finishes his experiment several thousand pounds to the good. It is "prodeegious," as Dominic Sampson would say, but it is all made vastly diverting—a very carnival of merriment. Nor is the tale merely burlesque and fantasy; it has behind it a hint of satire, evident enough to those who know anything of the haphazard policy with which too many of our play-houses are conducted, yet always insinuated with the best of good humour. Mr. Bennett sketches for us the kind of actress, the kind of posturing author, the kind of pretentious amateurs, who calmly expect to have their follies financed, and, what is odd, often get them financed, by business men otherwise sensible and far-seeing, but in the case of the theatre too frequently blinded by its "glamour." Machin, however, is not long dazed by the footlights, and soon recovers his native 'cuteness. When he discovers that poetry does not "pay" on the London stage he maroons the author of his play in America, he makes a clean sweep of his leading actress, and he takes an express journey to the States and back on purpose to secure the one attraction that will save his theatre from disaster. She is a notoriety-hunting suffragist, who is known in two Continents, and he wins her consent—thanks to his cajolery and sound advice—to figure in his bill and pile up his box-office receipts. All this makes laughable reading, and, at the same time, points a very telling moral. Success, however, in London fails to induce the "Card" to be untrue to his type; he resolves that his right place is not amid the strangers and strange conditions of the capital, but in the Five Towns in which he is at home. The more so because his wife is of the same opinion, and has betrayed to him in unmistakable pantomime her censure of his audacious projects. Not the least amusing feature of Mr. Arnold Bennett's farce is the subtlety with which he indicates Midland reticence, even in such matters as a wife's dumb disapproval of a husband's venturesomeness. Mrs. Machin never puts her jealousy or her irritability into words, but "Denry" reads her every look, and his caution is inspired as much by the wish to placate her as by the feeling that he must not push fortune too hard. The novelist's suggestion that his hero can be fearless everywhere save in the bosom of his family is one of his most humorous and also one of his most plausible strokes of character-drawing. His fun needed just this steady touch.

F. G. BELTANY.

W. PETT RIDGE.

"The Remington Sentence" 6s. (Methuen)

The plot in Mr. Pett Ridge's work is always the least important part of it. His recipe for a story would seem to be: Take a half-dozen or so of men and women, and a child or two: ordinary, everyday characters, the more ordinary the better, bring them together, let them act and react on each other as if they were really alive and stir in plenty of the sort of incidents that would naturally arise in the experiences of such people, keep them bubbling and briskly on the move until the story is done. It is a simple recipe, but whether it is also a successful one depends entirely on the art of the cook.

And Mr. Pett Ridge has the art to make it a successful one. A mere outline of the story of "The Remington Sentence" would tell you practically nothing about it. The Remington family of a sister-mother and three brothers, the youngest still a schoolboy, come from the country into the unknown world of London in search of a livelihood. Their father, who has lately died, was a man of means and has left some considerable estate behind him, but under his will their inheritance is deferred. Hitherto, they have lived too easily and it has not been good for them; they have developed a bad habit of quarrelling among themselves for lack of something better to do, and a worse habit of unpleasant arrogance towards their dependents and inferiors, and their father considered that if they had to rough it for a little and rub shoulders with the common world it would be a wholesome and humanising experience.

It is a hard and humiliating experience for them at first, it brings out all the worse qualities of the elder brother and ends for him in disgrace and tragedy, but for the sister, Helen, and the second brother, Walter, this having to face the stern realities of existence and arrive at a knowledge of their own strength and weaknesses is a liberal and healthful education. Geoffrey, the eldest brother, plays the man about town, drifts into doubtful society and passes through a divorce court episode on his way to ruin; to the other three life is a struggle to keep up appearances and make ends meet, but they win through. Helen's love affair is a point of light in the story; and the love adventure of "Snips," the youngest brother, who is the historian of them all, when the innocent, piquant loves of his schoolboy days are over, is no less charmingly told. Walter is the strong man of the group, but it is the sound, practical commonsense and enterprise of Helen that really keeps them all going and carries them through. "The Remington Sentence" interests you because you are interested in its people; it is a strong and attractive story; the humour and pathos of it are true, and its studies of London life and character are in Mr. Pett Ridge's happiest and most shrewdly realistic vein. C. W.

GEORGE A. BIRMINGHAM.

"General John Regan" 6s. (Houlder & Stoughton.)

Out into Ballymoy, a remote Irish village, goes Mr. Horace P. Billing, an American gentleman, anxious to see if a statue has been erected there, in the place of his birth, to the memory of General John Regan, the deliverer of Bolivia. Nobody in the village ever heard of such a General, but being reluctant to make a confession of ignorance, and so throw away the possibility of doing profitable business with this affluent stranger, Dr. O'Grady, Doyle, the hotel-keeper, Gallagher, proprietor of the local paper, and other residents, conspire to affect a knowledge of the General, to invent traditions concerning him, to point out his alleged birthplace, and to account for the absence of any statue. They get into and out of difficulties in trying to produce surviving relatives of the General, and embark upon a large scheme to raise a fund for erecting his statue, Mr. Billing (who is supposed to be writing the great man's biography) enthusiastically promising a handsome subscription towards that object. From inventing the General and details concerning his early life, they grow to absolutely believing in him; a statue is obtained, and it is only at the unveiling by a representative of the Lord Lieutenant that the whole legend tumbles to pieces, and it comes out that instead of the hustling Mr. Billing having been taken in by the leaders of Ballymoy, he had all along been taking them in, with a view to getting a move on the slow village and waking things up. This raw outline does the story no sort of justice, for it gives no idea of the delightfully quaint humour with which its characters are drawn, nor of the prodigality of farcical invention, and the irresistible gaiety and high spirits with which it is written. Those who saw the dramatic version of it will remember how the house rocked with laughter as scene after scene unfolded its glorious absurdities; and it is safe to say that those who read the book will find it to the full as droll, as whimsical, as ingenious, and as mirth-provoking as the play. In a word, it is a book that is joyously alive with the healthfullest, heartiest matter for laughter, and emphasises Mr. Birmingham's place among the very first of living English humorists.

EDWIN PUGH.

"The Proof of the Pudding." 6s. (Chapman & Hall.)

In "The Proof of the Pudding," Mr. Pugh makes something of a new departure—he turns from those vivid, intimate studies of London life that we have learned to associate with his name to write a sparkling, cleverly contrived novel in which the story's the thing, and a varied, swift-moving, thoroughly enjoyable thing he makes of it. Tommy Johnson living in a Fitzroy Square boarding-house inherits a fortune and a title, and is reluctant to accept the responsibilities of either. He was born and has passed most of his life in Australia; has studied art in Paris, and is far keener to develop his talent and become a great artist than to coruscate in high society. Moreover, he is in love with pretty Penelope Embers, the typist, who also lodges in the boarding-house, and he doubts whether Penelope is not too independent to marry a man who is so much above her socially and financially. He would like a little of the money if it could be got without his having to shoulder the whole of his inheritance, and he hits upon the expedient of securing somebody who shall personate him, acquire and enjoy his title and estate and allow him five hundred a year out of it. He finds a man for his purpose, makes terms with him, furnishes him with proofs of identity, and the scheme is successfully carried out up to a certain point.

But it happens that his substitute is a bigger rogue and more unscrupulous than Tommy had bargained for, and once he has possession of everything, he declines to allow Tommy the five hundred a year for fear these regular payments should eventually be used as evidence that he is an impostor, when the real heir wearies of the game and wants to come into his own. Tommy is so exasperated that he resolves to turn his ungrateful substitute out; but he has parted with all proof of his rights and, except for the one other man who has all along been in his confidence, can get nobody to believe his story. It is a piquant situation and Mr. Pugh makes the very most and best of it. Tommy finds that by his eccentric action he has almost precipitated Penelope into the arms of the rascal who is representing him; this makes him doubly eager to assert himself and recover what he threw away, and the succession of surprises and adventures that accompanied his efforts to do this make very delectable reading. The prevailing note of the story is of the happiest humour; the characters are well drawn; there are touches of pathos, sentiment, sensation, and the whole thing is told with a gusto that keeps the reader fully interested until Tommy has unravelled the knot in which he has tied himself and his affairs.

E. F. BENSON.

"Thorley Weir" 6s. (Smith, Elder.)

We should be glad if Mr. E. F. Benson would initiate us into his secrets of the art of novel-writing, as he proposes to do this month with the secrets of "Winter Sports in Switzerland" in a book which Messrs. Allen are publishing. It is no mean tribute to write of his latest novel, "Thorley Weir," that it impresses us as much by its unimpeachable craftsmanship as by its inherent qualities as a study of the modern world of art. The love story is not so striking as the picture which it presents of the way in which genius can be exploited at the present day. It would be interesting to know if the portrait of Arthur Craddock, the great critic who used the columns of his papers to boom his new discoveries, only to benefit his own pocket, is in any sense drawn from life. This Craddock had an astonishing flair for perceiving what the public would appreciate.

"Often he bought pictures, which from an artistic point of view he thought frankly contemptible, because he saw signs—so subtle that they were instinctively perceived rather than reasoned—that the public was going to see something in either an outworn mode, or in some new and abominable trickery."

Then, having nursed them in the Press, he transferred his purchases to a gallery in which he was financially interested, and gladly parted with them on advantageous terms. Yet Arthur Craddock, with all his faults, was only half a villain, and a patron who was always ready to bow the knee before genius; very different from the patron defined by Dr. Johnson in his abusive letters to Lord Chesterfield. Craddock did at least hold out a helping hand at the critical moment, however much he may have sinned by his dishonesty as a dealer and his meanness as a rival in his protégé's love affair. Many neglected geniuses would willingly bind themselves for three years on the terms by which Mr. Benson's two delightful young heroes were bound to Arthur Craddock. That worthy was sufficiently punished by the shame of discovery. His remorse, when he realised to what depths his unscrupulous ambition had led him, when it tempted him to betray the genius who was now hailed as the rising star of the whole artistic world, is depicted with the touch of a master's hand. "He felt as if he had been found picking Velasquez's pocket."

The Pearl Tears.

Drawn by Daphne Allen, at the age of 11.

From "The Birth of the Opal," by Daphne Allen (George Allen & Co.).

THE BIRTH OF THE OPAL.*

In her new book, "The Birth of the Opal," Miss Daphne Allen appears as both artist and author. There are three short stories, "The Birth of the Opal," "How the Pearls First Came," and "The Story of the Wind," and the charm of them lies in the quaint fancifulness and childlike simplicity with which they are told. You see the same quick, graceful fantasy, the same direct simplicity of thought—subtle sometimes in its very simplicity, as a child's thoughts are—delightfully at play in her work with brush and pencil. The second part of the volume consists of drawings for which, as Mr. Walter D. Ellis sets forth in his brief introduction, the artist "did not furnish any explanation, and I have done my best to supply selections from the poets which suggest similar lines of thought or imagination." These drawings, he adds, "are the pure fruit of the child's own fancy, done as the spirit moved her, without any purpose of publication," and the applicable poetical quotations are an afterthought on the part of the editor.

The paintings and sketches in this new collection do not show any advance in technique on the work of the earlier volume; that was not to be expected, for it is barely a year yet since "A Child's Visions" was published, but they maintain to the full all the spontaneous ease and grace, the happy, careless, poetic imaginativeness that characterised the other book. It is difficult to define the charm of these pictures: sometimes the slightest of them has a delicate beauty of line and form that is yet matched by the beauty of the thought or fancy it expresses. There is a delightful little sketch on the half-title page—"The Moon-Cradle"—showing six small babies asleep in the curve of a slim new moon, with an angel at each horn, rocking it; there is another—"When the Cloud Spirits dim the Moon," which is just an outline of the moon with a drift of light, flying figures clouding it over: the sense of quiet loveliness in the first of these, and of beauty and movement in the last are perfect in their kind. They have feeling and atmosphere and are intensely alive. It is the same with the painting of "The Golden Boat of Life," with the wash drawings of "The Storm Spirits," "The Pearl Tears," and "The Surprise Visit," and with the wonderfully vivid, vigorous little sketch, "The Spirits of the Wind."

None of the pictures are of this drab, every-day world in which people grow old and die, the girl and the child in the garden may be ordinarily human, but the dead autumn leaves dropping from the tree are little fairy-children; the rocks and fishes at the bottom of the sea are realistic enough, but there is a sea-maiden lifting the top shell of an oyster and disclosing a little weeping child inside it. Other healthily happy children play in the same fairy-land with the same airy, elusive fancies and bizarre imaginings, but one is put to it to name any other child of fourteen with so rare a gift for translating the thoughts and dreams of childhood into paintings and sketches such as these of Daphne Allen's. There are occasional technical flaws; it would be amazing if there were not; but the spirit and natural cunning of the work as a whole dwarf these into insignificance. We hesitate to make use of the word genius, but no other word can account for such art as this from the hand of so young and necessarily inexperienced an artist.

THE GENIUS OF THE GAEL.†

There is no doubt that racial psychology is a study as full of quicksands as of fascination. For nations are liable not only to the extreme oscillations of prejudice and appreciation from their critics, but their own development is subject in itself to such violent inconsistency and to such warfare between the multiple constituents of the national character, that it is little wonder that the average historian finds refuge solely in the bald exposition of facts and events, without venturing to infer or to generalize. But Mrs. Bryant, in her eloquent and persuasive analysis, plumbs deeper waters. Possessing the qualities both of introspective curiosity and logical deduction, she attempts to marshal the various aspects of Celtic activity—historical, literary, spiritual and personal into a consecutive whole, into a formula, which will justify the manifold calculations of which it is composed. She is certainly not immune from the charge of partiality, and the finished portrait emerges a little stiffed, a little more conscious of the burden of its excellence than the model virtually is. The Celt of her pages would, we fancy, be a little oppressive, if the verisimilitude were preserved in the flesh.

The pivot of Mrs. Bryant's investigation is her chapter on the psychology of the Celt, and on its summary she bases practically all the details of her speculations. It is therefore worth examining the more freely. Her salient contention is that in point of psychological emphasis, the Gael is much more vividly differentiated than the Teuton, with whom, though conceding the proper reservation, she classes the Saxon race. In some extremely able paragraphs, she mobilizes the particular virtues and stigmas that have been attributed to the Celtic nation and have passed into currency. There is the impractical dreamer, the Hamlet of the nations, which Mathew Arnold evolved; the practical genius, which as Mrs. Bryant might have told us Mr. Shaw both vindicates and represents; there is the conservative and the revolutionary, there is the primitive and the socially expansive; there is the concrete and the spiritual. All these opposing types Mrs. Bryant not only accepts and reconciles, but, with a paralysing astuteness and brilliance in the perception of idealities, shoulders into a common fold. The Celt, she says, is distinguished by his positive vitality, which by its tenacity of energy on the one hand and of memory on the other, implies a sense of "conservative progressiveness," linking him to the past and its essential character, and at the same time making him accessible and impressionable to ideas. Allied with this is his dominating trait of "facility of consciousness," which, on account of its concrete element, enables him "to react upon experience as a whole." Mrs. Bryant utilizes the subordinate characteristics which have been noted in him, with a similar aptitude of resource. His genius for domesticity and its associate qualities, his raciness, his imaginativeness, his sympathy, his individual and civic devotions, his variability, his dramatic sense divided from the histrionic by his acute apprehension of the significance of truth, and his spirituality, to illustrate some of her examples, are visualised by her in perspective and through the focus of a controlling, unifying idea. That is to say, she makes them generic and apposite. She defines the Celt (or the Gael, if we wish to preserve a rigid classification) in politics, in the religious life, in literature, and in his attitude to his ancient social institutions pretty well entirely from this point of view of a subtle amalgam in his disposition between self-consciousness and other-consciousness. Mrs. Bryant's theme, indeed, is so much of a synthesis, so masterly and plausible in its applications, that we almost forget that we are, as a matter of fact, treading upon highly controversial ground. For there are undoubtedly certain aspects in which she has understated and where she has overstated her case. She has assumed, for instance, that all the various estimates of Celtic temperament we have enumerated are ipso facto true. At any rate, they cannot be so correlative as she makes them, without being modified. Mathew Arnold's theories indeed are quite obsolete, it is dubious whether they were ever anything else but figments of his intellect—and Mr. Shaw's much more convincing thesis must be discounted in part from being a counterblast to the legend circulated by Arnold. Moreover, we frankly doubt whether it is the Celt's susceptibility to truth which balances his dramatic propensity, it is not so much that as his ironical sense, which goes so well with his competence. It is this slandered faculty which has made him take an unfailing delight in the myths we English people have invented concerning him and (as indeed there is no reason on earth why he should not) to play unscrupulously upon them. And he has the sanity and judgment to detect the rays of that same irony upon himself. He qualifies himself by it in the same way as we suspect he would qualify Mrs. Bryant's whole-hearted appreciation of him. Mrs. Bryant again infers that the positive personality of the Irishman, which she so vigorously italicises, is ethical in its implication. It is a vital point, but actually there is no foundation whatever for it. This Irish exuberance, which has so many virile and engaging manifestations, may evolve ecstatically, but is not intrinsically ethical. In so far as the life-force itself is ethical, the Celtic vitality is the same, but the one does not by any means presuppose the other. The moral instinct is positive, but the assertion of vitality is not necessarily moral. Anyway, Mrs. Bryant, if she traverses debatable regions, carries fine wares in her wallet.

* "The Birth of the Opal: A Child's Fancies." By Daphne Allen. 5s. net. (Geo. Allen & Co.).

† "The Genius of the Gael." A Study in Celtic Psychology. By Sophie Bryant. 5s. net. (Unwin.)

HAROLD MASSINGHAM.

THINGS NAUTICAL.*

To "Sailing Ships and their Story," "Fore and Aft," and "Steamships and their Story," Mr. Keble Chatterton has now added the present big and handsome book, which, so far as appearance and present handling go, is a credit indeed to all who have been concerned in its production. Truth to tell, not only is Mr. Chatterton taring sumptuously towards a fleet of battleships (or should we say: First-raters in books? For one reason, and in spite of its alliteration's artful aid, we would rather have said: Liners in literature), "all on his own"; but he must make the literary mouths of more humble penmen—dirty little smacks, by comparison—water with envy, when they contemplate his gorgeous, liner-like appearances, as he comes sailing now and then out of the harbour of the press and seems as if he must have a whole sea of a shelf to himself.

As to the subject matter of this book: Having separately and pretty exhaustively told the stories of windjammers, severally and generally, and of steam-driven craft (Steamship is an odious combination. There are old sailormen who won't admit such packets to be ships at all), from the A of Fulton down to the present-day litter of Titanics, Imperators, etc., Mr. Chatterton seems to have cast backwards, so to write, seen various interesting odds and ends, which had been omitted from the other books, recognized how, by certain additions and a little more literary privateering, he could put together (build up, we ought to have written) another of his rich-looking galleons from the El Dorado of things nautical in the Spanish Main of literature. Having done that and seen this, well, he did this also. And, lo, it no doubt looked as well in his sight as it is well in ours. His pictures are as profuse and as fine as ever, in fact, such pieces of black and white work as are found on pp. 49, 123, 162, 187, etc., are deserving of high praise. Mr. Keble Chatterton has again gone to the keel of his subject, as it were, beginning with "The Birth of the Nautical Arts" (Carthaginian, Roman, etc., of course), taking stock of the Vikings, of seafaring in the Middle Ages, in Tudor and Stuart times, and finally giving a glance at the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. And, so far as it is done, it is well done; but we would, indeed, that he, and all who go exploring the same literary waters, did give us somewhat of the depth and breadth of those seas. We are surfeited with the work of the literary dilettante; we are but little less impatient with those who can sail further and bring us of the wealth that lies afar, and Mr. Keble Chatterton is of the latter kind. He sometimes tries to cram a period into a chapter, and not with the brilliance of the really talented condenser. Let him, therefore, cover space somewhat equal to his pains in research. We don't like the short in those writers who are not snappy naturally, because shortness without corresponding crispness is like eating overdry biscuits that have but little flavour.

* "Ships and Ways of Other Days." By E. Keble Chatterton. With One Hundred and Thirty Illustrations. 16s. net. (Sidgwick & Jackson.)

J. E. PATTERSON.

KAISER MAX.*

Hero-worship is largely a matter of nationality. The present Kaiser will probably be remembered by his devoted subjects as William the Great, but to future generations of Englishmen it is not unlikely that he will be known as "Puffing Billy." In the same way Kaiser Max, as Maximilian I. was called in his own day and generation, was the darling of his German and Tyrolese subjects; but that is no reason why Englishmen should accept him, as Christopher Hare does in his new life of the Emperor, as "the very mirror of knightly courtesy." It is just four hundred years ago, be it remembered, since Maximilian helped young Henry VIII. to win his first campaign, and then betrayed him for the sake of Ferdinand's promise of help in the Emperor's plundering designs against Venice. It is true that Maximilian soothed his conscience on that occasion by the base assurance on the part of Ferdinand's emissary that Henry VIII. would raise no objection, but his was a conscience that was easily appeased. His daughter Margaret was a much nobler character than this needy and egotistical Emperor, and had a higher regard for the honour of the House of Hapsburg, of the greatness of which he was never tired of singing. It was Margaret of Austria who flatly declined to marry old Henry VII., though her father would have sacrificed her for a consideration to the monarch whose insecure throne he had previously sought to undermine by means of the spiritless pretender, Perkin Warbeck. She was not unwilling, at a later date, however, to flirt with Charles Brandon, the handsome favourite of young Henry VIII., while accompanying her father in the Terouanne campaign. Christopher Hare makes no mention either of Maximilian's futile championship of the English pretender, or of the diplomatic flirtation between his daughter—"Savoy's blooming Duchess," as Drayton calls her—and Brandon, with young Henry VIII. acting as a most enterprising matrimonial agent. This is the more curious as the author refers to the feminine touch in Margaret's letter from Lille to her father at this period, in which she says: "I am willing to ride thither if it will be for your good service . . . but otherwise it is not seemly for a widow woman to go trotting about and to visit armies for pleasure." The author mentions, instead, that Henry VIII. "was accompanied by the astute Wolsey, who had just been made Bishop of Tournay by the Pope." It was Henry who appointed Wolsey to this bishopric, but the appointment was never confirmed by the Pope. The French bishop-elect of the same See hotly disputed the Englishman's administration, and three years later Wolsey was content to surrender his claim for a pension of 12,000 livres.

The character of the last Holy Roman Emperor of the ancient régime is summed up by Christopher Hare in the title of her book, "Maximilian the Dreamer." He was always dreaming of impossible glories, the summit of his earthly ambition being to crown himself with the papal tiara and combine the spiritual and temporal rule of the world. But Maximilian's dreams soared beyond terrestrial heights. He assured his daughter quite seriously in 1512 that she would have to worship him after his death, as he fully intended to be canonised! On the other hand, he was not only an excellent soldier, and fearless as a lion at bay, but also a generous patron of art and letters. His supreme achievements were the organisation of his German troops into the famous Landsknechte, whose splendidly trained companies became the admiration, as well as the fear, of all Europe; and the restoration of the University of * "Maximilian the Dreamer: Holy Roman Emperor, 1459-1550." By Christopher Hare. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net. (Stanley Paul.)

Vienna. The Emperor was, in truth, a strange mixture of good and bad qualities, and the only fault I have to find with Christopher Hare's study is that it makes overmuch of the one and under-estimates the other. Her hero was no more sincere in his dreams of a crusade against the Infidels than were the other reigning sovereigns of Christendom, who were all ready enough with their promises, but only made them as an excuse for arming themselves against one another. Maximilian gave every encouragement to the Renaissance in Germany, but unlike Albrecht Durer, many of whose priceless works we owe to his patronage, he failed to realise the significance of the Reformation. He had a poor opinion of English arms, but the highest regard for English crowns, as he proved on many occasions in the course of his impecunious career, especially when he served under Henry VIII as a common soldier at one hundred crowns a day. Nobody, as Dr Gairdner has said, ever settled anything with Kaiser Max without ready money.

FRANK A MUMBY

ESSAYS IN REBELLION.*

In Mr Wells' Time Machine there is a vision of a world from which strife, danger and rebellion have been eliminated a world in which peace is secure and lasting and man released at last from standing guard over his life and well-being. The people who inhabit it, having no longer any need for initiative and fortitude, have degenerated upon a fragile physical beauty and a childish ineffectuality, the race has been pampered to its undoing. In Mr Nevinson's view, as set forth in his Essays in Rebellion it is the function of the rebel working in the social body like leaven in the dough troubling it with its demoniac commotion to avert from mankind the danger and degradation of so sluggish a tranquillity. To justify and explain his rebel Mr Nevinson has written the admirable parable of the cat-fish—that devil of the seas which the wise fisherman used to introduce into his tank to stimulate and enliven the cod that else would have rotted and become unmarkable.

In the course of a career whose active and varied interest is known to most readers of newspapers Mr Nevinson has been a spectator of—and for all I know, a participant in many rebellions—he has seen streets closed by barricades and the current of a city's life dammed with violence and slaughter—but he is far from limiting his use of the word rebellion to these mere crises and culminations of the rebel idea. Hardly shall you find in casual paragraphs scattered through his pages an admission that he knows at first hand whereof he writes: there never was a less boastful book. The rebels he esteems for the efficacy of their rebellion are such as Carlyle, Swift, Rousseau, Byron and Cardinal Vaughan, he sets their names beside those of Garibaldi, Mazzini, the revolutionaries of Russia and the reservists whose refusal to embark for Melilla brought about the Barcelona rising. It has been an age of rebels in letters as in life, he says with a tone of congratulating the age upon this point in its character. Rebellion has been the characteristic expression of its most vital self. There is even a whisper of hope that the immediate future will not lack its rebellious quality.

"During a generation or so, people have looked to the Government to mitigate the oppression of poverty, but some different appeal now seems probable. For many despair of the goodwill or the power of the State, finding little in it but hurried politicians, inhuman officials, and the experts who docket and label the poor for 'institutional treatment'."

The Catalan reservists who refused to serve in the Morocco campaign in 1909 furnished a precedent which Mr. Nevinson considers "the greatest gain ever yet won for the cause of peace." The war was an ignoble one, none stood to gain by it save a few speculators in Paris and Madrid. The working people, the class that supplied the reservists, for once in a way saw through the martial pomp that veiled the miserable truth of the matter, and rather than embark, set Barcelona in a blaze and held the city for nearly a week. Men of all countries have long since refused to fight for mere dynasties: "if they refuse to fight in the ordinary Government wars, either war will cease or it will rise to the higher stage of war between class and class." The latter alternative suggests to Mr Nevinson possibilities even of a world-war between the classes.

"I hat would take the form of a civil war extended throughout Europe, and perhaps America and the highly-developed parts of Asia. The allied forces in the various countries would then strike where the need was greatest, the French or English army corps of working men going to the assistance of Russian or German working-men against the forces of despotism or capital."

Mr Nevinson's range is a wide one—he is a cat-fish in many tanks. 'Institutional treatment of the poor, Imperial' methods of governing, the masculine oligarchy' against which the advocates of female suffrage battle so valiantly—these are but a few of the things established against which he stands in rebellion. But I should fail to convey the sense and flavour of him if I allowed it to appear that his rebel, his cat-fish, his leaven, were always and merely political factors in an eternal opposition set again the Government. Man is something more than a voter—something more than a reformer, too, for that matter. In The Lion Crown, Mr Nevinson takes for a text the case of Cardinal Vaughan, that fastidious and courtly Prince of the Church who moved in an entourage of state and worldly circumstance who was occupied with the arts, who was accepted in exalted social circles, whose life had the cast of dignity and sumptuous equipment—from whose arm when he lay dead, there was filed the iron bracelet he had worn for many years, with its fashion of rebellion, and another side to Mr Nevinson's mind. The Priest of Nemi is another most memorable paper in Mr Nevinson's best manner, yet another is 'The Underworld of Lime.'

Essays in Rebellion is more than an engrossing and strongly imaginative book: to read it is to add to one's mental equipment. It is the expression of a frank and courageous mind, which to a wide reading has added an unusual range of human experience and of a spirit which has been active for many years in the cause of liberty.

PERCIVAL GIBBON

ITALY IN NORTH AFRICA.*

The great adventure of Italy in Tripolitania has been largely forgotten or at least obscured by the more tremendous conflict in Europe itself that followed the Italian enterprise. Yet one was practically the logical and foreseen outcome of the other. Lord Salisbury in 1890 declared that on the day when the status quo in the Mediterranean shall suffer any alteration whatever Italy's occupation of Tripoli will become an absolute necessity, and again that an attack on Tripoli by Italy would be the signal for the dismemberment of Turkey. The status quo in the Mediterranean was certainly altered in 1911: there was a strong rumour that Germany had designs upon Tripoli. Italy found that the decisive moment had come. The curious scrambling campaign ended with the treaty of Lausanne, and as Salisbury prophesied was followed by the Balkan War. Now Italy is left with Tripoli on her hands and is faced with the problem of making the best of her bargain. It is an immense territory, mostly waste and unproductive, and occupied if at all by Arabs. Yet anciently it was a fertile land, and the modern descendants of the great Roman people may restore the province to something of its old prosperity. Italians are magnificent cultivators—a circumstance hardly sufficiently realised and very well understood irrigation and dry farming. Italy will have a great task to develop the resources of Tripoli, but she will succeed in the end with energy and patience. Mr. McClure's book is a résumé of the events of the recent war, with some reflections upon the country and its circumstances. Frankly pro-Italian in its point of view, it is moderate in tone and in statement, and if it praises not merely directly, but also "with faint blame," it is now of no good purpose to revive unhappy controversies

* "Essays in Rebellion" By Henry W. Nevinson 6s net (Nisbet.)

* "Italy in North Africa" By W. K. McClure 10s 6d net (Constable.)

THE PLEASANT LAND OF FRANCE.*

It is the more pleasant to come across this book by Mr. Goldring in that it is such an improvement on another of his travel books which we lately read. Here are, indeed, a few references to adventures amorous, but one feels that they actually happened, and, therefore, never need to be forgiven, while his other adventures in a more distant scene were too palpably unreal. Here Mr. Goldring is a far more leisured traveller, he stays for many days in town after town—at Nevers he stood in some peril of remaining too long for his own comfort. We picture him lying, at each successive place, in bed, with a Baedeker on the floor, and afterwards he will rise, will furtively glance through this admirable author, and will be honest enough to praise him when he is not irritated by the thought of personally-conducted and other tourists who use him likewise. Then he will go forth and will describe very well and vividly and amusingly the various human and architectural matters of interest. It is rather surprising that while Mr. Henry James is rightly quoted on several occasions, yet at Angers there is no mention of M. René Bazin who, we fancy, lives there, and at any rate has often made that district his literary scene. Mr. Collins's illustrations, in colour and in black and white, are very attractive, though they all seem to have been done in weather more monotonously fine than that which Mr. Goldring encountered. We hope that books of this enjoyable, rambling sort will henceforth come from Mr. Goldring, who persistently eschews the ways of Augustus Hare and gives us his own meditations without requesting us to arrange our own. When he arrived at Muerces of the magnificent cliffs, we wish he had gone a couple of miles from the river—he had already tramped many score in search of various objects—because at La Seilleraye he would have found in a delightful old chateau, not only souvenirs of Madame de Sévigné, who used to stay there but, very probably, ourselves, and, anyhow, we go there now and it will give great pleasure, we are sure.

Mr. V. C. Scott O'Connor is an Indian official who, on a holiday, visited the Pyrenees, and now has given us an excellent account of his explorings, both physical and of the spirit. This is very clearly a book which gave its author a great pleasure to write, and he completely takes us with him. That part of it which deals with the famous miniature republic—if republic be the word—of Andorra one naturally turns to first, and it is interesting to see that Mr. O'Connor is not one of those blind followers of the picturesque, to whom all that is exotic is laudable. It is the more interesting to read his remarks as to independence of a state when we remember that he helps to administer a part of our Indian Empire. And from the Andorran chapters, with their neat strokes and admirable observation, we see at once that no matter where Mr. O'Connor may travel we shall always be delighted to travel with him. Andorra is, no doubt, a rather sordid and mean commonwealth of smugglers, but if on his way from India the author should some day get off at Rimini and write a book about the Apennines, we hope that our own ideas as to San Marino will not be shown to be equally a delusion. There, at least, the executive is not so complicated, and the population appear to be devoted more to agriculture than to smuggling. With regard to the other regions of which Mr. O'Connor writes, we may refer to Perpignan, over whose faded glory he laments and then characteristically gives us an excellent sketch of the present Bishop, for whom he has much admiration. This prelate is, as we see, a scholar, and at the same time the inventor of a very profitable liqueur; also he has built his own tomb in the abbey. The old castles of the Pyrenees, the quaint inhabitants, Catalan or otherwise, the scenery—all are depicted to our great entertainment, and the line drawings are even more satisfactory than the photographs and the coloured reproductions, which is saying a good deal.

* "The Loire." By Douglas Goldring. 7s. 6d. net. (Constable.)—"Travels in the Pyrenees." By V. C. Scott O'Connor. 10s. 6d. net. (Long.)

THE HOMER OF INSECTS.*

Many years ago there appeared a small book on insect life entitled "The Population of an Old Pear-tree." It was written in popular language and treated the insects almost as if they were human beings. Yet there was nothing superficial about it. Every page bore the marks of the keenest observation, as well as the most entire sympathy with the joys and sorrows of the insects. The illustrations brilliantly carried out the spirit of the book, and even added a touch of poetry and fancy all their own. Through this fascinating channel the work of the great French naturalist was introduced to English readers without their knowing it. Now, by the industry of Dr. Legros, they know their benefactor, and at the same time, plunge far deeper into the amazing world, the doors of which he has opened to us. With a cleverness which commands our admiration, the biographer has brought out all the most salient points, the most picturesque revelations, the most pregnant discoveries of the humble schoolmaster of the South of France, and at the same time has unveiled for us a character of rare charm.

There is a vague impression abroad that Fabre is merely a peasant with a genius for patient observation. There is an element of truth in this. He is by origin a peasant. In the home of his childhood "the only light, of an evening, came from a splinter of pine, steeped in resin, which was held by a strip of slate stuck into the wall; in times of severe cold his folk shut themselves in the byre to save a little firewood." Undoubtedly, too, he had a genius for patient observation—unfortunately, we must say "hâï," for he is now past work. For no less than forty years he was observing the habits of the Scarabæus Sacer. But Fabre is far more than this. He has been a professor of physics; he is a first-class mathematician, lying awake at nights while absorbed in contemplation of some newly-discovered properties of a curve. This knowledge adds enormously both to his value and to his enthusiasm. It enables him to describe the hunting-net of the Epeira spider, whose "terribly scientific" combinations realise the spiral logarithm of the geyometers. He applies the infinitesimal calculus of Leibnitz to the "transcendent spirals" of the snail. He has composed a beautiful lyric in honour of Number. The man is a poet as well as a scientist, a poet who has sung the praises of the Hyperbola, "the desperate curve which plunges into space in infinite tentacles." Poetic imagination and sympathy pervades his work, makes dull facts burn with a glowing beauty. Never has there been a naturalist better equipped for interpreting to the multitude the marvels and mysteries of Nature.

The marvels: here is the Cerceris wasp hiding its larva in a tunnel and providing it with a larder of meat that keeps fresh for months. How is this possible? The sting of the Cerceris is plunged exactly into the seat of those invisible nervous ganglions which make movement possible. The victim is paralysed, but lives on until the larva is ready for its meal. Another marvel: the Sphex compresses the brain of its victim so as to produce a passing stupor; the glow-worm anaesthetizes the snail, in order to immobilise it before devouring it. The Philanthus wasp, after capturing the honey-bee, "outrages the dying insect" by squeezing honey out of it. Why? because the Philanthus knows instinctively that honey, which is her ordinary fare, is, by a mysterious "inversion," a mortal poison to her larvæ.

* "Fabre, Poet of Science." By Dr. C. V. Legros. Translated by Bernard Miall. 10s. 6d. net. (Fisher Unwin.)

This brings us to the mysteries unravelled by Fabre, or partially unravelled. His experiments showed him that what is poison to an adult is harmless to the larva—"a fresh proof that metamorphosis modifies the substance of the organism to the point of changing its most intimate properties." Then the great mystery of instinct. Fabre proves how mechanical it is. The Pelopæus continues to store away spiders for a larva that has been removed; the mason bee continues to fill a cell already provisioned with all the honey its larva wants. Then the mystery of sacrifice, the submission of the grasshopper before the Praying Mantis, of the Tarantula before its almost despicable enemy, the Pompilus. Fabre accounts for it by supposing a Providential law of renunciation, of self-sacrifice for the collective interest.

Very interesting is Fabre when he comes to attack Darwinism, and demonstrates, for instance, that the supposed striking mimicry of wasps by the Volucella fly is baseless, that its brown and yellow bands do not provide it with a pass into the enemy's country, but that it is actually welcomed as an invaluable scavenger. Most interesting of all is this great naturalist when he deals with general principles, such as the equilibrium of Nature, the task appointed to every insect, the mercy of Nature and the imprint everywhere of a great eternal Power. This biography will have done invaluable service if it sends Englishmen to the study of the works of this great and fascinating naturalist.

W. A. F.

THE DIARY OF LADY SHELLEY.*

It is hardly surprising that the first volume of Lady Shelley's diary (which was published in the Spring of last year) met with so unqualified a success. The popularity of this book was well deserved, for its pages were lively and amusing, and they treated of people and events (belonging to that fascinating period of Nelson and Napoleon) that are just beyond the recollection of people now living. In journalistic phrase our author would probably be described as "a link with the past," because she touched life at so many vital points of modern history, kept a journal, and put into it much of what she had seen and heard. Lady Shelley died in 1873, not so long ago that there must be many now surviving who will have heard from her own lips some of the stories that are related in this book.

A second and final volume compiled from these diaries of Lady Shelley by her grandson, Mr. Richard Edgcumbe, has just made its appearance. It begins in April, 1818, concludes with the year of her death, and it hardly contains a dull page. Mr. Richard Edgcumbe deserves to be commended for his skill in selecting the material of which the two volumes are composed, and congratulated on having completed his task. As an editor he leaves nothing to wish for. Lady Shelley wrote up her journal with exemplary regularity, and evidently it was with a sense of genuine pleasure that she recorded every event of interest, and any amusing chit-chat of the day. Her dry humour is reflected in the stories that she has preserved. Anything whimsical, odd or incredible appealed to her fancy and was set down with exclamation marks. But her diary also reveals a generous and charming personality, a nature which proved so attractive to her irresponsible husband, to her friends and not least to the old Duke of Wellington. We are told in the first volume of Sir John Shelley's gaming proclivities; in the present volume we are able to follow his successes and losses on the turf, and to read of his passion for field sports. Lady Shelley's devotion to her husband never abated, and his interests remained to the end the chief concern of her life. But her natural inclinations were towards politics; she followed all public events closely and criticised every promising aspirant to parliamentary honours. Married to a statesman she might have made a great figure in the world of politics. As it was Lady Shelley shared the political creed of the Duke of Wellington, who was ever ready to discuss his views with her, and the most genial side of his character is revealed in this correspondence; for every event in her life brought a letter from him with its old fashioned courtesy in neatly turned, clear cut phrases. It is interesting to compare his letters with the Duke of Rutland's pompous and wordy epistles: they both treat of political events and social news, but Wellington always remembered that he was addressing a woman of spirit, and he chatted entertainingly; whereas her other correspondent never forgot that he was His Grace of Rutland, and he succeeded in proving himself a sad bore.

The Duke of Wellington's duel with Lord Winchelsea is an old story, but it loses nothing in its telling by Lady Shelley.

She continued to entertain, till the Duke's death, an admiration for him almost amounting to idolatry. But her friendship with Wellington was not to endure without a cloud. The hero of Waterloo had singled her out for marked attention, and had, years before, ridden with her over the scene of his victory within a few weeks of the great battle; had permitted her the great honour of mounting his famous charger Copenhagen, and for many years had been on terms of close intimacy with herself and Sir John Shelley. In January, 1847, the Duke of Wellington wrote a long private letter to Sir John Burgoyne on the defenceless state of England, which he allowed Lady Shelley to see, and she with the most patriotic intentions exerted herself to make its contents generally known. It was a very grave fault, and it was the cause of an estrangement between herself and the Duke, who would not accept from her any explanation. This state of things lasted till 1850, when Sir John Shelley happened to meet Wellington at a party. "Good evening, Duke," said Sir John in his most winning manner. "Do you know it has been said, by someone who must have been present, that the cackling of geese once saved Rome? I have been thinking that perhaps the cackling of my old Goose may yet save England!" This wholly unexpected sally proved too much for the Duke, who burst into a hearty laugh. "By God, Shelley," said he, "you are right; give me your honest hand." Thus Lady Shelley was once more made happy.

In 1819 the Shelleys visited Sir Walter Scott at Abbotsford. This was before he had acknowledged the Waverley Novels, but despite his denial of having written them, their authorship was a stock topic of conversation wherever Scott went.

Mr. Edgcumbe tells the following amusing story about his mother, who was Lady Shelley's daughter. "One day" says Lady Shelley, "I gave a small 'breakfast,' which Scott attended. When most of the people had gone, my daughter Fanny stole up to Walter Scott, and, while the great man was intent on his conversation, she cut off a lock of his hair!" The lock of hair is still in Mr. Edgcumbe's possession.

Lady Shelley had no literary pretensions, and she did not cultivate the society of authors. She confesses, in 1819, that she had no means of judging of the gifts of her husband's young kinsman, Percy Shelley, as she had seen none of his "productions," but she was told that "he seemed to possess great talent" by Walter Scott. The following extracts are from a most interesting letter from Scott to Percy Shelley preserved by Lady Shelley; it is undated but apparently written when Shelley was beginning to write poetry. The elder poet breaks through his habitual rule never to advise young authors, and with much modesty offers some sound counsel:

"Above all, sir, I must warn you against suffering yourself to suppose that the power of enjoying natural beauty and poetical description is necessarily connected with that of producing poetry. The former is really a gift of Heaven, which conduces inestimably to the happiness of those who enjoy it; the record has much more of knack in it than the pride of poets is always willing to admit, but at any rate is only valuable when combined with the first. These are considerations which may serve to reconcile you, sir, to any failure which you may have experienced in your attempt to imitate verses that pleased you, or to celebrate scenes by which you have been delighted. . . . With respect to the idylls of which you have favoured us with copies, they seem to me to have all the merits, and most of the faults, of juvenile compositions. They are fanciful, tender, and elegant, and exhibit both command of language and luxuriance of imagination. On the other hand, they are a little too wordy, and there is too much the air to make the most of everything: too many epithets, and too laboured an attempt to describe minute circumstances. . . . Upon the whole, I think your specimen augurs very favourably of your talents, and that you have not any cause for the apprehensive dejection you have experienced, and which I confess I do not think the worst symptom of your powers: since it is a frequent attribute of genius to distrust its own powers. . . . But, above all, be in no hurry to publish—a name in poetry is soon lost, but it is very difficult to regain it."

* "The Diary of Frances, Lady Shelley, 1818-1873." Edited by her Grandson, Richard Edgcumbe. Vol. II. (Murray.)

In 1840 Lady Shelley went to reside at Lonsdale House, Fulham, where she gave for nearly thirty years those morning parties which became one of the features of the London Season. Here she received some of the most notable people of the day, such as Gladstone, Matthew Arnold, Monckton Milnes, Abraham Hayward, and Samuel Rogers. In her eighty-second year the lease of Lady Shelley's place at Fulham expired, and she thereupon moved to East Cowes where she built a house. During her residence there she was honoured by the personal friendship of Queen Victoria. Mr. Edgcumbe tells us that towards the end of her life Lady Shelley "conceived the idea of collating her various journals with a view to their publication after her death." She made, however, but little progress in this work, which has now, forty years after her death, fallen into the hands of so able an editor.

ROGER INGFEN.

SIX POETS.*

Mr. Flecker believes that poets and critics to-day need a theory to redeem poetry from "foimlessness" and "didactic tendencies." His preface and his own practice recommend the theory of the French Parnassian, whose "desire in writing poetry is to create beauty; his inclination is toward a beauty somewhat statuesque." The Parnassian was saved from being Augustan only by having in his veins Romantic blood. Mr. Flecker is saved, and that very barely, by having not only Parnassian theory, but some modern blood. He will have to show still more modern blood if his theory is to make headway. It is not enough to be hard in outline, lucid in atmosphere, and to have subjects which a Royal Academician would be bound to recognise as beautiful. Messrs. A. E. Housman, Lawrence Binyon, Gordon Bottomley, Sturge Moore, Lady Margaret Sackville, Mrs. Rachel Annand Taylor, and others, have done as well, and often better, without reproaching the age or drawing attention to themselves. But Mr. Flecker maintains a high level, spirited if uninspired, and reminds us of Tennyson in passages like the following:

Behind, the plain's floor rocks: the armies come:
The rose-round lips blow battle horns: the drum
Booms oriental measure. Earth exults.
And still behind, the tottering catapults
Pulled by slow slaves, grey backs with crimson lined,
Roll resolutely west

Of their kind, Mr. Flecker's poems are all but flawless, but is "blue-shadow sweeping" the right word for a plain that blue shadows sweep over?

Mr. Fletcher is less certain of himself and less certain in technique; he has broader notions of beauty, if that word

* "The Golden Journey to Samarkand" By James Elroy Flecker. 2s. 6d. net. (Max Goschen)

"Fire and Wine" By John Gould Fletcher. 2s. 6d. net. (Grant Richards)

"Visions of Evening." By John Gould Fletcher. 2s. 6d. net. (Erskine Macdonald)

"The Dominant City." By John Gould Fletcher. 3s. 6d. net. (Max Goschen)

"Eve and Other Poems." By Ralph Hodgson, and "The Two Wizards." By Richard Honeywood. 6d. each. (At the Sign of the Flying Fame, 45, Roland Gardens, S.W.)

troubles him. But he also has gone to foreign sources, to Baudelaire and Verhaeren, for example, for his poetical. He expresses himself through images that are largely sinister, shadowy, gaunt, terrific, disastrous, desperate, and in "Golgotha" says:

Christ only once trod Golgotha:
Christ only knew one day of woe.
Through life I feel my agony,
And life is slow.

He will not have "patented magic casements, and copy-right nightingales," but satisfies his sincerity by saying to a woman: "I cannot love you but for an instant only," and of his art:

Welcome each sorrow with full heart,
As freely as you welcome bliss;
Never to flinch is the best art,
And to receive all, giving is.

"The Dominant City" contains his best work. He is still experimenting, both in technique and in moods, so that his "dominant city," London, might be any huge city in the presence of a solitary, sensitive questioner. But already his words and his solemn or tortured feelings seem to promise an achievement that should satisfy readers, if not himself.

Mr. Ralph Hodgson cares nothing for Parnassian or any other theory. The difference between his chap books and Messrs. Flecker and Fletcher's bound volumes is the difference between a spinning wheel and a factory. But his spinning wheel is a genuine survival, not a revival. His is a blithe, truly lyric gift, swift and sweet, matchable to-day only in the best work of Messrs. Charles Dalmon and James Stephens. He is one of the few authors to whom it would be a pure compliment to say that they pipe but as the linnet sings, and as Tennyson didn't sing. Truly, as Mr. Hodgson says in a sententious moment:

God loves an idle rainbow,
No less than labouring seas.

And the form of the little book, twenty-four small cut pages, with a few lines to each page and a decoration dropped on to it by Mr. Lovat Fraser, is perfect. They go into the pocket like a letter, and come out more easily. They invite reading. If Barnfield, Sedley, Prior, some of the "Oxford sausage" makers, Peacock, T. E. Brown, the early Masfield, were printed in this form—not to speak of Ben Jonson, Herrick, Blake, Christina Rossetti—a very large number of people would spend sixpence (again and again) on poetry of certain kinds. Mr. Hodgson's work is born for this form: how many kinds are not will be at once apparent to purchasers of the yellow-covered "Eve." Another poet born for this form is a Mr. Richard Honeywood, whose work is similarly decorated, and has the title of "The Two Wizards" on its green cover.

EDWARD THOMAS.

MR. STOPFORD BROOKE ON SHAKESPEARE.*

"It is always a new wonder," says Mr. Stopford Brooke, in the last of these ten more of his lectures, "how close Shakespeare is to human nature." That is not, to be sure, itself a wholly new or particularly wonderful saying. It may, very conceivably, have been said some few times already. When one reads, however—or, better still, listens to—any of Mr. Stopford Brooke's lectures, one is as an ancient Athenian exclaiming, as he listened to a Demosthenes, not "What an orator!" but "Let us march against Philip!" It is not the lecture itself, but its object, that appeals the more directly to everyone. No one can move people better to think and feel with him, in literature, about the immediate subject on which he is lecturing. And thus it is that in this series of addresses, which are now published as essays, he brings the reader directly to that ultimate source of "new wonder" in Shakespeare—his humanity.

It is of no use, he writes, to say that the poet is an artist dealing in independence with his materials, with men's passions and principles. "He writes in a passion of pity for men, in a passion of resentment for their pains." That is the thought which recurs in these essays. It is brought out, in one or other of its phases, in each of the three great stages—in the comedies, tragedies, and the so-called "romantic" plays, and it is wonderful how, as the writer traces out this course of the poet's "passion of pity," the style of the writing reflects the successive moods of those moments. Indeed, in its fine quality of responsiveness, in the nimble turn of the thoughts and fancies, and in the central hold on main issues, Mr Stopford Brooke's criticism is something akin to creation. The reader is, so to speak, sitting at an ideal spectacle, held spell-bound by the acting. On no real stage, certainly, was ever presentment so moving. "I repeat," runs the essay on "Othello," "that Shakespeare was not in these tragedies the impersonal artist. He chose these grim, awful, piteous and fierce subjects because his mood towards humanity was grim with pain, because the questioning of mortal doubt and trouble which he did represent in 'Hamlet' had left him without an answer to give to the problem of misery and evil." It is however, when he goes on to show the essential sanity and healthfulness of true artistry that Mr Stopford Brooke is at his finest. He is on ground which puts him simply above criticism when he points out that if Shakespeare did falter once in his faith, and his sympathy to that very extent also his power as an artist faltered. "Measure for Measure," "Troilus and Cressida," "Iliad of Athens" are they not plays in which the 'hand wavers' and 'the view of the situation is not inevitably right'?"

* "Ten More Plays of Shakespeare." By Stopford A. Brooke. 7s. 6d. net. (Constable.)

But as genius may suffer, so also is it given to it to shake itself free of mere torments and, after treading the Inferno, to mount and behold once more the stars.

"In nature, not nobly built, who have not a solid foundation of healthy humanity, to whom cheerfulness and joy and love of human nature are not native, such cynicism when it comes is cherished, grows and finally masters them. But in nature that are of an opposite character—noble, healthy, joyous loving, such cynicism is transient. It is like a close and gloomy cloud veil, which after violent storm, makes grey the landscape and is silent from the exhaustion of the forces which preceded it. It broods like a curse over the land and takes all colour out of everything. Then a clear wind arises from the west, the black vapour thins, breaks upwards into soft cloud flakes, sun smitten into tender beauty, and in the quiet sky the evening sun is shining with a lovely and delicate light, more lovely and delicate than was its radiance in the morning."

These ten essays do not present in its fulness this beautiful twilight impression, for they do not deal directly at all with those last lovelinesses—"The Winter's Tale," "Cymbeline," "The Tempest." What they do give however, of the gay and gracious, as well as of the grave mood in Shakespeare is always equal in treatment and attests the same quality of sympathy in Mr Stopford Brooke's insight. Amongst pure comedies, the book includes essays on "Much Ado About Nothing" and "Twelfth Night," while amongst histories it embraces "Henry IV. Parts I and II," thus bringing in "the wave-crest of good humour" on which Shakespeare was being borne along when he created Falstaff. "A triumph of imaginative and executive genius," Mr Stopford Brooke further calls that creation and the triumph which he means by that is not a triumph of art only, but of science also—of the science of true history.

"What Shakespeare did (in thus adding common life to history) for the ideal of true history was not realised by historians for some centuries. Only lately have some historians begun to realise that the doings, thought, and daily life of the burghers and the working classes and the poor of the country itself, their ways and speech, and above all what the literature of England was and made were also history, and not rarely more important history than the doings of statesmen and armies."

They might have learnt that lesson earlier, Mr Stopford Brooke adds, from Shakespeare's "Henry IV." and "Henry V." They might also have learnt it, one may venture oneself to add, if they had considered certain of the actual characters who are more immediately in their special field of vision. Was it not Marlborough—or Chatham? who took his history from Shakespeare? No doubt either of those two would have worn his historical knowledge with some difference from the way in which Mr Stopford Brooke means that historians ought to have worn it. It is however distinctively instructive to find personages who have themselves contributed to real history turning for their own knowledge of times past and for their analysis of motive and of character in other great actors in that drama to that source which as Aristotle has it, is even truer than true history—namely, Poetry.

BIALMOAT FITCHER.

Novel Notes.

SHALLOWS By Frederick Watson 6s. (Methuen)

Mr Frederick Watson has taken an excellent romantic theme for his new novel 'Shallows,' and has handled it in the right glamorous spirit of romance. There have been stories enough of the 'Young Pretender' in the days when he was young but Mr Watson takes him at the less known, less obviously picturesque period of his career when he was living obscurely in France, a discredited, dissipated, broken, prematurely aged man. His identity is kept a secret from all but a faithful few, and one of the most tensely dramatic moments in the book is that when he is deterred from making insulting advances to Ethlena Murdoch, touched by her singing of a sad, gallant old ditty of Prince Charlie and the days of '45, and in a rush of shame and remorse, confesses, "I was Prince Charlie!" Even a realisation of his true character and the gross depths into which he had sunk cannot shake Ethlena's loyalty to her ideal of the banished king and in the futile rising that a very miscellaneous, variously-actuated remnant of his followers plan in his favour, she plays to this middle-aged, degenerate pretender the part that Flora MacDonald played to the Bonnie Prince Charlie of years gone by. The character of the Prince in all its pitiful weakness is drawn with unsparing realism; he makes a sorry, squalid figure for a hero of romance, but in the loyal faithfulness of Ethlena and the best of his adherents, the perils they face, the adventures they experience, the intriguing and outlawry in which they are involved for his sake there is no lack of romance that is full of colour and stirring incident. The pictures of Highland life and character are admirable. The love that awakens in Ethlena for the subtle Carmichael, before she learns that he is a spy, can have no happy ending and the grim tragedy of the close is in keeping with the shadow of thwarted hopes and inevitable misfortune, the sense of vain striving in a lost cause that haunts one all through the book. Most romances achieve the romantic by leaving out the fallible human element. Mr. Watson's men and women move in the very atmosphere of romance but retain their faulty mortal qualities, and it is this that gives their story its freshness and poignancy of interest. "Shallows" is a picturesque tale, well imagined and well constructed, and the power and pathos of it are heightened by the artistic restraint with which it is written.

Photo by Elliot & Fry.

Mr. Frederick Watson.

THE SPANISH MARRIAGE. By Helen Mary Keynes
(Chatto & Windus)

This is the first novel of a very young writer, and as such it deserves high praise. The construction of the story, perhaps, betrays a lack of experience, but the style is decidedly not that of an amateur. The ill-fated excursion into Spain of George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, and Prince Charles makes capital groundwork for an historical novel. Miss Keynes acted wisely in setting her story in the Stuart period, for she is sure of a welcome from the lovers of historical novels. Age cannot wither nor custom stale the infinite variety of the Stuarts, and the glamour of their misdeeds shows no signs of waning. The Duke of Buckingham becomes a most lovable man in Miss Keynes' hands, and contrasted with the boorishness of James the First and the sullenness and sensuality of Baby Charles, he stands, hero-like, head and shoulders above his masters. Whether it is a faithful portrait is a moot point. The author works up her climaxes well, particularly in the story of Buckingham's departure for Spain with Prince Charles. You can almost hear the clatter of the horses' hoofs upon the Dover road, and feel the intensity of the adventure when the rumble of coach wheels breaks in upon their ears, and at Rochester when the royal travellers are charged as conspirators, it is with a sigh of relief that you read of the resourceful "Steele" saving the situation. To use a North Country phrase, Miss Keynes "will do," and we shall look forward to her more mature work.

THE ROAD TO VICTORY. By Rose Schuster 6s.
(Chapman & Hall)

Miss Schuster has chosen a very difficult subject and made an excellent historical romance out of it. Her young hero is Frederick the Great: she studies his character with the carefulness of a historian and the insight of an imaginative writer, and though she keeps close to facts, her work is as full of movement and excitement as a piece of pure fiction. It is a tale of the conversion of an arrogant young fop into the hardest-headed man of business that ever sat on a throne. And interwoven with this theme is the problem of the transformation of a princely apostle of peace—the Carnegie of his age—into the most unscrupulous and successful of Royal robbers. It would perhaps be too much to say that Miss Schuster succeeds in making Frederick into a sympathetic character: even Carlyle could not do that, at the height of his genius and enthusiasm for the disciple of Voltaire. But she does humanize him a little, and his strange, enigmatical personality fascinates the reader, even if it does not win his admiration. Altogether "The Road to Victory" is one of those rare historical novels which are both good novels and good historical studies.

THE BRAT. By Mrs. H. H. Penrose. 6s. (Mills & Boon.)

Three of the most outrageously naughty and impudent children that one is likely to meet with between the covers of a book are to be found in Mrs. Penrose's lively and entertaining story, "The Brat." Callous and cruelly mischievous, they yet contrive to win the affection of all they come in contact with, and secure much undeserved forgiveness through their powerful and astounding sense of honour. The poor governess is the chief target for their torment; she is faded, broken-spirited, and middle-aged, and the pathos of a shattered love affair in her youth lends a grey background to a number of bright, amusing incidents. Strangely enough, her greatest tormentor, the Brat, is the one who unconsciously brings into her drab life a long-postponed happiness, and the story ends amid general rejoicings. Lightly told, but distinctly interesting, it makes excellent reading, and the unique children, with their pranks and daring, form splendid material for any quantity of unusual situations—material of which the author has taken full advantage.

BOTH SIDES OF THE ROAD. By B. A. Clarke 6s.
(Ward, Lock)

A FORTUNE AT STAKE. By Nat Gould. 6s. (Long)

Mr. Clarke's book consists of a series of rather loosely-connected sketches and stories dealing with the people who live in the vicinity of Trafalgar Road—which is two miles of the London end of the Great North Road. On the east live the working classes, whose stories, as related by Mr. Clarke, are invariably pathetic and sometimes tragic. Here the author is seen at his best. He handles his material with assurance and sympathy; his humour is unforced, and his sentiment never degenerates into sentimentality. On the west of Trafalgar Road are the middle-classes, which make good but less satisfactory material for the writer, who by the way shows himself to be quite at home on the cricket-field. In this second part, in fact, Mr. Clarke is best as a humorist pure and simple. But, although we prefer certain portions, the whole book well deserves to be read.

"A Fortune at Stake" is an astonishing contrast, though its characters are equally true to type. They seem to be interested only in their own amusements, with which even their love affairs are almost inseparably bound up. The hero is a millionaire who must surely be also one of the most successful amateur jockeys ever heard of. He spends his time solely in winning "classic" races and getting through his enormous fortune; he is not edifying, but he is perfectly harmless—a thorough "good fellow." Mr. Nat Gould can draw this sort of character with a precision which is almost alarming, and he has also an easy faculty for the invention of appropriate complications with which to pad out and make interesting his rather uninspired accounts of races. In fact, "A Fortune at Stake" is a typical Nat Gould story, breezy, innocuous, and very nice for people who like that sort of thing. It is published experimentally at six shillings in the hope that lady readers will borrow it from the libraries. Perhaps they will, for there is no reason at all why Mr. Gould's admirers should all be men.

Messrs. JACK have pleasure in announcing that the New Encyclopaedia will be on Sale by the Booksellers on October 2nd.

THE NEW ENCYCLOPAEDIA IN A SINGLE VOLUME EQUAL IN EXTENT TO SIX LARGE VOLUMES.

1600 PAGES. CLOTH 7/6 NET.

No more hunting for the right volume.
No more tracing references from one volume to another.
Concise written, accurate and thoroughly abreast of modern knowledge.
Strong in Science. With Maps and Illustrations.

EDITOR: H. C. O'NEILL, Editor of "The People's Books." Assisted by a Staff of Expert Contributors in the various branches.

THE PEOPLE'S BOOKS

ANOTHER 12 VOLUMES. CLOTH 6d. NET.

A Library of New Books by Writers of Distinction, bringing within the reach of all the results of Modern Knowledge.

3. BIOLOGY. By Prof. W. D. HENDERSON, M.A.
24. SIR WILLIAM HUGGINS AND SPECTROSCOPIC ASTRONOMY. By E. W. MAUNDER, F.R.A.S., of the Royal Observatory, Greenwich.
29. KANT'S PHILOSOPHY. By A. D. LINDSAY M.A., of Balliol College, Oxford.
42. ENGLAND IN THE MAKING (before 1066). By Prof. F. J. C. HEARNshaw, M.A., LL.D.
44. THE MONARCHY AND THE PEOPLE (1485-1689). By W. T. WALSH, M.A.
70. THE EXPERIMENTAL PSYCHOLOGY OF BEAUTY. By C. W. VALENTINE, M.A.
88. GOETHE. By Prof. C. H. HERFORD, LL.D.
111. SPIRITUALISM. By J. ARTHUR HILL.
112. KINDERGARTEN TEACHING AT HOME. By Two Members of the National Froebel Union.
114. THE STOCK EXCHANGE. By J. F. WHEELER.
115. COLERIDGE. By S. L. BENSUSAN.
116. THE CRUSADES. By M. M. C. CALTHROP.

"Here are volumes which throw open all the treasures of science, philosophy, history, and literature, as they are known to scholars of the present generation, books which are planned to cover the whole range of knowledge, and summarize some particular branch in an easy and simple style that is sure to urge the reader to closer study of the subject. Was I not right in declaring that education is within everyone's reach to-day? With 'The People's Books' in hand, there should be nobody of average intelligence unable to secure self-education. His library—this library—should be his all-sufficing university."—Sunday Times.
"The most amazing of all the issues of cheap books which have astonished our day and generation."—The Expository Times.

LONDON: T. C. & E. C. JACK, 67, LONG ACRE, W.C.
AND EDINBURGH. AND ALL BOOKSELLERS.

CONSTABLE'S NEW BOOKS

THE MASTERS OF MODERN FRENCH CRITICISMS.

By Irving Babbitt

Professor of French Literature in Harvard University. Author of "The New Laocoon," &c. 8s. 6d. net.

A study of the main trend of nineteenth-century thought as reflected in the work of some of its most significant personalities, especially Madame de Staël, Chateaubriand, Sainte-Beuve, Renan, Taine, Scherer, and Brunetière.

"Un livre exceptionnellement remarquable, très docte, infiniment agréable, débordant d'idées, dont beaucoup sont frappantes de justesse."—AUGUSTIN FILLON in Le Journal des Débats.

HIS LIFE, HISTORY AND GENIUS.

GEORGE MEREDITH.

By Constantin Photiades

Translated from the French by ARTHUR PRICE. 6s. net.

"Sound and well-written . . . most distinguished"—The Times.

"No better introduction to Meredith could be desired"—The Athenæum.

"The book is a worthy book . . . an admirable translation"—The Glasgow Herald.

TEN MORE PLAYS OF SHAKESPEARE

By Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, M.A., LL.D.

Author of "On Ten Plays of Shakespeare" De my 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

"Dr Stopford Brooke is the 'ideal spectator' of the Shakespearian drama. As he sits at the play his whole nature is thoroughly alert, intelligence, imagination, and emotion unite to receive the full impression of each scene and character, and then his own impressive speech conveys the impression to his readers without loss . . . The words one finds oneself using of Dr Stopford Brooke's gift of appreciation are such as 'intuition' and 'insight'."—The Times.

SIDELIGHTS. 7s. 6d. net.

Lady Blennerhassett

"Very interesting . . . admirably translated into English by Mrs. Gülicher. No one could be more fitted to cope with the task. Lady Blennerhassett's previous contributions to literature, her encyclopædic knowledge of historical facts, and her thorough grasp of the main political, religious, and economic considerations which moved the hearts and influenced the actions of men during the revolutionary convulsion give her a claim, which none will dare dispute, to speak with authority on this subject."—The Spectator.

NEW LETTERS OF AN IDLE MAN.

By the Author of "EUROPEAN YEARS," ETC.

Hermann Jackson Warner

Edited by G. L. WOODBERRY. 7s. 6d. net.

"These delightful letters . . . the correspondence printed in this most entertaining volume is never lacking in vivacity, character, and insight. Will make friends wherever the art of correspondence is valued."—The Daily Telegraph.

NEW POETRY.

MOODS AND METRES.

By Charles Newton Robinson

With a Bibliographical Note and a Portrait of the Author in Photogravure. Special editions—400 copies, Imperial 8mo, 5s. net, and 100 copies, large paper, 7s. 6d. net.

"Well worth preserving. The whole soundness of his ideals, the fastidiousness with which he chose his words, the attention he paid to metre, and his delicate mastery of it in many forms go a long way to justify his wish to be remembered by his verse. We feel sure that his friends will like to possess this volume, with its sympathetic memoirs as a preface, and we hope on account of more than one piece which it contains that it will not be overlooked by anthologists."—The Times.

A DOME OF MANY-COLOURED GLASS.

5s. net.

By Amy Lowell

"These poems show the influence of the Modern French School in the careful and delicate quality of their technique, and in the subtle and sophisticated emotions with which they deal. But they are also infused with a very rare and unusual quality of emotion, which is lacking in so much of the work of to-day."

"The Road to Avignon" is one of the best lyrics of recent years.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

NOW READY. A New Novel by the Author of "The Claw," "Poppy," etc., CYNTHIA STOCKLEY.

entitled THE DREAM SHIP.

THE POT OF BASIL.

Bernard Capes

VANISHING POINTS.

Alice Brown

A WILFUL WIDOW.

Edith Mowbray

THE PENALTY.

Gouverneur Morris

LONDON

MAGPIE HOUSE. By Andrew Soutar. 6s. (Cassell.)

Taking as his subject the descendants of a famous Sussex smuggler, Mr. Andrew Soutar has woven a very striking romance with the Downs as a setting. The theme in its handling inevitably challenges comparison with "Lorna Doone." Change the Stuart period to our own time, substitute the wild spaces of Sussex for Exmoor, turn "girl" Jan Ridd into an equally athletic hero in the person of Adam Black, and Lorna into the beautiful blind girl Verity Lavender, and you have a portion at any rate of the author's story. It says much for Mr. Soutar's ability that "Magpie House" is no unworthy successor to Blackmore's famous romance. The two fights in the book are admirably done, they linger in the memory and stir one's imagination as few such descriptions do. Mr. Soutar has the real romantic gift, and the stroke by which he brings Adam Black, the incarnation of the spirit of the Downs, into convincing juxtaposition with his brother Stephen Black, a typical twentieth century financier, is masterly. The character drawing in "Magpie House" is admirable, and the author has succeeded in giving us quite a gallery of human beings. Reuben Blunt, the shepherd, with his Kiplingesque imagination, Phineas Black with his dry, respectable humour and his incorrigible taste for the savage side of life, Aunt Hannah and Netie, the artist's model, are all people whose acquaintance it is a genuine pleasure to have made. "Magpie House" is a first class romance of its kind, and the publishers are to be congratulated on calling attention to its attractiveness by the very striking cover picture from the brush of Mr. Dudley Tennant.

LOVE AND £200 A YEAR. By Mrs. Alfred Praga. 2s. net (T. Werner Laurie.)

Cynthia Rafferty wished to prove that marriage on "£200 a year certain" need not mean squalor and bad management, badly-cooked and badly-served meals, and an ill-kept house. It need not mean going without a servant and turning oneself into a household drudge. And it need not mean going without pretty things and most of the refinements of life. Cynthia's sister was marrying a rich man for his money. Cynthia was marrying a poor man for love, and the moral of the book is obvious. From the moment Cynthia accepted the proposal of Roy Carruthers she determined to make a science of household management, and, like the Ancient Mariner and the wedding-guest, she buttonholes her mercenary sister and talks chapters of "managing" to her till the mercenary sister flies from the room. Cynthia was undoubtedly the right person for Roy. She is wonderful. She plays at learning shopping and cooking and laundering, and so forth; but we feel quite sure she knows it all thoroughly before she begins. She is really a marvel of practical sense, and we sincerely thank her for her pretended ignorance, which draws from her friend, the Irish cook, so many good recipes and cookery "tips." We are glad to leave Cynthia in a model home, with a contented husband and two sons. We only wish she had paid Matilda rather better wages and saved it off the store cupboard.

THE CLOAK OF ST. MARTIN. By Armine Grace. 6s. (Stanley Paul.)

This is a piece of pure wild melodrama which we expect some day to see on the stage. It has all the elements of a Lyceum or Drury Lane success—a society gambling scene, a murder, the execution of an innocent man, and a picturesque cripple who tracks down the real murderer by means of bloodhounds. With a revolving stage, the chase of the bloodhounds through London would be very exciting. And in addition to all these ordinary ingredients of the old and genuine Adelphi drama, the authoress has a new type of hero suggested to her, so she acknowledges, by Mr. H. A. Samsbury. This new type of hero is a wealthy barrister who is responsible for the execution of the innocent man. When it is made clear to him that he has used his great gifts wrongly, he devotes the rest of his life to sheltering the children of the wronged man and discovering the real murderer. He also sets up a detective agency for helping all prisoners who claim they have been falsely accused. He is really an interesting character drawn in a life-like way: but as the murderer turns out to be his own brother, the melodramatic atmosphere is strenuously maintained to the last sensational scene.

THE SHADOW OF EVIL. By Carlton Dawe. 6s. (Laurie.)
THE NETHER MILLSTONE. By Gilbert Littlestone. 6s. (Ward, Lock.)

Mr. Carlton Dawe's new book is a melodramatic story with a great deal of rather undeveloped plot, but enough spirit to keep the reader intrigued and entertained from the first chapter to the last. The evil of the title consists of the murder (in Chapter II.) of the rascalion Densley by that greater villain, the man who loves his wife. The unhappy lady escapes for the time being, but her past is artfully calculated to weight her down in the later developments of the story. "The Shadow of Evil" is quite successful in its way.

Mr. Gilbert Littlestone is much more deliberate than Mr. Dawe, and his new novel is if anything too long for rather an ancient plot. The hero is heir to an estate which the heroine enjoys, but he refuses to press his claim in order that the girl may get to love him for himself alone. His little plan very neatly fails, but the heroines of melodrama are not often normal human beings, and Miss Mary Dashwood Mallory is no exception to the rule. So after a good deal of trouble with another and fraudulent claimant she falls happily into the hero's arms in the last chapter of a book of which it would be very ungracious to say that it is unreadable.

The Seven Sisters and Coast-guard Station, Seaford, where Verity and Adam met.

"The Snake Valley." On the left, Hindon Hill, down the slope of which Adam rolled Dan O'Beady.

Views of Seaford, in and around which the scenes of Mr. Andrew Soutar's novel, "Magpie House," are laid.

READERS OUT OF REACH

of a good local bookseller, or who live abroad, are asked to write direct to London for their books, which will be sent by return of post, at lowest cash prices, on receipt of remittance with order

German or French Books (if not obtainable in London) are posted to customers direct from Leipzig or Paris by my agents there thus saving postage

LONDON AGENT FOR LIBRARIES ABROAD.

Subscription Newspaper and Periodical Agency for British and Foreign Publications

List of 1600 Subscription Rates free on application

CATALOGUES SENT POST FREE

- 1 Reference Book Catalogue of 146 pp of Standard Literature
- 2 Remainder Catalogue of over 1000 titles of Publishers Reminders, in good condition as issued, at from 30% to 80% off published prices
- 3 List of Pocket Editions and 7d Novels
- 4 Price List of Subscription Rates for British Periodicals abroad with a selection of the most popular American French, German and Spanish periodicals

ESTABLISHED
1851

ALFRED WILSON

Export and Retail Bookseller

18-19 GRACECHURCH STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Telephone: 7463 Central

Bankers: London County & Westminster (Combar Street)

AUTHORS' AGENCY The SURREY LITERARY AGENCY place MSS. promptly and obtain the best possible terms, because it is conducted on literary lines and business principles SPECIAL FACILITIES FOR PLACING NOVELS, Etc. Prospectus free on application to "Strathmore," Westbury Road, New Malden, Surrey (Kindly note new address.)

BOOKS (Secondhand). Catalogues post free. Thousands of books in stock, moderately priced. R. ATKINSON, 97, Sunderland Road, Forest Hill, London.

FOR SALE—8 bound volumes of "The Bookman," from 1899 to 1907, in perfect condition. Apply Executors of Alexander Shepherd, 55 Frederick Street, Sunderland.

TYPEWRITING.—MSS. of every description Copied Accurately and Promptly, 9d. 1,000 words (postage inclusive) Testimonials from Authors, &c.—MISS JACOBS, 18, Statham Grove, Clissold Park, N. (Kindly note change of Address.)

WM. GLAISHER, LTD.,

Remainder and Discount Bookseller,

265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.

GENERAL REMAINDER CATALOGUE

NOW READY.

POST FREE

TYPEWRITING BY EXPERTS.

Authors' MSS., etc., executed on the shortest notice. Estimates free. Southern Typewriting Co., 160, New Road, Portsmouth.

BORROW

ROMANTIC BALLADS

Translated from the Danish and miscellaneous pieces by GEORGE BORROW

A facsimile reproduction Limited to 300 copies, numbered of which 50 are on hand made paper, 10s. 6d. net Hand made edition 15s. net

Size 9 6 inches 194 pages with the three original title pages and a brief Bibliographical Note by Clement Shorter recording the history of the book and facsimile of MS in Borrow's writing. Beautifully printed on antique paper specially selected to match the original Bound in paper boards (uncut edges) with label

N.B.—The issue is almost exhausted

IN THE FOOTSTEPS OF BORROW AND FITZGERALD

By MORLEY ADAMS Large Crown 8vo (8 54) 256 pp With 40 illustrations in duo tone 6s. net

Mr Morley Adams is a delightful companion and raconteur. He is at his best in dealing with his beloved Borrow and Fitzgerald. This volume supplies a wealth of most valuable information not only of these two literary giants but also of the great men who have been born in East Anglia or who have made it their home and contains as a frontispiece the only photograph of Borrow ever taken and only recently known

Souvenir of the George Borrow Celebration

NORWICH JULY 5th 1913

2s. 6d. net

LONDON JARROLD & SONS

Worth Reading & Re-Reading

The Wooings of Jezebel Pettyfer

"The Great Classic of the West Indies"

By HALDANE MACFALL 6s

It is interesting to examine the creative work of a trenchant critic in this book we are enabled to judge the art of a writer who has won to fame as a judge of the art of others. The author set himself the difficult task of creating the atmosphere of the tropics a fierce play of comedy and tragedy amongst a people who have long been known only to the white folk in caricature. He reveals to us the essential negro—his humour, his weaknesses, his strength, his ambitions his superstitions, his daily life, his point of view, his follies as he has never been discovered. And Jezebel of the mixed blood centres the conflict of the white and the black in unforgettable fashion. His book is written in swift vivid, dramatic incidents which forbid piddling and demand almost breathless action

Put The Wooings of Jezebel Pettyfer on your Library List to-day. You will not be disappointed.

LONDON. SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & CO. LTD.

BELOW STAIRS. By Mrs Alfred Sidgwick 6s (Methuen)

We question whether the romance of the kitchen has ever been transcribed before, at any rate it is new to us, and after reading Mrs Sidgwick's new book we do not advise novelists to dig with too much diligence in this quarry. This is not to imply that Mrs Sidgwick has not succeeded, but rather that she has done so well as to preclude other novelists from doing better. It is a real achievement to write a story of some three hundred pages about a servant girl and her experiences in different houses without having recourse to extraordinary events and situations, and yet at the same time gain the reader's sympathy and attention. Priscilla Day was the daughter of John Day, who totally lacked business foresight and ascribed his failure to bad luck and of Mrs Day a capable woman who had been in service in good houses and desired nothing better for her daughter than a similar career. The misfortunes of John Day necessitate a removal into a ramshackle old cottage in the village, with some disreputable folk of the name of Spillers as neighbours. Polly Spillers is the evil genius of the story and appears at a critical time in London when Priscilla had lost a situation. Priscilla "sees life" with Polly but her innate good sense saves her from disgrace. Priscilla's heart is eventually won by an old love on her native heath where she returns after many vicissitudes in London. Mrs Sidgwick's story makes a timely appearance in these domestically troubled days and will find favour alike with mistress and maid.

THE BROKEN HALO. By Florence Barclay 6s (Putnam)

As not a few novelists have shown pertinacity in adhering to one locality as a background for their study of character, so Mrs Barclay has not hesitated to use once and again the same situation as the inspiration of her sentiment. In the present instance we have some hesitation in describing the book as a love story, for Dr Richard Cameron, in the course of his professional duties as a locum tenens in the country, developed a tender attachment for one of his patients the Little White Lady, a widow for the second time, and old enough to be his mother. When Thomas Atkins has committed a misdemeanour he is said by his comrades to have "dirtied his ticket." In more polite and suitable language, Dr Cameron "broke his halo" by his unpardonable curiosity in making some research at Somerset House into the state of the Little White Lady's finances. Like the kind mother Nature intended her to be, the Little White Lady overlooked the offence, married Dr Richard, and lost no time in fading out of the story, in order to make way for the true love in the background, who was also a widow, it is true, but of junior standing. The manner of Dr Richard's breaking of his halo will put him beyond the forgiveness of many readers, but many more will doubtless yield themselves gladly again to the glamour of Mrs Barclay's pretty way.

Mrs. Florence Barclay.

LILY MAGIC. By Mary I Pendered 6s (Mills & Boon)

There is hardly an unpleasant character in "Lily Magic," but were it choke-full of them and Amaylis Whyte (or Mryll) remained, it would still leave a good taste in the mouth. It is no exaggeration to say that in the figure of her heroine Miss Pendered has drawn one of the most attractive girls we have met in fiction for a very long time, and considering the difficulties of making of a charming book-character really charming, it would be enough to recommend "Lily Magic" on Mryll's account alone. And in other respects, to tell the truth, the book, although exceedingly readable, is not particularly striking. The plot is rather thin and it strikes us as improbable, notwithstanding the author's assurances to the contrary, and the minor characters are mainly conventional. The background—a Northamptonshire village—is particularly well done, however, and it—always, of course, with Mryll—makes the book one that will dwell long in the memory as one of the pleasantest and most fragrant that 1913 has given us.

TIDE MARKS By Margaret Westrup 6s (Methuen)

The strangeness and novelty of Mrs W Sydney Stacey's story are likely to please a large number of readers. The opening chapters struck us as being thin in quality, owing to the authoress having failed to realise her characters. Happily the minor poet and the gipsy woman soon disappear, and their daughter, who is a typical flapper, occupies the scene. Her audacity is equal to her inexperience, and she enters into the most extraordinary adventure with a lightheartedness that appals her friends. She marries a man on the condition that she shall only be his housekeeper—the man himself being forced to agree to this arrangement in order to prevent the girl from marrying an old cad of a professor on the same terms. The wilful irresponsible flapper is of course a maid of remarkable beauty, and her husband, passionately in love with her, has at first a tragic time of it. For until love touches her in turn she is a thing without a soul, who plays with burning coals as if they were bits of cold stone. Mrs. Stacey takes her strange heroine rather too seriously, yet draws her character so well that the story for all its strangeness remains a transcript from modern life. For one feels in the wildest part of the tale, that a flapper of the new school would do just what Philippa Hamilton does in the circumstances. She is a creature of secondhand emotions, versed in all the "advanced" thought of this age of moral anarchy, but afraid to trust her own feelings. Irritated realistically, the story would have ended in a miserable tragedy, but Mrs Stacey transforms it into a pretty idyll of the awakening of love in the heart of a wilful, fascinating girl.

THE NIGHT OF MEMORY By Edmund B d'Auvergne 6s (Lancet)THE MAN IN THE CAR By Alan Raleigh 6s (Long)

Mr d'Auvergne's hero is a distinguished aviator and inventor, apparently an American, who has survived an eruption on the island of Palmiste, in the West Indies, at the cost of his memory. He knows neither his name nor his antecedents but he works hard, and at the beginning of this story he is in the pay of the German Government. He runs across the beautiful Rhona Melrose the daughter of an English officer who has been found guilty of treachery and has died in disgrace, and, though not an impressionable young man, he falls in love with her. Rhona accepts him on conditions the most important of which is that he helps her to clear her father's reputation. The remainder of the book consists of a very skilful account of the enquiries made by Rhona and her lover and the gradual piecing together of the evidence collected. Mr d'Auvergne is a vivacious writer with a sense of character, and his first novel shows that he has more—and just as efficient—strings to his bow than the "library biographies" which he has written hitherto. "The Night of Memory" is a love-story with a detective interest, but "The Man in the Car" is a detective-story with a love interest. Mr Alan Raleigh understands the second type of story very well, and his book is one of the most ingenious murder mysteries we have read for a long time. It would be grossly unfair to the author to give away any portion of a very excellent plot, which is most carefully and interestingly worked out. The best thing we can do is to recommend everybody to read the book for themselves. It is almost, but—and here is the art of the detective story—not quite impossible for the reader to discover the true solution of the mystery before the author supplies his own explanation of it.

FROM Mr. JOHN LANE'S AUTUMN LIST.

Art Volumes.

ALASTAIR. Forty Four Drawings in Colour and Black and White With a Note of Exclamation by ROBERT ROSS Limited to 500 Copies for England and America 42s net

CHARLES CONDER: His Life and Works. By FRANK GIBSON With a Catalogue of the Lithographs and Etchings by CAMPBELL DODGSON, M.A., Keeper of Prints and Drawings at the British Museum 21s net

THE ANGLO-FRENCH ENTENTE IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY. By CHARLES BASTIDE With many Illustrations 12s 6d net.

WHISTLER'S PASTELS AND OTHER MODERN PROFILES. By A. L. GALLATIN With 22 Plates, including 9 hitherto unpublished Designs by WHISTLER 10s 6d net

A STAINED GLASS TOUR IN ITALY. By CHARLES H. SHERRILL, Author of "Stained Glass Tours in England," etc 7s 6d net

THE BEAUTIFUL LADY CRAVEN. The Original Memoirs of Elizabeth Baroness Craven, afterwards Margravine of Anspach and Bayreuth, and Princess Berkeley of the Holy Roman Empire (1750-1828.) Edited with Notes and a Bibliographical and Historical Introduction, containing much hitherto unpublished matter, by A. M. BROADBLY and LEWIS MELVILLE 2 Vols 26s net

Historical. Biographical. etc.

ANTHONY TROLLOPE: His Work, Associates, and Originals. By F. H. S. ESCOTT 12s 6d net

HARRIET HOSMER: Letters and Memoirs. Edited by CORNELIA CARR 12s 6d net

THE GREATEST HOUSE AT CHELSEY. By RANDALL DAVIS With 16 Illustrations 10s 6d net

Travel.

TRAVELS WITHOUT BAEDER. By ARDERN BEAMAN 7s 6d net

ENGLISH TRAVELLERS OF THE RENAISSANCE. By CLARE HOWARD With 16 Illustrations 7s 6d net

ADVENTURES WITH A SKETCH BOOK. By DONALD MAXWELL Illustrated by the Author 7s 6d net

GLIMPSSES OF INDIAN BIRDS. By DOUGLAS DEWAR 7s 6d net

Miscellaneous.

A VAGABOND IN NEW YORK. By OLIVER MADDOX HUITLER With 8 Illustrations by R. I. HALLINGS 3s 6d net

THE VALLEY OF SHADOWS. By FRANCIS GRIERSON New Edition With 13 Illustrations by EVELYN PAUL 5s net

SIX SHILLING NOVELS.

BEHIND THE BEYOND. (3s 6d net) STEPHEN LEACOCK

CONCESSIONS. SYDNEY SCHIFF

THE HAT SHOP. Mrs C. S. PLEL

GREEN CHALK. DORIS SOMERVILLE

THE PURPLE MISTS. F. F. MILLS YOUNG

THE STRONG HEART. A. R. GORING-THOMAS

GARDEN OATS. ALICE HERBERT

FASCINATION. CECIL CHAMPAIN LEWIS

APRIL PANHASARD. MURIEL HINE

THE WORLD'S DAUGHTER. CYRIL HARCOURT

THE DISTANT DRUM.

DUDLEY STURROCK

GREAT DAYS.

FRANK HARRIS

MADELEINE AT HER MIRROR.

MARCELLE TINAYRE.

SIMPLE SIMON.

NELLY LYONS

OPINIONS OF JEROME COIGNARD.

ANATOLE FRANCE

TWO LITTLE PARISIANS. (3s 6d net)

PIERRE MILLE

THE SONG OF SONGS. SUDERMANN

THE SON OF HIS MOTHER.

CLARA VIBERG

THE BODLEY HEAD, VIGO STREET, LONDON, W.

THE LOVE THAT LASTS By G B Burgin 6s (Hodder & Stoughton)

A prominent figure in this entertaining story is a Conservative Hertfordshire squire who, with his brother the vicar, insists that the old order changeth not, or that if it does, it has no business to change. Squire Paulet, as becomes an aristocrat of the old school, has nothing but contempt and hatred for Jews and tradesmen and rabble in general, he can tolerate Quakers, however, in moderation. The story tells how a Jew and a Quaker arrived in Leigh Oxleton, and ruffled the self-satisfied equanimity of the squire's household. The Jew is a wealthy provision merchant with an adopted son whose task it is in the novel to humble the pride and win the heart of the squire's superior daughter. These people are all admirably sketched but the outstanding character of the story is Reba, the Quaker—a charming maid and a fully qualified lady doctor withal. Mr Burgin has painted her gentle yet forceful personality in the most winning and delicate colours. In the smoothing out of Beatrice Paulet's troubled love-story Reba plays a noble part, and at the end of the novel the reader is left more sad by reason of Reba's sorrow than glad for joy of Beatrice's happiness. There is an amusing tramp in the story, and his opinion of Reba, after he has become reformed, is worth quoting as an example of the genial and tender vein which characterises the book. "She's got a knack of getting 'old of people, Miss. The love they 'as for 'er is the love that lasts. It's a wonderful thing, the love that lasts, Miss. I've ad four wives in my time and I ought to know. A wonderful thing, Miss."

THE RED COLONEL By George Edgar 6s (Mills & Boon)

In the matter of sensation and colour Mr George Edgar's new novel easily exceeds the lurid promise of the wrapper. Highly sensational, however as the story is, there are no signs of crudity or lack of skill in the telling. "The Red Colonel" is an excellent crime story of the breathless non-stop order, containing a succession of swift, powerful scenes. Mr Edgar's criminals have a dash and glitter about them which is irresistible. The Red Colonel for instance, in everyday life is a wealthy man of fashion, received in the most exclusive society, shooting, hunting, running his own coach on the Brighton Road, finding time also to dabble in politics and philanthropy. This is one side of the picture. When you get to know him better you realise that he is the head and front of a mysterious band known as the Red Four, whose brains and fingers have manipulated many a famous jewel robbery and who have a pretty way of marking the foreheads of the victims of their vengeance with a gash in the form of a cross. The hero of the novel is a young doctor who falls in love with the step-daughter of Paul Copeland, one of the terrible Four. Copeland, who goes in terror of the other Three with whom he has quarrelled, is himself sufficiently awe-inspiring in appearance. Here is a part description of his face. "Long and lean it was, yellow as the parchment of an old will, crinkled, faded, colourless. One eye was sightless. Where the eye should have been was a puckered slit in the skin, a little discoloured. You thought of that eye as having been torn out, violently, in some ruthless moment of brutality. The other eye was a pale, cold, shining grey." The plot thickens with the murder of Copeland when the young doctor becomes possessed of a clue to the hiding-place of the stolen treasures belonging to the surviving members of the Red Four. Then attempts to wrest the secret from him provide as thrilling and animated a story as has been written of recent years.

DRUM'S HOUSE. By Ida Wild 6s (Constable)

Drum's House is a strange and romantic old building inhabited by some amusing and interesting folk of the name of Millincoe who, having spent most of their lives at the gaming tables, resolve to retire to their lonely ancestral residence for the sake of two attractive daughters. The Millincoes are delightful company, and their family conversation promises well in the first few chapters. Papa and Mamma are an amiable couple and the reader will probably settle down in his chair with an expectant smile on his face. The county families refuse to countenance the Millincoes, but Papa rises to the occasion and renovates the ancient parish church, the disuse of which has compelled the inhabitants to worship at a distant shrine. One begins to anticipate some amusing situations, particularly when the choice of the new Vicar is being made. Suddenly, however, the story turns to tragedy. Barbara, the most winsome of the Millincoes, who has already been secretly wedded to a rather unromantic farmer, falls a victim to the charms of the new Vicar (a self-conscious prig) who has married a Professor's daughter. Eventually they are found dead in each other's arms in a burned chapel. The dénouement leaves us entirely unmoved, we are sorry to say. Barbara is far too charming a heroine to have succumbed to the Rev Ernest Crawshaw. We feel that Miss Wild might have written a clever and captivating society novel but unfortunately her gifts are not displayed to advantage in this strangely constructed story.

Photo by Alfred Douglas, La Mait

Mr. George Edgar.

---

The Bookman's Table.

---

LORD LISTER: HIS LIFE AND WORK. By G. T. Wrench, M.D. 15s net (J. Fisher Unwin)

Among all biographies one would perhaps expect that of a medical man to be the most technical, and particularly so when the author belongs to the same profession as his subject. Those readers who take up Dr Wrench's book in anticipation of finding in it a good deal of "shop" will be justified. Seeing also that Lord Lister gave to the world the antiseptic method in its highest form, readers will probably look for much about decay, gangrene, and such terms of evil import. Here again they will be correct. Yet anyone who, on account of these expectations, refused to open "Lord Lister: His Life and Work" would miss an interesting volume. It is well worth while to struggle

STANLEY PAUL'S ANNOUNCEMENTS

Napoleon in Exile at Elba, 1814-1815

By NEWBOLD YOUNG. With a chapter on the Iconography of Napoleon at Elba, by A. M. BROADLEY. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, with coloured frontispiece and fifty illustrations from the collection of A. M. Broadley. 21s. net.

The Queens of Aragon: Their Lives and Times

By E. L. MASON. Demy 8vo. Illustrated, 16s. net.

Princess and Queen of England: The Life of Mary II

By MARY F. SANDARS. Demy 8vo. Illustrated, 10s. net.

Maximilian, the Dreamer, Holy Roman Emperor, 1459-1550

By CHRISTOPHER HARRIS. Demy 8vo. Illustrated with photographic plates, 12s. 6d. net.

A Vagabond Courtier (Baron von Pollnitz)

By FRIEDRICH F. CURRIE, FR. HINTS. Two volumes, demy 8vo. Illustrated, 24s. net.

The Romance of an Elderly Poet

A hitherto unknown chapter in the life of George Crabbe. By A. M. BROADLEY and WALTER JERROLD. Demy 8vo. Illustrated, 10s. 6d. net.

Famous Artists and Their Models

By DAVID ANGLO. RALPH. Demy 8vo. Illustrated, 10s. net.

A Woman's Winter in Africa

By CHARLOTTE CAMERON. Demy 8vo. Cloth gilt, illustrated with reproductions of about 150 photographs taken by the author and printed throughout on art paper, 17s. 6d. net.

A History of Penal Methods

By GEORGE L. M. A. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

Remarkable Women of France (1431-1749)

By LIEUT. COL. ANDREW C. P. HARRIS, D.S.O. Demy 8vo. Illustrated, 10s. net.

A Winter in India

By ARTHUR H. SPENS. Large crown 8vo. With 100 illustrations, 6s. net.

The European in India

By H. HERVEY (Indian Telegraphs, retired). Illustrated, 12s. 6d. net.

August Strindberg: The Spirit of Revolt

Studies and impressions by I. LINDA HARRIS. Crown 8vo. Illustrated, 6s. net.

Torquemada and the Spanish Inquisition

By RAFAEL SABATINI. Demy 8vo. Illustrated, 10s. net.

Gaiety and George Groosmith

Random Reflections of an Apostle of Pleasure. By STANLEY NAYLOR. Crown 8vo. Fully illustrated, 6s. net.

More About Collecting

By SIR JAMES YCALLE, M.P. Large crown 8vo. Cloth gilt, with about 100 illustrations, 6s. net.

Paul's Simplicio

Crown 8vo. Cloth, 1s. net. A simple and thoroughly practical and efficient code for the use of Travellers, Emigrants, etc. A sentence in a word.

Louis XI. and Charles the Bold

By LIEUT. COL. ANDREW C. P. HARRIS, D.S.O. Demy 8vo. Illustrated, 10s. net.

Polly Peachum

The Story of a young London Duchess of Bolton, and "The Beggar's Opera." By CHARLES L. FRANCE. Demy 8vo. Illustrated, 16s. net.

The Insanity of Genius

and the General Insanity of Human Faculties Physiologically Considered. By J. F. NISBET. Sixth and New Edition with an Introduction by DR. BERNARD HOLLANDER. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

A Queen of Tragedy

The Romance of Hippolyte CLARKE, the great Eighteenth Century Tragic Hero. By KENNEDICK HAYES. Demy 8vo. Illustrated.

A Tour Through South America

By A. S. TORRENT. Demy 8vo. Cloth gilt, profusely illustrated, 10s. 6d. net.

BOYS' AND GIRLS' BOOKS

Edited by ALFRED H. MILLS

Large crown 8vo. 384 pages, fully illustrated, handsome cloth gilt, fully gilt, 8s. each.

Twist Life and Death on Sea and Shore

Heroines of the Home and the World of Duty

A Book of Brave Boys all the World Over

A Book of Brave Girls at Home and Abroad

In the Teeth of Adventure Up and Down the World

In the Lion's Mouth. Their Fights with Wild Men, Wild Animals and Wild Nature

Where Duty Calls or Danger. Records of Courage and Adventure for Girls.

A Garland of Verse for Young People. Edited by ALFRED H. MILLS. Handsome cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net.

A collection of verse for children, made to satisfy the requirements of school and home. Never before has an attempt been made to cover in one volume such a wide range of pieces at so small a price.

Verses

By DOLF WALLARDE. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Paper, 1s. 6d. net. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

The Cornish Coast and Moors

By A. G. FOLLIOTT STOKES. Demy 8vo. With Maps and 150 illustrations from photographs, cloth 6s. net.

THE A B C SERIES

An Exceptional Fine Series of Books. Large Crown 8vo. Fully Illustrated. 5s. each net.

A B C of Japanese Art. I. F. BLACKER. 480 pages. 150 line and about 100 half-ton illustrations.

A B C About Collecting (1st Edition). Sir JAMES YCALLE, M.P. China Clocks, Prints, Books, Furniture, Furniture, etc. Profusely illustrated.

A B C of Collecting Old English China. I. F. BLACKER. Ninety-four line and 64 pages of half-ton illustrations.

A B C of Collecting Old English Pottery. I. F. BLACKER. 40 line and 32 pages of half-ton illustrations.

A B C Guide to Mythology. HELEN A. CLARKE. Profusely illustrated.

A B C of Artistic Photography. Illustrated. A. I. ANDERSON.

A B C Guide to Music. Illustrated. D. GREGORY MANON.

A B C Guide to Pictures. Illustrated. CHARLES H. CARLIN.

A B C Guide to American History. H. W. FISKE.

A B C of Collecting Old Continental Pottery. I. F. BLACKER. 50 illustrations.

A B C of English Ceramic Art. I. F. BLACKER. 1200 illustrations.

THE "EVERYDAY" SERIES

The Everyday Vegetable Book. The Everyday Soup Book.

The Everyday Economical Cookery Book.

The Everyday Pudding Book. The Everyday Savoury Book.

Each book contains a Recipe for every day in the year, including 1200 recipes. 20th. Large crown 8vo, strongly bound. 1s. net each.

The Diner's-Out Vade Mecum. A Pocket "What's What" on Manners and Customs of Society's Functions, with hints on Etiquette, Dress, After-Dinner Speaking, Story-Telling, Toasts and Sentiments, etc. etc. By ALFRED H. MILLS. Large crown 8vo (64 by 31), cloth bound round corners, 1s. 6d. net.

My Own Receptor. By ALFRED H. MILLS. Crown 8vo, 1s. net.

The Up-to-Date Receptor. 6d. net.

The First Favourite Receptor. 6d. net.

Drawing-Room Entertainments. New and Original Monologues, Dialogues, and Plays for Home and Platform use. 1s. net.

NEW SIX SHILLING NOVELS

YOUTH WILL BE SERVED

THE EYES OF ALICIA

THE WINDS OF GOD

THE PAINTED LADY

QUADRILLE COURT

THE WATERED GARDEN

HIS MAGNIFICENCE

FRIVOL

DEFIANT DIANA

THE PIT OF CORRUPTION

HUNT THE SLIPPER

CASPERLEY'S WIFE

THE CLOAK OF ST MARTIN

MRS GRAY'S PAST

A GREY LIFE

THE STROLLING SAINT

CHEERFUL CRAFT

BRINETA AT BRIGHTON

THE CURSE OF THE NILE

THE SHE-WOLF

COLUMBINE AT THE FAIR

THE UNWORTHY PACT

THE ADVENTURES OF MORTIMER DIXON

SO IT IS WITH THE DAMSEL

MRS. BRETT

BOUND TO BE

JOHN WALLARDE

CHARLES J. PEARCE

HAMILTON DRUMMOND

ANABELLA KENFALL

CECIL ADAIR

MALD STEINLEY RAWSON

A. I. ANDERSON

KATE HORN

J. F. NISBET

WILLIAM GRAHAM

OLIVER MADDOX HILLIER (Late Warble)

LESTER MILLER

ARMISTE GRACE

HERBERT FLOWERSIDE

ROSA

RAFAEL SABATINI

R. ANDERSON

GABRIELLE WOOD

DOUGLAS STADEN

MAXIME JORMONT

KATE HORN

DOROTHY A. GERRARD

MAY WYNNE

ALICIA RAMSKY

NORA WYNNE

M. HAMILTON

WILL HUGO

A WIFE OUT OF EGYPT

THE DESTINY OF CLAUDE

SIR GALAHAD OF THE ARMY

THE STRENGTH OF THE HILLS

THE HONOUR OF THE CLINTONS

THE REDEEMER

THE FRUIT OF INDISCRETION

A GENTLEWOMAN OF FRANCE

GABRIEL'S GARDEN

LIFE'S LAST GIFT

THE HORRIBLE MAN

(Miss Harriett) FRANCES TORRES ROBERTSON

TAINTED GOLD

CUPID'S CATERERS

THE SPLIT PEAS

THE PASSION OF KATHLEEN DUVEEN

WHEN SATAN RULED

THE SECRET OF THE ZENANA

LOVE TIDES

BLACK HONEY

MARCELLE THE LOVABLE

NOVELS FROM SHAKESPEARE SERIES

THE MERCHANT OF VENICE

(Collected Plays) By A. POPULAR NOVELLIST

NORMA TORIMER

MAY WYNNE

HAMILTON DRUMMOND

HALLIWELL SUT LIVER

ARTHUR MARSHALL

RENE BAZIN

SIR WILLIAM MAGNAY

RENE BOYLE-NE

CECIL ADAIR

LOUIS DE ROBERT

RANGER GULL

MAY WYNNE

CAL FRANK SHAW

RANGER GULL

ALICE MAGOULT

with one's distaste for the horrors of hospital work in order to appreciate the career of the man whom Dr. Wrench takes as his hero. We can have no hesitation in calling the author a hero-worshipper. In Lister he sees "emphatically more than a great surgeon—far more than the founder of modern surgery—a great philosopher, whose thought never deviated from the central problem of life." And again, "in an even higher sense than of old he was a saint." Full praise, it might be thought, but not fulsome. Lister deserved the titles of both philosopher and saint in the practical rather than the idealistic sense of the words. To some it would seem hard to call a vivisectioner a saint, and Lister made abundant use of vivisection. We may add a third title—that of warrior. The champion of antiseptics was forced to be a fighter, but, for all his natural courtesy and consideration with him fighting cannot be said to have been against the grain. The opposition and abuse which he met, first in Glasgow, then in Edinburgh, and lastly in London, stirred him only to finer effort. His life is remarkable for his oneness of purpose, tenacity and faith in himself. Nothing shows the last named quality better than the story told by Dr. Wrench of how he tried a new experiment in the course of an operation on Queen Victoria at Edinburgh. He was confident of success. But what a nerve it showed in him to begin on his sovereign!

"His wide, rare smile is sweet with certainties," said of him Henley, one of his first Edinburgh patients in his sonnet "The Chief." No better armour could be found for a medical hero than certainty. It is strange that an idea has flourished—perhaps still flourishes—that Lister was a Scot. Dr. Wrench narrates that only recently one of the most distinguished surgeons of our time summed up his impression of Lister to me as a man who, chancing on a great discovery, pushed it with the pertinacity of a Scotchman. And, all the time Lister was born in Upton Lane, West Ham, being the son and grandson of London wine-merchants. The Listers were also Quakers and to the combination of profession and religion was due that atmosphere in which the boy was brought up of "comfortable affluence, earnest faith, and practical goodwill." It is worthy of note that his early days were unusually happy and serene, in comparison with the popular idea about the beginnings of genius. Joseph Lister brought his troubles upon himself later when he started to battle for the theory which, at the age of fifty-two, he forced the world to accept.

LOVE LETTERS OF A WORLDLY WOMAN. By Mrs. W. K. Clifford. New Edition. 2s. 6d. net. (Constable.)

It is not often that one can give so cordial a welcome to a book republished after twenty years as is due to "Love Letters of a Worldly Woman." Mrs. Clifford has unlocked the secrets of the heart of early womanhood with a sure understanding and with an almost ruthless frankness. We admit that girls, at a certain stage in their development, are in love with love before ever they have met with a lover and, in that uncritical period, they are liable to invest an unworthy material object with the qualities for which their hearts crave. But, with all respect to Mrs. Clifford, the spirit of romance is just as strong, though possibly not so concentrated in the heart of the young man as in that of the young woman. He has, or rather had, at the time this book was first published, more distractions and less leisure to indulge in love's young dream than his sister, who had not then discovered how greatly she could vary the monotony of her life by abandoning her traditional dependence and seclusion. Mrs. Clifford deals chiefly with the waste and disillusionment of girlhood's devotion before that girlhood has developed into worldly womanhood. The author is passionately on the side of her sex, and small blame to her if she have chosen unfavourable specimens of men. Here is a bit taken at random, but fairly representative of the whole.

She—"We had our summer day, dear, and it was good to live through, but now, go to your cousin Nell, contest

Carpeth, see to your tenants and good-bye. Yes, good-bye, dear Englishman. Only our own country could have grown you, and in a measure I am proud of you as I am of all its other goodly products. But for warmth and sunshine one goes to other lands than ours. For love and happiness I at least must go to other hearts than yours. Better for you that it is so, for I should have tried you sorely."

He—"I think you are vexed with me because I told you frankly that if you would not have me I should try my luck with Nell. But you can't expect me to keep single because you don't think me lively enough to marry yourself. I am getting on—thirty-six next January—quite time that I settled down. I feel that I ought to do so, besides, if I wait too long no one will have me. Of course, it is easy enough to talk as you do, but, take my word for it, your feelings are not what is wanted for daily life. They are all very well in the books you have got yourself into the habit of reading, but they won't work outside the covers in which you find them. I don't believe in Darwin, as you know. Not that I ever read much of him, I confess, but I made out what he was up to pretty well, etc."

THE CATHEDRALS OF SOUTHERN SPAIN. By C. Gasquoine Hartley (Mrs. Walter M. Gallichan). 6s. net. (Werner Laurie.)

Mrs. Walter M. Gallichan is an authority on Spain as well as on the Woman question, and this is by no means her first book about that country and its art features. "Things Seen in Spain," "Spain Revisited," and "Moorish Cities in Spain" are all well known and deservedly popular works, and this latest book from her is characterised by the charm and grace of its predecessors. Mrs. Gallichan writes well, and she has the power to arouse enthusiasm on the subjects about which she herself is an enthusiast. To generate interest and enthusiasm in the cathedrals of Southern Spain on the part of one who has never seen them is not an easy task, but Mrs. Gallichan succeeds in this, as she doubtless also succeeds in interesting and informing those who have studied the entrancing subjects at first hand. The work is comprehensive, dealing not only with Pamplona Cathedral.

From "The Cathedrals of Southern Spain," by C. Gasquoine Hartley (Werner Laurie).

T. WERNER LAURIE, LTD.*A Selection from the AUTUMN LIST, 1913.

- A BIBLIOGRAPHY OF OSCAR WILDE. STUART MASON 2 vols 25/- net
- THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF JOHN PAUL JONES. MRS REGINALD DE KOVEN 24/- net
- GOLDWIN SMITH. HIS LIFE AND OPINIONS. ARNOLD HAULTAIN 18/- net
- AN IRISH GENTLEMAN. MAURICE GEORGE MOORE, C.B. 16/- net
- LITTLE JOURNEYINGS IN CHINA. MARY GAUNT 15/- net
- THROUGH UNKNOWN NIGERIA. JOHN R. RAPHAEL 15/- net
- THE LOG OF A ROLLING STONE. HENRY ARTHUR BROOME 12/6 net
- CHINA REVOLUTIONIZED. J. S. THOMPSON 12/6 net
- CAMP FIRE YARNS OF THE LOST LEGION. COL. HAMILTON-BROWN 12/6 net
- MY BOHEMIAN DAYS IN PARIS. JUDITH M. PRICE 10/6 net
- THE CONQUEST OF THE DESERT. WILLIAM MACDONALD, M.S. Agr., Sc.D., Ph.D. 7/6 net
- IN SPAIN WITH PEGGY. A. GORDON WALSON 7/6 net
- PERSONAL EXPERIENCES OF SPIRITUALISM. HERLEWARD CARRINGTON 7/6 net
- THE PATHOS OF DISTANCE. JAMES HUNTER 7/6 net
- WET MAGIC. I. NLSBIL Author of "The Treasure Seekers" 6/-
- FIRST STEPS IN COLLECTING. GRACE VALLOIS 6/- net
- ALL ABOUT POSTAGE STAMPS. IRLD J. MINTHILL 6/- net
- STORIES FROM THE OPERAS. Complete in one volume GLADYS DAVIDSON 6/- net
- HOW TO BECOME AN ALPINIST. I. BURLINGHAM 6/- net
- THE HANDY BOY. A. NELLY HALL 6/- net
- MRS. EDWARDS' COOKERY BOOK. 6/- net
- ATLANTIS. GERHART HAUFFMANN 6/-
- THE WAY OF THE CARDINES. STANLEY FORBES HYATT 6/-
- TANTALUS. By the Author of "The Adventures of John Johns" 6/-
- THE LAND OF THE SPIRIT. THOMAS NELSON PAGE 6/-
- THE NIGHT OF MEMORY. EDMUND B. D'AVENANT 6/-
- THE FURNACE OF YOUTH. J. S. FLETCHER 6/-
- SOUTH SEA SHIPMATES. JOHN ARTHUR BARRY 6/-
- THE CURSE. FERDUS HUMI 6/-
- THE SHADOW OF EVIL. CARLTON DAWK 6/-
- AN UNFINISHED SONG. MRS. GHOSAL 3/6
- JOURNEY'S END. KATHARINE TYMAN 6/-
- LOVE AND LOVERS. ORME BALFOUR 3/6 net
- GOETHE'S HERMANN AND DOROTHEA. VIVIAN BRANDON 3/6 net
- HOW TO WIN AT AUCTION BRIDGE. "ROYAL SPADES." "CUT-CAVENDISH" 2/6 net
- LOVE AND £200 A YEAR. MRS. ALFRED PRAGA 2/- net
- HOW TO BECOME EFFICIENT. T. SHARPER KNOWLSON 1/- net
- CHANCE IN CHAINS. GUY THORNE 1/- net

WERNER LAURIE, LTD., CLIFFORD'S INN, LONDON.

A SELECTION FROM
Mr. NASH'S Autumn List.*THINGS I REMEMBER

By FREDERICK TOWNSEND MARTIN 10/6 net.

A volume of pleasant and interesting recollections by a well-known figure in Society

(Ready middle of October)

MORE ABOUT KING EDWARD

By EDWARD LLGGE, Author of "King Edward in His True Colours" 10/- net

(Ready middle of October)

THE PRESS-GANG AFLOAT AND ASHORE

By J. R. HUTCHINSON 10/6 net

A racy and vivid account of the practice of pressing men into the Navy, chiefly during the exciting period of the 18th century.

THE MOXFORD BOOK OF ENGLISH VERSE (1340-1913)

Presented by A. SIODART WALKER 3/6 net

An amusing parody of the Oxford Book of English Verse

THE EMPRESS OF THE BALKANS. A Drama in Three Acts.

By H. M. KING NICHOLAS OF MONTENEGRO 3/6 net

MY LADY of the CHIMNEY-CORNER

By ALEXANDER IRVING (Author of "From the Bottom Up") 3/6 net

"This book," says the Author in a foreword, "is the torn manuscript of the most beautiful life I ever knew" (his mother's). Mrs. Irving was an Irish peasant woman with a great heart and great spiritual insight, and Mr. Irving's beautiful tribute recalls Barne's "Margaret Ogilvie."

— FICTION. —

MARCEL PRÉVOST'S GREAT NOVEL

GUARDIAN ANGELS

By MARCEL PRÉVOST, Member of the Académie Française, Officer of the Legion of Honour

6/-

A very married woman ought to read this book, if only to be forewarned against a danger that may one day invade her own home

RUNNING SANDS (2nd Imp.)

By REGINALD WRIGHT KAUFFMAN 6/-

(Author of "Daughters of Ishmael")

The THOUSANDTH WOMAN (2nd Imp.)

By E. W. HORNING 3/6 net

(Author of "Raffles")

ELLEN ADAIR By FREDERICK NIVEN, 6/-MY ENEMY JONES

By ROBERT BARR 3/6 net

RAVEN, V.C. (2nd Imp.)

By CORALIE STANTON &amp; ELATH HOSKEN 6/-

THE GRELL MYSTERY (2nd Imp.)

By FRANK FROEST 6/-

PERRIS of the CHERRY-TREES

By J. S. FLETCHER, 6/-

Evelyn Nash, 36, King St., Covent Garden, W.C.

the history and the architecture of the cathedrals but giving particulars as to the bishops, rulers, and others personally identified with them. These particulars are never dull, and they are conveyed in an easy manner far removed from that of the sheer informer. An Introductory Sketch outlines the scope of the work, and has many noteworthy remarks. A point is that the cathedrals are, almost without exception, so hemmed in with buildings that it is difficult to approach them. To many this may seem a disadvantage, but the Spaniard has no understanding of the northerner's love of solitude, and the churches are placed in the midst of the towns. Mrs. Gallichan says that if this difficulty of view is to be deplored, it may yet be said that it is not of such disadvantage as at first it would appear to be. In Spain the church buildings are always in harmony with the landscape. Almost all the towns are dramatically built upon a hill, and the prominent feature presented by the outline of the cathedral at a distance causes it to appear as a crown to the buildings around, which form, as it were, a pedestal to its rising steeples and domes. The steeples with which almost every Spanish church is adorned are externally their finest features, and they give a character to the appearance of the town as beautiful as it is truly native and Spanish. The Spanish cathedrals are open all day. They still are, in a very special sense, the churches of the people. The book is illustrated by admirable photographs.

OLIVIA'S LATCHKEY By Hubert Bland 2s net (Werner Laurie)

Mr. Bland, with his unfailing sense of humour will forgive us the remark that he and his Olivia rather remind us of the conjuror with an accomplished puppet on his lap. It is true that he sets out to be a kind of secular father-confessor breathing worldly maxims to the ears of a fair and impressive penitent of twenty-three. He answers her appeal for advice about latchkeys and marriage, and ends by conceding her both for there is a murmur of wedding-bells and the registry office about the concluding letter of the correspondence, and he can hardly deny his fair client the liberty of a latchkey in face of his own liberal professions. But the book with all its cleverness, is slight in the extreme, and this is the chief impression it leaves on us, if we except its air of intellectual gaiety. It says a few profound things, but says them in a bamboozling way, and though Olivia seems to relish it and was doubtless created for the purpose we could find it in our hearts to prophesy that she would come to complain of it as trying after a year or two. Still we hope for the best, especially if the author contemplates a sequel in the shape of Olivia married.

MEN AND RAILS By Rowland Kenney 6s net (Fisher Unwin)

Mr. Kenney explains at the outset that he has written this book from "a desire to state the case for a more rational treatment of railway problems in the hope that it will lead to a more humane treatment of railwaymen." His own personal experience in bygone days as a railway worker in four years spent "in capacities varying from that of stable boy to shunter" not only explains Mr. Kenney's standpoint but is responsible for some very vivid descriptions of the hardship and dangers attendant on yard shunting by means of capstans (driven by hydraulic pressure) and hempen ropes. The official rules for protection against accidents were systematically disregarded. "I broke the rules every day and all day," writes Mr. Kenney. "We had to accomplish a certain amount of work in a given time, and to do this it was impossible to keep them." On one occasion the capstan was worked, "on a most dangerous crossing, part of the time in a blinding snowstorm, from six o'clock on Friday morning to two o'clock on Saturday afternoon, without a break except for meals. I was then getting 19s for a week's work of seventy-two hours, and overtime paid for at ordinary time rate." No wonder Mr. Kenney, with these memories, contends so stoutly for the welfare of railwaymen. But the personal element, if the most interesting, is the smallest part of "Men and Rails." The book is really a tremendous indictment of railway management, and of the attitude from the first of Parliament and the nation towards the railways. Statistics are given by railwaymen's hours and wages, and of the numbers—workmen not passengers—killed and maimed on the line. There are several historical chapters dealing with Railway Origins in England, the formation of the railwaymen's trade union, and the recent strikes. The way out of the present distress is in Mr. Kenney's view not so much railway nationalization as "Guild Socialism"—the ownership of the railways vested in the State, while a guild—covering the whole of the labour required for railway working—"would be responsible for the carrying on of the industry." But this admittedly is "too big for present achievement."

Mr. Rowland Kenney.

WILD LIFE IN WALES. By George Bolam 10s 6d net, (Frank Palmer)

With the straggling village of Llanuwchllyn in Merionethshire, as his headquarters, Mr. George Bolam made excursions into the surrounding country, studying nature and the wild life of the fields and woods and mountain sides, of the lakes and streams, incidentally observing the characters and customs of the human dwellers in the little known district over which his wanderings extended. He gives a most interesting account of his studies of bird-life and into the habits of fish, especially those that inhabit the waters of Bala Lake. His descriptions of scenery and of the ways of the primitive Welsh people in those parts are admirable, and the sportsman and the student of natural history will find that his patient and careful observation of the furred and feathered creatures, who were the main object of his quest, has enabled him to make valuable additions to the general stock of knowledge about them. The volume is lavishly illustrated by a series of excellent photographs.

THE SOUL OF A DOLL AND POEMS By K. C. Spiers. 2s 6d net (Chapman & Hall)

In his three earlier volumes Mr. K. C. Spiers showed not only the power to create striking imagery and fine phrases, but also the faculty for presenting a dramatic situation in a vivid manner. His new volume is not, therefore, a surprise, it is only a fulfilment of his earlier promise. Here he treads with constant foot the heights reached only occasionally in "Guido and Veronica" and "Durante and Selvaggia." Indeed Mr. Spiers has nowhere

GILL & REIGATE LTD THE SOHO GALLERIES.

ANTIQUES & REPRODUCTIONS.

Our latest "G 27" Illustrated
Catalogue post free upon application

73-85, OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.

AND 18 EAST 57th STREET, NEW YORK

Globe-Wernicke 'Elastic' Bookcases

Increasing the size of the G.W. "Elastic" Bookcase

is a very simple matter to those who already possess a few Globe-Wernicke 'Elastic' Bookcase Units, and the shape of the Bookcase can also be altered just as easily by a re-arrangement of the Units. This Bookcase has many other advantages over the ordinary fixed-sized kind—it is always complete, but never finished. Why not write for a copy of Booklet 18 B and read all about it?

Packing Free. Orders of £2 Carriage Paid to any Goods Station in the British Isles

The Globe-Wernicke Co.

Office and Library Furnishers

44 HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON, E.C.
82 VICTORIA ST., S.W. : 98 BISHOPSGATE, E.C.

'Koh-i-noor' POCKET PENCILS

See this new line.
The Indestructible
Enamel Pencil. An ideal Pencil for Presentation purposes.

In five exquisite colourings White, Red, Rose, Blue, Green, fitted at end with sharpener, as illustrated. Being made by a patent process the enamel will not scratch. Fitted with the famous 'Koh-i-noor' lead, 7/6 each.

'Koh-i-noor' Pocket Pencils are made in many novel and charming styles, from 9d. each. Ask your Stationer to show you the complete series.

List Free from L. & C. HARDMUTH Ltd,
Koh-i-noor House, Kingsway, London, W.C.

Note the Sharpener at the end.

previously attained the sinewy strength of diction and the depth of thought which is shown in his fine poem "The Madness of Launcelot." It is Lennysonian only in the remote sense that any one who follows Malory and can tell a story admirably may be somewhat absurdly called a follower of Lennyson. The Arthurian legends are our great national storehouse and it would be little short of a calamity if others were to be deterred from using them for fear they may be called imitators of Lennyson. The story of Launcelot's madness has, moreover, not been dealt with by Tennyson, and, full of human passion and of fine adventure, though it is, is less known than most of the stories. Launcelot was led unknowingly into an offence against the Queen, and she in her rage forbade him ever to come into her sight again. Launcelot losing his reason for very grief, left the Court and wandered over the land. And then those about the Queen—"the silk ones with the jungle eyes"—

"sought the morrow morn to read untried,
The Queen's deaf, dumb, and passion-burying face,
And failing, spread abroad the latest tale
Of Launcelot's golden guilt, then vied to add
The coloured circumstance, as is the wont
Of those who paint adultery with desire."

The story is told with great dignity and power, and it would be difficult to know where to look for its equal in contemporary verse. In "The Soul of a Doll" which gives its name to the volume, Mr. Spiers has dealt with a modern subject which restricts him to more prosaic language and imagery than do the romantic and mediæval themes he has hitherto chosen. In this sober garb he tells a story of human passion and character by which it is impossible not to be profoundly impressed. We have not space to speak of the other poems in Mr. Spiers' book. "The Toilers" has fine stanzas, and there are some good lyrics, though on the whole, we like Mr. Spiers better on the 'cello than upon the guitar or the tambourine. If he can write poems like this of Launcelot, and plays as strong as "The Soul of a Doll" he need not, however, trouble himself about either of these latter instruments.

IN THE FOOTSTEPS OF BORROW AND FITZGERALD. By Morley Adams. (6s. net.) (Jarrold & Sons.)

In the spring of the year Mr. Morley Adams set out on a pilgrimage through East Anglia, and he has gathered into this substantial volume a delightfully gossipy record of the places he visited, the persons he saw, the legends and history and folk-lore he picked up in his wanderings over the great stretch of country lying between the Stour and the Wash. From time to time and from place to place, he takes you with him in the footsteps of Borrow, Fitzgerald, Bernard Barton, Crabbe, Cowper, Sir Thomas Browne, Robert Bloomfield, and many another. One wishes Mr. Adams could have given us a little more about that shyest of authors, Seton Merriman, who lived in Fitzgerald's Woodbridge, but there is so much, and so much that is interesting in the book that we are in no mood to find fault with it in such matters. Its main purpose was with Borrow and Fitzgerald, and it has gathered up reminiscences of them, and fulfils this purpose in the pleasantest possible way. To East Anglia belongs the remarkable story of Margaret Catchpole, and you have a full narration of this, and the same district seems to have had more than its share of unfortunate witches, and the anecdotes and chronicles about many of these add much to the interest of the book. There is admirable discourse of folk legends of quaint bizarre birth and marriage customs, of local ghosts and, when you come to Mousehold Heath, something of the peasant rising under that great tanner, Robert Kett in the fifteenth century. Mr. Morley Adams has done his work in the right spirit of enthusiasm, and he has done it well. His entertaining chapters are illustrated with thirty excellent photographs.

Notes on New Books.

MESSRS. HODDLER & STOUGHTON.

Those who hope to find between the covers of Miss E. Shackelford's novel—The Jumping-Off Place (6s.)—a story as enticing and uncommon as the title suggests, will have their hopes more than realized. The people we are introduced to in the tale are each and every one of them exceedingly well drawn, so that we are interested in each one from their first appearance. "Most people marry an individual. But I didn't—I married a grandmother, a father, a brother, a sister, a huge brown stone house stuffed with the Civil War period of marble-topped furniture. And then, too, I married a few choice odds and ends like an established religion, the same old housekeeper whether I liked her or not, regular hours, and a 'proper idea of diet' " ruminates young Mrs. Ivanston, after she has run away from it all (the 'it' including her husband). She is proud, he is prouder, and his people are proudest of all, and so she stays away and becomes exceedingly bored with life altogether and very listless. "You have simply got to take a better hold on life," her physician fairly storms at her, and persuades her at length to get right away from the artificial atmosphere in which she lives in New York and go to the jumping-off place—a mining camp at Montana, where she rents a pretty little furnished bungalow high up on Copper Hill. And then, when she walks down the hill into the town she discovers the very last person in the world that she expected to meet. The plot is decidedly uncommon and entertaining, and the author's style is easy, sympathetic, exquisitely dainty.

MESSRS. HOLDIN & HARDINGHAM.

In Love's Victory (6s.) Miss Gertrude Hollis proves that she is literally—on the side of the angels, but it is a pity that her study of the character of a girl brought up "free from sectarian or purist letters," and "unshackled by creed and dogma," should end a good deal more weakly than it begins. However, it is a well-written and quite readable book, and we are entirely in accord with the lesson it inculcates.

Anne of the Marshland, by the Hon. Mrs. Julian Byng (6s.) is a second edition of a novel which was originally published under another title, and has been now almost entirely re-written. It is a strong and powerful drama, realistic and rather sombre, embodying a close study of several well-differentiated types of character, the best of which is that of Anne's amiable, stupid, and deluded husband, who is drawn in with assurance and sympathy. Although not altogether a pleasant book, it is one which well repays reading.

MESSRS. JOHN LONG, LTD.

The work of Miss Florence Warden is always readable, and her latest novel, Love's Sentinel (6s.) is no exception to the rule. The plot centres around the marital troubles of a High Church clergyman who is tricked into marrying a woman for whom he does not care, while his heart is engaged elsewhere. However, all comes right in the end, in spite of the machinations of a very efficient villainess.

Mr. (or, more probably, Miss) I. D. Henderson's An Officer and a — (6s.) has some fairly good dialogue, not unskillfully managed, but in other respects is less attractive. It is an amateurish story at best. Light Fingers and Dark Lyes (6s.) by Vincent Collier is also amateurish—these are both first novels—but its naively direct method of narration is not without humour, and is decidedly spirited. The contents of the book, which consists of three long stories, can be guessed from the title. Mr. Collier's gift of straightforward narrative certainly deserves encouragement.

MESSRS. MILLS & BOON.

In The Hizard (6s.), Mr. H. Vaughan-Sawyer tells a dramatic and interesting story with its scene laid in Baluchistan. It is clear that the author has an expert's knowledge—of which he makes excellent use—of the native mind and character while his treatment of the superstitions of his characters has a quiet humour which is decidedly attractive. A good stirring tale is this, and it is all the better because there is not a single European character of any importance in it.

MESSRS. STANLEY PAUL & CO.

Mr. Hamilton Drummond is seen at his best in Winds of God (6s.), a romance very much in the manner of "Treasure Island," excepting that the principal part is played by a girl—who is, by the way, a good deal more capable in a tight corner than most boys would be. It is a well-written novel, and, but for a few longurs, the story is well told and exciting. Its readers will find a pleasant evening's entertainment before them.

The ABC of Collecting Old Continental Pottery (5s. net) comes from the pen of Mr. J. P. Blacker, who is an expert not only in collecting but in the more difficult art of giving intelligible advice to amateurs. In a convenient space the author covers an exceedingly wide field—the whole of Europe outside Great Britain, Turkey, Rhodes, Persia, and Damascus—and his volume is also very liberally illustrated with over 250 choice examples.

John Galsworthy

Messrs. LONGMANS & Co.'s LIST

Completion of Mr. Millais' work on the Diving Ducks.

BRITISH DIVING DUCKS. By JOHN G. MILLAIS, F.R.S., M.B.O.V. With many Coloured Photographs and Collotype Plates by ARCHIBALD HOBURN, G. MURRAY DIXON, H. GRIMVOLD, and the Author's volumes Imperial 4to gilt top 812 12s. net.
* 450 copies only have been printed, of which 420 are for sale Prospectus on application.

REVISED AND CHEAPER EDITION

SAMPLERS AND TAPESTRY

EMBROIDERIES. By MARCUS L. HUISS, L.I.B. With 24 Reproductions in Colour, and other Illustrations in Monochrome 4to 10s. 6d. net.
* The present edition contains 24 Reproductions in colour of most beautiful examples of Needlework Samplers gathered from England and America, dating from the 17th to the 19th centuries.

THE REIGN OF HENRY VII. FROM CONTEMPORARY SOURCES.

With an Introduction by Prof. A. F. POLLARD Three Volumes Vol. I Narrative Extracts Crown 8vo 10s. 6d. net.
* Vol. II—Constitutional, Social, and Economic History. In preparation
Vol. III—Diplomacy, Ecclesiastical Affairs, and Ireland In preparation

THE LIFE OF WILLIAM PITT, EARL OF CHATHAM.

By DANIEL WILLIAMS With Portraits and Maps. 2 Volumes 8vo 24s. net (Nearly ready)

CHEAP EDITION, WITH NEW PORTRAIT BY MILLER

THE LIFE OF JOHN HENRY CARDINAL NEWMAN.

By WILLIAM WARD With 2 Frontispieces 2 vols. 8vo 12s. 6d. net.

EIGHTH AND CHEAPER IMPRESSION IN ONE VOLUME

LIFE AND LETTERS OF MANDELL CREIGHTON, D.D., Oxon. and Camb. sometime Bishop of London

By his Wife With Frontispiece 8vo 6s. net

CLIO, A MUSE, AND OTHER ESSAYS, LITERARY AND PEDESTRIAN

By G. M. TREVELYAN With Map 8vo 4s. 6d. net. (On November 15th)

CARDUCCI: A Selection of His Poems, with Verse Translations, Notes, and Three Introductory Essays

By G. L. BICKERSILL M.A. With Portrait 8vo 10s. 6d. net

LOVE TRIUMPHANT AND OTHER POEMS

By R. GORELL BARNES 1cap 4to 3s. 6d. net

THE PILGRIM FROM CHICAGO: Being more Rambles with an American

By CHRISTIAN CLARK With 27 Illustrations 8vo 7s. 6d. net

POLICY AND PAINT, or Some Incidents in the Lives of Dudley Carleton and Peter Paul Rubens

By the Author of "A Life of Sir Kenelm Digby," &c. 8vo 9s. net

OLD TESTAMENT LEGENDS: being Stories out of some of the Less-known Apocryphal Books of the Old Testament

By M. R. JAMES, Litt.D., Vice-Chancellor of the University of Cambridge. With 10 Illustrations by H. J. FORD Large crown 8vo 3s. 6d. net

THE HAMPTON LECTURES FOR 1913

THE CHURCH IN ROME IN THE FIRST CENTURY.

By the Rev. GEORGE EDMUNDSON M.A., Vicar of St. Saviour, Upper Chelsea 8vo 7s. 6d. net

Mr. Lang's Christmas Book for 1913.

THE STRANGE STORY BOOK.

By Mrs. LANG Edited by ANDREW LANG With 12 Coloured Plates and 18 other Illustrations and Portrait of Mr. Lang Small demy 8vo gilt top, 6s.

NEW FICTION.

"Cranford come again."—SUNDAY TIMES

Graceland. By JOHN AYSCOUGH Second Impression 6s.
"It is not too much to say that Mr. J. AySCOUGH's 'Graceland' is in its way as delightful as Cranford, of which work it irresistibly reminds us."—THE GLOBE

Father Gregory; or Lures and Failures. By P. C. WREN
"The story of a Club for Failures in India" 6s.
"A peculiarly interesting story, and one to be unreservedly recommended. Mr. Wren knows his India well. It is a book to be read."—LIVINGTON POST

The Sorrow Stones. By MAUREL WILLIAMS Crown 8vo 6s.
A Story of West Cumberland Life

A NOVEL BY A NEW SOUTH AFRICAN WRITER

Dirk: a South African. By ANNABELLA BRUCE MARSHAND 6s.
"We can unreservedly congratulate Miss Marshand upon her first book. We can as heartily congratulate South Africa in its possession of so sympathetic an interpreter as Miss Marshand."—LITERARY POST

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.,
39, PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

BELL'S NEW BOOKS

OLD ENGLISH CHINA

By Mrs. WILLOUGHBY HODGSON Author of "How to Identify Old China," "My Own China Book," etc. With 16 plates in colour, 64 in black and white, and numerous reproductions of the standard Factory Marks. Royal Quarto 25s. net.

RICHARD WAGNER: Composer of Operas

By JOHN F. RUNCIMAN, Musical Critic to the "Saturday Review" Demy 8vo. With Photogravure Frontispiece and other Illustrations 10s. 6d. net.
A brilliant and impartial Study of the great musician and a critical examination of his works.

THE COMEDY OF MANNERS

A History, 1664-1720 By JOHN PALMER, sometime Scholar of Balliol College, Oxford, Dramatic Critic to the "Saturday Review" Demy 8vo. With 12 Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net

The first systematic study of the Comedy of Manners and its relation to contemporary history

HORACE WALPOLE'S WORLD

A Study of Whig Society in the XVIIIth Century By ALICE D. GREENWOOD. Demy 8vo With Portraits 12s. 6d. net

LIFE OF NAPOLEON I.

By J. HOLLAND ROSE Litt.D., Reader in Modern History, University of Cambridge New and cheaper edition With Photogravure Frontispiece and Maps and Plans In one volume 6s. net

"To say that Dr. Rose has written the best life of Napoleon yet published is but faint praise."—TIMES

ENGLISH CONTEMPORARY OPINION ON NAPOLEON

By F. J. MACCUNN, B.A., late scholar of Queen's College, Oxford Crown 8vo 5s. net

A thorough study of the neglected side of Napoleonic research, with many quotations from contemporary sources.

DEMOCRACY IN NEW ZEALAND

Translated from the French of ANDRÉ SIGGFRIED With an Introduction by DOWNIE STEWART, and a Map Crown 8vo 6s. net

MONTESSORI: Principles and Practice

By E. P. CUIVERWILL, M.A., Fellow and Senior Tutor, Trinity College, Dublin, Professor of Education, University College, Dublin Crown 8vo, with many illustrations from special photographs, and a portrait of Dr. Montessori 3s. 6d. net

A careful and thorough examination of the new method of teaching and the views of its founder on spontaneity and liberty

THE QUEST SERIES

Edited by G. R. S. MEAD, President of the Quest Society. Crown 8vo 2s. 6d. net each

The Quest Series, as its name implies, is intended for those who are interested in that search for truth which is never been pursued with more knowledge and enthusiasm than at the present day

FIRST TWO VOLUMES

THE QUEST OF THE HOLY GRAIL

By JESSIE L. WESTON, Author of "The Legend of Sir Perceval"

PSYCHICAL RESEARCH AND SURVIVAL

By JAMES H. HYSLOP, Ph.D., LL.D., Secretary of the Psychical Research Society of America

TORYISM: A Political Dialogue

By KEITH FEILING, M.A., Student of Christ Church, late Fellow of All Souls' College, Oxford With a Foreword by I. L. SMITH, K.C., M.P. Crown 8vo 2s. 6d. net

Mr. Feiling brings four figures to represent various aspects of Toryism. They discuss in turn all the burning political questions of the hour—Home Rule, Irish Reform, Woman Suffrage, the future of the Land, and the rest, but the point of view which is emphasised by the tone of the discussion is not that of the partisan Press or platform

THE FUTURE OF THE THEATRE

By JOHN PALMER, M.A., sometime Scholar of Balliol College, Oxford Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net

G. BELL & SONS, Ltd., Portugal Street, London, W.C.

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S LIST.

The Full Account of the British Antarctic Expedition, 1910-13.

Ready November 6th In 2 Volumes

Royal 8vo., 42s. net

Scott's Last Expedition

Volume I.—Being the Journals of Captain R. F. Scott, C.V.O., R.N.

With a Preface by Sir CLYMENT'S R. MARKHAM, K.C.B., F.R.S.

Volume II.—The Reports of the Journeys and Scientific Work undertaken by Dr L. A. WILSON and the Surviving Members of the Expedition

Arranged by LONARD HUXLLY

With 18 Coloured Plates, 8 Photogravures, 4 Facsimile Pages from Captain Scott's Diary, 260 Illustrations and Maps

THE WESTERN REBELLION OF 1549.

An Account of the Insurrections in Devonshire and Cornwall against religious innovations in the reign of Edward VI

By Mrs FRANCES ROSE-TROUP F.R.Hist.S. With Illustrations Demy 8vo., 14s net

Katharine Tynan's Reminiscences.

TWENTY-FIVE YEARS.

By KATHARINE TYNAN HINKSON With a Portrait Demy 8vo., 10s 6d net

THE SOUTH AFRICAN SCENE.

By VIOLET R. MARKHAM, Author of "South Africa, Past and Present," &c Demy 8vo., 7s 6d net

OLD STANDARDS: South Country Sketches.

By JOHN HALSHAM, Author of "Idlehurst," "Lonewood Corner," &c Crown 8vo., 5s net

LABOUR, LIFE, AND LITERATURE.

Memories of Sixty Years.

By FREDERICK ROGLERS With a Portrait Large Post 8vo., 7s 6d net

THE NEW SCHOOLMASTER.

By FOURTH FORM Large Post 8vo., 6s. net

THE AUSTRIAN OFFICER AT WORK AND AT PLAY.

By DOROTHEA GERARD (Madame LONGARD DE LONGGARDL.) With a Frontispiece Large Post 8vo., 7s. 6d net

THE RAILWAYS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

By LORD MONKSWELL, D.L., Author of "French Railways," &c With Illustrations. Demy 8vo., 6s. net

LONDON

SMITH, ELDER & Co., 15, WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

MESSRS. JACK'S SELECT LIST*Autumn and Winter

By W. BEACH THOMAS and A. K. COLLETT. With a series of Reproductions in colour from the work of Sir Alfred East, R.A., Harry Becker, C. W. Furze, Buxton Knight, and Haldane Macfall, and nearly 200 drawings in the text by A. W. Seaby. One of the most charming Nature books ever published. Beautifully bound, 10s 6d net.

The French Revolution

By H. F. B. WHIFFER. The series of 80 illustrations accompanying Mr Wheeler's fascinating volume form a representative collection—undoubtedly the most curious and interesting series ever collected from authentic sources. Cloth 7s 6d net.

British Painters; their Story and their Art

By J. EDGUMBE STALEY. Contains 24 Reproductions in full colour of great masterpieces. The text supplies in a clear manner an account of painting and painters in Britain from the early days to the present time. A lovely gift book. 5s net.

The British Bird Book*Completion of a great Work

Edited by F. B. KIRKMAN, B.A. (Oxon.), assisted by a staff of the most eminent ornithologists. 200 Drawings in colour by G. E. Lodge, A. W. Seaby, G. E. Collins, and others. 200 Photos by various notable bird-photographers. In 12 sections, at 10s 6d net per section, and in 4 volumes, buckram, gilt tops, 36s net per volume. Edition de Luxe (350 copies signed and numbered), at 21s per section net, and in 4 volumes, half-morocco, gilt tops, at £4 4s net per vol.

Leather Yapp Editions of the "Masterpieces in Colour" Series

The following are now issued in artistic leather binding at 3s 6d net each —

1 Burne-Jones	5 Leighton	9 Rossetti
2 Constable	6 Millais	10 Turner
3 Gainsborough	7 Rembrandt	11 Watts
4 Holman Hunt	8 Romney	12 Whistler

Masterpieces of Music

Each volume contains a choice selection of music and an illustrated article by Sir Frederic Cowen, Sir C. Stanford, Sir A. C. Mackenzie, London Ronald, &c. Two NEW VOLUMES in this popular series. WILBER, by G. H. Clutsam, RUBINSTEIN, by Arthur Hervey. Piano size, bound, 1s 6d net per volume.

The New Encyclopædia

In a single volume of 1,600 pages. Equal in extent to six large volumes. Concise. Accurate. Up-to-date. Maps and Illustrations. Cloth 7s 6d net. "A masterpiece in the art of careful condensation." —Observer.

67, LONG ACRE, LONDON, W.C., & EDINBURGH.

PROSPECTUS ON APPLICATION

THE KIRRIEMUIR EDITION OF THE WORKS OF J. M. BARRIE

THE outstanding event of the autumn publishing season will undoubtedly be the publication of "The Kirriemuir Edition of the Works of J. M. Barrie." The production throughout will be on the most sumptuous scale. All Sir J. M. Barrie's books are being re-set for this new edition, by Messrs. Constable and Co., of Edinburgh, and printed for them in royal octavo on deckle-edged paper. The Kirriemuir Edition will be in ten volumes, price £6 6s net each set, and will be strictly limited to one thousand sets. The volumes will not be sold separately.

PROSPECTUS ON APPLICATION

QUALITY STREET BY J. M. BARRIE

WITH PLATES IN COLOUR AND MANY LINE ILLUSTRATIONS BY

HUGH THOMSON

Price 15s. net. Limited Edition de Luxe £2 2s net.

HODDER & STOUGHTON, LONDON, NEW YORK, TORONTO

Cassell's Notable New PublicationsBehind the Veil at the Russian Court*A Book of Startling Revelations*By COUNT PAUL VASSILI

In this work all the notabilities of the Russian Empire from 1855 up to and including 1913 pass under review. It is a series of glimpses of the inner lives of nearly 250 personages of various ranks and eminence who have been intimately associated with the Governmental and Social activities of the Russian Empire during the last sixty years. Many secrets are revealed the motives for many things which perplex the world are laid bare, and the true situation of many things, of which hitherto only hearsay data have filtered through, are here told in the unbiased language of unfettered truth.

With Eight Photogravure Plates*Medium 8vo 16s net*Lady Hester Lucy Stanhope*A New Light on her Life and Love Affairs*By FRANK HAMEL

This volume contains many interesting new facts. Fifty years after the publication of Dr. Meryon's Memoirs, the late Duchess of Cleveland printed a detailed life of her aunt but there are many incidents of Lady Hester's story of which the Duchess was ignorant or which she chose to pass over in silence. In this volume is disclosed for the first time the true reason for Lady Hester's exiling herself. There are included facsimiles of many important autograph letters, a genealogical table showing Lady Hester's relationship with William Pitt and her connection with the families of the present Earl Stanhope and Earl of Rosebery.

With Twenty Illustrations*Medium 8vo 15s net*The Country of 'The Ring and the Book'*By SIR FREDERICK TREVES, Bart., G.C.V.O., C.B., LL.D.

Not only Browning lovers but all those who love a book rich in descriptive colour will welcome Sir Frederick Treves's new work—the most important work that he has yet given to the public. The volume is divided into three parts. Part I is devoted to the crime which Browning deals with in 'The Ring and the Book'. Part II describes the country which is dealt with in this great poem of 21,000 lines, every spot on the eventful road from Arezzo to Rome being minutely dealt with. Part III is a criticism which sheds quite a new light on the Browning masterpieces. Lovers of the poem will become twice the lovers they were before. They will take this book to their hearts and enshrine it among their household gods. And they will be right. These photographs the vivid reconstruction of the story and an artistic resume of the poem combine together to leave us immensely in the debt of the author for making Browning's poem far more actual and living to us than ever it was before.

With Coloured Frontispiece and 106 Illustrations
Medium 8vo 15s. net

OF ALL BOOKSELLERS

CASSELL &amp; CO., LTD., LA BELLE SAUVAGE, LONDON, E.C.

WYMAN & SONS LIMITED

Largest Installation of Monotype and Linotype Machines in the Kingdom
Fine Art Miehle and other Presses for best
Bookwork

High-class Rotary Machinery for half-tone
printing and quadruple Presses producing 16, 20, 24, 28 and 32 pp. papers at 30,000 per hour, folded

Newspaper, Book
and
General Printers
and Lithographers

Binding Plant complete, including the latest machines for Case-making and Casing-in

Books set up by Monotype, submitted entire in proof, printed and bound complete

BOOKSTALL CONTRACTORS ON LONDON & NORTH WESTERN, GREAT WESTERN AND OTHER RAILWAYS

Wholesale Booksellers and Newsagents    ::    Railway, Press and General Advertising Contractors?

LONDON AND READING

Hodder & Stoughton announce for immediate publication a sumptuous limited edition in one volume of "The Collected Poetry of Francis Thompson."

THE COLLECTED POETRY OF FRANCIS THOMPSON

¶ A limited edition in one volume of Francis Thompson's Collected Poems, containing "Poems" (with "The Hound of Heaven"), "Sister Songs," and "New Poems" (the three volumes published during the Poet's life); and, in addition, the century of poems of the first importance that have been published since his death. These posthumous poems show just as great and golden a genius as "The Hound of Heaven," "The Mistress of Vision," and "Love in Dian's Lap" of the earlier volumes.

¶ The work, printed from special type, in two colours, by Messrs. T. & A. Constable, of Edinburgh, will be produced throughout in the most sumptuous manner, and will be issued in the three following styles:—1. Bound in grey boards, canvas back, paper label, printed on deckle-edged paper, limited to 2,500 copies, 20s. net. 2. Bound in vellum, blue silk ties, printed on special paper, with etched portrait, each copy numbered and signed by the publishers and the printers, edition limited to 500 copies, £2 2s. net. 3. Bound in leather, printed on special paper, numbered and signed by the publishers and the printers, with collotype reproduction of the manuscript of "The Hound of Heaven," and artist's proof of portrait on Japanese vellum, edition limited to 100 copies, £5 5s. net.

HODDER & STOUGHION, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.
HODDER & STOUGHION, 38 WEST 32ND STREET, NEW YORK
HODDER & STOUGHION LIMITED, 17 WILSON AVENUE, TORONTO

A selection from ALSTON RIVERS' new books

FOR THE CHILDREN

ROSYCHEEKS AND GOLDENHEAD

By RUTH M BEDFORD With 16 colour plates by Mabel L Webb Now ready 3s 6d net Postage 4d
A book of charming verses and beautiful colour illustrations for children of all ages

THE BEST NEW NOVELS

WHISPERING DUST

By ELDRID REYNOLDS, author of "Red of the Rock." With picture wrapper 6s. The author has woven into a delicate love story some threads of mystery and tragedy, and her passages descriptive of Egypt are gems of life and colour.

THE PEACOCK FEATHER

By LESLIE MOORE, author of "Aunt Olive in Bohemia," etc. 6s. Love, faith, constancy, the companionship of children and animals, tenderness and humour—all these go to compound the spell Miss Moore casts upon her readers.

THE RING OF NECESSITY

By Mrs STEUART ERSKINE, author of "The Magic Flumes," etc. 6s. The author has created in Maria Manning a striking and very real personality. There is a general greyness of atmosphere which makes an appropriate setting to the long, hard struggle of her life. A refreshing note of originality appears in both the plot and its handling.

THE MAN WHO PAID

By REGINALD BOLSTER and AUBREY O'BRIEN, author of "Cupid and Cartridges." Second large impression. 6s. "A powerful human story, which is certain to make its way to success." Daily Telegraph.

MR. WHYBREW'S PRINCESS

By HOWARD C. ROWE. 6s. "The production of a finished workman . . . a book with brains and heart in it . . . carries the reader along with it like a straw upon the surface of a torrent."—Sunday Times.

A BOOK OF MEN AND SHIPS

FLAGSHIPS THREE

By C. W. BEAN, author of "On the Wool Track," etc. Demy 8vo. Illustrated. 5s. net. The Globe says: "Every chapter has its own breezy interest, and the whole book smells of the salt sea. . . . We can cordially recommend Mr. Bean's book to everybody in search of a well-written, entertaining, and informative volume on the Navy."

Complete Autumn List gratis on application

LONDON: ALSTON RIVERS, LTD.,
16 GRAY'S INN ROAD, W.C.

ANDREW MELROSE, LTD.

FIRST AUTUMN LIST.

REMINISCENCES OF AUGUSTUS SAINT GAUDENS. Two vols., demy 8vo, gilt top. Crowded with illustrations and reproductions of the famous Sculptor's best work. 25s. net.

THE WONDER OF LIFE. By J. ARTHUR THOMSON, M.A. With a large number of illustrations in Black and White, and beautiful coloured Full page Drawings. Cloth, gilt top, price 12s. 6d. net.

ANTARCTIC DAYS. Sketches of the homely side of Polar life, by two of Shackleton's men. Illustrated by the Authors, James Murray and George Marston. Edition de Luxe, with 38 Full page Illustrations. Six Beautiful Reproductions in colour. Limited to 250 copies. Signed by the Authors and Sir Ernest Shackleton, who contributes a Preface. Price 18s. net. Ordinary Edition of this unique book, 8s. net.

A BOOK OF DUCHESSES. By ALICE E. ROBBINS, Author of "A Tour and a Romance," "Things that Pass," etc. With numerous full page illustrations. Demy 8vo, gilt top, price 10s. 6d. net.

THE OLD TRANSPORT ROAD. By STANLEY PORTAL HYATT, Author of "The Northward Trek," "A Soldier of Fortune," etc. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, price 7s. 6d. net.

ROME VERSUS JESUS. By E. H. BEARDSLEY. Crown 8vo cloth, 3s. 6d. net. An indictment of the Papacy in a series of scholarly philosophical studies of the lives of the Popes and historical incidents.

WANDERINGS IN THE ISLE OF WIGHT. By ETHEL HARGROVE, Author of "Silhouettes of Sweden," "Charm of Copenhagen," etc. With numerous Full-page Illustrations, and Map in pocket of cloth cover. Crown 8vo. Uniform with "A Tourist's Russia." Price 6s. net.

HUMAN VOICES FROM THE RUSSIAN CAMPAIGN (1812). From the French "Etudes d'Histoire." Cinquieme série. Translated by M. Harriet M. Capes. Price 3s. 6d. net. A singularly human book made up of letters, diaries, etc., written by Officers who served with Napoleon in the disastrous campaign.

A NOTABLE LIST OF NEW NOVELS. Price 8s.

THE LURE OF THE LITTLE DRUM. By MARGARET PETERSON. This novel was the Winner of 250 guineas in the great Competition. Adjudicators: Mr Joseph Conrad, Miss Cholmondeley, Mr W. J. Locke. 4th large edition.

THE HOUSE OF SILK. By ROY MELDRUM, Author of "The Ways of Life," etc.

THE SCARLET RIDER. By BERTHA RUNKLE, Author of "The Helmet of Navarre."

JULIA AND I IN CANADA. By the Author of "Daphne in the Fatherland," etc.

AN ENGLISH GIRL IN THE EAST. By MARGARET KIRBY.

THE MASTERDILLO. An anonymous and delightful novel embodying a love idyll fresher and more charming than anything that has appeared in modern fiction.

MAYFAIR LIMITED. By EDWARD O'SULLIVAN. A satire on the recent disclosures about noble ladies who make large sums of money by introducing vulgar nouveau riches into Society.

THE WORLD AND MR. FREYNE. By Mrs. ALFRED WINGATE. This amazingly clever novel has little to fear from the great output of fiction during the Autumn. Its subject alone would make it the most piquant novel of the year.

THE COLOUR OF THE EAST. By ELIZABETH WASHBURN. A very striking book of sketches by a writer with an eye for a picture, and the instinct for the right word. Frontispiece by Guterin. Price 3s. 6d. net.

THE FRIENDLY ROAD. By DAVID GRAYSON, Author of "Adventures in Contentment." Cloth, gilt top, price 5s. net.

CHRISTMAS BOOKLET.

RAINBOWS. By MARION DYKES SPICER. Imp 16mo. Fully illustrated by Charles Robinson. A series of delightful prose.

LONDON: ANDREW MELROSE, LIMITED.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS.Printed in the Beautiful Florence Type.STEVENSON'S POEMS

Including Underwoods, Ballads, Songs of Travel, A Child's Garden of Verses. Small 4to, printed upon pure rag paper, cloth gilt, 12s 6d. net, also a LARGE PAPER EDITION, limited to 500 numbered copies. These latter are all sold, and application must be made to the booksellers.

A New Book by the Japanese Artist in London.

MY RECOLLECTIONS AND REFLECTIONS By YOSHIO MARKINO Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s net With 8 illustrations in colour and several in Monochrome

An Inexhaustible Recount

JIMMY GLOVER AND HIS FRIENDS. By JAMES M. GLOVER With illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s 6d net

A History of the Moslems in Spain

SPANISH ISLAM. By REINHART DOZY Translated, with a Biographical Introduction and additional Notes, by FRANCIS GRIFFIN STOKES Royal 8vo 21s net

A Book About the Land

THIS REALM—THIS ENGLAND. By GEO A B DEWAR With illustrations 6s net

A Comprehensive Book on Furniture

FURNITURE: A History and Guide. By ESHIR SINGH TON Copiously illustrated after the best examples 16s net

A Study of a Great Teacher

WHAT TOLSTOY TAUGHT. Edited by BOLTON HALL Cloth, 6s net

Retold from Offenbach's Operas

TALES OF HOFFMAN. Retold by CYRIL FALLS With illustrations in colour by A Brantingham Simpson Sm 4to 6s net

THE DESIRABLE ALIEN AT HOME IN GERMANY. By VIOLET HUNT With Preface and Two Additional Chapters by FORD MADOX HUEFFER 6s

London CHATTO &amp; WINDUS, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

SINCE the announcement of the forthcoming publication of Professor Stalker's new work "How to read Shakspeare A Guide to the General Reader," its appearance has been awaited with much curiosity and interest, as it is a new departure in the literary activity of the famous author of "Imago Christi." Professor Stalker has found in the study of Shakspeare one of the chief delights of his leisure hours, and in this book he addresses himself to all the great company of the poet's friends, and especially to Christian people who wish to make the most of these great works of genius. The book has just been published 5/-

How to Read Shakspeare

A Guide to the general reader
By Prof. JAMES STALKER, M.A., D.D.

Hodder & Stoughton, 11 Mark Lane, London, E.C. 3.
Hodder & Stoughton, 15 E & 32nd Street, New York.
Hodder & Stoughton Limited, 17 Bloor Street, Toronto.

A. & C. BLACK'S NEW BOOKS.*THE BANKS OF THE NILE.

Painted by ELLA DU CANE Described by Prof JOHN A TODD Descriptions of the illustrations by FLORENCE DU CANE (containing 60 full-page illustrations in colour and two sketch-maps) Price 20s. net.

GARDENS OF THE GREAT MUGHALS.

By C M VILLIERS STUART Containing 40 page illustrations, 16 in colour also 8 ground plans 12s 6d. net.

STAINED GLASS OF THE MIDDLE AGES IN ENGLAND AND FRANCE.

Painted by LAWRENCE B SAINT Described by HUGH ARNOLD Containing 50 full-page illustrations in colour Price 25s. net.

RUSSIA.

Painted by F DE HAENLIN Text by G DOBSON, H M GROVE, and H STUART Containing 96 full-page illustrations, 48 in colour, and a sketch-map 20s net.

PHEASANTS AND COVERT SHOOTING.

By Captain AYMER MAXWELL With 16 full-page illustrations in colour by GEORGE RANKIN 7s 6d. net.

THE DOLOMITES.

Painted by T HARRISON (COMPTON) Described by REGINALD FARMER Containing 20 full-page illustrations in colour, and a sketch-map Price 7s 6d. net.

PROVINCIAL RUSSIA.

Painted by F DE HAENLIN Described by HUGH STUART Containing 12 full-page illustrations (16 in colour), and a sketch-map Price 7s 6d. net.

GIRTON COLLEGE.

By E I C JONES Containing 16 page illustrations (8 of them in colour) and a plan Price 1s 6d. net.

SOUTH AMERICA.

(THE MAKING OF THE NATIONS' SERIES)

By W H KOBFFEL Containing 42 illustrations.

Price 7s. 6d. net.

WILD LIFE ON THE WING.

By M D HAVILAND Containing 8 full-page reproductions from pencil drawings and 50 smaller illustrations in the text by PATRICK WILSON Price 5s net.

HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS OF THE ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.

By CONSTANCE JONES POCOCK (containing 32 full-page illustrations from photographs) Price 5s. net.

THE MOOSE.

By AGNES HERRERT Containing 8 full-page illustrations by PATRICK WILSON Price 5s. net.

IN THE GRIP OF THE WILD WA.

By G F MITTON With 8 full-page illustrations in colour by ERNEST PRATER Price 3s. 6d.

THE "FASCINATION" SERIES. IRELAND.

By L. EDNA WALTER, B.Sc., A.C.G.I. (containing 24 illustrations from photographs) Price 1s 6d. net.

ENGLAND INVADED.

By EDWARD FOORD and GORDON HOME With 43 illustrations and 13 maps and plan. Price 6s. net.

A HISTORY OF SOCIALISM.

By THOMAS KIRKUP Fifth Edition, Revised and Edited by EDWARD R PRASI, Secretary to the Fabian Society. Price 5s. net.

THE LAWS OF HEALTH FOR SCHOOLS.

By A M MALCOLMSON, M.D. Containing 35 illustrations in the text. Price 1s 6d. net.

THE "ARTIST'S SKETCH-BOOK" SERIES.

Edited by MARTIN HARDIE, A.R.E.

CAMBRIDGE. By WALTER M KERSKEY

OXFORD. By FRED RICHARDS

STRATFORD-ON-AVON. By GORDON HOME.

With artistic covers and wrappers, each bearing label designed by the artists and containing 24 reproductions in facsimile from pencil drawings. Each price 1s. net.

The best "Shilling" "Scroll" on the market

THE PORTRAIT EDITION OF THE WAVERLEY NOVELS.

In twenty-five volumes. Crown 8vo, cloth, each with frontispiece in colour and a coloured wrapper.

Price 1s. net per volume.

A. &amp; C. BLACK, 90, Soho Square, London, W.

A SERIES WHICH IS RECEIVING WIDESPREAD ATTENTION ON ACCOUNT OF THE QUALITY OF ITS WRITING AND THE DISTINCTION OF THE FORMAT

Small 8vo, attractively bound in cloth gilt Price 2s. net each.

FELLOWSHIP BOOKS

A new contribution by various writers toward the expression of the Human Ideal and Artistic Faith of our own day

The second six volumes, just published, are :

FAIRIES	G. M. Faulding
FREEDOM	A. Martin Freeman
SOLITUDE	Norman Gale
A SPARK DIVINE: A Book for Animal-Lovers	R. C. Lehmann
CHILDHOOD	Alice Meynell
ROMANCE	Ernest Rhys

The first six volumes already issued are :

FRIENDSHIP	Clifford Bax
THE JOY OF THE THEATRE	Gilbert Cannan
DIVINE DISCONTENT	James Guthrie
THE QUEST OF THE IDEAL	Grace Rhys
SPRINGTIME	C. J. Tait
THE COUNTRY	Edward Thomas

" These few quotations will give some idea of the tone and quality of the series, which deserves commendation for the dignity of its aim and the high level of its workmanship "— Mr W. I. Courtney in The Daily Telegraph

A new and attractive prospectus will be sent on application. The volumes are on sale at the leading booksellers in Great Britain

LONDON

B. T. BATSFORD, 94 HIGH HOLBORN

READERS OUT OF REACH

of a good local bookseller, or who live abroad, are asked to write direct to London for their books, which will be sent by return of post, at lowest cash prices, on receipt of remittance with order

German or French Books (if not obtainable in London) are posted to customers direct from Leipzig or Paris by my agents there, thus saving postage

LONDON AGENT FOR LIBRARIES ABROAD.

ESTABLISHED
1881

ALFRED WILSON

Export and Retail Bookseller

18-19 GRACECHURCH STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Telephone: 7463 Central.

Branches: London County & Westminster (Leamard Street).

Subscription Newspaper and Periodical Agency for British and Foreign Publications.

List of 1600 Subscription Rates free on application.

CATALOGUES SENT POST FREE

1. Reference Book Catalogue of 146 pp of Standard Literature
2. Remainder Catalogue of over 1000 Titles of Publishers' Reminders, in good condition as issued, at from 30% to 80% off published prices.
3. List of Pocket Editions and 7d Novels.
4. Price List of Subscription Rates for British Periodicals abroad, with a selection of the most popular American, French, German, and Spanish periodicals

JOHN LONG'S General Literature

BOHEMIAN DAYS IN FLEET STREET

By a Journalist Demy 8vo 10s. 6d. net

Fleet Street, "The Street of Adventure," has ever been the resort of wit, men of letters, the diplomats and abounds in recollections of distinguished men. A vivid picture of life on the "Press," on the "Stage," in the restaurants and clubs, and in the Bohemia which is almost a street. Fifty page terms with anecdotes and personalia of London twenty two decades ago.

ROSE BERTIN: The Creator of Fashion at the Court of Marie Antoinette

By EMILE LANGLADE English Version by Dr A S

RAPPOPORT With Photogravure and 24 Portraits. Demy 8vo 12s. 6d. net

The reign of Marie Antoinette is famous for its eccentricities, its extravagance, and expensive habits. Rose Bertin the daughter of a small Government official of Amiens, was a great favourite of the Queen, who raised her to the dignity of chief adviser in all matters concerning fashion. The story of how she gained fame and fortune makes fascinating reading.

EUGÈNE de BEAUHARNAIS: The Adopted Son of Napoleon

By VIOLETTE M. MONTAGU, Author of "Sophie Dawes,"

Queen of Chantilly," "The Scottish College in Paris," etc. With 24 Portraits and Illustrations Demy 8vo 15s. net

The life of Eugène de Beauharnais, the son of the Empress Josephine, and the adopted son, and at one time probable successor to the Emperor Napoleon, is but little known. He was born on the eve of the French Revolution and educated as a good "citoyen." He accompanied Bonaparte, as aide de camp, to Egypt, and later was Viceroy of Italy. After the disastrous retreat from Moscow he still remained loyal in the service of the Emperor, and to the end of his interesting and eventful life he lived up to his motto "Honour and Loyalty."

ROBESPIERRE AND THE WOMEN HE LOVED

By HECTOR FLUSCHMANN English Version by Dr

A S RAPPOPORT With numerous Portraits Demy 8vo 12s. 6d. net

Those who have always regarded Robespierre as the austere and incorruptible—a sort of Nero or Claudius—will be astonished to learn that in spite of his utter lack of physical attraction he was always surrounded by a crowd of worshipping women. Was, in truth, the idol of the women of the Revolution. They all had their love affairs—these men of the Terror, and in this fascinating volume we get a glimpse of the lighter side of those awful days.

THE BONDS OF AFRICA

By OWEN LUTHER, Author of "Big Game Hunting in North-Eastern Rhodesia." With 10 Illustrations from Photographs and a Map Demy 8vo 12s. 6d. net

Mr Owen Luther is a young Englishman who has spent the past eleven years in Africa, and has wandered into well known and unknown portions of the Dark Continent to hunt big game and to pry into the lives of the natives, inhabitants of the remotest corners of it. Quite apart from its value to the traveller, the sportsman and the student of natural history, the book possesses a remarkable human interest. Mr Luther knows Africa from Cape Town to the City of the Pharaoh, and his work covers in enormous field of but little known land in Southern, North Western and North-Eastern Rhodesia, Nyasaland, British East Africa, and Uganda, its merits from a geographical point of view are undoubted.

GUN DOGS

By FRANK TOWNEND BARTON, M.R.C.V.S., Author of "Terriers, Their Points and Management." With

10 Illustrations from Photographs Crown 8vo 5s. net

A manual of practical interest invaluable to all who are interested in the business of rural pastime. As far as can be ascertained it is the only work which is exclusively devoted to dogs expressly used and bred for work in connection with the gun.

HOUNDS

By FRANK TOWNEND BARTON, M.R.C.V.S. With

17 Illustrations from Photographs Crown 8vo 5s. net

An entirely new and original work dealing with the most important varieties of hounds. Each variety is exhaustively dealt with, not only in relation to the conformation, but in matters appertaining to feeding, breeding, rearing, showing, health and sport, &c., &c.

JOHN LONG'S Popular 6s. Novels

A SOCIAL INNOCENT	Richard St John Colthurst
LOT'S WIFE	A. M. Judd
THE EURASIAN	Henry Bruce
THE PARAMOUNT SHOP	H. Maxwell
YOUNG EYE AND OLD ADAM	Tom Gallon
GREEN GIRL	Mrs Henry Tippet
BOWING CLOVER	George Woull
A FORTUNE AT STAKE (2nd Edition)	Nat Gould
THE WISDOM OF THE FOOL	"Coronet"
ETELKA	Stanley Ford
LOVE ON SMOKY RIVER	Theodore Goodridge Roberts
A HANDFUL OF DAYS	Hal D'Arcy
A VICTIM OF CIRCUMSTANCE	Charles Lowenthal ("Low Lathen")

JOHN LONG, LTD, 12, 13, 14, NORRIS ST., HAYMARKET, LONDON

Macmillan's New Books

VOL I JUST READY

The History of England from the

Accession of James the Second

By LORD MACAULAY Edited by CHARLES HARDING FIRTH, M.A., Regius Professor of Modern History in the University of Oxford With 900 Illustrations, including 44 in Colour and Photogravure Portrait Uniform with the Illustrated Edition of Green's "Short History of the English People" In 6 volumes (published quarterly) super royal 8vo, 10s 6d net each

The Life of Florence Nightingale

By Sir EDWARD COOK With Photogravure Portraits 2 volumes, 8vo, 30s net

ENGLISH MEN OF LETTERS—NEW VOL

Jane Austen By F. WARRE CORNISH, late Fellow of King's College, Cambridge Crown 8vo 2s net

THE TIMES "The mark of this little book is its quiet and sober fidelity to the truth. Mr Cornish has read and delighted in all that there is to read. Jane Austen herself, we feel, would have delighted in what he has done for her."

RUDYARD KIPLING

Just So Stories By Rudyard Kipling With Illustrations by the Author, and 12 additional Illustrations in colour by Joseph M. Gleeson 4to 6s net [Immediately]

Songs from Books By Rudyard Kipling Uniform with Poetical Works Crown 8vo 6s Pocket Edition Fcap 8vo Cloth, 4s 6d, net Limp Leather, 5s. net Edition de Luxe (limited to 1,000 copies) 8vo 10s 6d, net.

AUTHOR'S ANNOTATED EDITION

The Works of Tennyson With Notes by the Author Edited, with Memoir, by HALLAM, LORD TENNYSON With Portrait Extra crown 8vo 10s. 6d net

RABINDRANATH TAGORE

The Gardener: Lyrics of Love and Life

By RABINDRANATH TAGORE, Author of 'Gitanjali.' With Portrait Crown 8vo 4s 6d net

Collected Poems By A. F., Author of "The Divine Vision and other Poems" Crown 8vo 6s net

DAILY NEWS—"A. F. is a poet with a gift and touch. One shrinks from calling a man great while he is still alive, but it is difficult after reading this book with its overflowing beauty and beauty, not to believe that A. F. will be remembered among the greatest of the mystic poets."

THOMAS HARDY

A Changed Man, The Waiting Supper, and other Tales, concluding with the Romantic Adventures of a Milkmaid By THOMAS HARDY With Frontispiece Extra crown 8vo 6s

WARWICK GOBLE'S NEW COLOUR BOOK

The Fairy Book The best popular Fairy Stories, selected and rendered anew by the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman" With 32 Illustrations in Colour by Warwick Goble Crown 4to 15s net

HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS SERIES—NEW VOL

Highways and Byways in the Border

By ANDREW LANG and JOHN LANG With Illustrations by HUGH THOMSON Extra crown 8vo, gilt top, 5s net

H. G. WILLS'S NEW NOVEL

The Passionate Friends 6s.

MAURICE HEWLETT'S NEW NOVEL

Bendish: A Study in Prodigality 6s.

By AUTHOR OF "THE CROCK OF GOLD"

Here are Ladies By JAMES STEPHENS, Author of "The Crock of Gold" Crown 8vo 5s net

*. Mainly a collection of character sketches, abounding with rich Irish humour

MACMILLAN &amp; CO., Ltd., LONDON.

MR. HEINEMANN'S LIST

EMINENT FIGURES IN FRENCH HISTORY

THE DUCHESSE DE CHEVREUSE

By LOUIS BATTIFOL
Each volume illustrated Large Demy 8vo 10s. net

MIRABEAU

By LOUIS BARTHOLO, Premier of France

MY FATHER; Personal and Spiritual Reminiscences.

By ESTELLE W. STEAD Illustrated Demy 8vo 10s. net (2nd imp.)

FIFTY CARICATURES

By MAX BEERBOHM Small crown 4to 6s. net

ART IN SPAIN AND PORTUGAL (Ars Una Series) By MARCEL DIEULAFOY With 600 Illustrations Cr 8vo 6s net

FRENCH COLOUR-PRINTS IN THE XVIII. CENTURY

50 Plates in Colour and an Introduction by MALCOLM C. SALAMAN Demy 4to 22 2s. net

OLD ITALIAN LACE

By ELISA RICCI In two volumes Cr folio With Plates in Colour and Photogravure, and numerous Reproductions in Black and White 26 6s. net

LOUIS XVI. FURNITURE

Introduction by S. de RICCI 500 Plates Dy 4to 25s. net

THE DAFFODIL FIELDS

By JOHN MASEFIELD Crown 8vo 3s 6d net

APHRODITE and other Poems

By JOHN HELSTON Demy 8vo 5s net

AUGURIES

By LAURENCE BINYON Cr 8vo. 3s 6d net

RHYMES of a ROUSEABOUT

By W. MONRO ANDERSON Crown 8vo 3s. 6d net

KNAVE OF HEARTS By ARTHUR

SYMONS Demy 8vo 5s. net

THE SEAS ANTHOLOGY By

J. E. PATTERSON author of "My Vagabondage," etc Large fcap 8vo 5s net

Works of JOHN GALSWORTHY

THE DARK FLOWER

"The book has great beauty. Its analysis of character and motive is as thorough and sure as all Mr. Galsworthy's work, his choice of words and imagery being exquisite." Cr 8vo, 6/- —Pall Mall Gazette

THE COUNTRY HOUSE 6s & 1s. THE PATRICIAN 6s.

FRATERNITY 6s THE MAN OF PROPERTY 6s.

THE ISLAND PHARISEES 6s. MOODS, SONGS, AND

A MOTLEY 6s DOGGERELS 5s. net

LATEST 6s. NOVELS

THE MOUNTAIN APART James Prosper

BAND OF BROTHERS Charles Turley

STORIES OF INDIA Mrs. Anthon

THE MILKY WAY F. Tennyson Jesse

THE PERFECT WIFE Joseph Keating

INDISCRETIONS OF DR. CARSTAIRS A. de O

THE TRUTH ABOUT CAMILLA Gertrude Hall

DIANA AND TWO SYMPHONIES Francis Tovey

THE VICTIMS George Willoughby

SET TO PARTNERS Mrs. Henry Dudeney

LIBBY ANN Sadie Katherine Casey

THE GARDEN WITHOUT WALLS Coningsby Dawson

MARRYING OF HESTER RAINSBROOK J. A. Revermont

Mr. Heinemann's splendid illustrated Autumn List sent on application to

Dept. 3b, 21, Bedford Street, London, W.C.

The Bookman.

"I am a Bookman."—James Russell Lowell

No. 266. VOL. XLV.
Subscription rate 11s. per annum post free.

NOVEMBER, 1913.

PRICE SIXPENCE.
Published Monthly.

CONTENTS.

NEWS NOTES . . . 83-88

THE BOOKSELLER'S DIARY 89

THE READER

John Galsworthy By RICH-
ARD CURLE 91

Walter Pater By T E PAGE 97

The Real Labby By G S
LAYARD 98

W. T. Stead . . . 102

PRIZE COMPETITIONS 104

NEW BOOKS—

The Dark Flower By RICH-
ARD CURLE 107

George Eliot The Earlier
Novels By THOMAS SEC-
COMBE 108

The Creed of a Critic By
PERCEVAL GIBBON 108

Frederick Tennyson's Poems 109

Cupid Goes North 110

The Romp 110

A Perspective of Policies By
WALTER SICHEL 111

Mr Grant Richards' Novel 112

Out of the Abyss By SIR
THOMAS OLIVER 112

Ellen Adair . . . 113

The Teachings of Tolstoy By
W P RYAN . . . 113

Harriet Hosmer 114

The Older Universities By
R BRIMLEY JOHNSON 114

The Coryston Family 115

Everybody's Books . . . 115

The Morning's War By
DIXON SCOTT 116

In Latin America By HENRY
HALBLEIN 117

Kate Douglas Wiggin's New Book 117

The New Man 118

A Picture of Russia By
GEORGE SAMPSON 118

An Englishwoman in America
By FREDERICK WHYFF 119

The Soul of a Suffragette 120

Lochage By EDWARD THOMAS 120

The Daffodil Fields By
FRANCIS BICKLEY . . . 121

NOVEL NOTES .

The Fool's Tragedy—The Allison Honour—The Children of the Sea A Trap to Catch a Dream—Love in the Hills No place like Home—Degarmo's Wife—
An Innocent Judas—Guardian Angels—Notwithstanding—The Perfect Wife—The Grip of the Past Barbara of the Thorn—The Mercenary 122-126

THE BOOKMAN'S TABLE—

The Press and its Story—
Famous Artists and their Models—The Man from Chicago—Confessions of a Book-Lover—Joseph and his Brethren—From Wheel and Look-out 126-129

NOTES ON NEW BOOKS 129

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E C

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

News Notes.

The December issue of THE BOOKMAN has taken its place as one of the most important of the Christmas literary periodicals. Our last year's Christmas Double Number sold out immediately on publication, and the demand for this year's, which will be ready on the 1st of December, is already so large that we would urge all readers who are desirous of securing a copy to place their orders for it at once. In addition to four large and fully illustrated Supplements dealing with the new books of the season, this Christmas Number will contain a photogravure frontispiece portrait of Sir J. M. Barrie by Alvin Langdon Coburn; a series of beautifully reproduced engravings in colour, a presentation plate portrait of Ernest Thompson Seton, and numerous portraits, reproductions of paintings and drawings, and other black and white illustrations. It is the amplest and most interesting guide for the Christmas bookbuyer, and besides all THE BOOKMAN's usual features and an unusually large number of shorter reviews, will contain articles on "The Work of Sir J. M. Barrie," by Dixon Scott, "Ernest Thompson Seton," by Charles G. D. Roberts; "Kipling's Songs," by Perceval Gibbon, "The Early Wars of Wessex," by Professor Collingwood; "Art and Morals," by G. S. Layard, "Butler, Pleasant and Unpleasant," by George Sampson, "Gerhart Hauptmann," by Darrell Figgis, "Pillars of Society," by Wilfred Whitten, "Edmund Gosse's Prose Works," by Francis Bickley, "A Bookman's Letters," by Thomas Seccombe, etc., etc.

It is two years since Mr. Stanley Portal Hyatt's last book "Off the Main Track," made its appearance. This autumn we are to have two new volumes from him—"The Old Transport Road," a travel book which Mr. Andrew Melrose is publishing, and a novel, "The Way of the Cardinals," of which Mr. Werner Laurie is the publisher. Mr. Hyatt has spent much of his life in South Africa, he was himself a transport rider for several years, and the interest of "The Old Transport Road" lies in the fact that it pictures the lives of those who lived on the Great Road of South Africa before the railway came, and the number of men who can write of those days is small now, and grows smaller every year.

Mr. Frederick Niven, whose new novel, "Ellen Adair," we review on another page, was born in Valparaiso, Chili, thirty-seven years ago, he was brought home to Glasgow to be educated, and there studied in the Glasgow School of Art, his earlier leanings being towards painting and not letters. Wanderfret drew him away to Western Canada, whilst he was still in his teens, and some of his experiences of life there have been gathered up into certain of his stories. Last year he returned to Canada, accompanied by his wife, and thence contributed several admirable sketches of Western life to The Daily News, The Pall Mall Gazette, and The World's Work. Another novel of Mr Niven's

Photo by Miss Yvonne Farnol. Mrs. Stewart Erskine
whose new novel, "The King of Necessity," will be published this month
by Messrs. Alton Knott.

which is appearing over here this autumn "Hands Up!" (Martin Secker) was published some little time ago in the United States, both serially and in book form, and met with considerable success. It is an adventure story that tells of the passing of "The Apache Kid," already known to readers of "The Lost Cabin Mine," one of the earliest and ablest of his books. Perhaps he reaches the highest level of his achievement, so far, in "The Porcelain Lady" and "Ellen Adair", he has written nothing more powerful nor more poignantly human than the closing scenes in the last of these two books. Mr Niven has contributed a good deal of occasional poetry to The Athenæum, The Academy, The Nation, and other journals, and not a few of his readers, we are sure, would welcome a collection of this in more permanent form.

Photo by Walter Lennyton, 14, Conduit Street, W.

Mr. Holbrook Jackson.

Photo by James Thomson. Interness

Mr. Frederick Townsend Martin.

"Things I Rem
published last

A complete edition in one volume of Francis Thompson's collected poems will be published by Messrs Hodder & Stoughton this month. In addition to the posthumous poems, the book includes the three volumes published during Thompson's life—"Poems" (with "The Hound of Heaven"), "Sister Songs," and "New Poems." The volume is to be sumptuously produced, and will be uniform in size and general appearance with "The Collected Verse of Rudyard Kipling," that was published by the same firm last year.

Irene Burn.
(Mrs Wilkins)

Madame Vernet, who appears in our portrait group of Mr Leonard Merrick and his family, is a grand niece of Horace Vernet, who painted one of the most famous portraits of Napoleon. She is a Professeur de diction du Conservatoire et Membre de la Société des Gens de Lettres.

Mrs Charlotte Cameron has recently returned from a long and adventurous journey across Africa, and has written an account of her experiences, which is to be published shortly by Mr Stanley Paul.

The first book published by Mr Herbert Jenkins—Mr W Riley's novel, "Windyridge"—is now in its tenth thousand, and a handsome new edition of it is to be issued shortly, containing six mounted plates of the Yorkshire village and its surroundings in which the scenes of the story are laid.

Miss Irene Burn, whose new novel Mr Fisher Unwin is publishing, is the author of two other striking stories of Anglo-Indian life, "The Unknown Steersman" and "The Unforgiving Minute," both of which were published by Mr Unwin. Miss Burn, who is the wife of an Anglo-Indian journalist, has

Mr. Leonard Merrick, Miss Lesley Merrick, Madame Nancy Vernet, and Mrs Merrick (seated).

Mr Leonard Merrick is engaged resided in India since her marriage. She took good place in the Honours Schools of Classics. She is devoted to outdoor pursuits, especially riding and tennis. Her knowledge of Hindustani enables her to enter freely into the hidden life of the Indian woman, and the portions of her new novel in which she does so are especially vivid and true.

Last month we reproduced from the Borrow Celebration Souvenir two of Miss C. M. Nichols's drawings of the interior of Borrow's house at Norwich, and on the opposite page we now reproduce one of the four vivid and delicately finished etchings in the same artist's portfolio, "The Haunts of George Borrow in and around Norwich," which is published by Messrs. Jarrold & Sons. Miss Nichols was born in Surley Street, Norwich, and now has her studio in the same street. Her father, William Peter Nichols, practised in partnership with Dr. Edward Lubbock, a distinguished practitioner in his day, and their house was a meeting place for the leading literary and political lights of the town. Miss Nichols had no regular training as an artist; she had a year or two of tuition under an excellent drawing-mistress at school, and afterwards continued, as she had begun, to train herself by painting natural flowers and, occasionally, birds at the museum. She taught herself by studying alone at the National Gallery, and in various foreign galleries during her travels; she painted much in Normandy, at Lourdes, in Cornwall, and these pictures are now in private collections. Then from painting she turned to etching. "The first thing I did," she says, "was hung at the Royal Academy, and I have since had three or four etchings and water-colours at a time on the walls at Burlington House. I have also exhibited in Melbourne, Munich, and in many English cities and towns. I have done considerably over one hundred plates—all printed by Mr. F. Goulding, of Shepherd's Bush. As a rule I choose my subject among trees, whether in oil, water-colour or on copper. My father wished me to paint in oil, and left me money for that purpose. He had made a collection of oil pictures, and old Crome went frequently to my grandfather's and taught my aunts for ten years. I was thus surrounded by good colour all my life. I prefer oils to any medium, but water colours insist on being used for some subjects." When the Royal Society of Painter Etchers was instituted, Miss Nichols was made a Fellow—the first Lady Fellow, and the only one for some ten years. Her etching has been chiefly dry-point work. She has done a great deal in charcoal, and likes the pencil as much as any medium. She never studied at South Kensington, but has taken prizes there for oil-paintings. "I am self-taught," she says. "No professors ever instructed me in the use of oils, water-colours or the etching tool, nor have I ever been taught miniature work of which I have done not a little, since I took it up a few years back." She has written from time to time for the magazines and newspapers and has published a novel, and a volume of poems, the latter being illustrated with her own etchings. She has had several very successful "one-man"

Photo. by Elliot & Fry.

Miss C. M. Nichols.

shows in London, and has several of her pictures on show at the Exhibition that is now being held in Norwich by the Norwich Art Circle, which should give her native city an opportunity to prove that, however it may be with a prophet, a prophetess is not without honour in her own country, so that Miss Nichols may no longer be moved to remark, "I have never received much encouragement in Norwich. It seems to me strange that, born of parents remarkable on both sides for descent, character, and social standing, and living so much of my life in the city of Crome, I should have been allowed to starve, so far as artistic appreciation goes—and had it not been for my own peculiar temperament, I should have starved. It is not owing to the View of Norwich from George Borrow's window.

From an etching by C. M. Nichols, R.E., in "Habitat of George Borrow"
A series of etchings (arranged & bound) discrimination of Norwich that I did not." Miss Nichols is an artist of high and original gifts, and thus reproach of neglect is one that Norwich should make haste to remove.

Miss Olave Potter has collaborated with Mr. Douglas Sladen in writing "Weeds: A Story of Women Shifting for Themselves," which Messrs. Hurst and Blackett have just published. The novel deals with the difficulties in finding work for themselves experienced by educated women who have to make their own living without having received any commercial training. Miss Potter is the author of that delightful book "A Little Pilgrimage in Italy," which was published last year with illustrations by Yoshio Markino.

Frank Hamel, who has written for Messrs. Cassell a new volume on that mysterious personage "Lady Hester Lucy Stanhope," is a young lady whose masculine name has frequently misled critics and the public into assuming that she belongs to that privileged sex which possesses a vote. Her first book, "Famous French Salons," was published no longer than five years ago, and she has followed it with various other volumes, including one on "Madame du Chatelet," and one on "The Dauphines of France." She took up the subject of Lady Hester Stanhope a few years ago, but was deterred for a time from going on with it by the appearance of another book on the same theme, and it has turned out that the delay was rather fortunate, because two years back she was able to trace the whereabouts of new and important material, some of which she came across by sheer accident during her travels abroad. Miss Hamel has made a particular study of French history and biography, and as a reviewer and miscellaneous journalist has contributed articles to THE BOOKMAN, The Globe, Westminster Gazette, I P's Weekly, and other well known periodicals.

Photo by Canadian Studios, Sloane Street, W.

Miss Olave Potter.

Photo by J. Russell & Sons

Miss Frank Hamel.

The first of THE BOOKMAN Extra Numbers "Robert Louis Stevenson: The Man and His Work," is now ready. It is a handsomely produced volume, strongly bound in canvas, of over two hundred pages, and among its literary contributions are an article by Stevenson himself on "Books that Influenced Me," and poems and personal or critical essays by Sir J. M. Barrie, William Watson, Edmund Gosse, C. B., Austin Dobson, Sir W. Robertson Nicoll, Eve Blantyre Simpson, S. R. Crockett, Ian Maclaren, H. C. Beeching, Y. Y., Alice Gordon, Charles Lowe, and Neil Munro. There is a photographic frontispiece portrait of Stevenson, eight plates beautifully reproduced in colour, numerous portraits, from paintings, drawings and photographs, of Stevenson and his friends, photographs and sketches of places associated with him, drawings of scenes from his books and facsimiles of letters from him to Sir Sidney Colvin. All the illustrations, and there are upwards of a hundred, are separate from the text and printed on special art paper. The price is 5s. net.

November 1st to December 1st, 1913.

A book of verse by Norman Boothroyd that Mr. Erskine Macdonald is publishing.

Messrs. Hutchinson & Co.

MIRID, M. MOSTYN—The Friend of Mary 3s. 6d. net
 FILLINGHAM, H.—Margaret's Book Illustrated by Charles Robinson 7s. 6d. net
 FRASER, MRS. HUGH, and STAFF MANN, I. Y.—The Honour of the House 6s.
 FRASER, MRS. HUGH—Italian Yesterday 7s. 6d. net
 KROENIG, I. P.—The Voice of Africa Translated by Rudolph Blind With 60 full page Photos. Over 200 other Illustrations, and a Colour of 1 frontispiece 28s. net
 PAPER, FRANK (Illustrated by)—The Book of Psalms 10s. 6d. net
 SIACPOOLE, H. M. V. R. (Translator)—The Persian Epic of the Shah 7s. 6d. net
 DE MONTESQUIEU, COMTE ROBERT (With an Essay of Introduction by), and WILLIAMS, OAKLEY (Edited with notes by)—The Works of P. A. de La Roche In 1 vol. with 60 Photogravure Plates 410. 0s. net

Messrs. T. Werner Laurie, Ltd.

BURLINGHAM, J.—How to become an Alchemist 6s. net
 CARRINGTON, H. R. W.—Personal Experiences of Spiritualism 7s. 6d. net
 DAVIDSON, G. ADY—Stories from the Opera 6s. net
 GIBSON, MRS.—An Unfinished Song 6s. net
 HALL, A. NEELY—The Happy Boy 6s. net
 HAMILTON, ARNOLD—Goldsmith Smith His Life and Opinions 18s. net
 MURPHY, J. R.—All About Postage Stamps 6s. net
 NELSON, J.—The Magic 6s. net
 PRICE, J. H. S. M.—My Bohemian Days in Paris 10s. 6d. net
 THORNTON, GUY—China in China 1s. net

Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co.

AUTHOR OF THE LIFE OF APRIL 1790—Ages in Virtues and other Virtues
 BARNES, RIGHT REV. MGR. A. S. M. A.—The Early Church in the Light of the Monuments With Illustrations
 BATES, EDWARD J.—and CHARLES SWORTH, FREDERICK—Mechanics for Beginners Fully Illustrated With numerous Practical Worked Examples Examples and Answers In two parts Part I
 BURTON, EDWIN H. and POLITT, J. H. S. (Edited by)—Lives of the English Martyrs Second Series The Martyrs declared Venerable Vol. I 1583-1588
 CHISHOLM, CATHERINE—The Medical Inspection of Girls in Secondary Schools
 COOKE, TESSIE CARVILLE and KIDD, MAUD HARRIE—Dressmaking in 10 Schools With 2 Coloured Plates and other Illustrations
 DAVIDSON, P. W. H.—Education of Metal Craft With upwards of 150 Diagrams
 DUNLOP, COLONEL H. C. (Professor of Gunnery Ordnance College Woolwich) and JACKSON, C. S.—Shik Rifle Notes
 ENGLISH, REV. EDMUND—Sermon and Homilies
 LECKY—Democracy and Liberty 2 vols. 4s. net
 LECKY—History of Ireland in the Eighteenth Century 5 vols. Vols. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 2s. 6d. net cloth vol.
 LECKY—Map of Life 1 vol. 2s. 6d. net
 LEYD, G. L. H. M. A.—The Cutlers' Trade An Historical Study in the Economics of Small Scale Production With Illustrations and Maps
 ROSE, C. I.—The World's Redemption 7s. 6d. net
 SIMPSON, REV. W. J. PARROW, D.D.—Non-communicating Attendance 4s. net
 TRAVELMAN, G. M. C.—A Muse and other Essays Literary and Pedestrian With Map 3s. 6d. net
 WILLIAMS, BASIL—The Life of William Pitt, Earl of Chatham With Portrait and Maps 2 vols

Messrs. Lywood & Co.

CRANSTON, DOUGLAS—The Adventures of Lester Graveling K.C. 6s.
 FLEMING, NOEL—Sparks that Brood 6s.
 GRAY, G. F. DUNCAN, L. D.—A Venture in Verse Essays and Verse 2s. 6d.
 MUGGER, M. A.—Darts of Divine Sonnets and other Poems 2s. 6d. net
 OULTON, I.—Exceeding Pleasant and other Sketches With 10 Illustrations 6s.
 PUGH, GEORGE and JENNIE—At the Back of the World Wandering Over Many Lands and Seas 6s.
 TRIVITT, VIVIAN—Stephen Rockford 6s.

Mr. Elkin Mathews

ANDERSON, A. J. H.—Lilies A Book of Verse 2s. 6d. net
 ARNOLD, MARGARET—From Across the German Ocean 4s. 6d. net
 DODD, G. L. ASHLEY—Fishing Rhyme 5s. net cloth 2s. 6d. net wrapper
 JASTMAN, MAX—Enjoyment of Poetry 4s. 6d. net
 GRAVES, ALFRED PIERCE—Irish Literary and Musical Studies 6s. net
 KNIGHT, WILLIAM L. D.—Coleridge and Wordsworth in the West Country 7s. 6d. net
 M. A.—Early Poems 3s. 6d. net
 SACKVILLE, LADY MARGARET—Songs of Aphrodite and other Poems 1s. 6d. net
 SPENCER, EDWIN—Songs Satire and Celestial 1s. 6d. net cloth 1s. net wrapper
 WESTERMAIER, ELIZABETH—Helen's Mirror and other Poems 1s. net
 WILSON, RUTHIE—Another Book of the Stars 5s. 6d. net

Messrs. Methuen & Co.

BARKER, THILLER—Rome of the Pilgrims and Martyrs 1s. 6d. net
 CHESLTON, G. K.—Charles Dickens 1s. net
 GILSON, G. L.—Royal Academy Lectures 4s. net
 HOLMES, ALICE—The Boy's Prayer Book 1s. 6d. net
 MARSHALL, R. C.—The Threshold of Religion New and Revised Edition 5s. net
 SUGO, HENRY—The Life of the Blessed Henry St.—Translated by T. D. Knox 1s. 6d. net
 WOODWARD, B. D.—The Life of the M. H. C. 6s.
 WYLLARD, DOLL—The Pathway of the Phoenix 2s. net

Messrs. T. Nelson & Sons

ACHARD, SMEDLEY—Reformation Solitaires net (French)
 AUSTIN, L. ELLIEN—In Action 2s. net
 AUSTIN, L. ELLIEN—Our English Land Muddle An Australian View 2s. net
 DE VON, ALFRED—Cave Muses 2s. net (French)
 HAMILTON, CURRY, COME J.—Sea Wolves of the Mediterranean 1s. net
 VALLER, J. VAN—Jumetiv Large 1s. net (Spanish)
 WILSON, AUGUST—The Mystery of the Green Car 2s. net

Mr. Frank Palmer

BISMARCK, CAUDNEY—1s. net Yapp Call 4s. 6d. net
 BIRKBECK, CAUDNEY—1s. net Yapp Call 4s. 6d. net
 BISHOP, CAUDNEY—1s. net Yapp Call 4s. 6d. net
 IRISH PROVERBS—1s. net Leather 2s. 6d. net
 JAPAN PROVERBS—1s. net Leather 2s. 6d. net
 KAISER, WILLIAM CAUDNEY—1s. net Yapp Call 4s. 6d. net

Messrs. Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner & Co.

CURL, RICHARD—Life is a Drama 6s.
 MANN, REV. HORACE K.—Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages
 MASON, CHARLOTTE M.—The Saviour of the World 6d. net
 SAMUEL, HORACE K.—Meditations 7s. 6d. net

Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co.

GASKOIN, CATHERINE MRS. BLAIR—In a Chamber Room and other short Plays 2s. net
 MEADE, J. F.—The Passion of Kathleen Dunne 6s.
 NAYLOR, STANTLEY—Gerty and George Grosvenor 4s. net
 RATALE, SABATINI—The Life of Cesare Borgia (Drexler Library) 4s. net
 SHAKESPEARE, WILLIAM—Hamlet The Story of the Play carefully told with over 50 Illustrations taken from Sir John Robertson's Performance for the Cinematograph film 1s. net
 YARDLEY, MAUD M.—Leaves 6s.
 YOXALL, SIR JAS.—More About Collecting 4s. net

Sir Isaac Pitman & Son.

ASHWORTH, MARGARET—A Child's Garland With 16 Illustrations 3s. 6d. net
 BIRWITT, RICHARD R.—Rural and Agricultural Arithmetic 5d. net, with answers, 1s. net
 CHADWICK, MRS. ELLIS H.—In the Footsteps of the Brontës About 40 Illustrations 16s. net
 DUNBAR, LADY (of Muchrumb)—The Chow Chow With 24 Illustrations 2s. 6d. net
 EDIN, HIRTHA—Joy Making for Infants With 20 full page Coloured and 42 black and white Illustrations 2s. 6d. net
 HADDON, ELLIEN G., and COWLING, TOM P.—Nature Games for Little Ones 1s. 6d. net
 HADFIELD, D. H. A. (Oxon)—Company Case Law 7s. 6d. net
 KILNER, PROFESSOR I., ARNOLD MADAME PATIA, and DELISLE, ARTHUR I.—Austriety of the Austrians and Hungary of the Hungarians (Countries and Peoples Series) With 14 Illustrations 6s. net
 LITTLE, L. A. R. (Translated by)—London His Life and Works 4s. net
 MACLARIAN, J. M. A.—Economic Geography With many Maps 3s. net
 MACLARIAN, CANON DOUGLAS—The Athanasian Creed (St. Paul's Handbooks) 2s. 6d. net
 McWILLIAM, R. B. A.—A History of England 2 vols. 2s. per vol.
 PARKER, JOHN (Edited by)—Who's Who in the Theatre New Edition, thoroughly Revised Cloth, 6s. net Leather 8s. 6d. net

Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

BROWN, JULIA MOORE—The Conquest of Mt. McKinley 15s. net
 BROWN, MARY ELIZABETH—Dedications 10s. 6d. net
 DELLEBACH, FREDERICK S.—Tomb and 49 15s. net
 GREGORY, LADY—Our First 70 Years 3s. net
 HOLLAND, W. J.—To the River Plate and Back 16s. net
 JENKINS, SILLIPHEN—The Old Boston Post Road 15s. net
 JEWELL, SOPHIE—The Folk Ballads of Southern Europe 6s. net
 JOHNS, ADRIAN H.—Rambles in Autographland 10s. 6d. net
 LITTLE, L. A. R. (Translated by)—London His Life and Works 4s. net
 KILNER, PROFESSOR I., ARNOLD MADAME PATIA, and DELISLE, ARTHUR I.—Austriety of the Austrians and Hungary of the Hungarians (Countries and Peoples Series) With 14 Illustrations 6s. net
 LITTLE, L. A. R. (Translated by)—London His Life and Works 4s. net
 MACLARIAN, J. M. A.—Economic Geography With many Maps 3s. net
 MACLARIAN, CANON DOUGLAS—The Athanasian Creed (St. Paul's Handbooks) 2s. 6d. net
 McWILLIAM, R. B. A.—A History of England 2 vols. 2s. per vol.
 PARKER, JOHN (Edited by)—Who's Who in the Theatre New Edition, thoroughly Revised Cloth, 6s. net Leather 8s. 6d. net

Messrs. G. Routledge & Sons

BRADLEY, CUTHBERT—The Book of the Foxhound 1s. net
 BRIDGER, TION—Jack Dismal's Luck
 CROFT, G. ADY'S BIRTH—Children's Games and Children's Parts 4s. 3s. 6d.
 CUNNINGHAM, RIVINGTON—The New Government 4s. net

Messrs. Alston Rivers, Ltd.

IRSKIN, MRS. SEPCART—The Ring of Necessity 6s.
 KNIBBS, GEORGE HANDLEY C.M.G.—Voices of the North and Echoes of the Hills 6s. net
 MOORE, J. S. L.—The Peacock Feather 6s.
 REYNOLDS, FREDERICK—Whispering Dust 6s.

Messrs. Sands & Co.

HAMPTON, M. J.—Modernity and Modern Thought 2s. net
 FRANCIS, M. J.—Molly's Courtship A Tale 3s. 6d. net
 GERRARD, J. T.—Henson An Exposition and Criticism 2s. 6d. net
 MARTINDALE, C. C.—The Solway Firth 2s. net
 MARTINDALE, C. C.—Old Testament Stories Illustrated in Colour 7s. 6d. net

The Walter Scott Publishing Co., Ltd.

ITZINGHOFF, H. M.—The Story of the Future 4s. 6d. net
 HOPKINS, A. J. M. D.—Influence Its History Nature Cause, and Treatment 3s. 6d.
 IRWIN, HENRIK—Prose Dramas 1s. net
 MICHLES, R.—Dorland and Questions of Social Ethics 6s.
 POLSTON, COUNT—Short Stories 1s. net

Mr. Martin Secker

ABERCOMBE, JASCELLES—Speculative Dialogue 4s. net
 HOWE, P. P.—Dramatic Portraits 4s. net
 HUFFEY, LORD MADON—Henry James A Critical Study 7s. 6d. net

Messrs. Sheffington & Son.

MARTIN, KENNEDY O'BRIEN—Jura Crois Trip to Italy and 20 Illustrations 2s. 6d. net

Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co.

Scott—Last Expedition 2 vols. Profusely Illustrated 4s.

Messrs. Williams & Norgate

ARISTOTELIAN SOCIETY—Early Volume of Proceedings Bound in Buckram 10s. 6d. net
 ARNOLD, JAMES TORING, Ph.D.—The Motor and the Dynamo Illustrated 6s. 6d. net
 BIGG, R. R. V. W. D. D.—The Foundations of Duty 3s. 6d. net
 BUCKLEY, RUDOLF DR.—Knowledge and Life (Crown Theological Library) 4s. net
 BUCKLEY, RUDOLF DR.—Present Day Ethics 4s. net
 JAGG, L. ELLIEN—Institution into Literature 4s. 6d. net
 TRAPS, G. S. Ph.D.—Principles of Agricultural Chemistry Illustrated 17s. net
 HARRIS, PROF. D. FRASER—Nerves Illustrated 2s. net Cloth, 2s. 6d. net
 HARNACK, DR. ADOLF—Monasticism Its Ideals and History and The Confessions of St. Augustine (Crown Theological Library) 4s. 6d. net
 JACK, PROF. L. P.—All Men are Ghosts 4s. net
 KRAVIER, P. L.—The Use and Care of a Balance 4s. 6d. net
 LEWIS, AGNES, SMITH, L. L. D.—Light on the Four Gospels from the Small Palm-leaf 4s. 6d. net
 PRANK, EDWARD J., B.Sc.—Cyanide Manufacture, Chemistry and Uses 5s. net
 RUSHKOW, J. M.—Social Insurance A Complete Survey 12s. 6d. net
 SOUTHWARD, THE LADY—Social and Political Reminiscences With a number of Portraits from pencil Sketches by the Author, and other Illustrations 12s. 6d. net

Messrs. Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.

CLAYTON, PAUL M. R.—The Story of Anna Jane Wicks
 DARTON, J. T. H.—The Seven Champions of Christendom 6s.
 GRANT, THE REV. CECIL—Modern Education and the Montessori System
 GRANT, CANON PETER—Studies in the Development of the Late 7s. 6d. net
 LEFFS, W. M., and M. L. S.—Hiccup and Howl 3s. net

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

BRIGGS, MARTIN S.—Baroque Architecture 7s. net
 HIDE, ANNA—The Fountains for Communication with the Dead 10s. 6d. net RAWLINSON, GAY—The Three Trees 6s.

THE READER.

JOHN GALSWORTHY.

BY RICHARD CURLE

THE writings of Mr Galsworthy, divisible as they are into the three classes of plays, novels, and short studies (his poems are a mere recreation), have nevertheless a singular unity. For at the back of his work there lie two very strong motives, a moral fervour and a literary fervour. He has the instinct of the social reformer joined to the instinct of the artist. The conjunction of them gives to his presentation of life (especially in his later books) a marked restraint and balance. And this is due not only to his sense of artistic finish, but also to his knowledge that a cause gains immensely which can be proved out of its opponents' mouths. For this is what his method amounts to. Mr Galsworthy's detachment is, as a writer aptly puts it in an old number of The Nation "an artistic device, not a matter of divine indifference." It is not the serene detachment of a Henry James, but the self-conscious detachment of a man who wants to present a problem without the faintest suggestion of exaggeration. His aim, in fact, is to show that human failure is a result not so much of differences in intention as of differences in outlook. He is indeed fond of the startling method of making evident the well-meanness of everybody concerned with some gigantic social inequality or injustice. For behind all lives he sees the universal longings, hopes and disillusionments, and in the schemes of men the ideal so clouded under the prejudice of environment and superstition. For he is too much of a philosopher not to be aware that the aim of life—the pursuit of happiness—is essentially the same in all people. This tends to make his books more interesting in regard to the comparison of characters and the situations in which they find themselves than in the actual characters. His justice and comprehension are wide enough to embrace everyone, but it is rather in relation to the blindness and unhappiness of all persons than in sympathy with the individual humanity of each person. This is a pitfall into which artistic moralists are liable to tumble. For in spite of all his balancing of one side against the other, Mr Galsworthy loses in a double sense that aloofness without which it seems so impossible to create real people. To begin with, his choice of subject has to be arbitrary, must be a defined problem, and secondly, he is too pronounced a reformer not to make it obvious as a rule on which side he takes rank. Although he endeavours to formulate the pros and cons of a question with a scrupulous fairness, it is not usually difficult to guess with whom his sympathies are ranged. This is all the more plain, because in some of his works it is true he drops altogether the cloak of watcher and adopts that of a partisan contemptuous of the other half. But this bitterness is more discernible in his earlier work than in his later. In "The Island Phantoms," for instance, he does not try to conceal how much he despises the wealthy English family (although even here the system of balancing is at work) whereas in his recent novel "The Patrician" it would be for once hard to say whether the democracy as represented by Mr Courtier or the aristocracy as represented by Lord Milton has his greater sympathy.

Thus the first thing to bear in mind in considering Mr Galsworthy is this intense but judicial treatment of the problems of real life. Whether he is social reformer turned literary man or whether he is literary man beguiled into social reform does not much matter. The strength and the weakness of it are apparent. His absorption with problems of this kind gives him impressive subjects for his art, but on the other side, it is apt to make him forget that the province of art is to create and not to preach.

Another peculiar thing which is observable in all Mr Galsworthy's work is the mixture of hardness and tenderness in his atmosphere. Perhaps his hardness arises from his way of looking at individuals in a rather inhuman collective aspect, as part of some abuse he wishes to point out prominently and not as being intensely alive, problematical, and obscure in themselves. Through all his compassion for suffering one cannot help feeling his incapacity to probe into minds beyond a conventional depth, that is to say, he does not as a rule have sufficient creative power to force us to see his people apart from a background of pronounced but rather general characteristics.

And yet in his descriptions of love and early spring he approximates very nearly to the spirit of Tourgeniev. He too is profoundly dominated by the beauty, the sadness, underlying the awakened forces of life, and profoundly aware of the inevitable change guiding the world and carrying along with it the romance and desires of youth. A melancholy yearning interweaves itself with his hard preciseness. Perhaps after all both arise from that undecieving process which so often dawns upon the believer in life. In his recognition of the injustice ruling a world so capable of happiness, in his knowledge of the fleetingness of all that is valuable in individual existence, he achieves possibly this practical and yet romantic outlook.

Photo by T. O. Hoppe

Mr. John Galsworthy.

His pictures of warm summer nights in London are especially memorable. They breathe, as it were, the perfumed mystery of some new and devouring passion. This is the sort of thing in which his works abound.

"Outside, over the dark gardens, the moon hung full and almost golden. Its honey-pale light filtered down on every little shape of tree and leaf, and sleeping flower. That soft vibrating radiance seemed to have woven all into one mysterious whole, stilling disharmony, so that each little separate shape had no meaning to itself." ("Fraternity," p. 345)

This extract represents the kind of background to "The Island Pharisees," "The Country House," "The Man of Property," "Fraternity," "The Patrician," "The Dark Flower." Not that these books always treat of London or summer, but because the sense of the strange, waiting forces of Nature haunts his work and the minds of his figures, surrounds them with an essence of fatality and dim purpose.

Here is a similar type of extract, which is written of the country and not of the town, but still holds within it the same wistful spirit.

"Truly peace brooded over that garden. The night seemed listening—all lights out, all hearts at rest. It watched, with a little white star for every tree, and roof and slumbering tired flower, as a mother watches her sleeping child, leaning above him and counting with her love every hair of his head, and all his tiny tremors." ("The Patrician," p. 26)

This intermingled atmosphere then, this atmosphere severe and soft, is the second thing to bear in mind about Mr. Galsworthy.

And these two things together, his choice and treatment of subject, and the light in which he wraps them, give to all his work that feeling of unity, that singular cohesive quality, which is mentioned at the beginning of this article. They are not only the productions of one mind, but the productions of one progressive idea.

It is indeed impossible to judge Mr. Galsworthy from a literary standpoint alone in the same sense as we can judge de Maupassant for example. Almost everything he writes has that element of the tract about it which at once puts it on a different level. That he is the most artistic of moralists does not make him less a moralist, it only makes his moralising more weighty.

It is probably this very thing which causes his plays to be so arresting on the stage. Here is the one situation in which art is legitimately wedded to preaching. The modern literary moralists have almost all taken to the drama as the pulpit from which to expound their theories on the decay and the reconstruction of society. The purely literary drama cannot now exist in England, as witness the failure of plays by Mr. James and Mr. Comrad, but the drama of literary moralising is growing increasingly influential, as witness the success of plays by Mr. Shaw, Mr. Barker, Mr. Galsworthy. Of this last group Mr. Galsworthy is perhaps, the most impressive because he is the most natural and the most impersonal. Although it is not difficult to perceive that his unbiased presentation of all sides of a question is largely a ruse to press home more directly his point, still one cannot avoid seeing that he does admit that there are other arguable positions besides his own.

Moreover, he does give his characters an air of reality, does suggest that they are like people you really do meet. Mr. Shaw's characters however are nearly all Mr. Shaw or (which comes to much the same) exactly what Mr. Shaw would not like to be. He can create ideas, he cannot really create people. They all seem to fall back sooner or later into the one fatal rut. Like Meredith he is too clever to stifle himself, too brilliant to be a great artist. Mr. Galsworthy has escaped this. His characters are not bizarre, or, in themselves, concerned with righting the world. He, unlike Mr. Shaw, keeps his moralising for the plot alone. His figures are the dull, kindly people of every day caught in the web of circumstance and institution. Throughout his plays everything is plausible and unstrained. And yet over all there is evident a dogmatic hand pointing out the cankers eating into the heart of life.

In this respect it is very interesting to compare his two greatest plays, "Strife" and "Justice." On the stage "Strife" was infinitely more suggestive, for the simple reason that it was more subtly unbiased. In "Justice" one was so conscious throughout of special pleading

Photo by H. in Langdon Coburn

Mr. John Galsworthy

Wingstone, Manaton

(inevitable in the conception of the play) that a feeling of fatigue took the place of the excitement which was the outcome of watching the former. In "Strife" the balancing was remarkably skilful, but in "Justice" the very subject precluded all that, although the whole effort was to prove that it was the system, not the workers of the system, that was to blame. The harrowing scene in which the convict clerk is alone in the cell, not a word being uttered, was yet far less terrible than the scene in which old Anthony is thrown over by his Board in "Strife."

This last play is, in truth, Mr. Galsworthy's greatest achievement. The tense atmosphere, the comparison between the rich nervous Board and the starving, nervous strikers, the folly and despatch of it all, are very impressively unrolled. The stolid, unyielding Anthony in juxtaposition to the fiery, unyielding Roberts has a tragic irony about it that is rarely met with. The power of the play lies essentially in the fact that the leading figures do show creation and are not mere puppets. For creation is the one thing in art which really elates, and it is the one absolutely necessary thing. Without it there can be no survival, for without it all life and all deductions from lives can be nothing but an appearance and a mirage.

It is indeed in drama that the born moralist like Mr. Galsworthy is able to develop his theories to best advantage. For, after all, the drawing of individuality need not be so sensitive as in a novel (the actor largely building up the illusion of it), and the dramatist can on the part that plays a part in his "Riding in Mist."

Mr. John Galsworthy.

devote himself to a thoroughly working out of the possibilities of a given situation or idea. When, as in the case of "Strife," the characters are so clearly visualised that acting only enhances a reality that is already there, the result is an actual triumph. The comparative failure of its successor "Justice" may be the first warning that Mr. Galsworthy is slipping away too far, not from the technique but from the spirit of art. For art, though with wider latitudes, imposes itself in a play just as forcibly as in any other form of literature.

Again, the theatre is the suitable ground for Mr. Galsworthy, because in it the psychology of situation is more important than the psychology of character pure and simple, and in all Mr. Galsworthy's works there is very strongly that dramatic feeling, which accentuates the former at the expense of the latter. A play like "The Silver Box" where there is a very definite situation is therefore much more successful than a play like "Joy" where there is a considerable vagueness.

It thus comes about that in judging of Mr. Galsworthy's novels one must imagine that to a considerable extent they are plays in the form of narrative. Roughly speaking, there is the problem in the middle, and on either side of it the two sets of people battling against it from different positions. That is the kind of impression one gathers from the perusal of such a work as the early "Island Pharos" and as the late "Patrician." The tone certainly has become much mellowed, much more judicial, but the impression does not alter. In who, besides being her husband's most delicate, drastic and punctilious critic, has set many of his verses to music.

Mrs. Galsworthy.

Mr. John Galsworthy.

The spaniel in these two photographs is the dog of "Memories," and in some sort the original of the spaniel "John."

"The Island Pharisees" it is the English middle class which is the butt. On the one hand there is the uneasy, questioning Shelton, the cynical, enlightened Ferrand, both kicking against the social pricks, on the other, apparently everyone else in the book. At this stage Mr Galsworthy had not attained his impartial standpoint of to-day. His bias is energetically obvious, although in the preface of the new edition he more or less admits that Shelton at any rate is not much less of a Pharisee than Antonia and the rest. In "The Patrician," the contrast is between the comparative worth of aristocracy and democracy. On the one hand there is the independent, modern Courtnier, the courageous untrammelled Mrs Noel, on the other, the whole family and connection of the Caradoes.

Both these works are, essentially, plays rather than novels. Both might have been capital as plays, both are poor as novels. In the two books together there is in fact only one quite vitally interesting person—the Lord Miltoin of "The Patrician." He is a brilliant study of the ascetic, earnest young aristocrat, who every now and then issues upon politics, profoundly convinced that he has a duty direct from God for the governing of the universe. But apart from this figure, and, in a lesser degree, that of Mrs Noel, the books are crowded with dolls, active, opinionated, and lifeless. This is the danger of a dramatist writing novels. The books are neither convincing, nor, what is more serious still, even interesting.

If Mr Galsworthy had to be criticised as a novelist on the strength of those two novels and of his volume of stories "Villa Rubem," he would really take a very poor place, but this of course is not so. He has to his credit three much greater performances, so much greater indeed that they belong to quite a different order. These three are "The Country House," "The Man of Property" and "Fraternity." But in these books too, it is well to remember that they are the work of a man whose insight into character is dramatic rather than illuminating, that is to say, it is the insight which grasps the atmosphere of some event rather than that which creates. Mr Galsworthy is not an innovator, he is an observer. His figures lack somehow that breath of life which marks the most distinguished writing. Even Mrs Pendyce in "The Country House," the tenderest and most refined of his portraits, is as representative of the yearning love of motherhood in general as of the anxious solitude of the individual mother. Her husband again shows absolutely the landmarks of a recognised type. Both of them are real in themselves, but both of them are too typical to be quite individual. The truth is, everybody in Mr Galsworthy stands for an idea as well as for a human being, and though this may add to their value as characters in books written with a purpose (which in one sense or other of the word his books most decidedly are), it does detract from their air of actuality. It is one of the several inherent snares awaiting the moralist in art.

Over this book, as over so many of his others, there lies that strange atmosphere of a summer evening. The visit paid by Mr Pendyce to her son's rooms in London suggests very beautifully the kind of exhaustion falling upon hot London at close of the day and the exhaustion that has fallen upon the heart of her son. This is the most moving scene in the whole of Mr Galsworthy. The intuition of the mother is extraordinarily touching. George Pendyce's love affair with Mrs Bellow is tragedy of a high order. The slow change in her from passion to aversion and his perception of what is taking place, has that element of utter despair about it which one feels in reading of the death of Rima in the magical "Green Mansions" of Mr Hudson. Moreover, this book gains in value from the fact that the problem part of it is more blended with the current of customary events than is usual. It is, in fact, more natural. The idea of the social conflict is still there, but it is not put forward as the obvious structure of the work. It may, perhaps, be called a satire on the county family, just as the "Man of Property" may be called a satire on the city magnate.

Photo by L. O. Hoffé

Mrs. John Galsworthy.

The wealthy Forsytes, the old brothers clinging to the family but secretly irritated with one another, secretly hoping that they are each the richest, secretly longing to have an actual proof of their own superior substance, are very ably described. The strange cruelty of aged people towards other aged people, even those they have known for life, and their pathetic warmth for youth, their set habits and their impatience with the set habits of others, their fifty-year-old grievances slowly smouldering in the hidden recesses of the mind, their intolerance and their tenderness—all these are portrayed with the hand of a master. The petty jealousies of a family, persistent and meaningless, augmented in old age by a sort of contemptuous envy of each other's children, and yet, beneath all, the desire to keep united as a family and to know all about the affairs of one another—that is the main idea on which this book is founded.

But here, too, there is visible that more-or-less ineffectual struggling of a woman against the circle she finds herself in, which is visible in most of his novels. In "The Country House" it is Margery Pendyce and Helen Bellew, in "Fraternity" it is Bianca Dallison and the little model (June Dallison is not really an example), in "The Patrician" it is Barbara Caradoc and Audrey Noel, and in "The Man of Property" it is Irene Forsyte. Her character is (with the possible exception of Bianca Dallison's) the most enigmatic in the writings of Mr Galsworthy, that mixture of the gentle and the passionate which is so arresting. Her husband Soames, a prig and a stupid cad, is, nevertheless, almost pitiable as a mate to this charming and incomprehensible woman. In the blindness of his soul he is aware of the deep unrest of an unsatisfied love, an unrest which reveals itself in fits of sneering and ferocity. But of these two figures the woman is at heart more intractable than the man, more unforgiving, more dangerous. Irene is almost Russian in her abandon and her indecision. The situation between her and June Forsyte (the young girl whose lover, Philip Bosinney, she has allowed herself half-unconsciously to steal) is a poignant one, a situation handled with that sensitive fineness with which Mr Galsworthy always treats the disasters and the happinesses of love.

Bosinney himself is not particularly good. The swing of the pendulum of his affections from June to Irene is convincingly imagined, but his own character does not stand forth clearly, and his death under the wheels of an omnibus fails to stir any profound sense of tragedy. As in all Mr Galsworthy's books, there are in this one, too, numerous people who are neither very striking nor very bad, the numerous people who, in a play, are real or unreal, according to the genius of the actor. Such a one is young Jolyon Forsyte, in whom it is impossible to acquire much interest. But the old brothers Forsyte are differentiated with a very skilful nicety.

"Fraternity" is in some ways a much simpler production than either "The Country House" or "The Man of Property." The canvas is more contracted, the number of figures is smaller. But in a certain lyrical fervour it excels them both, and in a certain rare delicacy of emotion and contrast. The old semi-mad father preaching his doctrine of a universal brotherhood in the very household where a real tragedy of passion is being enacted, the barrier widening with its deadly certitude between husband and wife, while, in the next room, the Spartan optimist pours out his impersonal love in the endless and incoherent pages of his book, has something about it very thrilling, very ironical. And there is much refinement in the comparison between the households of the two Dallisons. Bianca and Cecilia, Hilary and Stephen are life-like in a way few of Mr Galsworthy's creatures are life-like. So too are the old father (a wonderful portrait of a man with an idée fixe, a man utterly inhuman, utterly selfless, and utterly devoted), Thyme Dallison, and Martin.

But Mr Pursey is one of Mr Galsworthy's typically false people, just a clothes-horse. Nor is the little model altogether satisfying. Hilary's intuition for her has small air of probability about it, that is the weakest spot in this strong and remarkable book. The estrangement between Hilary and Bianca would have appeared almost more sad, more full still of bitter regret, had she never existed at all. For she is not the cause of the estrangement, but only supplementary to it. It is a much deeper, a much more inexplicable thing—an antagonism unconnected with hatred, an antagonism slow, hopeless, elemental. One of the saddest imaginable things is their moment of passionate reconciliation in the dark warmth of her room, a moment snatched fearfully by both from the memory of their love flowing away from them into a future without hope, a moment known to be fleeting, and, perhaps, only a memory even whilst it is being seized.

This book, owing to its compactness and finish, is probably the most generally perfect of Mr Galsworthy's novels. As in all his other writings there is noticeable that hardness and softness, that atmosphere half French and half Russian, but here, more than elsewhere, there is an abiding romantic glow, the glow of the London summer spreading itself over the unrest of hearts, tormenting them with its longings and soothing them with its softness.

Mr. John Galsworthy

It is very unaccountable that after so rich a book, Mr Galsworthy should have produced so commonplace a one as "The Patrician." As was said before, there are indeed two striking figures in it, Lord Miltoun and Mrs Noel, and the whole atmosphere is of the same order as in his previous novels, but the other characters are little better than puppets. Courcier and the Caradocs are insipid and conventional types. They simply lack the breath of life. It is true that Mr Galsworthy's judicial impartiality is putter here than elsewhere (though there is too obvious a problem for the book to be great art), but, all in all, the production is mediocre and quite unworthy of him— in fact, it very nearly approaches the obtuse

There exists here to a very marked extent a thing which exists more or less in all his novels— an incapacity for real dialogue. Mr Galsworthy never seems to have conquered a tendency to woodenness in the talk he puts into the mouths of his characters. In that he resembles Mr Hardy when he makes the upper classes converse (the talk of his peasants is life-like) Mr Galsworthy's impression of character is conveyed by action and implication much more than by conversation, which in his hands is far too liable to amplify the idea of the plot or moral instead of the idea of the character— another pitfall of the artistic moralist.

There is no space here to discuss Mr Galsworthy's most recent novel "The Dark Flower" (I have reviewed it separately in another column), but I will merely say that it represents powerfully the melancholy irony of his mind. It is a better book than "The Patrician," but it has the limitations of a novel in which the idea dominates the characters.

As a novelist his chief drawbacks are that he is not original in a great sense and that he is not sufficiently an artist. But against that it may be stated that he is philosophic, intellectual, and has a strong feeling for atmosphere. He is primarily not a novelist, but his novels are the work of an extremely gifted amateur.

There remains still to be discussed his three volumes of short sketches, "A Commentary," "A Motley," and "The Inn of Tranquility."

These suggest in an epitome his faults and successes as a novelist, though here the hardness and the softness are inclined to pervade individually a sketch instead of being mixed together. For instance, a miniature like "Comfort" ("A Commentary") is hard and unsympathetic as an east wind, while "Old Age" ("A Commentary") and "Once More" ("A Motley") are gentle and melancholy. One is very much aware in these three books of the mingled contempt and compassion in his views on life. Some of these little pictures are beautifully exact in their proportions, and as polished as prose poems, but they give, as a body, rather the impression that the author divides too sharply this line between those for whom he has contempt, and those for whom he has compassion. It is not an important point in itself, but it emphasises a fault which is easily observable in all his earlier work.

These little sketches are by no means a negligible item in Mr Galsworthy's work. In themselves they are at the best almost perfect, though at the worst curiously bad, but as clues to his opinions and trends they are invariably apt.

There is one minor thing that should be noticed particularly about Mr Galsworthy, that is his love of and sympathy with animals, especially dogs. In the spaniels of "The Country House," the bull-dog of "Fraternity," the terriers of "A Fisher of Men" ("A Motley") and in many other instances and stray remarks, there is evidence of this. He holds a theory about them, very far removed from the automata theory of Descartes, indeed he considers that they differ from humans not so much in intelligence, or at any rate force of character, as in kind.

And for trees too, for woods, for flowers, he has a genuine love. In his worship of Nature he seems to perceive a spirit lurking within the visible semblance.

That is why his descriptions, which though poetical, are not really very exquisite, do have the power of giving the sad and beautiful sensations of Spring and starry nights.

Snapshots of Mr. Galsworthy's garden and the country near his house in Devonshire.

The more you look the less you see
Tis all a glowing mystery.

From "Tune Song of the West" (on John Galsworthy)

By

Mr. Galsworthy is a man of great talent, great depth of feeling, great comprehension, but he is not a great genius. One has only to compare him with a contemporary like Mr. Conrad to see the difference. It is perhaps difficult to express it in words, but it is entirely unmistakable. Nor is he, at heart, a novelist.

Other men of great talent like Mr. Wells and Mr. Bennett are, at heart, novelists, but Mr. Galsworthy is not. His novels, excellent and unusual as they are, are always somewhat stilted. They are not eccentric, they are angular. They are the work of

Mr. John Galsworthy.

From a snapshot taken in his garden

a writer who has never quite learnt his trade, probably never quite could learn it. It is as a dramatist that his reputation is most surely held, and it is as a dramatist that he is likely to continue to hold it. The outward smoothness of his plays covers, but does not hide, the eloquence of a burning conviction.

If in his style and in his character studies there is no grand creative faculty, no first-rate original gift, there is, however, the clear reflection of a lofty and searching intelligence, an intelligence at once critical and humane. It is a precious distinction.

WALTER PATER.*

By T. E. PAGE

THE word "preciosity" is neither a beautiful nor a common word, but it starts to the lips unsought almost with the first glance into this volume. The subject and the treatment of it seem alike to be, if not "too bright," at least "too good for human nature's daily food," and the motto Odi profanum vulgus might fitly be set upon the title-page. The very first sentence immediately raises the reader above the level of everyday life into a region where phrases are the only realities. "Walter Pater," says the writer, "is a hero—our modern English half-hero, half-martyr of Style," and the plain man is at once set wondering whether Pater was or was not "a hero," and, if he was, why he should be at once degraded to "a half-hero" and even then only of our "modern English" type. If such there be—who are also "half-martyrs" to some divinity called "Style", though why they should stay half-way and not be at once complete heroes and complete martyrs it is impossible to determine. But perhaps Mr. Thomas should be excused for writing so curiously. He himself on one occasion describes Pater as "attempting to build up a scene out of sterilised words in a vacuum," and he has no doubt felt the fascination to do the like. For, indeed, the art of weaving words into strange patterns, purely from delight in the pattern, has a singular attraction for many minds, and of that art Pater was a devotee. He seems to care less for what he says than for how he says it, and he polishes to the utmost. He wrote, we are told, on ruled paper with the alternate lines left blank for corrections, and then "the revised work was copied, again only on alternate lines, for further elaboration." He thus "tends to encourage meticulousness in detail and single words, rather than a regard for form in its largest sense." There is nothing big or daring about him. His pen never runs away with him and so he never sweeps the reader, as it were, off his legs, nor, indeed, has he the least wish to do so. Beautiful composition is in his judgment something to linger over, to savour delicately like fine wine and he would have "the susceptible reader" give it "minute consideration" and "find one of his greatest pleasures in the critical tracing out of conscious artistic structure." And the result of all this is that he is never simple, easy and unaffected while so far from being natural, he even "attained an exquisite unnaturalness." At least that is how Mr. Thomas puts it (p. 220) and then immediately goes on (p. 221) to apologise for the "irreverence of discussing Pater's style" while on his last page he says that this same style "is meant for posterity and stands on foundations above the tides of time." Plain folk however may perhaps wonder whether either posterity or the tides of time will fret themselves at all over such perishable stuff as "the exquisitely unnatural."

But the grave defect of many of Pater's writings seems to be elsewhere. He himself says that two things go to the making of style—"mind and soul." And "mind" he undoubtedly had—not a great mind but, as his criticisms of art and literature sufficiently prove, a mind of extreme fineness and sensibility. Of "soul," on the other hand, of that sort of force which, as he notes, animates "the Vulgate, the English Bible, and the Prayer-Book," it is hard to find anywhere a trace

* "Walter Pater: A Critical Study" By Edward Thomas 7s. 6d. net. (Martin Secker)

But assuredly there is much of something very different – something which is the exact opposite of “soul” – For though in his own life Pater seems to have been sober, healthy, and even austere, yet there is in his writings a sort of sensuousness which discredits them. Whether he himself was a refined Hedonist, an Epicurean or a curious type of mystic, Mr. Thomas does not pretend to determine, nor indeed can any one do so, but the spirit which too often seems to hang over him as he writes is beyond question an evil spirit. It disguises itself, no doubt, as an angel of light, talks charmingly, has much to say of art and culture, of how life should “burn always with a hard gem-like flame,” and attain to “as many exquisite experiences” as may be. And then the desire for “exquisite experiences” leads on “to grasping at any exquisite passion” and then, for those who have more red blood in them than Pater, comes as one of his chief “disciples” found perdition and the pit. Listen to Mr. Thomas:

“Pater lived a sober, almost ascetic life. Yet his was the head upon which ‘all the ends of the world are come,’ the animalism of Greece, the lust of Rome, the mysticism of the Middle Age with its spiritual ambition and imaginative loves, the return of the Pagan world, the sins of the Borgias. Pater liked to think of the sins of the Borgias – they had enriched the pageantry of life by which he lived – and with the help of them and of Swinburne’s Lausine and Dolores he made his most famous piece of prose.

“He did not recommend their sins,” his critic goes on, “or any kind of sin, and there is no reason to suppose that he disapproved of the Ten Commandments or the moral ideals of the middle-class.” Not at all, the “sins of the Borgias” give colour to composition, and “the moral ideals of the middle-class” do not, and so Pater drew his picture of “La Gioconda” with “her eyelids a little weary” and that particular beauty which is wrought out from within – by strange thoughts and fantastic reveries and exquisite passions.” It is “his most famous piece of prose” and what matter if it conjures up devil’s dreams in those less artistic and more human than himself?

No doubt it may seem unjust thus to write. For there is much in Pater that is of unquestioned distinction, but this volume though often containing just criticism of his work yet, on the whole, seems to set him on a pinnacle. The writer is not content to confer immortality on his style, but he also seems to honour him as a philosopher, and in his absolutely final sentence he writes thus:

“The philosophy is designed for those who would attain a beautiful and varied life by self-conscious effort at as many points as possible, following pleasure of every order, with a consideration of remote effects on themselves and others, with a self-control and decorum beyond the dreams of virtue.”

Surely if this is the outcome of Pater’s thinking, the only thing left is to exclaim with the dying Brutus:

ὦ τλήμων ἡμετὴ λυγρὸς δὲ ἦσθ' ἐγὼ δὲ σὺ
ὡς ἔργασθαι ἤσκαυι

“Poor virtue you were but a dream”, and here is a new cult of the pleasant and beautiful that is beyond you, while if anyone wishes to know more about the hierophant of such strange mysteries he can find it in these pages. He can see him, for instance, at the Private View of the Academy “in a new top-hat and a silk tie of brilliant apple-green” or he can read a full description of the furniture of that room (p. 32), of which it is asserted, with cruel but unconscious irony, that “no saying of Pater’s is so expressive as that room”, or he can learn how this same room, “to behold which calls up the man’s spirit” appeared to one visitor as “greenish white,” and to another “all blue” and whatever in it was not blue seemed to be white”, and then he can picture to himself the owner “with an open bowl of blue china” before him, from which “it is just possible to detach the smell of dried rose-leaves,” as he sits framing some fine phrase about “that subtle and delicate sweetness which belongs to a refined and comely decadence.” But O! to turn from this pot-pourri of roses and sickly talk about “decadence” to writers like Isaiah, or the author of Job, or the rude herdsmen of Tekoa! To do so is to pass from the atmosphere of an orchid house into the free invigorating air. They were great men, great thinkers, and great stylists too. Put one of Pater’s sentences beside one of theirs and its frail prettiness would fade and shrivel into nothing. Set the description of “La Gioconda” beside that of the “Daughters of Zion” (Is. iii. 16-24), and let any honest man choose. And yet the son of Amos lived in uncultured days when men had not yet discovered that beauty which is “beyond the dreams of virtue.”

“THE REAL LABBY.”*

By G. S. LAYARD

IT has been said that nothing is rarer than the use of a word in its exact meaning. But surely it is equally true to say that an exact meaning is just the quality that a word hardly ever possesses.

Henry Labouchere was labelled “cynic,” but did we mean, with Antisthenes of Athens, that he looked upon virtue as the highest good, or did we mean, with Henry Ward Beecher, almost the opposite, that he never saw a good quality in a man and never failed to see a bad one? If we meant either of these things we were wrong.

Certainly he was not a cynic in the Socratic sense. That goes without the saying. As certainly he posed (characteristically making the worst of himself) as a sort of “human owl mousing for vermin and never seeing noble game.” Hence it came to pass that those who suffered most at his hands, wrong ‘uns and charlatans of all sorts, called him ignorantly and insolently, self-righteous. But certainly he was not ignorant, and as for self-righteousness, he whipped himself as unmercifully as he castigated others, miscalling himself, amongst other things, “a yahoo” and “an abominable and useless liar.” That was why those who feared him

* The Life of Henry Labouchere. By Algar Labouchere. Thorold 18s. net. (Constable & Co.)

Photo Daily Mirror

Act I. of "Justice."

Photo Daily Mirror

Talder throws himself down the

Last Scene in Act IV. of "Justice." rested while on ticket of leave

Scenes from John Galsworthy's play, "Justice."

most at a distance admired him most when they were brought into contact with him.

Born an aristocrat, Labouchere was disillusioned of aristocratic shams and assumptions almost from the beginning. Having a keen nose for humbug, he had a keener wit for exposing it. With nothing conventionally sacred to him, he was a very Voltaire for disrespect. Loving fighting for fighting's sake, loving intrigue for intrigue's sake, loving the shindy above everything else, he yet took good care to crack the right skulls, to wield his mordant wit and biting pen for the righting of wrongs. Certainly he was the mustard in the political pie, but with his sardonic and satirical spirit there was mingled a fierce though carefully-concealed zeal for the public good.

Let us justify this from a quotation or two from Mr Algar Thorold's delightful biography, which, though full of solid interest, will perhaps disappoint, and will certainly surprise, those who merely look for frivolous entertainment.

Here is what he quotes from what Mr T. P. O'Connor wrote on Labouchere's retirement from Parliament:

"He was a far straighter, far more serious, far more effective politician than his own persiflage would allow people to think. With all his light wit, there was something stern and rigid in the man, as you could see from the powerful mouth, with the full compressed lips. He was perfectly honest in his hatred of extravagance, pretence, vainglory. He did immense service to his party in his time. He was a strenuous, manly, courageous fighter. And he never changed, he never concealed, he never explained away his opinion upon anything. He was a model of honest good faith and courage."

Read, too, how affectionately so out-and-out an opponent of his political views as the Morning Post wrote on the same occasion:

"What Parliament and public life will be without him I hate to think. The House has long counted Labby as the last of its originals, has prized him as a refreshing relish, has looked to him for the unexpected flavour. It gives a peculiar pang to realise that he will be seen there no more."

Here is what was written of him by one of his bitterest critics:

"Mr Labouchere has done a great deal of good in his life, more good and less evil than many so-called statesmen."

No victim of cruelty or injustice ever appealed to him in vain."

That is surely a fine testimonial, and yet of course there were flies in the amber. He could be bitterly and corrosively cruel when the fit was on him. "I do not mind Mr Gladstone always having the ace up his sleeve," he once said, "but I do object to his always saying that Providence put it there." And yet this was no mere Whistlerian quip, no carefully thought-out "impromptu," but the bare fact as he saw it, expressed cruelly, if you like, with the greatest economy of language.

When asked if he liked Madame X—, he said, "Oh, yes, I like her well enough, but I shouldn't mind if she dropped dead in front of me on the carpet." That was cruel and cynical too, but there was the sort of honesty in it which protested against conventional insincerity.

Labouchere was essentially a man of the world, a man who had "seen life." Playing many parts, welcomed as a boon companion by men of education and men of little or none, full of eager curiosity, he had unrivalled opportunities of knowing and understanding his fellows. From Eton he carried away two cardinal convictions, which he never ceased to enunciate—first, that "an English education is the worst that the world has yet produced"; secondly, that, through the fagging system, a boy "learns all the tricks and dodges of the slave." At Cambridge he ruffled it with the "bloods" of the day, lost £6,000 in two years of gambling and horse-racing, and was finally sent down for alleged cribbing, a charge which he always stoutly and convincingly repudiated. With great liberality his father paid his debts, and Labouchere responded by taking up his abode at a tavern in London where, in two months, he lost several hundreds more at hells and casinos. From this tavern he was again rescued by his father and sent abroad with a mentor, who betrayed his trust by leaving him to his own devices. The result was another orgy of gambling at Wiesbaden and elsewhere. At twenty-two he became an attaché to the embassy at Washington, but discipline was so slack and his services were so little valued that he managed to slip away without being missed, join a circus, and appear on the playbills as the "Bounding Buck of Babylon," wearing pink tights, with a fillet round his head. Tiring of the circus, he joined a party of Chippeway Indians, "living with them for six months, hunting buffalo, joining in their work and sports, playing cards for wampum necklaces." From Washington he was transferred to the Legation at Munich. Thence to Stockholm, where he fought a duel with an Austrian chargé d'affaires. Abandoning diplomacy (if the part he played can be dignified by such a word) he became joint proprietor of the Daily News, and contributed no little to its popularity by his letters during the Franco-Prussian War, writing as a "Besieged Resident" in Paris. Twenty-four years later he sold his quarter-share, which had cost him £14,000, for four or five times that amount. About the same time he joined Alfred Wigan as partner in the new Queen's Theatre, gaining in this case more experience than money. Indeed, when Truth became his mouthpiece he made so much of the many contretemps that accompanied his theatrical ventures that the public could hardly take his productions seriously. That was characteristic of all he did. He loved the fun of the thing, the fun of playing the game. Here is how he discounted his production of an adaptation of "The Last Days of Pompeii":

"Everything went wrong in this piece. I wanted to have—after the manner of the ancient acrobats dancing on a tight-rope over the heads of the guests at a feast—our guests, however, declined to be danced over. Only one acrobat made his appearance. A rope was stretched for him, behind the revellers, and I trusted to stage illusion for the rest. The acrobat was a stout negro. Instead of lightly tripping it upon his rope, he moved about like an elephant, and finally fell off his rope like a stricken buffalo."

That was how he gave the show away, and it was not surprising that his theatrical enterprises were not taken seriously. In the same year that he entered theatrical management he became M.P. for New Windsor, only to be unseated for bribery on the part of his agent. Two years later he was returned for Middlesex, but, quarrelling with his colleague, Lord Enfield, he split the vote

Photo Daily Mirror

Joy, Maurice Lever and Miss Gwyn in scene at end of Act II. of "Joy."

Photo Daily Mirror

Last Scene of "Strife."

Mr Norman McKinnel as John Anthony and Mr J Fisher White as David Roberts been defeated by his own side

The two leaders confronting, each other after each has

Scenes from John Galsworthy's plays, "Joy" and "Strife."

at the next election and lost his seat. Finally he became "the Christian Member for Northampton," as he was euphemistically called, to his great amusement, in contradistinction to his atheistical, though really far more serious and respectable, colleague, Charles Bradlaugh. From this time he became a very real force in politics, would indeed have become a Cabinet Minister in Mr Gladstone's administration in 1892, but for the Queen's objection to his name being submitted to her. And here we come upon a striking example of his sincerity. For, as his biographer remarks in the Preface with disconcertingly rare insight, "He was a terribly sincere person, partly from pride and partly from indolence. Had he been willing to condescend to insincerity he would have been too lazy to do so for long." Here is the story. Mr Gladstone, greatly discomposed by the Queen's refusal, and more especially so because Labouchere's inclusion was publicly anticipated and desired, went the length of privately asking his would-be colleague to write him a letter stating that he would not accept office were it offered to him. This would have fitted in with his Radical principles, would have appeared to the superficial observer as a fine assertion of independence, would have improved his political position, and would have saved Mr Gladstone from an imputation of ingratitude to a follower who, through thick and thin, had done all he could to help him to win the cause of Home Rule, which the Grand Old Man had nearest to his heart. But Labouchere would have none of it. In his own words, he "couldn't stand the humbug of the suggestion." He was bitterly disappointed, and he wasn't going to pretend not to be.

I have endeavoured to give the salient points of Labouchere's character and career by way of inducing the reader to fill in the details for himself by going direct to Mr Algai Thorold's able Biography. It is, I admit, a story without a moral, showing as it does by what bizarre and unpromising paths a man with an outstanding personality may arrive at an unique and remarkable position in the body politic.

It is a sort of apotheosis of the Idle Apprentice, who should, according to accepted moral standards, have come to an untimely end, but did, in fact, arrive at an honoured and distinguished old age. It is not a story that would make an "edifying" tract. But it is a story of outstanding interest.

There is no room here to tell of the prominent part which Labouchere played in the unmasking of the Pigott forgeries, of the strong and courageous position taken up by him at the time of the Jameson Raid and the South African War, of the power which he wielded mainly for good from his self-constructed pulpit in Carteret Street, of his unsparing criticism, in season and out of season, of Socialism as opposed to Radicalism. These things must be read in Mr Thorold's fascinating pages to be properly appreciated. It need only be added that, if, to one like the present writer, who worked on Truth for two years, this book makes engrossing reading, comes, indeed, as something of a revelation, it should make an even stronger and more romantic appeal to those who have hitherto looked upon "Labby" as a mere faiçeur, as a man who treated nothing seriously, as a man of no strong convictions.

In the daily Press I see that Mr Thorold has been hauled over the coals for not collecting in this volume all the "good stories" that were current about his distinguished uncle. I can only say that, had he done so, he would have held the scales unevenly, have sacrificed his duty as a serious biographer to a desire for a merely ad captandum success. He is to be sincerely congratulated on his properly-balanced and dignified reserve.

W. T. STEAD.*

BY RICHARD WHITING.

MISS STEAD'S book about her father is naturally written from the point of view of one who loved him well. But it must always have its value for students of character, whether they lean to or from him in the end. There was a complex personality indeed, a thing of radium all compact in its everlasting activity of inward life. There is really no knowing where to have him for a working scheme of generalisation. The wonder is that he was ever caught in a photograph for the illustrations—and where he is, we have sometimes only a sort of bird on the wing. He walks in his own garden like an athlete on the under path. He was a very chameleon of the changes that make for praise or blame. He had a fine idealistic nature with a great sense of great causes, but the "sainthood"—it was hardly less in his view—was crossed by the pushfulness of a commercial traveller, the ruthlessness of a reporter on the scoop. He was ready to lay down his life, as he always laid down his leisure and his peace, for an idea, with that, he had a self-satisfaction that verged on absolute conceit, and a plentiful lack of taste, or what some call distinction for the benefit of a change. His acuteness in the ordinary transactions of business was beyond question, yet the bee was ever buzzing in his bonnet on the gravest affairs.

He was unique in a kind of belief that it was his mission to "boss," for morals, the whole human race—a prophet accredited not only to Palestine, but to the orb. "The idea that everything wrong in the world was a divine call to use your life in righting it sank deep into my soul." Thus when he was still in his teens, and under the roof of his father's manse. His programme was "Peace—Woman—Spirits," in the final summary, and in detail by the dozen causes, and he rushed from point to point of the compass in the service of them, with the energy of a victim of the St. Vitus dance. Such a mood, of course, precluded all the graces of literature, at the mature age of twenty he could celebrate his high commission in verses, to his mother, hardly worthy of a child of ten.

"Some may give sons an ancestry noble, that came with the Conqueror in,

But ah, what is blood the most ancient, compared to the soul that's within?"

* "My Father." By Estelle W. Stead (nos nct (Heinemann))

Some boast of the treasure they gave us, and high heaps of silver and gold,
But compared with the dower you gave me it's metal both worthless and cold."

It was a case of the finger in every pie. In the infancy of the Salvation Army we find him lecturing General Booth on the management of the concern. He interviewed the Czar on the Peace question, the Pope on things in general, and especially by way of "enquiring at first hand how far my aspirations were shared by the Holy See." "Wake up, Vatican!" might have been the word. He admitted great possibilities in the mother Church of Christianity, you had but to "develop the good and eliminate the bad. Surely the solution is not difficult." The Pope showed but a poor sense of his opportunities, so his mentor has to found The Review of Reviews "to be to the English-speaking world what the Catholic Church in its prime was to the intelligence of Christendom." In the same way, he called in due course on the Sultan of the Young Turks, "and talked with him for a full half hour as if I were a prophet or disciple." It was good copy and at the same time it was the apostle glowing with the sense of his mission. The Commander of the Faithful was almost as slack about it as the Holy Father. "It was clear to me from the outset that the Sultan had nothing particular to say to me." But that was only one chance more for his visitor. "The opportunity given me of speaking freely was one which I took advantage of to the uttermost. I confess I was more than once in doubt as to whether I had not ventured too far." The topics were "the function of Constitutional Sovereigns in the modern State, the advantages of their position as compared with that of autocrats, the doctrine of Ministerial responsibility, and the danger of confounding the person of the monarch with the policy of his advisers." Good going for half an hour! At another time, as we remember, he had a straight talk with the elite of Russian society on the right use of the Duma. In the very latest about him, received after his death, we are privileged to learn that he is now personally conducting his fellow spirits in the next world.

There was something uncanny in him, beyond a doubt. The blazing eye was not for nothing as an indication of a judgment ever tremulous for its balance, and of a want of ordinary discretion that brought so many of his enterprises to confusion. The Maiden Tribute agitation was shockingly mismanaged from first to last. He could never prove that the child was really bought and sold. He could only say, and in all sincerity, that somebody had told him so, that somebody being a person of more than shady antecedents. His discovery that the mother of the child was not the wife of its father, though it might, as he thought, have saved him from the legal penalty had he been willing to employ it, would probably have involved a moral penalty of far greater severity. The woman had either sold her child for the vilest of uses, or she had not, and all question of her status was really beside the mark. In the circumstances, no judge and no jury would have consented to make it her reproach. In one of the portraits we find him in pose with such a fine confusion of properties as Oliver Cromwell's pistol, a statue of Gordon and a copy of the Imitation. It is a bit of a trial even for the warmest admirer. His Spiritualism was too often of a piece with this in its incongruities, and its want of all sense not only of the ridiculous but of the trivial and the vulgar. "Young man, you are going to be the St. Paul of Spiritualism!" not merely is he content to listen to this from a medium but he accepts it with the utmost com-

Portrait of W. T. Stead

From a portrait in "My Life"

W. T. Stead

placency as "one of the signposts on his journey through life." In his first seance Mother Shipton is the control, and informs him that "the state of things in Ireland is very bad and would have been worse but for the precautions the Government have taken" with much more to the same effect. Excuse du peu. Every ordinary incident in his life is a premonition. His sub-editorship of The Pall Mall Gazette, his subsequent charge of the paper. The dialogues with the spirits who have "passed beyond" are as a rule, disastrously trivial. It is Lucian's masterpiece without the wit.

And yet! and yet! set his successes against his failures, and what a man he was. He had a large share in rousing the country against the idea of another war with Russia for the benefit of the Turks. He earned many a stone for the building of the Palace that now thrones Peace at the Hague. His "Truth About the Navy," was the starting point of what is now the national and even the racial movement of the time, and, but for him, Admiral Fisher would have been only a plougher of the sands. He sent Gordon to the Soudan, and that heroic misadventure, in its results, has set the land of Egypt where it stands to-day. In Imperialism he was Rhodes without freebooting and predatory war, and he found the formula at least for a policy that would make Big Englanders of us all. His services to the cause of purity, whatever their occasional misdirection of effort, have largely helped to make that cause a bond between all the leading governments of the world. His death, in its majestic calm and simple devotion to the idea of self-sacrifice, atoned for all that lacked dignity in his life. The best testimony to the beauty of his character is to be found in the fact that those who knew most of him, down to his humblest dependents, were those by whom he was best honoured and best loved.

THE BOOKMAN PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

NOVEMBER, 1913.

Answers to these competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing the name and address of the sender) should be forwarded not later than the 15th of the month to

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, Messrs Hodder & Stoughton, Warwick Square, E.C.

Colonial and foreign readers please note that Competitions II, IV., and V are the same each month, and that for the next two months the 1st prize will be for the best original Lyric

- I.—A PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA is offered for the best original Lyric
- II.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this number of THE BOOKMAN. Preference will be given to quotations of a humorous nature
- III.—A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS is offered for the best criticism of any new Christmas book in not more than twenty-four lines of verse
- IV.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best review, in not more than one hundred words, of any recently published book. Competitors should give the names of Authors and Publishers at head of their reviews
- V.—A copy of THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for THE BOOKMAN competitions. The Editor reserves the right to use any suggestions submitted

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR OCTOBER.

- I.—The PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA for the best original Lyric is awarded to Miss Dorothy M. Rawcliffe, of Culraven, Haigh, near Wigan, Lancs., for the following

DELILAH

Once your smile was a ray of light
That made the darkest moments bright
Now it is but a searing flame
Which brands my heart with a lasting shame
Once your voice was a heavenly song
That charmed away all thoughts of wrong
But now I hear in the simplest lay
The hiss of the snake as it glides away
Your breath on my cheek was an angel's kiss,
The touch of your hand was a thrill of bliss
But now in the touch of your hand and breath
I feel the pains of eternal Death
Go! you were true to your cause, I know,
And I was false! But I bid you go
I loved you once, 'twas a grievous wrong,
But in proving me weak you have made me strong
DOROTHY M. RAWCLIFFE

We also select for printing

A RIVERA RIVERA

We sat beneath the olive trees
That cluster round Fiesole,
And watched the distant mountains turn
Deep purple in the setting day
You leaned upon your arms and dreamed
With brooding face, till night was down,
Till silver stars shone out and gleamed
Through violet mists above the town

But under other olives now
I sit alone and watch the sea,
The fragrance of an orange-grove
Is carried on the wind to me,
Along the bay Mentone shines,
Cap Martin tells the further view,
A little house with trellised vines
Stands up against the sky's deep blue

The thick, long grass is warm with sun,
I hear the browsing goats go by
The very soul of you is here
In scent and sound, in sea and sky
A moment past your spirit seemed
With sun and wind and leaves at play,
Was this perchance the dream you dreamed,
That hour in far Fiesole?

(M. W. Averay Jones, 2, Metchley Park Road, Edgbaston, Birmingham)

RENUNCIATION

And I must leave this garden of delight
Where scented winds blow softly from the south,
No more your arms must crush me to your heart
No more your kisses burn upon my mouth

For me the narrow path winds straight ahead,
That path where two may never walk abreast,
My feet must tread its rocks and stones alone—
Pray God it lead me to eternal Rest

My heart and happiness lie far behind,
I leave them cold and dead as last year's snow,
What joy has Heaven to give me in return
For all the bliss that I gave up below?

(Guy Chester, Penarth, Glamorgan)

IF I HAD YOU

If I had you for evermore beside me,
My soul would rise above the cares of day,
I should not care whatever might betide me,
Though skies should stretch above me, dull and grey
If I had you, my heart would soon be heaping
Bright treasures of love that you should safely store
A harvest of joy I should be reaping,
If I had you beside me evermore

If I had you I should not heed earth's splendour,
Of riches and of fame my heart would tire
If I had you, and felt your handclasp tender,
And knew that I was Queen of your desire—
Then, not till then, I'd know life's truest gladness,
And satisfy the longing in my breast
I should forget those bygone days of sadness
If I had you, my heart would be at rest

If I had you, each hour I should be living Always for you in action or in prayer,
My higher self to you I should be giving,
And strive to make your present always fair
If I had you for evermore beside me—
Home in your arms I'd find on land or sea
I should not care whatever might betide me,
If I had you for ever near to me!

(Miss Marjorie W. Crosbie, The Balkans, Lancaster Gardens, Beltinge, Herne Bay.)

LYRIC.

This world I did not understand,
I comprehended not the skies,
Until I pressed a woman's hand,
Until I gazed into her eyes
If there be deeper mysteries,
Than golden suns and silver sand,
It was the wonder of her eyes
It was the beauty of her hand

(H. B. Egmont Hake, 11, Granville Place, Portman Square, London, W.)

A SPINDHURF'S WISH

If it be said that I have loved the sun,
Taken what God has given, without fear
Lost in its beauty Wrong be lurking near,
Ended in joy what was in joy begun,
If this be said of me, I am content,
Though I have died

If it be said from the full granary
Of love poured out to me, I gave again
To some poor hungry wretch, that not in vain
That brimming golden store was spent for me
If this be said of me, I am content
That I have lived

(Guenn F. Newnham, 7, Avenue Gardens, Dover)

Competitors must please keep copies of their poems as, owing to the rather heavy extra labour involved, we cannot undertake to return any. Mrs. Sloane Thomson sends some good verses "My Gutter-snipe," but they form a long narrative poem, other competitors have sent sonnets, and one a dilutive effort in blank verse. The best of the other lyrics received are from C. Roy Price (Wellington), Violet D. Chapman (Burnham), Donald Bam (Buffalo, N.Y.), D. K. Boileau (Bath), E. R. L. (Durlam), Kathleen R. Wilkes (Stowmarket), Cyril G. Taylor (Heswall), Miss A. Chambers (Birmingham), A. D. Goodwin (Gillingham), Ethel Welch (Aldburgh), Chrissie G. Palmer (Corstophine), Edith Funniss (St. Meols), A. E. Barnes (Baconshill), Miss E. F. Parr (Aytun), Doris Dean (Bromley), Mrs. Agnes E. M. Baker (Kilburn), H. R. Smith (Newcastle-on-Tyne), Margaret McDonnell (Glasgow), Miss V. W. Ware (Gloucester), Mary M. Wiltshire (Victoria Park), Gwyn Elton (High Barnet), Emily Kingston (Blangowrie), Evelyn L. A. Scott (Stratham), Miss C. Vera Amcley (Ilfracombe), Fred Tait (Leeds), Eleanor Bull (Ludlow), Albert Shackleton (Todmorden), Jas. (Aberdeen), Kate V. Jones (Ludlow), Thomas I. aw (Holytown), Maura Irwin (Leamington Spa), Winifred Holmden (Ilfracombe), Percy Thomas (Hornsey), Bernard Spencer (London, S.E.), Margaret Lane (Kettering), R. W. Fenton (Birstall), G. W. Turner (Burnley), A. Ruari Clarke (Ramsgate), E. Howard (Putney), D. P. Tweeddale (Birkdale), Mary G. Cherry (Matlock), R. W. King (Catford Hill), Frank Dale (Saxmundham), E. E. Wood (Ladywell), Elsie S. Mead (Burnley), Launcelot H. Stuckey (Taunton), Mona Douglas (Birkenhead), L. Aaronson (London, E.), G. Thelwall (Middlesbrough), G. A. Mackinlay (Perth), Hubert Rogers (Hackney), Evaline Emily He (Plumstead Common), M. A. Newman (Brighton), M. F. Alexander (Battersea Park), A. Charlton (Derby), Oswald J. Francis (Barry), B. R. M. Hetherington (Carlisle), Miss B. B. Friend (Sheffield), Kathleen M. Coates (Sherringham), Lillian Whitehead (Bury), Miss M. Spode (Newcastle), Margot Balfour (London, W.), Grace M. Measham (Newcastle-on-Tyne), John Carlton (Hornsey), Eveleen Pawle (Ware), Annie Newton (Carnarvon), Frederick Thomas (Ludlow), Arthur Hemingway (Northwich), C. W. Kent (Alderly Edge), Smah Helen West (Plymouth), Margaret E. Painter (Wimbledon), T. D. T. (Portadown), Dorothy Miriam Bunn (Hull), Sandy (Swinton), Frank Houghton (Bath), Beatrice Craig (Straidarran), O. H. R. Leyton (Westgate-on-Sea), Emily Cornell (Up Norwood), John D. Smith (Millingavie), Aline Austin Austin (Bournemouth), E. R. North (Settle), Joyce Jones (Buckhurst Hill), E. F. Shirley (Dumfries), Bunce (Yorkshire), E. Summers (Dukinfield), S. R. Noyes (Pontypridd), Annie Cowan (Galway), Frank A. Hellawell (Newbiggin), H. Becket (Oxford), Emily Sundeland (Todmorden), Rhys Raworth (Harrogate), Doris Rochefort (Stoke Newington), Carig (New Brighton), Miss M. Peart (Tottenham), Frank G. Greenwood (Bingley), Alex. M. Reid (Motherwell), F. H. Storm (North Shields), J. Macdonald (Bacup), Owen H. Carsburn (Sheffield), Jas. F. Snell (Dartford), D. M. B. (Liverpool), Miss Miniken (London, S.W.), Miss M. Troughton (Cape, S. Africa), H. B. Dawes (Birkdale), Eleanor L. Clark (Maghera), Rev. J. Wesley Houchin (Shenfield), Robert D. Roosmale-Cocq (Sandown, I. of W.), Florence Dunford (Bembridge), Maud Marion Burnell (Ashford), Mabel Malet (Hull), Lillie Laphorne (Southsea), D. M. Williams (New Mills, Derbyshire), Dora Duder (Launton), Violet Tootal (London, W.), O. W. Griffith (Cricklewood, N.W.), M. C. James (Hamstead, N.W.), Alice W. Linford (South Tottenham, N.), Evelina Ida San Garde (Accrington), Mrs. Clara Swain-Dickins (Dulwich, S.E.), G. Lisle Hindmarsh (Cardiff), A. Ellerton (Liscard, Cheshire), Ion A. Grundy (Liverpool), Rosie Speight (Armley, Leeds), J. E. Compton (Studley, Warwickshire), William C. Pocock (St. Paul's, Bristol), A. J. Freeland (Kibworth Beauchamp, Leicestershire), S. B. Irene Bell (London, W.C.), I. Macnamara (Dublin), Leslie H. Allen (Melrose Highlands, Mass., U.S.A.), Mrs. Edith Ratten (Leatham, Durham), J. D. I. Waugh (Teddington, Beds.), E. Jothan (Port St. Mary, I. of M.), Fred Reynolds (Walmer), Miss H. M. Barrow (Stratham Hill, S.W.), G. M. Northcott (West Kirby, Birkenhead), Gladys M. Salter (Maidenhead), A. C. Laughton (Wakcheld), E. O. Call (Lennoxville, Que., Canada), E. F. Sandford (Saltash), Ivan Adair (Dublin), Harry Glazebrook (Birkenhead), Miss L. D. Potter (Prescot, Lancs.), Mary Eva Kitchel (Boonton, N.J., U.S.A.), F. V. Branford (Edinburgh), E. H. Kenney, jun. (Dulwich, S.E.), M. F. W. (East Farleigh, Maidstone), Alice Binks (Westoe, South Shields), Mrs. J. M. Delbridge (Canterbury), Barbara Drummond (Monmouth), Edward G. Nightingale (Edinburgh), Russell Green (Sheffield), Margaret K. McEvoy (Cricklewood, N.W.), F. Popham (Annan), Margaret Savoy (Clifton, Bristol), Miss H. C. Williamson (Galashells), St. George Best (Kenwood, Chicago, U.S.A.), R. E. D. Donaldson (Calne), Eleanor G. Chandler (Toronto, Canada), Hugh McIntosh (Murrayfield, Edinburgh), James Percy Gross (Neully, Seine, France), Edith Bull (Southport), Ernest J. Sumner (Bury St. Edmund's), Marsella Whitaker (Earls Barton, Dewsbury), Mrs. Monypenny (Bedford), and Maud McDonald (Enfield, Middlesex).

Prize Photograph illustrating title of some recent book

By Miss E. A. Pearson.

"Journey's End," by Katharine Tynan (Werner Laurie).

See Competition No. 3, page 106

Honourable mention
Prize Competition No

Photo by
Irene Pollock Lalonde.

"The Perfect Wife" by Joseph Keating (Heinemann)

II - The PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation is awarded to Miss Ellen Webster of 6, Warrington Road, Ipswich, for the following

WET MAGIC By J. NESBIT (Laurie)

"He sought to keep his spirits up,
By pouring spirits down"

W. S. GILBERT Bab Ballads

We also select for printing

A TRAP TO CAUCH A DREAM By DION CANTON CATHROP (Hodder & Stoughton)

"It's that confounded cucumber
I've eat and can't digest"

THOMAS INGOLDSPY, The Confession

(Kathleen Birch, The Cottage, Colebrooke Road, Bexhill)

IS THERE A HILL? A SYMPOSIUM (Cassell)

"O golfer, be quiet!"

BARRY PAIN, Martin Luther at Potsdam

(Charles Powell, 290, Oxford Road, Manchester)

LOVE AND (200) A YEAR By MRS. ALFRED PRAGA (Laurie)

"How happy could I be with either!"

JOHN GAY, The Beggar's Opera

(M. J. Tindale, Woodcote, Worthing)

ONE SMITH By S. MURRAY JOHNSTONE (Wm. Dawson & Sons)

"My stout galloper"

R. BROWNING, How they brought the good news from Ghent to Aix

(A. Ernest Smith, 104, Sheen Park, Richmond, S.W.)

THE LOVE THAT LASTS By G. B. BURGIN (Hodder & Stoughton)

Still hapning on my daughter"

SHAKESPEARE Hamlet

(M. Hasler, Brunswick Road, Douglas, Isle-of-Man)

THINGS NAUTICAL. REVIEW BY J. I. PATTERSON

"It's very odd that sailor-men Should wear those things so loose"

INGOLDSPY LEGENDS, Misadventures at Margate

(D. Bass, 3a, Somerset Road, Ashford, Kent)

III - A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS for the best photograph illustrating the title of any recent novel is awarded to Miss E. A. Pearson, of Noss Mayo, Fleet, for the photograph reproduced on page 105

We specially commend the photographs of Irene Pollock Lalonde (Bath), Ernest S. Heron (Chester), and Miss E. A. Bracher (East Southsea), which we also reproduce. Among the best of the other photographs are those by Miss Dease (West Meath), G. McCrohen (Wakefield), B. R. M. Hetherington (Carlisle), Marie Russell Brown (Glasgow), Norah E. Goodbody (Kings Co.), Cyril G. Taylor (Heswall), and Miss B. W. Ramsay (Portes)

IV - The PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best review in not more than a hundred words is awarded to Miss Evelyn M. Abbott, of The Croft, Old Malton, Yorks, for the following

BENDISH By M. HEWLETT (Macmillan)

This elaborate study of a novel written from an obviously equal to Mrs. T. Annet, but the novelist has taken some liberties with dates, the story opening in the year 1830, the eve of the Reform Act. Various characters re-appear, notably George Moore - particularly drawn from Shelley - and the Great Duke. The book ends with the publication of Bendish's "Wanderer" ('Childe Harold'), and his discomfiture in love, politics, and friendship. Mr. Hewlett dislikes Byron, and does him less than justice, but this novel is one of his finest, witty, epigrammatic, admirable in characterization and grasp of the period.

We also select for printing

THE BROKEN HALO By FLORENCE I. BARCLAY (Putnam)

This is a clean, well-written story, with plenty of humour and pathos commingled in Mrs. Barclay's own inimitable style. The two principal characters, round whom the plot moves with hints of tragedy, the 'Little White Lady' - a poignantly pathetic figure - and Dick, command our sympathies. The actions of the latter are not always commendable, but the author has the gift of convincing us that there are extenuating circumstances. Sentimental but not sensational, this book contains no discussions on sex problems, and herein lies one secret of its popularity - it may safely be given to young people for perusal.

(J. D. I. Waugh, Conger House, Fordington, Beds.)

Honourable mention
Prize Competition No

Photo by Miss E. A. Bracher.

"The Boat," by Mrs. H. H. P. (Mills & Boon).

MODERN CHILE. By W. H. KOEBEL. (Bell)

Mr Koebel's book may be compared to a succession of beautiful landscape pictures with extracts from the descriptive catalogue, usually pertaining to all exhibitions of painting. His flow of words and wonderful wealth of language ensure a splendid variety of narration, and not only has the author himself caught the atmosphere of the country, and entered into the spirit of the people, but he has thoroughly enabled his readers to do so too. The practical chapters show careful thought and study, and the illustrations are an additional attraction.

(Mrs. Sybilla Stirling, Fordel, Glenfarg.)

THE LURE OF THE LITTLE DRUM

By MARGARET PETERSON. (Methuen.)

In "The Lure of the Little Drum," Miss Peterson has given us something to be thankful for. It is seldom one sees a character so pitilessly drawn as that of Esther Williams. One feels that her life is made up of trifles—each trifle, as insistent as the throbbing of the little drum, pushing her further from the happiness that was held out to her, and which she seemed incapable of grasping, as they sucked her further into the maelstrom, for which her forebears were responsible. The India, too, she draws with such a certain touch is not the India of the tourist and sightseer; it is the country of one who knows it well, knows it and, we should shrewdly suspect, loves it dearly.

(Mary Chadwick, 7, Church Road, St. Leonards-on-Sea.)

THE ENGLISH NOVEL. By PROFESSOR GEORGE SAINTSBURY. (Dent.)

In closing these vigorous, stimulating and critical pages one only regrets that it is by no means likely that even half the novel-devouring world will ever read them. The book is such a fine appreciation of that "human delight in humanity," so steadily true in its values, so illuminating and humorous, that, though it most undoubtedly will be hugely enjoyed by the minority, it would enormously benefit the great remainder. And to those peculiar persons who "do not care for novels"—for such do exist—I strongly recommend the very able final epitome.

(D. M. Lodge, 7, Gatestone Road, Upper Norwood.)

We specially commend the reviews sent in by Jocelyn Terne Ormsley (Pontypridd), Sessie Hunter (Chesterfield),

Honourable mention
Prize Competition No. 4

Photo by Ernest S. Heron.

"The Players" by Sir William Mynay (Houlder & Stoughton)

Wood, N.), Katherine J. Wood (Bournbrook, Birmingham), Miss H. M. Barrow (Streatham Hill, S.W.), G. M. Northcott (West Kirby, near Birkenhead), S. Sundaram (Madura, South India), J. Swinson (Gunbridge Wells), Constance Goodwin (Clapham, S.W.), F. M. Nicholson (Bebington, Cheshire), James A. Richards (Tenby), Lettie Cole (Pontrefract), Arthur Davidson (Naun), Sybil Waller (Boscombe, Hants.), Miss Rickey (Belfast), L. H. Cooke (Heaton Moor, Lancs.), E. Webster (Kingsdown, Bristol), M. Whitaker (Earlshaton, Dewsbury), Ivan Adair (Dublin), Irene Pollock Lalonde (Bath), Emily Kington (Blairgowrie), J. R. (Forest Hill, S.E.), A. Ruan Clarke (Ramsgate), M. Nicklin (Winscombe, Somerset), F. Booth (South Norwood, S.E.), Miss J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), M. A. Newman (Brighton), W. J. Honeychurch (Erdington, Birmingham), Muriel M. B. Aikman (Glasgow, W.), E. F. Parr (Clifton, Bristol), Frederica Mountford (Eastbourne), Horace W. Walker (Beeston, Notts.), M. J. F. Bittleston (Lilford, Surrey), and Mary (Island) (Overton, Ellesmere).

V. PRIZES OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO "THE BOOKMAN" are awarded to Miss S. Hunter, 14, Avondale Road, Chesterfield, and to Mr. John (Arilton), 36, Effingham Road, Hornsey, N.

New Books.

THE DARK FLOWER.*

"The dark flower" of Mr. Galsworthy's new novel is the flower of passion, springing up so wildly, so irresistibly, in the hearts of men. For this book is a study of passion in all its splendour and misery. The hero, Mark Lennan, at nineteen falls in love with and is loved by the wife of his Oxford tutor—an affaire strangled, almost at its birth, by the fascination of a girl of sixteen. It had blossomed fiercely, this flower, but it seemed to fade in a night—and with the fading of one passion the other faded too. So with Mark's departure for Rome, to take lessons in sculpture, the first part, "Spring," closes, and we are given a gap of seven years.

At twenty-six, in Monte Carlo, the real passion of Mark's life flames into bloom. Olive Cramer is the wife of an M.P., very beautiful, gentle, of his own age, and unhappily married. She is on the Riviera with her uncle and aunt. She returns Mark's love with the pure ardour of her repressed nature. He follows her to London, and they have a few sweet and secret meetings. But the husband—a violent, jealous and dangerous man—guesses all, and forbids them to see one another. She goes down to her cottage on the Thames and he remains in Chelsea. But at last, driven to desperation, she telegraphs for Mark to come to her. They have one evening in the dark summer woods, and they settle to flee together on the morrow. But for her there is no to-morrow. Her husband has tracked them, and as they return in the boat he rushes at them in his, and upsets them into the river. Olive Cramer is drowned. So closes the second part, "Summer."

The third part, "Autumn," opens after an interval of more than twenty years. Mark Lennan is now a man of nearly fifty, and has been married for fifteen years to Sylvia Dorne, the same little girl who, so long ago, had stolen his heart from Anna Stormer, his tutor's wife. He has been happy all these years, but he has come now to the age when men begin to long for their vanished youth. He is restless and full of an unsatisfied and vague emotion. And it is in such an hour that he meets his old school chum, Johnny Dromore, who takes him home and introduces him to his daughter Nell—a girl of eighteen, fearless, sincere, and utterly without experience. With the strange abandon of youth she conceives a passion for him, and he, clinging desperately to his Indian summer, returns her love with mournful intensity. They are drifting fast on to the rocks of an impossible situation when, with the despairing face of his wife before him (she knows everything), he pulls himself up and settles to leave the country with Sylvia. Compassion has conquered desire.

"The Dark Flower" By John Galsworthy 6s. (Hes)

"The Dark Flower" is a genuine, able, and eloquent novel. Unfortunately the first part is much the poorest, and makes an inauspicious prelude. Mr Galsworthy shows us skilfully the three stages of the disease—calf love, passion, and the yearning love of middle age. Mark Jennan is good in so far as he is typical, but poor in so far as he is meant to be a real creation. The best people in the book are Olive Cranmer and Nell Dromore—they have a breath of life in them. But most of the other characters are conventional, and have little distinct individuality. Of course that is the inherent weakness of a novel in which the theme is the most important thing. Mr Galsworthy has impressive powers of ironic melancholy, but much of his humour is crude—the description of Olive's uncle and aunt, for instance. But on the whole, "The Dark Flower" is certainly an arresting and curious work of art.

RICHARD CURRIE

GEORGE ELIOT THE EARLIER NOVELS.*

The appearance of a new edition of George Eliot's novels gives one an opportunity of taking stock of one of the pedestal-figures of the last century. George Eliot died in the same year as Carlyle and Borrow. She enjoyed for a time a supremacy in her own sphere as undisputed as that of Tennyson, but she was assaulted and hustled down far sooner than the Victorian poet by the iconoclasts of the National Observer and their kindred. The stories of which carpenters, millers, and weavers were the heroes captivated English taste completely for a time. They had a vogue similar to that of Dutch landscape painting when it first came in. But that did not prevent Hobbema from dying a pauper in the reign of Queen Anne, and the orgy of French naturalism, which reached a climax in Zola, created a decided ebb of critical taste which has receded from George Eliot and caused a strong set back among her veteran admirers. For a great writer who was also a great humorist George Eliot certainly had a singular gift of falling flat and producing prose that is primarily uninteresting. How flat is much of "Romola," "Felix Holt," "Daniel Deronda," "Theophrastus Such," and even "Middlemarch." How contemptibly bad and amateurish from the point of view of art are such stories as "The Lifted Veil" and the quasi-jocular "Brother Jacob." Dr Johnson would probably have said of this superior woman, as he said of the superior poet Gray, that she was dull—everywhere. She was certainly portentously dull in her letters and portentously solemn sitting as a sibyl and pontificating the round of her admirers. Mrs Olphand, I think, had a true insight when she observed that George Eliot (whom she admired to the green point of envy), took herself with tremendous seriousness, always on duty, never relaxing, certainly not in her letters, which are almost sepulchral in their gravity. I think she must have been a dull woman with a great genius distinct—something like the gift of the old prophets, exercised with only a sort of dim perception what it meant.

Contemporaries, for all that is said to the contrary, generally admire most and fathom deepest. The gospel concerning George Eliot is often dull enough. But it is the Word that tells truest in the end. And there are few Victorian writings that can "stand up to" Time like "Adam Bede," "Sister Maggie," and "Silas Marner." Go into the corner of any graveyard in the Midlands, where tombs of the 'sixties and 'seventies of the last century abound, try to evoke from their "brick graves" the typical, substantial figures of the fast disappearing bucolic England, florid gentlemen, energetically set by their mistresses with their heads above the level of the hedgerow, mounted on trim cobs, the Tullivers, the Dobsons, the Poyzers, the Lammeters, the Garths of those days will stand before you.

* George Eliot's Works. New Cabinet Edition, copyright, in 12 shilling volumes. "Adam Bede," 2. "The Mill on the Floss," 2. "Silas Marner," 1. (Blackwood.)

Truer portraiture has never been in English fiction before or since. Mingled with these life-like delineations are many scenes, episodes, and flashes of feeling that touch the heart and the emotions profoundly. Who can forget the encounter between Adam and Arthur Donnithorne, or that between Mrs Poyser and the old Squire? Few delights are more vivid to the novel-reader than the visit of Maggie to brother Tom at school, or the reception by the family at the Mill of the news that Tom Tulliver is about to pay off his father's debts. There is, by the way, a distressing "literal" in the great scene of the last words and death of the miller. "I had my turn. I beat him. That was out fair" for "but fair." Nancy Lammeter, again, and Eppie in "Silas Marner" are figures worthy of the best in Scott, and without a touch of the mawkishness so common among fictitious heroines. Eppie's clinging to her poor home has a touch of the noble and quiet simplicity of character that makes of Jeanie Deans the unforgettable heroine she is. But the cosmogony of the Dodson family and their like is, perhaps, the greatest thing of all in these earliest and best of the George Eliot novels. The type of character elucidated in the analysis of the simple Dodson faith is one of the rivets of English History. In these wonderful books of her early prime, George Eliot gives us first her neighbours, then her family, then herself—subjects which after all, afford the surest models for the portrait-artist.

The best critics have condoned her defects as a constructive artist, common it can hardly be gainsaid, to most of the English school, for they see in her the greatest of realists of that best kind of realism which seems a speciality of the Low German latitude—the Dutch in painting, the Anglo-Celt in fiction. The Latin naturalists are too bitter, because they are so impersonal. George Eliot never omits the ingredient of sympathy, and this gives to the colours on her palette a permanence which all the artistry of Flaubert and Maupassant seems hardly able to attain. It is excellent to have this very neat and handy shilling copyright reprint, but we should have been more grateful to the publishers had they included a revaluation of George Eliot from the modern point of view, and omitted such poor substances as the minor tales appended to "Silas Marner." We hope to conclude our own revaluation when the later novels are issued.

THOMAS SECCOMBE

THE CREED OF A CRITIC.*

It is always a good thing when a critic of books will come out from the covered way of the reviewer, and show himself in the open field of general criticism; it is a token that he possesses not only convictions but the courage of them. Mr John M. Robertson in his "New Essays Towards a Critical Method," would have the critic make to his readers a confession of his habit of mind, his culture, and even his physical diathesis, politics and age, by way of enabling them to check the personal quality of his judgments. And Mr William Archer, in the introduction to his "Poets of the Younger Generation," not only accepted but followed this plan. Mr Scott-James, in his new book, "Personality in Literature," is not quite so explicit as all that, but at least he puts forward clearly and at length those conclusions upon the fine art of literature, and the nature of beauty which are at the root and spring of his critical mind.

Such a statement, by so well-known a critic and reviewer, is entirely welcome. It is not only that he is thereby identified, and the body of his work rendered subject to the code he has himself formulated—an excellent limitation for a reviewer—but there is also a contribution to that critical atmosphere in which creative work is most profitably born. The chief function of criticism is neither approbation nor appreciation; it is the furthering, the guiding, the provocation of creative art, and that function is not to be accomplished save in the light of a clear vision and by the force of profound beliefs.

* "Personality in Literature" By R. A. Scott-James. (Martin Secker.)

"I lay it down as a self-evident proposition," says Mr Scott-James, "that if we mean anything at all by creative literature, or literature regarded as a fine art, we must mean something which provides us with an addition to experience, an experience sui generis. We demand that it should be something which will occupy us, and engage our faculties which will come profoundly in contact with us when we are in fullest possession of ourselves, which will not merely stir us, but stir us to activity."

That activity, however, must be what Mr Scott-James calls "disinterested." It must be an activity within the four corners of art, neither moral nor immoral. The writer's business as an artist is to furnish an experience and any purpose he may have beyond making that experience emotionally true and complete is alien to his chief end and hostile to his art. It is his to create, not a reproduction of life and its people, but "to substitute for the dishevelled commonplace the choiceness of an ordered interpretation." In a later chapter, the author says of Mr Arnold Bennett that "he is aware that life is a spectacle, that to make it interesting you must make it vivid, you must show it as something that is intense and passionate." And that is true, even of the drab and trivial lives of narrow men, Mr Bennett sees and shows his shopkeepers and the folk about them as vessels of wrath and passion. It is not they that matter—it is Mr Bennett's vision of them, and of the changing world they inhabit.

There is in this book a brief passage in which Mr Scott-James touches upon the falsification of such words as "passion" and "romance"; he might have enlarged the list by the inclusion of "art," "beauty," and "literature." In the debased currency of the vernacular a tailor may be an artist, beauty is a slang term, and every advertiser produces and distributes literature. It is needful that writers and readers alike should clear their pockets of their false coin of language and realise once more that noble words have a noble significance. "There are many people of my acquaintance who think it almost indecent to talk of literature as a fine art," says Mr Scott-James. "They have the same distaste for the word 'art' as others have for the name of God." It is because the author himself, in this book which sets forth and elucidates his critical creed, goes back to things basic and essential to stark art, and sheer beauty, and pure literature, that his volume has its character alike of a confession and vindication. Instead of telling us the place of his birth like Mr William Archer, he shows us the plain ground on which he stands.

The book concludes with studies of a number of men of letters. Of Mr Bernard Shaw we read that "if he has not completely failed (as a writer of plays), that is because he has not completely lived up to his theories." Mr Gilbert Chesterton's philosophy is "a sort of sublimated public opinion, minus the opinion of the intellectuals." Mr Maschfield, Mr H G Wells, J M Synge and Francis Thompson, are others to whom Mr Scott-James devotes consideration.

PERCEVAL GIBBO.

FREDERICK TENNYSON'S POEMS.*

Frederick Tennyson was the eldest of the three brothers; his younger brother, Charles, was a finer poet and it is the greatness of the youngest, Alfred, that gives to the work of the other two a larger interest than it would otherwise possess. The man himself was greater than his poetry. "It is because there are so few F Tennysons in the world," Edward Fitzgerald wrote to him, when he was living out of England, "that I do not like to be wholly out of hearing of the one I know. . . I see so many little natures that I needs must draw to the large." And the chief attraction of his poems is that his own strong individuality is reflected in them; he is no echo, in whatever he wrote he was wholly himself. His besetting weaknesses are a certain vagueness of thought and diffuseness of expression, but in his happiest lyrical moods his utterance is the perfection of simplicity and the thought shines out with a starry clearness, as in "Beauty."

* "The Shorter Poems of Frederick Tennyson." With Portrait. 3s. net. (Macmillan)

"Like as sweet Voices linger in the ear,
And Music that we heard not while 'twas playing,
Comes back unbid for many a day and year,
And haunts the heart like Spirits earthward straying

"When first I saw thee in thine own abode
I saw that beauty without fear or pain,
But now it rules my nature like a God,
And in my vision rises up again

And yet beloved 'tis no longer thou,
But something rare which Fancy in the brain
Regrets on Memory could I see thee now,
Thy beauty by its shadow could be slain

"If I should never more behold thy face
Alas! if thou wert dead and lowly laid
That shadow would rule over me in thy place,
Methinks I still should love that lovely Shade

"Oh! let me look into thy deep blue eyes
That if we part for ever if we part
My soul may live upon felicity
For ever shadows of the joy thou art"

You read these poems with quiet pleasure, there is not one of them that outdoes all the rest and put Frederick Tennyson among those lesser bards whom the gods in one great hour touched with the divine fire of inspiration, but there is hardly one of them that has not some felicity of phrase, something of reflection or feeling or fancy that lifts it above the level of mere verse. It is not great poetry, but it is poetry as the homely candle that brightens a little room is at one with that great miracle of the heavens which lightens all the world. A sympathetic introduction by Charles Tennyson gives a delightful character sketch of the poet, and a careful and discriminating criticism of his work.

Frederick Tennyson.

Frontispiece portrait from "The Shorter Poems of Frederick Tennyson" (Macmillan).

CUPID GOES NORTH.*

For all its wit and lightness of style, "The Sporting Instinct" had a serious side, but in "Cupid Goes North," Mr. Martin Swayne returns to the delightfully irresponsible humour of "Lord Richard in the Pantry." Once he has lured you into his mood he carries you on irresistibly and has you so under his spell that even the most whimsically burlesque behaviour on the part of his characters seems natural enough and tickles you to heartiest laughter without shaking your belief in them. The whole story arises out of Dr. Belascow's anxiety to cure his friend, Cecil Charteris, of certain growing habits of indolence and induce him to adopt a healthier, more active attitude towards life and the world in general. Cecil has inherited a handsome property, but is weary of living in the country and has taken a house in Harley Street, which he shares with Belascow, a doctor of a small but fashionable practice, and Belascow is beginning to find that the strain of living continuously in the same house with an idler, who is a minor poet, is just a little too irksome, and he becomes insistent that Cecil must marry.

"My dear Vladimir, I shall never marry," replied Cecil calmly. "When a man marries, his life ends. When a woman marries, her life begins. How can you expect marriage to be a success?"

Dr. Belascow took no notice of this remark.

"Why don't you go about more? Why don't you meet more people, Cecil?"

"I don't like people. People are a mistake."

"Oh, come, my dear fellow, it is absurd to talk like that. Let us go to Lady Algeinon's on Friday night. You will meet some of the best dancers in London."

"Lady Algeinon is a very tedious person, Vladimir. I dislike her brilliant unsuccessful smile, and her green satin stair carpets intensely. And besides, people take dancing too seriously nowadays. If one indulges in a little pleasant conversation, one is hustled out. Dancing used to be a medium for displaying beautiful dresses. Now it is merely a mode of exercise."

Nevertheless, after refusing to accompany Belascow on a holiday to Tilwhunny, a remote part of Scotland where there is good fishing—"It's such an awful nuisance moving, isn't it?"—he suddenly changes his mind when Belascow casually speaks of it as a pilgrimage. "Pilgrimage! You never mentioned a pilgrimage! That is a beautiful idea. Pilgrimage—it is an exquisite unhurried word. By all means let us go on a pilgrimage." And since "a pilgrimage without vows is absurd," he vows to take a stone off his weight and to read one of Scott's novels—"a dangerous, anguished vow"—before he returns. In the one inn at Tilwhunny, Marjorie Glenfiddoch is staying with her father and mother, and Cecil falls immediately in love with her, only to learn that the family has resolved to go away to Aberdeen on the following day. Mr. Glenfiddoch has had a most wretched time there. He had to lie up in bed with a cold as soon as he arrived, and on the very day he was well enough to get up he went out shooting with Lord Flashman, another guest, and as Flashman accidentally shot him in the back he had to hurry home and go to bed again. The only available doctor is laid up unwell, and Glenfiddoch's wife has had to nurse him until he is fit to get about again. Cecil sees at once that his one hope is to keep Glenfiddoch in bed and, as Belascow refuses to reveal his profession, offer to attend the patient, and insist on his not getting up yet. Cecil decides to pose as a doctor himself and achieve this end, Belascow undertaking not to give him away.

"There will be no necessity. You'll give yourself away."

"Nonsense. I have met so many doctors in our house that I can act the part perfectly. A doctor is only a manner and a list of half-a-dozen drugs or so."

"But you are a surgeon, remember. You may have to pick shot out of Glenfiddoch's back."

"Don't be so disgusting. I shall not do any such thing. My diagnosis will disclose the absence of shot in Glenfiddoch's back. I have arranged my diagnosis before seeing the patient, just like any great surgeon, Vladimir."

He carries out his scheme with complete success, even though he pronounces at first that the patient has an impossibly high temperature, and later that he has absolutely no temperature whatever. When Glenfiddoch has become recklessly impatient and announced that he intends to get up in the evening, Duane, the eccentric scientist and traveller, who has lately arrived at the hotel and is a friend of Belascow's, readily undertakes to pose as a Scotch specialist, he goes away, an elaborate show is made of wiring for a specialist, and Duane, arriving in a motor-car disguised in flowing whiskers, examines the sufferer and emphatically insists that he shall not leave his bed for another week or two and alarms him into obeying. Before this, however, Cecil has discovered that Marjorie is not his ideal, he is disappointed in her, and she is evidently not drawn to him, which leaves Belascow free to confess that he is himself in love with her, and latterly it has been in the interests of his friend that Cecil has continued to prescribe for the unfortunate Glenfiddoch and detain him upstairs. And before this, too, a very charming young widow has come to stop at the hotel and Cecil has wholly and irrevocably given his heart to her. There are pretty touches of sentiment in this new and genuine love affair, but the prevailing note of the book is of the gayest and most whimsical humour, punctuated with generally satirical comments on the life we live and the people who are living it with us. The characters are cleverly and amusingly drawn, the dialogue is crisp and sparkling, and the whole story simply bubbles over with laughter. Novels are as plentiful as sparrows, but your humorous book is a rarer bird, and the reviewer is to be forgiven if he writes more words than were allotted to him when he finds he has found a real one. C. W.

* "Cupid Goes North." By Martin Swayne. 6s. (Hodder Stoughton.)

THE ROMP.*

"Mrs. Jordan Child of Nature" makes the reader think he is taking up a lively gossiping story of the queen of comedy who was also the mistress of a king with whom the comic is in no other way associated. But the biographer seems to have been over much obsessed by the "mysteries" of his heroine's career, and, in natural disappointment over the failure to clear up certain of those mysteries, to have been a thought too zealous in quoting the various confusing and contradictory "authorities." The result is a work likely to appeal to those who want a careful collation of much of the biographical data concerning Dorothy Jordan rather than a realistic and lively portrayal of her personality.

That there are "mysteries" concerning Dorothy Jordan no one who has read more than one of the memoirs concerning her can have failed to perceive. When was she born? Where was she born? Who was her father? Such are some of the problems that face the biographer at the outset, and Mr. Sergeant seeks to deal with them by discussing the seeming probabilities on comparing the conflicting evidence. As to when she was born, her latest biographer accepts the date as 1762 though recognising that there is evidence that makes it uncertain, as to where she was born he does not state definitely, as the late Joseph Knight does in the "Dictionary of National Biography," that the place was "near Waterford," but leaves the rival claims of London and the Irish town as "not proven," saying that "in the absence of any evidence from a register of birth or baptism, it is impossible to go further." With regard to the parents of the actress, there seems to be little doubt as to the identity of her father, and Mr. Sergeant, with seeming justice, dismisses the story, too readily accepted by Knight, that he "was merely a stage underling"—otherwise a scene-shifter who, according to one authority, accompanied Dorothy when, still in her teens, she was acting at Cork. Mr. Sergeant dismisses this particular authority as "too loose a writer to inspire confidence," but it may be suggested that Dorothy's mother, after the supposed annulment of her marriage with Francis Bland, may have married again or, in some less binding form, have given another man the right to stand in loco parentis to her children, in which case the scene-shifter who accompanied the girl to Cork might well have been her actual or putative stepfather.

* "Mrs. Jordan Child of Nature." By Philip W. Sergeant. 16s. net. (Hutchinson.)

To turn, however, from the preliminary "mysteries" to the subject itself, there is much of varied and pathetic interest in the story of Dorothy Jordan's life, and her latest biographer has been at considerable pains to bring together all that he has been able to ascertain from contemporary journals and magazines bearing on her career as an actress and as mistress of the Duke of Clarence (afterwards King William the Fourth). The result is, as we have suggested, a work that is more conspicuous for carefulness than for vivid interest, for the author is almost over-careful to introduce "chapter and verse" for every statement, to give extracts verbatim et literatim rather than digest them and give a less broken story of his heroine's career. It was in the autumn of 1791 that Mrs. Jordan, having failed to make Richard Ford, later Sir Richard and the chief magistrate of London, make her in law that "Mrs. Ford" which he had led his friends to believe her, began her liaison with the Duke of Clarence; at least, it was then that the outspoken gossip-loving Press of the day began making paragraphs concerning the Royal Duke and the actress, though there are not wanting indications that it was only then that an arrangement entered into earlier became notoriously public. In speaking of the way in which the sons of George III. were brought up, the author, by the way, slips into a pun, the significance of which is more notable than the wit. "There is a story that the boys were brought up to do wo sted-work. It would indeed have been well if they had never been taught to do worse." For twenty years the Duke maintained Mrs. Jordan as the mistress of his home, and showed himself in quite a favourable light as a domestic character, and a fond father of the ten children of the irregular union, that he did so makes the story of the breaking off of that union and of the actress's closing years the more pathetic and the less creditable to him. Despite all that his apologists—the egregious John Barton, "official of the Royal Mint," Sir Jonas Barrington, and James Boaden—wrote, it is impossible to feel that he behaved with common decency towards the woman who had given the best years of her life to him who was the mother of his children. He could write smugly of being "a sincere friend and well-wisher to the Navy," as breeding up sons for the quarter-deck, but he does not come out well from the story of the later years of the mother of those sons. If, at the time of the commencement of the liaison, the Duke suffered more, as Mr. Sergeant says he did, from the scurrilous paragraphs of the day than did the actress, had he behaved better later he would have given less opportunity to the successors of those paragraphs.

As Mrs. Siddons reigns supreme in the annals of our stage as queen of tragedy, so does Mrs. Jordan—there appears no adequate explanation of her assumption of that name—in the realm of comedy (the tragedy with her was real in the closing years of her life), and Mr. Sergeant's carefully-prepared volume should serve to stimulate an interest in her personality and the story of her career.

A PERSPECTIVE OF POLICIES.*

This is an absorbing volume, packed with intuition and experience, penetrating, stimulative, statesmanlike. Mr. Fullerton has the rare gift of seeing the whole, and the parts so often mistaken for the whole, in true proportions and relations to it. He has given us a perspective of policies which combines the painstaking panorama of a map with the vivid brilliance of a picture.

The book handles the themes of past, present, and future, of realms, commonwealths and empires, under two * "Problems of Power: A Study of International Politics from Sadowa to Kirk-Kishinev." By William Morton Fullerton. 7s. 6d. net (Constable).

Mrs. Jordan.

From an engraving by J. Heath
From "Mrs. Jordan," by Philip W. Sergeant (Hutchinson)

heads. Postulating that money and public opinion underlie modern history (of which an art but no "philosophy" is possible), he considers that history as displayed in national character and international policies. But here again two several aspects prevail. Nationality asserts itself the more as the modern internationality tries to thwart it while in its turn the 'international mind' is frequently forced into some accommodation with the national mould. All along too, the stern facts of economics are effective modifiers of nations and internations.

There is no space to do the scantiest justice to Mr. Fullerton's presentations of and variations on the subject. Under the first aspect, for example, he shows how, with republican France—the fear of a man 'has been' the beginning of wisdom—and he shows also to what defects this has led though the republic of 1875 was itself an 'accident' whereby the façade of Government with its Napoleonic scaffolding was reinforced by 'fresh beams' of administration.

The inelasticity and over-bureaucracy, the lack of individual development under this system, are exhibited not only as they are but as they work in foreign relations. As Bismarck put it, France is still under the sway of 'the ten thousand.' Not so the sister republic of America, for which Mr. Fullerton has perhaps an inordinate admiration. And the recent revival of French nationalism dates, he thinks, from Roosevelt's declaration that there is no liberty without institutions. Under the second head the author shows the psychological effects, not only of Alsace and Lorraine, but of the Russian alliance which, by abolishing the hopes of ranchie, threw France back into 'positivism and resignation.' Then, again, he points out how the fascination of his kintion cousin for Tsar Nicholas II led to M. Hanoteaux's rapprochement with both Russia and Germany for the imitation of England. And how, thereupon, Edward the Seventh with a stroke of the stage initiated that successful entente which his genius for tact and comity commended.

The characteristics of Germany, Russia and America are pursued in analysis and proportions that are so animated as to form almost a melodrama in which (with exaggeration) Germany plays the necessary villain, England practical if oscillating, now the hero now the ami-mutuel, France and Italy the somewhat incompatible heroines. Very much to the point is the emphasis laid on the fact (which Disraeli, by the bye, foresaw at the time) that America's Civil War forced her to emerge as a great power affected by each shifting international situation. The preludes and sequels, too, of the Balkan War are followed and interpreted with masterful insight, while the future of Central America, the complications of Japan and China, with their manifold bearings, are more than indicated. Mr Fullerton believes that future struggles for power, after the opening of the Panama Canal will be transferred from the stage of the Mediterranean to that of the Northern and Eastern Pacific.

As befits a lover both of thought and action, the author has little patience with the "idealogue" who precipitate wars by pacific protests. Well does he know and show the dangers of the international mind that would save every country but its own, and he quotes Spinoza to prove the true foundations of a State. "Liberty or strength of soul are the virtue of private persons, the virtue of the State is security." He would have small practical sympathy with the almost Jansenist messages of Lord Haldane, "urbi et orbi," with the men of pens who think to write away thunder and lightning or the demagogues who imitate Canute on the sea-shore. Still less does he sympathise with the wrestlers round parish pumps, who are always too late for world emergencies, and would sacrifice national character to a vote-catching humanitarianism. The perils of sentimental neurosis are excellently dissected.

Perhaps the commanding, and continuing, if subterranean, activities of Russia are not sufficiently pursued, but on the whole this condensation of much in little, is complete. Nor—if only as a corrective to the prevailing "shallowness" of anti-national "democracy," can any one who would understand the wide forces that, amid all the tattle, are still driving the world afford to leave these poignant pages unread. For Mr Fullerton knows what he writes and feels what it means. That is a rare quality.

WALTER SICHEL

MR. GRANT RICHARDS' NOVEL *

"Caviare" was delicious—a whimsy, a whet, "Valentine" is both soldier and wilder. It has nothing whatever to do with the fourteenth of February, for Valentine stands for Valentine Barat, and he, though a lover, is "English, very English, English in all his ideas, sympathies, prejudices, a very John Bull mentally." In other words, a brick,—and bricks make but heavy love-missives. Art has probably never yet compelled Mr Richards to exercise a sterner self-denial than in his chapters recording Valentine's verbal love-making. But bricks do make the very best of building material for a novelist with a dizzy plot: their psychology is so simple they act as per invoice so reliably, that he can plan out successive tiers and courses of ascending circumstance without any fear of them suddenly playing him false—revealing sudden oddities of behaviour or unsuspected foibles of temperament. And Mr Grant Richards had a plot when he sat down to "Valentine," a plot of Grand Babylonian bigness—you think of "Hugo" and "The City of Pleasure" and the other excellent early Arnold Bennetts when you read of the "lordly pleasure-house, a home for all our colonies, a market place, several times larger than any building in the world," which Valentine's father, the famous architect, is spending his life-blood in erecting on the north side of Leicester Square, to be "a tower and lighthouse of Empire, dominating London." The building soars up, is opened and occupied—music-halls and synagogues, theatres and swimming-baths, a hotel "that alone dwarfs the Waldorf Astoria" are negligibly embedded in its wings. And then Valentine, as his father's heir and representative, discovers a flaw in the dead man's designs. That terrific topmost tower, brooding over London, apparently as solid as Ben Nevis, is based on a mathematical error—at any instant it may crash down, a monstrous flail of death, on the swarming city beneath. That is a nice strain to be thrown on a brick!

* "Valentine" By Grant Richards 6s. (Grant Richards, Ltd.)

Photo by F. O. Hoppe

Mr. Grant Richards.

On the one hand he is the guardian of his dead father's honour—on the other, he bears the weight of London's safety, and the tension is complicated by the transverse tug of love,—for disclosure means ruin, and ruin, to brickish minds, makes marriage immoral, especially marriage to an heiress. Does the triple wrench break him? You must explore the book and see. You will find it an entrancing undertaking. For that is only the corner stone of a structure which, like the Palace of Empire itself, easily embraces betting-rings and Turkish baths, countless restaurants, an aerodrome as broad as the Channel, and a glittering reproduction of the livelier Paris of dead years. "Caviare" was really a dramatic disquisition on the art of decorative living. "Valentine," though still decorative and disquisitionary, gives its chief attention to the art of drama. It has beauty, but no priggishness; it is melodramatic without noise. It is fastidious extravaganzas, rarest of art forms—a "Grand Babylon Hotel" finished like a "Cardinal's Snuff-box."

D. S.

OUT OF THE ABYSS.*

Those of us who as medical men have to do with the treatment of inebriety realise the truthfulness of the story told in "Out of the Abyss." The horror of the degradation, physical and mental, is fully exposed. In the poverty to which through the drunken habits of a wife and mother a family is reduced, the change in the character and disposition of the person addicted to drink, the constant attachment of blame for befalling misfortunes to almost every person other than the recalcitrant herself, and in the overpowering insistence of the craving for alcohol, before which the finer instincts of wifehood and motherhood have to give way, is given a picture in which the telling effects of an all enslaving appetite are vividly portrayed. While we cannot but feel for, and deeply sympathize with the writer of the autobiography, and share with her in the joy which is hers on delivery from the thralldom of alcohol, we cannot but express our admiration of the patience and tenderness of the husband, also of the love of children for a mother, under protracted circumstances of a most trying and heartrending nature. The family has had its reward.

* "Out of the Abyss: The Autobiography of One who was Dead and is Alive Again" 5s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

The drink question is all important from a personal, social and racial point of view. Humanly speaking, the recovery of the writer of the manuscript was effected through the magnetic influence of one of her own sex. This chosen messenger was successful in her appeal to all that yet remained best in her degraded sister. The changed life begun was continued and sustained by aid from a Higher Power, which the autobiographer fully and gratefully acknowledges, and without which there could have been no lasting success. The writer of this short note can recall instances of similar recovery, one by the simple grasp of a hand and the encouraging words spoken by a comparatively unknown friend, others, where self-determination enabled the individual to rise to higher things and to a return of the Christian Life.

THOMAS OULVER, Kt., M.D.

ELLEN ADAIR.*

From the working class life of a big city, an anything but circumscribed sphere, Mr. Niven has taken the material for this skilfully told story. The Adaurs are typical of thousands of decent, industrious, ambitious, pleasure-loving families in and out of Edinburgh. "Father" is head porter with a firm of decorators, but in the presence of the bank and insurance clerks and students who throng the flat during the jolly Saturday teas and the more sedate Sunday evenings he is referred to as their manager. Mrs. Adair's aim is the capture of gentlemen husbands for her daughters, persons able to take them shopping in Princes Street and to cosy luncheons in quiet but 'tony' grill rooms, and with this end in view they cultivate assiduously the accents and deportment of Queensferry Road and Rothesay Terrace. The portraits of the five members of the little household in "The Meadows" are etched with power, Mr. Adair blundering and at variance with the social nonsense, Mrs. Adair, beaming, pushing, shrewd, and worldly, Tom, stolid, unobtrusive and undemonstrative, Louise, staid, well balanced, a fine girl, and Ellen vivacious, pretty, alluring, revelling in high spirits and the joy of life, fully conscious of her power over men. The ruin of Ellen at the hands of "the Scotsman with Lascar's eyes" is no doubt in keeping with the development of her character, but nevertheless it and the heavy shadow cast over the rest, comes as a distinct shock to the reader, whose affections they have taken by storm. Depending upon incident and description rather than plot, it is no small tribute to the writer's art to say that never once during the reading of these three hundred odd pages does the interest slacken.

THE TEACHINGS OF TOLSTOY.†

The task of discovering what Tolstoy came to know or believe in regard to the meaning of human life and the universe is fascinating, arduous, at times perplexing if not a little exasperating. Mr. Bolton Hall, a devoted student of the master, says in the introduction to his expressive collection "Anyone may reject Count Tolstoy's teaching, no one can ignore it, his doctrine is dynamic, revolutionary, fatal if false, a message of peace if true." The matter is by no means so simple. One may readily accept Tolstoy's central and essential faith or vision, not finding it at all revolutionary. One may be often exceedingly dissatisfied with the way in which he develops it or applies it to immediate issues and problems. The trouble of many of us is not over the acceptance or rejection of Tolstoy, but over the fact that having seen a great light he cannot serenely and steadily follow the gleam and let us go calmly and gladly in his wake. He stops again and again to argue, like a theological controversialist or a politician, about that initial vision which we do not question at all. The over-emphasis and repetition become wearisome and painful, as in the book, "On Life," which Mr. Hall has so faithfully summarised in the first part of his work. And when Tolstoy recovers from the passion for argument about what we do not want to argue, and proceeds to work out his intuitive philosophy, he does not carry us so far as we hoped and he has not the poise, ecstasy, and power of revelation that we expected. His leading is not as definite as his light.

He is at some pains to show that the essence of the vision and gospel of the great world-teachers—the Founder of Christianity, Buddha, Zoroaster, Lao-tze, etc.—is similar, though the forms and accompaniments may differ. This is unquestionable. And one cannot believe that anybody deeply versed in Hindu, Buddhist, Hermetic, Esoteric mystical Christian, neo-Platonist and kindred philosophy would find the great Russian in the least degree revolutionary. The core of his teaching is of dateless age. He expresses at one stage his belief that he is older than recorded time, that, adopting a phrase from the "Bhagavad Gita," he never was not and never shall cease to be meaning, of course, the diviner self, the eternal consciousness within him, and not the transient actor, the animal man or personal self. But save on rare occasions he cannot quite transcend this personal mundane self. The Tolstoy who became a seer was more plagued than he knew by the memory of the Tolstoy who was not a seer. He often argued with his own past when he thought he argued with contemporaries who did not see the light that had come to him. If he could have put away from his everyday consciousness the disturbing thought of his faults and

Photo by ANNAN.

Mr. Frederick Niven.

* "Ellen Adair" By Frederick Niven 6s (Eveloigh Nash)

† "What Tolstoy Taught" Edited by Bolton Hall 6s (Chatto & Windus)

folies, the years he had wasted, and gone onward joyously to let his enkindled self, his exalted consciousness realise itself and give forth its tidings, he would have proved a more fruitful and convincing prophet.

So he is like and unlike the great teachers. He affords beautiful gleams of higher truth, but he lacks serenity, steadiness, sureness, and consistency. He falls too often from the plane of enlightenment to that of argument. The great seers unfold what they see and know. They do not argue. We may not always be able to follow them because we have not succeeded in developing anything equal to their faculty of spiritual sight. However we have realised something of the Way that leads to the Truth or part thereof. But we know what Tolstoy often forgets, that the further progress is a question of interior development, not mere argument. We cannot be argued into (that soul state called) the Kingdom of Heaven. We must grow, suppressing or shedding or keeping strictly as a garb or vehicle—the mundane personal self.

Tolstoy late in life discovered the limitations and the illusion incidental to the animal man—the everyday mundane personality. He came to possess a sense of the higher individuality which is timeless. But apparently he did not realise more than a little of its wonder and its mystical deities. He has made the mistake not unfamiliar in mystical or rather psychic history of assuming that an accession of supernatural light or vision is the very radiance of absolute divinity. He scarcely realised that on the psychic and spiritual plane souls must still go on labouring, discovering, achieving. The added gleam is not the All. In my Father's House there are many mansions.

The second part of Mr. Bolton Hall's collection consists of citations from Tolstoy on a medley of issues and interests. They show his occasional confusion as well as his vision and insight. It is manifestly impossible to consider even their salient aspects in a review of this character. It is a varied and complicated study, for great and wise on so many lines, Tolstoy sometimes palpably misinterprets or distorts truths till he makes them seem preposterous. 'The command resist not evil' for example. The real meaning is doubtless resist not evil. That is to say, do not become obsessed by passion and hatred thereof, for these are blinding, vitiating and mean spiritual deterioration and ineffectiveness. But fight and remove the evil calmly and scientifically, keeping your soul serene through the whole process. This is like the Hindu philosophy of "detachment," so nobly enunciated in the "Bhagavad Gita."

Mr. Bolton Hall's introduction and selection form a worthy work that is really needed. They do not wholly explain Tolstoy—the great writer himself does not succeed in doing so. The main material, however, makes for thought and enlightenment, and some of it is peculiarly valuable to-day. But to know the Russian teacher well we have need to go at times from Tolstoy to the masters of Tolstoy, who saw more surely and steadily than he.

W. P. RYAN.

HARRIET HOSMER.*

Nowadays one does not often hear the name of Harriet Hosmer, American sculptor of the nineteenth century. One hears more of St. Gaudens or even W. W. Story, her compatriots and fellow workers in the classic style. Yet Harriet Hosmer in her day enjoyed a reputation that in many respects transcended theirs. She is represented in the United States by some big public works, mammoth statues of notable personalities (Lincoln was one of them), and by some imaginative statuary that made the critics of the time lift up their eyes in admiration. Perhaps a little of the admiration was due to the fact that the sculptor was a woman. Some of the criticisms in these memoirs are as much compliments to her sex as to her art. It was a more wonderful thing, in the 'sixties and 'seventies, than it would be now, that a woman should venture, let alone excel, and Miss Hosmer certainly ventured. At the age of twenty-two, she went to study in Rome, where she became the pupil of John Gibson, then at the height of his fame. The young, enthusiastic American girl was prepared to worship at his shrine. The English sculptor's ideals quickly became her own; she set herself to be, as he was, a faithful, unquestioning disciple of the Ancient Greeks. Rome henceforth was to her, as to him, the centre of the artistic universe, and a headquarters for life. An intimate friendship sprang up between master and pupil, unmarred by any arrière pensée; Gibson had dedicated his life to art, so had she. Her letters abound with respectfully affectionate references to her master, while to his 'dear little Hosmer' Gibson unburdens his soul as much as his dour, restrained character could permit. The latter's letters, by the way, in this volume emanate a warmth of feeling and appreciation of his brilliant pupil that contrasts rather strangely with the three brief and wholly non-committal references to her in his own autobiography.

* "Harriet Hosmer: Letters and Memories." Edited by Cornelia Carr. 12s. 6d. net. (John Lane.)

But Gibson was only one of many in her crowded life. Miss Hosmer's breezy outlook and her lively wit soon made her a welcome recruit to the English colony at Rome. She knew the Brownings before and after they became the talk of cultured society. Robert Browning addressed her as "dearest Hatty," and then correspondence leaves one with the impression that she helped materially to keep the lighter side of the poet's personality alive. Leighton, then a student in Rome, was of their circle; Mrs. Fanny Kemble she had known in America and frequently corresponded with. Mrs. Anna Jameson, Sir Henry Layard, Gladstone, Sir Charles and Lady Eastlake, were but a few of those who never came and went without visiting her studio. The Crowned Heads who favoured her included the late King Edward, then Prince of Wales. "I think he will make a good king," wrote the sculptor naively in 1901, "because he has got two of my statues." To follow her social progress would require a volume, enough that the ramifications of the Rome 'set' extended so far and her personal popularity was so great, that when she visited England she was feted as if she had been a foreign monarch or an important municipal council. One may read the secret of her social popularity and her artistic success in her letters. They are singularly free from any note of bitterness, querulousness or uncharitableness. She is bright, whimsical, humorous, interesting—sometimes chastened, but never doleful. These qualities added to an undoubted talent for the then popular style of sculpture explain her vogue. The book is delightful reading for the light it throws on the dilettante Society that pilgrimaged to Rome, and for its intimate glimpses of notable figures in nineteenth century art and literature.

F. J. M.

THE OLDER UNIVERSITIES.*

It is scarcely to be expected that so complicated a question as University Reform could ever be satisfactorily determined in one volume. Mr. Tillyard attempts here both history and prophecy, or rather suggestion. He approaches the subject with accurate knowledge and sound judgment. It is, of course, in the very nature of Reform that it should be continuous and progressive. No live institution can ever stand still, and it is impossible that what is sufficient for one generation can altogether satisfy the next. Conclusion, however, would be more decisive, and less difficult, if we were all agreed about our aim.

The danger of idealism everywhere to-day is its strong leaning towards adaptability. Whether the main object of a university be teaching or learning (and authorities on this point remain diametrically opposed), it may direct its energies towards either on different lines. At every stage of education we may be more, or less, disinterested we may pursue knowledge for its own sake or in the quest of fitness for life, which covers more than mere wage-earning. Mr Tillyard appears to us not always conscious of the distinction. At any rate he fails to emphasize the unique supremacy of our older universities, which, unlike the new, may not wholly concentrate themselves on efficient training. He assumes as an Ideal—the teaching which busy men want.

* "A History of University Reform, from A.D. 1800 to the Present Time, with suggestions towards a complete scheme for the University of Cambridge." By A. I. Tillyard. 10s. net. (Heffer.)

Remembering this qualification, however, we may go far with him in retrospect and anticipation. He has explained, with a sure touch, many points often misunderstood concerning the mighty battles of olden time. He shows us how those strangely allied yet independent institutions—the university and her colleges—have grown to maturity, side by side, engaged apparently in one object, yet often acquiring interests which have proved stubbornly antagonistic. He traces the progress of education and finance, from their simple curriculum and single chest to all the multiplicity of boards and bursars by which they are now controlled. He summarises the various measures of Reform—often more far reaching in effect than design—by which Parliament has striven to put our House in Order, and regulate, by legislation, our management of a great National Trust.

Despite prejudice, backsliding, and the powerful drag of vested interests, it is a record of which every Englishman has a right to be proud. Oxford and Cambridge have moved with the times without sacrificing their heritage. They are still Centres of Light.

The question of what should be done next remains uncertain. Here Mr Tillyard is greatly daring and eminently practical. He has ready for us a complete, but elastic, system of universal economy for students, an attractive scheme for the raising of all salaries for teachers, a bold measure for unification in authority, instruction, executive, and finance. He faces the problem of the non-resident.

Undoubtedly his numerous suggestions merit very careful attention—but as we have indicated already, they fail—like his criticism—by not recognising any ideal beyond the creation of an efficient teaching machine. We may become that, but we must remain something else.

R. BRIMLEY JOHNSON.

THE CORYSTON FAMILY.*

"There was only one comfortable chair in the room, and Lady Coryston never sat in it. Here, in a sentence, you have the title-character in Mrs. Humphry Ward's new novel, and a happy example of the author's gift for hitting off in a few unforgettable words the personalities of her characters. Sometimes there is a pleasant echo of a past jeu d'esprit, as in a remark of the disinherited son of Lady Coryston, in reference to his brother James. 'But nobody could be as wise as you look.' The portraits of the Prime Minister's wife and the Radical Chancellor are bitten in with acid. There is no doubt that Mrs. Humphry Ward retains her unique power of fixing her reader's interest. It is a power that is felt by us all, however much we may agree in or dissent from the author's particular thesis. The particular thesis in the present case seems to be that "other things matter more than politics—especially to women", or that "tyranny is not good for man or woman either." The choice depends rather upon your own political, social or religious point of view. Consideration will possibly compel some readers to the conclusion that if Mrs. Humphry Ward has set out to satirise the suffragette, or condemn the newer spirit in the trend of social, political or religious affairs, she leaves an impression more favourable on the whole than antagonistic to the new order of things. But whatever your point of view, whatever your more serious conclusion, you will not, once you have opened the book, put it down unread, for the story is endued with the vivacity, the charm, the arrestiveness that we have come to look for and to admire in all that Mrs. Humphry Ward writes, and to those who are her admirers it will be quite unnecessary to state that no outline of the plot could possibly convey any adequate idea of the hold of the story upon the sympathy and the imagination of the appreciative reader. The family whose fortunes we follow consists of Lady Coryston, representative of the "Matina potestas", her three sons, and one daughter. Lady Coryston has been left in uncontrolled possession of the immense estates of her late husband, and of all the family traditions. Her first born, Corry, who is like his mother, though "with a difference"—he becomes a Socialistic agitator—really loves her better than do the others. He is a splendidly-drawn character. The favourite son, Arthur, falls in love, unhappily, with the daughter of the unspeakable Chancellor. The other son, James, hardly counts. The daughter, Marcia, drives a High Churchman into religious celibacy through an embittered dispute over the divorce question, but finds happiness elsewhere. She is a charming girl. The house divided against itself in life, is brought into partial reconciliation just prior to the mother's death. Individual readers will necessarily differ in their judgment of the book, but one is perfectly safe in saying that it will not be the least popular nor the least remembered of the author's studies of contemporary life.

* "The Coryston Family" By Mrs. Humphry Ward 6s (Smith, Elder)

W. F. A.

EVERYBODY'S BOOKS.*

We have twenty-four new volumes added to "Everyman's Library" this autumn, another eighteen to the cheap and popular re-issue of Bohn's Library, another five volumes of the "Home University Library" series, and a dozen of the equally handy and useful "People's Books." It is too late in the day to eulogise Bohn. To those of us who are unfortunately, getting middle-aged, his volumes were a familiar boon in the days when cheap books cost more, as a rule, than we are asked to pay for them now, and, carefully re-edited and re-issued at less than a third of their original price, they will be as great a boon to-day to the new generation of readers. They are well printed, strongly and neatly bound, and, by the time the series is finished, will include practically all the great books of the past that are essential to the scholar's and to the book-lover's library. These eighteen give you Fanny Burney's early "Diary," Ranke's "History of the Popes," Carlyle's "French Revolution," Mignet's "French Revolution," "Marcus Aurelius," two more volumes of Emerson, Trollope's "Barchester Towers," and "The Warden," "Fiddlers," "Tom Jones," Montaigne's "Essays," and Mrs. Jameson's "Shakespeare's Heroines."

With the four-and-twenty latest additions, Mr. Dent's great enterprise reaches a total of six hundred and sixty-four volumes. Some of the most attractive books in the new bundle are "A Century of English Essays," a well-selected anthology compiled and introduced by Mr. Ernest Rhys; "Dostoevsky's Letters from the Underworld and Other Tales," a further volume of Ibsen's plays, containing "The Pretenders," "Pillars of Society," and "Rosmersholm"; "Rousseau's Essays," "Balzac's Lost Illusions," with an admirable Introduction by Professor Saintsbury; "Neale's Fall of Constantinople," G. W. Russell's "Life of Gladstone," "Swedenborg's Divine Providence," an Encyclopedia in twelve volumes—a very full, concise and serviceable work of reference—and a re-issue of Madame Calderon de la Barca's more than half-forgotten "Life in Mexico" for which Mr. Henry Baerlein has written an interesting Preface, in which he gives us a biography of the author and bears testimony

* "Everyman's Library" 24 Vols. 1s net each (Dent) —
"Bohn's Popular Library" 18 Vols. 1s net each (Bell) —
"The Home University Library" 5 Vols. 1s net each (Williams and Norgate) —
"The People's Books" 12 Vols. 6d net each (Jack) to the truth and value of this record of her experiences in a distressful but fascinating country. Mr Ernest Rhys' "Century of English Essays" ranges from Caaton to Stevenson, and includes a round dozen by living writers. It is no use to talk of omissions. We would sacrifice two of Leigh Hunt's four for one by Alexander Smith, and one by Matthew Brown, but there is to be a second volume, and until we get that we have no right to be anything but thankful for a catholic and thoroughly representative first selection.

The "Home University Library" and the "People's Books" are in a sense the complement of the other two series. In the latter you may buy reprints of Coleridge, Goethe, Kant, and Shelley, and in the former obtain new books dealing critically and biographically with those authors. To the "People's Books," Mr A. D. Lindsay contributes a scholarly monograph on Kant's "Philosophy." Professor Herford a sound, lucid, and informing study in little of Goethe, and Mr S. I. Benson an adequate sketch of the poetry, philosophy, and baffling personality of Coleridge. It disquiets you a little to find him in his preface linking together Coleridge and Southey as poets who, "outside the ranks of professed students of poetry, are no longer read." Southey was a finer man than Coleridge, but a poet he never walked on the same level with him, and nobody is to be reproached for reading his verse no longer. There is, however nothing to fear, if Mr Benson seems to over-value the poetry of Southey at the outset, he does not under-value that of Coleridge. He does not attempt to gloss the errors of Coleridge's life, but writes of them with sympathy and understanding, and as a brief introduction to a study of Coleridge his book is as interesting and helpful a thing as one could desire. Others in this seventh dozen of the "People's Books" that will appeal particularly to the general reader are Mr M. M. C. Calhrops on "The Crusades," Mr W. T. Waugh's on "The Monarchy and the People," Professor Hearnshaw's on "England in the Making" (a brilliantly brief survey that is at once good history and good reading), an excellent account of "The Stock Exchange" and its functions, by Mr J. F. Wheeler, and an acute, but impartial, consideration of "Spiritualism and Psychical Research," by Mr J. Arthur Hill who is neither a spiritualist nor a sceptic, but keeps an open mind on the subject and states and weighs the evidence for and against in the best judicial spirit.

The "Home University Library" arrives at its eightieth volume with these new five, and each one of the new five is a real acquisition to the series. One feels a certain diffidence in praising "Euripides and His Age," because it is by Professor Gilbert Murray, and his name on such a book says more to commend it than could the needless commendation of critics, most of whom, on such a subject, stand towards him as pupils towards their master. Equally authoritative in their widely different ways are Mr Ancrum Williams' lucid and timely exposition of "Co-Partnership and Profit Sharing," Professor Fraser Harris' study of "Nerves," and his practical hints to those and they include most of us nowadays who are troubled with them, and "The Ocean," in which Sir John Murray gives a general account of the science of the sea. To the literary student, and to those who are interested in the great democratic movements of our own time, we especially recommend of these five Professor Murray's "Euripides and His Age" and Mr H. N. Brailsford's striking and masterly little book on "Shelley, Godwin and Their Circle." You might say of Shelley, Godwin, Tom Paine, and other great rebels who figure in Mr Brailsford's pages, what Professor Murray says of Euripides. As a thinker he is even to this day, treated almost as a personal enemy by scholars of orthodox and conformist minds, defended, idealised and sometimes transformed beyond recognition by various champions of rebellion, and the free intellect. No apostle of freedom has been more misrepresented and maligned than Tom Paine, and Mr Brailsford's record of his career does noble justice to a man who was almost quixotically honest and idealistic. Mr Brailsford sketches vividly the influence of the French Revolution on Shelley's and Godwin's England, he marshals and summarises his facts very skilfully, and his knowledge and breadth of vision, and the charm and strength of his style, make his book an authentic contribution to literature.

S. J.

THE MORNING'S WAR *

There is always something heart-breaking about perfect beauty, and Mr Montague's book exquisitely hurts. The constant keenness of its spirit is alone accusatory, like 'the reproachful purity of early dawn', and as the pages flash unconquerably the reader is found fallible—perhaps even to the extent of meanly, mutely, hankering for something, slurred or blurred, or second-rate, or padded. No use! The pace holds. There is no marking-time anywhere. In the whole of the book there isn't one ready-made phrase nor a single stock simulacrum stuck in to stand for a thing seen, faces, places, moods and motives, are all realised anew, with a pledged integrity that never wearies or fails. And thus realism is ruthless, just because it finds nothing but good. The world we had been dozing through so cosily, complaining of so complacently, turning the results of our own mistakes into martyrdoms and blaming the blotches in our sight on the scene, becomes imperatively positive, a challenge we can't refuse willy nilly, pride pricking us, we have to bestir ourselves, waken and prepare to do something adequate. And the aboriginal slug-a-bed in the veins of us all whimpers resentfully. It was much peacefuller to be a blind man receiving alms passively, sighing self-pity for our handicap, than to have the shield plucked away and be shown we can see perfectly and are as fit for a good day's work as any man. "The Morning's War" does that. Of all the books published this year, whether in verse or in prose it is by far the most sensually beautiful, and yet (though 'and therefore' would be nearer the mark) much the most ascetic.

And, indeed, the central situation is itself the supreme ascetic one of that battle between love and religion which is the concentration and symbol of all the countless lesser daily human skirmishes between desire and duty. June Hathersage, a radiant Catholic of the sort that makes saints and martyrs loves Aubrey, a most love-worthy pagan. But Aubrey, as he discovers after their love has interlocked, is the son of a Catholic priest who has broken his vows—the very result of that fracture. In June's eyes, therefore (so he feels, humbly worshipful), he must seem, when she knows, a live profanity, an incarnated affront to all she holds highest, an ambassador laden with insults to her Cause. She cannot come to him now (so he argues, alone) without deserting her own best, without compromise. 'He entered, he thought he was entering, into June's steadfast horror of him as he was, he heard it like music, it had the mounting, passionate urgency of some great strain drawn out on violins, one long importunate scaling of illimitable height, he saw it as a preternatural spire that never ceased to reach up further at the retreating sky.' Not from him, certainly, must come the tragic statement of alternatives that might make her yield to human tenderness, desert her faith's pinnacle, and lessen the distance between them by descending. Her heights may seem artificial erections to him, but none the less they give the best of her foothold, they keep her spirit poised at its highest pitch. Here, it may be, in this refusal of Aubrey's to let the woman make the choice for herself, there is some narrowing and specialisation of the motive. It sounds, perhaps, like psychological ingenuity. I confess I don't feel that it belongs indivisibly to the book. The Aubrey who would have let June solve the problem for herself, confident or careless of her consistency, would not have been the son of his father, the unfrocked priest, made newly and morbidly conscious of the driving force of desire.

* "The Morning's War" By C. E. Montague 6s (Methuen)

—and of the unhuman abhorrence of the faithful for their traitors. It was for just this suppression that he was born and bred; it is just this suppression, in its turn, that produces the rapid drama of the last six chapters. And of these chapters two alone (XXIV. and XXVI.) would justify any means employed to make them. XXV is the garden-scene where Aubrey plays Iscariot to desire XXVI, trimmed and trowelled by a poisoned dagger snatched up hastily (and yet no instrument less humbly horrible could have done the work desired) is a breathless switchback from sunlight to the very swamps of death and up again to the topmost cairn of living Aubrey, wounded mortally, learns from June's lips that her creed lies much nearer to his honest earth than he had dreamed, Aubrey, wounded mortally, in the moment of that discovery, defeats the creeping poison in his veins. We get, that is to say, the three most powerful forces in man's universe playing simultaneously upon these two perfect human instruments—and as chord curves after chord, interweaving and augmenting, the artist's utterance follows the mounting emotions infallibly till it soars at length, to hang sustained until the curtain softly completes it, into this unforgettable crescendo.

"He looked up at June. They had come through, unbroken, they had not squared fate, they had each kept pride clean, to bring to the other. And no poor life was ahead, romance had begun it, romance it would be, not the old farfaring romance of the cheering lists and the sun on the plumes—the trumpeting boys' paradise and the unassayed girl's—but romance strung afresh to the pitch of the grown strength of women and men, even of woman and man, the unmanned unit the two-chambered heart of the race, the twin-power-house of desire and will, the romance of new harder, unpraised feats to do, of dark places to traverse without any fairy lamp in the hand, of glamorous risks to affront of all the flintier flints that there were for steeper steel to strike the old fire from."

Even in isolation it is a passage that whips the mind. Reached in due order, at the close of the book, the clear resolution of its themes, it exerts, on the reader, an almost dedicatory power, pledging him to old virtues anew. For by that time the book's method has given him a clairvoyant consciousness of the transforming power of pure, glamourless sight. He has seen musty habitual things turned into marvels and splendours by the sheer honesty of the eye of the artist and the integrity of his uncompromising hand. It is another application of the main meaning of the tale. Integrity, in the story, wins a hard victory—and then finds that the prize of the conquest is the very gift it had longingly forgone, and that it could have been gained in no other way. And absolute integrity, in the workmanship, gains the very gorgeousness to which extravagance was supposed to be the only key. It is a wonderful book—this note on it is quite inadequate. I do not think I forget anything that nineteen-thirteen has given us—the new Wells, the new Galsworthy, 'Androcles,' "Sons and Lovers"—when I say that it seems to me the noblest work of imagination of the year—the wisest in conviction, the clearest in perception, the most scrupulous in aim, and, in technical accomplishment, immeasurably most exacting and exquisite.

DIXON SCOTT

IN LATIN AMERICA.*

Mr Forrest has already illustrated at least one other book on adjacent regions, he is primarily an artist, and in this volume the very numerous drawings give an impression of wood-cuts. In books on tropical countries the rather glaring results of the three-colour process are sometimes much more appropriate than the average reader supposes, but when one comes to deal with buccancers there is no comparison in the advantage of wood-cuts or pictures which resemble them. And the novelty of a whole book thus illustrated—and not in the inky coloured pictures or with photographs—lends a great attraction to this volume. The whole of South America would, indeed, be too great for proper treatment in one book, and there are parts which Mr. Forrest merely skirts, and other parts which he omits.

* "A Tour through South America." By A. S. Forrest. 20s. 6d. net. (Stanley Paul).—"The Southland of North America." By George Palmer Putnam. 10s. net. (Putnam.)

altogether. Yet we must be grateful for what we receive. The chapters, for example, on Paraguay are singularly fascinating. "There is little life," he tells us, "in the rugged streets of Asuncion at any hour of the day in normal times, but during the early mornings, when a revolution is in progress, a few dogs, cats and fowls have undisturbed possession of the thoroughfares." Mr Forrest makes no attempt at what is called "fine writing," but he continually interests us.

Mr Putnam also refrains from attitudes. He describes what he saw during a brief but crowded tour of some of the Central American republics. This is a much shorter and slighter book than Mr Forrest's. It covers in part the same ground as Mr Frederick Palmer's "Central America," but it is an amusing chronicle. He tells us that since the Palmer interview, Manuel Estrada Cabrera, Guatemala's famous tyrant, has refused himself to such ordeals, but surely Mr Putnam is wrong when he asserts that two attempts have been made upon Cabrera's life. We were told that sixty and six is more like the number. A great deal of ingenuity has to be displayed, because the President has for two years not been seen in public, and the knowledge of electrical contrivances, with which we hear some of the latest attempts have been made, is not yet sufficiently advanced in Guatemala. The tyrant has moulded himself upon Porfirio Diaz, it would have been interesting if his views on present Mexican affairs could be ascertained. The probability is that after Cabrera's death there will be an upheaval in his fertile but unhappy country, and that the Monroe doctrine will actively assert itself. In the Central American states either civilization is at such an ebb that one can only hope the Americans will speedily adopt them, or else, as in Salvador and especially Costa Rica, the civilization is more advanced, there is industry and prosperity, so that the interference of Uncle Sam will probably be much slighter, since his energetic sons will have fewer opportunities. By the way, there is a delightful account, from the lips of a Costa Rican lady, of how she was wooed and married by a "Mashar," that is to say, an American, though she had vowed never to have one of his restless nation. "Well, he sit near an' eat his soup. I see him look at me. I look again, he is not eat his meat. Next I look an' smile—so leetle. He does not eat his enseleda." Mr Himmel, the patriarchal German, who fell from the sky on to Cornito years ago when there was no Cornito, and where now is one of Nicaragua's comparatively busy ports with a real wharf and so forth, is only one of the queer personages whom Mr Putnam encountered. And since it is troublesome to visit Central America, and all books on those parts are pleasant reading, and likewise for its own modesty and merits, we are glad to have his souvenirs of travel. The illustrations, in this case, are from photographs, and include a view of the celebrated relief map at Guatemala City, and of the astounding Temple of Minerva, which the half-caste tyrant, with his severely classic taste, has presented to his countrymen.

HENRY BAIRIEN

KATE DOUGLAS WIGGIN'S NEW BOOK.*

Those of us who have found so many friends in Kate Douglas Wiggin's former books, will hasten to welcome this opportunity of meeting Waitstill Baxter, and the little group of people who are most nearly concerned in making-up her life. In her usual fresh and fascinating style—with its tenderness and power and delicious humour so skilfully blended—the author tells us the story of Waitstill, Waitstill, with the quaint name, beautiful face, and the undaunted courage, spending her girlhood's days cleaning, and scrubbing and sewing and baking, and looking after her father's farm and mothering her step-sister, Patience. Their father, Deacon Baxter, whose "extraordinary, unbelievable, colossal meanness" is common talk in the village, has a farm at the top of Town.

* "The Story of Waitstill Baxter." By Kate Douglas Wiggin. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

House Hill, and a stores shop at the bottom by the Edgewood Bridge that crosses the Saco River. The first short chapter of the book is a little gem of descriptive work, deftly placing before our mind's eye the scenes and times among which Waitstill is presently to move. There is a wonderful sense of time and space conveyed in these opening pages of the story, as they tell of the varied sights and scenes that the river has witnessed in its journey from its source in the granite hills of New Hampshire, through vales and fragrant brakes and woods, flowing on its way under the Edgewood Bridge watching and listening, then hurrying on towards the sea with its story of to-day that will sometime be the history of yesterday. Deacon Baxter has married and buried three wives, for his bullying and nagging and meanness make it well-nigh impossible for anyone to stand him for long. Waitstill is the daughter by his second wife, and Patience the daughter by his third wife—who has been dead some seven years when Waitstill reaches her twenty-first year. "You've got more courage than ever I had," the third Mrs. Baxter said on her death-bed, to the weeping Waitstill. "Don't you s'pose you can stiffen up and defend yourself a little mite?" Your father ought to be opposed, for his own good but I've never seen anybody that dared do it." The step-sisters are devoted to each other, and gay seventeen-year-old Patience is all impatient for laughter and girlish pleasure of which she gets hardly any at all. But Deacon Baxter's opinion of girls in general, and his daughters in particular, is very poor. "I never saw anything like the girls nowadays," he says. "Highty-tighty, flauntin', traipsin', triffin' trollops, ev'ry one of 'em, that's what they are." The story has a strong love interest, and the book is full of delightful character studies. We wait anxiously, longing for someone to "oppose" Deacon Baxter, and at length—but it is all so good and so enjoyable that it is not fair to Waitstill, nor the Deacon, to say nothing of the author or the reader, to "tell what happens in the end." One who has read and enjoyed the book from beginning to end can only advise those less fortunate to get a copy of "Waitstill Baxter" at the earliest possible moment.

THE NEW MAN *

Nowadays the publisher considerably offers upon the wrapper of his book a concise resume of what the reader ought to discover within. Most people like a lead, even the critic sometimes finds it useful. We are informed that in this book Mr. Gibbs "presents a very intimate psychological study of a new type in English life reveals under his searchlight the new problems which have arisen among us owing to the temperament of this type, in its relation with women, in its home life, and in its moral attitude. He devotes a chapter to the Education of the New Man" and he searches the soul of his type in a study called "The Religion of the New Man." "The book is a graphic portrayal of many phases of modern life as seen by a journalist. It is instructive and challenging."

There is really a great deal of truth in this attractive declaration. The book is "challenging," though it is not, to my mind, quite so "instructive." A chapter is "devoted" to the Education of the New Man, and the book is written by a "graphic journalist." Now that is just the trouble with it. It contains swift flashes of brilliancy, but it is just graphic journalism embroidered upon some well-stated generalisations. And the opinions set forth in the book are not unified, they preserve a general point of view, but the sections seem to have been written more to develop the theme of each separately than with relation to the plan of the whole volume. The result is that there appears to be a great deal more significance in each section than in the book as a whole. But it is good reading, witty and crisp. Mr. Gibbs thinks England is changing very greatly, and on the whole, one gathers, changing for the worse. The summing up is contained in a query. "Is it possible that out of all this new tenderness and sensibility, out of all this seething turmoil of unsatisfied desires, . . . this rebellion against authority and discipline, . . . there may be evolved another Nation, built upon a wiser, better scheme of things . . . ?" and in the answer, "Yes, by miracle . . . but otherwise we must expect all this discontent with life, all this feverish quest of pleasure, all this shirking of discipline and duty, will lead to some great national disaster which will shock us to the very foundations of our social system." But is there no hope, Mr. Gibbs? Yes, the New Boy may save us. The Boy Scout is our one hope. "If he fails us we are finished." So ends a lively, readable book, a very excellent piece of "graphic journalism."

* "The New Man. A Portrait Study of the Latest Type." By Philip Gibbs. 3s 6d net (Pitman)

F M A

A PICTURE OF RUSSIA.*

We all know the usual polite Academy pictures—the landscapes that resemble a railway company's advertisements, or (in Mr. Shaw's lively words) the familiar portraits of masters of hounds, in cheerfully unmistakable pink coats, mounted on bright chestnut horses. No one would dream of associating them with any serious revelation of truth or criticism of life. They are merely pictures of what comfortable, well-fed people like to imagine that life is like. They belong to the land where it is always after dinner, and the artist—playwright, painter, poet, or historian—who produces them prettily enough is sure of all the patronage that Bayswater can bestow.

The Academy picture has its equivalent among books, and especially among books describing the life of foreign countries. The comfortable citizen demands that his illusions shall be respected in politics, in history, and even in geography. In particular he demands that Russia shall be shown him as the Russia of his imagination, fond or otherwise. He is not sure about Germany. Germany is too new yet to have made a fixed impression, but Russia—everybody knows what Russia is like! Mr. Alexinsky is not out to preserve such illusions in this present volume. Indeed, he does not concern himself with illusions of any kind, his business being solely to tell the story of his country in such a way as will clearly inform the intelligent foreigner what the Russia of to-day is like in all its aspects. He has succeeded completely, and his book is a model of its kind. It is more than informing—it is fascinating, and it should do much to evict the academic or melodramatic Russia from the British popular mind.

Russia has always lent itself to the unreal, sophisticated picture, because, though with us in Europe, it is not of us; it is all so strange and bizarre, with the glitter of unformed autocracy against a background of fur-clad sleigh-drivers, snowy streets, and coloured churches that look like mosques. True, there is the other side—there is the Nihilist, the knout, and Siberia, but even these grim facts are, to the general Englishman, merely properties or a change of scene in a melodrama, as much a part of the illusion as a beautiful virgin martyr and a handsome pagan lover in a story of first-century Rome. The real picture of Russia, as the readers of Mr. Alexinsky's closing section on literature will be reminded, is that moving picture to which the great Russian writers have all contributed something. We have already dwelt, ourselves, in these columns, upon the peculiar interpretative power of the Russian artists, and Londoners have had, in the recent Russian opera season, yet another glimpse of this national revelation. Such a work as Moussorgsky's "La Khovantchina" could have come from no country but Russia. It is genuine autochthonous art, the product of purely Russian emotions and conditions, and wholly impatient of that kind of transmutation that enables the amorous tenor in Verdi's "Ballo in Maschera" to be called indifferently Gustavus III., or the Count of Warwick, or the Duke of Olivares, and the scene to be placed, as the manager wills, in Naples or Boston or Madrid. We do not wish to make any comparisons that are unkind or unfair, but when we turn from this interpretation of Russia by means of a Russian story in Russian words set to Russian music, to find some British story in British music interpreting the spirit of Britain, our memories encounter nothing but the "Children of Don", and, oh! the difference to us!

* "Modern Russia." By Gregor Alexinsky. Translated by Bernard Miall. 15s net (Fisher Unwin.)

Obviously a country that has this intense nationality deserves more than casual study, and intelligent people will be glad of such a book as the present, which gives them the facts that the artists leave out. Statistics, however startling, are not properly dramatic, and though they may be as true as a proposition of Euclid, they do not belong to the order of truth with which poetry is concerned. Mr. Alexinsky, in one sense, handles his facts as if they were fictions, for no one could desire to read a volume with more varied and sustained interest. He presents a real, vital, unsophisticated Russia, not a polished Academy composition, with the even lights and the swept and garnished air of the studio. Not, indeed, that he sets out to make our flesh creep. His book is not a manifesto. He conceals nothing, but he sets nothing down in malice, as we shall presently illustrate. He deals with facts, and his knowledge and literary skill are so happily combined that the book is both an indispensable encyclopædia and a collection of vastly readable essays.

It is history and criticism in one—as all good history must be. A hundred pages of introduction makes the reader clearly acquainted with the general course of Russian development, and the author then passes to a well-arranged review of the existing institutions and conditions, closing with a sketch of modern Russian literature and its illustrations of Russian life. The book is so thoroughly up-to-date as to include a reference to the shooting of the workmen in the northern gold-mines, and so comprehensive as to include all phases of public activity, yet nothing could be more unlike a dull, professional treatise, on the one hand, or a lurid journalistic sketch on the other.

That it is an illuminating commentary upon all the allusions of Russian literature and journalism is to be expected, but it illustrates other matters of general interest, not specifically Russian. When haughty young gentlemen preach to us about the revival of aristocracy and the necessity of keeping the herd in subjection, it may be worth our while to recall the conditions of Russian life in the mid-nineteenth century, when aristocracy could exhibit all its qualities without let or hindrance. Perhaps, some day, we too may emerge upon the higher plane of herd-control, and be able to solve the servant problem as one proprietor did in 1852, by keeping a peasant woman chained for five years to a post in the kitchen, or to amuse ourselves, as a certain Prince did in 1850 by playing billiards with his friends while, as a sort of side-show, a young girl was whipped before the other female serfs, until the last sacraments had to be administered. Mr. Alexinsky is so far from taking sides that, after several pages of horrors, from which we have selected merely the first two examples in order, he proceeds to point out calmly the value of serfdom in certain aspects of Russian development. We cannot pretend to that degree of disinterestedness, but we are glad to be able to read his examples "Aristocracy" and "the herd" are large and vague abstractions.

It is well to have glimpses of these aspirations translated into crude fact
GEORGE SAMPSON.

AN ENGLISHWOMAN IN AMERICA *

Characteristically English and delightfully womanly is this frank, breezy, breathless, inconsequent commentary on the America of 1913. Mrs. Alec Tweedie tells us in her Preface that she has "purposely not read any book on America by anyone, not even by Dickens." That was a good plan, probably. She was able thus to see things more clearly for herself and to talk about them more freshly and naturally. Now that her book is written and published, however, it might divert her to compare it with the books of some of her predecessors in this field of literature with Mr. J. F. Muirhead's, for instance, "The Land of the Dollar," and Mr. William Archer's, "America to-day." These two volumes, published ten or twelve years ago, offer a peculiarly piquant contrast to her methods. Whereas Mrs. Alec Tweedie, like the lady in "The Egoist," throws out her remarks "for apprehension, not dissection," these two accurate and analytical Scotsmen will not be found to have penned a sentence by which they could take their stand in the witness-box. Logical, judicial, large-minded, and in a dryly humorous way epigrammatic, they show themselves (in the best sense of the word) as masculine as Mrs. Alec Tweedie, in her exuberant, impressionable, irresponsible way, is feminine. Whereas they are skilled and careful writers, who probably, like most men of letters, are less effective in speech, she strikes one as the born conversationalist—the arch-type of the agreeable rattle. Her book is one long, voluble, extraordinarily animated monologue. It is very easy and pleasant reading, but one feels that it would be pleasanter still vis à voce, with an accompaniment of infectious laughter. One has seen Mr. Archer's austere features relax, and one can imagine a twinkle in Mr. Muirhead's eye, but their books do not make us picture them, like Mrs. Alec Tweedie laughing infectiously.

Would her American readers catch the infection? It would be very interesting to know. If they did, if they showed a real, hearty enjoyment of all her observations and reflections, she would owe it to them to re-consider her principal verbiage upon them, reiterated throughout the

"I saw it." By Mrs. Alec Tweedie. 16s net (Hutchinson).

The Niagara Falls—Summer.

From "America as I Saw It," by Mrs. Alec Tweedie (Hutchinson).

volume and expressed with all the emphasis of capitals as the last line of the last page—thus

"HYPERSENSITIVENESS IS THE AMERICAN SIN"

For really, with all her genuine admiration for some aspects of the country and the people, she does manage to administer a wonderful number and variety of sharp pin-pricks! "I love America," she tells us, "her women, her oysters, her grape-fruit, her roses, her express elevators, and her quaint ways, her eager life, her kindness to the stranger within her gates, and dare I say it?—her serene satisfaction with all and everything American." Dare she say, it indeed! Some of her transatlantic readers will hold that she would dare to say anything! She dares to say that "American hustle is a myth", that in reality the Americans "show their slowness by not understanding how slow they are", that the American people are literally fed on headlines "which suggest nothing but insanity and criminality", that "America is not only the country of conventionality, but the country of fads." And here is a little example of what George du Maurier used to call "felicitous amenity" which perhaps will prove an even more trying test for the good humour of one section of her audience. "American women are delightfully entertaining, they talk all the time about their interests, their families, their homes, their aspirations—so all one has to do is to sit and listen."

But faithful are the wounds of a friend, and throughout the greater portion of her book Mrs. Alec Tweedie shows herself an affectionate and enthusiastic friend of her late hosts and hostesses. Did space permit, many cordial tributes to their charms and virtues might be quoted to counterbalance the above asperities. It is a book put together at odd moments, its author herself tells us, "often at lightning speed and under all sorts of circumstances and conditions." Naturally, it reflects the varying moods in which it was written, but they are for the most part the happy moods of a woman overflowing with vitality, interested in everything, and making friends with everybody. Not every English visitor to the New World could have established cordial relations with men so different as Edison, Mr. Pierpont Morgan, Mr. Roosevelt, Mr. Carnegie, and Mr. Bryce. She has interesting things to tell of them all. She asked a darkie once what he thought of Mr. Roosevelt. "I never knew any man make so many soapbuds and do so little washing," was the reply. To sum up—a very entertaining and stimulating book by a very English Englishwoman—a woman so English that if she lived in America for a hundred years she would not be assimilated by that "Land of Assimilation."

FREDERIC WHYTE

THE SOUL OF A SUFFRAGETTE.*

Seven stories, mostly quiet in tone but curiously natural and, to use a much abused term, real, make up Mr. W. L. Courtney's new volume. Most of the stories are suggested by a subject in which the author is, it would seem, keenly interested, though in one of them he expresses something like despair as to a mere man ever being able to deal adequately with that subject—the psychology of women. "No man of experience will ever say that he understands women. They are infinitely diverse, remember, as compared with men who are, for the most part, alike." This we are explicitly told in the second story, "It Once Might Have Been", but the idea underlies many of the episodes presented in musing analytical fashion. In the opening sketch we see a girl joining the modern army of martyrs, giving herself up fanatically to the cause which she has espoused, refusing the love which has come her way that she may prove herself worthy of that cause. She obeys the orders of headquarters, is sentenced to two years' hard labour, and leaves prison with nothing more than the pitiful career of a chronic invalid to which to look forward.

* "The Soul of a Suffragette, and other Stories." By W. L. Courtney. 6s. (Chapman & Hall.)

Mr. Courtney presents the simple story with something of the style of dignified tragedy, and muses over it in a philosophical spirit that is as far removed from "anti" intolerance as it is from "pro" fanaticism. "There is much waste in Nature and in Life. Wastefulness is indeed Nature's characteristic method in carrying out her evolutionary processes. Just as she squanders hundreds of acorns in order to produce a single oak, so, too, many human lives are sacrificed in the effort to secure an isolated reform. Who shall say, therefore, that fanatics are wrong or martyrs thrown away, in the great processes whereby Humanity or the Immanent Will works out its obscure destinies?" The understanding sympathy which underlies this is a characteristic of each of the stories, of those which successively tell of the actress who feels that she has sacrificed her art in her marriage, of the suffering victim of man's inhumanity to woman, of the lonely vicar happy in a sudden death, before the deterioration of which he is aware has become obvious, of the devoted Breton girl who gives herself in a Faust-like bargain that her English lover may win the success he covets. Though there is tragedy—not always of that sudden-death kind popularly understood by the term—in several of the stories, the general effect is that of a quiet reality, psychological rather than merely descriptive, and the whole book is one that will be read with interest and remembered.

FOLIAGE.*

The first, and almost the best, poem in his new book tells us something of Mr. Davies' way of work.

My mind has thunderstorms,
That brood for heavy hours
Until they rain me words,
My thoughts are drooping flowers
And sulking, silent birds.

Yet come, dark thunderstorms
And brood your heavy hours
For when you rain me words
My thoughts are dancing flowers
And joyful singing birds.

Other pieces in the book must have come to the poet midway between two thunderstorms. They do not lack a line or a verse good enough to excuse the poet's error in admitting them, such is the last verse of "Morning."

I see no Christ
Nailed on a tree,
Dying for sin,
No sin I see
No thoughts for sadness,
All thoughts for gladness."

but they abound in the faults to which Mr. Davies is peculiarly liable. Thus the charming poem that opens

"Sweet Stay-at-Home, sweet Well-Content,
Thou knowest of no strange continent
Thou hast not felt thy bosom keep
A gentle motion with the deep."

is lowered somewhat by the dulness and commonness of the phrase, "as far as eyes can go," and the dulness and looseness of two lines in his defence of "Sweet Well-Content, sweet Love-One-Place."

"For thou hast made more homely stuff Nurture thy gentle self enough."

Mr. Davies can be plain without being common, and loose yet expressive at the same time, but one who knew him only from this book might doubt it. There are too many lame or tame things like "That Pleasure life wakes stale at morn,"

and

"So will our love's root still be strong
When others think the leaves go wrong," too many places where the simplicity comes down to saying that in spring the birds "would rather sing than

"Foliage." Various Poems by William A. Davies. 2s. 6d. (Elkin Mathews.)

eat" and the sheep "would rather bleat"; where the concerts are merely conceits, as in

"The stars in ambush lie all day,
To take her glances for the night;"

where I am not glad to meet for a second or third time the idea of a nightingale singing amidst thunder, a duchess bathing in milk, a blind man finding his way in fog, a homeless man stirred by an organ, the softness and warmth of a woman's hair, and

"There's no true joy in gold,
It breeds desire for more"

I do not suggest that Mr Davies should try to remedy these things. He is free to be as plain, as loose as concerted, as extravagant, as his Maker likes. We must be patient while he writes like this

"Man is a bird
Eagles from mountain crag
Swooped down to prove his worth,
But now they rise to drag
Him down from Heaven to earth!"

For in the past this freedom has been one of his great advantages, and when his imagination was strongly moved it led him to some of the purest poetry. There is no reason to doubt that this will happen again. Several of the poems here would have been delightful had they not been echoes of more beautiful things in his other volumes.

Twice Mr Davies has paused in his career, but this pause is less than the first, which was in "New Poems" and it need give anxiety neither to him nor to his admirers.

EDWARD THOMAS

THE DAFFODIL FIELDS.*

Mr Masfield has now published four of those narrative poems which have not only brought him the recognition he had long deserved, but also helped to give poetry a vogue unprecedented in recent years. But as their number increases, it becomes no easier to pass adequate judgment on them. One ever lives in hope that the next example will either be a triumphant vindication of the method, or else justify the conservatism which hankers to condemn it as incapable of achieving that highest excellence.

Our suspense started with "The Everlasting Mercy." "The Widow in the Bye Street" was easily the best of the four, and may well take its place among the finest of English narrative poems. But even that did not quite carry our critical defences by storm as, considering the largeness and poignancy of its theme, it should have done. Nor did "Dauber," though it had unique excellences, settle the question. "The Daffodil Fields" leaves us still undecided.

Is it, one is bound to ask, that the poetry of democracy cannot rise above a certain level? For these poems may fairly be called democratic, not only because they deal with the annals of the poor—neither so short nor so simple as were dreamt of in the academic philosophy of Gray—but because they are written in a language and a spirit which can be appreciated without any special training or tradition, and should appeal to all not prejudiced against the art by its old exclusiveness. Hitherto most poetry dealing with humble life, Wordsworth's, Tennyson's, almost all, except Burns's, since the Middle Ages, has, however sympathetic, had exactly that implication of insult which exists in slumming and rescue work. Fortunately we are outgrowing that spirit. We begin to recognise that superiority and inferiority reside in individuals rather than classes. The way, therefore, is open for art of a more universal appeal. There is nothing wrong with poetry because it does not address itself to a specially prepared audience. The age is democratic, and its art will not be vital unless it is democratic too. If we have not yet had the great poet of democracy, we may hope with some confidence that he is to come.

Why Mr Masfield is not that poet is simply—so far as one can judge at present—that he is incapable of being so.

* "The Daffodil Fields." By John Masfield 3s 6d net. (Hememann.)

Photo by Hoppe

Mr. W. L. Courtney.

whose book of short stories "The Soul of a Suffragette" (Chapman and Hall) is reviewed on page 120

He lacks certain great qualities, and chiefly the well-knit strength which compels acceptance. There is a prolixity, sometimes a flaccidity, in his work which weakens its reality. It is rather futile to suggest that one poet's work were better done in the style of another whose habits of thought and of writing are entirely different. One realises that Mr Masfield needs space to get his effect of slow-moving time, but it is difficult to avoid considering what Mr Hardy, in a few grim pages, would have made of one of his themes, or how "The Daffodil Fields" and "The Everlasting Mercy" would have profited if their author's more molten imagination had been tempered by a little of the dry restraint of Mr Wilfred Wilson Gibson.

It shows of what real significance Mr Masfield's work is, that in reviewing it one instinctively finds it wanting by the highest standard rather than adequate by any lower, and that one is so readily drawn from the particular work in question to an estimate of his general achievement. "The Daffodil Fields" has the lyric beauty and dramatic poignancy of its predecessors. The recurrence of that special beauty of nature which gives the poem its recalls the recurrence of the sea in Swinburne's poetry. There are fine passages of description, and a yearning bull stands out as the most artistically presented of all the characters, as one having, moreover, a significance in the plot. The stanzas which describe his arrival among the cattle of the Plate River are a good example of Mr Masfield's vigorous draughtsmanship.

"There Lion landed with the bull, and there
The great beast raised his head and bellowed low
Challenging that expanse and that new air,
Trembling, but full of wrath and thunder-browed
Far from the daffodil fields and friends, but proud
His wild eye kindled at the great expanse
Two scraps of Shropshire lie they stood there, then advance

Was slow along the well-grassed cattle land,
But at the last an end was made, the brute
Ate his last bread-crust from his master's hand,
And snuffed the foreign herd and stamped his foot
Steers on the swelling ranges gave salute
The great bull bellowed back and Lion turned

The weakness of "The Daffodil Fields" is its ending. Mr. Masfield has sacrificed tragic reality to the show of tragedy. The modern discovery that inconclusive endings can be effective is liable to abuse. Tragedy has still room for climax. But the climax of "The Daffodil Fields" is too drastic. Neither reciprocal slaughter, nor sudden death from heart-break, are easily made convincing. And here it would have been possible and desirable to dispense with both. Surely the death of Michael alone would have been sufficient. Lion and Mary should have been left to a more deliberate fate. Mr. Masfield has allowed himself to be carried away by the idea of red death and white death among the green and gold of the daffodils. He has, therefore, attained to a rather spurious picturesqueness at the expense of the verisimilitude which the treatment of the poem as a whole demanded.

The superiority of "The Widow in the Bye Street" lies in the fact that the poem gradually rises, in an inevitable way, to a great height of beauty. In "The Everlasting Mercy" and "The Daffodil Fields," the author seems to have been able to reach equal heights at all costs. The consequence is a sudden change of level which jars, destroying one's sense of security in the truth of what one is reading. Yet that there are truth and beauty in everything which Mr. Masfield writes, is a truism.

FRANCIS BUCKLEY

Novel Notes.

THE FOOL'S TRAGEDY. By A. Scott Craven 6s
(Martin Secker)

To take so complex a character as Wilfred Dodgson Cherry, to make him the central figure of a story into which he brings so much misery to himself and others through his unfortunate temperament, and yet to keep a share of the reader's sympathy alive for this man, is certainly an achievement. The author's large-hearted tolerance and sympathy and keen insight into human nature enable him to portray realistically the many and varied types of people that are concerned in the plot of the story. Had Mr. Scott Craven evinced even a whit more sympathy with Cherry the effect would have been to alienate much of the reader's sympathy with this egotistical introspective character. When the story opens Cherry is grinding out a monotonous existence as a clerk in the packing room of a firm of city publishers. He "remembered that a woman friend had once congratulated him on having to work in a publishing firm, which, the good soul declared, must be perfectly heavenly for a bookworm like himself. He would have preferred to have given his services to a linendraper, a condition which at least offered so many illusions. He had lost all respect for books since he had seen them in the making, the charm was a deception, their elegance but the product of man's fancy draping them in false colours. In reality they were just one more excrecence of the poisonous commercialism which hung like a loathsome vapour over the whole city." He is not happy in his married life. His wife, Josie—witty, critical, cynical, contemptuous—has lost all patience with his high-flown ideas, and his inability to cope with their poverty. Poor Josie! The finest character in the book is Russell Fenton, an old college chum of Cherry's. Mr. Scott Craven has a fascinating, vivid style, and this and his admirable handling of a story so full of human interest, make "The Fool's Tragedy," a novel that should prove a decided success.

THE ALLINSON HONOUR By Harold Bindloss 6s
(Ward, Lock)

Owing to the machinations of a scoundrelly brother-in-law, Andrew Allinson has gained an undeserved reputation for stupidity. Nobody has ever questioned his honesty, which indeed must be patent to everybody who meets him, but, nevertheless, the business of which he is nominally the head takes rather too risky a line on several occasions and is now embarking on the promotion of a Canadian gold-mine, which is never likely to pay any, but a few interested persons. Unfortunately for himself, the villain underrates Andrew's intelligence, and allows him to go out to Canada on a journey of inspection. The hero discovers the true state of affairs fairly quickly, and incidentally falls in love with a girl of rather stereotyped Western charm. Returning to England he puts matters on a proper basis and gets rid of his brother-in-law, afterwards, of course, marrying his Canadian.

There is the plot, which is one of the least of the attractions of a particularly taking novel. But Mr. Bindloss does this sort of thing so well, and rings the changes so deftly, that he may be pardoned for a lack of originality in a story which, in truthful, unexaggerated characterisation and freshness and abundance of incident is at least the equal of any other book he has written. In fact, "The Allinson Honour" is another of those pleasant, wholesome, and very readable novels that we have grown to expect from Mr. Bindloss.

THE CHILDREN OF THE SEA. By H. de Vere Stacpoole 6s
(Hutchinson)

Mr. Stacpoole's finely designed romances are always good in themselves, but they gain incalculably from his individual way of presenting them. He never fails to create an atmosphere which pervades the entire story to a degree that few writers attain, and he has never been more successful in this respect than in his latest novel. With Japan and Iceland for settings, he has given additional proof of his powers by mingling with perfect effect the subtle charm of the first with an account of the operations of a cable-ship off the Japanese coast, and in weaving in as a background, for a story of love and industry among its simple people, the elusive spirit of Iceland and the glamour of the sea. Interest is concentrated upon a gigantic

Mr. H. de Vere Stacpoole.

Icelander, named Ericsson, the chief buoy hand on the cable ship. A notorious philanderer, he has an affair with a Japanese girl during shore operations, which ends in a mysteriously disastrous manner. Ericsson is about to leave the girl's house, when, lighting his pipe, he sees her face. "He stared at her for one terrific moment. Then, dropping the match, he fled screaming from the house." The cumulative horror of this scene is admirably brought out, though the reader is left ignorant of its cause. When the ship is paid off, Ericsson, a changed man, returns to Iceland with his bosom-friend, Magnuss. There the two men set up in the fishing industry in Magnuss's native town in opposition to the tyrannical Gudmundsson, who, in addition to cornering the industry of the town, has become affianced to Schwalla, the girl whom Magnuss had hoped to win as his bride. Under the masterful direction of Ericsson the business thrives, the climax of success coming when Schwalla breaks with Gudmundsson and accepts Ericsson. Then, with shuddering suddenness comes the tragedy, the poignancy of which is sharpened by its loathsome character. The story ends with an act of splendid heroism on the part of Schwalla. Into the telling of this romance the author has put some of his finest work, charging it with beauty, colour and primitive emotion in such a way that the artistic balance of romance and reality is steadily maintained. The ending is on a high plane, and should secure for Schwalla's act a niche among the great deeds in fiction.

A TRAP TO CATCH A DREAM. By Dion Clayton Cal-throp 6s (Hodder & Stoughton)

This is a fairy tale of Ferdinand and Miranda and an island in the colourful South Seas. Ferdinand is a young English lordling, who has been sowing a pretty crop of Parisian wild oats, when his father dies leaving him a title and a broken estate. Two sober younger brothers start with him on a voyage of regeneration, and Ferdinand—otherwise Lord Pepprill—is cast away on a charming island. Naturally Miranda is provided for him, and Prospero, in the shape of a delicious French girl, Susette, and her father, an exiled marquis living an idyllic life on the island in a charming house. Their only companion has been a Chinese factotum, and as he has just left them Ferdinand takes up the household tasks friendly fashion and shares them with Miranda. Of course, Ferdinand falls in love with Miranda—full fathom five or more, and equally Miranda with Ferdinand, same as Shakespeare said. Only that would be too straightaway for the twentieth century, so Miranda backs and shies, and is a tease. The situation lasts a long time, just how long is difficult to decide, but nine years is the most definite note of time given us, though it seems extraordinary. Prospero dies, confiding Miranda to Ferdinand, and confiding to him also his true history. No banished duke is he, nor marquis nor belted earl—just a bolted banker, and Miranda must never know. Off go Ferdinand and Miranda to Paris, to be brother and sister—yes, even when they are married. They share a flat, but don't get married for some months, and chance brings upon them Prospero's accomplices, who had done time for the money Prospero had got away with, the money on which Ferdinand and Miranda had been living. Ferdinand pays back what is left, goes over to England, claims his inheritance, which in his absence has prospered amazingly, hurries back to Paris to Miranda, who now loves him in a proper wifely way, and they get married and start to live happy ever afterwards. The story is very light and sugar sweet, all the people are trumps, there is no Caliban, all is sunshine and bright limpid colour, tropical flowers and birds and fishes; the people seem to be playing, with much zest nice parts in well rehearsed amateur theatricals, and in fine, the book is a delicious frivolity, that will captivate the hearts of innumerable readers.

LOVE IN THE HILLS By F. L. Penny 6s (Chatto & Windus)

This story deals picturesquely and effectively with life in and round one of the hill stations of India. The author's powers of description do full justice to the beauty and grandeur of the Nilgiri Hills which form a charming background for the wooing of Nonia Armscote by her lover, Captain Warborough. Mystery envelops both these people. Nonia is a girl with a husband jacked away in her past, while the Captain's mission in this quarter of India is concerned with other game than the taking of cinema pictures. The arrival on the scene of Nonia's questionable husband, Pensax, a political spy masquerading as a prospector for gold, carries the plot to its climax, which centres round the legality of Nonia's unfortunate marriage with Pensax. There are many good things in "Love and the Hills," a vivid description of a storm in the mountains is one of them, the author cleverly utilising the fury of the elements to accentuate the sharply-drawn characters of Pensax and Warborough.

NO PLACE LIKE HOME. By John Trevena 6s net (Constable)

"Really a condemnation of the conditions under which the agricultural labourer is forced to live and work in England, and an indictment of the Irishman's incapacity,

Mr Trevena manages to wrap his sermon up in such a cover of whimsical fancy, topical allusion, and crowd his stage with so many quaint characters, that we have not time to notice the pill for the jam. David Byrne, poet, herald of revolt, anarchist and traitor, descends upon Prior-ton, Devonshire, in response to a letter from Amy, one of the Prior twins, with whom he claims a wholly fictitious relationship. He soon has the village in a state of ferment. Aghast at the squalor and horror of Tumbles, where live the Prior labourers, he builds a hut, Australian fashion, in total disregard of all regulations, in order to show the council and the landowners that his clay-covered log cabin with its earth floor is stronger and more habitable than their so-called houses. The Radical vicar, the harlequin curate, Montmorenci, player of innumerable parts, not the least amusing being that of Father Cockayne the ardent Irish conspirator and Mr Prior, with his lust for slaughter, making the twin Bobby miserable by perpetually compelling him to carry cartridges and pick up corpses, are happy conceptions. The author evidently believes with the Rev Adalbert Montmorenci that Ulster hates the rest of Ireland more than she loves England. The lesson of the last half of the book is summed up in the words of the Ballycastle car driver: "It's easy to get on in Ireland if you don't fight. That's the trouble with men of this country, they put fighting before work. That's what makes 'em good soldiers and bad citizens. If you want to get on you must keep clear of politics. I don't belong to any party. What's the use? One promises you the moon, and t'other the sun, and if they thought 'twould help to win an election they'd throw in the stars as well."

DEGARMO'S WIFE AND OTHER STORIES. By David
Graham Phillips 6s (Appleton)

This volume, one out of many, proves Mr Phillips a thoroughly competent craftsman. The stories are of fashionable wealthy Americans, and show us once more the littleness and vulgarity of their lives. The views that the characters express are often revolting to commonplace English people. The book has little romance about it. "Degarmo's Wife" recounts how a somewhat vain wealthy man marries a young enthusiast, whom he imagines he will easily subjugate to his will, her experience teaches her diplomacy, the husband gradually more clearly realises his wife's attractions, falls genuinely in love, and finally their lives become contented, happy and useful. "Enid" imagines herself a romantic heroine with high ideals, which are choked by a commonplace husband, husband and wife speak frankly to each other, she is amazed to find that he, too, has become bored. They agree to avoid scandal, and find gradually that they have come to require each other's company, they grow content, and almost fall in love again. About the last story which redeems the book from the commonplace—there is a certain romantic atmosphere, a young girl fresh from the convent falls in love with a man of the world forty-five years old, who is obliged to admit that he is no longer capable of love.

AN INNOCENT JUDAS By Charlie (Heath, Cranton & Ouseley)

Marion Lancaster was the daughter of an "eccentric social reformer" in Manchester, who died leaving her with nothing to live on except her wits. Raeburn Chesterton, M.P., a young politician with overweening ambition, and a newly-appointed Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, comes down to see Marion soon after her father's death, and is only prevented from proposing to her by the thought that she has neither wealth nor position. Marion's solicitor finds her a post as secretary to an aunt who is a busy London journalist. Raeburn discovers Marion in London, and throwing discretion to the winds, proposes to her in real earnest, and is accepted. In the flush of excitement Raeburn tells her of his prospects, and incidentally reveals a great Cabinet secret. When Marion's aunt hears of Raeburn's visit she slyly becomes possessed of the secret, and murmuring to herself "a scoop," she proceeds post-haste to Fleet Street and profits by the errors of the "innocent Judas." When Marion Lancaster understands the enormity of her crime, she leaves her aunt's employ and finds work with Mark Sampson, a novelist, who lives a charming life in "digs" with six artists, a press photographer and an elderly housekeeper. Marion is a great addition to the circle, and eventually rejects two offers of marriage because she still loves Raeburn Chesterton, who lays at her door the ruination of his career. Needless to say, when all is known, all is forgiven, and Marion and her lover are left in each other's arms.

GUARDIAN ANGELS By Marcel Prevost 6s. (H. Veleigh Nash)

This is not a book for all readers and not one that it is easy to criticise. It is admirably written, brilliantly clever, certainly interesting, and as certainly true to the life it pictures, but the life it pictures is the sort of thing many of us have decided that nobody ought to read about, or to write about. There is something to be said for that decision, and something to be said on the other side. Whether we like it or not, the ugly facts of life have got to be faced, and we shall never alter them until we face them frankly and are no longer afraid of them. Except for Guy and the little Yvonne, and the trusting, deceived wives of the Baron d'Anay and the French Under-Secretary Croze, and the pitifully simple little governess Rosalie, there is scarcely a likeable or decent person in the book. Yet for the mature, sane reader "Guardian Angels" is an almost terribly moral story, as terribly moral as the mercilessly realistic drawings of Hogarth, and most of the sinners in it have to pay in bankruptcy, disgrace, shattered ambitions and even death for their pleasant sinning. But they do not pay the full price out of their own pockets. That is always the sorry meanness of the game. It might be well enough to say courageously, "Well, I have been a fool, but I have paid for it!" if the innocent friends and relatives of the sinner were not forced, as M. Prevost shows they are, to contribute a share, and the lion's share, of the price. That rubs the bloom off the gallantry of the affair and makes it merely shabby. The moral of "Guardian Angels," according to one of the characters, is that foreign governesses should not be employed in French families, for a German governess, an Italian and an English one are at the root of nearly all the vice, mischief and misery with which the story is concerned, but the larger, more obvious moral is that, putting higher considerations aside, in the plainest, most practical sense, morality, like honesty, is the best policy. There is no preaching, the whole thing is written lightly and with a shrewd satirical humour, but it makes you realise that the gay life is a dragged and, a weary and a sad one before you get to the end of it.

NOTWITHSTANDING By Ma Cheln idik (John Murray)

At the outset the adventures of Annette towards happiness with the man of her choice threatened to drag, but the authoress has the gift of making us forget defects, and in the end we find ourselves thoroughly under the spell of her narrative. Annette has been brought up by three maiden aunts in London, Aunt Maria, a popular novelist, Aunt Harriet, a Christian Scientist, and Aunt Catherine, the only practical one of the family, who surreptitiously takes her niece to concerts and secretly encourages her desire to become a singer. When twenty-one, Annette joins her father, a courier and publican, in Paris, but here she meets with disillusionment, for he endeavours to sell her, first to a musician, and then to an English gentleman. Escaping from these dangers she is about to throw herself into the Seine, but is prevented by Dick La Qeyt, an English landowner, jockey, gambler, drunkard, and spend-thrift. They go to Fontainebleau together, and here Dick is fatally stricken. Annette nurses him until his relations arrive, and then vanishes, but not before witnessing a will in which Dick leaves the bulk of the family estates to Roger Manvers, his cousin and agent. The life of Riff, in Lowshure, where the larger number of the scenes are laid, with its dullness and gossip, is vividly touched on. Roger Manvers is a fine specimen of the country gentleman, in love with every inch of the land, and anxious only to do his duty to it and the people. A pathetic figure is Lady Louisa Manvers, Dick's mother, weighed down by anxiety to secure the heritage for her idiot second son, and a particularly grim episode is that where, paralysed and helpless, she lies and listens to Harry's nurse telling how she married him. The barriers between Roger and Annette are ingeniously demolished.

THE PERFECT WIFE. By Joseph Keating 6s. (Hennemann)

If Julie Carlish is to be accepted as a true type of the perfect wife, then it is much more amusing to read about her than to marry her. Julie was a very nice young person, that is what made it so hard for her husband, but she was very jealous and exacting, and not easily placated once her jealousy was aroused. Three months after Roddy Carlish had married her, they were giving a housewarming, and among the invited guests was Hattie Deverell, and it was Hattie who caused all the mischief. She was a friend of Julie's, and an old flame of Roddy's, and, though she had never really expected him to marry her, was a little resentful that he should have thrown her over and made Julie his wife. She resents it the more just then because she happens to be badly in debt, and is worried by a judgment summons, and fearing further trouble unless she can immediately raise five hundred pounds. Before his marriage Roddy had often advised her in Stock Exchange speculations, they had speculated in partnership, the arrangement being that she pocketed whatever they won and Roddy bore all the losses, but when she asks him now for a loan of five hundred pounds he reluctantly refuses, because he thinks it would not be fair to Julie for him to do anything more in that way. During the evening as the only escape from her difficulties, she accepts a proposal from the elderly hypochondriac Mr. Traffyn and later telling Roddy about it when they

Photo by Thos. Forster & Sons, Pontypridd

Mr. Joseph Keating.

"The most important biography of recent years."

—THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN

THE LIFE OF HENRY LABOUCHERE

By ALGAR LABOUCHERE THOROLD.

With a Frontispiece in Photogravure Medium 8vo 18s net

"Written with insight and ability. The series of letters which passed between him, Mr. Chamberlain, and Mr. Healy during the first half year of 1886 are a revelation. They are given to the world for the first time, and they are the most valuable part of this biography. . . . these letters of 1886 are a real contribution to the political history of our times. . . . a thorough and careful presentation of a very human and attractive man Mr. Thorold is greatly to be congratulated on his work." Mr. A. E. W. Mason, in THE LONDON REVIEW

THE LIFE OF JOHN BRIGHT.

2nd Impression 15s

By G. M. Trevelyan

Beautifully illustrated in colour and numerous line drawings by the Japanese Artist in London

YOSHIO MARKINO,

A LITTLE PILGRIMAGE IN ITALY.

By Olave M. Potter

Square Crown 8vo New and Cheaper Edition 6s net

THE LIFE OF CHARLES ELIOT

NORTON, From His Letters and Note-Books.

Extra Crown 8vo Two vols 21s net

MAXIMILIAN IN MEXICO.

By Percy F. Martin, F.R.G.S.

Author of "Through Five Republics of South America," "Mexico of the Twentieth Century," etc. Fully illustrated Demy 8vo 21s net

GEORGE MEREDITH, HIS LIFE, GENIUS AND TEACHING.

Constantin Photiadès

Translated from the French by Arthur Percé Crown 8vo 6s net

TEN MORE PLAYS OF SHAKESPEARE.

By Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, M.A., D.D.

Author of "On Ten Plays of Shakespeare" Demy 8vo 7s. 6d net

MEMOIRS OF LI HUNG CHANG

Being a Selection from the Journals of the Viceroy now first put into English and Chronologically arranged. With a Frontispiece in Photogravure 10s. 6d. net

"And then, far-swing and tireless, is reflected from every page of Li Hung Chang's illness, until at last he is distinguished above all scholars to become the Port Laureate of China, next to attain high office, and go at length, to stand pre-eminent in the councils of the 'Old Buddha' finally to leave recorded a firm and far-reaching virtue and good advice to the state and above all, to secure the favourable verdict of posterity. — The Times"

SIDELIGHTS.

7s. 6d. net By Lady Blennerhassett

"Admirably translated into English by Mrs. Gailher Lady Blennerhassett's previous contributions to literature, her encyclopedic knowledge of historical facts, and her thorough grasp of the main political, religious, and economic considerations, give her a claim, which none will dare dispute, to speak with authority on this subject. — The Spectator"

ITALY IN NORTH AFRICA.

10s. 6d. net With Maps Fully Illustrated By W. R. McClure

"It is undoubtedly the most level-headed and critical account of the Italo-Turkish War." The Westminster Gazette

THE UNEXPURGATED CASE AGAINST WOMEN SUFFRAGE

By Sir Almoth E. Wright, M.D., F.R.S.

Demy 8vo 2s. 6d. net

TWO CHARMING VOLUMES.

Songs from the Plays of Shakespeare.

Sonnets from the Plays of Shakespeare.

Exquisitely produced, with initials and borders illuminated by Edith A. Ibbes

2s. 6d. net each.

CONSTABLE & CO., LTD., LONDON.

A SUPERB NEW COLOUR BOOK

The Marvellous History of the Shadowless Man

From the German of Adelbert von Chamisso, and THE COLD HEART, a new translation from the German of Wilhelm Hauff With an introduction by Dr A. S. Rappoport Containing 30 Coloured Plates from the original paintings specially executed for this work by Forster Robinson

In crown 4to (7½ in. x 10 in.) bound in cloth, richly gilt and gilt top, with mounted coloured plates 15s. net Limited Edition de Luxe Signed by the Artist 21s. net In white buckram and gold Limited to 100 copies

"One of the most remarkable books published for a long time" The Standard

Third Impression Ready

The Real South Africa

By AMBROSE PRATT

Cloth gilt Eight Illustrations and Map 10s. 6d. net

Hunter, Trapper and Scout

Amongst the Contributors are

Lt-Gen Sir R. S. Baden-Powell	Colonel Cody
Admiral R. E. Peary	F. C. Selous
Sir Gilbert Parker	Sir Edwin Arnold
Frank T. Bullen	G. A. Henty
Sir Ernest Shackleton	Archibald Forbes

Edited by MURKIN HILLIS

Handsomely bound in cloth gilt, with a Coloured and other illustrations 9s

Police Work from Within

By H. L. ADAM

With 10 Illustrations 6s.

By the Author of "Woman and Crime"

A fascinating book. Holds the reader spellbound

VENUSBERG.

Monte Carlo Life

By CHILOSA

Cabinet Maestri, Swindlers, Great London Society, the reader meets them all. What a marvellous place it is, this 'Venusberg,' and how vividly the author represents it

IMPORTANT NEW 6s. NOVELS RED PEARLS

By CHARLOTTE MANSFIELD A powerful South African Story

Miss HYDA RHODES' Novel

A VASE OF CLAY

A fine novel by a Sister of the popular novelist, Miss Kathlyn Rhodes

An Immediate Success

LOVE'S VICTORY

By GERTRUDE HOLLIS

The Times says: "The novel is superlatively excellent." Bookman:—"We are entirely in accord with the Times in its praise."

THE STRAIGHT RACE

By KATHLYN RHODES

Third Edition now ready

ANNE OF THE MARSHLAND By the author of "Barriers"

The Hon. Mrs. JULIAN BYNG

THE BOOMERANG

A psychic novel

By KATHARINE BATES

THE SIN EATER

By "A WHISPER"

Author of "Black Mark"

FRUITS OF PLEASURE

FARRIN L. BRITTON

THE PURPLE LIGHT

BUCHAN LANDOR

Author of "The Myths of Prague"

BLUSH ROSE

IF PETIT HOMME ROUGE

Author of "The Court of Enchanters"

HOLDEN & HARDINGHAM,
ADELPHI, LONDON

are alone together in the billiard room, she lapses into a yearningly sentimental mood that subdues him to a passing sympathy, and in a desperate, momentary outburst she suddenly throws her arms round him and kisses him a last farewell, and at this juncture Julie comes unexpectedly into the room and sees them. Hattie hurries off in a panic, and Roddy's airy explanation that the whole incident was just an accident is not effective. Julie is hurt, indignant, angry, Roddy feels that out of loyalty to Hattie he cannot offer a full account of what has taken place, he is confident that Julie will simmer down and the trouble blow over, but her anger grows, and before the interview is ended she has taken off her wedding-ring and flung it on the billiard-table and declared she will wear it no more. Next day, before Roddy has a chance of seeing her again, she quits the house and goes to her mother. When he goes after her she refuses to see him, and presently runs away abroad to be out of his reach. The rest of the story follows Roddy in his pursuit of her and in his long-futile, but at last successful efforts after a reconciliation. It is all written in the gayest, happiest spirit of light comedy. Now and then it becomes almost farcically extravagant, and the closing scene smacks more perhaps of stage-life than of real life, but the whole thing is cleverly and entertainingly done. The dialogue sparkles with humorous and epigrammatic comments on love and life and the ways of men and women, and the story holds you interested and amused throughout.

THE GRIP OF THE PAST By John A. Stuart 6s (Hodder & Stoughton)

Our novelists on the whole do not take kindly to the modern political machine. They seem to find in the party system a legitimate butt for humour, and when, as occasionally happens, they themselves become cogs in the well-oiled mechanism, a short shift usually suffices them, the machine demands subservience to the master-pinion, and this of course is incompatible with the free play of individuality. Mr. Belloc and Mr. Wells are but two examples of the many novelists who of recent years have extracted ironical humour out of the political drawing-room and the political backstairs, and in his new novel Mr. Stuart joins company with these hard hitters and tilts merrily at Crumps and the party system. Crumps, the sleek, bland, rubicund smiling Crumps, is a masterly political strategist, invaluable to his chiefs, he knows all party secrets, and worships the party system as though it were a divine institution. Clever as Crumps is, however, he meets his match in Lady Oakhurst, the brilliant Society woman whose ambitions easily outweigh her scruples. She delights in deliberately "using" people to gain her ends. She chooses puppets for her purposes "almost as she would choose a frock for Ascot or jewels for the Opera." At the time the story opens the ends in view are a coronet and a title, and the people Lady Oakhurst "uses" to gain them include the wily Crumps and two powerful personalities, both young and both famous—one as an explorer and "enlarger of Empires," the other as a lady novelist. The love that draws these two irresistibly together lies strangled in the "grip of the past." The nature of this vicious grip is not clearly disclosed until the end of the story, but the struggles and heart-searchings of the victims provide a passionate undercurrent that is unsuspected, and consequently unallowed for in Lady Oakhurst's schemes, which involve the planting of the famous explorer as a safe Government candidate in an important by-election. Mr. Stuart makes dramatic capital out of the election and the subsequent conduct of Desmond, the explorer, in the House, and also out of the temporary thwarting of Lady Oakhurst's ambition. The characters in the novel are fond of talking, but they talk well and brightly, and their opinions are always worth listening to. Desmond's estimate of the equipment calculated to bring a man out top in politics is worth quoting: "Chiefly a tough fibre, a thick skin, a self-consequent manner, and an unlimited capacity for clap-trap—plus the art of giving to painful, personal ineptitudes the appearance of universal wisdom." Lady Oakhurst's abounding worldly wit and wisdom is also well worth quoting, but enough has been said to guide the discerning reader to a lively topical novel with a more than topical interest.

BARBARA OF THE THORN. By Netta Syrett 6s (Chatto & Windus)

Barbara Thorne (the title of the volume derives from the fact that one of Barbara's ancestors had settled in Italy and called himself Della Spina) found herself at the age of twenty-eight, after the dreariest of lives in an English village possessed of liberty and a small competence. Following a blind impulse, she went to Rome, and it was while visiting historical scenes there that she underwent remarkable psychic experiences, seeming to see re-enacted before her eyes some of the horrors of mediæval Roman history. Dr. Travers, to whom for a time she became engaged, diagnosed it as a case of hysteria. But a more sympathetic solution was arrived at by her future husband, Geoffrey Fraser, who discovered in her father's diary proofs of the historical accuracy of her visions. Barbara was in fact living over again the early adventures of the Della Spina family. As was to be expected, Miss Syrett has not failed to write an interesting story, but the psychic problem is made rather less plausible than it might have been by her over free use of coincidence. The threads are drawn together with a neatness only permissible in a detective story.

THE MERCENARY By W. J. Fecott 6s (Blackwood)

Mr. Fecott has gained a well deserved reputation as an historical novelist, and "The Mercenary" is well up to his accustomed level. It is a spirited and enjoyable tale of the Thirty Years' War, with a Roman Catholic Scottish captain for its hero, and for heroine the beautiful and wilful Archduchess Stephanie. It is almost unnecessary to say that the plot centres round the stormy and difficult courtship of these two, and that eventually the hero's grit and determination are successful in winning him the woman he loves. Otherwise we do not propose to give away more of Mr. Fecott's excellent plot, which with many unexpected twists and turns is certain to keep the reader alert. Although it must be admitted that for some of his characters and incidents the author has fallen back upon the ordinary historical novelist's stock-in-trade, yet "The Mercenary" seems to us a good deal superior to the general run of fiction of its type. Anyhow, it provides an admirable three hours' amusement.

The Bookman's Table.

THE PRESS AND ITS STORY. By James D. Symon. With 26 Illustrations. 5s net. (Seeley, Service & Co.)

"The history of the Press," as Mr. Symon remarks in his preface, "has yet to be written." Mr. J. B. Williams wrote, a year or two back, an adequate "History of English Journalism" from its beginnings to the foundation of the London Gazette in 1667, but the fuller, more varied, and in many ways more important record of the last two and a half centuries is still to be made. Mr. Symon gives you a very brief sketch of it in his opening chapter, and then devotes himself almost entirely to the story of present-day journalism and how the daily and weekly papers of our own generation are compiled, printed and distributed. This undertaking, which was really his chief purpose, he has fulfilled most thoroughly. There are excellent chapters on how the news is gathered, on the editor, past and present, on the rise of the London daily Press, the evening and the provincial Press, on the society journals, the "penny populars," and the weekly reviews, and a capital account of some of the greatest feats of journalism. Two very interesting chapters are concerned with the illustrated Press—Mr. Symon was himself for

THE CONFESSION OF A NEURASTHENIC.

BY HORACE HAZELTINE,

Author of "The City of Encounters," etc

A BOOK FOR ALL HEALTH-SEEKERS.

THERE had been warnings, of course—and yet I had refused to take my condition at all seriously, until suddenly the truth was rushed upon me, and I stood staring at the ghost of my youth and my manhood in the mirror that stretched above my study mantelpiece. My last scintilla of nerve force expended. I was nervously bankrupt.

begins "The Confession of a Neurasthenic" in which Mr. Horace Hazeltine has reproduced for us, with wonderful accuracy, his mental and emotional sufferings during a severe attack of neurasthenia. His book 'a true personal confession' is in no sense morbid. It grips our attention from the first page to the last, so that we are filled with sympathy for the unfortunate victim of nerves, and rejoice with him in his recovery.

It is not until the end of the book that Mr. Hazeltine lets us into his 'secret'.

"Do you know my dear," exclaimed my wife on her return, 'that you look positively cheerful this evening? I have not seen you appear so pleased for months. And I do believe you have a better colour. It must do you good for me to go away.'

"And then I told her—and after that, how we both watched for the added signs and symbols of that promised improvement of which we were now already half-assured."

"The lines of illness and worry grew less and less deep, my hollow cheeks slowly filled, my eyes lost their sunken dimness. And, coincidentally we noted one change after another, subtly wrought in the way of physical and mental betterment. Among the earliest of these was a day by day gain in activity and energy. A humorous kinsman ignorant of the effects of nervous depletion had chaffingly dubbed me 'The Mollusc' because of my general indisposition to exert myself. The most trivial undertakings had required, with me, a distinct effort. I would sit for hours in one spot, knowing all the while that one thing was required of me, but lacking the will to go about it, and momentarily growing more nervous because I was neglecting it. The overcoming of this will weakness was one of the earliest indications of improvement."

Eventually the reader becomes aware that Mr. Hazeltine has actually written this book to express his gratitude to Sanatogen, which, as he says, "wrought little less than a miracle in me." Appreciating this novel form of testimonial, the proprietors of Sanatogen have published Mr. Hazeltine's book for free distribution among nerve sufferers. It is not an advertisement in the ordinary sense of the word, and everyone who reads it will realise the genuineness of Mr. Hazeltine's confession.

Readers of this article who are interested in the subject should certainly apply for a free copy of the book. It is only necessary to send a post-card, mentioning this paper, to Messrs. A. Wulfer & Co., 12, Chancery Street, London, W.C.

Now is the time to select gifts for far-away friends. Choose the "always appreciated gift"

Waterman's Ideal Fountain Pen

Mr. S. R. Crockett, says "To give away a Waterman's Ideal is to make a friend for life."

Pens to suit all tastes. Nibs to suit all hands. (Can be exchanged through any Stationer if not exactly right.)

Font Style—Regular, Safety, Pump Filling and Self Filling, with numerous designs in each. In Silver and Gold for presentation. Of Stationer and Jeweller everywhere.

Booklet free from J. & C. HARDWORTH, Ltd., Kohlmeier House, Kingsway, London (New York 17, Broadway, Paris, 6, Rue de Hanovre.)

ARNOLD BENNETT

Just Published

PARIS NIGHTS and other Impressions of Places and People

By ARNOLD BENNETT. Illustrated by E. A. Rickards, F.R.I.B.A. 12/- net

Also Now Ready

THE PLAIN MAN AND HIS WIFE

By ARNOLD BENNETT 2/6 net

Hodder & Stoughton Publishers, London & C.

many years assistant editor of the Illustrated London News. He has traced the growth of the Press from its insignificant, rather mean beginnings to the flourishing power and splendour of its present maturity, and though he is fully alive to certain of its unsatisfactory developments he is optimistic enough to foresee that it will outgrow them and that its greatness is not in the past. Handling the complicated details of his subject with an easy familiarity and a keen sense of the romance of it all, Mr. Symon has written far and away the best and most entertaining story of the English Press that we have yet come across.

FAMOUS ARTISTS AND THEIR MODELS By Dr. A. S. Rappoport 16s. (Stanley-Paul)

We took up this book of Dr. Rappoport's with anticipation, and it possessed distinct possibilities of enjoyment and information for the reader. We had not, however, read more than a few pages before we became aware that a good subject is by no means a guarantee of a good book. Dr. Rappoport's is rather a machine-made production. There is a good deal of talk in the first chapter or two of the beauty of perfect nudity (which no one disputes so long as the figure is perfect and the display of it guiltless of offence), but little real matter of value to either the artist or the student of psychology. The author, it is true, heads two of his chapters "The Psychology of the Model" and "Ethics and Aesthetics," and one is tempted to turn to them in the expectation of some serious examination of the subjects, but he rewards us with remarks that may be true enough but are trite and superficial. Instead of a serious study of an interesting and important subject he has given us a chronicle of intrigues between certain famous artists and their models. There is a good deal of indefinite talk about Greek Art, but not much information regarding it, or the spirit that inspired it. Some sort of apparent solidity is given to the book by "appendices," comprising a "Bibliography," and a somewhat arbitrary selection of "famous" artists from "Apelles to Tebrun." The book is entertaining enough, and may interest lovers of light gossip; there are a number of good illustrations well reproduced.

THE PILGRIM FROM CHICAGO. By Christian Tearle 7s. 6d. net (Longmans)

If you have read Mr. Christian Tearle's "Rambles with an American," you will know that he is one of the best of gossip guides to places of interest—particularly of literary interest—in London and elsewhere about England. You find him at the commencement of his new book, "The Pilgrim of Chicago," sitting in his chambers at Verulam Buildings with his American friend, Mr. Fairfield, and they presently set forth from that place to go and see the Jacob's Island of "Oliver Twist," the dreary site of the house from which Bill Sikes accidentally hanged himself. Thereafter, they go on other expeditions, not only in and round London, but to Canterbury, where they visit the little inn at which Micawber stayed, and places associated with Chancer and his Pilgrims, to St. Albans, where Bacon lived, seeing many houses and districts rich in literary associations on the way there, to Lichfield, with its memories of Dr. Johnson. But a good half of the book is given to London. Mr. Tearle has a genius for finding out-of-the-way houses and haunts and for gathering curious information about them. How many people know that No. 5, King's Bench Walk is the "Number 5" referred to by Pope, in one of his paraphrases of Horace, as the home of Lord Mansfield? Or that here Mansfield, before he was raised to the bench, was visited by the great Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough, who was one of his clients? And at No. 3 you may see the identical entrance "that Dr. Johnson had been wont to cross on his visits to Lord Eldon's brother." If you are interested in these and a hundred other such memorials of the glamorous past, you cannot do better than secure this volume. Mr. Tearle knows his subject thoroughly and communicates his knowledge with so much enthusiasm, and so pleasantly, that you will find his book one of the most entertaining and most useful in its kind that any publisher has given us.

CONFESSIONS OF A BOOK-LOVER. By J. W. Walters. With an Introduction by Coulson Kernahan 2s. 6d. net (Charles H. Kelly)

Every good book-lover has a place in his heart for Alexander Smith, and a first glance through these essays assured us that Mr. Walters' was, to that extent, of the elect. He is, indeed, an enthusiast, "capable, when writing of books, book-making and book-buying," as Mr. Kernahan says in his introduction, "of an enthusiasm which I envy as much as I admire." Sometimes he is a little too elusive. When he comes to write of bedside books he names none but Stevenson's Prayers and Kingsley's "Westward Ho!" He discourses pleasantly on the subject, hints at the sort of books that ought to be on the bedroom shelf, but withholds his individual selection. There is a charming little talk about second-hand books, with a good word, in passing, for the minor poet who helps to fill the penny and two-penny boxes; there are other thoughtful, attractive essays on "Personalities in Book-land," "Books that Tempt," "Books that Captivate," and "Books and Gardens." Mr. Walters moves Mr. Kernahan almost to wrath by a confession that he can walk through the fields, blind to the beauty of his surroundings, with his nose deep in a book, reading as he goes, but this only proves that, as a book-lover, he is the genuine thing, all wool and a yard wide, as the Americans say. He seems to give most of his love to the essayists, most of his quotations are from them and he writes mostly about them, but within his limits he is delightfully enthusiastic and his enthusiasm is contagious. He is a good reader, and his gossip about what he has read makes good reading.

JOSEPH AND HIS BRETHREN By LOUIS N. Parker 1s. and 2s. net (John Lane)

After Pharaoh has declared his dream in the beautiful diction of the Jacobean translators of the Bible, we read "The crowd stir. The idea among the priests, etc., is 'What will Joseph make of that?'" It is rather an abrupt descent, this piece of modern Cockney slang, from Robert Henry pinxit, Mouilleron del.

Rembrandt Painting his Mother. oil on canvas, by Dr. Angelo S. Rappoport (Stanley-Paul).

Why Be Content with 4%?

The cost of living is rising, incomes derived from investments are, in many cases, falling. What is to be done? The prudent investor is turning his attention to "Sun Life of Canada" Annuities. This Company, one of the soundest concerns in the world, deals with the whole problem of Annuity Insurance on progressive and comprehensive lines. Its attractive forms of Annuities offer investment advantages not to be gained in any other way.

You can buy an Annuity out and out, or you can buy a deferred Annuity and pay for it out of your income—so much per year until the Annuity becomes due. You can buy Joint Annuities for yourself and your wife, you can buy Educational Annuities for your Children, you can buy Annuities with the whole return of your capital guaranteed. And these are but a few of the various forms of Annuities purchasable. Investigate! Your inquiry may mean, probably will mean the doubling or quadrupling of your present income. You will gain in every way by taking out a "Sun Life of Canada" Annuity. Your income will be larger and more amply secured. If you happen to be in indifferent health when the arrangement is made you will have still better terms offered.

The "Sun Life of Canada" has assets of £10,000,000 invested under the strict supervision of the Canadian Government. A present undivided surplus of £1,000,000 over all liabilities makes Assurance with the "Sun Life of Canada" doubly sure.

To J. F. JUNKIN (Manager),
SUN LIFE ASSURANCE Co. of CANADA,
152, Canada House, Norfolk Street, London, W.C.

Please send me particulars, explanatory booklets, &c. of your various

(I require a communication)

NAME

ADDRESS

DATE OF BIRTH

Binds instantly

The LEB

BINDER CLIP

Will instantly make a book of any pages, with the title on its back.

You can instantly remove any paper therefrom or add any paper thereto. It is the simplest, cheapest, and handiest filing system ever devised. With it letter files are kept on shelves just the same as books. After the Binder Clip is applied the papers may be reversed and napped against the documents, and thus kept out of the way. When one arm is reversed against the papers the other forms a good hook or hanger. Sample, with Catalogue of Office Specialties, 4d., post free. One dozen, 3/-, post free.

Stocked by leading Stationers.

The GEM SUPPLIES CO., Ltd.
(Desk. 29) 67, Southwark Street,
London, S.E.

Globe-Wernicke 'Elastic' Bookcases

ONCE books either overcrowded limited shelf space or empty shelves yawned and waited for books. When one bookcase filled, and its gaping shelves were gradually filled. That was before the Globe-Wernicke period in bookcases. Now, books and their shelves come together. The bookcase grows apace with the library. This is the modern way of building a library. This is the Globe-Wernicke idea.

Globe-Wernicke 'Elastic' Bookcases

"Always complete but never finished."

The illustration shows just one of the many pleasing ideas for building up a Globe-Wernicke "Elastic" Bookcase.

In design and finish the Globe-Wernicke "Elastic" Bookcases are unequalled, and their utility has been demonstrated to the satisfaction of thousands of Book-lovers.

SB she she idly
of book use lends itself to artistic treatment and fully explains its manifold advantages over the "fixed-size" bookcase.

Packing Free.—Orders for 52 Carriage Paid to any Goods Station in the British Isles.

The Globe-Wernicke Co. Ltd.

Office and Library Furnishers,

44, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

82, Victoria Street, S.W. 98, Bishopsgate, E.C.

the stately harmonies of the language of the Scriptures. It needed a Milton to match with a grand style of his own the majestic prose of the old translators of the Bible. To speak plainly, Mr Parker has taken the fine gold of the biblical narrative and mixed it with the pinchbeck of the modern melodrama. Both story and style have been adulterated. And though in the theatre the gorgeous scenery and the picturesque pageantry of the stage crowds may hide the weaknesses of the play, Mr Parker's failings as a writer are sadly evident when his work is read away from the glamour of the playhouse. When George Peele went to Scripture for a subject for a drama, he gave us such lines as

"Now comes my lover tripping like the roe,
And brings my longings tangled in her hair"

His genius at least was equal to his argument. Mr Parker handles a great theme, but does not handle it greatly. His drama is readable, and you may read it with interest, but the poetry of thought and phrase that should be in it are not there.

FROM WHEEL AND LOOK-OUT. By Frank T. Bullen
6s. (T. Werner Laurie, Ltd.)

A large number of first-hand reminiscences and not a few thrills are to be found in this entertaining collection of sea stories and articles by Mr Bullen. Whether he is recounting the successful salving of a twelve hundred ton barque "with three or four ugly holes in her bottom and five hundred tons of rock ballast, high and dry on one of the stormiest coasts in the world in the winter," or recalling with vivid detail an all-night encounter with the mighty sperm whale, we feel throughout that Mr Bullen has been faithful to life, and we are grateful accordingly. So also when the author is discussing the new merchant service or criticising the disgraceful conditions of life which obtained on board ship forty-odd years ago (when he first went to sea), his opinions, being founded on actual experience and observation, have an uncommon value. In "The Ship's Post Bag" we are given a poignant autobiographical glimpse. After confessing to a passionate fondness for letter-writing Mr Bullen continues: "And yet in all my sea career of over fifteen years, I wrote on my own account but ten letters! I had no one to write to until the last two years." To compensate for this loss he undertook the letter-writing for his shipmates, and how he tackled his engrossing if delicate task he sets down in this human sketch.

Notes on New Books.

MESSRS. APPLETON & CO.

Mr George Gibbs seems to be a disciple of R. W. Chambers, and in The Silent Battle (6s.), he gives us one of those strong but not altogether pleasing stories of New York society which we have grown accustomed to expect from the older writer. Mr Gibbs's hero suffers from the drink craving, and it is his struggle against this which supplies the book with its title and half of its interest, the other half being comprised in his love-story. Mr Gibbs writes well, and the book is well worth reading for its careful study of temperament.

MESSRS. CASSELL & CO.

Two of the latest additions to Cassell's Pocket Reference Library are German Conversation for English Travellers, by F. F. Bovey and Esther L. Hawkins, and Cassell's Miniature French-English Dictionary, edited by F. F. Bovey. Both are excellent little books, and they are certainly remarkable value for 6d. net. The Dictionary, which has been judiciously abridged from the New French Dictionary also published by Messrs Cassell, contains a useful appendix embodying, among other subjects, Proper Names, Weights and Measures, Money Tables, and a Guide to the Menu, while travellers in Germany will find the phrase-book an indispensable companion, unless they are unusually proficient in the language. For simplicity and ease of reference we have never seen its equal.

MESSRS. CONSTABLE & CO.

Around the every-day occurrences in the life of Polly, a happy little American girl living with Doctor and Mrs Dudley, her "adopted" parents, Miss Emma C. Dowd has written, in Polly of Lady Gay Cottage (3s. 6d. net), a delightfully fresh, vivacious story. With sure skill she turns even the most commonplace incident into an event and fills it with absorbing interest, the characters that move in Polly's small world are as natural, and some almost as lovable, as Polly herself. Chance brings her in contact with various real relations who each in turn claim her and urge her to live with them, but the ties of affection between herself and the Dudleys are too strong. In preference to riches and travel and all those things which appeal to young hearts, Polly chooses love and a poverty-pinched home, till a sudden fear that she is a burden on her kind foster-parents leads her to make the great sacrifice which proves conclusively that she is as noble and courageous as one could wish her to be. However, there is a delightful surprise waiting for Polly after all, and for Polly's many friends, inside and outside the book, and we leave her at last at the beginning of a newly-found happiness that she has more than fully deserved.

MESSRS. T. C. & E. C. JACK.

The New Encyclopedia (7s. 6d. net) which Mr H. C. O'Neill has edited for Messrs. Jack is a miracle of cheapness, better still, it is a miracle of miscellaneous usefulness. This large volume of one thousand six hundred pages claims to give you in the concise possible form all the information that is usually crowded with difficulty into half a dozen volumes. A careful examination of its pages has satisfied us that the claim is justified. Of course, there are little omissions, but they are surprisingly few, and the article on Milton stumbles badly when it says that one of his best sonnets was on Chapman's "Homer", but on the whole, the careful condensed articles on literature, geography, history, science, law, religion, commerce, education, the terse biographies of the world's great men, and all the thousands of items of varied information that fill the book are thoroughly well done and thoroughly reliable. Numerous maps and illustrations add to the serviceability of a well compiled, exhaustive, and very lucidly arranged work of reference.

MESSRS. HOLDEN & HARDINGHAM.

The Boomerang (6s.) is a reincarnationist novel by a lady, Miss J. Katharine Bates, who has made a life study of spiritualist subjects. The rather mawkish tale it tells is not very convincingly worked out, however, and, as a whole, the book is far too crude to be effective. Considering her fondness for French phrases and their excessive use, the author might have been more careful to see that they were correctly printed.

MR. JOHN LONG.

To write a novel about a journey, especially when that journey extends to a tour to the Far East and the East Indies, is not an exceedingly difficult task. Jules Verne succeeded in doing it in "Round the World in Eighty Days," but there the interest naturally excited in the mind of the reader, as to whether the hero would "pull it off," made the author's task comparatively easy. In Wanderings and Wodings Last of Suez (3s. 6d.), Miss F. B. Redwood has no such central interest to simplify the difficulties of her attempt, and it is paying her constructive and literary skill a great compliment to state that she has made, what might so easily have become merely the diary of a globe-trotter, into quite a charming and well-written romance. The authoress has seen the varied scenes unrolled before her with discerning eyes, and some of her pictures of life en voyage are admirable. She has, too, a rare gift of descriptive writing, and one regrets somewhat that the book, which prevents her from concentrating her gift of description on some one phase of existence. The story is a slight one, and the charm of the book lies solely in the lightning sketches of scenery and character, both of which are done exceedingly well.

MR. FRANK PALMER.

A thoroughly spiteful criticism sometimes makes amusing reading—if you are not particularly concerned in it. For this reason, Mr Alan Raleigh's The Real America (3s. 6d. net) may find a public in this country. The author can see no good in any American manners, customs, morals, or institutions (except their shaving saloons, which appear to be much better than the European variety). For ourselves, much as we admire Mr Raleigh's spirit and courage, we cannot believe that the United States are a quarter so black as he has painted them. Mr Raleigh would have been far more convincing if he had been moderate in his language, or if he had the humour to perceive that many of his charges are ridiculous. Nevertheless, a great deal of ink has been spilt in indiscriminate praise of America, and it is as well that the public should realise that there may be another side to the question, even though it be rather absurdly over-stated by this particular writer.

Now and again ladies pass in their pattens, a maid perhaps protecting them with an umbrella, for flakes or snow are falling discreetly

plement to The Bookman

Christmas, 1913

Photo by Alec Langdon Coburn

Sir J. M. Barrie, Bart.

THE BOOKMAN

CHRISTMAS
DOUBLE NUMBER
1 9 1 3

HODDER AND STOUGHTON

ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

THIRTY-EIGHT WEST THIRTY-SECOND STREET NEW YORK

HODDER & STOUGHTON LIMITED

17 WILTON AVENUE TORONTO

The Contributors to this Number include :

DIXON SCOTT
JOHN BAILEY
SIR W. ROBERTSON NICOLL
PERCEVAL GIBBON
CHARLES G D ROBERTS
A St. JOHN ADCOCK
FRANCIS BICKLEY
THOMAS SECCOMBE
FRANK SWINNERTON
WILKINSON SHERREN
G S LAYARD
EDWARD THOMAS
H A HINKSON
M. P WILCOCKS
WILFRED WILSON GIBSON
DAVID HODGE
W. S CROCKETT

PROFESSOR W. G. COLLINGWOOD
WILFRED WHITTEN
GEORGE SAMPSON
RICHARD CURLE
W. E A AXON
KEIGHLEY SNOWDEN
FRANK A MUMBY
ROGER INGPEN
W. P RYAN
JAMES MOFFATT, D D., D Litt
PHILIP W SARGEANT
R BRIMLEY JOHNSON
DARRELL FIGGIS
HAROLD MASSINGHAM
F. G BETTANY
J E PATTERSON
KATHARINE TYNAN

Etc., Etc.

Illustrations.

Frontispiece Photogravure Portrait of SIR J. M. BARRIE, Bart.

Presentation Plate Portrait of ERNEST THOMPSON SETON and Photogravure reproduction of the LIFE MASK OF FRANCIS THOMPSON.

Two Portfolios Containing Drawings in Colour

- (1) By HUGH THOMSON, illustrating scenes from SIR J M BARRIE'S "Quality Street"
- (2) By KAY NIELSEN, illustrating scenes from "In Powder and Crinoline," Old Fairy Tales retold by
SIR A T QUILLER-COUCH

Other Full-page Colour Plates by

FRANK REYNOLDS
RENÉ BULL
GEORGE BELCHER

EDMUND DULAC
BEATRICE ELVERY
WARWICK GOBLE

WILLY POGÀNY
LEWIS BAUMER
KATHERINE CLAUSEN

Etc., Etc.

Four Illustrated Supplements :

ART, POETRY, AND BELLES LETTRES.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

FICTION AND MISCELLANEOUS LITERATURE.

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

The Christmas Number of The Bookman.

"I AM A BOOKMAN"—JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL

No. 267. VOL. XLV.

DECEMBER, 1913.

Price Two Shillings and Sixpence.

6d. net monthly Special Numbers 1/- net and 2/6 net
SUBSCRIPTION TERMS British Isles, Canada and Newfoundland, 12/- per annum, post free Other places abroad, 14/- p

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E C

A preliminary letter of enquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration

already sent in their orders for the Christmas Number of 1914

Another new poem by John Masefield—"The River"—appears in the current number of The English Review

News Notes.

It scarcely seems a year ago since we wished our readers a Merry Christmas, but there is no disputing the calendar which assures us the time has come to offer them the old seasonable greeting once more. As our last year's Number exceeded in size and, we believe, in beauty of production, any of its predecessors, so this year's goes beyond last, and again we are reduced to the necessity of apologising to those readers who may be unable to obtain a copy of it. We enlarged the edition last year, and have very considerably enlarged it again this, nevertheless, the entire issue is already sold out to the trade, and many orders are still coming in that cannot possibly be fulfilled. Those of our readers who have not acted on our advice and placed an early order with their bookseller should do so immediately, for by the time they read this every available copy will be in the hands of the trade. Difficulties in connection with the reprinting of the colour plates prevent us from publishing a large second edition or we would gladly do so. Such testimony to the greatly increasing popularity of THE BOOKMAN cannot be other than very gratifying to us, and we can only urge our readers to act with the wise forethought of certain Colonial booksellers who have

Mr Everard Meynell, whose "Life of Francis Thompson" is one of the most important books of this season, is the son of Mr Wilfrid and Mrs Alice Meynell, and author of "Giovanni Bellini," in the "Great Artists" series, and of "Corot and his Friends." He is a gifted artist and art critic, who has written much on art and literature in various periodicals, and is on the staff of The Illustrated London News.

Photo by Sherri Schell
whose "Life of Fran

Mr. Everard Meynell on " (Turns & Oates) is reviewed mber

No book of this bounteous publishing season is surer of a welcome from all lovers of poetry than is "The Collected Poetry of Francis Thompson," of which Messrs Hodder & Stoughton publish a limited edition, printed in two colours from a special type, and artistically bound in three styles in leather, at five guineas net, with collotype reproduction of the MS of "The Hound of Heaven," and artist's proof on Japanese vellum of a portrait of Thompson, bound in vellum, with an etched portrait, at two guineas net, and in grey boards, with canvas back, at twenty shillings net. The only persons who will be satisfied that so finely artistic an edition of this great poet should be a limited one will be the limited number who are fortunate enough to become possessors of it.

Mr. Herman Scheffauer, whose admirable translation of Heine's "Atta Troll" was published last month by Messrs Sidgwick & Jackson, has recently returned from Danzig, where his play, "The New Shylock," was successfully produced to a crowded and enthusiastic audience at the Stadt Theater. It is to be given also at Strasburg, Bonn and Posen, and finally at Berlin. Mr. Scheffauer is not the first English dramatist (Mr. Shaw, for one, was ahead of him) who has had to get his work translated and produced on a foreign stage before the managers at home could be moved to produce it. There are now prospects, it seems, of the play being performed in its original English here and in America.

It is curious how people are beginning to talk

Photo by W. Hornby.

From left to right the group comprises Miss Dorothy Farnol, to whom his father, Mr. H. J. Farnol, (3) his sister, (4 and 5) Mr. and Mrs. Jeffery about "The Masterdillo," a novel that was published anonymously a few weeks ago and seems neither to have been much advertised or reviewed. One hears rumours that it is the work not of one anonymous author, but of two, and strongly suspects that these two are themselves the hero and heroine of it. The same suspicion has evidently entered the mind of at least one of its purchasers, for Mr. Melrose, who publishes it, tells us that the other day a member of a London business firm called upon him and said that he and his wife had been so moved by the story that if the author was really as poor as it suggested they would like to help him with a gift of twenty-five pounds. It is to be hoped that the author was poor enough for the purpose, it would be a thousand pities, in the interests of other authors, if such a generous impulse were thwarted.

A Family Group. Taken in Mr. Jeffery Farnol's Garden.

Mr. Charles F. Holder (author of "The Game Fishes of the World"), with His Excellency Dr. Henry Van Dyke (author of "Fishermen's Luck," etc.), at the Tuna Club.

Mr. James F. Munhead writes us that in Mr. Frederick Whyte's review of Mrs. Alec Tweedie's "America as I saw it," in last month's BOOKMAN, "there occurs a very pleasant reference to a book I published on America some years ago. Unluckily, however, the title of my book is wrongly given. It is named 'America The Land of Contrasts,' and not 'The Land of the Dollar.'"

Middle-aged readers will note with interest the reappearance of an old publishing name in a kindred business. Mr Samuel Tinsley, who has for many years been general manager to Messrs Roberts & Leete, has started a printing and stationery business in partnership with Mr Harold Justus Williams, formerly West End manager of Messrs. James Truscott & Son. Mr. Williams is a nephew of Sir John Bell, who was Lord Mayor of London in 1908, and Mr Tinsley is the second son of the late Samuel Tinsley, and a nephew of William Tinsley, of the famous Victorian publishing firm that gave its name to "Tinsley's Magazine."

Photo by John Frevore

Rabindranath Tagore,

the famous Indian poet and mystic, who has just been awarded the Nobel prize for literature

Mrs Charlotte Cameron, one of the most experienced and intrepid of women travellers, was born at Portsmouth; as a child she saw much of the world with her father, who was a Captain in the Royal Navy, and in later life with her late husband, an officer in the 42nd Highlanders. In 1910 she journeyed alone round the coasts of South America, motored for fifty miles along the Panama Canal, then in course of construction, and made a journey across country of over 24,000 miles. She embodied her opinions and experiences in an entertaining and useful travel book, "A Woman's Winter in South America." In 1911, she attended the Imperial Durbar at Delhi, as representative of The Lady's Pictorial and a syndicate of newspapers, and used the gorgeous pageantry and crowded happenings of

Mrs. Charlotte Cameron,

whose new travel book, "A Woman's Winter in Africa," is published by Mr Stanley Paul that great event as a background for her novel, "A Durbar Bride." Last winter, Mrs Cameron set out alone on a six months' journey along the East and West Coasts of Africa, and inland over most of the little-known parts of that wonderful region, and her new book, "A Woman's Winter in Africa" (Stanley Paul) tells the story of her daring and adventurous wanderings.

Photo by C. Vandyk

Mr. Percy Fitzgerald,

whose "Memories of Decker" (Arrowsmith) is reviewed in this Number

Miss H. B. Somerville.
Author of "Ashes of Vengeance" (Hutchinson)

Seton-Thompson By origin he is of Seton, Cameron, Logan and Snowdon stock—Thompson was not the name of an ancestor, or in any sense a family name, but one that had been assumed by his forbears during the Jacobite troubles. When he came of age he resumed the name of Seton, but to please his mother kept the combination of Seton-Thompson until her death. Later, the pseudonym Thompson has, in deference to the wishes of his business associates, been retained as a middle name. The story of Mr. Seton's early years is a story of hardships and hard work and of difficulties resolutely faced and overcome. His parents left England, after heavy financial reverses, and went to live in Canada when he was six years old.

Mr. Victor Bridges.
Author of "The Man from Nowhere," one of the most successful novels that Messrs. Mills & Boon have published this year.

Mr. Ernest Thompson Seton, whose new book "Wild Animals at Home," has just been published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton, was born at South Shields, in 1860. He published his first book, "Wild Animals I have Known," in 1898, under the name of attended the Ontario Art School, and when, in due course, he had taken the final highest honours in all subjects, it was agreed that he must go and finish his art education in London. He was to have had an allowance of sixty pounds a year to live on there, but this allowance never arrived, in two and a half years a total of eighty pounds reached

Mr. Arthur Mee,
whose "Letters to Boys" (Hodder & Stoughton), is reviewed in this

As soon as he was old enough to know his own mind, he wanted to be a naturalist. "I was doggedly set on the idea," he says. "I thought I had a mission to be the Prophet of the Outdoor Life. My father did not think so, as he was just as doggedly set on my being an artist." The result was a compromise. He

Wales, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and Lord Beaconsfield—he secured a dispensation in his favour and spent all his spare time thereafter in the Reading Room. In 1881 rumours reached his parents that his health was breaking down, and they insisted on his returning home. Back in Canada, by way

Mrs. J. E. Buckrose.
Author of "Rambles in the North Yorkshire Dales, etc." (Mills & Boon) him at irregular intervals, so, as books and art materials were necessities, "I saved," Mr. Seton explains, "on such non-essentials as food and clothing, consequently I was always ill-dressed and hungry." Because he could not pay the fees at the South Kensington School, he went to the British Museum, and worked there, till he was admitted free to the Royal Academy School as a seven years student. He was too young then, being only nineteen, to be granted a ticket for the British Museum Library, but by boldly writing to the Trustees of the Museum the Prince of

Mr. G. P. Putnam.
Author of "The Southland of North America" (Putnam).

of making a practical start, he obtained an order from a lithographer in Toronto to design a dozen Christmas cards, and for this work received the sum of sixty dollars, the largest amount in cash he had ever set eyes on. Presently, he sold some more sketches for thirty dollars, and with this purchased a stock of thirty hens and took train with them for the North-West. In Manitoba, he sold fifteen of his hens for the cost of the thirty, and "all that summer I sketched, worked on a farm, studied natural history, and raised and swopped hens"

Throughout 1883 Mr. Thompson Seton roved the great prairies and valleys of Manitoba, and so in that period of poverty was accumulating the wealth of observation and knowledge that was before long to enrich the books that have made him famous the world over. After all, his father's dogged determination to make an artist of him has borne good fruit, for no one could have illustrated his writings so truthfully, with such feeling and vivid realism as he has illustrated them himself. For some years, he tells you, "my life-line wavered up and down, but in 1896 I married Grace Gallant, of New York, and from that time it has steadily kept the upward trend." For long past, now, he has been Naturalist to the Government of

Statuette of
R. L. Stevenson.

Modelled by Herbert J. Hat
(David Bryce & Sons, Glasgow).

Manitoba, he has popularised natural history by writing it with the learning and exactitude of the student and the creative and narrative skill of the brilliant novelist. With "Wild Animals I have Known," "Lives of the Hunted," "Woodmyth and Fable," "Two Little Savages," "The Biography of a Grizzly," and the rest of the familiar series of his books he has delighted not only those who have studied and are studying natural history themselves, but a very wide and still widening circle of general readers. His newest book, "Wild Animals at Home" is in his happiest, most glamorously interesting vein, and bids fair to out-rival in popularity even the most popular works of the man who has surely realised

Mr. Compton Mackenzie.

From a sketch by J. Montgomery Flagg his first ambition and become for us "the Prophet of the Outdoor Life"

Lovers of Stevenson will be interested in the bronze statuettes of R. L. S. that are being sold at three guineas by Messrs. David Bryce & Sons, of

Miss Marjorie Bowen.

From a drawing by her sister, Miss Mary Vere Campbell

Miss Agnes Herbert,
A & C Black

Glasgow The statuette makes a slim and graceful figure and is a faithful likeness of the Stevenson of the Samoan days, familiar in the picturesque dress that has come to seem most vividly characteristic of him. It was modelled by Mr Herbert J Harvey,

Photo by Walter F. Harper, Ludlow
Mrs. Armel O'Connor.
Author of "The Idea Mary's Meadow," which was published recently by Messrs. Alston Rivers.

the well-known painter, whose picture, "The Smile," was one of the outstanding exhibits in the Royal Academy of 1910, and is a striking and very delicately finished piece of artistic portraiture

Miss Marjorie Bowen's latest novel, "The Governor of England" (Methuen), is a romance of Cromwellian days, the great Protector himself being its central figure. Miss Bowen has the gift of making "that imaginative guess from the most likely generalisations" which Mr G M Trevelyan says is the secret of the historian, the plots of her works are founded on historic facts, her characters are historic persons, and she writes of them almost with such an air of familiar understanding as they might have been written of by their own contemporaries. It was so in her first work, "The Viper of Milan," published when she was eighteen, and is so in "The Governor of England." The brilliant study of William of Orange in her three stories "I Will Maintain," "Defender of the Faith," and "God and the King," moved the Literary Society of Leyden, one of the oldest Societies in Europe, to elect the young novelist to membership, an honour usually reserved for serious Dutch historians. When Miss Bowen described Milan with such vivid and accurate detail in "The Viper of Milan," she had never been to Italy, now she is spending the first year of her married life in a charming villa of Viareggio, among the scenes that eight years ago she described from imagination.

Photo by London U.S.A.
"The Wind Press," is just published by Messrs
Blackwood

Mr. Alfred Noyes,

whose powerful narrative poem of the horrors of war, "The Wind Press," is just published by Messrs Blackwood

Our thanks are due to the various publishers who have been kind enough to assist us with the colour and photogravure plates and the general illustrations in this Number. The beautiful colour illustration from "Pink and Scarlet" (published by Hodder & Stoughton) is the work of the well-known firm of the Grout Engraving Company; and the fine four-colour plate from Messrs. Harrap's "Lohengrin" is the work of the BOOKMAN's own engravers, the Dux Engraving Company.

THE READER.

QUALITY STREET.*

By DIXON SCOTT

"QUALITY Street" is for "the quality"—let that be admitted, or affirmed, right away. It is no book for your newcomers, your parvenu readers, for those frightfully precocious, impassive, impressive young creatures, who take their first literary airings, quite self-possessed, in such precipitate new-fangled, agitating thoroughfares as "Sinister Street" or "The Street of To-day." Far away from these does it lie, in a different quarter of the town, in a mellow, faded faubourg full of dreams, and only those can understand it who know something of its history, who remember the old lane which it led from and the hidden highway it joined, and who can recollect all the hopes which ran to make a breathless crowd round the architect when he took the site in hand. Detach the book from these things and judge it intrinsically and you get—pooh!—a mere pretty tale—a kind of make-believe hijou, quaintly befurbelowed, planned out, with droll seriousness, like a real four-roomed play—and then built, bless your heart, on a plot that is really far more like a child's garden plot than a dramatic one—a plot from which the very flower-beds have not even been cleared away, so that such things as lavender and rosemary keep catching the feet of the characters, turning their movements into a minuet. The tenant's name is Miss Phoebe, and in one of these dainty rooms she is represented as keeping a school—a further suggestion being that, grown weary of teaching, she one morning pretends to be her own non-existent niece (did anyone ever hear of such goings on!) in order to attract an escort to a Ball (immoral too, it will be seen), and succeeds so well in her duplicity (though she merely shakes her curls free from her cap) that the very neighbours are deceived and her bosom friends imposed on, and the swains who mildly scorned her when she sat sedately in Room I, fall transfixed when they meet her in Room II. "A pretty trifle, but unreal. The diction, mock Georgian. The action, as artificial as the dialogue. The famous Barrie-tone of which I have always heard so much, appears in reality to be a simple treble." So might a new surveyor sum it up, with a snap—and smile indulgently at the jealous way we watched his movements.

But to us of the old school—how much more it is than that! It is a treasure-house of heirlooms, a store of lavendered delights, and life flows between the frail walls almost furiously. Every article has its history, memories race from room to room, each word uttered is a bait to bring more scampering, and the very touches that to alien eyes must seem most artificial, affect us like the friendly touches of kind hands. We recognise the very school-room, for example—"the blue-and-white room" where Miss Susan, in Scene I, sits listening with a fearful joy to a friend reading luscious love-tales from the library. For is not this the very room, down to the identical colour-scheme ("everything in it blue, or white, or both") wherein Miss Ailie, years and years ago, kept the Hanky School at Thrums and listened with delicious shame to a certain Tommy reading gloatingly borrowed love-stories full of Words We Have No Concern With? To be sure it is! And Miss Phoebe's curls? Are Miss Kitty's of course! And Patty the maid? Dagont, its Gavina! And Patty's follower?—Corp himself, by all that's mighty, disguised as an English sergeant! The whole thing is a rally of revenants. It reminds us of the old doings in the Den. And not from one book alone do the figures come trooping, nor do they shrink from exchanging characteristics. Miss Susan, to put us off, employs a trick of Tammas Haggart's. Livvy is really only Timothy. The little boy who weeps bitterly because Miss Phoebe has not caned him is borrowing beforehand one of the deeds of little David. The large S chalked on Georgy's tiny waistcoat may remind us, with one wriggle, of Mr Cathro branding Tommy—but it curls its other tail towards a "Little Mary." Phoebe herself is pure Grizel when she cries "Oh you sweet!"—but she is Babbie when she works bright muschief at the Ball. It is a masked meeting of characters dead and unborn, a bal masqué of by-gones and about-to-be's. . .

Photo by G. C. Herford

Sir J. M. Barrie.

* "Quality Street." A Comedy in Four Acts, by Sir J. M. Barrie. Illustrated by Hugh Thomson. 15s. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

And those who can see this, see something more. They understand why this assemblage is convened. The thing is a conspiracy, the blue-and-white room a dark rendezvous—creeping together so cunningly, with their false names and swapped noses, these characters are here to hatch a plot. They state loudly that the year is 1815. It is really a second and subtler '45. They all talk ostentatiously of the defeat of Napoleon. It is just to drown the fact that England is in peril. A Scotch raid is in progress, unconscious London is threatened, and this demure dames school in the shires, apparently so innocent, is an ambush where the ring-leader gathers his forces and perfects his final preparations.

"Quality Street," in other words, is part of the Great North Road, half-way between Thrums and Kensington Gardens. And down it, accordingly, the discerning eye detects, with a thrill, a small shiv figure pounding determinedly south. The figure's name does not appear among the dramatis personæ. But there is a certain light in his eye that betrays him. It is the author of "Sentimental Tommy" rushing to write "The Little White Bird." Like his famous hero, he has once more "found a way."

II

It is a fascinating thing, this progress of Tommy—I mean Barrie—the way he has dilapidated (but oh how obstinately!) worked and wriggled along his form until at length he reached his proper place. The fashionable thing to say about him now is that he has "never grown up." But this, though intended for praise, is a terribly tame version of the actual process which lies behind his career. The amazing thing about him is that he has grown, grown incessantly, but that instead of growing up, he has grown down. His case is one like Alice's. When first he set his easel up on the banks of the Quharity, his intention was to paint the simple truth, if the reader will glance back at his earliest canvases, the opening studies in "Auld Licht Idylls," he will see that their manner is the circumstantial one of Galt, with perhaps a touch of the Thoreau of "The Winter's Walk," and just a trace of the truthful Stevenson of "Pastoral." They are not "idylls" at all, the word was used ironically: the artist's idea was to show us, with a dogged Dutch fidelity, the dour reality of our sentimentalised Arcadia. He would bring out the slowness of these weavers—their ludicrous love-making, he would paint "the dull vacant faces" of the Tammas Haggarts and Pete Lunans as pitilessly as any Degas drawing washerwomen. And then, suddenly, came a change. Tammas began to grow eldritch. Pete became a quaint gnome. Gnarled idiosyncrasies sprouted, the stolid features swelled or shrunk, Thrums grew into a goblin market, all quirks and wynds and cobbles, its weavers were a race of hobnailed elves. "As unlooked for as a telegram" owns Barrie himself, somewhere in "Margaret Ogilvy," "there came to me the thought that there was something quaint about my native place. A boy who had found a knife in his pocket could not have been more surprised." That expresses perfectly the suddenness—but not the nature of the impulse. What he found in his pocket wasn't a knife. It was a little bottle labelled DRINK ME in large letters, and containing a philtre with the somewhat remarkable flavour of mixed cherry tart, custard, pine-apple, roast turkey, toffee and hot buttered toast. And standing there, on the bank of the Quharity, he drained it desperately, and at once began to shrink. He sped downwards like a stalactite, till he pierced the surface of the pool, and there he was, safe at last, beside his own reflection, in the mimic world of make-believe, so wanton and so wee, which had caught his eye and winked at him as he stood a-painting in the upper world and felt a sudden sinking of the heart. He had dived.

Now, why did he dive? Because he feared sentiment. And why did he fear sentiment? Because he was a Scot. Now, do not misunderstand this, do not take it to mean that he shrank from sentiment because, as a Scot, he hated it. It was the opposite of that. Barrie feared sentiment because, as a Scotchman, he loved the seductive thing too well. Ours is a queer country. Caresses being rare in it, we gloat furtively over the idea of them. Prettiness and daintiness seldom appearing among our lean, naked hills, we write passionate poems about tiny daisies and gemmy-eyed fieldmice. Endearments and graces which you think nothing of in the South, making free with them, with wondrous hardihood, every day, are always invested for us with a dark, dreadful deliciousness, the suppressed love of tenderness, felt by every human heart, is made feverish by the fascination of the forbidden, and there is a really close connection between the numbers of Lowland chance children, the way our Burnses treat their Jeans, and the way Barrie makes his Grizel rock her arms in an ecstasy and cry out constantly, "Oh, you sweet!"

Miss Fanny is reading aloud from a library book while the others sew or knit.

From "Quality Street," by Sir J. M. Barrie.
Reproduced from one of Hugh Thomson's colour illustrations.

Denied the use of these dear diminutives in her dour daily life, Scotland makes her poets use them for her, the Barrie's and the Burnses are urchins whom she sends to rob the orchard, so that she may be emotional by proxy, with a queer vicarious voluptuousness, watching them munching the forbidden fruit shamelessly, full in the world's face, all day long. And Barrie felt the impulse. He let his pen indulge. After he had been writing for a while he began to let himself go, he wallowed in Words We Have No Concern With and turned the tears on and off insatiably, like a lad who sees taps for the first time. He even set Lang Tammas greeting "his mouth worked convulsively, and he sobbed, crying, 'Nobody kent it, but mair than mortal son, O God, did I love the lad'"—the lad being his parish minister. You southerners felt uneasy—and indeed you had some cause. Mr Arnold Bennett lifted up his voice and spoke in public of "that excessively profitable lump of sweet-stuff The Little Minister." Its author's case was critical. We were reminded, a minute ago, of Dominie Cathro branding Tommy Destiny seemed to be on the point of doing the same to Barrie, marking his forehead with the fatal sign S B. It was the approach of the dread finger that drove Barrie to his bottle. He drank—he shrank—he ducked—he disappeared. He left reality behind him and leaped into the land where he could satisfy his wicked craving without shame—the land where prettiness is proper and make-believe is truth, where the official language is entirely formed of Words We Have No Concern With, and a kiss is no more thought of than—a thumble.

III

Into all Barrie's travels and adventures in this Never-Never-land of elvishness we must not enter now, our concern to-day being with that particular part of the journey which led him at last up into Quality Street. He had a glorious time down there—yet I would have you think of him, throughout it all, as longing, longing, as wistfully as any other human soul astray in fairyland, for some means of getting back to mortal ways. He had got separated from his earthly shadow—which had by now gone up to London—he wanted his art to join his body there, and endless were the dodges he employed to coax his cunning to go back to common earth. One of the best was on the day when he persuaded his mother to come to the edge of his pool and look down. When the reflection of her face touched his art, it gave a leap and lived gloriously in the upper sunlight for a little. We call that moment "Margaret Ogilvy," and still regard it as one of the noblest of his books. Another device consisted of selecting some Thrums character, one with whom his

Miss Phoebe is giving a dancing lesson to half a dozen pupils, and is doing her very best.

From "Quality Street," by Sir J. M. Barrie.
Reproduced from one of Hugh Thomson's colour illustrations.

art was already familiar, and then craftily sending that character off by train to London. This was done with Rob Angus, the Thrums millwright's lad (the full account of it is in "When a Man's Single"). But, no—the art wouldn't follow. It would only consent to join Rob's story when the characters turned impish—in Noble Summ's room, for instance beneath that Japanese umbrella, or among the mad members of The Wigwam. From all the others, the real grown-ups—Colonel Abinger, Sir Clement Downton, Miss Meredith—his skill held obstinately aloof. Either that, or, making an effort, it would start playing with them sentimentally, in the old waked way, until it had to be called off in terror, hastily dosed with Alice's mixture, and set to some absurdity, so as to pass off those excesses with a laugh.

Well, we know now, of course, that there was only one way of escape from his underworld—and that was up through the crystal lid of the Round Pond. He could only be allowed to enter real life again if he consented to come companioned and guarded by babies, he had to steal into our world at that extremest verge of it, on the very borders Elfland, where everything is actually quaint and sweet and small already—the houses doll's houses, the mortals all wee,—where Grizel could rock her arms and smile her crooked smile, and run no risk of being rebuked by Arnold Bennetts.

But until the day he found that out, Barrie made few happier guesses than the one that brought him bobbing up in Phoebe's school-room. The idea will be evident. It was a kind of back-stairs. He would creep into England through an unguarded postern, through an entrance a hundred years old, and then, having accustomed his forces to 1815, would creep down the years towards To-day. Many reasons made the ruse a good one. When he wrote full-grown modern English, the critics complained it was stilted. Well, in Georgian days, seemingly, words always walked on little stilts, and so his own would pass muster there perfectly. Then, again, there was the school-room and he had already begun to feel that his art got on oddly well with youngsters. And, finally, there were all the darling quirks of decorum and costume—the ringlets and crinolines—the curtsies and the chintz—the Whimsy cakes, pattens, and blue-and-white porcelain-toys—and treasures no fairy-bred art could resist, and no mere mortal-bred art use so well.

Small wonder, then, that Quality Street, though it proved in part a cul de sac, made his genius feel perfectly at home. He had to retreat from it, ultimately take to his mines again, extend his subterranean galleries till they stretched beneath Kensington and he could drive a shaft up into the unprotected Gardens after closing-time, instead of clattering into London (as once he had hoped) along the Great North Road of high romance. But he learned a lot while he was there, his pen acquired many graces, taking lessons in deportment from Phoebe—improving on the Hanky School code, generally preparing itself, unconsciously, for that great and glorious day when it would be entrusted with the tender character of little David. And it was very happy—you can see that for yourself. In and out the little houses, in and out Miss Phoebe's curls, in and out the vastly's and devoutly's, the quizzings and the 'twas's, it darts and struts and tumbles with the utmost zest and cunning. Nor, given such an opportunity, did it fail, you may be sure, to play its master's favourite game of Lost Identities. You know that game, of course? It is played in all Barrie's books. Somebody pretends to be somebody else, or pretends that nobody is somebody—with the result that there is always an alter ego wandering round, an invisible Being that has got to be dodged or scotched or swallowed or squareed. It was playing this game so hard that made Captain Hook's voice (if you remember) so remarkably like Wendy's father's. It was over this game that Miss Irene Vanburgh, in "Rosalind," doubled her charms by being two people at once. Little Mary Timothy Tink-a-Bell Stroke Beings, alter-ego's, every one. William Paterson Benjamin "My Brother Henry." The wistful little girl in Grizel's mirror. And now, here in Quality Street, Miss Livvy.

It would be strange indeed if such a predilection did not betoken something deeper—and readers of the old school well know that it does. They have always realised that, long ago, at the outset of his career, Barrie's own character split into two: the one half making fun of the pomps and claims of authorship, refusing to take writing books seriously,—while the other, who could not but regard books with awe, stayed in actuality, and gravely dreamed of lasting fame. To and fro behind his sentences these two have always chased and tussled, and the game of Lost Identities is but the shadow-show they cast. Sometimes the solemn artist holds the stage defiantly, oftener the other ego pops up and makes him laugh, sometimes the small mocker, weary of make-believe, can be heard pattering through the pages crying wistfully for his brother. But whether they meet, or whether they greet, or whether they suddenly appear simultaneously in a scene like the last uncanny tableau in "Petrouchka," our affectionate absorption never fails. One book delights us because the elf tried to spoil it, another because the author was in form, and "Quality Street" will always be remembered by us gratefully because it was there that the two found a mutual domain, and lived happily for a little side by side.

I would not sleep to-night if I ended without thanking Mr. Hugh Thomson for his perfect pictures of this enchanted rendezvous. Henceforward I am going to call him Master Tamson—for I feel certain (it never occurred to me before) that he, too, must be a Scot. No one but a Scotchman could have dwelt with such chuckling delight on the twinkling oddities of eighteenth-century English architecture on its plump-stomached window panes and fairy-tale caves and the endearing demureness of its inlaid spinets and samplers. He felt like a "foreigner at home" there, and the result is both faithful and impish, it is beautiful, yet it all has a comical cast, it is realistic, yet deliciously rum. By the time this note appears "Quality Street" will be on the boards again. What it looks like there, I do not know. But I feel jealously certain, none the less, that, between boards it is vastly better. No stage-carpenter on earth could make properties like Mr. Tamson's—not even Miss Vanburgh deceive us like his Livvy.

THOMAS HARDY.*

By JOHN BAILEY

WHY is Mr Hardy incomparably the greatest of living English novelists? Many answers might be given to that question, but one is enough. He is great, no doubt, because he is a great artist, with an artist's instinct for design and proportion, and he is great because he is a master of the English language, but his most indisputable title to rank above all living rivals lies in the fact that what he gives us in his novels is always, or almost always, truth seen in the light of poetry, not realism seen in the light of the fashion or scandal, the social or political propaganda of the hour. He is never a High Churchman or a Low Churchman, never a Christian apologist nor, with occasional unfortunate exceptions, an anti-Christian controversialist. So in political matters. A Conservative may feel that Mr Hardy is a Radical. But his Radicalism is just one of the two eternal halves of the eternal whole of the human being in the sphere of politics, it is a thing one may almost say, of all time and existence, not a thing that cannot open its mouth without declaiming about the wages question, or the woman's question, or the problem of the birth-rate, in fact, not journalism, but poetry. He has always been a man of much more than his own generation, caring about things that no single generation can claim for its exclusive property. His theme has mainly been man in the most universal and elemental phase of his existence, the peasant still living, face to face with nature, the life of primitive needs, fears, hopes, loves, man and woman, in naked simplicity, under the sun and the stars, as they have lived winter after summer and summer after winter for a thousand years. This is what he had seen with his own eyes in his own country, and he has had the imaginative power to divine in it what belongs to all countries and all ages. That, above all the rest, is the true secret of his greatness.

The edition, of which the present volume makes the eighteenth of those given to prose, is proof enough, if proof were needed, that this greatness is recognised not only by the critics, but by the public. Probably there is not one of these stories which had a title of the sale at its first appearance that several novels of this autumn have already had. But few are the popular novels, we are told by publishers, that are still being sold after six months, fewer still, almost none, after a year. Those who serve the moment have the reward of the moment, but there are no collected editions of their work. That is reserved for those whose imagination makes it impossible for them to live only in the present, and who write the English of the great tradition untainted by the slang or journalism of the hour. And of these the greatest to day is the author of the twenty-one volumes which make up the Wessex Edition of the works of Thomas Hardy.

"A Changed Man" is the latest of these, and is added, as the author's prefatory note says, to make "a dozen minor novels" accessible to buyers of the complete edition of the works. No one will pretend that Mr Hardy is seen at his finest in any of them. They vary in length from the twelve pages of "The Duke's Re-appearance," a legend of Monmouth, to the hundred and more of "The Romantic Adventures of a Milkmaid," where truth and Wessex are strangely invaded by a fantastic foreign Baron of Meredithian parentage. Most of them appear to have been written some time ago, and none shows the power of the master as we know it in "The Woodlanders," or "The Return of the Native." In them, as in all the great novels and dramas of all nations, it is character above all things which is destiny. The incalculable wilfulnesses of Fate are, it is true, for ever surprising us with unexpected windfalls and undeserved disasters. But, with Agamemnon and Lear, with Maggie Tulliver and Bathsheba Everdene, we feel that however inscrutable Fate may have overloaded the balance of justice, yet it remains true that the suffering is not a wholly unnatural result of the character.

"Passions spin the plot
We are betrayed by what is false within"

A different Maggie would not have gone to Mudport, a different Bathsheba would not have married Troy. But in many of the stories collected in this volume the caprice of accident plays so large a part that there is little left to be played by the men and women. And, after all, men and women, not chance or accident, are the stuff of drama.

Photo by Clive Holland

Mr. Thomas Hardy.

* "A Changed Man, The Waiting Supper, and other Tales," concluding with "The Romantic Adventures of a Milkmaid." By Thomas Hardy 6s. (Macmillan)

Still, with all their defects, most of the stories, and especially the finest, "The Waiting Supper," are such as only Mr Hardy could have written. Some of their unconvincing improbabilities are to be excused by an atmosphere of comedy, which has always allowed itself the help of the unlikely accidents to work out its ends. So the Baron and the Ball and the bedside-wedding may pass as part of fantastic comedy's legitimate stock-in-trade. Those that cannot make that excuse—like the conversion in "A Changed Man"—must do the best they can with the plea that they occur in short stories, which the author expressly reprints only "for what they may be worth." But the "Changed Man" will make many people ask themselves why conversions seem never to prove convincing, whether they come from Mr Masfield or Mrs Wilfrid Ward, or even Mr Hardy? Is it because, as Aristotle thought, imaginative literature deals, not with what happens, but with what ought in all reasonable probability to happen? Great sinners do, in fact, occasionally become great saints: we all know it, but we cannot see the process of it, and we never cease to be surprised at it. There lies the difference between life and art; art deals with events which surprise us when they happen, but after they have happened seem part of the inevitable course of things.

One thing which everyone who thinks of reading the book will be glad to hear is that nearly all the stories belong to Wessex. The only one which does not—"Alicia's Diary"—is certainly the poorest in the collection, probably for the reason that people who are "well to do" and spend their time at Versailles, have placed a double wall between themselves and Mr Hardy's imagination. The rest are more or less intimately Wessex. The scene of one, the melodramatic and improbable "Committee Man of the Terror," is laid at the Weymouth of George III. Another, the pleasant comedy of "A Mere Interlude," belongs to the Scilly Islands. It ends with an agreeable stroke of justice as conceived by comedy. But the best things are those that are the purest Wessex. All the Milkmaid, for instance, except the "fine-framed, dark-moustachioed gentleman" who is found in his garden meditating suicide in a dressing-gown and slippers at six o'clock in the morning, belongs to that familiar and delightful world, and he, perhaps, matters the less because he belongs to no world at all. Still more entirely inside the charmed circle, except for a rather melodramatic Duke and Duchess, is "What the Shepherd Saw" one moonlight night, near the Devil's Door on Marlbury Downs. "I be an old man, and there's old men that deserve well of the world"; we know where we are, and in whose hands, when we read that, and we have no wish to be anywhere else. So again, "The Grave by the Handpost," a bit of irony mainly comic, is pure Wessex and pure Hardy, as is also "Enter a Dragoon," where the irony is less tragic than comic. "Here's his son's letter 'Twas found in his father's pocket. You can see by the state o't how many times he read it over. Howsomever, the Lord's will be done, since it must, whether or no." The Shakespearian certainty of that belongs to Mr Hardy and to no one else to-day. He and he alone has been able to take a piece of our actual world, and, passing it through the crucible of his imagination, reproduce it as a thing real and eternal, so that, though we know nothing of the actual experience on which all is founded, we have the most undoubting assurance that the men and women of the books could by no possibility speak or act in a way different to that in which we see them act and speak. The only possible contemporary rivals to the peasants of Wessex are perhaps Mr Kipling's private soldiers. However little we know of the barrack room, we are for the moment as sure of them as we are of Gabriel Oak. But does not the actuality in them overweight the poetry? Are they not a little too much of their own generation? Will they be as alive a hundred years hence as they are now? But Gabriel Oak will, he belongs to all generations, and is above all accidents of time and place.

THE LIFE OF FRANCIS THOMPSON.*

By SIR W. ROBERTSON NICOLL

"THE Life of Francis Thompson," by Everard Meynell, is a book to be welcomed with sincere gratitude. It gives us the one authoritative account of the great poet's perplexed and difficult life. In a sense we do not need it. The true expression of the man is secured in immortal verse. Nor does he need to be vindicated against accusers, as has been the hapless lot of many in similar case. No one has brought charges against Francis Thompson. The biographer does not need to be an advocate. He has the facts to tell us, and they speak for themselves, so that his own tranquil and merciful view of the fallings and risings in Thompson's career will be accepted by all readers. While Mr Meynell's style is generally to be commended for its reserve and self-command, there are passages which do not yield their significance to a first reading. This obscurity was perhaps unavoidable. A life like Thompson's raises problems to which there is no easy answer—to which perhaps there is no answer at all.

In the early chapters we are told of his birth at Preston in 1859. He was the son of a medical man in that town, and his parents had become converts to the Roman Catholic Church. He was sent in due course to Ushaw to prepare for the priesthood. Lafcadio Hearn had been before him, and Henry Patmore, who lived to write some exquisite things, was his companion. He was a delicate, melancholy, book-loving boy, much engrossed in his own spiritual welfare. But his absent-mindedness and a certain curious indolence which made him "always behind-hand with punctual eve and in trouble with strict noon," disqualified him for the service of the Church. He was sent to Owen's College at Manchester to learn

* "The Life of Francis Thompson" By Everard Meynell
13s net (Burns & Oates)

Francis Thompson The Life Mask
1905

THE LIFE OF FRANCIS THOMPSON
By Everard Meynell
(Burns and Oates, Ltd)

medicine, but he did not attend classes and could not pass examinations. His mother had given him a copy of De Quincey's Confessions, and Thompson took to opium. He maintained, and his biographer partly agrees, that the effects of opium on his constitution were not wholly disastrous. On the other hand, opium is responsible for much of the misery and powerlessness of his later life. He had another chance at Glasgow with similar results, he enlisted in the army, and in no long time he was on the pavements of Oxford Street, without money, without friends, working at a boot-black stand and as a message-boy, as a seller of matches, living vacant and desperate days, poorly consoled by his nightly doses of opium. The way was stony and sore to the feet, but he was not without helpers, one in particular.

She passed—O brave, sad,
lovingest, tender thing!
And of her own scant pittance did she give,
That I might eat and live

But the availing succour was found in 1887, when he sent his manuscripts to Alice and Wilfrid Meynell. He said "I was myself virtually his pupil, and his wife's long before I knew him. He has in my opinion—an opinion of long standing—done more than any man of these latter days to educate the Catholic literary opinion." Here may be noted the singular and almost unique patience of Francis Thompson. He is not the first man of genius who fell into wild ways of living, but these did not lead him to hate and abuse his fellow-men. The natural revolt that is stirred by the sense of neglected merit, and the sight of good fortune, falling to the lot of the despicable, is hardly to be traced in the record of Thompson's experiences. He was not tormented as Savage and Poe were tormented by a burning sense of injustice. He remained lovable in the severest trials, and notwithstanding his weaknesses those who really knew him were convinced that in the end he was a good man, though never wholly victorious over his temptations, and never settling down quite steadfastly into a happy mode of living.

He was most fortunate in the friends who afterwards and to the last did their very utmost to protect and regulate his life. They perceived that he was essentially a Catholic mystic. It was necessary for him to do his share of drudgery, but this came in a comparatively easy way—the writing of reviews for The Academy and The Athenæum. This, however, was not his true business. He did it as well as most, and in his essay on Shelley he produced prose that will stand with his poetry. But I cannot think that he really possessed the faculty of writing musical prose. Perhaps this gift is born and not acquired by labour and study, however it may be improved.

Mr Everard Meynell recounts the years during which Thompson lived and wrote for mankind. His full recognition arrived somewhat tardily, but it was sure from the first. The immediate verdict that matters is the verdict of the few.

He had the Meynells and Coventry Patmore, and the splendid appreciation, as it is justly called here, by Mr Garvin in THE BOOKMAN of March, 1897, and before the end came he was numbered with his true peers. Hardly once in a hundred years do we find the fire, the stress, the unction along with the personal religious simplicity, which place a man among the supreme Catholic poets. He was a dreamer to the end. Conversation was an almost impossible effort to him. He had no possessions, and he had no home. "All that he left at his death was a tin box of refuse—pipes that would not draw, unopened letters, a spirit lamp without wick, pens that would not write. At no time did he possess a bookcase, nor sufficient books to crowd the slenderest shelf." He lived till 1907, but wrote no poems for years before. His magnificent work was done, and it may well be that Francis Thompson.

From a drawing by the Hon
From "The Life of Francis Thompson" by F. V.

ll (B. & Oates)

no substantial addition was possible. In the pages he has left behind him we have enough. He did not live till the glories of his style developed into tricks or hardened into mannerism.

One word must be said about the ever-to-be-remembered friendship between Thompson and W. M. and A. M. W. M.'s countless benefactions, endless patience and genial counsel were not the easy gifts of a millionaire. Of A. M. what shall we say? It is told in the memoir of Sister Dora that one night a fine healthy young man was brought into the hospital with his arm torn by a machine, and the doctor said it must be amputated at once. Sister Dora declared she could save it if he would let her try. He told her she was mad, but if she chose to be responsible she must have her way. She did save the arm which was always thenceforth called "Sister's arm." Years after when she was very ill the young man walked over every Sunday eleven miles to ask for her. When the servant answered his vigorous pull at the hospital bell, he asked "How's Sister?" and having got his answer said "Tell her that it is her arm that rang the bell." It was A. M.'s arm that rang the golden bell.

MR. KIPLING'S VERSES.*

By PIERCEVAL GIBBON

ANYONE might have guessed, though I know of no one who did, that the snatch of song in "Puck of Pook's Hill," beginning "When I left Rome for Lalage's sake," must have a context and a continuation, it was impossible that Mr. Kipling, having made so happy a beginning, should break off where the Centurion did and leave it incomplete. All these years the full version of it has lain "among his papers"; it appears at last in a volume which has strangely the air of having been compiled by a literary executor rather than by Mr. Kipling himself. As the prefatory note states, the volume contains practically all the verses and chapter-headings scattered through Mr. Kipling's books, and among them are some which, one feels, might have been suffered to remain unresurrected, if only for the sake of the poor figure they make in company with his more recent and felicitous work. For an example, "The Sack of the Gods," from "The Naulahka," belongs to those dark ages in which Mr. Kipling could write

"Dust of the stars was under our feet, glitter of stars above—

Wrecks of our wrath dropped reeling down as we fought and we spurned and we strove

Worlds upon worlds we tossed aside, and scattered them to and fro,

The night that we stormed Valhalla, a million years ago!"

Mr. Kipling's later books, notably "Puck of Pook's Hill" and "Rewards of Fairies," have been the occasion of much verse, most of it is fine and the best is above praise. Here Mr. Kipling's patriotism is mellowed to a genuine and very beautiful love of England, the very earth of her fabric and the green upon the face of her. His wonderful knack of knowledge, which before now has evidenced itself in a rather noticeable omniscience, softens itself to a wise and sympathetic comprehension of life as it is shaped and guided by its environment of downland and sea shore. It is not only that he knows the mere history of the south country, with names and dates in singular completeness, he knows, and tells with ecstasy, what the south country folk say and think and feel, he can convey into his verse the melody that is in the Kent and Sussex tongue. In "A Three Part Song," he makes not for the first time, his confession

"I've buried my heart in a ferny hill,
Twix' a liddle low shaw an' a great high gill
Oh hop-blue yaller an' wood-smoke blue,
I reckon you'll keep her muddling true!"

I've given my soul to the Southdown grass,
And sheep-bells tinkled where you pass
Oh Firle an' Ditchling an' sails at sea,
I reckon you keep my soul for me!"

What is peculiar to Mr. Kipling's manner of seeing things—and certainly his readers are the richer for it—is the fact that he has apparently not taken either the little low shaw nor the great high gill at their mere face value, he is very much aware that they were there long ago and served in their time as scenery to great or little drama. That appears even more clearly in "Puck's the fe     ride     at steals

* "Songs from Books" By Rudyard Kipling 6s (Macmillan)

Into the oak woods fir'     /
O that was when     hewed the
That rolled to Trafalgar
See you the dimpled track that run
All hollow through the wheat?
O that was where they hauled the
That smote King Philip's fleet
See you our stilly woods of oak
And the dread ditch beside?
O that was where the Saxons broke
On the day that Harold died!"

The poems which are antiquarian, whether in their setting or their subject, are in general admirable. "Eddi's Service," "A Smuggler's Song," "A St. Helena Lullaby," "Brookland Road," "Cold Iron," "The Looking-Glass," and "Poor Honest Men," show the author at his strongest, in that fortunate vein which appeals with an equal sureness to both adults and children. I had hoped to find, among verses which appeared in the first place singly and are here completed, a fragment which promised to be a worthy companion to "A Smuggler's Song"—I mean "Telscombe Tye" from "Brother Squaretoes"

"The moon she shined on Telscombe Tye,
On Telscombe Tye at night it was
She saw the smugglers riding by,
A very pretty sight it was

Three Dunkirk boats was standing in—"

And there it ended, and there, apparently, it is to end. A pity!

It is noteworthy that Mr. Kipling, when he writes prose, has only one manner, but when he writes verse, he has many. I have enumerated above several poems of real charm which illustrate most happily one side of his talent, in such poems as "The Way through the Woods" and "A Charm" he shows another facet of it. Versatility in any art is a dangerous quality, if only that it engenders the suspicion of critics, but there is more than versatility in the gift that enables Mr. Kipling to turn from writing his delightful "Smuggler's Song" to sing his "Cuckoo Song" or prescribe "A Charm" such as this

"Take of English flowers these -
Spring's full-faced primroses,
Summer's wild wide-hearted rose,
Autumn's wall-flower of the close,
And, thy darkness to illumine,
Winter's bee-thronged ivy-bloom
Seek and serve them where they bide
From Candlemas to Christmas-tide
For these simples, used aright,
Can restore a failing sight

These shall cleanse and purify
Webbed and inward-turning eye,
These shall show thee treasure hid,
Thy familiar fields amid,
And reveal (which is thy need)
Every man a King indeed.

Supplement to The Bookman
Christmas 1913

Ernest Thompson Seton

Ernest Thompson Seton

The wide circle of Mr Kipling's readers and admirers will welcome this book, and not the less cordially because it sounds echoes from the days of the "Plain Tales." Much that it contains is slight and unimportant, a little is actually poor, the rest is so excellent that it should have had a volume to itself, to take its place on one's shelves at the tail of the Kipling row which can never lengthen too rapidly

ERNEST THOMPSON SETON.

By CHARLES G. D. ROBERTS

IF there be one man, since St Francis of Assisi, whom all the kindreds of the wild have cause to bless, it is Ernest Thompson Seton. It is he who is chiefly responsible for the vogue of the modern "Animal Story." The effect of the modern animal story has been to persuade people that the wild creatures are of interest in their personalities, in their psychology, and not merely as things to be shot or put in shows. This has resulted in a more sympathetic and understandingly humane attitude toward our marticulate kin.

When I credit the vogue of the modern animal story to Ernest Seton, I am not unmindful, needless to say, of the imitable Mowgli. But those unrivalled creations of Kipling's are, obviously, of quite another species. They derive from the old fabliaux and from the folk-lore tales. Their natural history may be sound enough, as far as it goes, but it is incidental, and concerns us only so far as it helps along the story. The tales of Seton and his disciples, on the other hand, derive directly from the work of such close and loving observers of nature as Richard Jeffries and John Burroughs. They aim to present carefully observed fact. But to give it wider currency and more concrete personal interest, they present it in the form of fiction. They individualise the bird, beast, fish, or insect with which they deal. But, unlike the old fabliaux and their kind, they are careful not to humanise their subjects. They are either fragments of animal biography, or they are formally developed nouvelles, each with a central figure, about which gather the experiences which observation has shown appropriate to its kind. On the material side such nature stories are fact disguised as fiction.

But there is another side to these stories, and it is the pre-eminently distinctive side. They aim above all to get at the psychology of their subjects. They are not content to deal with the skins of the wild creatures, but they seek to get inside those skins. From observed actions they strive to deduce motives and emotions. They are based on the conviction shared by practically all experienced hunters and successful keepers, or tamers of animals, and denied chiefly by closet theorists—that there is an animal psychology. The old animal stories, if they went beyond mere external incident or adventure, simply humanised their subjects, ascribing emotions and motives that would be proper, in like circumstances, to human beings. Seton has taught us to expect, in the animal story, a psychology immeasurably simpler to be sure, than that of man, a psychology to the last degree limited indeed, but none the less real and worthy of investigation. He spurns the theory that all animal life below the human plane is the blind and helpless slave of reflex action.

As spokesman of the marticulate kindreds, Ernest

Seton is uniquely qualified. He approaches them from so many points. He knows them in so many ways. And he is untainted by that excess of sentimentality towards them which too often perverts the view of the sympathetic nature-lover. As a country boy in Canada he began then acquaintance very early and found it so much to his taste that he has been following it up and extending it diligently ever since. He is an expert with gun, trap, and camera. Cunning as an Indian to unravel the tangled trails, and patient as a lynx in watching, he has been able to spy upon the wild things when they least suspected it and so get at the intimate side of their lives. He has seen more than other men. And he has seen with such discriminating, accurate, and conscientious eyes, that

ERNEST SETON

"They all rushed under it like a lot of little pigs."
From "The Autobiography of a Grizzly" by Ernest Thompson Seton

I should be inclined to doubt the evidence of my own eyes, if I found it conflicting with that of his. I might, perhaps, join issue with him in a matter of the psychology at work behind the facts, but as to the facts themselves, gathered by his own observation, I would never regard them as open to question.

Having gained, as hunter and naturalist, so close an acquaintance with the creatures of the wilderness, Seton's first thought was to depict them as a painter, as a draughtsman. In the classrooms of the Royal Academy he trained his native aptitude for the brush and the pencil, and became a skilful artist, needless to say, not of the Post-Impressionist school. There is never any likelihood for instance, of one of Seton's guzzles being mistaken for a view of St. Paul's in a rainy sunrise. The product of his pencil is always so definitely and distinctively what it sets out to be, that the most austere of scientific naturalists may accept it as a label. At the same time we nature-lovers, who care more about the personal characteristics of a beast than about the number and configuration of his molars, are given that intimate individual touch which we are always seeking.

But when Ernest Seton undertook to convey his rich knowledge and fine enthusiasm, he found he had much more to say than brush and pencil could express. His own pictures drove him to writing about them. With the true instinct of the story-teller, his funds of authentic and verified material fall naturally into the form of fiction. The result was that fresh, vital book, "Wild Animals I Have Known." To the credit of the popular taste be it said, this pre-eminent sane and convincing book won instantly a success as emphatic as that of the most sensational novel. It was no mere "boom" success, however, but an enduring one. His other books in the same vein drove home the triumph, and the modern Nature tale was established in a popularity which neither travesty nor attack has been able to undermine.

Photo by John Brown
From "Wild Animals I Have Known"

Bull Elk Charging.
Thompson Seton, which Messrs

But to the temperament of this vigorous nature-lover even the pen and the pencil together did not seem to offer outlet enough. He had mimetic and dramatic faculty, a powerful and flexible voice accustomed to carrying across the wooded valleys, and the gift of telling a story vividly beside the camp-fire. These gifts he impressed to the task of interpreting his shy wilderness friends to the public. He went on the lecture platform, and hundreds of thousands who had been left cold by the printed page were reached and roused to interest by his magnetic personality. With his tall, lithe form, sinewy from much following of the trails, his lean and swarthy face, his wavy black hair worn rather longer than convention prescribes, his dark and watchful eyes, his head held somewhat up as if to sniff the air and search the hillsides, he looks his part as interpreter of the wilds. And when he adds to the convincing force of his narration his amazingly accurate mimics, reproducing the calls of the beasts, the pipings and the cries of birds, the spell is so strong that the lights and the intent audience fade away, and once more one goes furtively with alert eyes and restrained breath, through the transparent but confusing shadows of the ancient forest.

In this brief note I have concerned myself exclusively with Seton's work as interpreter of the animal world to the world of men. Because of this work of his, men everywhere are growing more considerate of their feathered or four-foot kin. But his wholesome activities are by no means limited to this one field, broad as it is. Himself incorrigibly a boy, his understanding of boys and his enthusiasm about them led him to a novel venture. He bethought him that innate in the heart of the natural boy was the desire to play Indian. He felt—and I think most of us will agree with him—that the boy could hardly be better employed, when not learning arithmetic and Latin verbs. Upon this theory he founded the "Seton Indians," an organisation to promote the art of "camping out," to spread the cult

Photo by E. T. Seton

Gray Wolf.

From Mr. Ernest Thompson Seton's new book "Wild Animals at Home" of wild life It taught scouting, trailing, swimming, canoeing, and courage, insight, truth, endurance It found its material wherever boys were boys It spread, and it formed the foundation of one of the most virile and admirable movements of modern days—the Boy Scout movement—of which, in America, Seton is naturally the inspiring influence. When the effect of this movement begins to manifest itself, as it must, in the finer, more unselfish, and more robust ideals of manhood of the generation now maturing, it seems to me that the kindreds of men, no less than the kindreds of the wild, will have reason to be grateful to Ernest Seton.

THE COLOUR OF CHRISTMAS.

NOTES ON SOME OF THE NEW GIFT BOOKS.

By A ST JOHN ADCOCK.

STRICTLY speaking, every good book is a Christmas Book For example, here is the new complete edition of Tennyson,<sup>1</sup> edited with a memoir by Hallam, Lord Tennyson, and annotated with the poet's own notes, and here, too, are the Oxford Press Shakespeare<sup>2</sup>, illustrated with three portraits and numerous black-and-white reproductions of famous paintings, and an excellent and marvellously cheap re-issue of Mr Wheatley's edition of Pepy's Diary<sup>3</sup>, in eight volumes—the only satisfactory edition yet published of one of the most curiously fascinating Diaries ever written Who that cares for books could wish, at any time of the year, for better gifts than these? Nevertheless, it has come about by a sort of natural evolution in the publishing world that there is a special type of volume which is regarded as the essentially Christmas Book It may be an old book with new illustrations, or old illustrations with a new book written about them, or both book and pictures may be new But it must be tastefully bound, beautifully produced, the illustrations must have real artistic value, and for preference they must be printed in colour Every Christmas offers such books to us in such rich plenty that we who are general readers are touched for the time with Stevensonian bliss and move through our book-world feeling it is so full of a number of things that we ought to be—and probably we are—as happy as kings For there is not only beauty to choose from, there is such an almost bewildering variety of it, that it is impossible to believe there exists a man of such unique taste in literature that no one among this multitude of Christmas books can appeal to him and give him pleasure The most studious, serious-minded person must at least be delighted with the British Empire Universities Modern English Dictionary<sup>4</sup>, with its coloured plates and monotonies, its duograph charts and maps In addition to its enormous list of words and definitions, it furnishes special glossaries by sporting and other experts, articles on "Great English Writers," by Sir A I Quiller-Couch," on "Versification and Prosody," by Professor Santsbury, on "The Origin and History of Dictionaries," by Dr Foster Watson, on "The Dictionary as an Educational Factor," by Sir James Yoxall, on the Origin and Development of the English language, on the British Empire, and on divers others subjects—all which serve to make it at once a work of reference and a book you can read for pleasure as well as instruction After all, though, who can with safety say that a Dictionary is best suited to the most studious of readers, when obviously it is the least studious that are most in need of it? On the same principal I would not recommend this sumptuous and finely illustrated edition of Mr. E V Lucas's already classical anthology, "The

Cymbeline.

From "The Complete Works of Shakespeare," Illustrated (Oxford Press).

ACT III. SCENE VI. Wales Before the Cave of Belarius.

*Imogen (in boy's clothes) . . . Ho! Who's here?
If any thing that's civil, speak, if savage,
Take or lend. Ho! No answer? Then I'll enter*

<sup>1</sup> "The Works of Tennyson" With Notes by the Author Edited by Hallam, Lord Tennyson 10s. 6d net (Macmillan)

<sup>2</sup> "The Complete Works of Shakespeare" Edited, with glossary, by W J Craig 4s 6d net (Oxford Press)

<sup>3</sup> "The Diary of Samuel Pepys" Edited, with additions, by Henry B. Wheatley. 8 Vols 5s net each (G Bell & Sons)

<sup>4</sup> "The British Empire Universities Modern English Dictionary" 20s (Syndicate Publishing Co)

Open Road," exclusively or even especially to those who love the broad highway and the wind on the heath. In its earlier form it was in every sense "a book for wayfarers," as Mr Lucas calls it, but no wayfarer could fit this splendidly large volume into his pocket, for it is as big as a knapsack, which is a just recognition that it is not meant for the carnal tramp only, but also for the tramp in spirit, and to sit by the fire and revel in this joyous breeziest collection of good poems is as healthful and tonic a thing as a walk of many miles and, moreover leaves you untired at the finish.

For all who are susceptible to the lure of the road, and also for those who are contented to stay at home and read of the places it runs to, and for that happy, active section of the community that loves to work in gardens, or to study the life of the woods and fields, here are several books next on my list that were made for their enjoyment. You may not agree with Mr Forbes Gray in his introduction to "A Summer in Skye," that Alexander Smith's memory is "kept green by this one book" but, much as you might like to, you cannot truthfully deny that it has proved the most popular of his works. Its prose is the nervous, imaginative prose of his "Dicam-

* "The Open Road"
Compiled by E. V. Lucas
Illustrated in Colour by Claude A. Shepperson 21s
net (Methuen)

* "A Summer in Skye," Illustrations in Colour by John Blair 5s net (Nimmo)

Cuchullin Hills, Skye.
From "A Summer in Skye," by Alexander Smith (Nimmo).

you are becoming vividly acquainted with the outward aspect of its places and people. Only a poet could have written such a guide-book, and it is very high praise to say that Mr John Blair's colour pictures are worthy of standing here beside the prose of Alexander Smith. Mr Reginald Farrer takes you farther afield in "The Dolomites," to a stranger, more wonderful country that lies like a vast garden among the Alps of South Tyrol. He gives you all the practical information you require for the journey, describes the passes and valleys, the villages and villagers, and the luxuriant blossom and bloom that make this mountainous region a very wonderland of fragrance and living colour, and describes them with remniscent enjoyment and a practised cunning that make picturesque and attractive reading. Out on the Alps, but on a very different part of them, you find yourself again in Mr Benson's "Winter Sports in thorpe," as says, it gives you a magical pen-picture of Edinburgh that even Stevenson has scarcely equalled, and when in its leisurely, graciously discursive fashion it has landed you in Skye, it describes the place in such fashion that you grow to realise all the beauty and strange charm of that wild island while

"The Shambles of the Plain."
From "Hoof and Claw," by C. G. D. Roberts (Ward, Lock)

* "The Dolomites,"
Painted by E. Harrison
Compton. Described by Reginald Farrer. 7s 6d net.
(A. & C. Black)

Switzerland,"<sup>9</sup> a charmingly written, well-informed, thoroughly useful guide to the skating, tobogganing, curling, ice-hockey, and other sports of the high Alpine pleasure resorts. It is written so well, with such knowledge and gusto and genial humour that, as with Lucas's "Open Road," to stop at home and read it is almost as invigorating as going to Switzerland and skating and curling and tobogganing like the strenuous people in Mr. Fleming Williams's illustrations. "The Land of the Blue Poppy"<sup>10</sup> lies in Eastern Tibet, it is a land of flowers, like the Dolomites (the blue poppy being that from which opium is made), and Mr. Kingdon travelled through it with a naturalist's eye for its plants and trees as well as a wide-open ordinary human eye for whatever of mortal interest he passed by the way. It is a fascinating travel book, whether you go to it as a student of natural history or as an average reader in search of amusement, and by the time you are at the end you will understand the hope its author utters in his preface, that before his book was published he might be "back in the Land of the Blue Poppy." The illustrations are not in colour, but are such excellent photographs so well reproduced that they suggest the atmosphere and almost the colour of the scenes they reveal. In "To Norway and the North Cape"<sup>11</sup> Mr. C. C. Lynam gives us the log of another of his cruises in Blue

Dragon II, the yacht that took him on the voyage that he described in that other breezy volume, "The Log of the Blue Dragon II, in Orkney and Shetland." If you have read that I need say nothing more of this than that it is vivid and high-spirited and as variously entertaining as its predecessor. If you are yet a stranger to Mr. Lynam's logs, then I recommend you to make haste and repair your fault by reading "To Norway and the North Cape." It is as unconventional a travel book as Mr. Lynam is an unconventional traveller. He conducts you round the capes and through the fjords of Norway, and writes of his experiences in the blithest of spirits and with the quaintest touches of humour. The sketches and maps, the photographs and water-colour paintings, with which the book is illustrated, add considerably to the brightness and the interest of it.

<sup>9</sup> "Winter Sports in Switzerland." By E. F. Benson. With 12 illustrations in colour by C. Fleming Williams, and 47 from photographs by Mrs. Aubrey le Blond. 15s. net. (Geo. Allen & Co.).

<sup>10</sup> "The Land of the Blue Poppy." By F. Kingdon Ward. Illustrated with photographs. 12s. net. (Cambridge Press.)

<sup>11</sup> "To Norway and the North Cape in Blue Dragon II." By C. C. Lynam. Illustrated in colour and with photographs, sketches and maps. 6s. net. (Sidgwick & Jackson.)

Or if Norway and Switzerland are too wintry for you even to read about by the fireside and you are for letting your imagination riot in the golden warmth and gorgeous colouring of the Orient, go with Mr. Villiers Stuart to the "Gardens of the Great Mughals,"<sup>12</sup> which seem to have been designed, more or less, on the pattern of the Moslem Paradise pictured in the Koran. Mr. Stuart's careful and interesting account "of the famous old Imperial Indian gardens which played so great a part in the history of their royal makers, and still loom large in the memory and imagination of the Indian people," is full of valuable suggestions in garden designs that are gloriously old in the land of the Mughals, but would be new if some modification of them could be introduced into our own country. There are sixteen beautiful reproductions of

From "To Norway and the North Cape"

(Sidgwick & Jackson)

Light Airs.

water-colour drawings by the author, a number of garden plans, and reproductions from photographs of Mughal paintings and specimens of Mughal handicraft.

With the new and charmingly illustrated edition of that delightfully written book "The Roll of the Seasons,"<sup>13</sup> we are at home again among the familiar changing scenes of our English year, and at home we are still, and in English gardens with Mr. H. H. Thomas's

<sup>12</sup> "Gardens of the Great Mughals." By C. M. Villiers Stuart. With 40 full-page illustrations, 16 of them in colour, and 8 ground plans. 12s. 6d. net. (A. & C. Black.)

<sup>13</sup> "The Roll of the Seasons." By G. G. Desmond. With 12 illustrations in colour. 6s. (Duckworth.)

"Rose Book,"<sup>13</sup> and Mr Walter F. Wright's "Garden Trees and Shrubs,"<sup>14</sup> two in valuable books of garden lore that should be on the shelves of every gardener, amateur and professional. The paintings of different classes of roses in Mr Thomas's volume are a joy to the eye, and if I refrain from saying much of Miss Beatrice Parsons' exquisite painting of the Double White Cherry, of Mr A C Wyatt's of the Clematis in "Garden Trees and Shrubs" it is because where all are so good it might seem invidious to single out this or that for special praise.

From these about gardens we pass by an easy transition to a book about British birds, the first volume of "The Bodley Head Natural History,"<sup>15</sup> by E D Cuming, which has in J A Shepherd its ideal illustrator. Mr Shepherd has rightly been more concerned to get into

<sup>13</sup> "The Rose Book" By H H Thomas Assisted by Walter Easlea With 8 Colour Photographs by H Essenhigh Corke, and 64 Half-Tone 6s. net (Cassell)

<sup>14</sup> "Garden Trees and Shrubs" By Walter F Wright Illustrated in Colour 12s 6d net (Headley Bros)

<sup>15</sup> "The Bodley Head Natural History" By E D Cuming With Illustrations by J A Shepherd Vol I British Birds 2s net (John Lane)

Charles Dickens
(aged about 50).

From a hitherto unpublished photograph

by Percy Fitzgerald (Arrowsmith)

his sketches a general impression of the characters and appearance of the birds than to make them scientifically accurate, and his deft, impressionistic method presents them, in all their simple grace and pretty quaintnesses, exactly as they look to the eye of the unsophisticated observer. Mr Cuming is of necessity scientifically accurate, but he carries his knowledge lightly, and his chapters on the manners, habits and characteristics of many varieties of our British song-birds are written with a clarity and simplicity that greatly increase the value of a concise and eminently well-informed work by making it delightfully readable. He is devoting a second volume in the series to a continuation of his studies of bird life, and in later volumes will deal with the birds of prey and the general wild animal life of our countryside. One must say a word on the production of these volumes. Mr Shepherd's illustrations are largely decorative, there are a few full-page pictures, but for the most part his birds perch and hop and fly round the margins of the letterpress, and both as presentations of bird character and as decorative art they

John Gilpin.

Etching for which the medal was awarded by the Society of Arts. Reduced from 19½ in. by 25½ in. From "Phiz and Dickens," by Edgar Browne (Nisbet).

"Oh, have mercy, good lady, and give me a drink of water."
(The Cold Heart)

(Mrs. Min and the Cold Heart. (Hobbs & Hardingham))

racy manner. The actual "sale" is an impossible story, but one is forced to admit that after events are the reverse. Love, hate, passion, and tragedy therein find a place. Bruce Daventry's "sin" is to be deplored, but his remorse proves him a fine character. Lady Daventry is a type society can dispense with. Life at Callogan Mansions with Margaret Eisters' circle is full of delightful reminiscences.

(W. F. Robinson, Impington, Histon, Cambridge)

A BOOKMAN'S LITERS. BY SIR WILLIAM ROBERTSON NICOLL (Hodder & Stoughton)

With the publication of this collection of letters from the British Weekly, a larger public comes into its rightful heritage. They reveal a well-informed man of the world, and yet more so a catholic man of the spirit. The reader will find plain opinions plainly stated, but all of weighty critical import. Here is a critic full of knowledge, yet very generous without favour. These essays are in the direct line of sane thinking, and make for health. Charles Lamb would have said a different grace before each one, we can say, at least, "thank you" after each one.

(A. Ruan Clarke, 17, Liverpool Lawn, Ramsgate)

THE PROMISED LAND BY MARY ANTIN (Heinemann)

We can recall nothing more haunting in recent literature than this autobiography of a Russian Jewess, born thirty years ago in Polotsk in "the Pale of Settlement," and educated in the Boston Ghetto. It is a human document, written from the heart, and therefore reaching the heart. Her writing is tinged with wonder, for she has hardly yet got accustomed to the fact that freedom is real in the Promised Land, but she writes joyously, for she is in love with life. The book abounds in unforgettable phrases, and in Merssonier-like sketches of life in Russia and America.

(Mrs. John Adams, 23, Tanza Road, Hampstead, N.W.)

LOITERER'S HARVEST BY I. V. LUCAS (Methuen)

A collection of essays, grave and gay, but mostly gay, and all pulsating with that sense of the beauty of the little things of life which makes Mr. Lucas' work so attractive. Here we gladly meet again many old friends, with whom we have chuckled in the pages of Punch, and there is an excellent article on the work of Mr. George Morrow, whose pictorial art is in spirit by no means unlike that of his appreciator. Both are loiterers in the byways of everyday life, and the harvest Mr. Lucas has reaped, if small, is ripe and mellow.

(C. Roy Price, Fernleigh, Wellington, Somerset)

Other good reviews have been sent in by Rose R. Froud (Southsea), J. D. I. Waugh (Teddington), Marie R. Brown (Glasgow), Miss L. Mugford (S. Norwood), Mrs. Sybilla Stirling (Glenfarg), H. S. Pridham (Portsmouth), Miss M. J. Dobie (Chester), Dorothy R. Robinson (Wilmslow), Miss E. Webster (Bristol), M. Blacklee (Barrow), D. Lefebure (Johannesburg), Kathleen Birch (Bexhill), Mrs. Jessop Hulton (Worsley), E. J. Martin (Sheffield), Mrs. M. Stevenson (Birmingham), W. F. Robinson (Cambridge), Bessie Eades (London, S.W.), M. A. Newman (Brighton), Lucy G. Chamberlain (Llandudno), Maude S. Carter (Brighton), Frances A. S. Holbrow (Maidstone), E. C. Linn (Stoke Newington), Louie Noble (Leeds), Gertrude M. Ellwood (Grimsby), F. M. Mountford (Eastbourne), M. Grene (Dublin), Edward Renny (London, S.W.), Nala (Seven Kings), Euphemia Dalgleish (Leith), Edgar Frere (London, S.W.), E. Bates (Reigate), Annie I. Beal (Barrow), Rev. R. H. May (Hebburn), Evelyn M. Abbott (Old Malton), J. Brian Ffoulkes (Worcester), Margaret B. Walker (Grays), Marcella Whittaker (Dewsbury), Mary Chadwick (St. Leonard-on-Sea), Miss J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), Hilda Ridley (Buffalo, N.Y., U.S.A.), J. Richard Ellaway (Basingstoke).

V—THE PRIZE OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO "THE BOOKMAN" is awarded to Miss Constance Ursula Kerr, of The Manse, Dorlton, R.S.O., East Lothian.

A MAN OF LETTERS.*

BY FRANCIS BICKLEY

THERE is a drawing by Mr. Max Beerbohm of a sort of inverted Valhalla, in which Mr. Edmund Gosse is displaying to his old friend Stevenson the effigies of eminent living authors. After duly admiring the physiognomies of Mr. Shaw, Mr. Wells and Mr. Galsworthy, R. L. S. turns to his cicerone and asks, "But where are the men of letters?" Mr. Beerbohm, if his sense of character had not forbidden the attribution of vanity where it was not to be found, might have drawn a sequel in which, with hand on heart, Mr. Gosse submitted his own claims to his companion's consideration. For Mr. Gosse, though the reference books call him poet and critic," is to be described, if anyone is, as a man of letters.

He is, therefore, as Mr. Beerbohm's picture implies, something of an anachronism. Before that year of mourning, 1909, someone imagined Meredith and Swinburne as exchanging greetings from two lofty hills, solitary but for one another's proud company. So from two hills of lesser height, though eminent enough and verdant for our pleasure, Mr. Gosse and Mr. Dobson call to one another to-day, the last of the men of letters.

Perhaps I exaggerate. There are those of a younger generation who may not inappropriately bear the designation such as Whibley, Street and Secombe. But these are scattered forces, with fame below their deserts. Of those most in the public eye none may be so

* "Collected Essays of Edmund Gosse" i, Seventeenth Century Studies; ii, Gossip in a Library; iii, Critical Kit-kats; iv, French Profiles; 6s. net each. (Heinemann)

RUBÁIYÁT OF OMAR KHAYYÁM

XI VII

And if the Wine you drink, the Lap you press,
End in the Nothing all Thing end in Yes

Then fancy while Thou art, Thou art but what Thou shalt be - Nothing - Thou shalt not be less described, to call them sanitary inspectors would be at least as near the mark. But in the last quarter of the nineteenth century, there was a group of men as distinct, as closely related and as respected as the sociological dramatists of to-day, who were men of letters first if not last. The group comprised Stevenson, Henley, Lang, Dobson and Gosse. A kindred spirit connects their very diverse works. Four of them were the chief contributors to that famous anthology, "Ballades and Rondeaux," which was dedicated to the fifth. They were linked by friendship. The "Stevenson Letters" are the historical evidence of their bond.

When you try to imprison a man in a definition you will usually find that some stray link has escaped you. Our label will not quite cover the multifarious activities of this quintet. Henley, for instance, who was the perfect man of letters—the man of letters of genius—in his essays, especially the longer ones, such as those on Burns and Hazlitt, was also a great poet, which is an altogether bigger thing. Stevenson was always near the type, never identified with it, and was getting farther from it as he grew older. Lang was the perfect man of letters, with additions. Mr Dobson, with limitations. The one wandered into such extraneous fields as totemism and psychical research and political history, the other has kept himself too rigidly to a selected theme, too rigidly, that is, for our definition, though not for our delight.

There remains Mr Gosse, and he, I think, can wear the label we have assigned him with less reservation than any of his friends, perhaps with no reservation at all. The man of letters is one who though his primary impulse to write comes from books, is not concerned with the contents of books alone, but with the men who made them and with all that appertains to them—their bindings and illustrations, their publishers and critics, all the adventitious circumstances surrounding their birth and their career. He does not deal only with pure literature, poetry and drama and fiction but with histories and biographies and letters, even with scientific and philosophical works that are sufficiently superannuated to be considered less for the sake of their theories than for their manner. It is not his aim to extract essences or to apply critical canons. He never loses sight of the author. On the other hand, he must have books for a starting-point, so that, while his criticism tends to become biographical, his biographies are mainly of those who write. He is not limited by a century or a country or a school, but by printed sheets between covers. He is learned, but no pedant.

Mr Gosse answers in every way to this description. He has, it is true, written poetry, but the man of letters, being interested in the craft of writing, nearly always does. Like Lang's and Dobson's and most of Stevenson's, Mr Gosse's poetry is literary verse rather than the outpourings of a seer. It smells, with no unpleasant odour, of the lamp. Nor is his criticism, like Swinburne's, that of a poet. He has specialised, to a certain extent, in seventeenth century

English literature, but in no way to the exclusion of earlier or later centuries or of foreign writers. Only one of his books stands really apart. But "Father and Son" is an exception to all but the laws of its own kind. It is one of those books which lie inarticulate in the breast of every man and, once in a while, get written. Auto-biographies can only be compared with one another. Mr Gosse's other prose books, whether full-length biographies or shorter studies, are all true to type. Whether you like them better or worse than purer criticism, depends on whether you are more interested in absolute principles or human idiosyncrasies. Mr Gosse has expounded his own preference in the preface to one of his latest volumes, "Portraits and Sketches." "It is less entertaining," he there writes, "to dwell exclusively on the verses of a poet, or exclusively on the incidents of his life, than to attempt the more complicated study of these elements in inter-relation to one another, as has been done, but only too rarely, in the best critical biographies. M Paul Desjardins, in an amusing and illuminating phrase, speaks of 'la cinématographie d'une abeille dans le mystère de la mellification.' This, I confess, is what I like best in a literary biography, and it is what I have attempted to produce. To analyse the honey is one thing, and to dissect the bee another, but I find a special pleasure in watching him, myself unobserved, in the act of building up and filling the cells." When he called a book "French Profiles" Mr Gosse acknowledged himself aware of Frontispiece to "Prin-

Princess Badoura.
ian (Hodder & Stoughton).

Sainte-Beuve His method has much in common with that of the great French critic

The four books under particular consideration here, "Seventeenth Century Studies," "Gossip in a Library," "Critical Kit-kats," and "French Profiles," form part of a welcome series of five reprinted volumes of essays in uniform bindings, which is to be completed with "Portraits and Sketches." It is instructive to contrast the first three as examples of different ways of approaching the same centre—through literature, through bibliography, and through personality, the result in each case being a set of miniatures of men at their work. "Seventeenth Century Studies," as its title implies, has more unity than the later volumes. It is an attempt "to do for some of the rank and file of seventeenth century literature what modern criticism has done, on a much larger scale, for Shakespeare, Milton, and Dryden." From the demarcation of boundaries, as well as from the overlapping chronological sequence of subjects and their careful selection, it is permissible to suppose that the author also intended to paint, or rather to indicate by significant strokes, the features of a century. In this he is not so successful as in his primary object. Truthfully to suggest a whole by the delineation of a part requires a mastery of impressionism which is alien to Mr. Gosse's methods. Moreover, though the lesser writers treated may be typical, the greater ones, Webster and Herrick and Crashaw, stand unique not only above but in a different air from the contemporaries who are ranked with them for historical convenience. "Seventeenth Century Studies," therefore, is a linked rather than a fused whole. Its parts are excellent, though one may cavil here and there at a minor judgment, such as the attribution of strength even in the comparative degree, to the character of Sir John Suckling. In considering these essays one must remember—not as an excuse, but as an additional virtue—that when they were written, between thirty and forty years ago, the seventeenth century poets were far less familiar or accessible than they are to-day. Dr. Grosart's labours were only beginning and the Muse's Library was not yet in existence. Those wonderful lyrics, whom we prize so highly, were for the most part in the limbo into which they had so promptly fallen. Mr. Gosse, therefore, was here, as in other fields, a pioneer.

"Gossip in a Library"—one wonders if it was so called for the same reason that William Hume entitled his books "A Hive of Honey" or "A Handful of Honeysuckles"—displays its author as a bibliophile. He is very humble about his collection, but, though he may be no Huth, he evidently has some very pretty volumes. The Duke of Devonshire, if he has any feeling for the Chatsworth treasures, would probably be more impressed to refer once more to Mix, that mirror of our age—by Mr. Gosse's playbooks than by his jokes. Here the librarian of the House of Lords, whose erudition must be an enormous boon to peers in search of ornaments for their oratory, chats very pleasantly of his possessions, from Camden's "Britannia" to "The Shaving of Shagpat," adding literary criticism and biographical detail to lore of editions and states.

"Critical Kit-kats" has the particular interest of a book dealing largely with personalities known to its author. In that respect it is comparable with "Portraits and Sketches," though containing nothing so elaborate as the chapter on Swinburne in the later volume. Mr. Gosse writes of his acquaintances with a just admixture of reticence and frankness, and though he sometimes comes into collision with the views of others who are equally well informed, his reading of a character is always entitled to respect. An attractive dedication to Mr. Hardy is a feature of this book which must not be missed.

"French Profiles" is a more important book than any of its predecessors. France has done well to honour Mr. Gosse, for he has written of her literature with a knowledge almost unrivalled among English critics. Mr. Symonds has displayed a deeper sympathy with, and insight into, the work of a particular school of poets, but Mr. Gosse's views are broader and even on the Symbolists he writes, for one whose tastes are confessedly classical and conservative, with understanding and something more than tolerance. His essay on Mallarmé evoked the admiration of that difficult poet himself, and that on Albert Samain, who is not included in Mr. Symonds's "Symbolist Movement," effectively introduces a delightful poet to English readers. An obvious drawback to the book is its incompleteness. This is a shortcoming inevitable to all criticism of living writers, but here we have it in an exaggerated form which is not inevitable. It is nine years since "French Profiles" was first published, but Mr. Gosse, beyond revising the paper on Mallarmé, and adding one on M. Maurice Barrès, has done little to bring it up-to-date. The apology in his new preface does not do away with the defectiveness of a study of M. Anatole France which takes no account of "Sur la Pierre Blanche," "L'Île des Pingvins," or "Les Dieux ont Soif." Still, these essays on modern writers are interesting criticisms of the books they deal with and those devoted to earlier writers show Mr. Gosse at his best.

Each of these volumes shows the strength and weakness of our man of letters. Mr. Gosse knows well how to place a writer, his work and his circumstances in proper relation. His sympathies are catholic. He has helped many a foreign author to a hearing in England. His judgments are for the most part sound. He seems to have read everything. On the other hand, he is at times unduly timorous of the creeping of that which is not literature into the works of an imaginative writer. He lays himself open to the charge of being afraid of ideas. Thus he seems to belittle the teaching of Tolstoy, not as a philosophical opponent but as a rather fussy guardian of the dignity of letters. His care for form, as exemplified in his very just criticism of Whitman (his own visit to whom is admirably described) is another matter, though his allied strictures on the younger generation are too sweeping to be of much account. Moreover, his temperament is averse from, though his method does not necessarily preclude, that deep brooding over art apart from its circumstances, which is an essential, though not, perhaps, the only essential, of great criticism, so that his miniatures, though like as far as they go, are apt to be rather superficial. He accurately depicts the broad aspect of his subject and even its less obvious features, but misses the finer shades. But then, as we have said, he is not a distiller of essences but a man of letters, and of that admirable brotherhood a very excellent member.

A BOOKMAN'S MEMORIES *

BY THOMAS SFECOMBE

DO editors or publishers know what it is, I wonder, to receive from the clippers really candid estimates of their work? Advertisement contractors and news proprietors are bitterly of the opinion of their breakfast tables whenever they commit pen to paper. It is a compliment, I think for the Editor of THE BOOKMAN to send me his latest work for full and free comment in his own magazine. Does he expect me to deal faithfully with it in the Palace of Truth? The circumstances, it must be admitted, are not particularly propitious for a slashing review. The essayists' doctrine on the subject seems to me to err on the side of humanity. "Leave the bitter word unspoken." "If you cannot say anything good, better leave the stuff alone." It is wise at any rate to seek a better opportunity of offence than is presented by such a series of book-kindly and friendly-discursive dissertations as are contained in "A Bookman's Letters."

To pursue the comparative method between the new volume and its near kinsman, "The Day Book of Claudius Clear" (which I liked well), the new book has on the whole the advantage. The goods are produced much more handsomely; the humour is not so prolific or so pronounced, but there is a ripier tone and a mellowness of touch declaring the author to be consummate in his own sphere of Book Ranger and Book Rambler. He is very seldom dogmatic or arbitrary. Occasionally he takes an ultra-objective view of books and literary problems - trying to arrange the best biography in order, or telling us on what book we ought to comment as an author, and the proper way of initiation. When he talks in this way he exasperates me. If delights of reading ought to be largely fortuitous and covenanted blessings. When I see Boswell, Lockhart, Trevelyan, and Gaskell down in a short list of the world's biographies for the million, I begin to doubt whether any merit can reside in them at all. The author, fortunately, is seldom in this vein. His four hundred and thirty pages afford a very rich miscellany to the omnivore among readers. Some of the contents are reviews of special interest to anyone who has had transactions in that métier. They often remind me of provisos one ought to have made, aspects one ought to have considered, and things one would like to have said. There are also literary debates, that hardly perennial "Was Thackeray a cynic?" for example, and "Why did Shakespeare retire to Stratford-upon-Avon?" There are a few, too few romantic stories stranger than fiction of the kind that Thomas Hardy might have transmuted into nouvelles or contes. Some may find the savour of the book to consist principally in its personal memories and reminiscences of such Majors as Meredith, Lafcadio Hearn, Masson, Dr. Garnett, George Gissing, and Mark Rutherford. I was told that after writing these Rutherfordiana (by far the most solid contribution to a profoundly interesting subject that the world has yet seen), the author confessed to complete exhaustion, and admitted inability to pump up another single word on the subject. This is interesting, because these recollections betray no sign whatever of approaching the limit of the material. They suggest rather consummate ease in producing samples - exemplary traits drawn more or less at haphazard from a wallet filled to profusion. The contrast between the apparent and the real suggests a point of some importance, namely, that the journalist who knows too much is apt to be lost. There are one or two beautiful fragments of the vitæ obscurorum virorum here, fragments which do more than pique the curiosity, they satisfy indeed a high ideal of artistic beauty. -the "Romance of a Still Life" thus deserves attention as a really beautiful morsel of prose delineation.

It this knight has compassion and a gentleness of tone sufficient to conjure up the still, small voice in which alone it may still be given us to hear about the treasure of the humble.

Good things, mots, happy hits are scattered about the volume in considerable profusion. "An old man once said to me, 'I have never known any one better than myself, and I think very little of myself.'" G. A. Simcox, handing back a laboured exercise (Latin Prose) to a pupil, and smiling. "Do you smoke?" "Yes, sir" (expectantly). "Then you can take this (chuckling) to light your cigar." A lady at Lewes always had a chop at 2 p.m. and was waited on by her old butler, who had been in her service upwards of thirty years. One day as chop time approached the old man dropped dead, suddenly. While the other servants were hastily considering how to break the news to their mistress, the bell was violently rung. On a servant appearing, the old lady asked why the butler did not bring in her chop On being told of his death, she merely said: "That is no reason why I should be kept waiting. Isn't there any one else who can bring in my chop?"

Photo by F. O. Hopp

Sir W. Robertson Nicoll

* "A Bookman's Letters" By W. Robertson Nicoll 4s 6d net (Hodder.)

Of Charles Lever (in his later years) it is said piquantly: "He was an expert in depression" This reminds one of the cautious epitaph of a lady aged one-hundred and twelve, buried in Bath Abbey, also cited in this volume "During the later years of her life she was distinguished by both virtue and propriety"

"A hedonist is a man who lives for pleasure, and Fitzgerald found his pleasure in drinking tea with his Woodbridge friends, in hearing the Waverley Novels read aloud, in walking home with a lantern to the little house at Boulge, which of all his dwelling-places seems to me the one that best fitted him" "Holmes's 'One Hoss Shay' is a fierce parable describing the smash of the impregnable logic of Calvinism" "To understand Stevenson fully one must first spit a little blood" "There are also novels which are adapted only for reading in railway tunnels"—an exact and really marvellous description thus of "The Woman Thou Gavest Me"

The author has given us a memorable picture of the philosophic journalist contemplating the bulge of extinct newspapers—The Wandsworth Herald, Shadwell Echoes, and *Clerkenwell Gazette*s—in the mighty hold at Hendon To a journalist in these catacombs the spectacle is suggestive of fearful thoughts, and it is of the vanity rather than the glory of his profession that he is tempted to think Looking at these impregnable tombstones, he cannot but think of the toil and thought that have been spent on them, and about the apparent end of all Here survives perhaps the only extant and whole copy of many a newspaper of importance in its hour Many volumes may never have been opened, more still are there that no one will ever open again The writings have withered like the grass of the field, as soon as the day or week of their allotted existence was over In a passage of real felicity in this conjunction the author quotes Gibbon's cheerful submission of his great work to the verdict of posterity in the bureau or covered walk of "acacias at Lausanne" commanding a prospect of the country, the lake and the mountains Few, indeed, have walked under these acacias—have planned, and lived to finish, a great book with the assurance that they have not failed to win fame for the years they are to live, and for many years beyond that period

There may be an exception here and there, such as

Daniel Defoe But the working journalist can never hope to walk under the acacias of Lausanne. To write a great book of any kind, a great book of history perhaps, above all, an exceptional combination of circumstances must occur Leisure, wealth, knowledge, physique, sustained labour, curiosity, and endurance must be harmoniously blended with opportunity in a happily compacted individual

"The great book is a work of time, and its writer must be content to see many showy popularities arise and disappear while he remains in his obscurity, waiting for the day to come He must be content to take the ordinary risks, and hazards of mortal men His labours may be interrupted by death when his work is but a fragment, and a fragment, however brilliant, must fail of the recognition and the life which are assigned to completeness

"While all this is true, yet I count those happy—even those journalists happy—who for many years have before them the vision of something which shall last in literature, and which shall worthily occupy their thoughts, and the scant margin of their days The outcome may be nothing. It may extend to little more than a mass of notes, intelligible only to the compiler Yet if it has been a happiness to think of it, if it has made the days short and delivered from ennui, if it has led the mind along congenial paths, and if it has given life an undertone of hope, it is well that the plan was in the heart, that the dream assisted and consoled to the end And if a journalist who has written much, and for many years, desires to establish some personal relation with a few readers by writing an occasional book, or even by putting together a few of his contributions to newspapers, let him not be too severely condemned, at least, by his brother journalists His is a natural and a pardonable ambition Let it be granted that reprints from periodicals are very rarely of striking and permanent worth Let it also be granted that they may reveal partially the writer's tastes, and friendships, and ambitions, and disappointments If this be so, they will not altogether miss an audience, and they may even find, for a time, a large audience At the very worst, a few copies will survive, marked with the author's name, and who knows whether some investigator of the future may not discover one and hold it up to praise? It is a very, very faint hope Nevertheless it is a hope"

Our author tells us more or less symbolically, I suppose, that two hundred anecdotes are about the maximum that a man may possess and live, and that it takes eight anecdotes to make a book In this case no man should exceed twenty-five According to the panel (facing-title) the present is no more than his tenth embarkation He may still essay time and tide fifteen several tunes Well, he is justifying our warmest hopes of him He must persevere His work promises 'nasac ill'

THE LITTLE HOUSE.

TO AICE MEYNELI

I will have a little house
When the children are flown,
The toil of a big house
Would be cold as a stone,
A house full of emptiness
And we two alone

But in a little house
We could creep to the blaze,
We could warm our old hearts

With the thought of old days,
Him and me together
When the firelight plays

The littlest house and garden
For him and me just,
And all the sweet times we had
Withered to dust
A big house would break my heart
For the children lost

From "Irish Poems," by Katharine Tynan 3s. 6d. net. (Sidgwick & Jackson.)

New Books.

MR. GARDINER'S PORTRAITS.*

There is no more difficult or delicate work to be done with the pen than the critical portraiture of contemporaries, and the more serious is the attempt, the more does it involve the risks of misjudgment and self-betrayal. Courage, wide knowledge, imaginative sympathy, penetration, humour—these are the qualifications. Now Mr Gardiner has these; but the secret of his singular success is something else. In portraying and judging other men, a writer will reveal either his temperament or his ideals. He may reveal both, yet one will be foremost. But we do not want to know much about his temperament, because we are concerned with his subjects and not with himself. We do want to know his ideals, because these enable us to perceive by what human standard or tradition he judges men. Herein lies the difference I think, between Mr Gardiner's portraits and Hazlitt's. The twenty-five portraits drawn by Hazlitt in his "Spirit of the Age" tell us a good deal more about his temperament than about his ideals. We are conscious of his nerves and their irritations, and of his relations to Dr Bell. In Mr Gardiner's sketches we have no such experience. His ideals emerge, and his hostilities are seen in their light. His attitude to a man may be unsympathetic, but it is part of a general attitude that is stable. Thus his hot and cold are related to each other, and both to the everlasting Yea of his adoption. You may find unfairness in the judgment, but not in the judge, severity or blindness in both, if you will, but not levity or any unworthy spasm of feeling.

In an essay placed inconspicuously near the end of this volume, Mr Gardiner virtually discloses his criterion when he names, as the greatest living Englishman, Mr James Bryce. He admits that Mr Bryce's claim to this distinction is challengeable on many grounds, yet he thinks it is just. Mr Bryce's qualities appeal to him, not merely by their intrinsic greatness, but by the wind-like freedom with which they play over humanity as a whole, unbounded by barriers of race, polity, or creed.

"He represents more than any conspicuous figure to-day, except Lord Morley, that noble and temporarily obscured tradition associated with such great names as those of Fox, Gladstone, Mazzini, and Lincoln—that allegiance to humanity, without regard to colour, creed, or country, which is not the negation of patriotism, but its finest flower and fulfilment."

That sentence indicates, perhaps, as well as any Mr Gardiner's pivot. Again, of President Wilson he writes

* "Pillars of Society." By A. G. Gardiner 7s 6d net (James Nisbet & Co.)

"He has what Mr Chamberlain never had, what Mr Lloyd George, with all his fine intuitions and democratic sympathies, has not—a considered philosophy of politics. It is a philosophy warmed with a generous humanity and a sincere vision."

And once more, of Lord Courtney

"He is the lay preacher of national righteousness. Mr Ichmann once likened him to Isaiah, and the parallel is not inappropriate. He is the Isaiah of our day—Isaiah in a canary-coloured waistcoat. He moves through our feverish time with the cloud of prophecy about him, a figure significant and inspiring, firm as a rock, free from rancour and littleness, taking the truth, and working without thought of reward or praise for all noble ends. When we have lost a certain reverence for such a figure we shall have lost the soul of goodness."

These passages reveal Mr Gardiner's central sympathies and, as one turns from portrait to portrait, enable us to understand his degrees and reserves of appreciation. They explain, for example, his dislike of Roosevelt, whose career he sees as "a mad whirl of untutored energy." He allows that he was the first to face the plutocratic tyranny of the States—"he will be remembered as the man who broke the idols"—but he credits him neither with political honesty nor political vision. "With all his volubility, few men of distinction have less to say." If we turn to such a portrait as that of Lord Hugh Cecil, we find that Mr Gardiner's sympathies are feelingly divided. The scion of Hatfield's political creed is "a perverted and fantastic nightmare—the nightmare of a mind that sees the twentieth century from the fourteenth,"—but it is based, not on selfishness, but on fundamental beliefs. "There is no price on him. He is not in the market. And it is this fact which makes him indeed priceless." It is by his seen standards that Mr Gardiner places

Photo by E. O. Hoppe

Mr. H. G. Wells.

From "Pillars of Society," by A. G. Gardiner (Nisbet)

Mr Churchill whose abilities and inexhaustible faculty he acclaims, but whose uncertainty he dreads. "It is the ultimate Churchill that escapes us. I think he escapes us for a good reason. He is not there", and he concludes this sketch with a warning. "Remember he is a soldier first, last, and always. He will write his name big on our future. Let us take care he does not write it in blood."

Although, as I have said, temperament, as a petty and disturbing element, does not enter into these portraits, yet in a larger sense it is here. This could not be otherwise in the chapters on such personalities as Sarah Bernhardt, Sir Johnston Forbes-Robertson, Mrs Humphrey Ward, and others. Mr Gardiner's different attitudes to the great French actress and the great English actor will be felt by the reader. To each he does the justice which the admirers of each will demand. Yet there is temperament, as well as critical insight, in his seeing Sarah Bernhardt as Sarah Bernhardt, and Forbes-Robertson as Shakespeare. Of her he writes "The stage has no triumph like it", of him "It is the highest tribute to his reverence and the fineness of his artistic conscience that when we emerge from his Hamlet or Othello we think less about the actor than about the mighty mystery which we call Shakespeare." If, after reading these two sketches, the reader turns to the deeply sympathetic portrait of Archdeacon Tilley, he will find, of course, nothing that bears directly on either, but he will know more about the temperament and the trend of thinking which explain these divergences of feeling.

Mr Gardiner never falters in attack. His portrait of Mr St. Loc Strachey is bitten in with the strongest acid. His sketch of Mrs. Humphrey Ward is respectfully disrespectful. He laughs unmercifully at the supple barrister in Mr F. E. Smith. He turns on Mr Carnegie with the suggestion that he should stop building libraries and unbuild the Steel Trust. He points to Lord Milner as to "a forlorn, solitary figure in our midst, with no thinkable future." But, in nearly every case, such judgments are the balance of an account in which the debtor and creditor columns have been carefully written up. The correctness of the balance is one thing—it cannot be audited, the sincerity of the endeavour is another—it can be felt.

The forty appreciations contained in this volume, added to those in Mr Gardiner's earlier series, "Prophets, Priests, and Kings," are a fine achievement. Yet I hope that they may prove in the end to be studies for a larger canvas. Mr Gardiner's destiny is surely to write a social and political history of his time.

WILFRED WHITLEN

BUTLER, PLEASANT AND UNPLEASANT *

Here are two more of the Butler volumes that Mr. Tuckill is now re-issuing in a form convenient for both hand and shelf, and at prices suited to most pockets. We say deliberately that no set of books now before the public is so truly valuable so thoroughly salutary as these Butler reprints. Whether any body of original doctrine can be extracted from them or whether Butler is a purely critical spirit (so far as criticism can ever be distinguished from creation) is an interesting topic too large for present discussion, but this at least is certain, that scarcely any writer of the past or present is more efficient as a mental purge. Butler represents logic raised to the plane of inspiration. At a touch from him away fly our assumptions, our fallacies, our false conclusions, our self-deceptions. He is not so much a breaker of images as a denuder of images. The brother-in-law of the haberdasher to Mr. Spurgeon, in his own remarkable verses clothed the Discobolus in vest and trousers. That is the precise opposite of the Butlerian process. He strips away the shams and false shames, and if what he leaves is bare, at least it is clean, pure and real. Another quality that makes him specially attractive to bookmen is his mastery of the instrument he wielded. He had that rare gift, an ear for prose, and he wrote with conscious care and exactness, although (such is the way of genius) he nourished a singular delusion that he was indifferent to style.

The two volumes just issued differ very widely in subject and attractiveness. "The Fair Haven," Butler's Op. 2, is extremely clever and extremely unpleasant. It is the sort of book that you read for the author's sake and not for its own. Mr. Shaw (than whom none has praised Butler more intelligently, and whom, for some reason, certain Butlerites regard with strange animosity), has spoken of Butler's grim, hoaxing humour. "The Fair Haven" is a case in point. It purports to be the posthumous work of one J. P. Owen, prepared for the press by his brother, W. B. Owen. Apparently it is a piece of Christian apologetics written to demonstrate and defend the historic truth of the Resurrection, actually, it is an acute criticism of the Gospel narratives, an exposure of the methods of those who purvey Christian evidences, and an affirmation of his own belief that Jesus was removed from the Cross before death had actually occurred, and that the Resurrection was thus merely a recovery of consciousness.

* "The Fair Haven." By Samuel Butler. Edited with an Introduction by R. A. Stratfield. "The Humour of Homer and Other Essays." By Samuel Butler. With a Biographical Sketch of the Author by Henry Festing Jones. 5s. net each (Fisfield).

The pretence was so well managed that the book was taken seriously, in many respectable quarters, as a skilful defence of the miracle (just as Defoe's "Shortest Way with the Dissenters" was taken as a genuine piece of Toryism), and Butler had to explain himself in a preface to the second edition. I find it hard to understand how anyone could have found the book other than what it is, namely, a closely argued attack on the Scriptural story. In that respect it deals with matters beyond the scope of these columns, and I do not propose to say anything on the subject. Considered merely as a piece of reading, the book is not very attractive. It is weighed down by its own machinery. It was meant to strike at Orthodoxy with Orthodoxy's own weapons, and it imitates the manner of the Christian evidence books so well that it has much of their dullness without their excuse of piety. Moreover, the tone of writing implied by the pretence that the author was a defender of what he was really attacking, soon becomes very distressing—if not worse. A man may sham art, or science or letters, or even love, without great condemnation, but by the tacit consent of mankind, the one thing he must not sham is religion. And even in an age where very broad views of the Christian faith are taken, it may be urged, not unfairly, that the Crucifixion and Resurrection are not subjects for an elaborate literary hoax. Upon me the principal effect of the book, with its ruthless, nihilistic logic, has been to arouse a great desire to hear again that tenderest and most human of tragedies, "The Passion according to St. Matthew"—a longing whose rightful heresy will be appreciated by those who know Butler's fierce Haudchian and anti-Bachian convictions. The editor, Mr. R. A. Stratfield, is inclined to think that the book did Butler no social damage, but that it provoked a literary conspiracy to suppress him. Thus he writes:

"I am convinced that 'The Fair Haven' did him grave harm in the literary world. Reviewers fought shy of him for the rest of his life. They had been taken in once, and they took very good care that they should not be taken in again. The word went forth that Butler was not to be taken seriously whatever he wrote, and the results of the decree were apparent in the silence that greeted not only his books on evolution but his Homeric works, his writings on art and his edition of Shakespeare's sonnets.

a view so grotesque that I am puzzled to decide whether Mr. Stratfield is the simplest of mortals, or whether, like Habbakuk, he is capable de tout. If the general reader of to-day is not offended by the subject of "The Fair Haven," he will find much to admire in its trenchant cleverness, but he will probably prefer the prefatory memoir of the supposititious author by his imaginary brother. Here he will meet some interesting sketches of the Butlerian personality drawn by the artist himself.

Turn we to something different. The volume of essays entitled "The Humour of Homer" is as pleasant as the other is unpleasant. Here Butler's humour is more genial, and plays about topics in which there is no danger of offence—unless, indeed, good Wordsworthians are scandalised by his proof that "She dwelt among the untrodden ways" can be satisfactorily interpreted only by the supposition that Lucy was an ill-favoured and undesirable entanglement, secretly murdered by the poet! The fantasia, "Quis Desiderio?" in which that preposterous piece of exegesis is one of the themes, is a genuine piece of sustained and original humour. There are papers, too, on the figures in certain Swiss shrines, supplementing the delightful "Alps and Sanctuaries" (just republished), and interpreting the groups in a way that suggests a slightly ironic Mark Twain. Those who like heavier fare will turn with interest to those papers on the Darwinian controversy.

in which Butler not only a keen combatant, but an exponent of the neo-Lamarckism towards which the tide of evolutionary doctrine is steadily setting nowadays. Then, as a final (or rather an initial) treat, there is a long memoir of Butler by his intimate companion Henry Festing Jones, a foretaste of that complete biography which we all so eagerly await. Mr. Jones's sketch is closely packed with Butlerian good things, and is itself worth getting the volume for. In the course of it, by the way, he asks for a sight of any numbers of the periodical called The Drawing-Room Gazette, to which, in the early 'seventies, Butler contributed some criticisms of Handel. Many readers would be glad if these articles could be unearthed.

Genius is a "name not lightly to be said," especially of contemporary figures that are not quite in focus yet. It may be used safely and emphatically of the author of "Erewhon."

GEORGE SAMPSON

THE LATE VICTORIANS.

Here are two books of criticism which are likely to attract a good deal of attention. They are both by well-known writers, and they both deal with subjects which are at once recent and controversial. Mr. Jackson's book<sup>1</sup> is the wider in scope and the more important in intent, and therefore we may consider it first. His aim is to give us an ordered and concise view of the literary and artistic activities of the eighteen-nineties, and to coordinate, as it were, the vast material at our disposal into certain recognised channels of energy. To him there is a regular philosophy of motion underlying the artistic recrudescence of this period. In the twenty-one chapters of his formidable undertaking, a bewildering array of names flashes before our eyes—major names and minor names, names which still mean something to us, and names which suggest, if they suggest anything at all, merely the ghosts of memories. Mr. Jackson knows his subject; he has the facts and the spirit of it at his finger-tips. And they need knowing. For the eighteen-ninety "touch" has the elusive quality of a thing which has many manifestations but a very definite range. We feel it in Shaw and in Wilde, in Beardsley and in "Max," but we do not really feel it in such men as Conrad and Bennett. The reason for that may be in a new conception of art and realism. I am not sure. But whatever it is, the student of the most modern tendencies in painting and literature does feel extraordinarily divorced from the spirit of the eighteen-nineties. One cannot read the "Yellow Book" without a yawn, or of the dandies or decadents without a grimace. They are all so utterly "out of it." Mr. Jackson's learned, painstaking, and serious study is quite pathetic. You simply will not get people to excite themselves over dead bones. Who can take Oscar Wilde seriously nowadays, except that type of foreigner who still thinks Byron the greatest of English poets?

Mr. Jackson does not, by any means, obtrude his own opinions too freely, but the very fact of his writing such a book makes it evident that he considers his period an important one. But, apart from the sad history of curious and futile talent, it is hard to see where the importance lies. Already we seem to have cast from us all the influence of that decade. Their ideals are not only not our ideals, but it is difficult to believe that they could ever again be our ideals. Even their survivors appear strangely out-moded. I admit that in all this there is, perhaps, some exaggeration arising from personal prejudice, but, at any rate, it is exaggeration founded on a substantial basis. The Russian novelists of forty years ago are infinitely closer to us than the artificial English school of fifteen years ago. Time always takes its revenge on precocity.

Of course, I would not deny that the eighteen-nineties were a time of renewed mental activity in the world of English art. What I deny is that this spectacular and glittering display has any permanent interest for students of English letters. It was an era of finished and yet barren achievement. For with all their "smartness" and lively brilliance the writers who are most representative of this period are the mere false dawn of modern tendencies. With all their airs and graces, with all their polish and superiority, they are, at heart, rather crude and rather vacuous. There are exceptions, naturally, distinguished and remarkable exceptions, but it must be said quite frankly that the spirit of the time was a deluded spirit. The pulse of the eighteen-nineties is clammy, feverish, uncertain. It is a period that will long survive historically, no doubt, because it did produce some great men of high genius, but the influence it had on these men was probably almost invariably bad. The fact is, I suppose, that England had far too long been under the thumb, artistically, of several giant names, and that, in the moment of her recovered freedom, she went head over heels into other extremes. She experimented right and left with intense zest and little wisdom. It took her ten years to find her feet again.

Page decoration from the Morte d'Arthur, by Aubrey Beardsley. From The "Eighteen Nineties" by Hollbrook Jackson (Grant Richards)

<sup>1</sup> "The Eighteen Nineties" By Hollbrook Jackson, 12s 6d. net (Grant Richards)

In contrast to Mr Jackson's monumental effort Mr Howe's may be called a modest one<sup>1</sup>. He has written a book of nine essays on as many modern English dramatists—Pinter, Jones, Wilde, Barrie, Shaw, Harkin, Barker, Davies, Galsworthy. His manner is judicial, unemotional, and sometimes caustic, and his style is adequate to his thought. It is a better style than Mr Jackson's, but, on the other hand, it has not Mr Jackson's genial familiarity. Mr Howe keeps us rather at arm's length. There is no reason to object to this except in so far as it prevents Mr Howe stating his own opinions with sufficient emphasis. His book is one of half-tones, and is, therefore, apt to be uninteresting. But, of course, one must remember that it is written more from the dramatic than from the literary standpoint, and that its popularity, consequently, is bound to be less effective.

Some of his judgments are capital—when he dwells, for instance, on the "efficiency" of Pinter ("efficient" one sees, instantaneously, is precisely what Pinter is), or when he remarks of Galsworthy "The art which tries too consciously to conceal art is the art that does not succeed in its aim", and thus, we feel, is Mr Galsworthy's."

Students of the drama (there are such people one must assume) will read this book with avidity and, perhaps, with profit; the general reader will read it with a certain lack of enthusiasm, I fancy. Writing about the modern drama has become almost as much of a craze as writing modern dramas—most people are tired of both things. Why not give Bernard Shaw, Oscar Wilde, and so on a rest? There are much more exciting persons in the world—even in the world of to-day. That's what one has to drum into the critics' ears.

RICHARD CURIE.

SYNGE AND THE IRISH THEATRE *

I have found this elaborate volume by M. Bourgeois both embarrassing and attractive. I did not want to read anything more about Synge. The muddle of legend and controversy that has arisen around his name and work is a profitless study. "Synge" has become as inartistic an irritant as a persistent patent medicine, or worse advertisement. It arouses feelings that have nothing of the animation and graciousness which we usually associate with literature. And it bears us far from the thing that matters more or less—the creative and interpretive work of the real Synge himself.

Many of those who have discovered Synge appear to have hastily assumed that they had at the same time discovered Ireland. As a whole she had given up her secret, and, furthermore, every individual unit of her people was revealed in all essentials. We were all disclosed and labelled. Synge had given us away. Some of us are amused at this assumption, more of us resent it, but the measure of resentment is much greater than the measure of amusement. It has militated against a dispassionate and measured appreciation of the Synge of actuality.

I happen to be deeply interested in Ireland, and her inlook and outlook, both from the Gaelic and the Anglo-Irish sides. It is difficult to say on which of these sides we find the greater crop of contentions and theories about the meaning and destiny of the entity we call Eire, or Ireland. I have grown distrustful of nearly all the law and the prophets on both sides and try simply to understand what Ireland and her various individualities and authors (in Gaelic and in English) are trying to express in their more deliberate moments. I find the task entertaining and animating, but I grow more and more chary of positive conclusions, though I may be able to venture on a tentative theory about it all if I live to a hale old age.

<sup>1</sup> "Dramatic Portraits." By P. P. Howe 5s net (Martin Secker).

* "John Millington Synge and the Irish Theatre." By Maurice Bourgeois 7s 6d net (Constable).

Certainly when I reflect on the Ireland that is associated with the mystic, artist, co-operator, and heroic worker, "A. E.", when I consider the Ireland that reveals herself in the Féiseanna of the Gaelic League, the Ireland that is expressed in the Irish writings of Canon O'Leary, the rare young Ireland that lives and labours in St. Enda's College, the grim and what might be called Ibsenian Connacht interpreted in the writings of Padraic O'Connor; the deep-hearted and romantic Connacht that slunes and sings in the work of Micheal Breathnach, the Ulster of "Cu Uladh", the Munster of "An Seabhac", the toiling and tragic Ireland that in mire and misery has begun to think even of the Co-operative Commonwealth; the Ireland that is either obsessed or vexed with ultramontanism, and the psychic Ireland that still has glimpses of fairyland, howsoever the normal consciousness may seek to explain them—when I think of these and others, a mild amusement is pardonable in regard to the positive souls who consider the Abbey Theatre—whose interests, of course, are undoubted—the beginning and the end of art and literature in our country. And though Synge has a distinctive place in this varied realm of life, he is far from being all-important and predominant.

I said at the outset that this work of M. Bourgeois is attractive and embarrassing. He calls ourselves and our mixed concerns before the council and the judgment of Europe, we are vain enough to be attracted and self-critical enough to be embarrassed by the thought of this novel and august tribunal. On the whole, however, we fare well. M. Bourgeois, unlike the majority of English and not a few Anglo-Irish critics, has realised the necessity of understanding something of the Irish language, Irish history, Irish culture, and the ancestral Irish civilisation before one ventures to sum up modern Ireland. His knowledge, interest and palpable desire to spread light rather than to construct a theory at any cost is refreshing. On the Gaelic side he is often really informing, though he ink sketch by John B. Yeats, R.H.A.

William Butler Yeats.

Irish Theatre, by Maurice Bourgeois (Constable).

ROBERT HOFF, JR.

1. Between the 1st and 2nd
 2. HILLS OF HOMER
 3. MACLEIN WALL
 4. ROBERT HOFF, JR.
 5. LONDON & EDINBURGH

falls into the mistake of using the crude and meaningless term "Erse" Where he is most unconvincing it is his general theory of life and destiny that appears to be at fault Thus he seems to imagine that, generally speaking, things "Pagan" and "pre-Christian" were unspiritual and barbarous Thus, to my mind, is a hopeless conclusion Again, he thinks that the Irish peasantry, as portrayed by Synge in his essays, is closely akin to "the aboriginal Gacdhacht," and he speaks of the modern Irishman that typifies a survival of "the dateless Irishman of the sagas" I doubt this survival theory, as he and others put it, there may be a certain survival, but there is also deterioration The matter, however, is too spacious and subtle to be argued in detail just now

Extensive and judicial a study as he has made of the formal life and the artistic life of Synge, M Bourgeois still leaves him an aloof and somewhat inscrutable individuality He has told us everything that the biographer and commentator can tell, and Synge remains what he was before arresting, odd, bizarre, morbid, solitary, an eerie visitant in, rather than an expression of, Ireland He might be called the Sick Man of Anglo-Irish literature, the Sick Man who had something of genius, whose sickness and suffering were broken by phases of psychic intoxication and exaltation, flashes of romance and poetry, bursts of mordant and extravagant humour When all is said there is no real scope for the biographer and the historian, everything that matters is to be found in the unequal plays In regard to these, M Bourgeois is discriminating on the whole, though he is unduly severe on "The Tucker's Wedding" Here, again, he confounds religion and theology, and makes too little allowance for the great human sense of humour Testy indeed must be the theological sense that treats this rare tinker to the critical bell, book, and candle

W P RYAN

LOVE-MAKING AT SIXTY *

George Crabbe, whose early life was saved from being a tragedy by the friendship of Edward Burke, appears in these volumes in the somewhat unexpected light of genteel comedy He married the girl he had loved in boyhood and there were seven children, but five of them died, and a nervous disease made her for some years impossible as a companion of his efforts and aspirations He wrote on one of her letters "Nothing can be more sincere than this, nothing more reasonable and affectionate, and yet happiness was denied" These lines are a domestic romance when read as the history of eight years courtship and thirty years of marriage

When he settled at Trowbridge his days of struggle were over His income must then have been about a thousand a year, and with his simple tastes this must have been wealth Compare it, for instance, with the scanty living Johnson wrung from the booksellers!

Soon after the death of Sarah Ilmsley, this book reveals him in the character of a comfortable widower looking out for a second wife In "The Romance of an Elderly Poet" we have a hitherto unknown chapter in the life of George Crabbe, revealed by his ten years' correspondence with Elizabeth Charter, which has been carefully edited by A M Broadley and Walter Jerrold The book is well illustrated, and the portraits are particularly worthy of study

His efforts ought to have been successful, for they were extensive, as he was corresponding at one time with six young ladies, each of whom was ignorant of the existence of the other five Matters went so far that there was an actual engagement with one of these damsels, but by a combination of a vixen aunt, a foolish brother, a father who cared for nothing, and a sister who wrote of "carriages and follies of that nature," this course of elderly true love did not end in marriage On the other hand, a lady who apparently refused him and continued to receive letters

* "The Romance of an Elderly Poet" By A M Broadley and Walter Jerrold 10s 6d. net (Stanley Paul & Co.)

George Crabbe.

From a sketch taken in 1826, in the collection of A M Broadley
From "The Romance of an Elderly Poet," by A M Broadley and Walter Jerrold
(Stanley Paul)

from him before and after the rejection, preserved them, and they are now printed and offered to the public

Love-making under such circumstances must have been difficult If there was in sight a mirror the elderly poet must surely have seen five disapproving faces looking over his shoulders to see what he had written to the not impossible sixth Yet they need not have been alarmed, for they show Crabbe incapable of warmth in wooing as he was of writing a letter worthy of being placed in the same casket with those of Lamb, or Cowper, or Fitzgerald

There is not then, much romance in the elderly poet's ineffectual effort to combine the courtship of six demure ladies at a temperature that should leave them all free from compromise But the letters form a curious psychological document as to the poet himself He was free from some clerical prejudices, for on the day that he was instituted to Trowbridge he went to the theatre and saw Kean in "Hamlet" Perhaps some explanation may be found of Crabbe's philandering in his complaints as to the lack of "congenial intellectual society" and "social intercourse" Yet a manufacturing town is rarely destitute of the elements out of which a sensible man may find for himself friends that shall be both congenial and social, and if the fits of depression to which Crabbe was subject were too severe, there was Bath, which, with its gaiety and fashion, has always combined elements appealing to the intellect Tom Moore, William Isle Bowles, Warner the antiquary, were all living within short distances of Trowbridge But it appears that at all times Crabbe had a decided preference for the society of women, and was sometimes willing to take both their beauty and wit for granted We shall all sympathise with the old squire who declared "Dammie, Sir, the first time Crabbe dined at my house he proposed to my sister," and also with the lady who complained that "she felt quite frightened by his manner" on a similar occasion But in his love letters, as here printed, he is more discreet He generally begins frigidly, and the warmest epithet he has for a lady of his soul is an occasional "Dear," dropped, as it were, by accident into the middle of a sentence He has as little distinction in prose as in love We are told that he wrote much, and that many of his MSS he burned In this he was wise His sermons were with a severe economy made to serve on various occasions

Miss Charter sufficiently valued his letters to keep the MSS., and these enable us to see in full this unexpected and unattractive side of Crabbe's character. To Miss Charter he does not hesitate to narrate some of his other amatory "excursions and alarms"—all of them apparently as tepid as those of which the documents are given in the present volume. For a man of letters Crabbe has little to say about literature, but we do get some additional details as to the sale of his poems to John Murray for £3,000—a transaction which showed that the poet had more business tact than he gave himself credit for. Doubtless Byron's reference to him as "Nature's sternest painter, yet the best," helped him in the estimation of the public, which was far more familiar with narrative verse than the general reader of to-day. The critics will soon have the opportunity of comparing in some considerable bulk, the work of two of nature's stern painters—George Crabbe and John Maschfield. And it will be remarkable to note how different are the roads by which they reach a similar result. There is a case known to me of a man of mathematical genius who was seriously and wisely advised by his friends to read poetry, which he had entirely neglected as a means of retaining a sense of general culture. Looking over a goodly range of the English poets he selected Crabbe as being nearest in appearance to prose! The implied criticism is not without justification, for Crabbe is a poet of the earth, earthy. Unlike the worthy Vicar of Wakefield, the Vicar of Irowbridge was not an opponent of deuterogamy on any stern principles of ethics or morals, so that when he had to discuss the question it was as a mere question of expediency. One of the "Tales of the Hall"—that of the old Bachelor—is devoted to the wider topic of Celibacy and Matrimony. But there comes a time when he and the widower parson reach a common standpoint. There are nice girls who are specially born to be the wives first or second of elderly parsons, but they are not always easy to find when wanted, and are difficult of identification, as Casaubon found in the case of Dorothea. Perhaps the Anglicans who have so many wifeless elderly clergy ought to found a school for the training of nice girls intended for the wives of clergymen of sixty and over. There would need to be proper precautions, especially against young and impetuous curates, but doubtless under episcopal patronage these lazy (and youthful) marauders would be warded off. The last is an important point, for who has not regretted to see a matronly dame wasting her sweetness on a layman's household when every indication, astrological and cheiromantic, shows that she should have been a vicarress or even a bishopess?

The end of Crabbe's many letters and much deliberation was that he remained a comfortable celibate to the end of his days. The old Bachelor says

"I now was sixty, but could walk and eat
My food was pleasant and my slumber sweet
But what could urge me at a day so late
To think of women?"

What, indeed!

WILLIAM I. A. AXON

THE INSOLUBLE PROBLEM.*

In their new novels, Mrs. Henry Dudeney and Mrs. Elmor Glyn deal with the same difficult problem of love and marriage, each tries a different way of solving it, and leaves it still unsolved. Guinevere Bohun tells her own story in "The Sequence." She was married at the age of seventeen to the middle-aged General Humphrey Bohun, she was then a simple innocent, and had timorously obeyed her parents' wishes in accepting a man of whom she was afraid, and who was old enough to be her father. She is now thirty-one, still simple, innocent, idealistic, still in fear of her husband, bullied and dominated by him, and has one son, a graceless cub for whom, as for his father, she has little affection. Guinevere is too much of a darling and a beloved, too much given to playing dreamy or passionate things on the piano, and one rather dislikes her habit of self-pity, the vivid consciousness she has that she was such a helpless child when she married at seventeen, and her appealing way of talking of the failings of her elderly husband, and of her son. Nevertheless, she inspires a handsome bachelor neighbour, Sir Hugh Dremont, with a splendid passion for her, and she gives her whole heart to him, but the cruelty of the position is that she is married, and can never be his without scandal and misery. She will not stoop to dishonour, but sends him from her when she feels the situation is getting beyond her, and, reckless and hopeless, he contracts a headlong marriage with a beautiful girl who temporarily fascinates him, but an hour after the wedding he learns that she has negro blood in her veins, and conceives such a loathing for her that they never live together as man and wife. To complete the irony of the situation, General Bohun dies suddenly at this juncture, and Guinevere is free, but Sir Hugh is not. And how this new entanglement is unravelled you may go to the book to discover. It is a clever story, but Guinevere is too yearning and daintiness to win your sympathy. The most likeable person in the book is her sister Letitia, a delightfully worldly woman, whose views on other women, and on the ethics of good society in general, make amusing reading, but are not to be adopted.

Mrs. Dudeney takes up this same problem of the danger of a woman marrying lest she should alter her mind, and meet the right man after she has bound herself to the wrong one. Her Angelina Peachey is a vivid contrast to Guinevere, she is a very charming, baffling, wilful, assertive personality. As a child of ten she has precocious love affairs with boys at her school, later, she is for a time inclined to marry the foolish son of a peer, but is revolted by his first kiss abruptly runs away from him, and will see him no more. Then she meets, and loves, the staid Antony, nephew of Lady Johns, but as she is not sure whether her love may be lasting, she will only consent to be his wife in name, they must pretend they have married secretly at a registry office, then if she changes her mind, it will not be too late for her to leave him. He consents to this arrangement, and all goes fairly well for seven years, but when Antony's friend Julius returns from abroad, he and Angelina are irresistibly drawn to each other, she realises that he is the man of her heart, and, having told Antony of her intention, goes away with him. Presently, he leaves her in a lonely place whilst he goes to London on urgent business, and, during his prolonged absence, she hears that Antony has been overtaken by misfortune, his house and valuable collection of old china are burnt, and he is ruined, and stricken with paralysis. She goes to him pityingly, and whilst she is looking after him, Julius returns—he has been to London to endeavour to save his failing eyesight, but the operation was unavailing, and he has come back stone blind. At the finish you find Angelina running a curio shop, the two men living with her, and being maintained by her earnings. The earlier chapters are the best part of the book. The story of Angelina's girlhood, her school days, and the whole life of the household over the chemist's shop at a corner of St. Paul's Churchyard, is faithfully and powerfully realised. Her father and mother, her sister Blanche, the bizarre old grandmother, and her wistful, likeable maid, Kitty, are veritable creations. The story is admirably written, the atmosphere of central London is very skilfully re-created in those earlier chapters, but you do not altogether believe in the reality of the grown-up Angelina, and that two such men as Antony and Julius would, even crippled as they were, settle down together under her roof, and consent to be wholly dependent on her is a little incredible, and a little ridiculous. Mrs. Dudeney writes so well that you are bound to go on reading to the end, but because she writes so well you wish she had left these freak

* "The Sequence." By Elmor Glyn. 6s (Duckworth).
"Set to Partners." By Mrs. Henry Dudeney. 6s (Hemann).

problems alone, had kept in the broad, main stream of normal human life and experience, and made this tale as strong and as finely true all through as it is in its beginnings

TWENTY FIVE YEARS' REMINISCENCES *

Those who have fallen under the spell of Mrs. Tynan Hinkson's enchanting lyrics—not to mention those who take delight in her novels—should hasten to acquaint themselves with this book. For it serves a three-fold purpose. It affords an intimate insight of that kindly, genial, sympathetic personality which is revealed on every page; it introduces the reader, on colloquial terms, as it were, to a whole host of interesting people. And it affords an exciting glimpse of that stormiest period of Irish political history which culminated in the Parnell debacle. Of this last Mrs. Tynan-Hinkson writes from a strongly partisan point of view, which probably renders her chapters more convincing, more effective, than any more unbiassed account could be.

Strictly speaking, two men loom so large in these "Reminiscences" as to overshadow all others,—the author's adored father, a strong and simple Irish Catholic farmer, and her adored leader, Charles Stewart Parnell. These two dominate the whole book. But between these two one encounters almost all the famous names of later-Victorian literature. W. B. Yeats in particular, Christina Rossetti, the Meynells, the Morrises, the brilliant unhappy Wildes, mother and sons, Frances Wynn, Dora Sigerson, and countless other interesting people more or less well known. There is some piece of generous appreciation,

* Twenty-Five Years' Reminiscences. By Katharine Tynan (Mrs. H. A. Hinkson). 10. 6d. (Smith, Elder.)

Miss Katharine Tynan.

the Portrait by J. B. Yeats, R.H.A. in the Dublin Municipal Art Gallery of enjoyable description, of amusing anecdote, to be met with at every turn.

The story goes in Cheshure of a certain vicar who called, in his parochial capacity, upon a poor, decrepit, somewhat squalid and sulky old woman. "My good woman," says he in dulcet tones, endeavouring to put her at her ease, "I understand you're Irish, and so am I Irish, too. This should be a bond of union between us. We ought to be good friends." "Ah!" replied the incredulous one, huddling herself closer in her ragged old shawl, "Sure, there's a many that says they're Irish. But they're all sorts!" The vaguely damnatory charge of being "all sorts" can never be laid against Mrs. Tynan-Hinkson. She is pure unmistakable Irish through and through, racy of the soil. And so skilful is she in enlisting our sympathies, that we are at one with her all along. With her, we are equally ready to enter a convent school or to join the Land League, with her, to worship Parnell through thick and thin, or to rejoice in the charming communications of the visionary "Willie Yeats." For there is nothing so infectious as enthusiasm, and this author is enthusiastic or nothing. A broad-minded gregariousness and tolerance, a devotion of hero-worship extended to women just as much as men, are here blent with native humour and vivacity. The result is at once enlightening and entertaining as though one chatted with a cheerful friend over the panoramic pageantry of vanished years. There is no cold Sassanach heart but must kindle to some responsive glow over the description of "dear dirty Dublin" in the 'Sixties, and in those of Irish blood these memories will awaken an atavistic, or altruistic thrill, as of happiness pre-experienced by proxy.

The passionate heights and depths of the Celtic temperament find no exponent here. The spiritual dreams and wild imaginings which beset a consciousness suffused with the cognisance of unseen powers, such as you may find (to take two widely differing examples) in "The Countess Cathleen" and in "The Crock of Gold", these are here subordinated to what one may call poetic materialism. They are lost sight of beneath the tender, gentle, lovable traits, the human, humorous, half pathetic traits, which make the Irish character what it is. Nature is dear to Mrs. Tynan-Hinkson, still more so human nature, but always in their more gracious and homely aspects. With the fiercely overwhelming passions common to both nature and human nature, the hurricanes and volcanoes of existence she appears to be calmly acquainted but as an outside spectator. Yet, perhaps, this very absence of anything "high-falutin'" will secure for her a wider circle of readers, for whose sake I forbear to spoil a prospective feast by untimely preliminary "tastings." Katharine Tynan has come in contact with so many fascinating folk, celebrities or otherwise,—her record has included so many crowded hours of eventful, if not glorious life,—that although she has not yet arrived at the hour when reminiscences are usually written, we welcome the "heavenly long-windedness" of hers. We are left looking forward with pleasurable anticipation to the two more volumes promised us in due course. For such is the grace of her style, such the charm with which she can endow the smallest episode, that there never seems to be one word too much in these three hundred and fifty pages. M. B.

PARLIAMENT AND THE PRESS*.

Visitors to the House of Commons glance at the reporters' gallery and are pleased to see a certain quiet bustle and alertness there. It helps to assure them of the interest of the scene. Whether they commonly reflect that we are represented by its diligent occupants as well as by members on the floor may be doubted, but it is certain that the future student of history, looking back to these early days of the struggle to make of Parliament a truly democratic institution, will find some of its most indefatigable heroes among the reporters of debates. These craftsmen, in fact, have borne the brunt of it. Mr Michael MacDonagh's new book on "The Reporters' Gallery" makes romantic reading for that reason, and is a vitally important contribution to the political record of two centuries. Reporters maintained for generations, with infinite difficulty and in the face of frequent pains and penalties, the right of the nation to be governed publicly, and not privately. Nor is their full usefulness yet proved. It is to the reporters, as popular government develops, that Parliament itself must look for help in maintaining this right against Cabinets and the Civil Service, if it be unreasonably contested. Who knows? There is no extravagance in supposing it still possible that journalists may have to suffer in the public interest.

* "The Reporter's Gallery." By Michael McDonagh. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

In the days before popular government, Parliament was just a secret convention against the King with his standing army. When it got control of the army, it remained secret out of contempt for the people. John Dyer, the first news letter writer, had humbly to beg the pardon of the House for trading in contraband intelligence, and was "upon his knees reprimanded by the Speaker for his great presumption." This was in 1694, and, after nearly two centuries of reporting, the House formally refused, in 1875, to say, on the motion of Lord Hartington, that it would not in future entertain any complaint in respect of the publication of its own proceedings or those of its Committees "save and except those conducted with closed doors or in the case of wilful misrepresentation." The reporters, moreover, may still be turned out at any moment, either on a vote of members or at the discretion of the Speaker.

From the literary point of view, Mr MacDonagh's book is not only to be praised highly as a thorough piece of work, done with due concern for the dignity of its subject, but to be welcomed as adding to our knowledge of famous writers. How long will Pitt's reply to Walpole be printed without Dr Johnson's name as the author? The whole mass of so-called Parliamentary speeches printed in the Gentleman's Magazine between November '5th, 1740, and February 22nd, 1713, was a product of Johnson's imagination, and might be printed as the most characteristic example of his rhetoric—his trick, as Goldsmith said, of making little fishes talk like whales. He wrote those speeches in a garret in Exeter Street. Coleridge's labours for The Morning Post were far more strictly those of a reporter. No hearsay inspired them. He was down at Westminster by seven o'clock in the morning to get a seat in the "strangers' gallery," and, if he sometimes fell asleep towards midnight, that was not his fault. He had to work a twenty-five-hours day on more than one occasion. No wonder he refused to go on, even for a half share in the paper, £2,000 a year, and said on retiring to Kew that he would not give up the country and lazy reading for two thousand times the sum. But let nobody blame Johnson. He had not access even to the back row of the "strangers' gallery," and did his prodigious best in the circumstances. Both men lent the House their brains unstintingly. The result of such labours as they shared with distinction was that members began to wish themselves reported, and Sheridan could plead successfully for liberty of the Press against corruption. That liberty, granted as a privilege, was then asserted as a claim. The reporters boycotted those who grudged it, pushed their way defiantly to the front of the gallery, were turned out for it, re-admitted, and finally given a gallery of their own, with a great suite of rooms. Irishmen played a picturesque part in the struggle. There was Mark Supple, who, bored by the House's dullness one night, cried out "A song from Mr Speaker!" and Peter Finnerty, who told the attendant he did not care a damn for him.

"A certain noble Lord who was drinking at the Bar which once stood in the Lobby, thought that a newspaper man was watching him."

"'Hallo,' cried he, 'put down in your notebook that I have just drunk a glass of wine.'"

"'I certainly would,' was the reply, 'if I saw your lordship drinking water.'"

Wilkes's adroit use of his popularity as a City man to protect offending journalists, and Dickens's career—much more important in this connection than has been understood—are very fully treated. Dickens saw the new gallery provided. There seems no doubt that, even at twenty-three years of age, he was one of its ablest workers, though the story that he could fill a column and a half of The Morning Chronicle in an hour is, of course, absurdly ill-informed. He never claimed to have done so. In a brief review, however, the interest of the book can only be hinted at. For all politicians this is as great as for all journalists, and, the scale and treatment being entirely worthy of it, Mr MacDonagh must be congratulated on a permanent record of the long contest which helped to establish the fact that Parliament is the nation's servant, not its master.

KLIGHLY SNOWDEN

NOVELS IN SOLUTION.*

No doubt there will be, until the end of time, a fierce and edifying conflict of opinion as to the particular solvent which will effectively assign to works of fiction their quite especial relative values. It is not entirely a question of Art and No-Art, because, although splendidly dogmatic, that definition calls for volumes in its defence. Nor is it entirely a question of accomplishment, because accomplishment is not invariably a sign of the inferior artist, though it is frequently a mark of superficiality. What hampers the critic is that his theory has inevitably to embrace, and even to exalt, his own preferences—those preferences which no man has ever been able quite honestly to explain. For there are books that amuse the critic, there are books that edify him, and there are books that move him. All those books that bore him are ruled out, because the boring books often have—for different reasons—very large circulations, and thus alienate the sympathies of any theorist to whom popular taste is a study in pathology.

By what standard, for example, may one judge such works as "The Joy of Youth," "Gold Lace," and "The Sorrow Stones"? By what standard such stories as "Cake," "Sheila Intervenes," "My Lady of the Chimney Corner," and "The Irresistible Intruder"? The second question is easier to answer than the first, but the last four books conform to a recognisable convention, or to recognisable "conventions." The other three books are "different," as they say.

"The Joy of Youth" is apparently a satire upon the pompous garrulity of youth. It is very largely a series of broken monologues, in which all the characters use an extraordinarily inflated manner of speaking, and argue about themselves and their opinions in a very aggressive style. As was only to be expected, Mr Eden Phillpotts satirises these objectionable people to perfection, though perhaps, as a jeu d'esprit, "The Joy of Youth" is a little heavy in the hand, in spite of its subtle suggestion that all the speakers are as much behind the times as theorists always have been.

"Gold Lace" is a revelation by persistent analysis of the relations of naval and military officers with the feminine population of a district in Ireland. It is singularly able, complex, and sincere, though it is curiously static. Miss Mayne is a really delicate observer, who does not shrink the conclusions to which she is brought. Her illuminating discussion of the significance of women in the world is both wise and charming, and, while character is of more consideration with Miss Mayne than characters, the portraits in the book are often exquisitely subtle.

* "The Joy of Youth" By Eden Phillpotts (Chapman & Hall). "Gold Lace" By Ethel Colburn Mayne (Chapman & Hall).—"The Sorrow Stones" By M E Williams (Longman).—"Cake" By Bohun Lynch (Murray).—"Sheila Intervenes" By Stephen McKenna (Jenkins).—"My Lady of the Chimney Corner" By Alexander Irvine (Nash).—"The Irresistible Intruder" By William Caine (Lane) 6s each.

"The Sorrow Stones" is a tragic narrative of the Dales and Fells, or rather, the book is a series of sketches of life quite strangely wrought into poignancy by the effect of its tragic rhythm and of one final calamity. I have never read a book in which human speech was so perfectly rendered, and for that alone Miss Williams's work would be memorable. In addition, and in spite of an Imperialistic and injudicious use of the late Boer War, "The Sorrow Stones" is very beautiful and very moving.

"Cake" is a clever and charming book about an eccentric young man who chose to marry a delightful girl. It has many ramifications, and the questions of legacy, name-changing, and an unexpected title, are all satisfactorily settled. The author is a very dexterous and competent writer, and does this sort of thing so easily that one wishes he would do something else not quite so easily. But that wish is not meant to imply any reflection upon "Cake," which is the reflection of a particularly jolly and nonsensical mood.

More ambitious is Mr McKenna's "Sheila Intervenes" in which an alluring busybody nearly wrecks four lives before fate steps in and leaves everybody happy. The book is written with great confidence, but it is rather conventional, and the parade of political knowledge is less convincing than the frequent gay conversations which lift the material above the commonplace. Mr McKenna does not shrink from a blood-spitting hero, and a rather vulgar little heroine, he has other portraits which are more pleasing.

"My Lady of the Chimney Corner," which has its sentimentalities, in the main tells with considerable emotion the story of an Irishwoman who lived through horrible privations with undaunted courage. Mr Jack London is quoted upon the dust-cover as saying that "no more beautiful thing of the spirit has come out of Ireland."

Mr William Caine tells, in the person of a middle-aged bachelor, a rather simple story of love and a surprising little boy. The abrupt change from amiable romance into an almost passionate recital of an unexpected plot, laid by an apparently charming lady, against the hero's bachelorhood, is less welcome. But it is well done, even if it is unbelievable, and the hero's narration is as consistent as one could wish. Only the heroine's plan to marry him is exceptionally mean, and I for one could never forgive her such deceit. The style is Sternian, and well sustained. The Intruder himself is very cleverly steered clear of priggishness: he is a wholly delightful little boy, in spite of an unpleasant imaginary kingdom.

Of these books, to return to the question of a solvent, "Cake" and the "Irresistible Intruder" really amused me, "Gold Lace" edified me, and "The Sorrow Stones" moved me. Mr Phillpotts's book does not seem quite successful, because the young artist in it who talks almost humanly about bores, seems to be given an unnecessary walk-over. He is a poor soporist, and Mr Phillpotts would have given more point to his satire by contrasting Bertram Dangerfield's inexpressible ill-breeding and verbosity with the better behaviour of some ordinary humans. Instead, he opposes only pompous folk infected with the same disease equally tiresome. There were, in fact, moments when I wondered if the book really was a satire. In any case it is purely intellectual. Miss Mayne's book is intellectual also, and it does not move very deeply, but it is tremendously interesting. "Cake" and "The Irresistible Intruder" are simply amusing novels by capable writers, who are content to accept novel-conventions and work originally within those conventions. "Sheila Intervenes" is an acceptance of conventions and an effort to sustain them by cleverness, that is why it lacks real value and why it appears superficial. But "The Sorrow Stones" is really moving: one feels that simple lives are being simply unfolded. Art is certainly involved, although the outcome is apparently artless. Now "The Sorrow Stones" is simple because the life it describes is simple, "Gold Lace" is complex because it deals with complex and not very passionately-felt emotions. "Gold Lace" is urban; "The Sorrow Stones" is among the mountains. It is a finer, purer air, perhaps, but "Gold Lace" is as deeply felt. The difference lies in the material, surely? Urban life is complex, full of subtleties, the life of Cumbria is otherwise. But in both of these books, which do seem to me to rise above the others as distinguished work, there is the one fundamental quality of sober, passionate sincerity to the author's emotional perception of life. I cannot, in the case of prose fiction, find any other universal solvent. We cannot in Mr Phillpotts's case, find much emotion, the talk is all theorising, and Loveday's transference of affection to her conversational wooer is not moving nor beautiful. In the other books with which these words immediately deal, there is hardly any attempt to move the reader deeply, the authors are content, and justifiably content, to skim the surface of life and to store the cream in jugs of antique fashion. Miss Mayne, although working with the delicacy of a lace-maker, is really engrossed in her material, and in the presentation of this her true and immediate vision, Miss Williams also, with less subtlety, but with equal preoccupation with the actual spectacle of life, cares more passionately for precise truth than for anything else. But in both books the fundamental attitude is one of sober detachment. Which is to say that both books are unmistakably works of art.

FRANK SWINNERTON.

ART AND MORALS.*

It is dreadfully the fashion amongst critics to apologise for Boucher, measuring his genius by unapplicable standards, to regard him rather as the baleful beautiful iridescence on the surface of the festering cesspool of French eighteenth century society than as the supreme artist and expresser of his age and surroundings, as authentic in his own way as Velasquez or Franz Hals in theirs.

One might just as well apologise for the rose, because it expresses in terms of beauty the ordure from which it has drawn its sustenance.

And Mrs. Bearnie is no exception to the rule. True, she disclaims any intention "to write a technical book on the life of Boucher" and indeed is not to be taken as a serious critic, but she adopts the general tone, mixing up morality and art as though they have of necessity anything in common. This is a matter which calls for serious protest. Take the following passage, which surely misconceives the function of art in the completest possible way Boucher's talents she writes, which "might have served to raise the whole aim, tone and character of the French art of the day were only made instruments of its degradation. The subjects chosen by Boucher and the manner in which he painted them were exactly calculated to excite the admiration and encourage the tastes of the society in which he was everyday more popular and successful!"

And this, if you please of one of the supreme decorative artists of all time, whose function was not to preach but to mirror the spirit of the age in which he lived. Possibly, though this may be questioned, it would have been better for him to have turned Puritan and abandoned art altogether, but, having chosen his mistress, he would have been but a faithless servant not to have served her wholeheartedly.

Unconcerned with morality, he was concerned with Beauty, and must be judged in the Court of Taste, not in the Court of Arches, must be weighed by the avoirdupois of aesthetics, not by the troy-weight of didactics.

So much by way of protest against an assumption for which I admit Mrs. Bearnie must be held only indirectly responsible. For her book is rather the result of an industrious colligation of other people's writings than of her own original thought or judgment. It is, in fact, a not unamusing mélange, without any very direct bearing upon its avowed subject, of the scandalous happenings of those very scandalous years which preceded the French Revolution, and of which Boucher was at the same time the product and the prophet. That the facts are ill-digested and poorly marshalled will probably not trouble the average reader, who reads not for instruction but for the killing of time. Nor will it trouble him that there is throughout the book an eccentric use of punctuation, which I take it is as much the fault of the publisher's "reader" as of the author. But those things should warn the serious student that this is no book for him. And this is a pity, for not only to have placed Boucher in his proper surroundings but to have shown him part and parcel of his environment would have been well worth the effort. And this because Boucher was not only a great artist. He was the founder of a school, the discoverer of the true French art-soul, doing more than any other to rid his country of foreign domination, and to set up in its place a domination native to her genius. It was a Frenchman who said, "Les grands artistes n'ont pas de patrie," but this does not mean that the picture painted for a French boudoir has as proper a place in an English gallery, nor that a Pieta by Michelangelo should be ravished from an Italian chapel and set up in a New York drinking bar.

* "A Court Painter and His Circle François Boucher" By Mrs Bearnie 15s net Illustrated (J. Fisher Unwin)

Analogously, it is a good thing to write of an artist in his proper surroundings, not as an isolated marvel, independent of circumstances and influences. And, so far as this has been her object, Mrs. Bearne is to be commended, but, as I say, she has failed to digest the results of her industrious research. Good stories there are in plenty, with which to pass an hour or two, stories of Madame de Pompadour, of Madame Geoffrin, of Madame du Deffand, of Louis XV, and his disreputable relations, legitimate and otherwise, of John Law, the Comte de Charolais, Watteau, Chardin and Veret, of that amazing sisterhood Les Demoiselles de Nesle and a score of other so-called ladies, but real demureps. But as often as not, these chroniques scandaleuses have no direct bearing on the subject in hand, which seems rather to have been used as a peg upon which to hang the many piquant stories which the writer of the book has culled from various sources. In a word, this is one of those volumes which have no relation to literature, but which are turned out in ever-increasing numbers "to supply idle minds" (I quote the words of this morning's paper apropos of something else) "with such mild stimulus as will banish boredom for a few hours each day." Doubtless it will find its quota of readers. Economically perhaps it may be justified by the fact that it occurs in response to a demand. None the less it is pitiful that such a demand exists. It is the public that is to blame. If it demanded sound literature the publisher would not be slow to give it. But the publisher has to live and cannot, except in the rarest cases, take the risk of supplying what the large paying public will not have at any price. This volume is lavishly illustrated and its format does credit to the taste of its producer.

G. S. LAYARD

THE STATESMAN OF THE REVOLUTION *

The President of the French Republic having just given us a picture of "How France is Governed" at the present day, it is not inappropriate to receive from M. Barthou, the Prime Minister a study of France during the first phase of the Revolution, written round the life of Mirabeau, the one man who might have reconciled the monarchy and the national liberty, and so spared France the Terror. M. Barthou possesses to the full the lucidity and sense of proportion which have placed so many Frenchmen among the best biographers in the world. He has been fortunate, too, in being able to include some unpublished letters, which throw not a little light upon the real character and personality of the great orator whom Gambetta

* "Mirabeau." By Louis Barthou 10s. net (Heinemann's "Illustrious Figures in French History" Series)

regarded as "the most glorious political genius this country has had since the incomparable Cardinal Richelieu." This eulogy remains unqualified in spite of the acknowledged blot of corruption upon his escutcheon. Mirabeau, it is admitted, was in the pay of that "inert creature," Louis XVI, but he never sacrificed his principles to his pecuniary interests, just as some of our own statesmen in earlier days proved it possible to accept pensions from abroad without sacrificing any of their loyalty to their own country. Mirabeau received money from the king in order to save the king, according to his own friend, M. de la March, and even his enemy, La Fayette, was generous enough to admit that "Mirabeau would not for any sum have supported an opinion destructive of liberty or dishonourable to his mind." He was the one man with a clear consistent policy in that chaos of ideas, but neither the king nor the queen would follow his advice. Mirabeau died, and the inevitable Revolution came, not by the way of Law, as he had proposed, but by the way of Terror, as he had foreseen. Could Mirabeau have saved the situation had he lived? It is a point which many historians have disputed. M. Barthou has no hesitation in declaring that Mirabeau's scheme was doomed to failure before his death by the Assembly's suicidal Ordinance of November 7th, 1789, by which no member could take office under the Crown while holding his seat or for six months afterwards. Limited as Mirabeau thus was to the obscure position of secret adviser to the Court, he possessed neither the confidence nor the esteem of those whom he was advising. They consulted him, but never heeded, and the Assembly, which at that period, as Minister, he might have mastered by the magic of his personality, afterwards grew out of hand, and would have brutally upset his plans.

"The decree of November 7th," as his biographer says, "broke the only power which could consolidate the Revolution by moderating it. It was on that day really, and not on the day of Mirabeau's death, that the ruins of the monarchy became the prey of faction."

The book is valuable for its intimate glimpses of Mirabeau's storm-tossed private life, as well as of his public career. The one reacted upon the other to an exceptional extent in his case, especially in regard to his inherited vices and virtues, justice to both of which is done by Mr. Barthou.

"His life and genius, his prodigious, great, able weaknesses, everything in his eventful life an irritating enigma to all who do not claim him as their ancestor."

Some of the letters, now published for the first time, also reveal the full extent of the tragedy of Mirabeau's early marriage, the fatal mistake of which was largely responsible for those excesses of his youth which he lived so bitterly to repent.

FRANK A. MUMBY

A STUDY OF GEORGE MEREDITH *

France, upon the whole, has not taken to the Meredith.

"The first step that she steppit in,
She steppit to the knee,
An', sighin' sair, says this lady fair,
'Thus waters no for me."

Like the heroine of the Scots ballad, France has been disinclined to go deeply into the study of an Englishman who loved her as few Englishmen had the courage and insight to do, during the last quarter of the nineteenth century. This is the phenomenon which stirs the loyal soul of M. Photiadès. "There is in all countries, and above all in France, a certain class, which, by reason of its character and culture, is predisposed to read Meredith, but many well-informed people do not realise this, because the poet-novelist is little known, and still less translated." His aim in this book is to encourage the French to step into the waters of Meredith's prose and verse.

* "George Meredith: His Life, Genius, and Teaching." From the French of Constantin Photiadès. Rendered into English by Arthur Price 6s. net (Constable)

It is from this point of view that the volume must be criticised. The sub-title is too large. English readers will not find in these pages very much original or fresh criticism of Meredith's philosophy. M. Photiadès does not supply even literary estimates of a particularly brilliant order. He writes for the outside public of men and women, especially women, and does his best to interest them in the personality and aims of the great English novelist. The opening chapter describes a visit to Box Hill on September 22nd, 1908. Meredith loathed interviewers, and told M. Photiadès so. "America, that cradled Hercules, infects us with the too free manners of her cowboys and rough-riders. These trappers communicate to us their eccentricity, that mania for besieging persons of note to expose their innermost secrets. Such effrontery stupefies us, we are too apt to take this unceremoniousness for strength. And now, behold, the English journals are enviously imitating the most insolent habits of their Transatlantic brethren!" What would Meredith have said if he had when his visitor was to make copy out of his visit? The next chapter, on Meredith's life, put together the main acts about his career, partly based on Mr. Clodd's article in The Fortnightly Review. But is it quite true to say that Meredith came out of the ordeal of his first marriage "natured, purified by grief, with a fund of indulgence and pity towards women"? The chapter on Meredith's genius is disappointing; it is a paraphrase and analysis of "Harry Richmond," nothing more. For the purpose of interesting the French one would have imagined that "Beauchamp's Career" would have been more suitable. The next chapter on his art is better. But what does M. Photiadès mean by saying that "a character of Dickens passes for ever from our remembrance as soon as the thread of adventure is broken"? So far as that is true, it is just as true of Meredith's characters. The last chapter, on his teaching, does not go into any profound estimate, though it contains an interesting remark of Meredith upon Goethe: "He, to be making love to young girls! I hate in old man in whom passion is dead, and who yet desires to crush a young flower on his breast, I loathe it because nature loathes it."

It is doubtful if a book like this was worth translating. Its audience lies on the other side of the Channel. But if it stimulates French people to read Meredith's verse and prose, either in the original or in a translation, all success to it!

JAMES MOLLAT, D.D., D.Litt.

MORE MAX.*

Mr. Max Beerbohm has become a national institution. To say so may seem to overburden him with a deadly weight of ultra-respectable solemnity, but the fact remains, and to be caricatured by him is the hall-mark of fame. He is a national institution, like Guy Fawkes Day, Mrs. Grundy, and the Income Tax, but he is all unlike these or any other of the institutions that have taken root in the national heart. He stands alone, he is unique, even his resemblance to Guy Fawkes Day is merely superficial, so superficial that I don't suppose it would have occurred to me if this new collection of his caricatures had not come into my hands on the memorable Fifth.

He is not only unique among English institutions, but among English caricaturists. Most of our caricaturists, since the days of Gilray and Rowlandson, have been either admirable artists who could draw good portraits,

* "Fifty Caricatures." By Max Beerbohm 5s net (Heinemann.)

or very indifferent artists whose portraits were not good, and whose virtue lay wholly in the humour of their ideas. But a true caricature is a very different thing from a true portrait, it is a subtler and actually truer thing than that, for it takes account of its subject's invisible characteristics as well as of his obvious features, and suggests these by a cunning exaggeration of the salient points in the face, figure, attitudes, manner and expression of its original. Mr. Beerbohm has done this often before, and in these "Fifty Caricatures" he has done it again triumphantly. Lord Halsbury, for example, is not like the broad, squat, dogged figure that stands for him in the picture labelled, "The Rising Hope of the Stern Unbending Tories," yet the broad, squat, dogged figure is exactly like him, and not merely suggests his outward appearance, but the whole personality of the man. It is the same with the delightful sketch of Justice Darling requesting his marshal to "get some bells sewn on" to the black cap, in the presentation of Mr. Thomas Hardy "composing a lyric," of Mr. Arnold Bennett sitting at ease on a milestone, whilst Hilda Lessways reprimands him for keeping her and Clayhanger "standing about here," waiting to be disposed of in the long overdue third volume of the Clayhanger trilogy. Or take the drawing of Mr. Masfield leaning over a cottage roof, looking down into a squalid village street in which a row is brewing among the natives, the nose is not really Mr. Masfield's, nor the mouth, nor the drooped eyes, nor the collar, and yet, so far from the final likeness being lost in the slight exaggeration, it is curiously emphasised, and you are made to realise intimate characteristics that before you may have seen without seeing, and the little legend underneath

Mr. Bernard Shaw.
that the dear fellow has not moved

e who, revisiting I n
From "Fifty Carl

"A swear-word in a rustic slum
A simple swear-word is to some,
To Masfield something more,"

completes the picture

Mr Beerbohm is our greatest living caricaturist, our most satirically humorous draughtsman, but the humour of his drawing is always edged and accentuated by the humour and often biting truthfulness of the thought that lies behind it. Usually his satire is so genial, for all its shrewdness, that even his involuntary sitters must be moved to laugh at themselves, and if now and then it cuts to the bone and deeper, and is mercilessly revealing—well, it would be a poor and ineffective satire that invariably left its victim rejoicing. But there is no need to go on. It is enough to say that these "Fifty Caricatures" include some of the most amusing and most brilliantly clever things even "Max" has given us, they may not be things of beauty—they were not meant to be—but they are certainly a joy for ever.

RECENT POETRY.*

The greater part of this poetry is of the humbler kind, a versification of thought and fancy that is not always perfectly intelligible to the stranger. When it is intelligible it is often homely, as when Mrs Spender begins

"Such a perfect April, on the Suffolk Coast"
'Plain and flat and humdrum, are its features,' said mine host Humdrum! with the ocean roving, brawling on the beach or when Mrs Cameron sings of "Grandmother's Garden"

"Over the mountains and over the sea,
In the land where we never again shall be,
There loth a garden of long ago,
Where children played that we used to know or when Miss Gregory praises Mentoni

"There is a place I know, and love, upon a Southern shore,
A spot on earth most dear to me, I love it more and more,
Where oranges and lemons grow, and feathery palms abound,
And olive trees with grey green leaves grow on the terraced ground"

From these homely records of their affections they range to attempts at expressing their fancies or aspirations. Thus Mrs Cameron begins her first poem

"In Arcady I live Great Pan himself Hath taught me what I tell and another poem tells us

Yet this is sure each has his key,
His magic 'Open Sesame,'
Wherewith to enter Fairyland
Mine—was a doorway in the Strand"

Her chief success is a version of a familiar tune, of which the first verse is once I went joyously Friends of the morning

Walked with and guided me, and low in my ear
Whispering, 'Prudence and wealth be your scorn,
So shall we tarry a while with you here'
Then was I happy with dreams for companions"

The last line is slightly varied for each of the six verses. Mrs Spender resembles her in crying 'Romance! Romance is here!' in a London night, and in exclaiming

'Take my hand, I'll lead the way,
To our Silverwood to-day,
For I feel in fairy mood
And 'tis ever understood
That silver woods are fay

* "Grey and Gold" By Mrs Hugh Spender 2s 6d net (Erskine Macdonald)—"In Arcady and other Poems" By W J Cameron 3s 6d net (Erskine Macdonald)—"Dreams of Arcady" By Octavia Gregory 2s 6d net (Erskine Macdonald)—"The Flood of Youth" By Sherwood Spencer 1s net (Fifield)—"Moods, Metres, and New Lyric Poems" By Charles Newton Robinson 5s net (Constable)—"The Flute of Sardonix" Poems by Edmund John 3s 6d net (Jenkins)—"The Diwan of Zeb-un-Nissa" With Introduction and Notes 2s (Murray)

Miss Gregory prefers Greek gods to faeries, and says.

"Of the classics I grow fonder
And of quaint old Grecian lore," but it is doubtful whether she has seen them in the flesh, and she is really more at home in her gentle tributes to Mrs. Browning, Lamb, Lady Hamilton, and her own pet cranes.

Mr Sherwood Spencer's verses are more interesting as poetry. They are hasty juvenilia "writ in the flood of youth" and nevertheless expressing more of youth itself than juvenilia often do. In "A Whistling Boy"

"Lusty, young and glowing,
Carnal and unabashed,
Song to the four winds throwing,
Out of the wood he flashed,"

and in the feeling that pervades or visits even less perfect poems, there is more than the shadow of youthful joy, vigorous and profound. The author went to Tripoli in 1911 and was at twenty-one "the youngest, the highest-paid war correspondent in the world." Whether he would achieve such glory at poetry I cannot foresee. It is more likely that he will not attempt it, but if he does, he has, or had, a spirit which might do very much if it combined with experience and greater skill.

Mr Newton Robinson was a fencer, a connoisseur, and the organiser of the "Land Union." He died this year at the age of fifty-nine. This, his last book of verse, must be a pleasure to his friends for its many-sided personal revelation. For those who did not know him its value is less, because it lacks both subtlety and vigour and the verses have to be read with far more attention than they command if they are to yield anything. But "October"—and especially the last verses. So, Mary, bring a brace of trout," and "Bring up the eighty-seven port," down to

"Thanks, kindly nil of Paradise!
My pint of 'eighty-seven,
For just a glimpse of An Sweet, dark and bright is good light verse.

Among these poets Mr John is the one whose grasp equals his aim. His verses are full of love and of remorse, of Greek or Græco-Roman gods, who mingle in a half-Christian, half-Pagan temple with acolytes, and with Salome, "Our Lady of the Ivory Tower," and many other ladies, real and imaginary. If it were not that initials are put at the head of some of the erotic poems it might be supposed that they were the result chiefly of reading Wilde and the early Swinburne. "For my Desire," he sings

"For my Desire, for Love and Song and Pain,
Now hid beneath dead rose-leaves of regret
I would walk joyous in the Devil's Net,
And welcome death and hell—for you again"

He is full of voluptuous epithets and substantives arranged with firm, hard rhythms and plangent rhymes which produce the effect of imitation bronze work. He is cold with all his use of passionateness. He is scarcely more real than one of his women, whom he says Love made "from tears and cassia and a rose." He is melodramatic and declamatory. But his grasp is always equal to his aim, and though he conveys only a general sense of amorousness, luxury, melancholy and exhaustion, every poem, every verse, every line, is visibly the work of one who has mastered his trade, and must unlearn it if he would be a poet.

A good versifier also is Miss Jessie Duncan Westbrook, and she is able to reveal something of the poetry of that tragical great Indian lady, the Princess Zeb-un-Nissa, who called herself Makhfi, The Hidden One (1639-1689). Truly she said of her soul that it wore suffering like a kingly garment, and that in spite of all she was blessed because she possessed the "jewel of song divine." It might be said of her, as she said of the moth

"How strong hast thou become, O Moth, how great, Worshipping thus the flame!"

As a lover at least she is the peer of Dante, and Miss Westbrook's translation suggests a poet who combined in a unique degree, sadness and pride, fervour and humility.

EDWARD THOMAS.

MONTROSE.*

This is an altogether attractive book, and may be reckoned a serious piece of history; it is interesting throughout. It cannot be said that the writing is exactly brilliant, yet the concluding pages have a genuine eloquence arising from the author's enthusiasm. The publisher has done his part well, the illustrations are carefully chosen and excellently reproduced, the book would make an acceptable prize for boys, and should find a place in every school library. The serious historian will value it because the evidence is always carefully weighed, the notes contain an adequate biography. Mr Buchan shows that Montrose was a very great soldier, although he never took part in any battle which profoundly modified the course of history. In nature like so many of the finer type of soldiers, he was loyal and simple-minded, an upright liver and a religious man. But besides being a man of action, Montrose held with deep conviction opinions which were the result of much thought. His confession of political faith, 'a Discourse on Sovereignty,' is worthy of consideration as an expression of the leading principles of his life, and must be taken into account by every student of politics. He was a poet, the last four lines of the following verse are amongst the most familiar quotations

'Like Alexander I will reign,
And I will reign alone
My thoughts did evermore disdain
A rival on my throne
' either fears his fate too much,
Or his deserts are small,
that dares not put it to the touch,
To win or lose it all"

He was handsome and dignified, caring for pomp and fine clothes, although these always took a very subordinate part in his life. Mr Buchan brings before us the outward picture of the man with great distinctness, though he does not help us so much in understanding his deeper nature. We occasionally feel that the biographer is not quite fair to those who opposed his hero, he does not conceal his dislike of the Covenanters, though he can see—as could Montrose—that there was some wisdom in their original intentions. In his relations with Montrose, as with so many of those who fought and suffered for him, Charles I cuts but a poor figure. We suspect that the parts of the book which Mr Buchan most cares about are those actually concerned with fighting and when he comes to the fighting Mr Buchan is always actual and vigorous.

JANE AUSTEN.†

It may be admitted perhaps, that few biographies, if any, could be more difficult to write than that of Jane Austen, as there are few authors about whose work it is more hard to speak at once freshly and adequately. Occasional paragraphs of enthusiasm, like those of Scott and Macaulay, will seem often to express just the right thing. It is not so easy to analyse and estimate at any great length. For the fact is that Jane Austen's genius can scarcely be described in words. It is mainly a matter of instinct, a gift for creation, which is unerring and inevitable. She accomplished the final achievement of art by making her characters alive. There can be no question about whether all they said and did was right or wrong simply because they did it, and could not have done otherwise. So far as Mr Warre Cornish attempts to explain this mystery, he has selected an original, and suggestive, point of view, which is in itself absolutely sound.

"The miracle in Jane Austen's writing is not only that her presentment of each character is complete and consistent, but also that every fact and particular situation is viewed in comprehensive proportion and relation to the rest. She knew what every one of her people did yesterday and would do to-morrow, and what had happened, and was going to happen, to make them do it. Small facts and expressions which pass almost unnoticed by the reader, and quite unnoticed by other actors in the story, turn up later to take their proper place. She never drops a stitch. The reason is not so much that she took infinite trouble, though no doubt she did, as that everything was actual to her. She has no need to construct her characters, for there they are before her, like Mozart's music, only waiting to be written down."

* "The Marquis of Montrose" By John Buchan 7s 6d net. (Nelson)

† "Jane Austen" (English Men of Letters series.) By F Warre Cornish, 2s net (Macmillan)

We cannot so readily accept his summary of "obvious faults" that "she has no remarkable distinction of style," whereas every word tells that "her plots are neither original nor striking," whereas they never obtrude because they are absolutely true to life, that "she has little tenderness," when we remember Marianne and Anne Elliot. Her limitations, of subject and emotion, were deliberately self-imposed. It would be idle to dogmatise upon what she had, or had not, the power to do. It is well said, however, that her "admirers, whether critics, authors, or men and women of the world, are innumerable, and their homage takes the form of unweariedly reading and re-reading her books." That, after all, is the mystery, that no one ever grows tired of her characters. Our delight in them increases at every reading. The more we talk about them, and wonder over them the greater their fascination. There are not many people in real life of whom one can say the same.

It is very doubtful whether our ignorance about Jane Austen's very self need be honestly regretted by any one. Inevitably we welcome the smallest item of information about one who has given us so much pleasure. Gratitude craves a personality for its expression. But no work could be more absolutely independent of its creator, so intimate, and yet so impersonal. The artist conceals herself, her work needs her not. To the credit of humanity we are glad to know that she was beloved by her own family, particularly the young people. Nothing else really matters. The letters confirm what the work proves, that her keen insight and sparkling humour was given as freely to friends as to the public, that she enjoyed life and humanity, if she saw through a great deal of it.

In the course of analysing the novels, Mr Warre Cornish announces a conclusion which will come as a surprise to many, and certainly merits careful attention. As an explanation of Elizabeth's rather abrupt forgiveness of Darcy it is far more satisfactory than the usual reference to Pemberley. "I can find no solution of this problem unless it be in Jane Austen's belief in the overmastering power, and the sufficiency of love."

Moreover, in the opinion of our critic this "high flown sentiment" may be found nearly everywhere in her work.

"In her philosophy love prevails over prudence, family feelings, social condition, worldly propriety. When love comes in at the door, all other considerations fly out of the window. Wickham and Willoughby in Sense and Sensibility, would have been forgiven if they had been true lovers. She has no condemnation for Marianne Dashwood—her disapproval, in Persuasion, however moderately expressed, rests not upon Anne, but upon Lady Russell, who gives the foolish-wise counsel of prudence. To her mind, the call of love, which comes to few, ought not to be resisted, cannot be resisted, when it comes."

We are so accustomed to hear Jane Austen criticised for lack of deep feeling, that the above paragraph seems to suggest an entire revision of judgment, and we must confess to a difficulty in reconciling it with other dicta by Mr Warre Cornish himself. He says "There is little passion in Jane Austen's lovers," and stigmatises the raptures of Emma, and Fanny, and Anne, as "moderate." He calls their life "real, not ideal, lived among moderate hills and valleys, for summits and abysses we must go to greater writers."

In all probability the confusion arises from the impossibility of finding words to estimate so fine an art. The first, and more original, opinion here enunciated, is too crudely expressed. The second, more conventional, criticism is superficial. We may assume that Jane Austen understood human nature sufficiently to recognise the infinite power of emotion—and we are grateful to Mr Warre Cornish for emphasising what her delicacy may have obscured. We may admit without cavil or regret, that the passions which the Brontës were the first women to reveal, lay outside her sphere. She penetrated the heart without dissecting it, and never stimulated our sympathy by any abnormal appeal. It is her magical control over expression which may have blinded us to her essential romance.

It is not possible, unfortunately, to go over this whole volume in any detail. The discussion of persons so familiar to all readers as the characters in Jane Austen would quickly exceed the proper limits of a review. While, since every one must have his own ideas on the subject, he will appreciate those of Mr. Cornish without any comment from us. There is no occasion for any dogmatism on such matters; we do not expect to agree about them. We each have our own favourites, our own interpretations. The opportunity afforded us by Mr. Cornish, of studying them once again through the eyes of a friend, will be very welcome. At times even, we may be tempted to change our minds.

For our critic is an enthusiast who knows his subject, a sympathetic observer of detail, a patient chronicler of these delicate touches which mean so much, and may so profitably be compared one with the other. Miss Austen's work will bear the most microscopic analysis. Her sentences may be detached from their context without fear, for the most searching examination. A passage, when thus isolated, may have a message which we have overlooked hitherto, simply because it fitted so perfectly with what came before or after.

Wherefore we welcome the appearance of a volume on Jane Austen among the "Men of Letters" and we find pleasure in going over her work again with Mr. Cornish.

R. BRIMLEY JOHNSON

A GREAT CHINESE STATESMAN *

The editor of these memoirs modestly conceals his name on the title-page, though the initials W. F. M. and the address Shanghai, at the end of the "Editor's Foreword" give a clue to those who know the China Column. It appears that Li Hung-Chang left behind him at his death a vast mass of memoirs in manuscript, scattered about in various cities of his native land. His family collected these, and 170,000 words of them have now been translated into English, from which the selection in the present volume has been made by the editor. We are not told whether it is in contemplation to publish more hereafter, but we do not doubt that the interest aroused by what is now before us will be such as to encourage further publication. Some day, perhaps, we shall see the diary, if not in its entirety, at least in a form that will satisfy readers that they are listening to the real and undiluted opinions of Viceroy Li himself. For, however able and conscientious the translators and editor, it is impossible to resist the suspicion that preconceived notions have influenced the selection. Just as no brief anthology from his works will enable us to understand a poet, so no scattered extracts from a diary will permit us to master the writer's character.

Li Hung-Chang certainly had a character worth mastering, if such a feat ever be possible in the case of a great statesman, East or West. The Hon. John W. Foster, once U. S. Secretary of State, in his Introduction does not err on the side of rating Li too low. To him Li "was not only the greatest man the Chinese race has produced in modern times, but, in a combination of qualities, the most unique personality of the past century among all the nations of the world." If we must deal in superlatives, we would rather call Li the sublimest opportunist of the nineteenth century. He took for his motto in statecraft a maxim in the old Chinese work, known to us as "The History of Great Light"—"Force can only be successful in combating what is weaker than itself, but weakness can overcome what is far stronger than itself." This idea of "the policy of the weak," as he called it, was no new and startling intuition of genius; but to the way in which he worked out the idea we will not deny more than a touch of genius. Few statesmen were ever put in a more difficult position than he was in guiding the porcelain jar of China down the stream among the brazen vessels of the "barbarian nations."

* "Memoirs of the Viceroy Li Hung-Chang" With an Introduction by the Hon. John W. Foster 10s. 6d. net. (Constable.)

These fragments of diary give us a more pleasing picture of the great Viceroy than we might have expected. With all due deference to the Hon. John W. Foster, they do not set at rest all suspicions that he was under the undue influence of Russia. Such extracts as are presented show, indeed, that he was not ashamed of his conduct with regard to Russian aggression in Manchuria. This, however, we knew already from the letter which he wrote shortly before his death to the Empress Dowager's kinsman Jung-lu, by Europeans the most misunderstood of all the Manchu statesmen. What we do not know, and cannot expect to know from a diary (since very few diarists are like Pepys) is how far self-interest blinded his eyes about Russia. Before and since Li Hung-Chang men have conceived patriotism to be pointing the same way as their pockets. We may allow that he did not wittingly sell his country for gold. But we cannot see that the memoirs show him as one of those who would resolutely say to the tempters, "You must go away, gentlemen—you are getting near my price."

There is a simplicity which has no little charm in much of this diary of Li Hung-Chang. We like both the occasional great humility and the self-esteem, the early debate about the advisability of marriage and the enduring admiration of fair ladies, the filial devotion to his mother and the strict attention to official duty which made him acquiesce in the Throne's demand to shorten his display of mourning, his love of "old custom" (such as Westerners in the coast-ports find so irksome in their Chinese dependants) and his recognition of the advantages of progress, his bluntness and his appreciation of a diplomatic lie. Quite a new light, we imagine, will be thrown for most readers upon his literary ambitions and his far from inconsiderable literary achievements. On few things did he pride himself more than on his poem on Shen Nung, the Divine Husbandman, the patron of agriculture (The translators give a full version of this). How happy would he be, he writes, if he could speak as well of all his official and private acts as of this poem!

The translators appear to have done their work well, for the most part, though there are occasional oddities of style and a few Americanisms which strike a strange note amid their surroundings.

PHILIP W. SLICHLAND

THE YOUNG IDEA.*

Boys are harder to please than men, perhaps that is how it is you can number the famous authors of boys' stories on the fingers of one hand, and more difficult is it than writing their fiction to write a book of good counsel for boys—that boys will read. It cannot be done except by one who has very special qualifications for the task, and the first of these is that he should himself be something of a Peter Pan, he must have a wide knowledge of the world, he must have done his fair share of worrying, practical work in it, and have made a success of his own life, but through it all he must have remained at heart one of those wise boys who never grow up so fatally as to become middle-aged. Because when you become middle-aged you forget your own boyhood, and forgetting that you forget also what appealed to it, and so do not really know how to impart to other boys those broad truths they will understand and believe, and be the better for knowing.

Mr. Arthur Mee has these qualifications, you cannot read his "Letters to Boys" without realising that. Moreover, there is tangible evidence that he has this fine and more too common understanding of the mind of youth, in the fact that some few years ago he commenced the issue of The Children's Encyclopædia, and it proved so great a success that he has never been able to stop it, and as The Children's Magazine it is still "running," and, combining instruction with amusement, it is unique among periodicals of its kind. On the same principle, his "Letters to Boys" are both instructive and entertaining. He begins with an address "To the Boy who will be Prime Minister." Of course, some of the Prime Ministers of the future are at present at school, they are necessarily a strictly limited number, but there are hundreds of possible Prime Ministers, and they will be the nobler men for the post—or, if they miss it, for any other post—if they adopt the manly, high ideals towards which Mr Mee would lead them. An admirable letter too, is that "To the Boy who is leaving School"—the whole book, indeed, is as inspiring as it is eminently common-sensible. There are letters to "The Boy who loves a Game," "To the Boy who will manage a great Business," "To the Boy who gets over Difficulties," "To the Boy who loves a Hero," "To the Boy who loves a Book," "To the Boy who loves the Highest." These, and the rest of the letters, are all written in the happiest, most genial spirit, and in a simple, lucid, pleasant English that enlivens and emphasises its teachings with anecdotes and aphorisms, and makes easy and interesting reading. It contains just those things that every boy ought to know, and we commend it as an ideal gift-book to all who are concerned for the welfare of the men of to-morrow, for in a word, it teaches the young idea how to shoot straight and at the highest things.

* "Arthur Mee's Letters to Boys" 1s. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

GERHART HAUPTMANN.*

It is one of the ironies of art that the who undertake violent revolutions so often come to turn their backs upon the thing for which they stood. Thus the League of Youth," and later in "The Dolls' House" conceptions of drama by setting to work to build a house of naturalism, yet in the end, from "The Master Builder" onwards, he has turned upon that self same naturalism than any of his critics had done in the noise of the first battle. And time comes along with its own further irony by delicately giving a dullness, a staleness, to nearly all the plays written between "The League of Youth" and "Hedda Gabler," and an increasing freshness to the poetic plays written before that period, and to the semi-poetic plays written after that period.

Something of the same is to be found in Hauptmann. In the "consistent naturalism" on which he based the first of his plays, "Before Dawn," he needlessly sought to eliminate all trace of stage subterfuge, and not only of stage subterfuge, but that other subterfuge that is known as artistic order. He did not wholly do so. Dramatic beginnings and dramatic endings are part of that artistic order: their place, strictly, is only as the effective opener and closer of a plot, or sequence, that in its total effect provides a significant, or, at least, knowledgable microcosm of the larger and less weldy masses of life. In "Before Dawn," however, Hauptmann casts away that plot, that apt sequence, and in five acts, that is to say in five distinct and chosen scenes, displays a number of characters, many of whom have little relation with many others, recounts conversations whose only justification is that they occur, leads the mind (fed by an antiquated sense of "plot," and so of expectation) to anticipate developments that are not proceeded with, to take as clues what are no more than events sufficient in themselves, and concludes with what seem to be (again from our antiquated sense of things) a number of loose ends throughout the play. All show of plot, thus, has gone, in the name of fidelity to life—though to call mere happenings Life is to ask a challenge at once—but the beginning and the ending of a plot, that is to say a dramatic opening and dramatic conclusion, are still retained. Loth's entrance and Helen's desperation preserve those foundations of dramatic semblance, and they at once raise the question whether artistic cause and effect, which, after all, is what is meant by plot, may not be as truthful as the necessity for a beginning and an ending.

In "The Weavers," the second of the plays given in these two volumes containing the "Social Dramas," the result is rendered still more amorphous by the vast number of characters he brings on to his scenes. None of these characters may strictly be considered as of minor importance. That is part of the method. If there is no action to be carried forward it follows that there are no primary or secondary characters, and that, therefore, each figure must receive equal attention in the transfiguration of personality. Over the five acts the figures of the weavers surge to and fro, unforgettably, but without gathering any drift or direction. Yet here, too, there is a carefully chosen opening, and a conclusion even so conventional as a gun-shot. Between one and the other the hungry, terrible figures of the weavers shift and pass in such a tumult of disorder that we watch them almost as we might watch a riot from a hotel-window, yet a little listlessly too, because we know that it is not real after all. The scenes have not the conviction of life, nor have they the other conviction of art, and this in spite of the epic character of the whole.

It is as though we were listening to some narrator. There is always the sense in Hauptmann's naturalistic plays that a narrator is seeking to make his narrative into a panorama. And here it is that the irony of his development enters. The insufficiency of this assaults him continually, until at last in "Hannele," "The Sunken Bell," and "Henry of Ane" the things he has rejected compel his service in the name of an Art that alone can satisfy spiritual craving. We will not speak of these now for they are yet to be produced in a later volume of this collected edition, it is only necessary at this time to note how the significance of a poetic content compelled the significance of form, of order, of artistic cause and effect, and so wrote Hauptmann's own criticism on his earlier, and amorphous, naturalism. Poetic content and poetic form—these are the only things that remain in drama, as is best proved by the things that depart from those ancient significances. In some words that Mr Lewisoohn quotes from Hauptmann's "Griechischer Frühling" the dramatist writes:

"The Green Gleam which mariners assert to have witnessed at times, appears at the last moment before the sun dips below the horizon. The ancients must have known the Green Gleam. I do not know whether that be true, but I feel a longing in me to behold it. I can imagine some Pure Fool whose life consisted but in seeking it over lands and seas, in order to perish at last in the radiance of that strange and splendid light. Are we not all perhaps upon a similar quest? Are we not beings who have exhausted the realm of the senses, and are athirst for other delights for both our senses and our souls?"

As Mr Lewisoohn justly remarks: "The author of 'Before Dawn' has gone a long journey in the land of the spirit to the writing of these words," and we may add, possibly, that he comes to see that it is not the ocean of humanity merely, but the ocean with the green gleam upon it that gives his material to the dramatist who satisfies both himself and us in his art.

One feels that in the first of these two volumes, where the dramatist (both actually and for us in the course of this edition) begins his travels toward that discovery. In "The Weavers," and the figure of Mrs. Wolf in "The Beaver Coat," we may see how that travel is rooted in humanity. "The Weavers" is almost epical in its darkness and its terror, when the people, rising from under the heel of industrialism and its concomitants of hunger and degradation, surge wildly over the pages. It is too epical, indeed, to be dramatic, though its skill is wonderful. In Mrs. Wolf we see a coarse shrewd woman, with a love of scrapes almost Falstaffian, thriving by outwitting the pomposities of this same social system. We cannot help admiring her for her success.

* "The Dramatic Works of Gerhart Hauptmann." Edited by Ludwig Lewisoohn. Vols I and II. "Social Dramas" 5s. net. each. (Martin Secker.)

The second volume contains work much later of production, though Hauptmann includes them under the same classification "Drayman Henschel," "Rose Bernd" and "The Rats," indeed, weave in and out, in point of time, with such plays as "Hannele" and "Henry of Ane." Mr. Lewisohn in his introduction suggests that they are a reaction to naturalistic methods even while the dramatist is seeking to discover the green gleam, but to contrast them with "Before Dawn" is to see how far Hauptmann has progressed from his "consistent naturalism." "Drayman Henschel" and "Rose Bernd" are very skilfully woven plays, and "The Rats" is in fact most elaborate of construction. In the last of these plays Hauptmann takes the opportunity of giving through Spitta's lips his opinion of tragic people in drama, though in his own practice now he condemns himself, since we do not feel tragedy in the death of Mrs. John whereas there is tragedy in the death of Henschel, not because Henschel is simply a carter but because Hauptmann, led by a sure instinct, made him of heroic mould. Naturalism receives further criticism in all the plays of this second volume by the clear dramatic need (to which Hauptmann like the skilled technician he is gave full play) of free entrances and exits. Nowhere do people come and go so freely arrive so desirably and punctually, have such unlimited access to other people's rooms depart so precisely when their hour is done, as in these plays. And they are the better mirror of life for that. They, in their own ritual, catch and portray the wider thing outside, and the result is an increased intensity that is of the very essence of truth. There is a considerable increase of art (artifice, indeed if one will) in the second of these volumes, and it has meant an immeasurable increase in significance. Mr. Secker, we need scarcely say, has produced the books with his customary sense of the fitting in dignity and artistry, and they will introduce Hauptmann to many readers to whom his vernacular original is out of the question.

DARRITT FIDGGS

LADIES AND OTHERS.*

The delightful qualities which charmed and fascinated us in "The Crock of Gold," with its freakish humour, its exuberant joy in life, its fantastic philosophy greet you again in Mr. Stephens' new book "Here are Ladies." He sets before your intellectual palate a wonderful assortment of vands, or, rather he flings them at your head, as who should say "Take them or leave them and be hanged." Many of the sketches—they are not stories in the accepted sense of the term, but fragments of life—are concerned with courtship and marriage, with the disillusionment or catastrophes which interrupted love's young dream with selfish husbands and dominant wives, and with the desperate monotony of two people sharing the same house looking at the same face and hearing the same voice day after day until some god or devil ended it.

Another writer might in dealing with such similar subjects produce a sense of sameness but Mr. Stephens does not, since he gives you different aspects and revelations of the elementary facts of life.

"I'll tell you what is in my mind," said the discontented stone-breaker as he paused in his work by the roadside, "a person that has neighbours will have either friends or enemies, and it's likely enough that he'll have the last unless he has a meek spirit. And it's the same way with a man that's married, or a man that has a brother. For the neighbours will spy on you from dawn to dusk, and talk about you in every place and a wife will try to rule you, in the house and out of the house until you are badgered to a skeleton, and a brother will ask you to give him whatever you value most in the world. There are three things a man doesn't like. He doesn't like to be spied on, and he doesn't like to be ruled and regulated, and he doesn't like to be asked for a thing he wants himself."

* "Here are Ladies." By James Stephens 5s net (Macmillan)

And whether he lets himself be spied on or not, he'll be talked about, and in any case he'll be made out to be a queer man, and if he lets his wife rule him he'll be scorned and laughed at, and if he doesn't let her rule him he'll be called a rough man, and if he once gives to his brother he will have to keep on giving for ever, and if he doesn't give in at all he'll get the bad name and the sour look as he goes about his business."

"Maybe," answered the Philosopher, "your wife would be a good wife to some other husband, and your brother might be decent enough if he had a different brother."

"The Blind Man," who after he had been dispossessed in favour of a younger brother married a farm of ten acres, is a powerful little tragedy, as inevitable in its issue as fate. "A Glass of Beer," although a very effective piece of work, rather mars the congruity of the whole, the scene being laid in Paris, which is more remote from the Ireland of Mr. Stephens' inspiration than heaven or hell. But the humorous extravaganza called "The Threepenny Piece" is pure and bewildering delight. It is in representing the personal relations between mortal and immortal, human and divine, that Mr. Stephens excels all others. His very daring compels conviction. You ask no questions, but believe it all with the greediest credulity. "I hate these sinners from the kingdom of Kerry," said the Chief Tormentor, when Brian of the O'Brien nation had thrown hell into confusion, and threatened even the serenity of heaven, because the Seraph Cuchulain had stolen the threepenny-piece, which had been given him at his wake, "I hate the entire Clan of the Gael."

A delightful book, and as unique as delightful. We look forward with eager impatience for what Mr. Stephens will next give us.

H. A. HINKSON

ELLEN KEY*

Those who already know of Ellen Key through her writings will be glad to learn, through this translation of Louise Nystrom-Hamilton's well written biography, something of the woman herself, those who learn of her first from this biography will if they are interested in psychological and moral questions, pass on from this story of Ellen Key's life to the revelation of the woman herself in her writings.

At first we do not connect the name of Ellen Key, the Swedish lecturer, writer, and "liberator of woman's soul," with the Sutherlandshire clan M'Kay, but from this volume we learn, in the chapter devoted to "Ancestry," that "the Key family is of Scotch-Celtic lineage" and that M'Kay, the earlier form of the name is best interpreted by "war-flame," or "hery," or "warlike." And certainly it would seem that in spite of Ellen Key's thoughtfulness, self-control, and very gradual development, she does possess much of the spirit of the soldier, and is strong to fight in defence of her beliefs.

In the earlier chapters of this biography we see the child, Ellen, clever, serious, individual, with a precocious love for literature and a passionate love for her beautiful country home. It was a real grief to her that the world contained ugliness and was not entirely just and harmonious. And through childhood, girlhood, womanhood, we see her gradually growing towards that day when she should preach and labour for the happiness and the beauty of life as she understood it. Restless, questioning, inwardly chafing and striving, she was long in coming to the fullness of her life's work, but she was coming to it through careful thought and strong conviction, and, in reality, her way was straight and undeviating. When about the thirtieth year of her age, Ellen Key, owing to her father's loss of money, left the country for the town to earn her livelihood by teaching. With eagerness and individuality she strove to form the minds of her pupils, and gradually she spread out her powers beyond the schoolhouse, and began to give courses in history and literature. Gradually, again, the force within her expanded and she began to speak for various societies, leagues, and unions, her sympathies being ever with the cause of liberty, justice, and beauty of life, as she understands these things.

* "Ellen Key, Her Life and Her Work." By Louise Nystrom-Hamilton. Authorised Translation from the Swedish by A. E. B. Fries. With an Introduction by Havelock Ellis. 5s. net. (G. P. Putnam's Sons)

"Ellen Key's individualistic morale of happiness has given rise to both amazement and indignation." But these are her own words on individualism. "No individualist persuades himself that he lives for anybody's sake but his own, or for any other object than to develop and ennoble all the resources of his being. But the more fully he attains his self-realisation, the more strongly does he feel the complexity within, he is as sensitive to the weal and woe of others as he is to his own."

Ellen Key "believes in humanity's development according to natural law, through its own powers to achieve the earthly harmony which is its goal. Not only does she lay bare the faults, the present conception and its consequences, but she also knows that right through these progress must go. She analyses the many and varied reasons of happiness and unhappiness, she points out what it is that holds the marriage intact, and what sunders it." Storms of abuse have beaten about this woman's head, but to hundreds of people beyond her own country she stands as "a brave and noble priestess of high personal culture."

THE ART OF SHADOW.*

The world is fond of paradox, though it never believes in it. Yet it is the paradox more than the platitude it implies the significance of truth. For instance, there are few people who would believe offhand that from one æsthetic aspect the Victorian era was heterodox, subversive, even revolutionary in its effects. Yet, inasmuch as it crushed the free impulse of artistic reaction into a common mould of ugliness and garishness, it certainly made overtures towards its most embittered foe. The process was more positive with the plastic and ornamental arts and emphatic with the gentle art of silhouette. For in the thirties of last century, the chaste traditions and dignities of the eighteenth century profilists were not only undermined by all kinds of crude and charlatan innovations, but practically annihilated. An art almost as gracious as that of miniature was degraded into the abortions of "papyrotomy" and "scissorgraphy." And so violent a departure from loftier standards of achievement postulates a very definite convention in the heyday of the art. This had not so much to do with methods and material as is currently supposed. "Cut-paper," for instance, though it was largely enhanced by the great masters—the Augustans of silhouette—like Charles Miers, Rosenberg, Frith, Foster, Mrs. Beetham, Lea of Portsmouth, who painted much of their best work on chalk and convex glass, was a device before their day, and Edouart, the Puritan iconoclast of the Victorian horrors, painted backgrounds, bronzing, gold-tinting, lavish colouring, freakishness and the "profec-machine" of Sam Weller—cut both full-length and from paper. No, the canon was that a shadow is a shadow, and that decorative effects other than plain black are meretricious. That is all very well, but there are grades between the austerity of the shadow profile as such and the orgies of the pseudo-picturesque. I agree with Mr. Coke that a tempered variation from the ideal is even more felicitous than the ideal itself. So, apparently, did the masters themselves. Some of Miers', Charles's and Mrs. Beetham's most irresistible busts are relieved from the black by delicate patches of silvery grey, in a cravat, a frill, a hat, or a dressing of the hair. Mrs. Beetham's aptitude for meticulous detail adapts itself most appropriately to the fineness of colouring, and it serves to throw into more salient relief the lucidity of her outlines. Mr. Coke, in particular, points to a singularly delightful silhouette of the Misses Awdry, by Beaumont, dated as late as 1844, in which there is no trace of black at all. Even small threads of gilding may be indulged, without entirely losing sight of Pisgah. Unfortunately for taste, to ornament degenerated into a fashionable vice.

* "The Art of Silhouette." By Desmond Coke. 7s. 6d. net. (Secker.)

Mr. Coke devotes a chapter to that elusive purist, Edouart, and makes merry over his egoism and capacity for self-advertisement. But the profilists of the golden age were not a whit behind him. Mrs. Beetham, whose art certainly cannot be accused of the antics and expansiveness of the mountebank, could yet, early in her career, descend to these abysmal depths.

"Mrs. Beetham has enabled herself to remedy a difficulty, much lamented and universally experienced, by PARENTS, LOVERS AND FRIENDS, the former assisted by her ART may see their offspring in any part of the tempestuous Globe, nor can death obliterate the features from their fond remembrance. LOVERS, the rocks have advanced, can waft a sigh from Indus to the Pole," she will gratify them with more substantial, though ideal, intercourse by placing the beloved Object to their view."

And so on, in this immortal strain. It is indeed strange how opposite are the personal conventions of the arts of literature and silhouette. The latter at least has avoided the habit of an affected diffidence and modesty.

Mr. Coke's discursive annals make no pretension to an historical survey of his subject. They are rather a collector's scrap-book, embodying occasional and leisurely impressions. There is little padding, and the book is full of interesting side lights. But Mr. Coke would have been better advised not to stumble into the pitfalls of fine writing. Many of the reproductions are exquisite.

HAROLD MASSINGHAM.

Mr. Liston in his own character.

(Cut by Edouart).

the Art of Silhouette, by Desmond Coke (Secker)

A MASTER OF ART · LEONARDO DA VINCI.*

There is no figure in the history of art which has gathered round it more of mystery than that of Leonardo. Partly, no doubt, this is due to the process, begun by Vasari and continued by the German art critics, of ascribing to him whatever in the period they found beautiful and unnamed. The very fragmentariness of much of Leonardo's work, too, when found in conjunction with such power, has made for glamour. But his many-sided genius, his science, his gift for catching life in movement, his mirror-script notebooks only interpreted in the nineteenth century, all these to the student of art are subsidiary to the fact of the power of inspiration for future ages contained in his sketches and few completed works. As the centuries passed, so the true Leonardo became obscured in a nimbus of cloud woven of men's dreams, the man who made a new epoch in painting by his "Adoration of the Magi" was forgotten in the man who planned the tunnelling of mountains and the mastery of the air. It is the task of Dr. Jens Thius, in the book before us, to remove the rubbish of accumulation round this great figure and to lay bare its essentials of greatness as shown in the germinating period, Leonardo's youth in Florence.

More especially Dr. Jens Thius is concerned with three things. He has to disentangle Leonardo's work from that of his master, Verrocchio; he has to trace to its source the origin of that culminating achievement of the Florentine Period, the "Adoration of the Magi" the unfinished altar-piece in the Uffizi which revolutionised European art; lastly, he has to prove how that painting showed the way, not only to a new method in art, but also to a new interpretation of human life and its mystery. Incidentally, too, we get in one chapter an illuminating study of the stages in the development of Florentine landscape painting from the first topographical charts to the panoramic backgrounds of Piero della Francesca, of Verrocchio and of Leonardo himself. It is a brief abstract of the evolution of aerial perspective, that feature which for all the subtlety or conflict of Florentine work, gives to their pictures such a sense of peace and dignity. Here we get the human being set visibly in the background from which it springs, the land the people that gave it birth. The shining rivers, the carved escarpments of the hills explain the Leonardesque smile, the virgin dignity of Verrocchio's women as well as the deep-graven lines of his Colleon statue, woman and soldier are nourished by the light and rigour of the land we see in these backgrounds.

Of the forty-two works in the Uffizi usually ascribed to Leonardo, Dr. Jens Thius will allow only seven to be genuine, some of these false ascriptions being due to forgery or carelessness, but most to a common-sense prepossession by the idea that Verrocchio was painstaking but uninspired. By a minute study of the "Boy with Dolphin" of the "Doubting Thomas" in Donatello's marble niche, of the great equestrian statue of the Condottiere Colleon in Venice, Dr. Thius proves conclusively that not only did Verrocchio know how to "marry" sculpture to architecture, but also how to transform sculpture from a purely decorative work to an art capable of expressing the undulations of life itself. This it was that made him the true forerunner of Leonardo, who in turn showed Raphael and Michelangelo that the body is a medium by which the soul of man may express itself, who made of art a sensualism that is all soul. In the figures of the "Adoration," in the smile of the Mona Lisa, in whole sheets of drawings, we have the inner man leaping to life through the outer. This is Leonardo's secret, but it was Verrocchio who showed him the way to it. Dr. Thius's vindication of the old bronze-caster is a magnificent piece of analytical criticism.

The whole book culminates in the work of tracing the genesis of Leonardo's "Adoration of the Magi." In the Royal Library at Windsor is a sheet of studies of eleven profiles by Leonardo, with others on the back of it. These are extraordinary indications of his thought as well as of his art. For these profiles are all drawn from one type of face—old age, youth, maiden, woman, Roman emperor, bestial man, dragon and lion—all one type of face in different stages. It is a study of transmigration, it also contains in detail sketches of heads that were afterwards to be used in the great altar-piece of the "Adoration." Dr. Thius's analysis of that work, of its geometrical grouping, its architectural design of the wide vistas of conflict in the background, is a monument of subtlety and acumen. Practically every outstanding feature of the picture has been traced to the drawings that were its source. Also it is proved that two of the greatest works of Leonardo's later years, the fresco of the "Last Supper" and the destroyed picture of the "Battle of Anghiari," that conflict of man and beast which gives a whole vista of evolution sprang from the studies for the "Adoration." But this fine piece of criticism only subserves a greater task, an analysis of the reason why that picture is regarded as giving a new reading of the eternal mystery of the procession of human life across the planet through the simple well-worn device of the Madonna and Child and worshippers. All types of humanity are represented in the sixty figures of the picture, whole ages of the past are suggested by the background with its half ruined buildings, its warring groups, as in the foreground the philosopher and the way-faring man, the ascetic and the man of pleasure, gather round the Child and his Mother. All these spectators are men, the centre is the woman. The idyll and the pastoral have been used to show the human bending before the divine, here the idyll and the pastoral give way to drama and the mystery has become the merely human, a child, wise with promise, a woman, natural and modest. Behind her is the welter of past history, as in front are the nations, asking the eternal question of "Whence" and "Whither" of this strange panorama of life.

Dr. Thius has every gift required for his work—judgment, knowledge and discrimination combined with enthusiasm. To gaze at the beautiful reproductions and then to compare them with the letterpress is to be convinced of the truth of his conclusions. His appreciation of 'quality' is particularly refreshing in England, where art criticism is so constantly made a vehicle for moral platitudes. The whole of the editing, translating and reproducing is excellent, though it is a pity that so many misprints should have been left in the proof-reading.

M. P. WILLCOCKS.

FIVE BY SEVEN.

The seven authors of the four novels and the one book of travel that chance brings together on our table, are all writers of considerable accomplishment, and three, at least, of the books are works of some distinction, while one of them, and that by two new writers, is a really notable achievement. "Undergrowth"<sup>1</sup> besides being one of the most challenging first novels we have read for many a long day, is the only one of the books that is really contemporary, in any precise sense, informed as it is through and through with the young and ardently anti-materialistic spirit of the new Georgian era. In the nineteenth century, we all thought, in our exclusive complacency, that we had subdued the supernatural powers by disproving their existence. We refused to recognise them, at the same time taking infinite pains to explain to them, in elaborate and ingenious detail, that they were really not there at all, and that if they thought they did exist, they were only suffering from pitiful superstitious delusions. And how could superstition exist in the clear, cold light of that new Age of Reason, the Nineteenth Century? Strange to say, the supernatural powers do not seem to have minded very much. They hardly appear to have even realised they were being snubbed, or, if they did, they merely chuckled.

<sup>1</sup> "Undergrowth" By F. and E. Brett Young. 6s. (Secker)

* "Leonardo da Vinci. The Florentine Years of Leonardo and Verrocchio." By Dr. Jens Thius. With 277 Illustrations. Translated by Jessie Muir. 42s. net. (Herbert Jenkins)

Leonardo : The Condottiere (about 1478.)

(Silver-point drawing in the Malcolm Collection, British Museum.)

From "Leonardo da Vinci" (Jenkins)

and bided their time. And it would seem that their time has come again. On all hands, there are signs that man is becoming conscious that his vaunted reason is but a farthing dip after all, which can at most illuminate only a few inches of the universe at a time, and that there are more things in heaven and earth than can be accounted for by any system of purely intellectual philosophy. So that, as in art is to be found the highest expressions of man's consciousness at its intensest and most urgent, we already find this new spirit improving the work of the more distinguished of our younger artists. The elders will doubtless shrug their shoulders, and mutter the word, "Reactionary!" but the earth is for the young, and this time youth has allied itself with the oldest powers of the universe. The publication of "Undergrowth" is a significant symptom of the tendency of this new and vital movement. The tale is the story of the struggle of Forsyth, a Scots engineer, against the primeval forces. Being under contract to build a reservoir under the shadow of Pen Sarnadon, a Welsh mountain, he gradually discovers that he is not merely pitting himself against a material mountain of estimable stone, but against a spiritual mountain of incalculable forces. He fights with every weapon he can clutch—reason, common-sense, drink, and the Calvinistic theology of his childhood—to retain his sanity, his self-possession, but the mountain is too much for him. Everything goes wrong with the work, every conceivable and inconceivable "accident" overtakes him, and in the end the supernatural forces triumph, and the primeval "undergrowth" closes over him and all his puny works. The tale is admirably told. The style has a tautness and realistic precision which adequately expresses the intensity of the imaginative conception. In the expressive American phrase, it bites. The grip never fails throughout, and the character-drawing is admirable.

Anything that Mr. Hewlett writes must carry itself off with a certain distinction, but his new novel<sup>1</sup> must be accounted as one of his less notable achievements, if, indeed, it can be considered to be anything but a positive failure. Though he has prudently attempted to avoid the charge of having drawn a false portrait of a great man by calling his Byronic hero Bendish, and by making him live at a later period than Byron, we do not think that he can altogether plead "not guilty." The circumstantial evidence against him is too damning. Byron, undoubtedly, has been taken as the prototype of Bendish, but it is a Byron who never was on sea or land, a Byron who never existed except in that inconceivable menagerie of "celebrities," the journalistic brain. Byron has never been one of our heroes; but, at his shallowest and most satirical, he could never have been the sawdust puppet that Mr. Hewlett labels "Bendish." Byron was flesh and blood, at least. Mr. Hewlett's hero seems to be made up of hints picked up from the worst of Byron's verse, and, even taken as a study of the temperament of a weak and blustering charlatan, the portrait is quite unconvincing. The character is never presented from within, it is only described superficially. And Mr. Hewlett is scarcely more successful with his other characters. He seems almost pathetically eager to persuade us of the charm of his heroine, Rose, but to the end she remains a pretty doll, and Gustave Poor only bears as much relationship to the real Shelley as Bendish does to the real Byron. Mr. Hewlett's failure is singular, because one would have expected him to have some understanding of the nature of poets. Needless to say, there is much in the book that is entertaining. Mr. Hewlett always writes with a graphic and picturesque pen, though too many passages of the present narrative read rather too like Mr. Max Beerbohm's parodies of Meredith.

"The Yoke of Pity"<sup>2</sup>, which has been admirably translated from the French of M. Julian Benda by Mr. Gilbert Cannan, is, within its limits, a masterly and dexterous performance. It is a novel written according to a thesis, and the fact that the thesis seems to us to be utterly false, and its exposition consequently ineffectual, does not detract from our approbation of the fine workmanship of the book. M. Benda sets out to prove that it is impossible to live "the intellectual life," and maintain the ordinary decent human relationships at the same time, while, of course, the truth is that only he who lives in the completest and most familiar relationship with his fellows can attain any spiritual or intellectual life worth having. M. Benda never gives any precise definition of his conception of the intellectual life, but we gather that it is a sort of stererous existence, wherein a man may attain to immunity from the disease of human emotions and sympathies.

"The Desirable Alien at Home in Germany"<sup>3</sup>, though the work of two expert novelists, is a singularly amateurish performance. Mr. Hucfel, who himself supplies the preface and two of the chapters, thinks otherwise, and somewhat complacently assures us that his collaborator has written "a very good book about a country." Miss Violet Hunt has a quick eye, but we find that her observations are superficial in the extreme, as her comments on what she sees invariably are, and her writing is too desperately light-hearted, too strenuously airy, too pathetically facetious, to be anything but unutterably tedious. And we cannot really feel that we are worthy of sharing the domestic confidences which either collaborator, in turn, thinks fit to lavish on us. No doubt it is flattering, but it only makes us feel shy!

In "Youth Will be Served,"<sup>4</sup> Miss Dolf Wyllarde relates how Gillian Joyce, the girl-wife of the grizzled Colonel Joyce, is gradually taken captive by her own unwanted child, Clavis, who, in the end, saves her from the fascinations of her husband's kinsman, Lionel Sinister. It is a pretty, harmless tale of the development of the maternal instinct, told without any distinction of conception or expression.

WILFRID WILSON GIBSON.

MRS PIOZZI'S LETTERS *

It is an arguable point whether too much attention has not been bestowed by commentators and biographers on that frivolous, if rather captivating little lady, who is equally well known as Mrs. Thrale and Mrs. Piozzi. The lover of letters owes her a debt of gratitude because she and her first husband between them provided a haven of refuge for Dr. Johnson in which he could expand and meet with the softening influence of feminine society. A second and even greater service she did both to him and to posterity by recording in her "Anecdotes" her impressions of his character and table-talk, never in so small a space has a better portrait been furnished of Johnson, and this notwithstanding that the light-headed hostess failed sometimes to catch the drift of his conversation. Were it available for general study, it is likely enough that another work of hers still apparently kept under lock and key—the diary which Johnson urged her to start and she was advised by her brewer spouse to entitle "Thraliana," would put students of her times under fresh obligations, though, to judge from extracts issued in Abraham Hayward's volumes, and additional quotations to be found in a just-published booklet of Mr. Charles Hughes, its indiscretions are far in excess of matter that is genuinely informing. For the rest there are her letters since any other books of hers, even her account of her Italian travels, have passed into limbo, and Mrs. Piozzi, while a vivacious, was in no sense a brilliant letter-writer. Hers was an alert and sprightly intelligence, for a woman of her day she kept surprisingly in touch with what was going on in politics, literature, society, and even science; her disposition was mercurial and friendly, she had the desire and the capacity to please, and the charm of her personality found its way into her correspondence. But her circle was too limited, her talents were too irresponsible, her interest in life was too superficial, too much concentrated on trifles, for her letters to repay perusal to any readers save those who are curious about the manners and culture and social atmosphere of her age. Her correspondence with Dr. Johnson, published after his death, is noteworthy mainly on his account, other letters, addressed to men of parts or to literary women such as Fanny Burney, prove that she could hold her own with accomplished persons and carry no little learning easily. And the latest batch to see the light, some two hundred letters sent, save for an interval of fifteen years, quite regularly to her friend Mrs. Pennington, from 1788, not long after she had married a second time, till 1822, the date of her death, and now edited by Mr. Oswald G. Knapp, have the merit of being lively, confidential and unaffected, but are narrow in their

<sup>1</sup> "Youth Will be Served" By Dolf Wyllarde 6s. (Stanley Paul)

<sup>2</sup> of He Pi and Penelope Pennington, 1788-1821 Edited by Oswald G. Knapp 16s. net. (Lane)

<sup>3</sup> "Mrs. Piozzi's 'Thraliana'" By Charles Hughes. 2s. 6d. net. (Simpkin, Marshall)

<sup>1</sup> "Bendish" By Maurice Hewlett 6s. (Macmillan)

<sup>2</sup> "The Yoke of Pity" By Julian Benda 5s. net. (Unwin)

<sup>3</sup> "The Desirable Alien at Home in Germany" By Violet Hunt and Lord Madox Hueffer 6s. (Chatto & Windus)

range and far from profound in their observations. It is a right instinct which attributes more significance to Mrs Thrale than to Mrs. Piozzi, and regards her association with Johnson as her real passport to fame.

The editor of the new letters cannot be felicitated on the system of annotation he has adopted. He has been at enormous pains to elucidate references to all persons and events not likely to be familiar, but instead of placing his notes at the foot of his pages or at the end of his volume, he has incorporated them in the text along with his running comment. So that it is impossible for the reader to get away from them even if he would, and the fact of no distinction being made between Mrs. Piozzi's own talk and the explanatory material gives the work a look of stodginess with which, when all is said, its main contents do not deserve to be credited. If the letter-writer is curiously discursive, inconsequent and casual, she is never dull or apathetic. She, at any rate, pays her correspondent the compliment of being interested herself in the topics of her gossip. It is the fault of the topics, as a rule, and of her own confined circumstances, that her chatter proves monotonous. Mrs. Piozzi was getting on in years when she began this correspondence turned forty-eight—and she was soon living in an isolated corner of Wales. Her marriage with her Italian and Papist husband had cut her off from most of her literary friends, as well as from her daughters, and Johnson had been some while dead. Her correspondent, Penelope Sophia Weston, was a spinster lady who ruled over a little literary coterie at Ludlow, in Shropshire, and married the gouty master of ceremonies of the Clifton hall-room, so that Mrs. Pennington's situation did not permit her to feed her "dearest friend" with very first-rate material. Bulletins on their husbands' respective attacks of gout, rumours about women-writers and blue-stockings they had known but ceased to meet, such as Mme d'Arblay, Anne Seward, Hannah More, and Mrs. Montagu, confidences about the actress they both esteemed and the illnesses of the Siddons girls, a rivalry of admiration, when they were old, over the handsome young player, Conway, for whom both had a doting fondness—such, together with forebodings as to the issue of the war and laments about the high prices it caused, are the exchanges they made each other generally over a generation and more of time. It is startling to find that the one celebrity (if Miss Farren and Tom Moore and Rogers are excepted) with whom Mrs. Piozzi came into direct contact in these years, was Sarah Siddons. As for her comments on the French Revolution and the Napoleonic Wars, they were such as any clever woman might have made, and her forecasts were just as often wrong as right. She is for ever "mounting a turnip-cart to predict the end of the world" to quote her own words. She suffers, like her neighbours, from invasion panic. She grumbles over Nelson's "playing double or quits too often and tempting fortune too far." Her concern about the Terror gains half its intensity from the fact that a girl she knows, Helena Williams, has trusted herself to the tender mercies of the sans-culottes of Paris, and is reported to be living there under the protection of an English Jacobin. In general, like the rest of us, she is much more excited over the love-affair of an acquaintance than the tragedy of a nation. Will Harriett Lee marry the Marquis Ortoffi? Will Conway be accepted by Miss Stratton? are questions that mean more to her romantic heart than the fate of the French aristocracy or the progress of the generals of the Revolution.

Needless to add, Mrs. Piozzi's uncomfortable relations with her children occupy no small portion of her correspondence. She was the sort of mother, conscientious and yet flighty, whose society her children escape at the first chance of freedom. And they were the kind of children, sedate and self-assertive, who disapprove of sensibility and gaiety in a parent. What wonder that she fell in love again as a widow of forty, and they voted her undignified, and visited her romance with resentment. The elder girls had set up for themselves before her correspondence with Mrs. Pennington opens, but Cecilia was with her still, and it is not difficult to discover that the mother found the duties of chaperonage tiresome. Cecily ill stirred her compassion and tenderness, but Cecilia eager for balls and love and a girl's happiness, draws from her the complaint "One's arms do so ache with pulling at an unbroken filly that longs to hurt herself by skipping into mischief." And so the youngest went the way of the other Thrale girls—married and forgot her mother, drifted from her so far that she, in her turn, started a lawsuit, became reconciled, and again let love grow cold. Mrs. Piozzi complained, and the Thrale blood may have told, but she must share the blame, especially when we see the drama repeated in the case of her adopted son—a Piozzi—Sir John Salusbury. For ten years of this correspondence the name of Dr. Johnson never appears, so long did indignation last. After that the allusions to him are reasonably frequent and every now and then we get the echo of his thought and even style. Thus, "There is no real inference to be drawn from people's behaviour in their last moments to the character they would sustain in life, was their recovery permitted. No inference at all. The great Duke of Marlborough was known to show pusillanimity at the parting hour, and people are not weary of saying how Samuel Johnson was afraid of death." Characteristically, Mrs. Piozzi offended the recipient of these letters by some sort of ill-advised speech. Hence the gap of fifteen years.

Mr. Hughes' interesting book conveys his opinions on "Thraliana," all six volumes of which he seems to have been privileged to read recently. The extracts he quotes provide scandalous stories of the author's father, paint an ugly picture of Burke at home, offer less favourable estimates of Siddons as actress than the letters to Mrs. Pennington, and hint at a confidence of Johnson's which put him "in Mrs. Thrale's power," but which, to her credit, she never revealed. It is pleasing to discover that her recklessness of speech had its limits.

F. G. BULLIANY.

THE BOOKMAN'S BAEDERER.*

Certain books are invidiously distinguished by the epithet of "problem", but there is usually a problem in most books. About some the problem is to discover why they exist at all, about others, to discover why they did not exist before. Mr. Adcock's volume belongs to the latter class. It is so inevitable and desirable that every man of letters who sees it will wonder why he did not think of writing it himself. After which he will console himself by doing the next best thing to writing it, namely, reading it. To glance through its pages is to live over again some of the choicest scenes in fiction. Others have described the London of real people who lived and worked in it, Mr. Adcock takes us through the London of those much more real people who never lived at all. Think for a moment of the difference. Bob Cratchit going down the slide on Cornhill in honour of Christmas is a much more abiding person than anyone you may see there to-day. Clerks may come and clerks may go, but Bob slides on for ever. Is he not more really alive than they? We know almost everything about Hamlet, but we know almost nothing about Shakespeare. A thousand are familiar with the life of Micawber to every one that is familiar with the life of Dickens. Cast your mind back several centuries and try to recall something about the London of a distant period, and it is highly probable that you will find yourself thinking, not of the bloodless veracity of established antiquarian fact, but of "The Boar's Head" in lastcheap, with Falstaff guzzling exhaustively and lying superbly, Pistol swaggering out his vague and tremendous abstractions, Francis bleating "Anon, anon, Sir!" to the sack-thirsty customer, and Mrs. Quickly prattling interminably to some earlier Mrs. Gamp at the round table by a sea coal fire in the Dolphin chamber. When we try to think of someone whose knowledge of London was extensive and peculiar, we think instantly of Sam Weller, and not at all of the gifted gentleman who compiles the Directory or of the doctors and saints who make great argument whether London is named from "Hlyn-din" or from some aboriginal ground-landlord called Londinos.

* "The Booklover's London." By A. St. John Adcock. With twenty illustrations by Frederick Adcock. 6s. (Methuen.)

The meeting-place of Tom Pinch and his sister in "Martin Chuzzlewit."

From "The Bookman's London" (Methuen).

This London of literature then, this London trodden by the feet of those who step out of the pages of Dickens and Thackeray, Disraeli and Trollope, Besant and Gissing, Deane and Ben Jonson, is Mr. Adcock's theme, and so happily does he handle it that one knows not which to admire most, the enviable extent of his reading, the gossiping ease of his writing, or the inspiring gusto of his appreciation. It is difficult to see how it could be better done. The author is himself a born Londoner (like his present reviewer) and that counts for much, though it is remarkable that the man who has put all the soul of London (and much of its body) into books was born at Portsmouth. Mr. Swinburne, happily inspired, includes the River Thames among the characters of Dickens. We might go further and include London itself. Walk through and about the heart of London and you will find scarcely a street or a building without its Dickensian associations. That intense energy of characterisation, in which Dickens is not inferior even to Shakespeare himself, moved him as strongly in his descriptions of places as in his descriptions of people. Windsor Terrace is as vivid as Micawber.

The London of joy and pathos, of farce and terror, of glittering lights and foul darkness, is Dickens' London, just as the London of drab joyless lives, too meagre and neutral ever to be tragic, is George Gissing's London. Through all these streets of light and shade, Mr. Adcock conducts the reader most happily and with scarcely a single stumble—a most remarkable fact when we consider the enormous range and multitude of his literary and topographical allusions. We ask him, however, more in sorrow than in anger, why he makes Pip and Estella dine in Wood Street, when the meal was merely tea for the lady, a distinction of some importance, as the description of that exiguous refreshment is one of Dickens' happiest bits of comedy. Two features of the book strike us as especially excellent, namely, the zest of the writing and the choice of apposite quotations. The author is no hired and weary cicerone who drones out, "Thus is Blank Street, mentioned by Asterisks in 'What do you call it?'" He is a reader writing for readers, not afraid to salt and season his narrative with the appropriate passages from old plays and newer stories, not afraid, too, to let himself go in the matter of enthusiasm. That is excellent. There are already too many dull fellows writing books. Give us someone who can write with a communicable relish!

The book is charmingly illustrated by Mr. Frederick Adcock, whose drawings of places where famous scenes were enacted have a double quality, very rare in pictures of this kind, they combine vision and fact. In such a volume as this we want the drawings to look like the places they represent, and we want them also to have the slightly glamourised air of places in a book. Mr. Adcock has triumphed over this double difficulty, and his twenty pictures are both excellent in themselves and entirely in harmony with the subject.

Altogether, the book is one that goes straight to a reader's affection. It is full of the love of literature and the sense of places, and illumined, moreover, by a large and kindly humanity of which we should like to record our special appreciation. If you are a Londoner Mr. Adcock's book will give a new zest to your walks through the streets, and if you are not, it will be just one more temptation to a holiday in town.

GEORGE SAMPSON

EARLY WARS IN WESSEX.*

Out of the Heptarchy and its "battles of kites and crows," Wessex emerged as mistress of Britain. Wessex indeed, became England, and—so to say—wedding Normandy, she arrived at great estate. But what of her birth and breeding? Recollections set down three or four hundred years after the events were very misty. Critical readers of this part of the Saxon chronicle find much to doubt. A constructive mind, anxious to see the story whole and thinking that disbelief has been strained, tries to piece out legends with new evidence. In the attempt there may be considerable value, especially if the new evidence is trustworthy, and in this book we have more than a recast of the chronicles. The author is known to many as Hon. Secretary of the Earthworks Committee of the Congress of Archaeological Societies, and his knowledge of the hill-forts and defensive dykes in the southern counties is serviceable in reconstructing the strategy of the long warfare in which the Britons may have held them against the Saxons. He does not suggest that all these earthworks were first thrown up in post-Roman times, but that they were re-occupied and defended by the Welsh as the Saxons advanced, step by step, from Hampshire, which Mr. Major takes to be the original Wessex. Its boundaries in 519 A.D. he infers to be those of the present day, and supports the view from the archaeological map. At the same time it is admitted and deplored that little has been done in examination of these sites. We can hardly say that they have yielded all the evidence we may expect from them.

When the Saxons are at last brought into Somerset the plot thickens with fuller detail. The editor of this volume was for many years Vicar of Stockland near Combwich, and interested in local antiquities. Hence, no doubt, the somewhat elaborate discussion of the Saxon advance from the taking of Glastonbury in 670 to Ine's capture of the Parret valley in 710. This is worked out with the help of early charters, assumed to be trustworthy so far as regards places given to the Abbey after each successive victory. But the point is well made that this long struggle with the West-Welsh trained the Saxons to war, and ultimately enabled Alfred to overcome the Danes when the North and Midlands fell before them.

* "Early Wars of Wessex. Being Studies from England's School of Arms in the West." By Albany F. Major. Edited by the late Chas. W. Whistler, M.R.C.S. With Maps and Illustrations. (Cambridge, University Press.)

An episode in the saga is devoted to Watchet and Combwich and their Norse fisher-folk. Mr. Major premises that recent Scandinavian antiquaries have remarked possible connections of Britain with Norway and Sweden from the Bronze Age downwards, long before the registered arrival of the first Vikings. That the seas were sailed and one country known to another need not be doubted, it is fairly evident that the adventurers of 705 knew the lie of the land and the chances of "acquiring property" as they called their freebooting. But a Norse trading settlement in Somerset before 710 is not easily proved from place-names and folk-lore. Similar circumstances are observed in many parts of the country; place-names of Norse form are found sometimes, in the North of England, even as late as the twelfth century, in survivals of heathen myths the persistence of old beliefs after Christianisation must not be forgotten. But the point is a curious one, if the question raised here will lead to a closer examination of the supposed pre-Viking settlements of Norse it will not fail of a welcome.

The third "book" expands an argument familiar to readers of the Viking Club's publications. For many years Messrs. Major and Whistler have been accumulating evidence to support their view of Alfred's campaign in 878. Their point is that the fighting must have gone on near Athelney. That view was sketched by Bishop Clifford nearly forty years ago, but his conclusions were hurt by his treatment of place-names. In the form now given to it, be it with a little of chronicle-extracts and supported by a lucid account of the topography, it reads persuasively. We are taken with the Danes on their rapid ride from Cambridge to Wareham and shown their route. We view the fort where Hubba may have landed and fallen, here located at Cannington Park near Combwich, and the skeletons uncarried from trenches laid by, where the Danes may have buried them, and from the story as told it seems reasonable to believe that here, rather than at Appledore near Budeford, was the Arx Cynuit of March, 878. Then, as Guthrum was in daily fight with Alfred whose headquarters were at Borough Mump near Athelney, what more likely position could Guthrum hold than the ridge of the Poldens, just across the marshes? Edington is actually the name of the hill he must have occupied. Seven weeks after Easter, when the neap tides tempted the Danes to attack across the marshes, Alfred signals to his lieges in the east from a Quantock hill invisible at Edington, meets his men in Selwood, rushes on the enemy as they quit their strong position to cross the flats, and drives them westward along the ridge to the old earthwork at Downend. There they are trapped between the river and the Saxons, after a fortnight they capitulate and the Peace of Wedmore is assured.

The story is vividly told. The details hang together excellently. Some difficulties still remain in the place-names. If Arx Cynuit be Cannington Park, "Cunyz" (temp. Henry III.) for Combwich is the nearest equation for the name Aecglea or Iglea, where Alfred mustered his men before Ethandun, is a name common in Wessex, but absent, in this form, here. Mr. Major proposes Butleigh, in early charters Budeclege, at the east end of the Poldens. Edington, at first sight near enough to Ethandun, is in Domesday Eduuinetone, this, Mr. Major suggests, may have been a mistaken expansion of Ed'indon, for Glastonbury documents give the place as Edindone and Edintone. These doubts remain to shake the full acceptance of a theory which otherwise commends itself to the imagination. It does not carry the conviction of Dr. Nelson's identification of Brunanburh, though it contributes in an interesting way to the solution of this parallel difficulty. If any other sites than Combwich and Edington on the Poldens are now maintained for the battle-scenes of 878 it will be important to work out the topography with no less completeness.

W. G. COLLINGWOOD.

Novel Notes.

THE MASTERDILLO. A Story of Youth 6s. (Andrew Melrose.)

The too-sophisticated, the fatally grown up and growing old should not read this book, for it is not meant for them. Its anonymous author rightly describes it as "A Story of Youth." And its charm can only be felt by those who are still young, or by those who have not lost their own youth with the passing of years, or who, if they have, can remember it sympathetically, knowing they have lost something that was better than all the wisdom and wealth and dignity they have obtained in exchange. People of that happier sort will read "The Masterdillo" and be delighted by it. The young husband and young wife of the tale are just what most of us were before we grew too old to be so joyously and gloriously foolish, or what we shall be when we grow old enough to marry. You blush for them now and then and call them silly and in self-defence perhaps, tell somebody else who is reading the tale that they are absurdly sentimental, but secretly you are in love with both of them for that very reason, and know in your heart that you were as bad or as good yourself in those days when you first set up housekeeping and the world was so very a fairland that you did not grudge paying your taxes. The manner of telling the story is gaily and charmingly inconsequent, but it is exactly in harmony with the laughing spirit of youth in which it is all written and in which it must all be read. It is quaintly, daintily humorous; it is full of tenderness and of the pathos of those little things that are the greatest things in life to the young man and woman who are utterly in love with each other. To repeat the story in any bold outline would be cynically profane, the story is nothing, the freshness and naive simplicity with which it is told are everything, and you can only make acquaintance with these and realise the book's curious charm by reading it for yourself, wherefore there is no more to be said but go and read it.

HORACE BLAKE. By Mrs. Wilfred Ward 6s. (Hutchinson.)

Mrs. Wilfred Ward's style has a distinct charm, and her novels have a high seriousness. Horace Blake seems to us so far her best book. The characters develop in a way which is true to life. She has knowledge and understanding, her main incident recalls what actually happened to a well-known literary man, but all will feel that she has not merely copied, but has made an artistic use of her material. Mrs. Ward makes her readers feel the fascination that Horace Blake exerts over every one. Her theme is the salvation of the hero which is wrought by his own clearness of vision and the faithful loving devotion of his wife. His wife is first conquered by admiration for his genius. She helps him loyally and with her help he has won success. She knows him and forgives his great wickedness; her admiration and compassion have turned into true love. She wants his true life to be written, but realising that the world will neither understand nor believe, and knowing how through all he has never feared the truth, she reluctantly gives this up. The story of Trix and Stephen is on a less high note, but is very human.

PERRIS OF THE CHERRY TREES. By J S Fletcher 6s (Eveleigh Nash)

Mr Fletcher may always be relied upon for a good story, and in "Perris of the Cherry Trees" the author will delight old friends and make new ones. Abel Perris was a farmer in a very small way with a very stunted vision of the possibilities of his farm, the Cherry Trees. He had married a girl who was his superior in every way. When the story opens we find Perris behind-hand with the rent, due to his drunkenness and indolence, and a prospect before him of being turned out by the Steward. The gentleman-farmer of Martinthorpe (Mark Taffendale) had land abutting on the Cherry Trees, and within his domain were some profitable lime-kilns, the scene of the most dramatic episodes in the book. To him Rhoda goes by night and borrows money on the understanding that she is to manage the farm herself. Now Mark Taffendale was a bachelor, and of course it was inevitable that he and Rhoda should find themselves attracted to each other. Rhoda has as much money as she wants, and on the day when the Steward comes round he is surprised to find the farm in good condition, and the rent ready for him. Abel Perris's only workman was Pippany Webster, who is dismissed by Rhoda for stealing. He resolves on revenge, and finds a means at hand by a chance discovery of the clandestine meetings of Rhoda and Taffendale. It would spoil the reader's pleasure to disclose more, but we are sure that he will not put the book down until he has reached the conclusion, where Abel Perris is revealed in a surprisingly noble light.

JOAN THURSDAY. By Louis Joseph Vance 6s (Grant Richards)

Mr Vance's reputation has been made by a number of bright and exciting stories of adventure, very modern and American in spirit, partly melodramatic, partly humorous, partly sentimental. In this manner he is comfortably at home, confidently master of his material. "Joan Thursday," however, is a surprise. It is a careful and painstaking study of theatrical life in America, written with a minute and slightly depressing realism. In fact, not at all the sort of book we expected. However, the reader's disappointment may be tempered by the assurance that Mr Vance has achieved something that is nearly a triumph. His book might have been better for a trifle less insistence upon detail, it would have been more likeable had its heroine been less ambitious and mercenary, but for all that it is a very fine piece of work. Practically plotless, what story there is centres around Joan Thursday, a beautiful girl who takes to the stage as a more attractive manner of earning her living than serving in a shop, and her success—at a price—after rather more than a year of varied experience brings the book to an end. We congratulate Mr Vance heartily upon this very successful example of his versatility.

SUBSOIL. By Charles Marriott 6s (Hurst & Blackett)

"Anyhow, after any big event," says Saffery, the novelist, in Mr Charles Marriott's new novel "you are apt to get an upheaval of a different layer of national character—subsoil, in fact. Some quiet things get thrown up, but it's native stuff, and we've got to make the best of it, not only in art." This is the idea that Mr Marriott plays with very plausibly and very effectively. He thinks the Boer War was responsible for a great upheaval, and that its effect upon our national life and, directly or indirectly, on our national art, ideals and general outlook has been broad and deep. Modern movements in art, politics and social economy are discussed by his men and women shrewdly, brilliantly, suggestively, their conversations are, as they should be, vastly cleverer than the studio and dining room talk that most of us have an opportunity of listening to, but the power and interest of his story lies in the subtlety and vivid truthfulness with which he limns his characters. Saffery is a masterly study. Neither Sylvia Bradley, to whom Sutherland is engaged, nor the widowed Loveday Rosewall, whom he loves in vain, are ordinary women, but they are natural, baffling, charming women notwithstanding. You suspect a touch of cynicism when Sylvia breaks off her engagement with Sutherland because she feels that he keeps her outside the best interests of his life, and they are not suited to each other, and then shortly after becomes engaged to the handsome, conceited, rather shallow young novelist, Reginald Vaughan, and when about the same time Loveday Rosewall rejects Sutherland because, though she loves him, she also has given her heart to the somewhat egregious young Reginald. She confesses that she loves Sutherland, but thinks he is one of the men that "no woman ought to have." You are too big a proposition. We must either lose ourselves in you or keep you at a distance. Perhaps it is a wise and good instinct that makes us spare you and give our nonsense to somebody else. It is very well for her to tell him, with gentle scorn, "Little you know us!" Loveday does not represent the average woman, and perhaps the reader even more than Sutherland will be at a loss to understand her. But she has a large share in making "Subsoil" a story of cunning and compelling interest. It is admirably written, the story it tells grows easily and naturally out of the characters of the persons concerned in it, but if it told no story at all it would still hold you by its searching insight into the hearts and minds of modern humanity and its piquant, provoking discourse of men, women and things in the complex world of to-day.

OTHERWISE PHYLLIS. By Meredith Nicholson 6s (Constable)

Mr Nicholson's success in this novel is dual: he has created one of the most engaging heroines of recent fiction, and through the medium of a highly interesting story has interpreted with praiseworthy lucidity that sensitive spirit of citizenship which is peculiar to the inhabitants of American mushroom-growth towns. Phyllis Kirkwood is a harum-scarum young lady of the defiantly unconventional type, but possessed of such high qualities of heart and mind that, while she is the despair of her three most proper aunts, she is the darling of the township. Being the daughter of Tom Kirkwood, whose wife, Lois Montgomery, ran off with Jack Holton when Phyllis was a child, the young lady is the central figure for sympathy in a scandal involving the two leading families of Montgomery, in Indiana, a fact which disturbs her not at all. At a crucial period of the town's history when the community is threatened with disgrace through the unsoundness of the Holtons' affairs, Phyllis's mother returns and takes up her abode with her brother, Amzi Montgomery, causing a flutter of interest in the town, and winning the love of her daughter. Amzi is a rival banker to the Holton firm but when the integrity of the town is in jeopardy, he large-heartedly sinks his personal affairs, and, with the assistance of Tom Kirkwood, succeeds in straightening out the scandal, and saves the situation. In this, Phyllis is a very active agent and, in the end, cements the restoration of the Holtons' reputation by becoming engaged to a nephew of her mother's second husband. Mr Nicholson has written a powerful book, full of humour, compactly constructed, and reflecting, through a gallery of perfect types, the authentic spirit of the American people.

THE LOVERS OF MADEMOISELLE. By Clive Holland. 6s (Hurst & Blackett)

The French Revolution may not have been an unmixed blessing for France, but it has certainly been a fine thing for novelists the world over. It has equipped them with a theme of unparalleled interest, a fund of romantic episodes, a background of breathless suspense and bewildering horror. All these factors are to be found in Mr Clive Holland's new novel, which gives a very vivid reproduction of the aristocrats and the canaille of those stirring times. The story opens in Normandy in the year 1792, with a spirited account of the mob's attack on the chateau of the Vicomte de St Hilaire, who, with his wife, son, and daughter, Cécile, is taken prisoner and sent (after a brave but futile attempt to escape) to Paris, there to be tried by the dread Revolutionary Tribunal Cécile's lover, the gallant Basile, Comte Dubois, is also captured, and one of the big scenes in the story occurs when the prisoners are offered their liberty on condition that Cécile is promised in marriage to the son of one of the revolutionaries—an ex-steward whose sister has been cruelly wronged by the Vicomte in a closed chapter of the past. Dramatic, too, though hardly original, is the ruse by which Basile is enabled to escape from the sinister Conciergerie. The terrors of that melancholy building are made very real in these pages, and one gets a lasting picture of Marcel Telhier, the head-jailer, with his numberless little subtleties of cruelty, he "took a devilish delight in his daily task of reading aloud the list of the condemned, and with a love of theatrical effect posed himself in the light at the foot of the steps leading up to the great door of the chamber, with one of the National Guards with fixed bayonet on either side of him." "The Lovers of Mademoiselle" is just the book for those who cannot resist the spell of Madame la Guillotine.

THE TRUTH ABOUT CAMILLA. By Gertrude Hall 6s.
(Heinemann)

Without doubt Miss Hall has revealed considerable ingenuity in the conception of her heroine. Camilla's character is one which it would be difficult indeed to summarise in a paragraph. Obviously her governing instinct was to create herself, to make something of life, throwing the limelight on one figure, which all the world should recognise as supreme in charm and distinction. She had her dreams, this child of the people, this intrepid adventuress, to whom the slightest of opportunities offered such infinite scope. She had absolutely no respect for truth, a very limited sense of honour, and phenomenal concentration in the pursuit of her own interests. Yet somehow she was actually charming, except to those who would venture to cross her ambitions. Moreover, she was extraordinarily competent in a thousand ways, punctiliously conscientious about everything she undertook, and capable of marvellous self-restraint. It is difficult to say whether or no circumstances were really kind to Camilla. She had certainly many exceptional strokes of good fortune, but one and all were attended with serious limitations. The way was never quite smooth for her, entirely straightforward. Obviously Miss Hall has set herself deliberately to expose the Latin temperament, through one supreme example. Camilla is always, or nearly always, governed by a most startling degree of common sense. And yet, as we have said, she dreamed dreams. She could, at least temporarily, risk all for the satisfaction of her fiery emotions. We are inclined to believe that her one experiment in passion was sincere, and we recognise that it was foredoomed to failure. There was a good deal of Becky Sharpe in Camilla. Her denouement was more picturesque, as fitted the skies of Italy, but it had all the essential elements of greyness and subdued satire. "The Truth about Camilla" is a remarkable, and an artistic, production. Its permeating and profound cynicism just escapes unreheved bitterness, since Camilla is quite human. The characterisation of her lovers, her benefactors, her enemies, her allies, and her family is managed with a firm hand, all are interesting in themselves, all skilfully fitted into their place in her development.

THE MISCHIEF MAKER. By E Phillips Oppenheim 6s.
(Hodder & Stoughton)

To get the full flavour of this capital story we recommend a visit to a Soho restaurant fairly far on in the evening, and a chapter of "The Mischief Maker" in between each course. We say a Soho restaurant, because on a certain evening Sir Julien Portel, former Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and his journalist friend Kendrick, were to be found dining there. And what brought so high an official as Sir Julien to so low a quarter? A grave scandal, which drove him out of public life, and to a resolve to travel the

Mr. Clive Holland.
Other of his novels have just been in his Misses Fynwood world over. But a little message from a mysterious woman at the Soho restaurant caused him to travel no further than Paris. The message contained instructions to call on a certain Madame Christophor, who turns out to be —, but let the reader discover her identity for himself. Another character, whom we soon detect as disguised, is Herr Freudenberg, of Leipzig, maker of toys. Herr Freudenberg is Prince Falkenberg, of Germany, the inveterate foe of England and the uncompromising opponent of the Anglo-French entente. The remainder of the book is a breathless account of the contest between the two statesmen, resulting in the ultimate downfall of Falkenberg, engineered by a magnificent journalistic "coup" which was suggested by Kendrick, the journalist, and performed by Sir Julien. Then follows Sir Julien's return to power and the establishment of friendly relations between England and Germany. The spice of international politics, combined with a strong love interest, make "The Mischief Maker" a most delightfully exciting book, and one which we defy the most lethargic to fall asleep over.

THE MERRY MARAUDERS. By Arthur J Rees. 6s.
(Heinemann)

This amusing and unconventional book describes, in the form of letters, the adventures of the Merry Marauders Dramatic Company during their tour in New Zealand. The writer obtained the post of advance agent, after selling his watch and chain in order to provide the necessary guarantee of his commercial probity. Needless to say, the company was brimful of talent, from Miss Audrey Bendalind, the leading lady, to Mr Barney King, the stage manager, who had "packed a bewilderingly diversified stage career into his thirty-five years, having played in his time the widest range of parts—from leading man to the hind-quarters of a stage bullock." Such versatility, indeed, was constantly needed, for while the stock pieces of the company were such straightforward things as "Demon Drink, the Destroyer," and "The Unkissed Bride," constant adaptation had to be made to meet local prejudices and requirements. On some occasions, too, the stage-manager could only secure his full cast by bailing his men out, through an arrangement with the local police. We cannot pay this book a higher compliment than by saying that it is true to the tradition of the first and greatest of its kind, the Roman Comique. Mr Rees writes with insight and humour, and his cheerful tale of vagabondage will prove a pleasant departure from the more usual grooves of the season's fiction.

WATERSPRINGS. By Arthur Christopher Benson 6s (Smith, Elder)

This is an intimate book. Mr Benson is always intimate. In certain moods one is apt to be angry with him. Here, as elsewhere, he gives one the feeling that one is guilty of eavesdropping. But, like the Don of this story, which is at once something less and something more than a novel, he contrives to carry out his programme and to carry the reader with him. Though the background is Cambridge, the opening pages of his new book are eloquent of the unfamiliar medium in which the author is working. They contain phrases and sentences such as are common in the work of the 'practic hand'. But by and by we get into touch with real life. Jack Sandys the frank undergraduate, his father the talkative Vicar, Mr Redmayne the caustic Vice-Master of Beaufort, Mr Gretton the Dean, Aunt Graves, her companion Miss Merry—these are real people. Howard Kennedy, Fellow and Classical Lecturer at Beaufort, and Maud his young wife monopolise attention, but their views rather than their personalities arrest one. The passages about the dream-child recall "Ella". But the real charm of the book lies in its reflections on the problems of existence, religion and science, reason and instinct. For example, "Instinct is the only guide for women, if they begin to reason, they get run away with by reason, that is what makes fanatics." Jack's description of the tutor's life—"Just learning things till you are twenty-three, and then teaching them till you are sixty-three." The same young man's choice of books—"The books I like are those in which people say what they might say, not those in which they say what they have had days to invent." Or this remark of the author's—"The old untroubled necessary work of the world flows on in these fields and villages, peopled with lives hardly conscious of themselves, with no aims or theories, just toiling, multiplying, dying, existing, it would seem, merely to feed and clothe the more active part of the world." There is the suggestion of this thought at the back of the mind of many a teacher—of the futility of it all, the lack of real confidence in the things taught. One cannot but sympathise with the view that "there are such a lot of fine and obvious things in the world, perfectly distinct, absolutely necessary, and yet the moment they become professional, they deprive one of all spirit and hope." Mr Benson's quiet humour is often compelling, as in this observation of Howard Kennedy's—"I have to talk over their careers with a good many young men, and it generally ends in their saying they would like a secretaryship which would give them interesting work and long holidays and the command of much of their time, and lead on to something better, with a prospect of early retirement on a pension." As might have been expected there are delightful bits of scenic painting, impressions of "the charmed dusk and the fragrance of hidden flowers." And there is mysticism too—of a kind that belongs to something far removed from those "vague and even muddled emotions of which scientific psychology would probably dispose."

THE DREAM SHIP. By Cynthia Stockley 6s (Constable)

It is hard to see just why the hero of this book should be all he was merely in virtue of being Irish. A great surgeon, difficult, idealising, incapable of understanding other people's lives and needs, hard to live with, and sentimental—why should it all be harped upon as the outcome of his Irishry? The real portrait of the novel is his wife, Val Valdanha, a charming young woman, a man's woman, a journalist whose free lance articles from every corner of the globe had won world-wide fame for her pen-name, Wanderfoot. Married first to a wastrel, meeting Garrett Westenra on a cross-Atlantic steamer just after Valdanha was supposed to have died heroically in South Africa, she and Westenra come together like meeting flames, marry, and begin their troubles. Incapable of domesticity, she finds it impossible to run Westenra's private hospital, and when Valdanha turns up she runs away from Westenra, taking her boy and an adopted daughter. Misunderstanding with Westenra makes life barren and hard, but in the long run Valdanha dies, and Westenra comes to a proper sense of Val, and life begins over again in deep love. The skill and completeness with which Val is drawn and made alive for us, and the comprehension of a complex, rich, sympathetic character, are most admirable. Val is real and modern, and it is difficult not to imagine that she has a prototype, though a prototype the details of whose life are not to be identified with the incidents of the novel. The subsidiary characters fall into their proper places, and preserve their proper proportions, without sacrificing one jot of their reality. Altogether "The Dream Ship" is a notable piece of character study and of story making.

CRUMP FOLK GOING HOME. By Constance Holme 6s (Mills & Boon)

There is the fragrance of the brown earth, the music of the wind, the freedom and freshness of the hills in Miss Constance Holme's new novel, "Crump Folk Going Home." With the background of Crump, a stately, ancestral hall, in the possession of the Tyndesays, Miss Holme weaves an interesting story around a group of wealthy, propertied people, centring it on a girl's wounded pride. Betrothed to the Master of Crump not for love of him, nor for the sake of position, but for sheer passionate attachment to the land that she feels is hers, yet has no actual claim to, Deborah, the reserved self-controlled heroine, is saved from the tragedy of marrying the wrong man by his sudden death. But the subsequent discovery that he is already married to another woman flings her into an abyss of humiliation, making her the target for scornful glances and spiteful snatches of scandal. She braves this mortification, and growing to love with a true, self-sacrificing love, the new Master of Crump, she is able to renounce him and to shut out all hope of owning the land that is so dear to her. But after all they both care too much to let the story end on this unhappy note, and in her fluent pleasing style, with touches of humour that make the book all through delightfully attractive, Miss Constance Holme drops the final curtain on her happy Crump Folk, wending their way home at last across the evening-shadowed land.

THE GARDEN WITHOUT WALLS By Coningsby Da 6s (Heinemann)

There is so much that is fine and human and beautiful in this story that one marvels at its striking want of balance. Sex-obsession cramps, distorts, overbalances and devastates the novel. The life story which is here developed, and which in its early stages readily kindles the reader's sympathy and enthusiasm, is swamped and surfeited with a tempestuous passion which rages unhealthily like a destroying blast through the greater part of the story. The trouble with Dante Cardover's father was that he was "an emotionalist ashamed of his emotions," which he carefully suppressed, Dante's trouble would appear to be that he was an emotionalist impelled by a restless and inflamed imagination. The plot of the story may be summed up as the tragedy of a young man who, after repeatedly playing with the fire, attempts to drug a hopeless passion for a married woman by succumbing to the physical fascination of another woman. And like most tragedies of this nature, the young man, Dante Cardover, is not the only victim involved. Many alluring and delightful characters figure in the novel—one remembers with special pleasure Dante's youthful-hearted uncle, Obadiah Spreckles, who is appropriately nicknamed "The Spuffler"—"A spuffler is a gay pretender, who hides his lack of success beneath the importance of his manners. . . . The prime requisite (for a spuffler), is that he should affect the prosperity of a bank-president, and be dependent on some quite obscure source for his pocket-money." As might be expected from the clever author of "The Road to Avalon," his new novel is studded with brilliant descriptive gems, and it is good to note that from beginning to end the story is rich with the promise of bigger achievements ahead.

A MASTER OF LIFE. By Philip Gibbs 6s (Cassell)

Titus Harsnett, the leading character of Mr Philip Gibbs' new novel, is a kind of Hamlet of the modern industrial world, burdened not with the purple or with revenge, but with introspection, hesitation, a conscience that speaks of duty to those who have helped to make the huge fortune of two-and-a-half millions left to him by his father, the artistic-temperament, and a mother who drops her "h's" and can no more drop her servant-like devotion to her late husband's memory than she can enter into the humanitarian ideas of her only son. One feels that but for the constant coaching from his old tutor Gerard Langbaine, and his cousin's wife, Mrs Jack Lavington, Titus would have made a hopeless mess of his life and his inheritance. As it is Titus and Mrs Lavington betray a woeful ignorance of the ways of a censorious world, and pay very bitterly for their blindness. Mr Gibbs is one of the most interesting of our younger novelists, and in his latest book he displays a marked increase of power, power of maintaining the reader's attention, power of depicting character, of displaying the warp and woof of modern political and social life. There are constant flashes of epigram, particularly in the pages devoted to the philanthropic Duchess, and the style is sustained throughout at a high level. It was, perhaps, a pity to make Will Jennings accept the bribe. But if there is cold cynicism here, there is cynicism enough in the portrait of the "living image of Nell Gwynne," who "would rob a graveyard or bleed a millionaire to death, or flirt in a disgraceful way with Satan himself," for "the sake of her precious societies." The dénouement is cleverly disguised, and as much as anything else sets a mark of distinction on a book which will make every reader eager for its successor.

THE HEART OF A HERO By Morice Gerard 6s (Hodder & Stoughton)

Mr Morice Gerard has written this novel round the simple love story of a great soldier—General Wolfe. At the outset he gives an animated picture of the gay city of Bath with its elegant ball-rooms, its crowded pump-rooms and fashionable coffee-houses, and introduces an interesting character in the exquisite person of Beau Nash, a venerable figure at the time the story opens. Wolfe's love story begins in the year 1757 with a momentary glimpse of the beautiful Katherine Lowther, the toast and belle of Bath, and thanks to the assistance of his devoted friend and admirer, Lord Dion Blair, Wolfe manages to win Katherine's heart before setting forth on the great venture which culminated on the Heights of Abraham. It is, however, the love story of Lord Dion which gives to the novel its peculiar poignancy; for Lord Dion was himself in love with Katherine, but, because of his affection for Wolfe and his own unhappy physical deformity, he elected to stand aside and facilitate Wolfe's courtship. The character of Lord Dion—a noble figure in spite of his humped shoulder and his slightly crossed eyes—is sketched with sympathy and understanding. "Perhaps his friendship for James Wolfe grew out of, or at any rate was stimulated by, a longing to play a similar part in the world. He felt in a curious way that his soul and that of the fiery, intrepid young officer were fused together, linked by the same spirit—that Wolfe was engaged in doing what his own courage would have effected, had his body been fitted for martial service." What the courage of the one man and the great heart of the other effected is set down in these pages with a dignity and restraint worthy of the theme.

MARTHE. By Reginald Nye 6s (Sampson Low)

The one doubt you have about "Marthe" is whether Marthe, loving the large, good-natured Bovril, would give herself body and soul to John Blaine on purely artistic grounds, and in order that his career as a singer might be furthered and his wonderful voice not lost to the world. But Marthe was an altogether exceptional girl. She is not to be judged by ordinary standards. She is charming when, at the outset, a mere pretty slip of a girl, she passes along the road in France, and John and his stolid friend, who answers to the absurd nickname of Bovril, see her and hear her singing as she goes, and she is charming at the close but pathetically charming, after she has sacrificed herself wholly to Blaine's welfare and, when she is dying, he can leave her almost without a pang for another love and a new artistic triumph. Blaine is a vacillating, eager likeable creature, afflicted with an artistic temperament. He can paint cleverly, he writes neat verses, composes music, swims excellently, and is a good horseman, he can do many things well, but his supreme gift is song, he has a marvellous voice, and it is Marthe who discovers this and urges him to his right work, and willingly offers herself up on the altar of his ambition. The characters are all drawn very skilfully, Blaine with his foolish, insatiable love of play, his instability in whatever he undertakes, his keen sensitiveness to his own sufferings, and his sheer inability to feel much for the sufferings of others, "Bovril," the genial, easy-natured, loyal friend, who tells his story here and, to say nothing of the gay, beautiful, gracious, tantalising Helen Hendred, and many minor characters, Marthe herself—in all her sweetness, sagacity, recklessness, a very fascinating and finely sympathetic creation. For its freshness its skill in characterisation, its vivid pictures of life in France, and the poignancy and interest of its story "Marthe" is emphatically a book to read. We believe it is a first novel, and as such it is an achievement that is full of high promise.

Mr. R. R. Nye.

The Bookman's Table.

THE VALLEY OF SHADOWS. By Francis Grierson 6s. (John Lane)

This new edition of Mr Francis Grierson's memoirs of his early career is beautifully illustrated by Miss Evelyn Paul. The book is a study of American life in the days of the Civil War, and especially of the farming communities just before the outbreak of the great conflict. The moonlight of history has already fallen over the scene, dimming the trivial details and throwing out in a sort of looming majesty the figures of the famous heroes of the battlefields. Mr Grierson paints it all with quiet, wistful touches of romance, and Miss Evelyn Paul works in the same manner. Her thirteen pictures are in colours, and each of them has a charming air of romance about it. Some of them, indeed, have a jewel-like splendour—such as the study of a Red Indian Medicine Man, sitting in his wigwam in some strange ritual of magic. Excellent also are the pictures of battle, but to our mind the scenes of farm life are the most charming. They are painted in the pastoral manner, and remind one of the grace and beauty that our artists import into their pictures of eighteenth-century England. In both cases the facts are seen in a mist of sentiment.

but the sentiment is in itself a natural fact, just like the blue veil of air that lends an enchantment to a distant landscape. Romance is largely a matter of distance, and if Mr. Grierson now sees the scenes of his youth in the light that never was on land or sea, well, that is exactly the charm that the years bring us in compensation for all that they steal as they pass.

THE YEAR'S MIND. By the Author of "Leaves from a Life." 10s. 6d. net (Leveleigh Nash.)

This volume is very like previous works by its author, indeed, at stages there is more than a suggestion of repetition. It belongs to no definite branch of literature, being a mixture of gossip about flowers and folk, of placid old-fashioned fiction, with dashes of melodrama, and of comments on existence, naive or candid, rather than deep. One feels that the writer would be very genial and interesting in a garden, or by a quiet fireside, the commentary and conversation would have an agreeable flavour, and would leave a pleasant memory. But set on paper, and turned into a book of nearly 350 pages, the offering is another matter altogether, and its continued appreciation demands patience as well as simplicity of nature. However, there must be a goodly number of simple and conventional souls to whom it will appeal. It might well be a quiet classic for various orders of housekeepers, or mean animation for gentle ladies with a passion for flower-pots. While it is entirely innocent of glow or inspiration, its homely, human nature, despite the slowness and occasional tedium of detail, is acceptable.

COMMERCIAL GARDENING. Edited by John Weathers. 4 Vols. Fully Illustrated. 36s. net (Gresham Publishing Company.)

To the craftsman with the spade or the plough the commercial side of gardening is as offensive as the commercial side of painting a picture, writing a poem, or carving a statue is to the craftsman of the brush, the pen, or the chisel. It is an aspect that has not been frankly or fully dealt with by most textbooks on gardening. We therefore welcome these four attractive volumes which have been issued by the Gresham Publishing Company with the efficiency with which they treated agriculture in their Standard Cyclopedia of twelve volumes. The writers on the various aspects of commercial gardening are, we are glad to note, men who have been engaged for the most part in earning their living as growers of fruit, vegetables, flowers, or as nurserymen. We have at any rate been spared another volume from the pen of that "popular writer on gardening," Mr. So-and-so of Fleet Street. It is interesting to find in one considerable writer in this series, Mr. Lobjort, in what a pleasant style a professional market gardener can express himself. Here and there one notices a little looseness in the editorial control, such as when writers give us the average profits arising from different crops which are somewhat at variance with the introductory chapters. The space devoted to packing and marketing might surely have been greater, and we think that in specialised work like this the essays on the science of plant-growing, excellent as they are, might have been reduced to find room for this and other aspects of growing for the markets. But we will not grumble, for on the whole the compilation fulfils a unique place in our gardening literature. The illustrations are beautifully reproduced. We could wish, however, that the design on the cover had been as artistic as that on the companion volumes which dealt with agriculture.

AN EXILED KING. By Sophie Elkan. Edited and translated by M. Lucien Koch. Illustrated. 2 vols. 24s. net (Hutchinson.)

The first thing needful for a good biography is not that the subject of it should be a great man, one who has done wonderful things in the history of the world, but that he should be a man if not of some greatness at least of some strength or peculiarity of character. Gustaf Adolf IV of

Sweden fully answers to this latter requirement. He was neither a great leader of men nor a great statesman, but he was almost equally eccentric and strong-willed, and a certain dark streak of melancholy and a touch of religious mania would seem to suggest that a taint of madness was in his blood. Moreover, he was unfortunate and ended in failure, and misfortune and failure are generally more romantic and nearly always more interesting than success. His hatred of Napoleon amounted almost to a mania. He joined the league that was formed to subdue that scourge of Europe and restore the Bourbons to the throne of France. After Napoleon had harried and defeated him, he fell out with his Allies, and made himself in divers ways such an impossible ruler that his own subjects deposed him and banished him, and he died in Switzerland after some twenty-eight years of life in exile. Like most crownless Kings, he fretted miserably in his banishment and cherished a conviction that his people would yet recall him and restore him to his throne, but though neither this hope nor the hope that they would choose his son to succeed him were to be realised, he at least had the satisfaction of seeing his most hated enemy, Napoleon, a broken exile like himself, and of outliving him. He makes a strangely pathetic, rather a pitiful figure, but one's sympathy goes out more readily to the wistful, long-suffering woman who was his Queen. Mrs. Sophie Elkan has gathered all his story up into her two stout volumes, and told it with such narrative skill and such insight into character that the poor King emerges a vividly human being and, with all his loves and hates, his friends and his enemies, becomes the central person in a live and intensely interesting romance. It is distinctly a book to be read for pleasure, but it is none the less sound and reliable history. M. Koch has translated it admirably, and the numerous illustrations add much to its attractiveness.

Notes on New Books.

MR W. I. SPALDING

[22, Lightcliffe Road, Palmer's Green, London, N.]

Mr. William I. Spalding is his own publisher, and in Foreign Banking Appointments (1s. net), he has written a little book that is not for all readers, but should be of the greatest usefulness to the particular section of business readers to which it is addressed. Mr. Spalding is a certificated associate of the Institute of Bankers, and has made a special study of the requirements of foreign and Colonial banks, and furnishes a lucid and thoroughly well-informed epitome of the conditions governing entry into the principal banks in the Colonies and abroad with some account of the prospects offered to the enterprising young man who is disposed to adventure upon a career in one of them. He not only sets out the remuneration that is paid to different classes of clerks in such banks, but tells you of the climate, general local conditions and gives you a careful estimate of the cost of living in the countries where they are situated. The ambitious young bank clerk who has any idea of trying his fortune in the banks of Egypt, Persia, Canada, America, South Africa, New Zealand, India, China or elsewhere in the East should consult this handy little booklet and profit by its expert guidance.

MESSRS JOIN LONG, LTD

In Green Girl (6s.), Mrs. Henry Lippott tells an enjoyable story of life in the Latin Quarter, and of a young girl who dislikes the idea of being tied by the marriage bond. This sounds a little risky, but the book is not, in fact, in the least erotic or unpleasant, it is emphatically on the side of the angels. It is a well-constructed tale, and, on the whole, a well-written one, although the characters are inclined to talk too much, and the Bohemian scenes are described with a convincing restraint.

MESSRS MILLS & BOON

The philosophy of a nursemaid of an attractive and all too rare type is the most striking feature of "With Drums Unmuffled," by L. A. Burgess (6s.), a pleasant and well-written first novel, which shows considerable promise. The book is humorous and pathetic by turn, and Gibraltar life forms an effective background for the greater part of a story which may be cordially recommended.

The Bookman Annual Art Supplement

BOOKS BEARING THE HALL MARK of the BODLEY HEAD

Alastair

FORTY-THREE DRAWINGS IN COLOUR AND IN BLACK AND WHITE.
WITH A NOTE OF EXCLAMATION BY ROBERT ROSS

42s. net.

Limited to 500 Copies in England and in America

Alastair

Charles Conder

HIS LIFE AND WORK.

By FRANK GIBSON. With a Catalogue of the Prints and Drawings by CAMPBELL DODGSON With 121 Reproductions of Conder's Work, including 12 in Colour. 21s. net.

Charles Conder

HIS LIFE AND WORK.

Whistler's Pastels & other Modern Profiles

By A. E. GALLATIN With 22 Plates, including 9 Hitherto Unpublished Designs by WHISTLER 10s. 6d. net.

HISTORICAL, BIOGRAPHICAL, TRAVEL AND ADVENTURE.

The Beautiful Lady Craven. The Original Memoirs of ELIZABETH, BARONESS CRAVEN, afterwards Margravine of Anspach and Bayreuth, &c. With an Historical Introduction. Edited by A. M. BROWDER and F. W. MERVILLE. With over 50 Illustrations. 2 vols. 25s. net.

Intimate Letters of Hester Piozzi and Penelope Pennington, 1788-1821. Edited by OSWALD G. KNAPP. 32 Illustrations. 16s. net.

Harriet Hosmer: Letters and Memoirs of the Famous Sculptor. Edited by CORNELIA CARR. 30 Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.

Anthony Trollope: His Work, Associates, and Originals. By T. H. S. ESCOFF. 12s. 6d. net.

English Travellers of the Renaissance. By CLARE HOWARD. 7s. 6d. net.

The Anglo-French Entente in the Seventeenth Century. By CHARLES BASCHET. 10s. 6d. net.

Travels without Baedeker: The Record of an Unconventional Tour in the East. By ALAN BENJAMIN. 7s. 6d. net.

A Motor Tour through Canada: From Halifax to the Pacific. By THOMAS W. WILBY. 5s. net.

A Vagabond in New York. By OLIVER MADON HUEFFEL. With Illustrations by R. L. HAYTINGS. 3s. 6d. net.

POLTRY, NATURAL HISTORY, GIFT BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.

Lyrics and Dramas. By SHIPPIE PHILLIPS. 4s. 6d. net.

Bread and Circuses. By HELLIN PARRY EDEN. 3s. 6d. net.

Glimpses of Indian Birds. By DOUGLAS DEWAR, Author of "Jungle Folk," "Birds of the Plains," &c. 7s. 6d. net.

Two Little Parisians: A Charming Record of the Child Mind. By PHILIP MUIR. 3s. 6d. net.

The Valley of Shadows: Recollections of Scenes and Episodes of Life in Illinois and Missouri at the time of the Abolition of the Slave Trade in 1863. By FRANCIS GRIFFINSON. New Edition, especially illustrated in Colour by LILLIAN PAUL. 5s. net.

Nancy in the Wood: A Fanciful, Idealistic Fairy Tale. By MARION BRYCE. Illustrated in Colour and in Black and White by KATHERINE CLAUSEN. 3s. 6d. net.

The Universe and the Mayonnaise. A Book which tells Children Scientific Facts Simply but Enthrallingly. By J. BRADSHAW ROBERTSON. Illustrated by KATHERINE CLAUSEN. Vol. 21. 3s. 6d. net.

The Bodley Head Natural History. By I. D. CUMING. Illustrated by J. A. SHUMBER. Vol. 1. British Birds. Passerines. A Book for young and old alike. In Cloth, 2s. net. In Leather, 3s. net.

FINE FICTION FOR PRESENTS, PROFIT AND PLEASURE.

When William Came: A Story of London under the Hohenzollerns. By H. H. MUNRO ("Saki"). Author of "The Unbearable Bassington," "Reginald," &c. 6s.

Behind the Beyond. By STEPHEN LELAND, Author of "Sunshine Sketches of a Little Town," &c. 3s. 6d. net.

The Hat Shop. By MRS C. S. PEELE. 6s.

BOOKS BEARING THE HALL MARK of the BODLEY HEAD

"To any lover of R.L.S. we should say that the par value of this extra number is likely very soon to be increased to a substantial premium."

—Financial News.

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON

THE MAN AND HIS WORK.

Extra number of "The Bookman" superbly illustrated in colour and black-and-white.

Price 5/- net

"Beautifully produced, it should be cherished by all admirers of Stevenson."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"It contains not only articles by a number of well-known pens, but what we imagine is the best collection of illustrations of Stevenson himself and places and persons associated with him that has ever been brought together."—Westminster Gazette.

HODDER & STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, LONDON. NEW YORK. TORONTO.

THE BOOKMAN
CHRISTMAS
SUPPLEMENT

ART
POETRY
AND BELLES
LETTRES

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913 LITERATURE AND ART.

We are always hearing that the public has no love of poetry, yet, perversely enough, new poets are always publishing something and the publishers always busy reissuing the old. I say nothing of the many that must satisfy my share, I first of all, it includes a handsome volume bound in cloth boards, with a canvas back deckle-edged paper, and this volume contains the "Collected Poetry of Francis Thompson," the man who in the few years since his strange chequered life ended, has been recognised as one of the great English poets—even one of the greatest among that splendid company of poets that glorified the second half of last century. With this comes a new edition of a very different singer Thompson was a religious mystic, a visionary dwelling remote among the high and sacred things

"The Collected Poetry of Francis Thompson" 20s net
£2 2s. net, and £5 5s net (Hodder & Stoughton)

From Old Italian Lace (Heinemann)

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

of the spirit: Stevenson was an essentially human soul, he sang of his friends, of his wistful, mundane memories, and homely, everyday experiences, and just because every man is both mortal and a spirit we are drawn to him on the one side as we are drawn to Thompson on the other. Stevenson's 'Poems' comprises also the inimitable 'Child's Garden of Verses' which has hitherto appeared only in a book to itself.

A steady flow of new editions testify to the enduring but the verse is good, there are, moreover, seven hundred and sixty-two quatrains, instead of the hundred or less that satisfied FitzGerald and Mr Johnson claims to have kept closely to the original text. It is interesting to compare this rendering with the other and increases your admiration of FitzGerald as an original and richly imaginative poet. His version is appears in Mr Foulis's Rose Garden Series, with ten ornately illuminated pages from old Persian manuscripts and a series of illustra-popularity of Omar Khayyam. You have a choice of four for this Christmas. One is a new version translated from the well known Lucknow edition by J. A. Johnson (Pasha). It has not the magic of FitzGerald's version.

It is Old Italian Lace (H. M. H. S.)

* Poems of Robert Louis Stevenson (Florence Type Edition) 15 (1 net) (Chatto & Windus)

* The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam Translated by J. A. Johnson (Lush) 35 (1 net) (Kegan Paul)

tions in Mr Langwyn's new edition. It is a fine, large size and more complete than the others of FitzGerald's. Or in all the little hand and illuminated J. Sullivan's edition from the latter with a charming, elegant introduction by Mr Langwyn.

* The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam Translated by FitzGerald Illustrated in (1 net) (Kegan Paul)

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

effective black-and-white drawings. In his unmistakably individual manner, Mr. René Bull has caught in these remarkable paintings of his the spirit and atmosphere of Fitzgerald's immortal adaptation, the glowing imagination, the sombre occultism, the mystery and Oriental magnificence of the poem as sensitively and glamorously expressed in them and in his beautiful, ornately decorative work. There is strength and a bold play of imaginative suggestion in Mr. Sullivan's wonderful line drawings,* and the curiously modern touch in some of them—as where he introduces into one a Salvation Army lassie in a labelled poke-bonnet, or where in illustrating "His Ill" a chequer board of night and days—he places a little figure of Napoleon among the chessmen on the table when you have recovered from the first jar, serves only to emphasise that though Omar wrote in an age that is long past, his philosophy is not so dated but belongs to to-day—and will belong to to-morrow.

"Villon is the greatest and truest of French verse writers," says Mr. H. de Vere Stacpoole in a preface to his translation of "The Poems of François Villon."<sup>7</sup> "He is the only French poet who is entirely real. He was the supreme master of the Ballade, perhaps the most artificial form of poetry yet in his hands, and became a wholly natural medium

From Greek Art and National Life
ASIAS, AFTER LYBIPPOS
(Nisbet).
(Delphi Museum)
Photo, T. Agnew & Sons.

From Early Poems of William Morris
(Blackie)

"IN THAT GARDEN FAIR
CAME LANCELOT WALKING, THIS IS TRUE, THE KISS
WHEREWITH WE KISSED IN MEETING THAT SPRING DAY

for the expression of his thoughts, feelings and emotions, and Mr. Stacpoole has Englished the finest things in his poetry so skilfully that he has rendered the

* "The Rubayyat of Omar Khayyam" Illustrated in Colour by René Bull 15s net (Hodder & Stoughton)

* "The Rubayyat of Omar Khayyam" With a Frontispiece in Colour and numerous Black-and-White Illustrations by Edmund J. Sullivan (Methuen)

* "The Poems of François Villon" Translated by H. de Vere Stacpoole (Hutchinson)

magic and music of them as well as their meaning. "The Charm of Edinburgh,"<sup>8</sup> Mr. Alfred H. Hyatt's excellent anthology of the best that has been said in prose and verse at the Athens of the North, takes its place among the most desirable gift-books in a fresh edition that is beautiful with twelve delicately-finished colour plates by Harry Morley. The Oxford Press issues, in its cheap and tastefully produced Standard Authors series, the "Poems and Translations" of D. G. Rossetti,<sup>9</sup> including the poems and the prose story, "Hand and Soul," which he contributed to The Germ, and, among the translations, his "Dante and His Circle." Miss Florence Harrison reflects with delicate skill and much charm the romantic mood and old-world fascination of Morris's best verse in the series of colour illustrations she has done for "The Early Poems of William Morris."<sup>10</sup> There is the true imaginative

* "The Charm of Edinburgh" Compiled by Alfred H. Hyatt. 12 Illustrations in Colour by Harry Morley 5s net (Chatto & Windus)

* "Poems and Translations of D. G. Rossetti (1850-1870)" 1s 6d net (Humphrey Milford)

* "The Early Poems of William Morris" Illustrated in Colour by Florence Harrison 12s 6d net (Blackie)

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From Early Poems of William Morris
(Blackie)

"GUENEVERE! GUENEVERE!
DO YOU NOT KNOW ME, ARE YOU GONE MAD?"

touch of mediæval quaintness and magnificence in Miss Harrison's work, as in the pleasing, almost severely simple paintings of Mr M I Kirk that illustrate "The Story of Evangeline"<sup>11</sup> the pastoral sweetness and Quaker-like simplicity of Longfellow's narrative poem are faithfully and sympathetically preserved. Mr Clayton Edwards, who edits the volume, has supplied a prose adaptation of the poem, and the poem itself follows this, so that a reader may enjoy the story in whichever medium pleases him most. I suppose "The Ingoldsby Legends" have lost the first bloom of their phenomenal popularity, but, outside the pages of Hood, there is no body of English humorous verse to compare with them. Barham was a born story-teller, a master of clever and catchy rhythm and a cunning hand at daringly-ingenious rhymes. There is humour, the wildest and most farcical, in his Legends and the humour of them is heightened and made irresistible by the crispness and jollity of his chuckling, tripping, trickily-dancing measures. "The Jackdaw of Rheims,"<sup>12</sup> is one of the most successful and popular of his works, and, clothed as and a realism that is that of the visionary who sees the wind blowing visibly from the fields of sleep and the clouds shredding into airy evasive shapes and flying darkly before it. There are examples in this book of every variety of Mr Rackham's beautiful and versatile art, and an interesting preface by Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch, which bears many alike to the thought and a Christmas book, and illustrated in a grotesque, irresponsible spirit of kindred gaiety and whimsicality by Charles Folkard, it strikes again a note of merriment that is in harmony with the season and should delight old lovers of Barham and win him many new ones.

The same seasonable note is struck in "Arthur Rackham's Book of Pictures,"<sup>13</sup> in such eerie fancies as the drawings of "Flies," "The Little People's Market," "Jack and the Beanstalk," "The Man who was terrified by Goblins." But the humour of Mr Rackham has subtler, more delicate, more graceful qualities. It holds, too, a higher, more imaginative sense of the weird, the terrible, the supernatural—a feeling for the spiritual side of life and the loneliness and wonder and majesty of nature, which you rarely glimpse in Ingoldsby except in the haunting last lines that he wrote. If you only know Rackham as a humorous artist, the power and imaginative impressionism of such studies as "Hauling Timber," and "The Regent's Canal" will be something of a revelation to you. There are fantasy and exquisite grace of line and cunning colour effect in "The Magic Cup," "The Little People's Market" in "Log" and "Shades of Evening," but the result in one is sheer beauty and delicate fancy, in another the quaintest freakish humour and in the others a grim, grotesque realism.

From Greek Art and National Life
(Nisbet)

<sup>11</sup> "The Story of Evangeline" Illustrated in Colour by M L Kirk 7s 6d net (Headley Bros)
<sup>12</sup> "The Jackdaw of Rheims" Illustrated in Colour by Charles Folkard. 10s 6d net (Gay & Hancock)

<sup>13</sup> "Arthur Rackham's Book of Pictures" 15s net (Heinemann)

APOXYOMENOS
(Rome, Vatican)
Photo, Anderson.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

husband, and the priest whose chivalry brought about his own and her undoing. The three sections of this volume give the story of the poem, a vividly-written description of the country of the story, and an account of its people as they appear in the poem. There is a beautiful frontispiece in colour and over a hundred photographs, maps and plans.

(C. W.)

written somewhat on the lines of his lectures, a book that will be full of interest to his students, and to many others who would like to be students if they could. Mr. Kaines-Smith must be found guilty of writing purple passages, and some stern critics prefer an uniform texture of hadden grey, but a good many of us like a little embroidery, a line of colour, such as was picked out in borders to the drapery on later Greek statues, we are told, key patterns in brilliant red and green.

Thus, Mr. Kaines-Smith will not only describe Knossus for you, but imagine what the sack of Knossus was like, and then, with a falling cadence, tell of the desolation that ensued. "The place became a maze of horrible associations full of ghosts as it was full of bats and night-birds. Painted figures, faded with rain and sun, stood out grimly in the corridors, like dead kings walking. The traveller took away with him stories of winding paths between great walls, in which a man might wander till he died. There were stones with pictures carved upon them of monsters, half bull and half man. And so, a like monster, half truth and half grisly imagination, grew up the story of the Labyrinthine maze, and of Theseus and the slaying of the Minotaur."

DECORATIVE IRONWORK.

By CHARLES FOULKES,
Blott, Oxon,
F.S.A. Illustrated 42s net
(Methuen)

This is a subject of great artistic and technical interest that Mr. Charles Foulkes has made his own, and in the present volume he supplies a learned and ably-written history of the development of art in ironwork from the eleventh century to the eighteenth. The smith's craft has played an important part in the growth of civilisation, it has not only been indispensable in war, but has supplied no small share of the necessities and luxuries of common domestic life. It has furnished both carpenter

From Decorative Ironwork
(Methuen)

THE GREAT DOOR, ANGERS CATHEDRAL,
XII-XIII CENTURY.

GREEK ART AND NATIONAL LIFE.

By S. C. KAINES-SMITH, M.A. 7s 6d net (Nisbet)

We know Mr. Kaines-Smith as a popular University-Extension lecturer, and he has now given us a book and goldsmith with tools, the kitchen with some of its most useful utensils, and the drawing-room with some of its ornaments. Mr. Boulton writes a full and very interesting survey of the rise and progress of this art of decorative ironwork which has made railings, hinges and door-knockers objects of beauty, as impartially as it has beautified chests and caskets, clocks, mirrors and furniture. He has dealt with the subject most exhaustively, and his book is much the amplest, the best informed and most valuable in its kind that has yet been published. The thirty-one plates and eighty smaller illustrations are excellently reproduced and add considerably to the use and beauty of the volume.

CHARLES CONDER HIS LIFE AND WORK

By FRANK GIBSON
With a Catalogue of the Lithograph and
Etchings by CHARLES
CONDER. With
151 Illustrations.
21s net. (John Lane.)

It would not have been in keeping with Charles Conder's personality or art had much space in this memorial volume been occupied by the 'Life'. A narrative of solid structure, a portrait of definite outline we do not expect or desire in his case. Conder's father was a civil engineer, a direct descendant of the statuary Roubiliac, whose virility was dashed with a queer emotionalism. James Conder took up an appointment in India, whither he was followed by his wife, with her baby son, Charles. The artist was five when he returned to this country on the death of his mother. There ensued ten years at various schools, and another two, apparently, spent in preparation for the father's profession. In pursuit of it the lad joined an uncle in the Lands Department of the New South Wales Government, but, wearying of trigonometrical surveying, he left the up-country party, and, in 1886, at the age of eighteen, started artist in Sydney. Conder remained in Australia, keeping himself by black-and-white work, and practising painting in the company of Mr. Arthur Streeton and others, until 1890. In the autumn of that year he entered Julien's, and France was his home until 1894, when he settled in London. The chief incidents of his life after that, besides his marriage and travels abroad and his friendships, were the various exhibitions of his works at the Carfax Galleries (1899 and 1900), M. Moret's, Paris (1901), Van Wisselburgh's (1903), the Leicesters

From Decorative Ironwork
(Methuen)

WEST DOOR, LICHFIELD CATHEDRAL.
XIII CENTURY

Galleries (1904 and 1905-6) and incidentally at the International and the New English Art Club. During the greater part of this time Conder had been living in Chelsea, but after 1906 he sought renewal of health at Brighton, Newquay, and elsewhere. The search was unsuccessful, and he died in London in 1909, at the age of forty-one.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From Charles Conder His Life and Works
(Lanc)

THE "BLUE BIRDS" FAN
(The property of Geoffrey Blackwell, Esq.)

The production of this brief career is recorded in the present volume in a full list of Conder's exhibited paintings, and an exhaustive catalogue of his lithographs and etchings, compiled by Mr Campbell Dodgson. Mr Frank Gibson, who knew the artist from his Melbourne days, adds to the chapter on his life another on his art illustrated by about a hundred and twenty excellent reproductions, several in colour, which compose the body of the book. Together they make a very proper memorial of an artist, the quality of whose gift was above all, exquisite. Mr Gibson emphasises somewhere the effect of Australia upon Conder's colour, and India too, may have told. The sun was in his blood. In the estimate of his art it is conceded, as it must be, that he never became a good draughtsman. His Austrian friend, Streton, and afterwards, Puyss de Chavannes, Gabriel St Aubin, Daumier, and especially, Anquetin, are mentioned as influencing him, and obviously in respect of his oils in particular. Whistler's name ought to be added. That there are memories of Watteau in his work goes without saying and if said, does not signify very much. Far more true it is that all essential pieces of it are filled with memories of Conder. Memories of things observed by himself, memories of the observations of others, sensitively recorded at the time, and recovered again and again in the evocations of his fancy, and always with the significance refined out of them, except their appeal to his momentary mood. They are not related to any experience save that of their recovery itself. Too remote from life to be any comment upon it, they are too wholly things of sense to take on the reality of the mystic. That element in them which seems sometimes dramatic, is generally only the surprising introduction into so languid a context of things that still have hanging about them a faint, reminiscent association with drama. It is this rareness, and not the originality, of his gift that tells, and that causes the most important event in his career to have been the discovery for himself of the fan convention. Within its limitations, all the disturbing appeal of reality chastened out, his gift moved freely. It admitted within them for it was a cunning spirit—just the things of its choice, for usefulness and companionship, it created no original world of its own, but out of such pieced a world—a coterie of ferie—which Conder made his own by dwelling in it.

From A Visit to Venice
(Llunt Stock)

MURANO GLASS BOWL
1' 1 1/2" ht, 6 1/2" inches, Width, 8 inches.

MORE ABOUT COLLECTING.

By SIR JAMES YOXALL
Illustrated 5s net
(Stanley Paul)

"More About Collecting" is a helpful guide by a collector, who in this well-informed, capably illustrated handbook, enlightens the less experienced with an account of his own adventures in the bewitching art of miscellaneous collecting.

From Charles Conder His Life and Works
(Lane)

THE PALAIS ROYAL
(The property of Mr. John Lane)

A VISIT TO VENICE, AND OTHER SKETCHES.

By WILLIAM WOODROOFE 2s. 6d. net (Elliot Stock)

Mr. Woodrooffe's half a dozen slight sketches probably please his circle of friends for whom they have been collected, rather than for the general reading public. The art of the essayist resembles the art of writing blank verse: it is temptingly easy and yet extremely difficult. Mr. Woodrooffe has been tempted by its ease but he has not appreciated the difficulties. There is no charm of personality in his little book, in spite of the fact that he tells the reader a good deal about his way of life, his ailments and his tastes. "A Visit to Venice" is a good piece of pedestrian prose: it gives merely a summary of the guide-book facts of the Queen of the Adriatic, and the quality of personal vision is lacking. And though Mr. Woodrooffe is a keen dog-lover, he fails to make his description of "The London Dog Cemetery" anything but commonplace. Yet he seems to be himself a man of unusual qualities of character, the trouble is that he lacks the art of giving these qualities a literary expression.

From A Visit to Venice
(Elliot Stock)

SPECIMENS OF SCOTTISH LITERATURE

Edited by W. M. METCALFE, D.D. 2s. 6d. net (Blackie & Son, Ltd.)

The purpose of this little book we understand to be chiefly concerned with the grammatical forms of the Scottish tongue, during the several periods between 1325 and 1835. For carrying out such a praiseworthy object no one could be more competent than the editor. So far so good. It is, presumably, a text-book for the student, a brief investigation into the formation of words. At least so we imagined when we began to read Dr. Metcalfe's introduction. But the following paragraph set us wondering: "The book appeals more directly to Scotsmen, and many of them I trust will read it. They will find in it many points of interest, and in easy means of studying their national, and by no means unbrilliant, literature in all the three great stages of its history." This, we presume, was inserted to cover the title "Specimens of Scottish Literature," which strikes a more popular note than the book warrants. As a text-book, we are confident that a scholar as profound as Dr. Metcalfe can give instances of dialect in 130 pages, together with notes and a glossary. But the field of Scottish Literature

MURANO GLASS BOWL.
Height, 6½ in. high, Width, 8 in. diam.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

deserves more generous treatment, especially when the early forms of the Scottish "language" comprise nearly three-quarters of the book. We must not we may not appear Philistine when we remark, that our admiration for literature is largely dependent on modern conveyance. Such lines as

OLD ENGLISH CHINA.

By Mrs WILLUGHBY HODGSON. Illustrated. (G. Bell & Sons)

Some little while ago Mrs Willoughby Hodgson wrote a useful and very successful little book on "How to Identify Old China", she follows this now with an exhaustive

From Old English Chin.
(Bell)

CHELSEA.
(1) Chinese Cup and Saucer decorated at Chelsea. (2) Fluted Chelsea Cup and Saucer painted in monochrome in Meissen style. From the Victoria and Albert Museum

"And he heicht hym he suld do swa Athers thar with that can ta" leave us comparatively cold. As an educational text-book though the scope be limited, "Specimens of Scottish Literature" should prove invaluable, but beyond that it should not look for recognition work on Old China, written not as if it were a task, but as one of the pleasures of a collector who feels the fascination of the art of the old English potter, and has a real love for whatever concerns it. Mrs Hodgson writes in an easy, familiar fashion, and does not make the path of her reader hard and pebbly with technical terms. She may know that language of the expert, but here she uses only the language of ordinary intelligent people, with the result that her book is the more informing because it is so thoroughly readable. There is a full and careful account of old English china in all its varieties, brief histories of famous factories, and

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

NINETEENTH CENTURY ENGLISH CERAMIC ART

by J F BLACKER Illustrated 5s (Stanley Paul)
Mr Blacker, who is a specialist in this sphere, points out that while there are many books on English pottery and

From Old English China
(Bell)

practical hints as to housing and arranging a collection. The numerous illustrations, sixteen of them in colour, are beautiful examples both of old china and of the engravers' art. Collectors will find the book an entertaining and an invaluable guide.

porcelain, a number treating of old ceramic art, very few deal with the later work of the nineteenth century. He has an earnest feeling for the ceramic developments in the Victorian era and in our own day, and this book is designed to justify the faith that is in him. It is a study in exhaustive

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From Staffordshire Pottery
and its History
(Sampson Low),

LANE END d 22
From the Stoke on Trent Museums

A HISTORY OF THE ROYAL SOCIETY OF ARTS.

By SIR HENRY FREEMAN WOOD, SECRETARY OF THE SOCIETY.
With a Preface by Lord Sanderson, C.C.B., Chairman of the Council. 15. net. (Murray.)

"Royal and Ancient" was the headline I had given this review, but it seems too suggestive of golf, and golf is one of the few matters with which the Royal Society of Arts has as yet had no association. The Royal Society of Arts cannot claim to have encouraged the invention of even the bath, waffle or the Senechady putter. And the name of the inventions encouraged by the Royal Society of Art is legion.

Save to its thousands of members the Royal Society of Arts is, I fear, a kind of mystery. We all know its Adelphi home, designed by Robert Adam, 1792, the wonderful Scot, who along with two talented brothers created the Adelphi as it is to-day, but what more is common knowledge? Even the Society's title is misleading, for the institution in the Adelphi has little concern nowadays with the fine arts, though in its earlier years the Society did much to aid people who drew, and its original signature-book has the names of many painters of world-wide fame among them Cosway, Allan Ramsay, and Sir Joshua Reynolds. The book has also the names of Samuel Johnson, James Boswell, and Samuel Richardson. Johnson took a great deal of interest in the Society, attended its meetings, and contributed to its deliberations, though by his own account he was no orator. He told Boswell that he had several times tried to speak at the Society of Arts and Sciences, but found that he could not get on. Also he acknowledged that he rose in the Society to deliver a speech which he had prepared, but that all his flowers of oratory forsook him. It is an obvious comment that the environment of a learned Society, with speeches made upstanding, was not the ideal environment for an oratorical Dr. Johnson. For him the Mitre, the Cock, or the Strettham villa of Mrs. Thrale. A formal speech-making Dr. Johnson is not a figure of history. A curious point, by the way, is that Goldsmith (probably prompted by Johnson) thought of sending in his name for the post of the Society's paid secretary. He never did so, though two of Goldsmith's biographers say he applied to Garrick

From More about MASONIC DRINK-
Collecting GLASS
(Stanley Paul)

From Staffordshire Pottery
and its History
(Sampson Low)

SCRATCHED BLUE SALT GLAZE CUP, DATED 1780.
From the Stoke on Trent Museums

for a testimonial. It is added that Garrick, annoyed by Goldsmith's criticisms, declined to give him one. Potently may think Garrick became a bad Goldsmith got the post there would have been in interference with his literary work. Also the Society may thank Garrick, for Goldsmith would in all likelihood have proved a far from effective Secretary, and his records might have had gaps to distress the Society's present meticulous historian, Sir Henry Freeman Wood.

Sir Henry has done his work brightly and well, despite the confused nature of the material available, and made clear all that has been attempted and accomplished by the Society since its foundation, in the year 1751 by William Shipley, an absent-minded amateur, a native of Leeds, a man of no conspicuous importance, as an artist or art teacher. A tradition of Shipley's absent-mindedness is that on his way to church to be married he was led away by the sight of a rare butterfly, started in pursuit, and arrived late for the marriage ceremony. Perhaps Sir Henry Wood does not do full justice to this man, who must at my rate have been well abreast of his time. In 1766 a silver medal was given to Shipley for a lighted buoy for saving life at sea. Of this Sir Henry writes: "As the invention does not seem to be specially valuable or remarkably original, it may perhaps be assumed that a certain friendliness of feeling dictated the award, as respect for his memory may have led to the publication of a description of the apparatus in the 'Transactions' a few years after the inventor's death." Lighted life-buoys were employed in the dark the other week (after Sir Henry's proofs had gone to Press), when the steamship Tollurno was a blazing charnel-house in mid-Atlantic.

Sir Henry Wood sets forth the biggest achievements of the Society, and there is natural satisfaction in the tone in which he tells how it pioneered the great Exhibition of the year 1851. That was the Society's most important work, and the recital of the Society's part is interesting. More readable is the account of its many small achievements. It produced, among other things, a shilling box of paints, eleven millions of which were sold. Political interest to-day attaches to the fact that it is to this non-party, unobtrusive Society that we owe the mangel wurzel, though not, it would appear, the pleasant. More than a hundred years ago the Society got some mangel wurzel seeds, and some were given to a member, the celebrated Dr Lettsom of Denmark Hill, who experimented with them, to some mind.

From More about MASONIC DRINK
Collecting DRINKING GLASS
(Lucy Paul)

wurzel leaves did not like them, and reported they were doubtless fine food for cows. That was the beginning of the wurzel in Great Britain.

To-day the Royal Society of Arts proceeds smoothly with examination that cover the whole country, deal with 30,000 candidates each year, several lectures each week, a weekly magazine, and a spirit of enterprise, though much of the work it set out to do now in the hands of the specialised bodies that are descendants.

Thanks are due to Sir Henry Trueman Wood, the Inventory, the value of which is increased by competent index. A defect is the scarcity of anecdotes. There must be scores.

DAVID HOBBS

STAFFORDSHIRE POTTERY AND ITS HISTORY

By JOSIAH C. WEDGEWOOD, M.P., C.C. With 20 illustrations. 6d net. (Sampson)

This is a specialist volume upon a most interesting

From Staffordshire Pottery
and its History
(Sampson Low)

ENAMELLED SALT GLAZE JUG
Presented by Biddley of Shelton dated 1760. It is in the Stoke-on-Trent Museum. The jug was reproduced in picture by the Rev. J. Middleton, showing a picture with the above Biddley.

and almost an untouched subject, in which Mr Wedgwood would give details of every side of the pottery industry in North Staffordshire. The author's name alone should ensure authority for a book which collectors and amateurs of all kinds will find of the utmost value.

From Staffordshire Pottery
and its History
(Sampson Low)

SALT GLAZE TEAPOT, DRAB BODY
Supposed to be by Josiah Wedgwood, dated 1737. From the Stoke-on-Trent Museum.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

THE LIFE OF PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY

By the MEDWIN
A. N. S. Edition
first edition, 1847
revised and corrected by the author, and left in perfect state of the introduction and commentary by
H. F. Forman
Clarendon Press
Oxford
London

some good things have been said of Captain Thomas Med-
win and his late editor Mr. H. F. Forman quote them without endorsement
let it be said in his introduction to the new edition of Medwin's

'Life of Shelley.' He can do no doubt weary of hearing the book benounced for its obvious shortcomings, a he utter a timely warning that it is more plausible to deny Medwin
the rank of a good biographer. Published in 1847 Medwin's

'Shelley' was the first attempt to present a full-length biography of the poet. Mary Shelley, whom trusted Medwin
trembled at the thought of a biography in such hands, and well she might for Medwin's love of gossip could not have been known to her. Byron had been the first victim on whom he tried to play
Boswell, he pumped him for all he was worth and rubbed out
a collection of conversations, while all the world we mourn the poet's death.
The book which is full of inaccuracies and contains superficial sketches of Shelley, but the vitality and energy however with which Boswell went to his work were all simultaneously lacking in Medwin's
character.
So when Mr.
Shelley realised that

Medwin was meditating
a biography of his cousin she appealed to his better nature in her efforts to stop the publication of private details of her husband's life. But she was unsuccessful and Mr.
Forman makes out a pretty clear case against Medwin in his attempt to sell her manuscript. Although Med-win declared in the introduction to his

'Life of Shelley' that it was written in no indolent haste it was carelessly put together.
It is full of tedious digressions which often bear little or no relation to his subject, but Medwin's chief fault is his proverbial unworthiness. So much so that it is hardly ever safe to accept unreservedly any fact on his statement alone. And if one delves from his 'Life of Shelley' some entertainment one is always conscious while reading it of an ever present
lack of confidence.

Medwin was evidently conscious that there was something wrong with his book for he set about correcting a copy in anticipation of a second edition, but his efforts were far from successful as is shown by Mr. Forman's nu-merable corrections.
No reprint however,
was called for during the author's lifetime, and a corrected copy answering to the description of that from which Mr.

Buxton has printed his new edition apparently the identical copy was formerly in the possession of the late Mr. Dykes-Cumplish, who lent it to Professor Dowden,
when he was writing his
'Life of Shelley,' and the Professor used what was new in
it. In this reissue, under the able editorship of such a

From French Pottery, by Henri Lantz
(Batsford's Collectors' Library)
(about 1840)

PALISSY DISH

Collection of George Salting, Esq. Length
12 inches - Width 16 inches

Sheffield Plate, by Benja. Wallis
(Batsford's Collectors' Library)
(Batsford)

BUTTER DISH WITH GLASS LINING ADAMS PERIOD

(The property of Gordon Thomson, Esq.)

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

veteran in Shelley bibliography as Mr H. Buxton Forman, the book gains not a little. He has provided a most readable introduction, and nothing could be fairer than his examination of Medwin's character, and his qualification for writing biography. Mr Forman has, moreover, supplied some valuable notes which display his wide and peculiar knowledge of all that relates to the poet and his times, and he has ensured for the book a useful and comprehensive index, which the first edition lacked. Judging from the trouble in this respect, of a page of the original text covered with corrections in Medwin's singularly crabbed writing, Mr Forman's task cannot have been an enviable one. Yet the book was worth reviving as an original document, supplying as it does some particulars that are not to be found elsewhere, although judged as a biography it has long been superseded by Professor Dowden's masterly monograph of the poet.

If Medwin is often inaccurate, there is often a germ of truth even in his most irresponsible statements. For instance, when he repeats the tradition of the poet's grandfather, Bysshe Shelley, marrying the widow of a miller and practising as a quack doctor in America, he is obviously on the wrong track, as Bysshe could have been no more than a child when he came to England. It is known that his father (Percy Shelley's great grandfather) married a widow in America, but whether her first husband was a miller and whether he practised medicine, there is as far as we are aware, no information forthcoming. Most of Medwin's quotations from Shelley's printed works were incorrectly copied, he altered and muddled his numerous citations from Mrs. Shelley's notes, and Hogg's papers on Shelley at Oxford. These quotations are duly corrected by Mr Forman, who sets right many misstatements, but it is not quite clear why he abstains from correcting others. The task of

From 'Old Pewter,' by Malcolm Bell (Batsford's Collectors' Library) (Batsford)

(1) Henricus, XVII Century, height 10.4 ins.
(2) Pinder, Scotch XVII Century, height 6.1 in.
(3) Flagon, German XVIII Century, height 11.5 in.

Keith, who was notorious for performing clandestine marriages, and who is said to have united Prince George, afterwards George III, to Hannah Lightfoot, the fair Quaker, got into trouble for celebrating marriages without banns or licences, and was, at the time of Bysshe Shelley's nuptials, duly lodged in the Fleet, where he continued to officiate at weddings. If therefore he joined Bysshe to his bride, it is evident he could not have done so at his chapel in Curzon Street. Medwin, moreover, states that two of Bysshe Shelley's daughters by his second marriage were not mentioned in his will. This statement also calls for correction, as they both received small legacies from Sir Bysshe, Robert Owen's chapel, which is or was till quite recently standing, was in John Street, now Whitfield Street, and not in Charlotte Street, as stated by Medwin on page 10. These blunders, besides others, are Medwin's, and Mr Forman may not have considered them worth correcting.

amending everything in the book is one that might well have daunted the most industrious of editors.

Mr Forman makes no comment on Medwin's information that when Bysshe Shelley eloped with Mrs. Mitchell he was married in the Fleet by the Fleet Parson. The pedigree printed by Mr Forman in the first volume of his edition of Shelley's prose works, from a copy in the College of Arms, gives [Bysshe Shelley's place of marriage as "Kerth's Chapel, May Fair."

The volume contains as frontispiece a picture which is described as "a portrait of Shelley from a drawing by Alfred Scott." It is to be presumed that it is an idealised likeness of the poet, but whether intentionally or not it bears a striking resemblance to the head of our Lord, as sketched by da Vinci for his picture of the Last Supper. While on the subject of the portraits of Shelley, attention may be directed

From 'English Table Glass,' by Percy Bate (Batsford's Collectors' Library) (Batsford)

INScribed GLASSES BEARING NAVAL TOASTS AND DESIGNS
1. Height, 8 ins. 2. Height, 6.1 ins.
3. Height, 6.1 ins. 4. Height, 7.1 ins.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

MR FORSTER ROBSON

Photograph of the dramatist, Min and the Col. (then All Hours, Hana mon) stand by the word—at the time—that this picture has since been reproduced.

Medwin was an odd character, with ambitions to become a man of letters. In the theatre he perpetrated a novel and some verse, his book entitled The Angler in Wales—but excepting volume on Byron and Shelley, his writings are practically forgotten. He has been described as a mild observer who had much to say and who said it badly.

His motive in writing about the two once fixed on terms of intimacy has been represented as entirely dictated by him, but I think this is open to question. He was doubtless proud—as most people were to have known Byron and Shelley—and for the latter he seems to have had a sincere affection and expressed admiration.

time when it was anathema to timid people.

ROGER INCH.

ADAM BEDE

By George Eliot
With coloured Drawings and numerous Black and White
Illustrations by George
Dowd, George
and W. & A. K.
Chapman

Charles Reade, in his breezily enthusiastic fashion, declared on reading 'Adam Bede' that it was 'the finest thing since 'Snake and Spirit'.' Anyhow, it is a fine and great story, and Mr. Gordon Brown has illustrated it very beautifully and with real imaginative sympathy. In this new to Mr. Forster Robson's note

P
here Med

W
h of th
Th

spla

William's sketch had not at the time been engraved or otherwise reproduced at all. The sketch is generally supposed to have been lost, but we now under-and attractive edition 'Adam Bede' makes one of the most artistic and wholly desirable of the season's gift-books.

FOUR TRAGEDIES.

By ALAN MONKHOUSE. 6s. (Duckworth.)

THE PRICE OF THOMAS SCOTT.

By ELIZABETH
& JACKSON

1 and 2s. net. (Sodgwick)

THE MOTHER

By EDITH PIERCE. 2s. and 1s. 6d. (Duckworth.)

Because what politicians regard as the backbone of England, the middle class, has an inchoate mentality that can only be described as stodgy, some of us think it will always be difficult for the dramatic artist to make acceptable any realistic reproduction of their mental or spiritual life. The straight-jacket of convention has so mired them to habits of self-repression that their souls have become lean like those quaint dwarf Japanese trees, they have become stunted growths with the semblance of reality, minus the vigour and bloom of virgin growths. That thought may explain why Mr. Allan Monkhouse's 'Four Tragedies' have such a depressing effect upon the reader. I have no bias for 'happy ends'—but it is sometimes well to remind oneself that the Greek dramatist, even in his direst moments, always managed to inform his tragedy with that sense of pitiousness that redeems and uplifts. Admittedly it is difficult to avoid using the photographic method in dramatising the middle-class, but it is hopeless to surprise thus the likeness of truth out of their souls. Without a vision the people perish; and without vision the dramatist must always fail to make the popular appeal.

The reason being this, the public always wants to believe the best about what, after all, is itself, viz. human nature. The other point I wish to make is that in choosing the middle class as a subject matter for what appear to be examples of scientific natural history, Mr. Monkhouse has deliberately set out to explore him, if he has failed to the

the saying family, and

The Strickland, for both are well observed and carefully recorded pieces of contemporary life, informing, certainly, but wanting in that purging and uplifting quality we look for in tragedy. The protagonist in the first play, Hayling, is a quaint megalomaniac who, having squandered his own and his wife's fortune through his incompetence, expects his children to sacrifice theirs as well. To the last resort he forges a cheque, and on the Hayling family declining to pay up, their father is marched off to prison. When the convict returns to a shabby home, he is still the dandified megalomaniac insisting on his parental rights, till Mrs. Hayling decides to give him poison, but is thwarted through the husband felling her

From 'Personal Experience in Spiritualism'
(Laurie)

"SPIRIT PHOTOGRAPH"

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

with a stone club. There is a certain austerity about the dialogue that gives it a touch of actuality, but as the etiolated characters are lacking in any friendly warmth by reason of the dry light thrown upon them, I confess to a feeling of profound relief at the curtain-fall. In "The Stricklands" the element of surprise is well sustained to the last. Gerald Strickland, a literary gent, has for fiancée Georgie, a handsome woman, full of animal spirits. When Robert Strickland, a masterful type, returns from a successful West African rubber exploit it is evident that Gerald's engagement is in peril. Two years pass, and the Stricklands' mother and daughter are waiting for the arrival from West Africa of Robert and Georgie, who have been married, and also for Gerald, who subsequently joined them. Only Gerald and Georgie return—Robert is dead. The pretence is that he was killed in a quarrel among the rubber slaves; the truth is detained for analysis here, but Mr. Phillpotts has yet to learn Burns's secret of lopping off ruthlessly the unessential acts and words.

ROBB LAWSON

THE LOG OF A ROLLING STONE

By HENRY ARTHUR BLOOME. Illustrated from Water-Colour Drawings by the Author. 12s. 6d. net. (Werner Laurie.)

The book is essentially the diary of a wanderer. Mr. Bloome, who was the younger son of a Norfolk vicar, writes of his early days at Houghton Hall, in the patrimony of Horatio Walpole, where he was born. He then describes his apprenticeship to wood engraving for Punch and Fleet Street celebrities whom he met, including G. A. Sala, George Du Maurier, Crankshaw, etc. His dislike of a sedentary occupation, however, sent him abroad. At heart he was a rolling stone from the first. But then it is mostly the observant rolling stone that either the blessed productive moss of wisdom. He spent three years in what was afterwards known as the Cape Mounted Police, an authorised band of trolling, and more or less gentlemen with bonds with whom he was wounded in the Gorka war, and went through the rebellion in Giqualand East. After a few months as a clerk in the Government railway engineering office in Cape Town, he bought a spanking set of mules and a wagon, and became a transport rider between Cape Town and Kimberley, making a success of his venture, in which there was plenty of trial and some adventure. His next move was to Ladak, where nothing of moment happened to him, so he returned for a spell in the wine-making district of Cape Colony. Tiring of this, he sailed for New Zealand, and went on to Australia, carrying his way from trial to trial, a compulsive pressman. In the

From The Poems of D. G. Rossetti

(Woodcut by the Author)

DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI

From the drawing by him, 1844 in the National Portrait Gallery, London. (The Trustees, London) that Gerald had killed him because of his brutality to his wife and his slave. It is a straight, clean-cut tragedy, but it seems to me the author has not shown us the most dramatic moment in the tragedy, which would have been that West African scene. And I do complain that Mr. Monkhouse, in his desire to make his characters logical, causes them reason to inform their passion, instead of the reverse, in time they have thought, but no passions.

The two one-act plays, Resentment, which cleverly gives us Brecht's typical monotic, and Requiem, the Whirlwind, are feats in characterisation all too rare in plays of this genre.

The author of Chans, Miss Elizabeth Baker, returns in "The Price of Thomas Scott," to her observation of middle-class life. It is a study bare of beauty, showing a certain dry quality of analysis that is careful rather than inspired, and its gripping qualities would best be tested before a little Bethel audience, to whom the main situation possesses a more tragic value than for the normal spectator. I doubt if the fact of a tradesman refusing, although it be in ruin—to sell his premises because it was proposed to use them as a dancing saloon, would impress a modern audience.

Mr. Eden Phillpotts's four-act play "The Mother" has already been produced by the Liverpool Repertory Theatre. It is an impressive piece of work, possessing a dominating note of tragic beauty in the presentation of the mother, Avis Pomeroy, that lifts a commonplace series of episodes into the region of poetry. The plot and character are too

From Social and Political Reminiscences

(Williams & Noyes)

THE RT HON JAMES BRYCE

May 25th 1896

(Portrait sketch by the author, 1896)

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

former colony he put armed policemen up country. When that became too tame, he shipped before the mast to Valparaiso, reached Santiago de Chile, and returned to Liverpool as captain's mate. After owning and conducting a newspaper in the Isle of Wight, he went again to South Africa and there passed through such phases of life as quarry master, convict guard, sheep breeder, chief constable and resident magistrate. Yet wherever he went or whatever he did, and all his occupations are not mentioned here, there was ever one progress made, accompanied by a certain recklessness as to consequences, and behind it all the wanderlust working through to the front again. It is a book to put heart into would-be doers who are afraid, especially into those who desire to be wanderers and doers alike.

THE WALLACE COLLECTION

By FRANK RUTTER.

Handy in size, well printed in price, this little book by Mr. Rutter is likely to become the most popular of all guides to the glorious palace of art in the West of London. The writer is one of the best known of our art critics, and he has made his little book on the treasures of Hertford House into something far better than an annotated catalogue of pictures, porcelain, furniture, sculpture, and armour. It is an introduction to the great arts of beauty, written out of the experience of a lifetime. It gives its readers new points of view in the appreciation of the masters of art, besides providing them with the knowledge necessary in estimating the glories of the Wallace Collection. It is, in short, an education in art as well as a guide book, possessing a literary value of its own independent of the wealth of information it imparts. Mr. Rutter has a clear, engaging way of writing and a vivacity that comes from original thought and original feeling. If all the guides to

From Hans Holbein the Younger (Allen)
An important critical biography by Arthur B. Chamberlain, which was in review in the January Bookman.

PORTRAIT OF AN UNKNOWN
ELDERLY MAN
Kaiser Friedrich Museum, Berlin

(Grant Richards)

well illustrated, and cheap

From The Wallace Collection
(Grant Richards).
LADY READING A LETTER.
TERBORGH

our chief museums of art were written by men of his stamp, these prisons for beautiful things would be transformed into centres of living influences. The Wallace Collection is, of course, one of the most inspiring places in which to study. The deadly museum atmosphere is entirely absent; it is a true home of art.

THE ROMAN CAMPAGNA

By ARNALDO CIR
VISATO. 218 net.
(Unwin.)

This is the translation of a book that was published in Italy some time ago when the conditions on the Carriage were even as endurable as they are to-day for Signor Cirvisato has had some of the reforming influence of a Dickens. We wish by the way that he would allow himself to diverge a little more into Dickensian descriptions of odd characters. The book is too much of an enlopedia and it is too dry. Now and then, as in the client account of people cutting up a dead horse, the scene is vivid and vivid these wretched barbarous surroundings we require relief. There are a good many historical and orthographical mistakes, which is extraordinary in a man who knows the Campagna as does our author. And the illustrations are more remarkable for quantity than quality; the interest of some of them does hardly compensate for the amateurishness and ineffectiveness of others. What we gather, though from a perusal of this book is a sense of the great misery which lies on the inhabitants of the Campagna, even with the efforts towards anchorage which the Government is making. Signor Cirvisato devotes himself not only to the present but to various epochs of the past and it is doubtful whether he is not too ambitious, even as he stretches his Campagna to unusual limits. We should have obtained a clearer picture if he had concentrated more on a smaller strip of country and described it, say, for the last century. The other method savours too much of a photograph made from an air-ship, such as indeed he also gives us. A few villages, with their human inmates, and part of the wilderness with its buffaloes and wild horses, would have given us a picture of the whole. There is too much dull information, with too little charm of style, though this may be due to the translator. Yet one cannot but applaud a man whose heart is evidently set upon improving the lot of his unhappy countryfolk, and for many of us who imagine that Italy is a land of universal laughter this will be a revelation. Marion Crawford has described some squalid villages of the Abruzzi, and with the knowledge of Signor Cavosito one could write a book as powerful as those, and as artistic.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From A Dictionary of Irish Artists
(Munnich)

SIR FREDERICK W. BURTON.
(Painted by G. F. Mulkerry, R.H.A.)

MODERN DANCING AND DANCERS.

By J. J. CRAWFORD BLITCH, M.A. With 8 Illustrations in Colour and 40 in Black and White. 7s 6d net. (Grant Richards.)

It is refreshing to note that the modern revival in the art of dancing has extended also to the literature upon the subject so that a sufficient demand exists for a cheaper edition of Mr Crawford Blitch's masterly "Modern Dancing and Dancers," which was published last year for the first time. It is almost unnecessary now—as it is also beyond our scope—to do more than mention the fact of this new edition, and to observe that in the manner of production no material alterations have been made. To students of modern dancing—one of the most "live" of all the arts at the present moment—the volume carries its own recommendations.

From The Wallace Collection
(Grant Richards.)

BOOR ASLEEP
BROUWER

MY COSMO- POLITAN YEAR.

By the Author
of "Mastering
Time" to 61
net. (Mills & Boon.)

That the chapter headings neuterly misleading entirely unimpressive that is the first impression one gains on opening "My Cosmopolitan Year." One wonders how the publisher came to price to them, one pictures how the proof reader, hardened though he probably was must have groined over them. "In Rehearsal (New York)"

The Broken-down Actor (Madrid) certainly these suggest anything of sketches of life and conditions in various great cities of the world, and there are several more headings of the same type, well calculated to head off the average reader who is a subscriber to illustrated papers, and has therefore had a surfeit of things theatrical. As a matter of fact, however the book has nothing to do with the stage. Instead it consists of some shrewd well-written pictures of things seen by the author in Paris, London, Vienna, New York and Madrid. The five cities are well chosen because of the strong contrast between them. The author has gripped the essential points in his subject and his book is a

THE CHARM OF THE WEST COUNTRY

An Anthology. Compiled and
Edited by THOMAS BURKE.
2s 6d net. (Arrowsmith.)

THE CONTENTED MIND

Edited by THOMAS BURKE.
3s 6d net. (Fuslove & Hanson.)

THE CHARM OF ENGLAND

Compiled and Edited by THOMAS BURKE. (Fuslove & Hanson.)

Those who love anthologies will be delighted with these three that Mr Thomas Burke has edited and compiled.

THE BOOKMAN

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From Baroque Architecture
(Unwin)

MUNICH ST MICHAEL'S CHURCH

Mr Burke is himself a poet of fine achievement, and he has done his work in these books with the judgment and good taste we should have expected of him. The West Country has reason to be proud not only of its shining list of native authors, but of its other famous men and its own beauty, that have inspired so many alien authors to write of them. In "The Charm of England" Mr Burke throws a wider net, and you have the best things that have been said in prose and poetry about the English girl and woman, about the English house and garden, the town and countryside, about love and marriage in England, and English customs and festivals carefully gathered up and admirably arranged in his hundred and seventy pages. The outer world and the loveliness of visible nature are only incidental to "The Contented Mind" which, as its title indicates is more concerned with the inner life of man and the things of the spirit, and, as befits the contented mind the prevailing note of all the selections is of the bravest, most optimistic philosophy. It ranges so far up and down the ages that on one page you have Chaucer's "Good Counsel," and on another Mr Edwin Pugh's thumb-nail sketch, "A Merry Heart." St. Augustine's "Of Joy" jostles a jolly song from "Ralph Roister-Doister", Lord Avebury lies down on the same page with Charles Lever, the benignly dignified Emerson walks immediately on the heels of the rollicking rhyme of "Old King Cole." It is good to have the sweetest the wisest, the most carelessly happy things about life and the right way of living distilled thus into this one pleasant book. Each of the anthologies is compiled with a taste that is as sound as it is catholic, and from the widest most miscellaneous reading, and each in its different way is entirely well-timed. They are just the fascinating sort of books that you buy to give away and then have to keep for yourself. Mr Burke has dipped his bucket into the great rivers of literature, but he has dipped it also into all manner of charming little brooks and streams that do not run and sparkle always in the sight of everybody, and it is thus that makes his volumes so fresh and so refreshing.

ARTIST'S SKETCH-BOOK SERIES

OXFORD BY FRED RICHARDS, CAMBRIDGE BY WALLER M. KEESEY
Each containing 24 Drawings 1s net each (Black)

The latest additions to Messrs Black's "Artist's Sketch-Book Series" are both excellent little books in their way. The work of Mr Richards and of Mr Keesey is especially attractive where architectural "bits" form their subjects. Neither is so effective in the sketches in which the everyday life

From The Artist's Sketch Book Series: Oxford
(Black).

THE CAMERA FROM ALL SOULS, COLLEGE QUADRANGLE.

of the undergraduate at the 'Varsity figures at all prominently Mr Richards, for instance, introduces young men in cap and gown into a large number of sketches. One is not so bold as to say that this is an unusual sight but in Oxford it is far less common than the purchaser of this book might think. As a matter of fact it is quite possible to get through an academical career at Oxford without buying a "college cap" at all. A good borrower could easily arrange loans for the few occasions on which it is absolutely necessary. One must have a gown, of course. At Cambridge the proctors or the University regulations seem to be stricter, or the custom is different. Anyhow, Mr Keesey's undergraduates are dressed in a more likely way than are Mr Richards's, but the lack of knowledge of punting shown in his sketch of Clare Bridge is simply amazing. With these reservations, however, and they are trivial reservations, after all these two little books are quite charming.

THE COMEDIES, HISTORIES TRAGEDIES AND SONNETS OF SHAKESPEARE

Savoy Edition 7s. 6d. net

(d.)

The special attractiveness of this well printed, handsomely bound edition of Shakespeare lies in its illustrations. Twenty-eight of these are in colour, including a beautiful reproduction of the Chandos portrait, paintings of the birthplace and of Anne Hathaway's cottage by Edward H. Pritchard and reproductions of scenes from the plays by the Hon. John Collier, Harold Speed, F. A. Abbey, D. Macise, Landseer, Teslie, Opie, Millars, Sargent and other famous artists. In addition there are some seventy excellent reproduced photographs of celebrated actors and actresses in the Shakespearean characters they have presented before the footlights. An adequate biographical and critical introduction and a useful glossary almost complete what should prove a very popular edition of our greatest dramatist; at the poems printed at the end, though the title page does not promise them, crown and really complete it.

A HATCHMENT

By R. B. CUNNINGHAM-GRAHAM

Of the contents of Mr Cunningham-Graham's volume "A Hatchment" the general characterist can be said to be that of retrospect, tinged by Whither the author sets his scene in Spain, in America or in the Scottish Highlands, he is always

From An Artist in Italy
(Holtby & Son, Ltd.)

A CANAL IN VENICE

From The Works of Shakespeare - Savoy Edition
(Eyre and Spottiswoode)

ANNE HATHAWAY'S COTTAGE
(Drawn by Edward H. Pritchard)

his eye back across the years in a wistful attempt to recapture some glimpse or memory of the past. The picturesque, the flamboyant, the elemental are what he looks for, and though not a single one of his new sketches can by any stretch of language be called a short story - three only, "A Moral Victory," "A Page of Pliny," and "A Belly God," have a title to rank even as anecdotes or yarns, they all possess the real glamour of things seen and felt. As is naturally the case in tales describing raids or the herding of cattle the horse figures largely in most of Mr. Graham's latest impressions, and the author, loving and knowing horses as he loves and knows them, shows a quite admirable skill in the variety of parts he sets these noble animals to play. The men and women who figure in "A Hatchment" and its companion vignettes, are shadowy if picturesque, but the horses—whatever their breed may be—have real life and being.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

THE MEANING OF ART ITS NATURE, ROLE, AND VALUE

By PAUL GAULTIER. With a Preface by J. M. L. BOUTROUX.
Translated from the Third French Edition by H. and J.
BALDWIN. With 36 Illustrations. 5s. net. (George Allen)

This work was crowned by the French Academy of Moral and Political Sciences, and there must be many

His view that the work of art is no more or less than to embody and objectivise emotion by means of sounds, lines, reliefs, colours, etc., is one that is assuredly gaining ground. Art, he says, "is the charm of our days and the joy of our life." It refines our sensibility, it stimulates it for the good, it enlarges and socialises it, and, at the same time, it enlarges the field of our intuitive knowledge in the most unexpected ways. Nature, he maintains, is the school to which the artist should always go. Granting that art is non-moral, M. Gaultier does not suggest that it has no action on manners; rather, he suggests, it is too deeply involved with life to fail to be of great assistance to morality. Though art does not purify everything, it is 'the best discipline in refinement that there is.' It is M. Gaultier's faith, too, that art is social by nature, simply because it is beautiful. It is not beauty but it must be beautiful. And "the duty devolves upon the artist even in the interest of his work, of not injuring society, in the expression of his feelings, by opposing the interests of morality." As to criticism, for the appreciation of works of art, finesse is more important than argument, feeling than intellect, emotional capacity than logical faculty. M. Gaultier's monograph is masterly and fascinating in its stimulating effects on the imagination.

From The Meaning of Art (Illustration).

MORNING LANDSCAPE, COROT LOUVRE.

English readers who will be grateful for its presentation in an English dress. We venture to think that M. Gaultier is on the right path in throwing off the shackles of intellectualism in approaching his intricate and difficult subject.

Poet, Mystic and Moralist. By HENRY ROSE. 6d. net (Fifield).

The great artists and moralists must have many a time turned over in their graves at the consequences of that desolating adage quot homines, tot sententiae—to the appreciation of their work. At any rate we feel tolerably sure that Ibsen's hair would have bristled in horror, had he been alive to read Mr. Rose's interpretation of his philosophy. A few homely tracts upon human conduct, a caution to the new-fangled ideologues of to-day that the spiritual progress of mankind is "evolutionary" and not "revolutionary", a timely reminder of the claims of love, duty, truth and freedom (preferably in capitals) in

From The English Year: Autumn and Winter (Jack).

THE GOLDEN VALLEY.
By Sir Alfred East, R.A., P.R.S.A. (By kind permission of the Leeds Corporation.)

OUR VILLA IN ITALY

By JOSEPH LUCAS, 5s net (Unwin)

"I love this Tuscan corner of God's earth," says Mr Lucas, and although this is a short book and the love of Englishmen for Florence is traditional and there are many famous shrines, medieval and modern, ecclesiastical and secular Italian and British, where we come in homage, yet we must find room for this old villa. Mr Lucas is apparently not an old hand at writing books, but he has a delightful way with him and one thinks of Montgomery Carmichael's "In Tuscany."

This volume is slighter, and it does not fear to deal with events one would have called hum-drum, such as are in all countries, even the most romantic, associated with the buying of a house. To Mr Lucas, and to us, it becomes an exhilarating adventure, and if he sometimes keeps us overlong with his meditations on human happiness and the catacombs we plunge back with all the more eagerness into his ultimately successful quest. For those and there must be a considerable number of English people who become per-

"COME,
FOR LOVE IS OF THE VALLEY COME THOU DOWN AND FIND HIM"

manent exiles in Shelley's Paradise, this book will be of great service, not only does it assist one with the house agent, but from the author's varied experience always pleasantly conveyed one learns a good deal about furniture, ancient and modern, and the garden, which, of course, was a necessity. The glimpse of his relations and other Florentines with whom he is brought into contact are, in some cases, provokingly brief and we hope that like Marianna when she came to Sussex he will unload his mind freely on the subject. How infinitely more agreeable is a humorous and urbane book of this kind than opposition to "selfishness," a trumpet blast to emphasize the essentials of individual and social responsibility and, hey presto the walls of the problem are crumbled to dust! Mr Rose's cardinal triumph of theoretic exposition is centred upon the contract system. For his delimitations of the moral teaching of the plays he conjures up two potent talismans "the practice of prudence and wisdom in entering into contracts," and "fidelity to contracts when made." Thus armed he soon drills the plays into order. No Jesuit could be more ingenious. In the "Doll's House" for instance he is confident that Nora's evasion of her marital obligations would not possibly have solved the complexity of her position, as Ibsen, he feels, would agree, and it was really too bad of her to suppose that her husband would take upon himself the responsibility of a crime of which he was all along innocent. In "Rosmersholm" again, he pursues the same quarry, ignoring the fundamental tragedy the failure of Rebecca's vitality to vanquish the hereditary family skeleton of the Rosmers. In "The Lady from the Sea," he remarks, did not Ibsen's theories of life require that Ellida should recognize a priority of claim towards the stranger? Our faculties are paralyzed before the nautech of Mr Rose's criticism. At least the readers of Ibsen will be reassured that he was quite respectable. The equation of morality is not after all an intricate one. 'Be good,' is its discovery, and all is well. If Ibsen can be pinned down to this summary crystallization of moral ideas we should have imagined that Mr Rose's analysis of his mystical outlook was altogether superfluous.

H M

From The Open Road
(Methuen)

From Ancient Painted Glass in England
(Methuen)

EAST WINDOW, FAIRFORD CHURCH, GLOUCESTERSHIRE

those triumphant books of travel to the countries where we have no wish to go and where we often find ourselves believing that the author has not been! It is possible also, as we know, to write exotically about Florence, and it would have been as well if more than one writer of memoirs had followed Mr. Luc's advice as to gardens. 'The supreme pleasure of a garden,' says he, 'is its privacy.'

ANCIENT PAINTED GLASS IN ENGLAND

By PHILIP NELSON, M.D., Ch.B., F.S.A., and Lect.
(Methuen)

From Religious Art in France
(Dent)

Painted window from its known beginnings—about the sixth century—and describes the methods of the early craftsmen. The various styles are classified in accordance with the presumed date of origin and peculiarity of decoration, each style being dealt with in successive chapters covering a period from the beginning of the thirteenth to the end of the sixteenth century. Following, come chapters on English Domestic Glass, Medieval Glass Artists, and the Vicissitudes of Ancient Glass, after which—arranged in countries—come lists of the most notable examples to be found throughout the country. The index to these, by the way, leaves something to be desired, for unless the reader knows the county in which any particular church is to which he may desire information is situated, he may have a long search before finding it.

Needless to say, ecclesiastical buildings enjoy an almost complete monopoly of relics of the art, and even after the ravages of the Puritans and other Vandals their treasury is far from depleted, judging by the extensive lists of cathedrals and churches in which ancient stained glass is to be found. Nowadays it has little to fear but the maw of time, and we are glad to notice that in an appendix the author gives some practical hints in the direction of restoring and

From Religious Art in France
(Dent)

Whatever may be our national deficiencies in other branches of Art, we can at least claim that during the Middle Ages our country held the first place in the art of the stained-glass window, and in recording and describing the most important relics of medieval painted glass to be found in our churches and cathedrals. Mr. Nelson has done a useful work. The book (which forms part of the excellent series of Antiquary's Books) opens with a brief history of the

From Religious Art in France
(Dent)

From Religious Art in France
(Dent)

preserving old painted windows which (especially in manufacturing towns) are, unless protected, liable to injury from the acid vapours in the air. There are many plates and illustrations, and the book, in the production of which Mr. Nelson acknowledges the assistance of artists, clergymen and others interested in the subject, is a valuable contribution to antiquarian literature.

FOR THE THOUGHTFUL CITIZEN
SOCIALISM AND SYNDICALISM
By PHILIP SNOWDEN, M.P.

MODERN VIEWS ON EDUCATION
By THISTLETON MARKS, B.Sc.

EUGENICS.
By EDGAR SCHUSTER

SANE TRADE UNIONISM
By W. A. OSBORNE

INDUSTRIAL GERMANY
By W. H. DAWSON

THE PRACTICAL SIDE OF SMALL HOLDINGS
By JAMES LONG

Each is net. (Collins' Nations' Library)

The most interesting and provocative one might even say the most vital of this series of handbooks, is Mr. Snowden's 'Socialism and Syndicalism'. For a book on this subject it is exceptionally free of rhetoric, and though it bears marks of hasty composition, it is written like a well-knit essay that one can read without a break from the first page to the last. To open with a long trenchant criticism of our existing social conditions was inevitable, but Mr. Snowden does more than this. He tells us how Socialism might eventually be won, and he manfully faces the difficulties on the road. That is the most valuable part of his book. It meets the demand of the ordinary business man.

Mr. Thistleton Marks's 'Modern Views on Education' carries with it that quality which should be the special characteristic of every one of these controversial handbooks. It is stimulating. Most of us pick up with suspicion a book on education written by a professional educationalist for many of us have felt with Mr. Bernard Shaw, "My education was interrupted by my schooling." Mr. Marks, however, is human. He has a sense of humour, and says many a fine thing finely. 'Shakespeare,' he truly observes, 'was man first, poet second, hence he is supreme as poet. He has the courage to face Mr. Holmes's dictum.

Whatever else the current system of education may do for the child there is one thing which it cannot fail to do to him - to blight his mental growth, and he tries to find devious ways to remove this blight from the brows of children. The author is alive to the value of the Montessori system though he warns us it would fail in our overcrowded class-rooms with their fifty or sixty children policed in one class. 'The exhilarating teacher,' he says with real insight, 'is the one who really disciplines, for he sets free the life.' Perhaps what is chiefly wrong with our schools is that our teachers have to build on a rocky base. 'If the nation knew,' says this experienced schoolmaster, 'what head-teachers could tell them of children who come to school tired out and unfit to learn, a crusade of some sort would almost certainly be started.'

From Religious Art in France
(Dent)

From Religious Art in France
(Dent)

From Lohengrin
(Harrap)

AND SUDDENLY IN WRATH
THE KING HATH SEIZED THE DARK WITCH-WIFE

It will be interesting to watch the circulation of a shilling handbook on a subject about which only the highly-educated know anything. Mr. Edgar Schuster constantly uses a terminology which is carrot to the dog, no less than to the human, or at any rate a means of preventing much unnecessary misery.

The volume on Trade Unionism by Mr. W. A. Osborne, is an anachronism in this series. It is an attack upon the whole modern policy of trade unionism, and most of us are wearied of flogging a horse which though it might have passed off a winning post, is too aged to run another race. The volume should have been entitled "Insane Trade Unionism," for the very existence of trade unionism is dependent upon political action. Without political action trade unionism would have been impossible, and our Factory Acts have become dead letters. Workmen having grasped what their employers were quick to learn, that their executive power lay in the House of Commons, show no disposition to-day to reverse their policy.

In the Practical Side of Small Holdings, Mr. James Long, gives sensible advice, but the small-holder can learn nearly all this book contains in any elementary book on agriculture.

Mr. W. H. Dawson contributes to the series a very informative volume on "Industrial Germany."

I. F. GREIN

IN MY STUDY.

By ANTHONY DIANE
(Nisbet)

Sundry papers contributed to "The Treasury" by Mr. Anthony Deane have been collected and published by him in book form. Emphatically it was worth doing. Even when his pen loses its inspiration, and his Pegasus becomes such an ambling nag as Dr. Syntax bestrode, his pleasant genial humour always pervades his

And there are times when the reader's pleasure becomes a keen and enthusiastic delight. For Mr. Deane knows his rights. He pictures as Mr. Frankfort Moore instructive of Queen Anne's times is known in St. Paul's, delivered in more than one sense, for up into the most enormous very happy. He pictures the ladies' skirts are bl convex as Mr. Spectator is remarked. Mr. Deane adds what is, after all, a very shrewd and playful self would not have disdained the authorship of the chapter on the Fairyland book-store, where the books are, so to speak, turned topsy-turvy or inside-out, as in "Alice through the Looking-Glass," and "The Life of James Boswell, Esquire, by Dr Samuel Johnson," rubs shoulders with "Mrs Pepys Diary" on one side, and on the other with "Plain Words about Socrates, by Mrs Xantippe."

The author also discusses in more serious vein the value of our modern education. Does it repay the enormous labour spent upon it, the endless requirements concerning floor space, "hoppered" windows, the weighings, the measurements, and the working-out of "their health in printed tables to the decimal of a meal?"

If we were asked "What is the special value of these papers?" we should point to the literary criticisms, especially those that deal with Mr Deane's much-beloved eighteenth century. He is very emphatic, and rightly so on the "enormous skill" shown in Boswell's "Life of Johnson," on the art which conceals artifice. In giving you "the impression that he is merely an amiable and garrulous donkey, Boswell deliberately uses himself as a foil in order to display the character of Johnson." This is well put. Boswell is vindicated.

Mr Deane perhaps builds with too much assurance on a doubtful foundation when he finds a close resemblance between Goldsmith's picture of the lonely room in which "the muse found Scroggen stretched beneath a rug," and "The Dwellings of the Poor" in Crabbe's "Borough." Such resemblance as there is comes naturally enough when practically the same miserable dwelling is described. It might be more to the point to emphasise the likeness between Scroggen's room and the inn in "Sweet Auburn." Another subject, well adapted to the author's humour comes to his hand, when making an excursion into the by-paths of literature he finds the Duke of Buckingham, a well-known figure on the eighteenth-century stage boldly attempting to rewrite "Julius Caesar" in the polite and elegant diction then in vogue. No better example could be produced of the gulf that separates Shakespere from the classical school.

From Lohengrin
(Harnap)

"LIKE A MORNING CLOUD IN THE FIELDS OF AIR, THOU CANST IN SPLENDOR

THE JUDGMENT OF THE SWORD

By MAUD DIVER (a constable)

In this vivid chronicle of the disastrous retreat from Kabul, Mrs Diver has easily eclipsed her "Hero of Herat." Noble and stirring as was that account of Edward Pottminger's earlier achievements, it pales beside this glowing record of his trials and struggles when caught in the Afghan toils in 1841. "India fertile in heroes has shown since the days of Clive no man of greater and earlier promise than Edward Pottminger," wrote Sir Henry Lawrence. But even he has to share the interest of the reader with such officers as Broadfoot, Codrington and Haughton. The history

From The Art of the Great Masters
(Sampson Low)

risers times Lpi of the Dive blam

chapte
Chalde

History and Methods of Ancient and Modern Painting
(Chapman & Hall)

a decrepit and used-up soldier as Elphinstone. Equal blame, too, must be apportioned to the Government at home for its fatal parsimony in cutting down expenses, and not only that, but for its deliberate breach of faith. The miserable £3,000 deducted from the subventions granted to loyal Afghan chiefs might have been easily obtained by suppressing the useless Residency at Kabul, whose occupant chiefly concerned himself with his port, his maraschino and his salmon grills. Dramatic in the extreme is the contrast between the epicureanism of this lazy sensualist and the superhuman struggles of Pottinger and his friends.

HISTORY AND METHODS OF ANCIENT AND MODERN PAINTING.

By JAMES WARD. 2s 7s 6d
net (Chapman & Hall)

Mr Ward's volume covers much the same ground as M. A. P. Laurie's "Materials of the Painter's Craft," published three years ago. It is, however, decidedly more comprehensive. For go y pages are devoted to the art of which Mr Laurie did not touch, and the earlier on the painting methods of the ancient Egyptians, Assyrians, Persians, and Greeks, are particularly in condite. Egyptian wall-painting was the most of the arts of which we have historical knowledge.

It had but little structural value. "They had little regard," writes Mr Ward, "for the principles of constructive decoration, as their figures and other designs usually covered walls, piers, columns, and pylons alike, some of the figures occupying three or four courses of masonry in upright measurement, regardless of the joints and seams of the building." They did not understand the art of decorative space-filling. In spite of technical excellence in the handling of distemper, a fund of invention, and a wealth of colour, they never outgrew a certain artistic childishness. The neighbouring Chaldeans and Persians went much further in this direction, though it was less by their painting than their pottery and textiles that they became memorable. About Greek painting we knew, until comparatively recently, just as much as Pliny, another scribe and the Greco-Roman, copies in the catacombs told us. But the discoveries of Schliemann at Tiryns and Mycenæ, of fragments of painted plaster enriched our knowledge of Greek polychromy very considerably, and Sir Arthur Evans's excavations at Knossos lifted the veil still further. Mr Ward tells us that fragments painted in Buon Fresco were unearthed by the latter Buon Fresco in 1500 B.C. It makes the famous treatise of Cennino Cennini, not to mention "Vasari on Technique" seem purveyors of stale information. This book should be welcomed not only by the students for whom it is principally intended, but by the average amateur, who, if he is mostly vague about modern painting processes, is usually quite ignorant of the older ones.

THE PLAIN MAN AND HIS WIFE.

By ARNOLD BENNETT 25 Gd net (Hodder & Stoughton)

For intellectual anæmia we always prescribe a course of Arnold Bennett, and, like good doctors, we take our own physic. Whenever we begin to feel too complacent and comfortable, we reach down one of Mr Bennett's philosophical little manuals, and soon find the effect most bracing. In his latest book Mr Bennett seeks to read a lesson to the average man in the art of living, and first he draws an almost uncannily true picture of the life he leads. "The plain man on a plain day wakes up, slowly or quickly according to his temperament, and greets the day in a mental posture which might be expressed in words: 'O Lord! Another day! What a grind!'" "All means and no end" is how Mr Bennett characterises the average man's life. The men who are happy in the hours of business are few. The whole attitude of the average plain man to business implies

From The Art of the Great Masters
(Sampson Low)

THE MARTYRDOM OF ST. GEORGE,
(By Paolo Veronese)

that it is a nuisance, scarcely mitigated. His home does not bring him peace. The shadow of the next day is always upon him.

He stays up late at night, weary of impairing his vigour for the morrow, and even when he gets to bed he carries with him ten million preoccupations.

Having diagnosed the disease, Mr Bennett proceeds to tell the patient some plain truths. He tells the plain man to ask himself a fundamental question in some such form as the following:

"I am now this morning engaged in something rather tiresome. What do I stand to gain by it this evening, to-morrow, this week, next week?" In order to return a satisfactory answer, Mr Bennett insists on a thorough, honest self-examination. This knowledge of one's self, he observes, is about as difficult to acquire as a knowledge of Chinese. First, our plain man asks himself, "What am I and what bores me?" "Everybody has, or has had, a secret desire, a hidden leaning." For a most amusingly comprehensive omnium gatherum of interests which it is possible for a man to have, we suggest a careful reading of page 55, beginning with gardening and concluding with "even golf." When our plain man has discovered a long-forgotten enthusiasm he is to give it a chance of recaptivating him. "He must be ready to treat his hobby somewhat as though it were a woman desired—with splendid and uncalculating generosity," for a hobby demands real sacrifice.

Mr Bennett entitles his last chapter "In Her Place," and perhaps the plain man's wife as conceived by Mr Bennett will rather astonish the plain husband who reads the book, unless he is getting on in years, for Mrs Omicron is a Victorian. Nevertheless, there is no harm in being told again very plainly that the true secret of domestic happiness is sympathy.

Frontispiece to The Complaint Angler
(Foulsh). IZAAK WALTON
(By Jacob Huisman)

Topic: Chantilly in History and Art (Monday)

THE CHATEAU CHANT

CHANTILLY IN HISTORY AND ART

By Fourteen I know (Myself I know) With a 3 Illustration in the middle even is it (Myself)

[illegible]

SAMPLERS AND TAPESTRY EMBROIDERIES.

1.5 Mm x 1.5 Hm x 1.5 B With 4 colored Plates and 1 other Illustration 10 fold net (10 mm) Green 10 p

Old Edinburgh from Waverley Bridge.

Г. III The Charm of Edinburgh
(1 half 14 and 2)

• OLD EDINBURGH FROM WAVERLEY BRIDGE

pathetic. Some of the inscriptions, too, would be entirely pathetic if they were not pathetically humorous as, for instance

"And now my soul
another year
Of this short life is past
I cannot long continue here
And this may be my last"

The grave embroiderer of these lines was aged seven

We have but little space to speak of the tapestry embroidery discussed in this volume but Mr Hush's writing on the subject is full of first-hand knowledge, and this added to a delightful style of expression and magnificently reproduced examples make his book a veritable treasure

EDINBURGH REVISITED

By JAMES BONE With 8 Plates and 30 Illustrations in the text by HANSIE FLETCHER 5s net (Sidgwick & Jackson)

One of the most charming books on Edinburgh published

From Edinburgh Revisited
(Sidgwick & Jackson)

EDINBURGH FROM CALTON HILL

in recent years was "Edinburgh Revisited," in which Mr James Bone gave voice to "the impressions and opinions formed during a visit to Edinburgh in 1910 after a long stay in the South" and the present attractive volume is a revised edition of that book, which, although it is cheaper, it was published originally in a very elaborate manner contains an additional chapter and all the fine original illustrations of Mr Hansie Fletcher, who has not often done better work than here.

From Charles Conder His Life and Works
(Lane).

"FROM CONDER'S HOUSE"
(In the possession of Mrs. Richard Raphael)

From The China Collector
(Jenkins).

NANTGARW
laboric border of painted dwork of gold. Painted with and insects. See the of varkans. faintly impressed a raised scroll painted with

THE CHINA COLLECTOR.

By H. WILLIAM LEWER. With 1
(Herbert Jenkins, Ltd.)

Among the written by chu

oks, expens id
rs for china collectors and would-be china collectors.
Mr. Lewer's volume will take its place
as a practical help
and a sensible encouragement. We probably all know
the book which we take up with a light-hearted enthusiasm and lay down with a groan, balked by the amount of knowledge and money
necessary to us
before we can begin our quest as collectors. Mr. Lewer
instead of balking
us, encourages us,
trained enthusiasm
is, he says, the one thing needful - and
he proceeds to train

From More about "FIRING GLASS."
Collecting MASONIC DRINK-ING GLASS.
(Stanley Paul).

us The china he writes of is old English porcelain, and he pays his readers the compliment of taking for granted the fact that they are serious in their search for help and anxious to learn the essentials of the study of Ceramics. After a general chapter on china collecting, the author gives detailed chapters on the factories of the period which produced the treasures named "Old English," a period which, after all, stretches only from about 1750 to 1820. There were nearly a score of these factories, and this volume includes some beautiful illustrations, specially helpful because they represent the more general rather than the more elaborate pieces of porcelain. In addition to these extremely good reproductions, there are about two dozen plates giving authentic marks and signatures.

ENGLISH DOMESTIC CLOCKS.

By HERBERT CESCINSKY and MALCOM R. WEBSTER. Illustrated from Drawings and Photographs by the Author.
(Routledge.)

This handsome volume continues or supplements an earlier work on "English Furniture of the Eighteenth Century" by the same authors in which clocks were necessarily dealt with as only one of many details that belonged to the subject. They required a book to themselves, and Messrs. Cescinsky and Webster have here traced the clock fashions

From The China Collector
(Jenkins)

CHELSEA.

(1) Plate, painted in blue and white under-glass, in Chinese size Dia. 6½ ins.
Mark, blue anchor. (2) Plate, with raised scroll borders, painted with flowers. Size
Dia. 9½ ins. Mark, red anchor.

that have come into vogue and sometimes gone and come again from 1665 to the present day, and have done so in an entirely interesting and instructive way. They write of the problem of the measurement of time, the law of the pendulum; the regulation and mechanism of clocks; and enter into details of design—a history of the old long-case clock from its rise to its decline, and the introduction of the Chippendale and Sheraton clock cases, and an equally ample record of bracket clocks, and of mural and cartel clocks. It is a very ably-written well-informed book, that appeals to craftsman, dealer and collector alike, and will unquestionably take its place as the standard work on its subject.

JOSEPH KNIBB, LONDON
Month striking clock. Skeleton dial with minutes numbered. Case of oak veneered with laburnum banded with olive wood, and inlaid with marqueterie in oval and circular panels. In the possession of D. A. F. Wetherfield, Esq. 6 ft. 8 ins. high. 10 in. dial. Date about 1680.
From English Domestic Clocks (Routledge)

faith. It is with these various rebellions, and particularly with that of the West, that Miss Rose-Troup deals. The author shows a deep knowledge of her subject, and, while her book will appeal more strongly to the student than to the general reader, it is one which fully deserves to be read, if only for its lucid style and the elaborately-detailed description of an episode of history which has not yet been exploited as it deserves.

THE WESTERN REBELLION OF 1549

By FRANCES
ROSE-TROUP
With 6 Illustrations
net (Smith, Elder)

At the time of the Reformation the whole of England rose up against the changes brought about by King Henry VIII—a fact which, as the author points out, is not generally realised—and many prominent men lost their lives for the tenacity of the "old"

Antispiece to The Western Rebellion of 1549
(Smith, Elder)

THE BADGE OF THE FIVE WOUNDS.

From Byzantine and Romanesque Architecture
(Cambridge University Press)
(Reviewed in a recent number of THE BOOKMAN)

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From Ancient Art and Ritual
(Home University Library)
(Williams & Morrow)

THE APOLLO
BELVEDERE

ANCIENT ART AND RITUAL

By J. I. HARRISON (Williams & Morrow)

Assuredly this must be one of the most learned books of the "Home University Library." Not that the talented authoress sets out to frighten the general reader, but because the book teems with the results of the well-known learning of Miss Harrison. We may describe it as a plea for a restatement of the questions surrounding the meaning of art, and the restatement has to be made in terms of ritual.

Ritual is a bridge between life and art, and this bridge all men have to cross. So, if there be difficulties in Greek art or ritual, it is well to turn to Egyptian; if Egyptian will not make itself clear, then we must turn to savages, for every form of civilisation throws light on others. A most interesting feature of this little volume is the way in which modern scenes are compared and contrasted with ancient, sometimes rather disconcertingly, and it is refreshing to find a plea for a thoroughly modern art which is to look at life not only steadily, but at first hand, and with optimistic and exploring eye—and now the Futurists may count on the support of the archaeologist. We must add a word of congratulation to Professor Gilbert Murray and his co-editors; on the calm and sound judgment shown in the choice of subjects for this admirable series than in the authors that deal with them.

From Arthur Rackham's Book of Pictures
(Heinemann)

VIE DE BOHÈME

A Patch of Romantic Paris By ORLO WILLIAMS Illustrated 15s net (Martin Secker)

This book by Mr. Orlo Williams is quite a good one upon a very fascinating subject. From it the uninitiated, alike through the excellent pictures of a past age of Parisian life and of dead Parisian celebrities and by means of the author's sympathetic and intelligent text, will gain at least some idea of what Bohemianism was and is. It certainly

From Ancient Art and Ritual
(Williams & Morrow)

FRIEZE OF THE PARTHENON

is not and was not a pose, but a more or less definite expression of a mentality and even spirit. Loving and knowing Paris as we do we have read the book with particular interest and pleasure. The introduction is, we confess, somewhat "weighty," but when Mr. Williams gets to his subject, which is practically the Paris of the middle half of the last century, he shows that he has studied it, and mastered it, with a thoroughness which is often lacking in writers upon this period. Mr. Williams has, however, little patience with the modern Bohemian of Paris who is a Bohemian, he appears to think, because he wishes to adopt a code of lax morals rather than because he possesses the artistic temperament which distinguished his forerunners of old. The true Bohemianism, Mr. Williams asserts and insists, came to an end with Louis Philippe. All may not agree with him as to the precise date, but few will dispute that the "spirit" has evaporated during the last two decades. For ourselves we think it began earlier than Mr. Williams appears prepared to admit, and ended later. Surely Rousseau (for example) was a Bohemian if ever one existed? And coming down past Louis Philippe and his age, what about Verlaine, Rimbaud,

Frontispiece to Atta Troll (Sidgwick & Jackson)

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám
(Methuen)

QUATRAIN LXXIV "AH MCON OF MY DELIGHT WHO KNOW'ST NO WANE."

BOHEMIAN DAYS IN FLEET STREET

By A JOURNALIST 108 6d (John Long.)

That there are no days like the old days— that there something mean, cheap, and flat about to-day— is a c familiarised for humanity down the ages. The "Journalist" who is the anonymous author of "Bohemian Days in Fleet Street" is evidently so convinced of this that, after reading Philip Gibbs' "Street of Adventure," he sat down and turned out this entertaining collection of reminiscences just to show what a vastly superior place Fleet Street was in his time to the somewhat sober, nerve-wrecking district it has been portrayed to-day. Perhaps the concentration of the newspaper world into a few powerful hands has done something to eliminate the striking characters who haunted the street from 1870 to 1890—the period of which the author writes. The book is unquestionably the best collection of gossip about newspaper men that has appeared for many a day. The author's first real journalistic position was obtained by an introduction to Harrison Ainsworth, whom he paints as a cheerful, benevolent old gentleman with a very clear eye for the "main chance." He had acquired a magazine some time before, and, finding that its circulation did not come up to his expectations, he had resold it to a relative—a cousin of his own. It was on this short-lived paper, of which the author writes most amusingly, that he had his early training. It is impossible to give even an idea of the book, but his stories deal with everybody worth knowing, from Carlisle to Pigott the forger, from William Morris to "Jimmy" Davis. Regarding "Jimmy" Davis—who first made his name as a solicitor, then established a reputation by his papers, The Hats and The Phoenix, as one of the bitterest writers of our time, and finally ended his days as the author of a whole series of amazingly successful musical comedies—the author makes a curious mistake. He declares that Davis, after libelling Lord Durham, fled the country to avoid the results of the action brought against him. As a matter of fact, "Jimmy" went to prison gaily, and came out none the worse for his experience.

One of his best stories is about Father Healy, of Bray, who, dining one night at a house in London, found himself at the table with an Anglican bishop, whose air of easy condescension was almost more than the witty Irishman could stand. He bided his time, and at last the bishop gave him his opportunity. "I have lived sixty years in this wicked world," he exclaimed, "and I have never yet been able to see the difference between a good Catholic and a good Protestant." "Faith, me lord," answered Healy, "you won't be sixty seconds in the next before you'll know all about it."

He gives us a most illuminating glimpse of George Borrow, who, he says, firmly believed that he had personally experienced all the wildest transactions described in his "Bible in Spain." In a country inn Borrow pointed to a man sitting by himself in a and said in a stage whisper,

Reduced from The Coloured Plate presented with Pears' Annual, 1913.

THE OLD FARM.

"That man is a murderer. Finish your swipes. I'll tell you all about him when we get out." Borrow was as good as his word, and detailed graphically the horrible crime the man had committed and the means by which he had managed to escape justice. The author, out of curiosity, visited the inn the next day, to learn that the man in question was a simple, God-fearing, hard-working carter, against whose good reputation never a word had been uttered until George Borrow selected him as a peg on which to hang one of his lurid fancies. The author knows his subject thoroughly, and this is distinctly a book that everybody will enjoy reading, whether they are connected with the street of adventure or not.

A LEISURELY TOUR IN ENGLAND.

By JAMES JOHN HISSEY 10s net
(Macmillan)

The word "leisurely" suggests anything but a motor-car, and it is evident that, though Mr Hissey travelled at ease, he has none of the characteristics which have made motorists the "Enemies of the People." On the contrary, he reveals the very genius of the true wanderer, careless of his destination, ready at every step to linger or turn aside by the way, indifferent alike to speed or the guide-book. "My only care was, as far as possible, to find fresh roads to explore and taverns new wherein to take my ease." He avoided big towns, popular beauty-spots, and busy thoroughfares, thereby securing the real charm of travel, the unexpected adventure. Seldom deter-

From The Book of Psalms
(Hutchinson)

LET THEM BE AS CHAFF BEFORE THE WIND, AND LET THE ANGEL OF THE LORD CHASE THEM"

(Psalm xxxiv, v. 5.)

From A Sea Anthology
(Gay & Hancock).

"FROM THE DEEP ABYSS
ROLLS THE BLACK WIND-VEV'D SAND; AND EVERY JUTTING PEAK THAT DRIVES
IT BACK
RE-ECHOES WITH THE ROAR."

mining at dawn where that night should be spent, or by what paths he should ride during the day, he "trusted wholly to the fortune of the road, letting, so to say, the good things come to him, he did not go in search of them."

Mr Hissey quotes, with approval, the old saying that "The lane is a work of genius, the highway that of the engineer", and, being the master and not the slave of his car, he fearlessly explored so-called "bad roads," in pursuit of a whim, at the dictation of a sign-post, on the hint of a confiding wayfarer. It is, indeed, the traveller without responsibility who finds the treasure trove, and such methods enable our author to hunt out many an old manor-house of rare beauty and priceless historical associations. He has an eye for the quaint outline, the true charm of old-worldliness, the haunt of legend. He loves old inns and hidden churches, he has the instinct for extracting curious information. It would be hard to say whether he and his readers will value most what he has seen or heard.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

Perhaps the most interesting items of Mr Hissey's personally-acquired church lore, are the "small doorway on the north side of churches to let the Devil out when a child was baptised," kept open for the purpose, the old painter's bill, "To mending the commandments, altering the Belief, and making a new Lord's Prayer £1 10s", the epitaph, "a virtuous woman is 5s to her husband", and the tower believed to have been built "by the life-savings of two servants, a butler and a dairy-maid."

A reward of twenty pounds for "dragging the King out of bed on Easter Monday" opens a fascinating vista of possibilities for the place-hunter: the observation that "ants are throwing up their tiny heaps on the bowling-green" is an unfamiliar sign of good weather: and there is much pagan philosophy in the "rule of life" attributed to miners:

"Hear all, see all, say nought,
Eat well, drink well, and care nought,
If thou dost ought for nought
Do it for thyself."

Such are but a few out of many delightful, and unexpected discoveries of the countryside. Mr Hissey has further given us many pages of attractive description—of scenery, architecture, and people. He is equally persuasive and interesting as an observer or raconteur. He never wears by ornate language or idle superlatives. His tour should entice many from the beaten track: in their turn to echo his praises of quiet pathways, English landscapes, ancient buildings, and roadside inns—like that immortalised by Ashton-Sterry.

"'Tis a finely-toned, picturesque, sunshiny place
Recalling a dozen old stories,
With a rare, British, good natured, ruddy hued face,
Suggesting old wine and old stories
Ah! many's the magnum of rare crusted port,
Of vintage no one could cry lie on,
Has been drunk by good men of the old fashioned sort
At the Lion."

From The Wagner Stories
(Grant Richards)

KUNDVAT
(From a story)

G. C. Willemhurst

The Crescent Moon

THE HOME

(A room a drawing by Nan

(By R. Indramath Jagore, just published by Messrs. Macn

THE TRADE OF THE WORLD.

By JAMES & Hall)

net (Chap

Boldly planned and brilliantly executed, this American survey of the principal commercial forces in modern civilisation deserves wide and deep attention in our country. For it gives us an outside view of some of the chief problems in our own industrial expansion. We are treated, along with Germany, France, other European nations, and Japan as competitors in trade and finance against the United States. "Britain has bled herself too freely, and her heart now shows some signs of weakness," says our American critic. "But it is to the British nation, to its world-wide and broadcast sowing of right-thinking men and women that the world owes its progress in the last two centuries." In his opinion, it is with Germany that the advantage now lies in the struggle for the trade of the world. The United States is only preparing for the silent, bloodless fight for industrial dominion. Russia looms in the background, one of the grand factors in the future economic battle. France has already been hopelessly beaten by Germany, and England, though strong in finance, is going the way of France in the struggle for foreign markets. Canada, our American authority is confident, will become an economic province of the United States, and the British Empire will probably fall to pieces. The industrial power of Japan does not trouble Mr. Whelpley as it does many of his countrymen, he says that the Japanese worker is so slow and inefficient that he can never compete with the men of the white races.

ALL MEN ARE GHOSTS.

By L. P. JACKS. 5s net. (Williams & Norgate.)

We all remember Grant Allen's history of the Reverend John Creedy as one of the world's remarkable short stories. Can the Ethiopian change his skin? This was the text upon which Grant Allen wrote a commentary informed by all his knowledge of sociology and philosophy, and then artfully disguising his tract in the form of a magazine short story he wilfully deceived many guileless persons into reading it for the sake of pure amusement, and they never suspected it had any other design. The clover book before us now is suitably prefaced by a quotation from Vaughan, "Some strange thoughts transcend our wonted themes, and into glory peep." But Mr Jacks following upon the lines of Grant Allen, has not quite the same gift of deception, for the most casual reader will see there is more in these pages than meets the eye, and that the author intends you shall pause to think what the "something" is he wishes to imply and not to say. "Is the world one or many?—fated or free?—material or spiritual?"—"On such trifling notions Mr Jacks writes you a short story, and this book is a collection of these stories. They often contain a good deal of ironic suggestion. In the story about Farmer Jeremy and his Ways, for instance, where you are led into a discussion of Primitive Religion, you will meet with irony of a sufficiently appalling nature. But we must not be understood, in saying this, to refer to Farmer Jeremy's

From Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám
(Hodder & Stoughton)

QUATRAIN LXXIV: "AH, MOON OF MY DELIGHT WHO KNOW'ST NO WANE . ."

contention that "the land likes to be high-rented," though we imagine many a simple Pantheist sitting down to enjoy Mr Jack's stories may object to such a conclusion, and consider that that is carrying the thing a little too far, perhaps.

PERSONAL EXPERIENCES IN SPIRITUALISM

By HEReward CARRINGTON With 22 Illustrations
7s 6d net (Laurie)

Mr Hereward Carrington is a convinced believer in spiritualism and a well-known authority upon the subject. This attractive collection of some of the most striking experiences which have befallen him is therefore assured of its audience, and we have no doubt whatever that they will be deeply interested in the remarkable collection presented between the covers of this book. As we have said, Mr Carrington's attitude towards his subject is one of belief and sympathy, but it must not be imagined that he is not a skilled detector of fraud. He is—one of his principal duties, in fact, as a psychical researcher, has been to expose fraudulent mediums. There are some cases, however, which he believes admit of no material explanation, and the most important of these is that of the famous Eusapia Palladino. The second half of this book is devoted to that medium's American séances, while the first half is mostly a record of the frauds practised by other mediums. The volume is fully illustrated and is one that is well worth reading.

From Joseph and his Brethren
(Lane).

JOSEPH.
Drawing by Dorothy Parker.)

THE WATER SELLER
From the paper jacket of All Men are Ghosts
(Williams & Norgate).

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

*Frontispiece to The Jackdaw of Rheims
(Gay & Hancock)*

ACROSS UNKNOWN SOUTH AMERICA.

By A HENRY SAVAGE-LANDOR
Plates, and 200 Illustrations
Author 2 Vols 30s. With 2 Maps, 8 Col from Photographs by
(Hodder & Stoughton)

In these two magnificent volumes Mr Landor has given us a full, vivid, and startling account of his recent wanderings in the wildest parts of Brazil, and across South America to the Peruvian Andes. His narrative is one of extraordinary difficulties successfully encountered. The vile cowardice and cupidity of his followers (the very dregs of Brazilian prisons, for the most part), the attacks of fever, the evils of starvation and fatigue, and all the mysterious dangers of the forest, made his undertaking one of almost superhuman effort. The value Brazilians put upon it may be gauged by the fact that the Congress voted him £4,000 in recognition of his great services.

The story of his adventures can be divided into four parts. The first deals with his arrival in Brazil (January 9th, 1911), of the arrangements for his exploration, and of his plunge into the wilderness with a handful of ruffians and an elaborate convoy of stores and scientific apparatus. In a purely human sense this is the most fascinating part of all. Mr Savage-Landor's description of the primitive Brazilians of the far-land settlements is highly instructive. With one accord they seem to be idiotic, conceited, ignorant ruffians, whose chief pleasure in life appears to be assassination, and who are not merely unattractive but utterly lacking in any kind of virtue or good quality whatsoever. No wonder they almost drove him into frenzies of irritation. But he had resolved never to lose his temper (oh, wisest of men), and he never did. In this part of his travels his hardships were often acute, but never desperate. Had it not been for the folly of his companions, who wasted their stores of food and ammunition without a thought, they would have had a comparatively easy time of it. But as it was, their stores began to give out and they had to turn aside to Diamantino to replenish their supplies. Had they held on straight for Manaus, as he had planned, they would all have perished in the bush.

The whole of the opening volume is concerned with this first part of the undertaking. In it we are introduced into the most savage, untrodden part of Central Brazil. It must be owned that pictorially we get a shock of disillusionment. Instead of being a land of vast, teeming forests, of innumerable birds and butterflies, of hordes of Indians, it is a flattish and nearly deserted land of pampas and swelling plains. Mr Savage-Landor was chiefly impressed by its immense possibilities for the grazing of countless herds. It is such land that, in his opinion, will help to make Brazil the greatest country of the future.

But in the second part of the story, the journey in canoe down the River Arinos, we are introduced into country more closely resembling the tropical Brazil of travellers' tales. This episode opened auspiciously (the volatile Brazilians being delighted to exchange the saddle for the paddle), but it ended with a disastrous series of accidents. They again began to run frightfully short of food, the men developed an ominous state of incipient mutiny, and more than once the rapids nearly ended the lives of all. But Mr Savage-Landor, with his cat-like energy, with his resource and courage, brought the cruise to what one may call "a successful termination." At any rate, if he lost almost everything else he saved his life, his photographs, and the lives of his followers. It is a fine chapter in the history of dogged perseverance.

Part three, his two journeys through the dark horrors of the forest with two followers (the rest temporarily left behind), where they were actually sixteen days without food, is by far the most terrible section of the book. The story of how, starving, covered with bites and sores, with sinking strength, and without hope, they struggled on to the river's brink and built a raft, and had the amazing good fortune to meet in mid-stream some friendly canoes full of rubber collectors, resembles the incredible adventures of a Ballantyne or a Captain Marryat. This is the crown of the whole book, a feat of daring and endurance that can seldom have been equalled in the astonishing annals of adventure. But Mr Savage-Landor makes so light of it all in the simplicity of his realism that one has to rub one's eyes and read it all over again. It is like a dreadful glimpse into the sombre heart of the wilderness.

From The Open Road (Ward, Lock).

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

At the close of this adventure Mr Savage-Landor suffered so severely from fever and prostration that it was not thought possible he could live. But he not only recovered but resolved to pursue to the bitter end the plan he had set himself — which was to cross over the Andes and reach the Pacific Coast. And this he accomplished without any great hazard or discomfort. After his other adventures Mr Savage-Landor may have thought so lightly of this deed that he did not think it worth while dwelling on too fully, but, however that may be, this section is one which we would gladly have seen expanded. For in itself, it is a feat which requires an uncommon amount of determination and grit. The author of this article has penetrated the Peruvian Andes to some small extent, but he has never descended eastwards below 12,000 feet, and he has heard quite sufficient of that journey to make him shudder.

Enough has been said to prove that Mr Savage-Landor has produced a singular and striking book. It is written in a very decided manner, but in its egotism it is not bombastic. It is the narrative of a wonderfully assured man, of a man who knows his own mind, who is ignorant of fear, and who has been touched to the very core of his being by the romance of adventure. The style is direct and vigorous, though it is wanting in just those finer shades which makes the travel-book a classic. Mr. Savage-Landor will never write an "Arabia Deserta," or "A Naturalist on the Amazons." He has not the magic touch which can transform the grandeur of the forest into the printed page. But his descriptions are not lacking in sturdiness or observation. And, indeed, how could he fail to enliven the blood when he has unknown South America for his subject? Imagine these ghost-like forests, as silent as the grave, and where the trees are so eaten into by termites and so full of water, that they often fall down if you lean against them? No wonder that savages have a horror of woods!

The photographs that accompany Mr. Savage-Landor's text are very numerous, but somewhat disappointing. They add to our interest without exciting it unduly. Of more value are the two maps. For they help materially to show us the course of Mr Savage-Landor's year-long wanderings, which, in the very nature of a book like this, are apt to be far from clear in the reader's mind. Even more than pictures are maps an incentive to imaginative grasp of such a subject.

RICHARD CURLE

From Arthur Rackham's Book of Pictures (Heinemann)

ONCE UPON A TIME.

THE WORLD'S ROMANCES

Dante and Beatrice and Kilnugh and Olwen. 1s. net each.
(Nelson)

If cheapness be a matter of comparison, then many of the cheapest editions of the classics, and other literature which flood the market to day, must be reckoned expensive when set against these two volumes of this remarkable new series of "The World's Romances." Messrs Nelson have always been the pioneers of the cheap book, but if this latest series of theirs fulfils the promise of these earliest volumes, they will, surely, justifiably claim to have broken all records in regard to value. Bound in a large square shape in a strong, handsome binding, with

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From Abbeys, Castles, and Ancient Halls of England and Wales
(Warne)

DOVER CASTLE.

her son was a year old, "certain that it will help you to admire God's Providence." It is an extremely interesting record of the life of a courageous, reverent, and unlucky woman, and Mrs Le Blond has done well in translating it, for it is a genuine contribution to literature.

CHRISTINA OF DENMARK, DUCHESS OF MILAN AND LORRAINE, 1522-1590

By JULIA CARTWRIGHT (MRS ADY) With 22 Illustrations
18s net. (Murray)

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF CHARLOTTE AMÉLIE, PRINCESS OF ALDENBURGH, 1652-1732.

Translated from the French of the Original Manuscript, and Edited by Her Descendant, MRS AUBREY LE BLOND
With 17 Illustrations 15s net (Nash)

From the point of view of the writer of this short note it is a little trying to find that the publishers of this book have been beforehand in making a résumé of the interesting introduction with which Mrs Aubrey Le Blond prefaces her translation of the autobiography of her ancestress. This résumé, moreover, is printed on the paper cover of the book—the most conspicuous position—and it is almost impossible to write a note on the book without paraphrasing it. Still, it is necessary that the reader should have some idea as to the identity and the personality of Charlotte Amélie, and we shall therefore quote from the publisher's note "Charlotte Amélie was a member of the family of de la Trémouille . . . and a granddaughter of Marie de la Tour d'Auvergne (sister of the famous general Vicomte de Turenne). She left France as a girl owing to religious persecution and lived in Denmark with her cousin the Queen. Three Kings and numerous German Princes proposed to her, but she gave her hand to Anthony I, Count of Aldenburgh." Six months afterwards her husband was poisoned at the instigation of the heir-presumptive, a villain who later tried to rob Charlotte Amélie's son of his inheritance. Charlotte Amélie, therefore, travelled to Vienna to seek the protection of the Emperor, and she started her autobiography when

The life-story of Christina of Denmark, so ably told by Mrs Ady, is interesting to an English public for two reasons, first, because her portrait in the National Gallery is one of the most famous and most successful examples of the art of Holbein, and secondly, because she had an opportunity of being numbered among the wives of Henry VIII. But though she was spared this she experienced many other troubles. "She lost her first husband," in the words of the author, "at the end of eighteen months. Her second husband, Francis, Duke of Lorraine, died in 1545, leaving her once more a widow at the age of twenty-three. Her only son was torn from her arms while still a boy by a foreign invader, Henry II., and she herself was driven into exile. Seven years later she was deprived of the regency of the Netherlands, just when the coveted prize seemed within her grasp, and the last days of her existence were embittered by the greed and injustice of her cousin, Philip II." There in brief is the tragic story of the

From Westminster Abbey
(Seeley).

HENRY VII'S CHAPEL (EXTERIOR).
(By H. Raiton.)

original of Holbein's Duchess of Milan, a story which Mrs. Ady has clearly spared no pains to make as complete and authoritative as possible, and the result is a biography which deserves to be in many hands this Christmas

REMINISCENCES, SERMONS, AND CORRESPONDENCE

By AUGUSTA E. STETSON, C.S.D.
With 10 illustrations 21s net (Putnam)

This is a very long "specialist" book, of a kind which can hardly be expected to appeal to the general reading public in this country, although no doubt it will be found interesting and satisfying by people of the writer's way of thinking. Mrs. Stetson was the Pastor of the First Church of Christ (Scientist) in New York—an office to which she was ordained in 1890, and from which she resigned in 1909. Her correspondence mostly takes the form of encouraging letters to her supporters, and a considerable portion of the book is more or less polemical and apologetic. As it is beyond our scope here to criticise it in detail, we can say no more than that it seems to us interesting and well put together.

ENGLISH TRAVELLERS OF THE RENAISSANCE.

By CLARE HOWARD 7s 6d net (John Lane)

This book is the outcome of a study, evidently pursued con amore, of Renaissance travel—the journeys for adventure and education undertaken in the days before steam and electricity—to say nothing of photography, travel-books, and newspapers—had dispelled the elements of peril and surprise. From the chapter on "The Beginnings of Travel for Culture," which includes the pilgrimages at the close of the Middle Ages, the travels of scholars to distant centres of learning, and the errands of courtiers to acquire foreign tongues and new ideas of statecraft, we pass to the travel of the Elizabethan period, into which there entered a more scientific and military spirit, the educative influences being still borne in mind. In a succeeding chapter the author describes a phase of reaction against travel in England, resulting in satires on the foreign airs and graces acquired by the Englishman abroad, and much resentment against the heretical opinions on religious and social questions imbibed by students and others from contact with the Continental mind. The quickening of animosity between Protestants and Catholics played also a part in this change of attitude, and, indeed, introduced some very real perils to the Englishman trained in Protestantism who ventured into Catholic countries without a clear recognition of the necessity for extreme vigilance. In the chapter on "The Grand Tour" we learn of the revival of the idea of developing personal culture by travel, but by that time considerations of fashion and "deportment" had grown up, and the "governor," or tutor, was regarded as an indispensable companion to the young man on tour. Then came

FOUNTAINS ABBEY

From Abbeys, Castles, and Ancient Halls of England and Wales
(Warne)

From Westminster Abbey
(Seeley).

WESTMINSTER ABBEY FROM DEAN'S YARD.
(By H. Ralston)

*From Scott's Last Expedition
(Smith, Elder)*

THE FREEZING UP OF THE SEA.

decadence—religion, scholarship, adventure, fashion, had enjoyed each their turn, and with the approach of our own prosaic days much of the dignity of travel departed. With its twelve illustrations from old pictures and engravings, and its citations from travel documents of the past, the book is a welcome study of an attractive phase of our social history.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

By W J LOFTIE 6s (Seeley, Service & Co)

This new edition of Mr Loftie's excellent book on Westminster Abbey is enhanced by the very fine illustrations of Mr Herbert Railton. The book is quite one of the best on the subject and deserves to rank with Messrs. Woodruff's and Dank's "Memorials of Canterbury." There is nothing omitted which is of importance, and the reader will find here much information which he will seek in vain elsewhere. For example, the author takes the trouble to tell the reader why Westminster Abbey is called an abbey and St Paul's called a cathedral. "St Paul's is an establishment which consisted of secular canons whose business it was to maintain Divine worship in the church under their charge. Each of them had his estate to which he could retire at intervals, and there is reason to believe that before the twelfth century many of these canons were married men with families. In an establishment like that of St Peter, at Westminster, on the other hand, Divine service was maintained by monks, and the church, instead of being the first object for which the establishment existed, was only a chapel of the monastery."

*From Scott's Last Expedition
(Smith, Elder)*

AN 'OUTLET GLACIER' VALLEY COMPLETELY FILLED WITH LOOKING UP THE FERRAR GLACIER TO THE SOUTH-WEST.

ANNALS OF A LANCASHIRE VILLAGE.

By CLARE DORNING 3s 6d (Digby, Long)

This little book is a collection of character sketches, some humorous and some sad, and all told with an understanding and sympathy that make them alive. Miss Dorning has the gift of observation, and she is especially successful in putting on paper the many quaint and amusing sayings of her village folk. Though some may call it small beer, the book is admirably successful in rendering the spirit and atmosphere of village life in an age just past.

MOTOR WAYS IN LAKE-LAND.

By GEORGE D. ABRAHAM 7s 6d net (Methuen)

Although we cannot claim, as Mr. Abraham can, a lifelong knowledge of the Lake Country, we have had the pleasure of wheeling our way along most of its roads, and we can fully endorse his claim that "Every lake and every valley is worthy of exploration, and the roads are remarkably good, though sometimes there is a spice of adventure in their conquest." The adventure will, however, be more pleasing than risky to anyone who arms himself with the information here given. The author makes a special feature of the hills and their gradients, and ends with a summary of routes and distances. But before we come to the end of the volume, we are treated to other things than motoralities. There are yarns of the old

From Scott's Last Expedition
(Smith, Elder)

EVENING SCENE IN THE PARK.

From Scott's Last Expedition
(Smith, Elder).

THE MOUTH OF DRY VALLEY, SHOWING THE COMMONWEALTH GLACIER DEBOUCHING INTO IT FROM THE SOUTH

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From The Land of the Blue Poppy
(Cambridge University Press).

FRANCIS GARNIER PEAK (14,000) AT THE HEAD OF THE CHUN-TSUNG-LA.

type of Cumberland fell men, notes on mountain climbing, and some very effective descriptions of the Lake District scenery. We are also pleased to find that Mr Abraham has a tilt at the speed fiend "It is sacrilege to rush through such spots. Is it not a reflection upon motoring habits that a wayside halt at once suggests that something must be wrong (with one's car)?" A particularly useful and sane volume of advice and information of Indian History and Topography. The chapter "Bits about Bears" is both amusing and interesting. The author remarks with reference to bears, "that the tameness or interest of the sport of bear shooting lies with the sportsman, if you go out on a twilight night in June, and play 'here we go round the mulberry bush' with a bear, or simply sit in or near the mulberry trees until he comes, and then blow his head off, I confess it is not very interesting or exciting shikar. Sometimes" he goes on to say, "you sit up all night, and perhaps a bear never comes, or if he does come you see but little and blaze off at an indistinct mass, which you may or may not hit." "Some Pages from the Life of a Bear" is really a most interesting chapter well worth reading, and gives a vivid impression of the bear's life. Shooting mountain sheep in the Himalayas must be even more exciting than chamois hunting in the Alps. A word of praise must be given to the excellent reproductions of interesting photographs which adorn the book; they are not only well reproduced but well chosen, and illustrate the subject in every variety of aspect, adding no little to the charm and general interest of the volume. There are some particularly good ones of scenes in the mountain ranges. There is an appendix containing information relating to gamelore, questions of licenses, routes, etc., which will be useful to sportsmen.

SPORT AND FOLK-LORE IN THE HIMALAYA

By H. L. HAUGHTON. Illustrated. 12s 6d, net
(Edward Arnold)

This handsome volume is far more readable than many of a similar kind we have come across for one thing it is unpretentious in style, and for another the author has the gift of jotting down interesting and unusual facts and incidents. In the first chapter entitled "Tales of Fair Kashmir" the author throws some light upon a point which must have puzzled many, namely, the fact that there are two names for many of the places and other things in Kashmir. This has arisen very largely from the fact that the "Sahib-Log" failed to catch exactly the right, and native, pronunciation of certain words, and eventually the servants of the Europeans took their pronunciation from their masters, and so the two names grew up side by side, often to the puzzlement of students

From A Naturalist in Western China (Mothuen).

THE LACQUER-VARNISH TREE
(Rhus Vernicifera).

From Sport and Folk-Lore in the Himalaya (Arnold).

HIMALAYAN VIEW

JAPAN'S INHERITANCE

The Country, its People, and their Destiny.

By L. BRUCE MITFORD, F.R.G.S. With 12 Maps and Plans and 75 Illustrations from Photographs. 10s. 6d net (Unwin)

This excellent piece of work, by Dr Bruce Mitford is, for the most part, an essay in the science of geography, as newly expounded. That is to say that a study of the characteristics of the country affords data for a study of its inhabitants and for the reasons for its development along certain lines. The visions of dullness aroused by this statement may be banished immediately from the reader's mind. Mr. Bruce Mitford has a sense of humour and he has travelled widely in the lesser-known parts of Japan, where one may still have curious and sometimes uncomfortable experiences. The later chapters of the book are devoted to a study of Japanese society, religion, and government, and of her empire, and prospects for the future. Written from what is clearly a very wide and sympathetic knowledge of the Japanese nation and character, "Japan's Inheritance" should do much to explain a point of view which few Europeans have troubled even to try to understand. The volume is fully and well illustrated.

From Japan's Inheritance (Unwin).

WILLIAM AUGUSTUS, DUKE OF CUMBERLAND.

His Early Life and Times. 1721-1748

By [The Hon. EVAN CHARTERIS.] 12s. 6d net. (Edward Arnold.)

In the history of our country certain battle-fields retain an imperishable place in our minds and memories. In England such names as Hastings, Marston Moor, Blenheim, Sedgemoor, carry with them a distinct impression like a colour, emphasising either love of country, love of king, love of glory, or the bitter sorrow of defeat. In Scotland that land of conflict, there is no sadder name than Culloden. Around it songs are sung, verses made, tales still weaved—such an abundance of romance and poetry as surely no battle ever inspired before. It has worked itself into the national life. It stands like a monument raised to self-sacrifice, it has, one fears, obliterated real issues in the glamour that has fallen across the years.

Behind all the blood and smoke of the '45 stands the sombre figure of the Duke of Cumberland, reviled as "The Butcher," because he acted with a harshness unprecedented even in an age not associated with leniency.

Mr Charteris, in his most admirable study of the life and times of Cumberland, does not set out to "whitewash" his subject. There is nothing sensational in

FUJI FROM LAKE MOTOSU THE PARASITIC GONE IN THE LEFT MIDDLE DISTANCE IS MARUYAMA ("ROUND MOUNTAIN.")

From Reminiscences of a South African Pioneer, Second Series
(Unwin)

THE OLD OX WAGON.

the book. Cumberland is just the methodical, coarse, conscientious and unattractive man we believed him to be. True, Mr. Charteris has made an effort to prove how clever and fascinating he was as a child, in just the same way as all biographers of royal personages have done. That he could speak various languages when other children are playing hide-and-seek is very similar to the anecdotes of his rival, Charles Edward Stuart, who, for all his diligence, could not even spell simple English as an elderly man. Such things are better ignored. The main difficulty that confronted Mr. Charteris was the fierce antipathy to the Duke. To pacify this he set about making Cumberland a much-injured and misrepresented person. He mentions him as a general who commanded a greater number of troops than Wellington or Marlborough, a creature of genial and sturdy temperament, and a political force to be considered. Let us take these points in their order omitting only the last, which Mr. Charteris has not dealt with in this volume.

Now to the ordinary person, and in military matters most of us are very ordinary persons indeed—the fame or obscurity of a commander rests upon his success or failure. For, after all, that is the practical (though possibly unreasonable) test of a general. If he does not win, his retreat, no matter how impressive, will leave the man in the street comparatively cold. The Duke certainly was in command of very large bodies of men. That he was popular with them we gather from our author, who mentions with gratification that at Culloden they shouted, "Now Billy for Flanders!" From a casual study of his campaigns one can only admire their high spirits.

But grant him his popularity (which, however, was not sufficient to keep his statue intact for very long), and certainly every bluff, rubicund, hard-living officer has won the admiration of his men far more easily than such leaders as Wellington—allow that he was looked up to after Culloden by troops more accustomed to running than

From Thirty Years in Kashmir
(Arnold)

AT THE FOOT OF THE KHARDONG PASS.
(From a photograph by Mr. G. Mills.)

facing cold steel—but do not let us pretend that the judgments of history are false and that Cumberland was a distinguished tactician. According to Mr Charteris he nearly did this, and he might have done that but the fact remains that the '45 affair was his solitary achievement, and those who care to study the conditions of the two armies in that engagement, will realise that it would have been a wondrous piece of stupidity had the Duke not been, to quote Mr Charteris, "the hero of Culloden." He towered admittedly above such pantomime artists as Cope and Hawley, he carried out his plans skilfully and methodically and with rigorous determination, but it is new to learn that he had more eminent qualities than we have hitherto supposed.

The truth of the matter is, that apart from Culloden and what it entailed, nobody has the smallest interest in the Duke of Cumberland. In other words, had the Duke not fought at Culloden no one to-day, including Mr Charteris, would have bothered two pins about him. On the Continent they did not capture him because he was their best friend in war—at home he was only exploited as a royal person gifted with a little more than mediocre intelligence.

No one in his senses can deny that there were not gross atrocities after Culloden. Anyone who is familiar with the class of soldiery Cumberland commanded would look for such behaviour. It is also essential to remember the bitter hatred that the English had for the Highlander, a hatred that can be compared to the treatment of Red Indians by the American Government. But in defending the Duke Mr Charteris weakens his case considerably by laying stress on anecdotes and insignificant evidence. He replies, for instance, that the Jacobites were no better. This is not true, but for the moment let us suppose it is. What does it amount to? Now, if the American Government had remarked in all gravity, "We cut them to pieces because they skinned us," the statement would not have relieved them of an odious crime against humanity. And Mr Charteris bases his accusation on the most slender ground. He quotes a letter, written by the Duke to Newcastle, with reference to the affair at Clifton in which Cumberland asserts that the Highlanders gave no quarter. Now, to fling an assertion of this sort wholesale is unfair. The engagement at Clifton was a lonely skirmish on a miniature scale, fought in the dark, and by the rearguard of the Jacobite army. Someone may have shouted, "No Quarter," there is no evidence to suppose that it was the official order for the day.

From The Old Transport Road

By Stanley Portal Hyatt, which Mr Melrose will publish in the Spring of 1914

Let us examine the position at the time of the '45. The Highlands had long been the scene of serious menace to the Government, the Highland chiefs were unscrupulous and disloyal and in so far as Cumberland deemed it expedient

From The Old Transport Road

By Stanley Portal Hyatt, which Mr Melrose will publish in the Spring of 1914

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From Athletics in Theory and Practice
(Hutchinson)

WALKING, OLYMPIC GAMES, 1912 GOULDING (CANADA),
WINNER

to punish with severity he must be treated with reason and not foolish partizanship. That Cumberland acted in accordance with the panic-stricken wishes of the Cabinet and the country at large is probably not fully appreciated, that it was a brutal age and that his troops were drawn from the lowest scum of the slums is also not sufficiently remembered, but that he, as Walpole remarked, "loved blood like a leech," is difficult to explain away. Tradition is too strong, even though, as Mr Charteris observes of the Lyon in Mourning, it may be a "hotbed of recriminations." Recriminations are often the warmer when they have the inspiration of injustice.

That there were seventies Mr Charteris allows. That it was an age of severity does not greatly help us out. But whether he was as cruel as we imagined or only as cruel as it was customary to be, does not affect opinion at this lapse of time. Cumberland is doomed to unpopularity whether he was cruel or not. Who could sustain popularity when confronted with the glamorous figures of Prince Charlie and Flora Macdonald? Though Mr Charteris will shrug his shoulders at such a profane standpoint one must admit that dullness was Cumberland's as it was the Georges' unforgivable sin. Against that nothing can avail, certainly not the meagre explanations and counter-charges that the author has gathered together. The thing does not depend on historical data, and so far as Mr Charteris hoped to win people to sympathy with the Duke we fear his book has not succeeded.

For history may pass its verdicts, but popular opinion flings them down. There is in the heart of all of us a love for colour and a joy in romance, especially for the side that loses, and there is a movement and a glamour in the '45 that is not false nor theatrical, but very chivalrous and profound.

Mr. Charteris has written an interesting and unbiassed book, and his picture of social life in Georgian times is most effective. His vigorous treatment of his subject, his sound historical accuracy, and his handling of battle-fields (particularly Fontenoy) are most admirable. That he has not established the subject of his study well, we feel sure, make him infinitely more popular than if he had, and sympathisers with the Stuart cause will purchase his book with pleasant anticipations, which will not be disappointed.

FREDERICK WATSON

From The Surgeon's Log "TWO! WOMEN WERE DRESSING FOR CRAB"
(Chapman & Hall)

ATHLETICS IN THEORY AND PRACTICE

By F. W. HJERNBERG. Illustrated (Hutchinson & Co.)

From The Silent India
(Blackwood).

Now that the question of national support for British competitors at the next Olympic games is so much to the fore, this book written by the coach of the Swedish team, who was formerly coach to the Columbia University Irish-American Athletic Club, and the Manhattan Athletic Club, should prove interesting to many amateur athletes. All branches of sport which come under the general title of athletics are ably and lucidly dealt with, and valuable hints are given on training, diet, care of the skin, treatment of injuries, sleep, attire and other important matters including the arrangement of athletic meetings. A special feature of the book is its numerous, excellent, but not always quite clearly reproduced, photographs of athletic events. These should be particularly useful to amateurs, as many of them were taken at the Olympian games, and, therefore, are pictures of champions in the various events. In this excellent book the smallest details have been carefully attended to, even the question of how the holes should be dug for the feet to enable a runner to get the very best start off in sprinting and long-distance running. At the end of the book are some useful tables showing schemes for training for the various events mentioned in the book. We can thoroughly recommend this little volume to would-be and actual athletes. The former will find much of interest and importance, and even the latter, we fancy, will gain some valuable hints.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From The Bonds of Africa
(Long).

RETICULATED GIRAFFE,
NORTHERN GUABO
NYIRO RIVER

THE BONDS OF AFRICA

By OWEN LETCHER, F.R.G.S. With about 50 Illustrations from Photographs and a Map 12s 6d net (Long)

"The Bonds of Africa" consists of a series of the impressions of one who has travelled about Africa for the last eleven years and knows the continent, if not perhaps inside out, at least very thoroughly—the countries dealt with by the author being Rhodesia, Mashonaland, Portuguese East Africa, Nyasaland and the Lower Zambesi, the East Coast, British East Africa, Uganda, and Egypt. The experiences of a wanderer of this description should obviously be interesting, and Mr Owen Letcher does not disappoint. Perhaps he is a little too fond of the purple passage, but he has many excuses for his indulgence and he does not allow his pen or his feelings to suffer with him. In fact, "The Bonds of Africa" is quite a fine book and that is well worth getting.

FAIRSHIELS: MEMORIES OF A LAMMERMOOR PARISH.

By T. RADCLIFFE BARNETT. Price 2s 6d (Oliphant, Anderson & Fernier)

These pleasant idylls of a Scottish hamlet, while carrying here and there a reminder of Alexander Smith, have their own individual note. The author has gleaned "the harvest of a quiet eye" in his descriptions of the country of the Lammermoor hills with its rolling pastures and fragrant pine woods. There are flower fancies, sketches of manse and village life, garden musings, and a chapter on "An old Secession Kirk," full of happy touches. Here is one concerning John Cooper, one of the former ministers at the kirk. "It was this Cooper, of the pawky wit, who said that at the last great judgment day, when the secrets of all hearts were revealed, there would be none from Fairshiels. Which would appear to mean that we are fine claspers." For the benefit of the Southern reader we translate the last word as "gossips" that the point

From Fairshiels (Oliphant, Anderson, and Fernier)

MIDSUMMER HEAT AT COSTERTON

may stand revealed. There is a delicate pastoral charm and freshness about the work that will make it especially grateful to the town reader. And it is not obtrusively Scottish—it belongs only in spirit to the Kailyard School. The book, which is in its second edition, contains twelve illustrations of the scenes and people described.

A CHRONICLE OF THE ARCHBISHOPS OF CANTERBURY

By A. E. McKILLIAM, M.A. With Portraits 7s 6d net
(James Clarke & Co.).

To have made the chronicles of the Archbishops of Canterbury interesting, even fascinating, to the general reader, as well as to the clergyman and the historian, may seem something of an achievement. Mr McKilliam has undoubtedly succeeded in doing so, and his account of the first Archbishop, the great Augustine of the seventh century, is as good to read and as vivid as that of the men of the nineteenth century. By his own clear realisation of the Early Christian missionaries, their landing on the Isle of Thanet and their settlement at Canterbury, he has presented them to us as living men, not as archaic figures. This is all the more admirable when we consider that he has not yielded to the temptation to popularise his subject by writing with the freedom of the novelist at the

From The Strand of Mercy
(Hutchinson).

WOUNDED JAPANESE BROUGHT INTO CAMP UNDER THE RED CROSS FLAG.
(Hutchinson, Underwood.)

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

*From A British Chaplain in Paris
(Chapman & Hall)*

A PARIS PROMENADE IN 1801-2
(From the Coloured Aquarelle of J. P. Debucourt.)

expense of verity. Mr McKilham has evidently searched and delved for facts, and he presents them in clear, terse form. There are ninety-four archbishops in our Church's history, a notable tale of men from Augustine to Randall Davidson. And when we remember that the list includes such names as Lanfranc, Anselm, Thomas à Becket, Stephen Langton, Henry Chichele, Thomas Cranmer, William Laud, Gilbert Sheldon, and Archibald Campbell Tait, we know that the author has had dramatic as well as critical periods to deal with. This volume necessarily, and cleverly, gives a continuous picture of English history as a background to its prominent figures—an impressive piece of work which he may base his own independent conclusions, or better still, proceed to make an extended study of the comic dramatists of the Restoration (as they are usually styled), for himself. For such is the subject. Mr Palmer deals in detail with Etherage, Wycherley, Congreve, Vanbrugh, and Farquhar, illustrating his points and pleas by judicious and enlightening citations from the plays, the whole being so arranged that despite the fair measure of quotation, the work does not lose coherence and unity. He considers the plays and the dramatists in relation to the manners, conventions and notions of their time, and on the whole makes a clever and interesting defence of them against the narrow, and in the real sense uncritical judgment of Macaulay and others. The work in fact is a notable apologia, and both from the historical and critical points of view, is undoubtedly valuable. Mr Palmer modestly disclaims the notion of writing for specialists. We doubt that the number of specialists on this ground is very large. But there must be many, who have accepted the popular prejudice against the Restoration playwrights, and this book may chasten them and change their general attitude.

*From The Comedy of Manners
(Bell)*

ENGRAVING OF A SCENE FROM FARQUHAR'S "RECRUITING OFFICER."

THE COMEDY OF MANNERS.

By JOHN PALMER.
Illustrated.
(G Bell & Sons)

Mr Palmer has given us a piece of critical and interpretive work that is sometimes lively and generally illuminating. At the same time, he takes his theme or themes in serious wise and affords the student a wealth of material on

From "The Fairy Book," by Mrs. Craik
With 38 Illustrations in colour by Warwick Goble
Published by Macmillan & Co. Ltd. 4to. 15s. net

PIERRE, GARAT :
SINGER AND REQUISITE.

By BERNARD
MIALL. With 35 Illustrations, 20s. 6d.
net. (Unwin.)

Pierre Garat, the subject of Mr Miall's vivid biography, was a remarkable man and a fine artist, but he was not, as Mr Miall admits, of any political importance. He was merely a singer and a dandy, a leader of fashion. His story, therefore, becomes a history of the French society of his period (he was born in 1762 and died in 1823) with a central figure of as much fashionable importance as a Brummell or Nash. Incidentally, also, Garat's morals—like those of nearly all the people among whom he passed his life—were lax in the extreme, and, regarded in this light, his life was no more than a continuous succession of successful intrigues. However, there was probably more in Garat than that. He was a singer—possibly almost a great singer. Mr Miall handles his subject with an assurance and a ready wit that are altogether admirable, and, though nobody could claim that his book is particularly edifying, at least it makes amusing reading and presents excellently drawn picture of the times.

Frontispiece to Pierre Garat
(Unwin)

GARAT AT THE ZENITH OF HIS CAREER.
(A CARICATURE OF THE PERIOD.)
From a coloured engraving. Mme. a—Mme. d'Angely (?), Mons. b.—Dauvot, Mlle. c.d.—Mlle. Daclump, Mons. g.—

THE STORY OF THE WORLD.

By ELIZABETH O'NEILL. Illustrated in Colour and Black and White from authentic sources 7s. 6d. net (T. C. & L. C. Jack.)

It almost takes one's breath away to think of anybody sitting down to relate in one volume "The Story of the World." It is a hard enough task to unfold the history of a single nation, to be faced with the project of writing a history of the whole human race from the beginnings of time is a prospect that is calculated to daunt even the

From The Story of the World
(Jack).

THE SOLEMN CORONATION OF THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON IN THE CATHEDRAL OF NOTRE DAME AT PARIS IN 1804.
(From the painting by David.)

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

most daring of authors. Yet such is the scope of Miss O'Neill's new volume, and this world-history of hers for boys and girls is really a very attractive and masterly performance. Her first chapter deals with "The Coming of Man," and her last with "Our World to-day" and in the forty-six intervening chapters she gives you a clear, concise, well written history of the Jews and Phœnicians, of Greece, Rome, the contemporary barbarian nations, and so on to a well-arranged, well-informed account of all the great peoples of the earth. About half-way through, you start upon the history of modern times. The history of England and her Colonies is adequately set forth, there are admirable chapters on the French Revolution, on India, China, Japan and the colonising and growth of America into a separate and great nation. It is a book of real educational value, and the more valuable because it is written in an easy, interesting fashion that will lure children into reading it for pleasure, which is the most profitable way of study. A word of special praise must be added for the colour plates and the numerous black and white illustrations that have been selected and arranged by Mr S. G. Stubbs, they comprise some excellent photographs and a large selection from old prints, and add enormously to the interest and attractiveness of the volume.

A WINTER IN INDIA

By ARCHIBALD H. SPENS 6s. 10d. (Stanley Paul)

Mr Spens describes his work, in his sub title, as "Eight Impressions of its (India's) Cities, Peoples, and Customs," whereby he succeeds in putting it off accurately enough. Last winter he paid his second visit to India, and he gives

From Gardens of the Great Mughals
(Black)

"A RIVERSIDE GARDEN."

From A Winter in India
(Stanley Paul)

A TEMPLE IN THE DESERTED
CITY OF ANGER

his impressions in a chatty, often flippant, but always vivid, journalistic style. In the course of three months he saw a lot, though nothing far from the beaten track. The public at which he aims is not that which knows India, but the untravelled multitude. He likes to recall the history of the places which he passes through, to picture the scenes of the Indian Mutiny, and of the days long before that, and never scruples to digress in pursuit of the associations of the spot on which he stands. The plan has its merits, though it makes the book easier to read in brief snatches than as a continuous whole. "A Winter in India" would make an excellent companion volume to the guide-book for one who desired to "do" India for the first time. Its letterpress is illustrated by nearly a hundred photographs, nearly all of which were taken by the author. They are both good and varied in character. Mr Spens, if but a tourist, made his tour with an intelligent mind and a quick eye.

THIRTY YEARS IN KASHMIR

By ARTHUR NEVE, F.R.C.S.E. With 24 illustrations and a Map 12 6d net (Arnold)

Dr Arthur Neve arrived in Srinagar in 1882, having gone there to take over the charge of the Kashmir Mission Hospital. The first chapters in the book are descriptive of life in the Punjab in 1881, and of the author's experiences in Srinagar at a slightly later date. But the principal interest of the book lies in the author's accounts of his travels, climbs, and adventures in the Himalayas, and to this by far the greater space is devoted. Dr Neve is a daring and indefatigable explorer, and in the course of his journeys he has had many interesting experiences and has met many strange peoples. Written with a becoming modesty, the book is one of the best of its kind it has ever been our good fortune to come across.

THE LIFE AND THOUGHT OF JAPAN.

By OKAKURA
YOSHISABURO
3s 6d net
(Dent)

A word of commendation should be given to the dainty dress provided for this book by the publishers, because daintiness and prettiness are befitting a book about Japan. The author says the typical flower of Japan is the sakura cherry blossom and says "It is precious to us because it affords us a kind of widespread canopy beneath which we may dwell. Every year at the end of spring we find ourselves living in a common home made of the blooming sakura trees in their fulness of glow. All through the book the note struck here of life in common is repeated and a point made of contrast with the individualism of Western nations. The typical Western flower is the rose, but the sakura is not like the rose, an individual flower. It is a congregated flower. With us it is not individuals before family as is the case with you, but family before individuals. A man is not so and so by himself, but a member of such and such a family. Again the author says emphasizing the contrast between East and West. With us marriage is an affair of the house, not of the individuals. The union had its fundamental idea in ancestor worship and to leave the world without male issue came to be regarded by us as the greatest sin. Elsewhere he insists 'We feel the constant presence of our guardian spirits. Christian theology can be taught so as to be accepted by the Japanese, but whether it can ever succeed in touching our heart of hearts and make us care no more for the spirits of our forefathers hovering in the air is a question not likely to be answered in the affirmative. So he continually brings home to us his meaning when in speaking of the typical flower of Japan he says it makes a widespread canopy beneath which its devotees may dwell. An interesting account is given of the influence of the Chinese upon Japan and of the kind of amalgamation that has taken place of the native Japanese Shinto religion with Confucianism and Buddhism. Filial piety (in the sense they ascribe to it) is the virtue par excellence our author repeats of the Eastern world.

THE BOOK OF PSALMS

With 24 Illustrations, in Colour by FRANK PAPE 10s 6d net (Hutchinson)

Of the many beautiful books of this season none is more beautifully produced than this of the Psalms. The illustrations of Mr Pape reflect the splendour, the sombre mysticism, the tenderness, the lyrical sweetness—all the

1 The Life and Thought of Japan
(D. H.)

THE TEA CEREMONY (CHANOYU)

varying moods of these immortal songs powerfully and with most delicate imaginative art.

From Myths of the Hindus and Buddhists (Harrop).

DAMAYANTI
(By Khatundra Nath Mazumdar)

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From Nelson's Last Love
(Hutchinson)

EMMA, LADY HAMILTON,
AS THALIA.
(From an engraving by Raphael Morgen, Rome, after a painting
by Angelica Kauffman.)

MYTHS OF THE HINDUS AND BUDDHISTS.

By the SISTER NIVEDITA (MARGARET J. NOBLE), of Ramakrishna-Vivekananda, and ANANDA K. COOMARASWAMY. With 32 Illustrations in Colour by Indian Artists under the Supervision of ABANINDRO NATTA
TAGORE, C.I.E. 15s net (Harrap)

In the course of a short note it is impossible to do justice to this very unusual and remarkable book, and we have space, unfortunately, only to indicate very briefly what the volume contains. The text is divided into eight chapters. Opening with a brief study of the mythology of the Indo-Aryan races, it is continued with two chapters upon the Rāmāyana and the Mahābhārata. In these chapters, after briefly summarising the story, the authors proceed to retail and expand the myths and traditions contained in the two great classics of India. These chapters take up rather more than half the book, the remainder of which is devoted to chapters upon Krishna, Buddha, Shiva, Other Stories from the Puranas, Epics, and Vedas, and the conclusion. Very well and simply written, the book should appeal alike to the student of Indian religions and to the general reader who is in search of something more arresting and unusual than the ordinary novel of the day. The illustrations, of which there are thirty-two, are all reproduced in colour, and have been made by Indian artists. They are as remarkable as anything that we have ever seen, and we imagine that many people will regard them as a vindication of Indian pictorial art. It would call for a good deal of knowledge adequately to criticise them, but it may be said at once that everybody is sure to find them fascinating, even if their beauty does not appeal. Certainly this book is, as its publishers claim, "a genuine product of the East."

THE BEAUTIFUL LADY CRAVEN.

By A. M. BROADLEY and LEWIS MELVILLE, 2 vols. 5s net. (John Lane.)

The memoirs of Elizabeth, Lady Craven, afterwards Margravine of Auspach, were published originally in 1840, with a dedication to the Duke of York, so soon afterwards to die. They are now "edited with notes, and a biographical and historical introduction, containing much unpublished matter," by Messrs Broadley and Melville. That the autobiography in itself possesses sufficient merit to call for republication at the present date could scarcely be argued. But the long Introduction, in which the editors "have endeavoured," they say, "to reconstitute the life-story of an exceptionally attractive lady," the numerous documents, many of them the property of Mr. Broadley, which now for the first time see the light, and the admirable illustrations, forty-eight in all, which decorate the two volumes—these give the work a value which cannot be denied. The memory of the lady is very faint nowadays, though, as the editors point out, there are Margrave Road and Margravine Mansions to recall that she and her husband once resided in Hammersmith at Brandenburgh House, the site of which is occupied by the Hammersmith Distillery. In her lifetime, however, she was a figure which we may call, as we will, either famous or notorious. Queen Charlotte had no doubt which was the correct term, and refused to have

From The Beautiful Lady Craven
(Lane.)

ELIZABETH, LADY CRAVEN, WIFE OF WILLIAM, SIXTH LORD CRAVEN.
(From the portrait at Combe Abbey, attributed to Thomas Sneyd.)

her at Court; in justification of her attitude.

Elizabeth, youngest daughter of the fourth Earl of Berkeley, married, when she was not yet seventeen, William Craven, who, two years later, succeeded his father as Baron Craven. She bore him seven children before he settled £1,500 a year on her, and packed her off as a bad wife. Her editors think that in her relations with Craven she was "possibly more sinned against than sinning." But, whatever Craven's sins, he had forgiven in her a particularly scandalous infidelity before he turned her away in 1783. In her subsequent travels on the Continent she entered into a friendship, of the type mis-called platonic, with Christian Frederick, Margrave of Brandenburg Auspach, and Bayreuth, a great-grandson of George I. His wife died in 1790, and Lord Craven at the end of September, 1791. In October, 1791, the widow and widower married. He had already, by her wish, sold his principality to Prussia, and the pair came to England, bought the house already mentioned, on the bank of the Thames, and hoped to be received by Society. So, indeed, they were generally, and the royal princes had no compunction about visiting Brandenburg House, but they never got to Court.

The Mar gravine wrote, besides her Memoirs and some travel-letters, poems, and a few plays. She acted, according to an admirer, tout à la Jordan, but other criticisms make us suspect that this was a libel upon Mrs. Jordan. Certainly, however, she was keenly interested in theatricals, and she made Brandenburg House celebrated for its stage-performances, assisted by Mrs. Abingdon, Bannister, and a host of titled amateurs. Messrs. Broadley and Melville say that, though she was "not, possibly, what the world calls a good woman"—this is rather quaint—she "exercised, for a lengthy period, power of fascination." That she was beautiful the portraits, by a large variety of artists, prove. Beauty and fascination are her claims to remembrance.

ed some hard facts

BOOKS OF THE BORDER.

This season has seen almost a plethora of books relating to the Border Country on both sides of the Tweed. That locality—narrow in extent—is second to none for its wealth of literature, for the memories that cling to every landmark, for the poetry and romance which are its peculiar possession. Scott, to be sure, is the great central glory of the Border—its "Guardian Genius," as Wordsworth said. Nevertheless, other names than his have helped to make Tweedside glorious and renowned among the sons of men.

It is not only for the sake of Sir Walter, but for the sake of Sir Walter's friends and associates—men like Hogg, the singing Shepherd of Ettrick, and Leyden, the most prodigious pundit of his time, and gentle Willie Laidlaw; and Lockhart—it is for their sakes, and a host besides, earlier than the Wizard's time—"good worthy Mr. Thomas Boston," for instance, the Erskines and the Baillies, mighty supporters of the Covenant, and many others—that the valleys of the Tweed and Teviot, of Ettrick and Yarrow, have grown into a kind of happy hunting-ground for thousands of pilgrim feet from the realm of Everywhere.

Is it surprising that such a vast and attractive literature should have fastened itself, ivy-like, around this

From Society, Politics, and Diplomacy (Unwin).

LADY ELIZABETH COMPTON.

Only child of Charles, 7th Earl of Northampton, by Lady Anne Somerset, daughter of the 4th Duke of Beaufort. Born 25th June, 1760. Died 7th April, 1831. Married 27th February, 1782, Lord George Augustus Henry Cavendish, created Earl of Burlington in 1831. After Sir Joshua Reynolds.

charmed and charming land? We welcome, first of all, Mr. Lang's fine contribution,<sup>1</sup> reviewed elsewhere in this Number, and destined, one feels, to be the "open sesame" into this so precious treasure-house.

Mrs. John Lang's book<sup>2</sup> is the fragment of a more ambitious scheme, as one happens to know. She follows to some extent that Border evergreen, Wilson's "Tales." But a more finished pen is apparent here, and the stories are scarcely so lugubrious (barring that terrible tale of

<sup>1</sup> "Highways and Byways in the Border" By Andrew Lang and John Lang 6s net (Macmillan)

<sup>2</sup> "North and South of Tweed" By Jean Lang 5s net. (Jack)

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From The Public Prosecutor of the Terror Alphonse Quentin
Fouquier-Tinville

FOQUIER-TINVILLE

Spoti Manse), they are more or less based on historical data, and form a delightful resume of the folk-lore of not a few quiet and undistinguished nooks of the Border. The book should make an acceptable Christmas gift. What shall be comprised under that magical word "the Border"? Mr Hannah's task<sup>2</sup> takes him much further afield than Mr Lang has ventured, though it could be proved that once on a time (far-off, to be sure) Edinburgh itself might be included within the term. It was a phrase that constantly varied with the fortunes of war between Scots and English. Nowadays the delimitation is simple. Geographically, the Tweed and the Cheviots constitute the natural boundary line—the counties of Berwick, Roxburgh, and Northumberland being, therefore, the Border Counties in the stricter sense. But the fostering of a literary signification, brought about mainly by the work of Scott and his compeers, has finally settled that the Border is to be regarded as consisting of the whole watershed of the Tweed and its tributaries, to wit, the counties of Berwick, Roxburgh, Selkirk, and Peebles, with the portion of Dumfries which abuts on the Solway. Mr Hannah has taken no end of pains in preparation for his agreeable word-picture of the Berwickshire coast, and the conveyance of his readers right along the Lothian line to Linlithgow and Bo'ness. The book is packed with solid material. The writer is especially helpful when he discourses on the geological and architectural features so much in evidence around the "country of St Abb," for example, where, at Coldingham, one of the oldest religious houses of the kingdom still does duty as the parish kirk. The account of Berwick-on-Tweed is almost all that one wants to know about the "good town." But to say that this book is at its best in the purely Border section, would not be just. For the remaining chapters are equally interesting, and equally valuable, only they do not come within the present purview.

<sup>2</sup> "The Berwick and Lothian Coasts." By Ian C. Hannah. 6s net (Fisher Unwin.)

Two scholarly contributions to Border history per excellence have recently appeared. Thanks to the cultured leisure of Otterburn Tower, we now know all we can know about the men who kept the Marches in the days of the deadly feud, when, "if any two be displeased, they expect no law, but bang it out bravely, one and his kindred against the other and his, they will subject themselves to no justice, but in an inhuman and barbarous manner, fight and kill one another." To go through Mr Pease's pages<sup>4</sup> is to recall a very desolating epoch in the national annals. English and Scots were continually "in bad blood," and many were the forays and the fights, much was the terror and the anguish of that so unhappy time. It was Edward of the Long Shanks who blew the coal that set the fire ablaze. He charged his son "never to make peace with Scotland until the nation was subdued." And not for many long years was the sound of the unholy strife stilled at last. Wardens (or Guardians) were needed to hold in check the wild clamorous clans of the Border. Both alike were inbred thieves. If Barty of the Comb should discover that his sheep were missing, all he did was to step over to his neighbour Corbit Jock to tell him so, and the twain, sure that "Scotland would ha' them," set off on the "hot trod" down Blakehope, and into Redewater, and across the Carter to Teviotside, where they would "lift" the best Scots wethers they knew of, and flashing (if need

<sup>4</sup> "The Lord Wardens of the Marches of England and Scotland." By Howard Pease, M.A. 10s 6d net (Constable.)

From Macanlay's History of England
(Macmillan)

SIR PETER LELY.
From a Mosaicist by J. De Witt after painting by Sir P. Lely.

has their swords on the wall, they would fight to the death rather than return "loomhanded." Let us be thankful for our own quiet era. For now

"No Warden keeps the Marches,
From Tynedale to the Tweed,
Broad winds the road to Scotland
Beside the streams of Rede"

There were pleasant and peaceful spots on the Border throughout those centuries of blood and iron. To fight may be the breath of one man's life, to pray is the very breath of another's. Thus the monasteries were constructed, "not in cities, or in castles, or in towns, but in places remote from the society of men." And when Dervorgilla the Devout set up her noble Abbey of the Sweet Heart at the foot of Criffel, with his diadem of transfigured mist, his wreath of red heather, his deep battle scars of the glaciers, his Titanic ribs of granite, and calm Loch Kindar with its leafy, lonely isle asleep beneath him, surely never was site more ideal for the Sanctuary of God on earth! It is the story of this Lady of Galloway, this daughter and mother of princes, this bountiful doer of gracious deeds, which Mr Huyshe has narrated so charmingly.<sup>6</sup> She is among the most winsome women in history

"A queenlier heart
never throbbed more true
'Mong Galloway's rocks and rills"

Her whole life was surrendered to religion, to the creation and endowment of Friaries, and to such acts of beneficence as bridge-building; for Dervorgilla's Bridge at Dumfries is that town's chief relic of the olden time. Save one, however, all her religious foundations have perished. And Dulce Cor stands open to the winds of heaven. It was on Dulce Cor that she lavished her greatest love, and somewhere within its broken walls she waits the Morn.

It is but a step from the meditative life of the monasteries to the life of those who commune with Nature, and to whom every aspect of Nature speaks with a voice unheard by ordinary mortals. There are Whites of Selborne in many of the parishes of Scotland—men who live in the close enjoyment of the sights and sounds about their own Manse door, and to whom the truest revelation in bird, and beast, and flower, ensures a harvest of unspeakable joy. It is the ability to bring blessing out of the commonest things, to see more clearly that which lies at our feet that is Heaven's best boon to the human soul. Lady John Scott sings of "wild and stormy Lammermoor," but, as the present writer well knows, Lammermoor holds many a kindly mood in her lap. And it is like breasting the old road again, it is like being enwrapped by one's native air, it is like listening to the lilt of Leader Water, to read those scholarly and sympathetic essays of the minister of Lauder.<sup>6</sup> Mr Bolam's book<sup>7</sup> is necessarily technical and cyclopædic. It tabulates the experience of a born naturalist, whose nights and days have been ungrudgingly given to a most intimate fellowship with the feathered tribes which predominate in the East Border. An account of the chief Border ornithologists makes a singularly pleasant introduction

<sup>6</sup> "Dervorgilla, Lady of Galloway" By Wentworth Huyshe 6s. (David Douglas.)

In one sense, the "Country of Sir Walter Scott" is synonymous with the Border. Scott belonged to the Border, was nursed by it, lived in it, died in it, and the Border holds his dust. There is a sense, however, in which Sir Walter's country broadens and widens to many a farflung shore. It is the Country of the Novels, beginning with "mine own, my native land," making many an inroad upon England and Wales, crossing to France and Germany, touching Syria and the Golden Horn, and extending to India. Mr Olcott<sup>8</sup> is apparently an American (his book bears an American imprint), who loves his Scott, and made a pilgrimage through most of the scenes of the Waverleys. The result is an addition to Scott literature which justifies its use by every student of the Master

THE DAUPHIN, LOUIS XVII (1745-1795 (P)).
After the portrait by Kucharzinski made in 1792.
(Photo, Ncurdin.)

Hunnewell's (also an American) "The Lands of Scott," has been long out of print, and there is no better book to take its place. With Olcott for guide, those who are entering the Waverley realm for the first time are fortunate, and those who oft return to it (and who does not?) will derive fresh stimulus (if that be possible) for a literary sojourn which does not seem likely ever to brook a rival. The children are ever with us, and Miss Grierson's little book<sup>9</sup> will fill a fine niche till the day for reading Lockhart has dawned

W S CROCKETT.

<sup>6</sup> "In the Lap of the Lammermoor." By William McConachie, B D 6s (Blackwood)

<sup>7</sup> "Birds of Northumberland and the Eastern Borders" By "Hun" 7s 6d (Black)

<sup>8</sup> "The Country of Sir Walter Scott" By Charles S Olcott 6s net (Cassell)

<sup>9</sup> "Sir Walter Scott" By Elizabeth Grierson ("Peeps" Series) 1s. 6d (Black)

From The French Revolution
(Jack).

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From Phiz and Dickens
(Nisbet)

HARLOT K. BROWNE ("PHIZ")

THIRTEEN APPRECIATIONS.

By PRINCIPAL ALEXANDER WHYTE, D.D., LL.D. 3s 6d
net (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier)

These thirteen sketches deal each with the life and work of some character distinguished in the realm of religion, or of religious literature. Thus we have amongst them appreciations of Santa Teresa, Jacob Behmen, Samuel Rutherford, Sir Thomas Browne, William Law, Cardinal Newman, and John Wesley. The material is handled with understanding, the cardinal features of each life being skilfully disengaged, while the writing is marked by ease and sureness of touch. The essays are obviously the outcome of a close and sympathetic study of the lives and writings of the personages with whom they deal, and the fact that they were for the most part originally given in the form of addresses to Principal Whyte's classes, makes them additionally readable by reason of the absence of formality. The subject of Jacob Behmen is rather a heavy burden for a brief essay, but the difficulty is surmounted with considerable success. In the case of Sir Thomas Browne, too, the treatment is notably discriminating and adequate. With their feeling for essentials, and certain happy touches of phrase and anecdote, Principal Whyte's

MRS. STETSON

Author of "Reminiscences, Sermons and Correspondence"
(Putnam)

"Appreciations" give us a clear presentment of the worthies whose spiritual portraiture he has undertaken. And although his first interest is naturally the religious, we had almost said the theological, side of the subject, the literary aspect is by no means neglected. Thus, in the essay on Cardinal Newman, we are bidden to observe the "strength, the richness, the pliability, the acuteness, the subtlety, the spiritualness, the beauty, the manifold resources of the English language" in Newman's writings. Altogether the "Appreciations" may be considered as yielding to the reader very much more than a mere introductory acquaintance with their subjects.

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND

By LORD MACAULAY Edited by CHARLES HARDING FIRTH, M.A. In Six Volumes Vol I, with Photogravure Frontispiece, 9 Coloured Plates, and 173 Black-and-White Illustrations 10s 6d net (Macmillan)

The main feature of this fine reissue of Macaulay's "History of England" lies in the illustrations which have been included under the direction of Professor Firth. Not only are they extremely numerous, but the selection of them has clearly been made with the utmost care. They do really illustrate the text, they are all of a good size, and they have been very carefully printed. Their inclusion marks an epoch in the publishing of Macaulay's History, and if—as seems likely—the succeeding volumes attain to the high standard of the first, Messrs Macmillan's illustrated edition will become easily the best to be had.

THE FRENCH REVOLUTION

By H. F. B. WHEELER With a series of Illustrations from authentic sources. 7s 6d net (Jack)

The story of the French Revolution is one of those stories that seem to grow newer the more you tell them. Since Carlyle wrote his famous history many new facts have come to light, fresh contemporary memoirs have made their appearance, letters and private documents have emerged to throw vivid sidelights on the monarchists and republicans of that unparalleled period. Mr H. F. B. Wheeler has done useful historical work in this, as in other fields, and in his latest volume, "The French Revolution," he tells the tale of that terrific uprising picturesquely, interestingly, making use of all the most recent revelations and discoveries on the subject and writing a thoroughly sound and eminently readable history of that portentous time and the remarkable men who flourished in it. A special word of praise is due to Mr S. G. Stubbs to whom the author ascribes all responsibility for the scheme of illustration, and the selection of the eighty portraits and the old engravings of characteristic scenes and events that increase both the attractiveness and the helpfulness of the book.

PRINCIPAL ALEXANDER WHYTE, D.D., LL.D.
(Author of "Thirteen Appreciations") (Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier).

THE CASE FOR CO-EDUCATION.

By CECIL GRANT, M.A., and NORMAN HODGSON, B.A.
5s. net (Grant Richards)

Two Oxford men here give us a statement of the case for educating boys and girls together at the public schools which lacks nothing in courage, sincerity, and powerful argument. Their conclusions are based on the experiment at Keswick and (subsequently) St George's School, Harpenden, of which Mr Grant is headmaster. That experiment, which lasted fifteen years, was directly caused

From In the Footsteps of Borrow and FitzGerald
(Jarrold)

GEORGE BORROW
(From a hitherto unpublished photograph)

by the hope of finding a remedy for the moral evil in our schools. Conducted on right lines, using such simple safeguards as all good schools should employ, co-education, they insist, can render any school as securely immune from immorality, as good boys' schools are immune from small-pox, or from epidemics of stealing. Displeasure is plainly hinted at the custom of adopting co-education, on the ground that boys and girls can be more cheaply educated together than apart. American experience is very fully dealt with. In spite of Professor Stanley Hall, it is clear that co-education is a distinct success in the States. Particularly interesting is the testimony of a high American official authority, that it "explains in great measure the freedom that women enjoy in this country, with respect to the pursuit of careers, and especially the large share which they take in the educational work of the country." In view of the great changes which the authors, in common with all experts, foresee to be imminent in our educational system, this able presentation of the case for co-education is very timely.

LADY HESTER LUCY STANHOPE

By FRANK HAMEL. With 20 Photogravure Plates. 15s. net
(Cassell)

Miss Hamel's new discoveries tend only to make more remarkable the remarkable history of Lady Hester Stanhope, the eccentric woman who left England and travelled in the East, eventually settling down in Damascus, where she died in 1839. The author of this book has had access to material which has never before been published even in the life written by Lady Hester's niece and privately printed in 1897. "In the first place," says Miss Hamel, "she does not mention Lady Hester's love affair with Michael Bruce, and her magnanimity in giving him up when the time came for him to follow his career in England—a career which unfortunately did not turn out as brilliantly as Lady Hester expected."

In the second place, the Duchess of Cleveland never attempted to solve the question of the possibility of Lady Hester's marriage or love affair with an Arab sheik, a matter which Lady Hester refused to discuss openly to the close of her life. On these two points Miss Hamel's biography is of great value and may claim to be the most authoritative life of Lady Hester yet published, and every reader who encounters the book will find his feelings divided between wonder at the remarkable career of Lady Hester and admiration for the ability with which Miss Hamel handles her material. History and biography need be none the less sound for being interestingly written, and, keeping close to the facts, Miss Hamel has deftly fashioned Lady Hester's strange career into one of the most fascinating of romantic stories.

THE REV CECIL GRANT, M.A.
Part author with Mr Norman Hodgson,
B.A., of 'The Case for Co-education'
(Grant Richards)

From John Bright
(Constable).

JOHN BRIGHT
(From a photograph by Mr Rupert Potter, 1881).

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

Lady Hester Lucy Stanhope
(Gussell)

LADY HESTER ENTERTAINING A VISITOR
IN HER RECEPTION ROOM AT DJOUN.

a love of books that was catholic and discriminating. His son has drawn his character with a deep sense of the nobility and the warm humanity of it, and has told ably and sympathetically the story of a full and happy life that touches you with no regret except [that it has ended.

A LIFE OF JOHN COSIN, BISHOP OF DURHAM, 1660-1672.

By PERCY H. OSMOND,
M.A. 8s 6d net
(Mowbray)

LOVE AND LIFE

The Story of J. Denholm Brash. By his Son. With Two Portraits. 2s 6d net (C. H. Kelly)

Mr W. B. Brash has written a very interesting record of a very useful and beautiful life. His father was the well-known Methodist minister, Denholm Brash, whose memory will be long cherished in Shetland, in Aberdeen, in divers towns of Yorkshire, Derbyshire, Lancashire, which were the scenes of his ministerial labours. It is a vivid picture of a charming and lovable personality that grows upon you as you read these pages—the personality of a man who was passionately sincere, a great preacher, for "preaching was the supreme passion of his life, and to him it was no weekly task, but the divine privilege of his days", a faithful and hard-working servant of his Church, and yet one who was keenly alive to all the varied interests of the life about him. He was so much of an enthusiast for cricket, and so young in his old age, that at seventy-one he could "count the selection of a Test Match team as something of inexpressible importance." There is a delightful chapter on "My father and his books," from which you gather that he was a real bookman, with

This is the biography of that Bishop of Durham whose life covered a period which is of tremendous interest to all students of Church history. It saw the conclusion of the labours of the Reformation, and the rise and subsequent triumph of that great movement which we know as Anglicanism. In his desire to preserve the æsthetic side of religious observance, Dr Cosin appears to have suffered much at the hands of those who to-day are mainly represented by the followers of the late Mr Kennt. It was the Bishop's aim to conserve the direction of progress by withstanding the extremes of reforming zeal. It was a time of warfare for the Church, and "The Knave Cosin"—as he was pleasantly described by another bishop—was in the thick of the fray. The book, indeed, gives us some lively pictures of the ecclesiastic stress and terror of the time, and incidentally throws valuable sidelights on the evolution of the Anglican movement. As a liturgical scholar the Bishop did useful work in the revision of the Prayer Book. Priest, scholar, and intellectual gladiator, he made his mark on his age. But as a lover of books, music, and architecture, he appeals equally to our sympathies.

From Ships and Ways of Other Days
(Sidgwick & Jackson).

SIXTEENTH CENTURY SEAMEN STUDYING
THE ART OF NAVIGATION.

THE SOUTHLAND OF NORTH AMERICA.

By GEORGE PALMER PUTNAM. With 96 Illustrations from Photographs by the Author, and a Map. 10s 6d. net (Putnam)

The importance of the Central American republics will be materially enhanced by the Panama Canal, and these once comparatively unknown regions will doubtless spring into considerable prominence. The American traveller, therefore, naturally finds these countries of very much interest at the present moment. Mr Putnam's recent wanderings took him into all the republics with the exception of Honduras, which shares with Nicaragua the distinction of being in the worst financial position of almost any state in the world. The writer is a traveller with keen powers of observation and a sense of humour, and he does full justice to a fascinating subject.

THE ANGLO-FRENCH ENTENTE IN THE XVII. CENTURY.

By CHARLES BASTIDE.
10s. 6d. net. (John Lane)

If these latter days, when the Entente, the alliance based on similarity of interests and mutual respect between the French and ourselves, is one of the accepted things of life, it is difficult to conceive that, for so many generations, the two first nations of the world should have regarded each other as deadly enemies. Probably it was because no one else approached us that we were so keen, and so bitter, in our rivalry. During the nineteenth century the combined folly of our rulers and those of France allowed rival powers to grow unhealthily big. What chances we lost when we failed to guarantee Jefferson Davis' dollar bills, or to heed the cry of the Danish people in Holstein. But to-day France and ourselves have been forced into alliance as the guardians of civilization. Out of that alliance has come a mutual understanding. A few years hence and, in all human probability, the Fashoda affair will seem inconceivably remote, our quarrels of the past will appear as something unreal. Still, it is well to be reminded that the friendship between the nations is not merely a thing of yesterday, that it began centuries ago. M. Charles Bastide has done a useful work in tracing the beginnings of the present entente. His book is scholarly and thorough, although it is strange to-day, when France has broken away from Rome, and we ourselves allow so much latitude in matters religious, to find how strong a factor religion was in the seventeenth century, how enormously it could affect international relations.

ROSE BERTIN

The Creator of Fashion at the Court of Marie Antoinette.

By EMILE LANGLADE.
Adapted from the French by Dr. ANGELO S. RAPPOPORT. With Photogravures and other Portraits and Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net. (John Long)

The life of the Court milliner of Marie

From The Anglo-French Entente in the Seventeenth Century (Lane)

"L'ANGLAIS," POPULAR REPRESENTATION OF AN ENGLISHMAN, c. 1670, AFTER BONNART

From Rose Bertin (Long).

FASHION IN 1778. set called Le Lecer de la Rame Musée Carnavalet.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

Antoinette, the creation of the numberless dainty, ridiculous, extravagant poufs and hats and bonnets, is so intimately connected with the Court itself that much of the charm of that ill-fated period enters into this biography. Rose Bertin's real name was Marie-Jeanne, and Marie-Jeanne is more picturesque than Mary Jane. So, too, this French daughter of a policeman had a charm and an ambition which were more common and more possible of fulfilment among French women than among women of other countries about this period. The Court was frivolous and fond of dress. Therefore, if one could contrive and create becoming novelties, however startling, one was likely to become "the fashion." Rose Bertin possessed a millinery genius and plenty of courage, and she became the familiar adviser of the Queen in matters of dress. Throughout that gay, extravagant period, when the French Court was at the height of its brilliance, the gold flowed into Rose Bertin's purse, and she was often haughty and self-seeking on the strength of her popularity with the Queen, but the story goes that when the days of the Terror came, and accounts had to be rendered, the loyal milliner burnt her ledger with all the enormous sums owed to her by the aristocracy, that the millinery bills of Marie Antoinette also recorded there might not be made known to the New Masters and brought as a further charge against the poor Queen. The volume is vivacious and interesting, and the illustrations are excellent.

MORE ABOUT KING EDWARD.

By EDWARD LEGGE 16s. net. (Evelough Nash)

Having written one admirable book on King Edward VII., Mr. Edward Legge has been driven to compile yet another by a veritable passion of bitter resentment and indignation. And the cause of his wrath was Sir Sidney Lee's article on the late King in the Dictionary of National Biography. Sir Sidney, in fact, figures rather like King Charles's head—he is always cropping up to be

From More about King Edward (Nash)

KING EDWARD.
By Albert Bruce Joy (Photo, W. E.
Grav, London, W.)

severely trounced and mauled just when Mr Legge is becoming interesting. "When you wrote your article," he asks Sir Sidney with a rhetorical flourish in his preface, "did you bestow a thought of the widowed queen still in her garb of woe? Did you ask yourself if your wounding phrases would soothe her lacerated heart? Did you think of the dead king's children—one a king, another a queen? Do you respect or do you mock at the injunction "De mortuis nil nisi bonum"? To anybody who has read the article in the Dictionary of National Biography, it will seem quite unnecessary for Sir Sidney Lee to reply to any of these questions. But apart from this obsession, Mr Legge's book is delightful. Indeed, the long chapter entitled "King Edward in Story" is quite the best collection of anecdotes ever yet published. There is another chapter to which the author has given the title of "The Iron Fist" which the eager reader will find somewhat disappointing. The author gives the impression that he is going to lift the veil that hides the mystery of the theft of the Dublin Crown jewels, but all he has to tell us is what we know already with this exception, that he declares that King Edward deliberately squashed the enquiry. "I will not have any scandals," said His Majesty, and Mr. Legge explaining this remark, declares that an enquiry "might have necessitated the publication of evidence having no bearing upon the crime, but a direct bearing upon the reputations of persons not in any way implicated in the robbery of the jewels."

EUGÈNE DE BEAUHARNAIS.

By VIOLETTE M. MONTAGU With Photogravure Frontispiece and 16 other Illustrations. 15s net. (Long.)

Miss Montagu's book deals with the life of the son of the Empress Eugénie by her first husband, the "adopted son" of Napoleon, who loved him so well that for his sake he forgave his wife her infidelities more than once before finally he divorced her. Eugène had a weak but lovable character, and Miss Montagu gives us an interesting account of the early years of poverty, the mature years of high favour, and the latter ones of comparative seclusion of this plaything of fortune. The figure of Eugène is sketched in against a background of European politics and the wars of the Napoleonic period, in the handling of both of which Miss Montagu shows familiarity and assurance. Napoleon himself is strikingly and sympathetically delineated, and as a whole the book is well worthy the attention of serious readers.

FLAGSHIPS THREE.

By C. E. W. BEAN With 4 Plates and about 30 Head and Tail Pieces by the Author. 5s net (Alston Rivers)

Anybody who read "On the Wool-Track" or "The Dreadnought of the Darling" will know that Mr Bean can write, and in "Flagships Three" he has what is, perhaps, the most inspiring theme that he has yet dealt with—the recent formation of an Australian Fleet. In 1908 Mr Bean published a little book dealing with the naval needs of Australia and demanding very much the same sort of fleet that is now rapidly in the making. In five years his dream has been realised. The present volume consists of the greater part of the old one, together with a large amount of new material, dealing mostly with the building and launching of the new battle-cruiser Australia.

From Eugène de Beauharnais
(Long)

NAPOLEON BONAPARTE IN HIS YOUTH.
From a bust by an unknown sculptor
the Museum of Ajaccio.
(Photo, A. E. Montagu).

Frontispiece to Volume I of the Life of Florence Nightingale (Macmillan)

THE LIFE OF FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE.

By SIR EDWARD COOK cl. net
(Macmillan)

To mankind generally, Florence Nightingale is still the lady with the lamp, the ministering angel. Popular feeling and imagination fastened on that mission to the Crimea, and the mystery and seclusion of Miss Nightingale's later life could not efface the heroic story from men's minds.

Now that Sir Edward Cook has told us in this full and well-ordered biography, all the mental activities that followed the return from Scutari, and has revealed the enormous correspondence, the interviews, and the wire-pulling conducted by Miss Nightingale in her seclusion, it seems to us that the episode of that journey to the seat of war—and it was but an episode in a long and busy life—is by far the greatest thing to be remembered, and that while ever brave deeds are valued in this world, we shall always rightly think of Florence Nightingale as "the lady with the lamp." Yet, what a mass of work was accomplished in the after days, what strings were pulled, and what judgment, pertinacity and tact were used to get things done! Getting things done became a fine art for Miss Nightingale from the days of the first Sanitary Commission, and by their capacity for this art did she judge her contemporaries, men and women alike. Hence the strong and lasting friendship with Jowett of Balliol—so well brought out in these volumes—and the admiration for Sidney Herbert, Dr Sutherland, John Lawrence, Lord Ripon, and other famous men who took her counsel. "The combination of masterful powers of organisation with womanly gentleness and sympathy," characterize her public work from the first, Sir Edward Cook notes. "She is a noble-minded woman," Robert Lowe said of her in 1867, "and so charming." A practical mystic is an easy description. And her spirit was nourished on the literature of the great mystics, on St Teresa, St. John of the Cross, St Peter of Alcantara. All the intriguing, the wire-pulling, and the art of getting things done were used, not as we commonly use them, for personal or party ends, but solely for the health of the race, in the cause of sanitation. Provided that mortality was decreased in the army, in the workhouse, in the homes of the poor, and amongst Indian ryots, no pains were too great to be taken. But never-failing good sense made Florence Nightingale understand that her energetic prompting must not be made public. Hers might be the hand that pulled official wires, and set official puppets moving to carry out her high behests, but no word of it must reach the Press. The long years of seclusion favoured her methods. In vain John Stuart Mill urged her to come out in the open, regretting the preference for moving hidden springs "so very general among women." Miss Nightingale, beyond allowing her name to be placed on the General Committee of the Women's Suffrage Society in 1871, and her opinion to be published, would not be persuaded to public controversy on Votes for Women. Similarly, when Mrs Josephine Butler crusaded, and successfully, for the repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts, Florence Nightingale privately supported Mrs Butler, and refused absolutely to assist the War Office in selecting medical officers to carry out the obnoxious Acts. But she would take no part in the public agitation for repeal. When the question of the Registration of Nurses was raised, and hotly discussed in 1887, Miss Nightingale was prominent against the proposal though she admitted its possible advantage in forty years time. Her objection to inoculation was never removed. "she loathed and mocked at it," writes Sir Edward Cook.

Happy in her usefulness, and in her friendships, Florence Nightingale is no less happy in her biographer.

From Things I Remember
(Nash).

MY GRANDMOTHER.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From Provincial Russia
(Black)

THE ART COLLECTOR'S LIBRARY

8 vols 6s net each (Batsford)

Mr Batsford has issued eight volumes in his new and useful "Art Collector's Library" series, from four of which specimen illustrations have been selected for this Supplement, these four concerning respectively "English Table Glass," "French Pottery and Porcelain," "Sheffield Plate," and "Old Pewter." Like the rest of the volumes in the series (on "Old French Furniture," "French Furniture," "Dutch Pottery and Porcelain," and "English Embroidery") they are written by authors who are acknowledged experts, each in the particular study he has undertaken. The books are well printed, strongly and artistically bound, and they have information to impart that is both new and reliable. The whole series should prove an indispensable addition to the collector's library.

PROVINCIAL RUSSIA

Painted by J.F. DE HAENEN. Described
by H. STEWART.
7s 6d net. (A. & C.
Black.)

[This is not a record of travel, but rather a sober, careful attempt to give a picture of the condition, the ways, the morals of Russia as it now is after the first disillusion. For the reformation or revolution appears not to have brought in its train half the blessings that the intelligentsia, or the free-thinking, educated middle classes, expected and dreamed of. The burden of the book, as of most books on Russia, is that time must elapse, perhaps centuries, before the wonderful Russian people come into their own. We know little about their literature, their enormous mass of folk-lore, their aspirations and their creed. The various chapters deal with Central and North Russia, with the Urals, with Provincial towns, with white Russia, with the steppes, and, lastly, with the Crimea, where winter is not known. A plea is made for a Russia in Asia which, with a sympathetic England, is the only civilising power in the northern East. The illustrations, sixteen of which are in colour, are delightful.

CONVOY OF PRISONERS ON FOOT

THE BIJOU BOOKCASE.

With 60 vols 24 4s. net. (Glasgow David Bryce & Son)

One of the most attractive of Christmas gifts is the artistically designed Bijou Bookcase, supplied by Messrs David Bryce & Son, and the miscellany of miniature books that fill it. These dainty little books, and they include Burns's Poems in six volumes, and Scott's in another six. Poems of Hood and Moore, and the Poems and Plays of Goldsmith, Chaps from Dickens and Thackeray, Gleanings from Wordsworth, Lamb's Essays, Pepy's Diary, an Atlas, a Gazetteer, and, to say nothing of various volumes of extracts from Thomas à Kempis and other authors, a Bible, a New Testament, and English, French and German Dictionaries, that are surely the very smallest and most quaintly pretty books that were ever published this side of fairyland. Such a Lilliputian library in such a charming Lilliputian bookcase makes a dainty present from and to any lover of books.

Frontispiece to Reminiscences of India and North Queensland
(Constable).

BAILEY-GUARD, SHOWING BREACH THROUGH WHICH HAVELOCK'S TROOPS ENTERED.

From Unknown Mongolia
(Hutchinson)

SHEEP GROUND OF THE UPPER BOROTALA
(Photo, J. H. Miller)

UNKNOWN MONGOLIA.

A Record of Travel and Exploration in North-West Mongolia and Dzungaria. By DOUGLAS CARRUTHERS. With Three Chapters on Sport by J. H. MILLAR. 28s. net (Hutchinson)

This is the story of a fine piece of exploration in the heart of Asia that won for the writer the Gold Medal of the Royal Geographical Society in 1912. As Lord Curzon remarks in a preface to the book, it will long remain a classic on its subject. For, in addition to discovering a large tract of unknown land at the source of Yenisei and giving a varied description of the reindeer-owning Nomads who live in a vast forest swamp on the frontiers of Mongolia, Mr Douglas Carruthers deals in a large way with all the problems of the central deserts of Asia. He shows how the wild Mongols, who were once the most destructive force in the world, have been tamed and hopelessly weakened by the degraded form of Lamaism introduced by Tibetan monks encouraged by the subtle and Machiavellian Chinese. The author also gives a most interesting sketch of the Nestorian Kingdom on which were based the legions of Prester John, whose Christian subjects have been converted to Mohammedanism and now form the most energetic and warlike of the tribes.

The Uriankhai tribes, living between Russian Siberia and Chinese Mongolia, in the new country explored by Mr Carruthers, are a very simple and happy people. They want nothing from the outside world, for their reindeer supplies them with food and winter clothing, and the bark of the birch-trees is sufficient for their other needs. The explorer came with a caravan to trade with them, but he had great difficulty in buying even a specimen of their reindeer, for nothing he possessed could excite their curiosity or tempt them to a bargain. For two years Mr Carruthers and his party wandered on the frontiers of the Gobi desert in an untravelled region that for centuries

Frontispiece to With the Russian Pilgrims to Jerusalem
(Macmillan).

THE VANGUARD OF A THOUSAND PILGRIMS
GOING DOWN TO THE JORDAN.

From A Woman's Winter in Africa
(Stanley Paul)

OVAMBO WOMAN AND CHILDREN

has formed a borderland between rival races, creeds and political powers. The work of exploration was done in a thoroughly scientific spirit, the land was surveyed, the animals and plants collected and the geology of the country carefully examined. Mr Carruthers has a brilliant and vivid way of writing, and the general reader will be deeply interested in his work. The people of the various nations are studied from the life, by a man with a remarkable insight into character and a lively sense of the romance and picturesqueness of the wilds of the Orient. To an historian the book is quite as attractive as it is to the lover of the adventures of geographical exploration. The effect of different religions on men with originally the same force of character is traced in a striking manner, and the mystery of the enfeeblement of the Mongol race is clearly and finally solved. The chapters on big game hunting in the new lands are written by Mr J H Miller, who, with Mr M P Price, contributed to the funds of a private enterprise in geographical exploration which has brought honour and glory to our country.

FROM
THE CONGO
TO THE NIGER
AND THE NILE

By ADOLF
FRIEDRICH,
DUKE OF MECKLEN-BURG. With
514 Illustrations from Photographs and Drawings, and a Map. 2 Vols. 38s net (Duckworth)

These two finely-produced and elaborately-illustrated volumes chronicle the journeyings of the German Central African Expedition of 1910-1911 under the leadership of the Duke of Mecklenburg. The main route of the expedition led from the Congo River to Lake Tchad and thence across to the Niger, but auxiliary parties broke off at various points along its march, two of which practically crossed the continent and reached the Nile, and the book is accordingly planned in such a way that the heads of the minor expeditions contribute chapters upon their own experiences and the scientific results they obtained. It is safe to say that few journeys of exploration have been conducted more thoroughly or more successfully, and the enthusiasm of the principal members of the party will transmit itself to the reader. It is quite impossible here to give any idea of the scope of this remarkable work, but it is safe to say that in many ways this is the travel book of the autumn. The illustrations from photographs are extraordinarily varied and effective, while those for which Herr Ernst Heims, the artist of the expedition, is responsible are sometimes remarkable for their beauty.

A WOMAN'S WINTER IN AFRICA.

By MRS CHARLOTTE CAMERON.
10s 6d net Illustrated. (Stanley Paul)

There have been women travellers, but not many, and of recent years few indeed who have travelled so variously and so far, or with such strict observance of the rigours of the game as Mrs Mary Gaunt and Mrs Charlotte Cameron. Her experiences in India and in Morocco,

From From The Congo to the Nile
(Duckworth)

GIANT CHIMPANZEE.
(Killed by Von Wiss.)

VANITY FAIR

"Don't break her heart, Joe, you rascal"

Mrs. Cameron used as material for two novels; she journeyed some thousands of miles in South America, and a vivacious and very interesting narration of her travels and adventures in "A Woman's Winter in South America" was the result. Last winter she set out to make a journey alone round East and West Africa, from Mombasa to Sierra Leone, and across Rhodesia to the Victoria Falls. She covered in all twenty-six thousand miles of the Dark Continent, and her record of things seen, dangers faced and difficulties overcome, of the curiously interesting cities, towns, villages she visited, and the manners and customs of their inhabitants, makes a varied, stirring and at times, fascinating history. Perhaps the strangest, most terrible and pathetically interesting place of all was Robben Island with its sad colony of lepers. She describes the people and the life they live there with vivid and haunting realism, and moves on to admiration of those heroic souls who devote their labours to mitigating the long-drawn misery of that forlorn community, and perhaps the most exciting moments of her adventure came when she was passing through that part of the West Coast of Africa that is the lurking-place of the sleeping sickness; or when she was interviewing the cannibals of the Cameroons, whom she found not so black as they are commonly painted. Mrs. Cameron has a pleasant gossip style and a real gift of descriptive writing. Her book is one of the most informing and entertaining African travel books we have read, and with its useful maps and numerous excellent photographs should appeal irresistibly to the large travelling public, and the even larger public that cannot travel far but likes to see the world, and the wonder and the peril and the beauty of it, through the eyes of one who is enterprising and courageous enough to go out of the main track and bring back news of people and places unknown to the average voyager—especially when that adventurous spirit can write of such things with such charm and interest and outspokenness of opinion as Mrs. Cameron has written of them here.

From Tigerland (Chapman & Hall)

FOUND DEAD.

TIGERLAND

By C. I. GOULDSBURY 7s 6d net Illustrated (Chapman & Hall)

One would say with apparent safety, that it was well-nigh impossible to write another readable book on big game shooting, yet Mr. Gouldsbury has done so, and thoroughly confounded those who thought the subject exhausted. The modest friend from whose diaries and records the present volume is put together, ran away to sea when a youngster, and, after some years of roving, landed at Calcutta on the eve of the Mutiny. Enlisting in the Bengal Mounted Constabulary, he fought through the revolt, meeting with many unique experiences, and when the country was once more quiet was appointed a junior

From The Book of the Lion
(Murray).

AN ALGERIAN LION.

Abbey, Castles, and Ancient Halls of England and Wales (Warne)

CAERPHILLY CASTLE.

officer in the new semi-military police, or constabulary. Drafted to a good sporting district, gifted with plenty of nerve and the hunting instinct, he was soon enrolled amongst the devotees of the gun. During nearly half a century he shot tiger, leopard, panther, bison, bear, ibex, sambhur, and elephant, ranging over the whole of his own and his neighbour's districts in Bengal, and spending his rare leave on sporting trips to a friend in the hills of Travancore. Excellent are the glimpses of camp life, of the Commissioner's tours of inspection, of the good relations existing between natives and officials, of the whole-souled devotion to duty of the old type of civil servant. Of yarns other than sporting there are any amount. The anecdotes of elephantine intelligence, of the habits and customs of the various beasts and birds, the sayings and doings of the native helpers, are well chosen. "The Major's Tale" is as weird a ghost story as anyone could wish to hear, "The

By A C COOPER-MARSDIN 10s 6d. net (Cambridge University Press)

The Lerins are a group of islands forming a sort of natural breakwater at Cannes off the south coast of France. At the beginning of the fifth century, a young Roman noble became a Christian and fled as a hermit to the Lerins to study and meditate in quietness. He was joined by other men of his way of thinking, and while Gaul was being destroyed by the Franks, the islands of the Lerins grew in importance as a religious centre of Western Europe. It was a brilliant school of missionaries, and both St. Patrick, the apostle of Ireland, and St. Augustine, the apostle of England, studied there. Many of the leaders of Christian thought in the fifth and sixth centuries, owed their training to the monastery on the island, and Canon Cooper-Marsdin gives a scholarly account of their lives and labours there, and brings out clearly the great importance of the Lerins in the days when the Roman Empire had fallen under the attacks of the northern barbarians. The work is an able contribution to English theological literature, for the school of the Lerins has not hitherto excited much interest among the Anglo-Celtic nations that owe most to this ancient centre of missionary work.

From The Castles and Towers of Cumberland, Westmorland, and Lancashire, North-of-the-Sands (Titus, Wilson, Kendal).

BROUGHAM CASTLE AND KEEP.

MADAME NECKER.

By MARK GAMBIER-PARRY. 12s. 6d. net.
(Blackwood)

That Madame Necker was the mother of Madame de Stael is sufficient justification for the publication of this informed and appreciative biography; and when it is remembered that it was in great measure due to the powerful influence she exerted through the medium of her famous salon that Jacques Necker secured the Director-Generalship at such a crucial period of the history of France, we feel that Mr Gambier-Parry has made a valuable contribution to the literature of the Revolution. To students the personality and social eminence of Madame Necker have long been familiar, through the pages of Comte d'Haussonville's "Le Salon de Madame Necker," and the various memoirs of the period, but the present volume is, so far as we recollect, the first separate account of her life in English. The daughter of an impecunious but cultured Swiss parson, she gave early evidence of unusual qualities of heart and mind, and as a girl of seventeen she won and reciprocated the affection of Edward Gibbon, at that time residing at Lausanne. As is well known, this affair terminated unhappily. Gibbon, on meeting with parental opposition to his engagement, complacently renouncing his claim to Suzanne's hand, after keeping his lover in suspense for five years. Two years after this break the much-admired girl, reduced to penury by the death of her parents, met and married the man who was to play so conspicuous a part in the crisis of his adopted country's history. As soon as they were established in Paris, Madame Necker, who possessed in rare degree attributes of beauty and character peculiarly adapted to the rôle she was to play, proceeded to gather round her in her salon the beaux esprits of the literary world, several of whom became her life-long friends. In doing this her object was not self-gratification, but the promotion of her husband's interests. Her affection for Necker was deep and enduring, and she perceived in him possibilities which she determined should have their opportunity. It is held by some that she was insatiable in this ambition, but, be that as it may, the result fully justified the means. Whatever weakness Necker may have shown in grappling with the

The Castles and Towers of Cumberland, Westmorland, and Lancashire North-of-the-Sands
(Titus Wilson, Kendal)

YANWATH CASTLE

chaos of the early revolutionary period, it is a question whether any one man could, in the circumstances, have done more than he attempted, and it is probable that had he been permitted to carry out the reforms he projected in his first administration, the Revolution might have been averted. The portrait of Mme Necker which the artist has given us is of a refined and beautiful woman, who wins our admiration as a devoted wife and mother, and as one who, surrounded by the temptations of a morally corrupt age, preserved her integrity unsullied to the end. Religious by temperament and training, she was her own hard judge in matters of duty, carrying to excess the principles of introspection and self-castigation, and if she failed to appreciate her remarkable daughter it was due to the blindness of mother-love.

The History of the Islands of the Lerins
(Cambridge University Press).

THE CHATEAU FORT
(Specially photographed by kind permission of the Most Reverend Father Abbot Dom Patrice.)

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

*From The Country of Sir Walter Scott
(Cassell)*

DESERT AND WATER GARDENS OF THE RED SEA.

By CYRIL CROSSLAND, M.A., B.Sc., F.R.S., F.Z.S. With 91 Illustrations from Photographs and 12 Diagrams. 10s. 6d.
net. (Cambridge University Press.)

Mr Crossland's interesting book deals with the western (the Egyptian) coast of the Red Sea, a district which in spite of the recent foundation of Port Sudan, and the building of the railway thither from Athara, remains almost completely unknown to the traveller. It is sparsely populated, but nevertheless it contains, as the author shows, material of interest and importance to the ethnologist. The second part of the book deals with corals and coral reefs and the making of the Red Sea, in a manner that will appeal alike to the specialist and to the general reader. The volume is finely illustrated with numerous good photographs and some useful diagrams.

CAMP FIRE YARNS OF THE LOST LEGION.

By COLONEL G. HAMILTON-BROWNE (MAORI BROWNE). With 8 Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net. (Laurie.)

There is something exceedingly attractive about Colonel Hamilton-Browne's unliterary manner. His method of telling a story is that of the raconteur, not the writer—and it is by far the best method for the material at his command. And what stories he has to tell, how varied and unconventional! He draws upon! In New Zealand and South Africa he has gone everywhere and to have done something which offered the least promise of excitement and interest and he has hunted bushrangers in Australia. He is a gentleman adventurer in the South Seas. His experiences have endowed him with a stock of marvellously good yarns which everybody who has the slightest love of adventure or the smallest sense of humour ought to read. This is a book, in fact, which we cannot help feeling resembles its author in one respect at least—it is an ideal after-dinner companion.

*From Desert and Water Gardens of the Red Sea
(Cambridge University Press)*

A SANDSTORM SEEN FROM AMONG THE BARRIER REEFS.

THE ROMANCE OF THE NEWFOUNDLAND CARIBOU.

By A. A. RADCLYFFE DUGMORE, F.R.G.S., F.R.P.S. With Frontispiece in Colour and 72 Illustrations from Photographs by the Author, 39 Illustrations in the Text, and 2 Maps. 12s. 6d. net. (Heinemann)

Mr. Radclyffe Dugmore is perhaps the most distinguished exponent of the art of shooting without a rifle. We never saw better wild animal photographs than in "Camera Adventures in the African Wilds," and we can easily say the same for this very remarkable book. Mr. Dugmore has, in fact, reached the top. He cannot improve upon his former work, because it was of the best. But he can at least equal his earlier achievements, and, as we have already said, he does so in "The Romance of the Newfoundland Caribou," which wonderful book is accurately described in the sub-title of "An intimate account of the life of the Reindeer of North America." Having said so much it is necessary only to add that nobody who is in any way keen upon natural history can afford to neglect Mr.

Camp Fires of the Lost Legion
(Laurie)

BUSH TRACK.

Dugmore. He appeals strongly alike to sportsmen and the general reading public—for he writes almost as well as he takes photographs.

TWO YEARS WITH THE NATIVES IN THE WESTERN PACIFIC.

By DR. FELIX SPEISER. 10s. 6d. net. Illustrated. (Mills & Boon)

A good travel book is a difficult thing to write. There are so many of them turned out every year, and nowadays the world seems to have grown very small. The same ground is covered over and over again, and the latter-day narratives lack all the colour and excitement of those written by the early explorers. The old wood blocks, grotesque though they might be, were infinitely more interesting than the modern photograph. When we see them, they carry us back to the days when an explorer seemed the most heroic of all people. We do not know whether Dr. Felix Speiser went out intending to write a travel-book, but rather think he must have done so, for he seems to have been on the look-out for "copy" all the time. At any rate, he got good "copy," and he has known how to make the most of it. His English is quite good,

From The Bonds of Africa
(Long)

FALLS ON THE CHANIA RIVER, BETWEEN NAIROBI AND FORT
HALL.

and the book is readable throughout. His choice of a hunting-ground was a wise one. Very few people know anything about the New Hebrides, and this is an age in which everyone is ready to learn. Now and then, one comes across controversial things, but these really add to the interest of the volume, by proving that the writer is in earnest. His strictures on French colonial methods are very severe, though one wishes that he had come into collision with German officials. His comments on them would have been more interesting still. The photographs in the book are excellent, and one puts them down with the feeling that, after all, there are very much worse places than those islands of the Western Pacific. The rate-collector and the party agent do not appear to have penetrated there.

From Round the British Empire (Jenkins).

IN THE CANADIAN ROCKIES.

From Two Years with the Natives in the Western Pacific (Mills & Boon)

CANOE FROM NITENDI

JERUSALEM AND THE CRUSADES.

By ESTHER BLYTH With 8 Plates in Colour by L. D. LUARD, and a Series of Reproductions of Pictures of Historic Interest 5s net (Jack)

Men and women, boys and girls, will equally be interested in this handsome volume. It tells in graphic language of the early state of the city of Jerusalem, and of the several crusades undertaken to win the city for Christ and the Christian people. Very thrilling are these historic stories, with their periods of glorious hope and of sad defeat. And the saddest episode of all is, perhaps, the tragic, pitiful tale of the Children's Crusade, in 1212, when, preached to by the half-frenzied priest Nicholas, and fired by the words he told them and the promises of glory and miracles he held out to them, fifty thousand children escaped from their homes and, led by a boy of fifteen, named Stephen, started joyfully upon their way. The terrible sufferings of that unhappy band are painful to read of, even after all these years, and, perhaps, most painful of all is the thought of the betrayed remnant sold into life-long bondage at the slave-markets of Egypt. A very interesting chapter is that on "The Two Great Orders," the Hospitallers and the Templars. The full-page coloured plates are striking in style, vigorous and appropriate. They greatly help the text by presenting the Crusades as a living, moving undertaking.

From The Romance of the Newfoundland Caribou (Heinemann).

A FINE STURDY DOG.

THROUGH SIBERIA:
AN EMPIRE
IN THE MAKING.

By R. L. WRIGHT and BASSETT
Digby With 70
illustrations
12s 6d net
(Hurst & Blackett)

Messrs Wright and Digby are two American journalists who made the journey across Siberia in a leisurely manner and also in such a way as to mingle as much as possible with the natives of the country. The result of their observations as to the future of the vast empire which is lying practically untouched at the door of Russia, is decidedly interesting. The authors believe in Siberia. Rapid strides in the development of the country have been made since the opening of the Trans-Siberian Railway, and particularly in the last few years, when the Russian Government has begun to try to attract settlers to the country. The record of the authors' journey and the hardships and experiences they underwent is lively and in every way attractive. We can strongly recommend the book to those who are in

From Rambles in the North Yorkshire Dales
(Mills & Boon)

MEETING OF THE GRETA AND TEES.
(Photo, A. Sweeten)

search of amusement, neat or combined with instruction. You get both between these covers.

SIR WILLIAM ARROL. A Memoir.

By SIR ROBERT PURVIS 5s net (Blackwood)

In his monograph, "Sir William Arrol: A Memoir," Sir Robert Purvis has given us a plain, brief account of the

From The Romance of the Newfoundland Caribou (Helmreich)

CARIBOU SWIMMING ACROSS SANDY RIVER
This shows how buoyant they are in the water, owing to the hollow quilt-like hair of their coats.

Jerusalem and the Crusades
(Jack)

THE CASTLE OF A GREAT CRUSADER
Built by Raymond of Toulouse at Tripoli in 1103

of ten years, as a "piecer" in a cotton mill, at half-a-crown a week; was next employed by the great firm of Coats, at Paisley, of which concern he afterwards became a director. Later on he was apprenticed to a blacksmith, then started a little "shop" of his own and came near disaster. But being one of the natural heroes of industry, full of fortitude, patience, perseverance and right-seeing, he went on to the great end that lay before him. The story is simply told, and is admirably suitable for a gift-book.

life of the famous builder of the Forth bridge — that piece of engineering which has made the world stare in wonderment. It is another version of the old, old story that is daily telling the dissatisfied and believing of romance alive — as much alive as ever it was. For we learn that Sir William started life, at the age

From Through Siberia
(Hurst & Blackill)

TOMSK, "A CITY OF ORGIES AND EDUCATION."

From Sir William Arrol
(Blackwood).

VIEW FROM NORTH-BRITISH RAILWAY, EAST OF QUEENSFERRY.

BAROQUE ARCHITECTURE

By MARTIN SHAW
Briggs Illustrated.
21s net (Unwin)

Mr Briggs sympathetic study of "Baroque Architecture," deals with a complex and somewhat neglected period in architectural history. The larger part of the book is devoted to Italian examples, but the Baroque influence in other Continental nations and in England, and the value of the Baroque period to modern architects receives full attention. It is incomparably the most exhaustive and important work yet published on this subject.

ORIENTAL CAIRO.

By DOUGLAS
SLADEN. With
63 Illustrations
from Photographs
by the Author,
and a Map 7s 6d
net (Hurst & Blackett)

No travel book of recent years has attained greater popularity than Mr Douglas Sladen's "Oriental Cairo," of which a new and cheaper edition has just been published by Messrs Hurst & Blackett. The present re-issue is a handsome, finely produced, and well illustrated volume, and—being easily the best guide to Cairo extant it is certain to be received with marked favour by a very large public.

From Oriental Cairo
(Hurst & Blackett)

A MEDIEVAL STREET IN THE ARAB CITY AT CAIRO.

TWO ON A TOUR IN SOUTH AMERICA.

By A. W. SEARS. Illustrated with Photographs
by the Author. 2 Dollars. (D. Appleton)

The author, who we gather is Mrs Sears, undertook this apparently delightful journey in company with her husband, "Orange-blossom," and a Swedish maid Martina. All were determined to find nothing but pleasure, and at the end the verdict is that South America keeps calling them to go to. Jamaica, Panama (where mosquito known), Callao, Iquique (where rain has not fallen for 158 years), Valparaiso, are all visited and everywhere there are fun and brilliant descriptions of a Kinglake sort, until the journey across the Andes takes the travellers to the roof of the world and they descend racing, "because it is the custom of the country to race down the steep," and arrive at the better-known Buenos Aires and Bahia. We are favoured with maps, but the book will be read, not for its geography or statistics, but for its humanity. The country and the people live before us.

From Two on a Tour in South America
(Appleton).

A STREET IN BUENOS AIRES.

A VAGABOND COURTIER.

From the Memoirs and Letters of BARON
CHARLES LOUIS VON
POLLNITZ. By Mrs
EDITH E. CUTHELL,
FR. Hist. S. In 2 Vols.
With 34 Illustrations
24s net (Stanley Paul)

The Baron von Pollnitz, who died in 1775 at the age of eighty-three, was in many ways an interesting figure of the old régime of Continental aristocracy. But he had a wider experience than most of his fellows. Falling into dissipated habits at a fairly early age, he seems to have taken naturally to

From A Vagabond Courtier
(Stanley Paul).

VOLTAIRE AND FREDERIC THE GREAT AT SANS SOUCI.
(From the collection of A. M. Broadley).

From Pioneers in Tropical America
(Blackie)

"THIS GOLDEN BEING EMBARKED UPON A RAFT"

wandering from one European to of amusement and profit. In fit of a very gallant and witty kind literature, and the very interesting memoirs which he left behind him have formed the basis of the material upon which Mrs. Cuthell has drawn for the subject-matter of this book. In his day Pollnitz enjoyed a considerable reputation as an author, and even received an unusually kindly "epitaph" from Voltaire. "Well, Sir, Baron de Pollnitz is dead, he also wrote. Frederick the Great, however, was more outspoken. 'Old Pollnitz generously wished to pay his passage to Charon. He did some cheating even the day he died that it might be said he died, as he lived. No one regrets him but his creditors.'" Mrs. Cuthell is to be thanked for having rescued from the limbo that threatened it the memory of this remarkable man, and readers of these brightly-written volumes will share our gratitude for them.

advent durable

be named in the native manner. He must be a man of great force of character for he won through, and has now a splendid mission working among the Chaco.

PIONEERS IN TROPICAL AMERICA

By SIR HARRY JOHNSTON, G.C.M.G., K.C.B.
With 8 Coloured Illustrations by CHARLES M. SHEDDEN, 11 in Black-and-White, and 2 Maps.
6s. (Blackie)

"Pioneers in Tropical America" is in many ways the most successful of Sir Harry Johnston's "Pioneers of Empire" series. South America—with which in the present case Central America and the West Indies are included—is pre-eminently one of the glamorous names of the world, and the mention of the early explorers call to mind heroes and pirates with full Stevensonian trappings. Hawkins, Drake, Raleigh, Dampier—these are a few of the great men who pass through the pages of this most enthralling of chronicles. Sir Harry Johnston has done his work particularly well, and has put children more deeply in his debt than ever with one of the most readable "improving" books that was ever written. Mr. Sheldon's illustrations, also, are excellent.

A CHURCH IN THE WILDS.

By W. BARBROOKE GRUBB. Illustrated 5s. net.
(Seeley & Co.)

A book that is destined to become one of the classics of the romance of missionary work. In the uncharted wilderness of central South America is a region peopled by the Chaco—a race of pagan Red Indians speaking several unknown languages and wandering about the country without any fixed place of residence. A river separates them from the Spanish settlers of Paraguay, who regard them as hopeless savages and wait till they are weak enough to sweep away. In spite of warnings from every white man Mr. Barbroke Grubb struck into the jungle in search of the Indians who had looted a settlement, and met them and told them he wanted to live with them. Not only at that moment but every minute for many months his life was in danger, for he boldly set himself to win the chieftainship over the tribe. He hunted and danced with them night after night, his face and arms painted red, his head crested with feathers, and his be adorned in the native manner. He must be a man of great force of character for he won through, and has now a splendid mission working among the Chaco.

From A Church in the Wilds (Seeley).

GIRLS FROM THE

From Prehistoric Times
(Williams & Norgate)

BISON
(From a painting in the cave of Altamira Spain)

THE VOICE OF AFRICA

By LEO IKORNIUS Translated by KATE
Two Volumes with 70 Plates (2 in Colour) and Illustrations in the Text from Photographs and 4 Maps and Tables 28s net (Hutchinson)

Illustrations
wings

This fine record of the travels of the Central African Expedition in 1910-1911 may be divided into four parts. The first part is devoted to a narration of the journeys of the Expedition, three to an explanation of its work, its objects and aims and its methods of research, two to the results of that work, and sixteen to testing the material in sections which contain excerpted descriptions of the manners and customs, traditions and monuments of civilisation. It will be seen from this that the two volumes are a good deal more than the ordinary traveller's story, and the book is indeed definitely constructive in its theories and tendency. Unfortunately little justice can be done here to the wealth of interesting material to be found between these covers, but we cannot refrain from mentioning with especial emphasis the results of the devoted work of Herr Carl Arriens, the artist of the expedition, whose drawings, which are to be found in extraordinary abundance, are of the greatest value both from an artistic and a scientific point of view. Mr. Rudolf Blind may be also congratulated upon the very readable English into which the German original has been rendered.

Illustrations
is the

Poacher' was the Mary Thomas sealing schooner falling into heavy fog and thus unwittingly drifting into Russian waters after hunting the seal pack north to Bering Sea. The Mary Thomas was captured by a Russian cruiser, who put a young officer in command of her and took one of the crew on board the battleship a ship's boy Bub Russell—to give information which might vary from the tale told by the captain of the Mary Thomas. The fate of other poaching seal hunters was well known to the crew of the Mary Thomas and Bub had been terrified at stories of cruelty to prisoners in Siberian mines. After giving the information required from him Bub was overlooked by his captors and made his way aft where he could see the side lights of the Mary Thomas following in the rear. He watched in the dark night close by where the hawser passed over the stern to the captured schooner. Once an officer came and examined the straining rope to see if it were chafing and Bub unobserved in the darkness had an idea. He reasoned that his crew, guiltless of crime, were yet relentlessly being carried away to a living death in Siberia. He was himself a prisoner with no chance of escape, but it was possible for the crew of the Mary Thomas to escape for the only thing that bound them was a four-inch hawser. They dared not cut it at their end because a watch was sure to be maintained there by the Russians left on board. But at his end Bub opened his jack-knife and went

As I told that

WITH HUNTER, TRAPPER, AND SCOUT IN CAMP AND FIELD

Edited by D. M. H. Illustrated by 55 (Hollen & Hingham)

Mr. Alfred Miles has made a capital boys' book by editing a number of personal stories of hunting, adventure told by eminent hands at adventure too. Yet in our opinion the best story in the book is by Jack London and seems to show that fiction is more dramatic and arresting than truth. "The Lost

From The Voice of Africa
(Hutchinson).

CAVALRYMAN IN PADDED ARMOUR
(After a water colour by Carl Arriens.)

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From The Diary of Li Hung-Chang (Constable).

REMINISCENCES OF INDIA AND NORTH QUEENSLAND, 1857-1912.

By ROBERT GRAY 6d net (Constable)

The author of these reminiscences was a subaltern in a regiment that set out from England in August, 1857, to take part in the suppression of the Indian Mutiny. From India, three years later, he visited Australia, and in 1863 he left the Army and turned sheep-farmer in Northern Queensland. Only fifty pages of the book are concerned with India, nor does Mr Gray make any great claim on behalf of these jottings from diaries. The Queensland section is certainly that which gives the work its value. To settle in Queensland in 1863 was to be a pioneer, and a pioneer who has any power of expression can hardly fail to be interesting. No doubt, the "Reminiscences" are calculated to appeal more to Australians than to stay-at-home Englishmen. Yet they will repay the attention of those of the latter class whose minds are open to learn something about any portion of the Empire. To such, the recommendation may be given that they should read the last chapter of the book first. Mr Gray is a man of sane views, and presents the problem of North Queensland— and of the neighbouring Northern Territory— both clearly and fairly. The extremists of the "White Australia" party would be benefited if they would listen to what one who has spent half a century in the north of the great island continent has to say. The book is illustrated by some of the author's own sketches.

A SUMMER IN CORNWALL.

By M E CURTIS 6s (Dugby, Long)

Plot, if we may judge from "A Summer in Cornwall," is not the strong point of Mr. or, more probably, Miss—Curtis. Anyhow, it is the weakest part of the book now under consideration, which is very much more a study in characterisation than an attempt to write a story. Still, as one can give very little idea of what the book is about without a brief summary, it may be as well to detail the main idea of the novel. It introduces the Eternal Triangle under not very unusual circumstances. A, having married B, goes for the end of the honeymoon to Cornwall. There he falls in with C, a lady of high birth, who has had a tender feeling for him before marriage, and has now become jealous of B. She decides to steal A away from his allegiance. Of course, she fails, and the book ends happily. You can see from this that you are not particularly likely to read the book for its plot, but if you can be induced to do so for its presentation of two or three individual, though not uncommon, types of character, you will find that you have not wasted your time. In its way, "A Summer in Cornwall" is a sound piece of work.

A ROSE OF OLD QUEBEC.

By ANNE HO 4 WHARTON With 8 Illustrations.
5s net (H. J. Mott)

For lovers of historical fiction who are on the look-out for a romance that will introduce an unhackneyed period—one of the principal difficulties of the modern historical novelist—will find their requirements satisfied in this very charming story by Anne Hollingsworth Wharton. For her background the author has chosen old-time Quebec, and the principal figure, in whom centres the main interest of the novel, is the young naval captain, Horatio Nelson. Readers will find the account of a love-affair that might have altered the history of the world had it been successful prettily and pathetically done. The conclusion of the story is laid in London, and the illustrations of the book are mostly from old prints.

From Maximilian in Mexico (Constable).

From Antarctic Days
(Melrose)

JUST BACK FROM THE SOUTH POLE THIS TRAMP BECAME IN AFTER LIFE THE FAMOUS SIR ERNEST SHACKLETON

ANTARCTIC DAYS

By JAMES MURRAY and GEORGE MA
by the Authors and Introduced by SIR LI 5s net (Melrose)

Here are sketches of the homely side of Polar life by two of Shackleton's men. It is a very human document, with racy stories. Human nature generally prevails, said Mark Twain, and here we have novel illustrations of that truth in an Antarctic environment. The sober and the laughing side of everyday Polar destiny is revealed - "the kernel of the life of the Polar explorer," as Sir Ernest Shackleton says in his cheery and appreciative introduction. After the vivid appeal made to our imagination by the big Polar tomes and chronicles something of this work may seem kindly trifling, more of it like a delicate review of family failings, while part of it gives, as it were, a suburban interest to the Antarctic Circle. But we feel at home with it all, it establishes a kinship between the men who bore into Polar vastness and peril and the men whose adventures are in suburban street-hawking or the boarding of omnibuses. Great and small is humanity, below the stars all the time.

BEHIND THE VEIL AT THE RUSSIAN COURT.

By COUNT PAUL VASSILI With 23
Photogravures 16s net (Cassell)

The title of "Behind the Veil at the Russian Court" very fairly describes this book, which, it is pointed out, is not historical, but merely anecdotal. The revelations it promises date from 1855, with the death of Nicholas I, to the present day, and they finish with a very pungent criticism of the present Czar. It is not surprising that the book has been banned in Russia, for the author—who hides himself under the pseudonym of Count Paul Vassili—was no respecter of persons. (He died, we are told, quite recently.) The "Count" gives inside information on the subject of the late Russo-Japanese War, and some astonishing facts concerning Russian prisons. He also deals with the Berlin Convention, and has nothing but praise for the deportment of the British statesmen who attended it. But, undoubtedly, it is for its revelations centring round the present Russian Royal Family that the book will be read. In these it is often cruel, sometimes amusing, and always intensely interesting.

MEMORIES OF MY LIFE

By ARTHUR MURSELL 6s (Hodder & Stoughton)

Mr Mursell was born in Leicester on the eve of the great Reform Bill. "Leicester then, as now, was pulsed with politics." Mr Mursell's father was of democratic sympathies, and the youth's early friends belonged to the circle of Edward Miall. He gives a vivid reminiscence of the bitter feeling which pervaded politics at that period, the seething discontent, the controversy over Church and State, and the propaganda of men like Cobden and Thomas Cooper. Later on, Mr Mursell's breadth of sympathy led him to associate with Bradlaugh, and he seems always to have had a saving sense of humour, which kept him from partisanship. But his circle was narrower in early days. He went into business at Manchester, where

Illustrated
SHACKLETON

GRAND DUCHESS OLGA
GRAND DUCHESS MARIE

THE CHILDREN OF THE TSAR

THE TSAREVITCH ALEXIS
(Photos, Dolansonnas and Egger, St Petersburg)

GRAND DUCHESS TATIANA
GRAND DUCHESS ANASTASIA

From Behind the Veil at the Russian Court (Cassell).

ARCHBISHOP SHELDON.
(after the design by Lely in the Sheldon Theatre, Oxford)

One curious experience might be entitled "How I nearly met Dickens." The novelist was lecturing in Manchester, and his host invited Mursell, as a lover of Dickens, to come and see him. "I sallied forth in such elation as I cannot describe, to pay my homage at the shrine of the genius which enthralled my life. I walked four miles across the city to the suburb where the illustrious guest was staying, and stood upon the threshold of the door, with my hand upon the bell. I had been picturing the thought of touching and addressing the creator of Sam

By LOUIS AMBIER Illustrated 358. net. (Batsford).

In this handsome volume on "The Old Halls and Manor Houses of Yorkshire" Mr. Louis Ambler makes an exhaustive and deeply interesting study of the domestic architecture of our great northern county. Mr Ambler is an architect and his work is primarily for students of architecture. From a wealth of material in existing old halls, manor houses, and large and small dwellings of every description, Mr Ambler has carefully and skilfully traced the development of domestic architecture in Yorkshire from the beginning of the sixteenth century to the eighteenth, and his lucidly-written and valuable work is illustrated with over a hundred plates from special photographs, and measured drawings, and with numerous sketches and smaller photographs in the text. It would not be easy to praise this book too highly, whether for the careful survey it makes of the ground it covers, the expert knowledge it brings to bear upon the different styles and structural and decorative details of these picturesque old houses, its lucid writing, or the excellence of its numerous illustrations. In every way, it is an interesting and valuable exposition.

From South America (The Making of the Nations Series)
(Black).

CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS.
From the portrait in the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York. The gift of Mr. Pierpont Morgan. The painting bears the words "Sebastian Vespotti, fecit 1492." (Photo. A. B. Nichols.)

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From Macdonald of the Isles
(Murray).

FLORA MACDONALD.
in a picture in the possession of Sir John Seton-Stewart of Touch, Bt.

historical facts, and no nastiness. In her preface the author tries to belittle her own work, and to speak of it as mere "scissors and paste." That may be her point of view, but it is doubtful whether her readers—who must, of necessity, be numerous—will accept it. All history must begin with scissors and paste. The historian's art is to make the dry record extracted, often with infinite pains, from the papers of past days into a living story for to-day. And therein Miss Robbins has succeeded. On the other hand, the book has one failing, only too common amongst the interesting books of to-day—it is too short. If it is worth while producing a volume of that kind so well, surely it would stand a few thousand words more in length. Often in this case a story seems to be but half-told, as though space were precious. We want, now, to see a "Book of Dukes" by the same hand, but we want it to be fuller, more detailed.

LABOUR, LIFE, AND LITERATURE.

By FREDERICK ROGERS 7s 6d net (Smith, Elder.)

Throughout this volume there breathes the same cheery spirit which has faced all the troubles that affect the material side of man's life, and has come out serene and confident that humanity is making for better and grander things. Mr Rogers started life as an ironmonger's errand-boy, at a weekly wage of two shillings, and from that he developed into a book-binder, a commercial traveller, a journalist, a lecturer, and a social reformer. He has lived the life of the workman, and enjoyed it. He took his share in labour activities before there was any money to be

SOUTH AMERICA.

By W. H. KOEBEL ("Making of the Nations" Series.) With 32 Plates and 10 Illustrations in the Text 7s 6d net (Black.)

Messrs Black's admirable "Making of the Nations" series has received an important addition in Mr Koebel's "South America." In this volume the author—well known as one of the leading authorities upon his subject—presents in a concise form a history of the entire Continent of South America from its discovery until the present day. Such a book has long been badly needed, and the praiseworthy clarity of the author's treatment of his subject will, no doubt, ensure it the success it deserves. The volume is admirably illustrated.

A BOOK OF DUCHESSES.

By ALICE F. ROBBINS Illustrated. 7s 6d net (Melrose.)

There are several ways of writing about duchesses. Until a few years ago, one pictured the author doing the work on his knees, his mind full of reverence. The Victorian chronicler who dealt with such subjects would, surely, never have dared to think of the possibility of his book being a commercial success, and so would have made it wholly dull and discreet. Then, with the publication of a certain cynical old lady's reminiscences, came a revulsion of feeling. Scandal about duchesses, and even more highly-placed persons still, proved to have a very definite commercial value, and we began to have books which lacked not only reverence, but often truth and common decency as well. Now, we seem to have entered on a new phase—that is, if Miss Alice E. Robbins' book may be taken as typical. It is the same book of duchesses—the same and the wholly-pleasant. There is no flattery, no absurd straining of

From A Book of Duchesses (Melrose).

ELIZABETH HOWARD, DUCHESS OF RUTLAND.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From Thomas Hardy's Wessex
(Macmillan)

WELLS

period of the negotiation for which the ambassador Jackson was responsible, to be friendly with England and America, and it was the fashion for Frenchmen to affect what they thought were English fashions, with "dirty boots, cropped head and, large whiskers." Such signs as these appeared in the shop windows, "Boots titivated here on the English Gout" (which almost seems too good to be true), and "De Flos and Merryweather makes English Boots", but then, as now, the real nation of shopkeepers (what cheek Boney to call us that!) rooked the visitors, while protesting they loved them. The ambassador was particular for the attentions or inattentions of the harpists nested in the hotels. At Dessem's, where the uns Sterne stayed during the Sentimental Journey (by the way, Mr Broadley should correct the legend to the illustration of this Calais hostelry, and there are other small slips), the bill was exorbitant, as it seems to have been everywhere else, and the attention embarrassing through its determined inattentiveness. An appeal for shaving-water was answered with assurances that a hair-dresser had been sent for, and so on, in the nature of stale farce. The British minister and his satellites, during their visit to Paris, met several persons of note, including the future Empress Josephine, Talleyrand, Madame Récamier, "Corinne," Madame Tallien, but the glimpses we obtain of these personages of parts are not extremely revealing. The manners of the place and the time evidently shocked one good parson. The ladies dressed to expose themselves. The churches were generally devoted to civil purposes, though Bonaparte was already considering the necessity of reviving religion for state purposes. Morality, to judge from the lamentations of our honest author, was,

From With Camera and Rucksack
in the Oberland and Valais (Headley)

VIEW FROM THE JAYBINIAN GARDEN, LOOKING UP THE GIFFRE VALLEY

From Things Seen in Oxford
(Sceley)

THE FRONT OF TRINITY COLLEGE.
(Photo, Taunt, Oxford)

unquestionably, at a low ebb, as was bound to be in a generation which had seen some of the noblest brought to the gutter and the remains of Voltaire worshipped as if they were relics of God.

WITH CAMERA AND RÜCKSACK IN THE OBERLAND AND VALAIS

By REGINALD A. MALBY, F.R.P.S., F.R.H.S. With 8 Photogravure Plates, 15 in Colour, and 57 in Monochrome 10s 6d net (Headley.)

Mr Reginald A. Malby's book differs so greatly from the ordinary record of haphazard travel in a mountainous country that it might have been advisable to choose a different title for it. "With Rucksack and Camera" hardly expresses the idea that Mr. Malby is not only an enthusiastic photographer, but is also a botanist of the first ability, and that his trips were made primarily with a view to photographing the flora of the higher Alps in their natural surroundings. However, apart from this we have no further desire to criticise this most excellent volume, which is most fully and beautifully illustrated with views of scenery and of alpine plants.

THINGS SEEN IN OXFORD.

By NORMAN J.
DAVIDSON, B.A.
With 52 Illustrations. 2s net, 3s net, and 5s net (Seeley)

The latest volume of the "Things Seen" series makes far the best handy guide to Oxford we have ever come across, with the great advantage that it has not been written in guide-book style. Mr Davidson has the advantage of a thorough knowledge of his subject, both as regards the present and the past. However, what the general reader will find most interesting are the chapters on the undergraduate, his manner of life, his sports his work, and his expenses. Very wisely, Mr Davidson has written the book from the point of view of one ignorant of 'Varsity life, and while the senior man will find little in the chapters on this subject that will seem to him at all impressive, the freshman should get some very useful hints. A large number of illustrations add to the attractiveness of the book.

THE AMERICAN MEDITERRANEAN.

By Sir PHILIP BONSAILL Illustrated 12s 6d net (Hurst and Blackett)

Perhaps a better title for this book would have been "The Economics of the Golden West." In the author's opinion the vast extent of the lands ringed by the American Mediterranean, in which he includes the Gulf of Mexico, the Caribbean Sea, the encircling rim of islands, and the coast of the old Spanish Main, are susceptible of wonderful industrial development. As Elisée Reches informed us years ago, although lying almost entirely in the tropics, these lands are perfectly accessible to man for all purposes of permanent settlement. One hundred and fifty years ago these today neglected islands were regarded, and justly so, as the most valuable portions of the world's surface. It is really remarkable, as Mr. Bonsaill points out, that the islands have not been developed on really sound lines, instead of having been allowed to drift into a state of perpetual anarchy and decay. The Dutch and Danish islands are going to rack and ruin, the French islands seem to be drifting steadily toward a race struggle of the Santo Domingo variety. "Whilst even in the English islands the crowded blacks, with all their loyalty to the Union Jack, under which they have for so long enjoyed liberty and even-handed justice, are near starvation, as near as people can be who live in Nature's most generous garden." Mr. Bonsaill's book is, of course, addressed chiefly to American business men, but it seems to us to have a much wider appeal. Nature is bounteous beyond words in that part of the world with which it deals, and there is no reason, except the foolishness and jealousy of man, why all the nations of the earth should not have some measure of good from those bounteous stores. The book is packed with facts, figures, and information of all kinds.

The Oxford County Histories Lancashire
(Oxford University Press)

WARRINGTON MARKET PLACE IN 1834.

From Ingatestone and the Essex Great Road with Fryerning
(Oxford University Press)

INGATESTONE HIGH STREET
(From an old print).

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From The American Mediterranean
(Hurst & Blackett)

STATUE OF THE LIBERATOR, SIMON BOLIVAR, IN THE PLAZA BOLIVAR, CARACAS.

(Courtesy of Collier's Weekly)

WITH THE RUSSIAN PILGRIMS TO JERUSALEM.

By STEPHEN GRAHAM With 38 Illustrations 7s 6d net
(Macmillan)

One had read "Inner Jerusalem," by the author of the "Outer Isles," and had felt how petty much of the tourist energy devoted to Palestine was, and how futile the endeavour to invest it with any real spirit of the Holy Land. What remained of the old crusading or mediæval spirit was, all were agreed, to be found exclusively among the Orthodox. And now we have an inside account of the Russian Pilgrims by an English delineator, who is also an artist, who sailed with a large gang from Odessa, and saw them through the various stages of their enterprise. The opportunity would have been coveted by Borrow. The great George would have accomplished his task in a very different way. Mr. Stephen Graham has none of the Borrowian dryness, he writes with sympathy, with metaphor and with unction, but he has achieved a rare task with uncommon fidelity and beauty. He reveals to us the right simple moujik of the great novelists, as he reappears in the pleasant narratives of Maurice Baring, but he also enables us, again and again, to get a glimpse of the real treasure of the humble Jerusalem, the earthly, is a pleasure-ground for wealthy sight-seers, a place where ever stone has been commercialised either by tourist agencies or greedy monks, where the very candles lit by the pious before the pictures and the shrines are put out the moment they are lit, and sold in sheaves to the Jews. Jerusalem the Golden, the city of the Vision, the Jerusalem of Tancred, this is a very different place, and the poor Russians are almost the only people to-day who manage to get to this ideal Jerusalem.

The great merit of Mr. Graham's book is that he does not merely tell us all about the external incidents of the journey, extremely curious, barbaric and even sinister though many of these are, but he tells us how the miracle is brought about of a real pilgrim's progress taking place in full blast of the twentieth century. The pilgrims have a hard time of it, especially on the march from Jerusalem down to Nazareth and Capernaum and back, many of them perish in the dust or the storm, and some of the stages almost resemble those of the terrible retreat from Moscow. It is not the popes who persuade them to go, for they are jealous of seeing money go out of their own parishes. The peasants, it seems, often take a good deal of money with them, and spend it in relics or on debauch going back, but never upon the actual incidents of the journey. Neither is it an epidemic. Great numbers of pilgrims

From My Cosmopolitan
(Mills & Boon)

A PATCH OF THE CRAZY-QUILT
BROADWAY, FROM 42ND STREET.
(Photo, Underwood & Unkenood).

From Kent (County Churches Series) CANTERBURY, REGULATOR PILLAR. (Allen).

come from isolated and remote villages and march one or two thousand miles even to the port of embarkation. Why do they come? It is often the one voluntary act of a creature of passive routine. It is the sudden inspiration of a contemplative, a man who would in old days have been an anchorite. It is the outcome of a sacred promise or a sudden spontaneous resolution. The incurable drunkard of a village picks himself out of the mire one afternoon, renounces the bottle, and starts off for the Holy City of the Sepulchre. The miser, who has been hoarding for fifty years, gives his money away, and sets off begging to the far-off shrine. The reserved peasant suddenly tells to a stranger the hidden secret, perhaps the crime of his existence, and sets out the same day on an expiatory pilgrimage. Here, again, are the peasants of Tolstoi, or the strange beings who emerge from under the seat in a modern Russian emigrant train. Some of them cross the sea to Jaffa again and again. They catch the Holy Fire at Easter, they bathe in their shrouds in the Jordan. They are terribly dirty, these people, extraordinary characters, some of them are ascetic, and some of them drunkards, but most of them are, after a fashion of their own, genuine mystics.

The pilgrim goes to the City partly in order to prepare himself for death, but also, very materially, to derive from life its greatest happiness—the sweet feeling of the heart in prayer. Follow his life from birth, and you will find these "sweet feelings began in the village church when he was a child. Ordinary life dulled them, caused their repetition to be infrequent, and he began, without knowing why, perhaps, to visit neighbouring monasteries. There he caught his sweet vision again. But the ordinary things of life defeated him, and even at the monasteries he felt seldom. So he went further afield. He went to far shrines, to Solovetsh, to St Seraphim. He left home and went from village to village, and from Monastery to Monastery, ever further and further till he reached the holiest place on earth—the Holy City and Golgotha, where the redemption of mankind was accomplished. Further on the earth there was nowhither; it seems that the soul had found what it wished—though it had not. Satisfied for the time, he returns to his native land, but again, in a little while, appears once more the unconquerable wish to go to that place where were experienced such sweet minutes."

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

Character, pathos, observation and style are happily compounded in a book which stands high in the rare category of religious travel.

THOMAS - SCRIBNER

THE QUEENS OF ARAGON: THEIR LIVES AND TIMES.

By E. L. MIRON. With Photogravure Frontispiece and 21 Illustrations in Half-tone. 16s net (Stanley Paul).

This interesting volume deals with no fewer than twenty-six "heroines," and covers more than three hundred years of stormy history—from 1035 to 1468. The unfamiliarity of the history of Spain to the average English reader constitutes only a stronger reason why you should get this book without delay, and the author's able treatment of his subjects, and the many romantic stories that centre around them, is an extra inducement. "The Queens of Aragon" is written in pleasant gossiping fashion, crowded with picturesque incidents and events, and, in short, is in every way, a most fascinating book.

From The Queens of Aragon (Stanley Paul).

LA SEO, ZARAGOZA (Photo, H. A. S. y M. A. S. M. A. S.).

From Coleridge and Wordsworth in the West Country
(Lilin Mathews)

Racedon

From Coleridge and Wordsworth in the West Country
(Lilin Mathews)

OXFORD COUNTY HISTORIES

The East Riding of Yorkshire By J. L. BROCKBANK, M.A.
With 60 Illustrations and Maps. Lancashire By F. G.
W. HEWLETT, M.A. With 6 Maps and 60 Illustrations.
18 6d net and 24 6d net each (Clarendon Press)

Those excellent little manuals, the Oxford County Histories, continue steadily to increase in number, and two of the latest additions to the series, Lancashire and the East Riding of Yorkshire, are now before us. The object of the series is to interest dwellers in the counties in their localities and to acquaint them with something of the spirit that inspired their ancestors. Both these volumes are admirably edited and put together, and Mr Brockbank and Mr Hewlett deserve the gratitude of many of the younger generation for their truly patriotic work.

THE MOST HONOURABLE ORDER OF THE BATH.

A Descriptive and Historical Account By JOCELYN
PERKINS, M.A. 7s 6d net (Pitman)

With the reinauguration of the Chapel of Henry VII in Westminster Abbey as the official home of the Order of the Bath, this historic Order of Knighthood will enter upon a new stage. Public interest in it has been reawakened, and this compact little work of Mr Perkins, sacrist and

Highways and Byways of the Scottish Border
(Macmillan)

TOMB OF SIR WALTER
SCOTT AT DRYBURGH.

From Highways and Byways of the Scottish Border.
(Macmillan)

BEWCASTLE CROSS.

From The Oxford County Histories The East Riding of Yorkshire
(Oxford University Press)

THE CELEBRATED PERCY TOMB OR SHRINE IN BEVERLY MINSTER, WHICH LELAND NOTICED.
(Photo, Charles Coudling)

minor canon of Westminister, is both timely and welcome. He has drawn freely and with discretion upon the mass of material at his disposal, and his book is embellished with no less than forty-two illustrations, taken from authentic sources, and now for the first time, we think, put before the public in a comparatively inexpensive form. It is a wonderful story, with its roots traceable to the far back days of our forefathers in the forests of Germany, with an interval of desuetude lasting for some sixty years after the accession of Charles II. For the revival, so to speak, we have to be thankful to George I. "It may be taken for granted," as Mr. Perkins writes, "that the historic Church of Westminister will fully rise to a sense of the greatness of its opportunity, and in so doing will forge yet another link in the chain which unites the British Empire to that most venerable and sacred of all the many sanctuaries which grace our island home."

GIRTON COLLEGE

By F. F. CONSTANCE JONES. Illustrated by MARY CLARKE. 15. 6d. net. (A & C Black.)

Messrs. Black's reputation in the matter of colour-books is well sustained by this number of their "Beautiful Britain" series, and Girton girls, whether former or present students, will welcome a monograph upon their Alma Mater. Of course Girton, with a mere handful of years behind it (the original building was opened in 1873) cannot compete in archaeological and romantic charm with the great mediæval Colleges of either University.

Of strenuous, vigorous work, of aims carried out to noble ends, it affords a marvellous example. But the indefinable spell of immemorial antiquity is lacking, and Girton presents literally only academic attractions. Hence this short account of her rise and progress reads somewhat in the style of a report. The specimens of Girton verse, however excellent in their intention, do not evoke an Oliverian request for more; the record of literary, philosophic, and scientific publications by past students is rather awe-inspiring than epoch-making. The best thing in this slender volume is the sprightly narrative of Miss L. I. Lumsden, who chronicles some of the obstacles, frustrations, and misconceptions encountered by the pioneers of Women's Higher Education, and tells of the eventual, though gradual, triumph of the determined few. Miss Mary Clarke's illustrations will be of interest to Collegians, but we hardly imagine that the "sweet girl graduates with their golden hair" bear so extraordinary a facial resemblance to one another as here portrayed.

MY MEMORIES, 1830-1913.

By LORD SUFFIELD. Edited by ALYS ROWTH. 16s. net. (Herbert Jenkins.)

During the last forty years of the life of King Edward, Lord Suffield was his constant companion. Even when the King went away without him, he nearly always sent for his friend to join him. "I loved him as much as one man can love another," says Lord Suffield, so naturally the greater part of his memoirs is devoted to an account of his intercourse with his royal friend and master. He went with the King to India in 1875, and relates in a very interesting way the events of the brilliant journey. Afterwards he travelled a good deal on the Continent with the King, and got on terms of friendship with the rulers of Europe. Even Bismarck

From The Most Honourable Order of the Bath (Pitman)

THE NEW KNIGHTS BEING INSTALLED BY THE DUKE OF YORK IN 1912.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From Girton College (Beautiful Britain Series)
(Black)

was extremely affable to him, but Lord Suffield is inclined to fancy that the great statesman hoped to worm some State secrets out of him. Naturally there are no revelations of this sort in "My Memories", but though Lord Suffield is the soul of honour and discretion, he is never dull or formal, and his book is sure to be one of the successes of the season. For it is written with picture

THE STANLEY LIBRARY.
(Photo P. A. Buchanan & Co.)

difficult to estimate the importance of the history making, and the value of these volumes in this is more likely to increase than to diminish. The edition gives, as usual, many photographs and a few admirable summaries on the principal events of the year, ranged in a classified order. It is at least as interesting of its predecessors—which is saying a good deal.

humour and good spirit by a sportsman who has a kindly but shrewd power of observation. King Edward is the hero of the book, but a long line of famous men and beautiful women is passed under review and sketched in telling strokes, and several hitherto unpublished drawings by Sir Arthur Ellis add to the historical interest of the account of King Edward's travels in India. The best tale in the book is contained in the preface by Sir Charles Beresford: it concerns Lord Suffield.

THE YEAR 1913 ILLUSTRATED.

2s. 6d. net (Headley)

The appearance of that capital annual, "The Year Illustrated," will no doubt be welcome to the many who have invested their half-crowns in earlier issues. It is

From The Year 1913 Illustrated (Headley).

MADAME CURIE IN HER LABORATORY.

A FEW OF SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & Co.'s NEW BOOKS

IMPORTANT!!!

The following is only a selection of our New Books. Write for complete Illustrated List post free.

A New Christmas Gift Book
by Jeffery Farnol.

THE HONOURABLE MR. TAWNISH

By JEFFERY FARNOL.

Author of "The Broad Highway," "The Amateur Gentleman," and "The Money Moon."

Uniform with the Illustrated Edition of "The Broad Highway." The Premier Gift Book of the Season.

SECOND IMPRESSION

Charmingly illustrated in colour by CHARLES I. BROCK. Cloth extra gift, gilt top. Bound in colour illustration on the front cover. Detailed prospectus post free.

An Equivocal and Appropriate Present.

The Broad Highway

[Second Edition]

By JEFFERY FARNOL.

Author of "The Amateur Gentleman," "The Hon. Mr. Tawnish," "The Money Moon," etc.

Beautifully illustrated with 24 exquisite illustrations in colour by C. I. Brock together with 12 lightful portraits of characters in colour by the same artist.

Small, gilt, handsomely bound. Demy 8vo cloth extra gift, gilt top. Detailed prospectus post free.

A Delicious Book Prettily Illustrated

The Money Moon

[New and Cheaper Edition]

The Sweetest Story ever told

By JEFFERY FARNOL.

Fully illustrated with over 30 illustrations, nearly half of which are full page in colour by the well known artist, ARTHUR I. KILLER. Presentation Edition. Royal 8vo bound in cloth extra gift, gilt top. Detailed prospectus post free.

THROWS A LIGHT UPON OUR DIFFICULTIES IN SOMALILAND

MY SOMALI BOOK

By CAPTAIN A. H. E. MOSSE.

Fully illustrated with sketches by T. D. D. H. KARL R. A. and photographs taken by the author.

Demy 8vo cloth gift 12s 6d net.

A MASTERPIECE ILLUSTRATED BY THE PRINCE OF ILLUSTRATORS, FRANK BRANGWYN, R.A.

EÖTHEN

Or Traces of Travel Brought Home from the East.

By A. W. KINGLAKE.

Specially illustrated with 17 illustrations in colour and 25 fine drawings together with a calendar of signs in hand papers by FRANK BRANGWYN, R.A. Crown 4to cloth extra gift top. Price 12s 6d net. Edition de luxe, bound in cloth, consisting of 100 numbered copies signed by the artist, printed on English hand made paper, specially bound price 12s 6d net. Only a few not yet sold, price 12s 6d net.

Twenty-five Choice Editions from Sixpence to Three Guineas

LORNA DOONE

A Romance of Exmoor

By R. D. BLACKMORE.

6d, 12d, 18d, 24d, 30d, 36d, 42d, 48d, 54d, 60d, 66d, 72d, 78d, 84d, 90d, 96d, 102d, 108d, 114d, 120d, 126d, 132d, 138d, 144d, 150d, 156d, 162d, 168d, 174d, 180d, 186d, 192d, 198d, 204d, 210d, 216d, 222d, 228d, 234d, 240d, 246d, 252d, 258d, 264d, 270d, 276d, 282d, 288d, 294d, 300d, 306d, 312d, 318d, 324d, 330d, 336d, 342d, 348d, 354d, 360d, 366d, 372d, 378d, 384d, 390d, 396d, 402d, 408d, 414d, 420d, 426d, 432d, 438d, 444d, 450d, 456d, 462d, 468d, 474d, 480d, 486d, 492d, 498d, 504d, 510d, 516d, 522d, 528d, 534d, 540d, 546d, 552d, 558d, 564d, 570d, 576d, 582d, 588d, 594d, 600d, 606d, 612d, 618d, 624d, 630d, 636d, 642d, 648d, 654d, 660d, 666d, 672d, 678d, 684d, 690d, 696d, 702d, 708d, 714d, 720d, 726d, 732d, 738d, 744d, 750d, 756d, 762d, 768d, 774d, 780d, 786d, 792d, 798d, 804d, 810d, 816d, 822d, 828d, 834d, 840d, 846d, 852d, 858d, 864d, 870d, 876d, 882d, 888d, 894d, 900d, 906d, 912d, 918d, 924d, 930d, 936d, 942d, 948d, 954d, 960d, 966d, 972d, 978d, 984d, 990d, 996d, 1002d, 1008d, 1014d, 1020d, 1026d, 1032d, 1038d, 1044d, 1050d, 1056d, 1062d, 1068d, 1074d, 1080d, 1086d, 1092d, 1098d, 1104d, 1110d, 1116d, 1122d, 1128d, 1134d, 1140d, 1146d, 1152d, 1158d, 1164d, 1170d, 1176d, 1182d, 1188d, 1194d, 1200d, 1206d, 1212d, 1218d, 1224d, 1230d, 1236d, 1242d, 1248d, 1254d, 1260d, 1266d, 1272d, 1278d, 1284d, 1290d, 1296d, 1302d, 1308d, 1314d, 1320d, 1326d, 1332d, 1338d, 1344d, 1350d, 1356d, 1362d, 1368d, 1374d, 1380d, 1386d, 1392d, 1398d, 1404d, 1410d, 1416d, 1422d, 1428d, 1434d, 1440d, 1446d, 1452d, 1458d, 1464d, 1470d, 1476d, 1482d, 1488d, 1494d, 1500d, 1506d, 1512d, 1518d, 1524d, 1530d, 1536d, 1542d, 1548d, 1554d, 1560d, 1566d, 1572d, 1578d, 1584d, 1590d, 1596d, 1602d, 1608d, 1614d, 1620d, 1626d, 1632d, 1638d, 1644d, 1650d, 1656d, 1662d, 1668d, 1674d, 1680d, 1686d, 1692d, 1698d, 1704d, 1710d, 1716d, 1722d, 1728d, 1734d, 1740d, 1746d, 1752d, 1758d, 1764d, 1770d, 1776d, 1782d, 1788d, 1794d, 1800d, 1806d, 1812d, 1818d, 1824d, 1830d, 1836d, 1842d, 1848d, 1854d, 1860d, 1866d, 1872d, 1878d, 1884d, 1890d, 1896d, 1902d, 1908d, 1914d, 1920d, 1926d, 1932d, 1938d, 1944d, 1950d, 1956d, 1962d, 1968d, 1974d, 1980d, 1986d, 1992d, 1998d, 2004d, 2010d, 2016d, 2022d, 2028d, 2034d, 2040d, 2046d, 2052d, 2058d, 2064d, 2070d, 2076d, 2082d, 2088d, 2094d, 2100d, 2106d, 2112d, 2118d, 2124d, 2130d, 2136d, 2142d, 2148d, 2154d, 2160d, 2166d, 2172d, 2178d, 2184d, 2190d, 2196d, 2202d, 2208d, 2214d, 2220d, 2226d, 2232d, 2238d, 2244d, 2250d, 2256d, 2262d, 2268d, 2274d, 2280d, 2286d, 2292d, 2298d, 2304d, 2310d, 2316d, 2322d, 2328d, 2334d, 2340d, 2346d, 2352d, 2358d, 2364d, 2370d, 2376d, 2382d, 2388d, 2394d, 2400d, 2406d, 2412d, 2418d, 2424d, 2430d, 2436d, 2442d, 2448d, 2454d, 2460d, 2466d, 2472d, 2478d, 2484d, 2490d, 2496d, 2502d, 2508d, 2514d, 2520d, 2526d, 2532d, 2538d, 2544d, 2550d, 2556d, 2562d, 2568d, 2574d, 2580d, 2586d, 2592d, 2598d, 2604d, 2610d, 2616d, 2622d, 2628d, 2634d, 2640d, 2646d, 2652d, 2658d, 2664d, 2670d, 2676d, 2682d, 2688d, 2694d, 2700d, 2706d, 2712d, 2718d, 2724d, 2730d, 2736d, 2742d, 2748d, 2754d, 2760d, 2766d, 2772d, 2778d, 2784d, 2790d, 2796d, 2802d, 2808d, 2814d, 2820d, 2826d, 2832d, 2838d, 2844d, 2850d, 2856d, 2862d, 2868d, 2874d, 2880d, 2886d, 2892d, 2898d, 2904d, 2910d, 2916d, 2922d, 2928d, 2934d, 2940d, 2946d, 2952d, 2958d, 2964d, 2970d, 2976d, 2982d, 2988d, 2994d, 3000d, 3006d, 3012d, 3018d, 3024d, 3030d, 3036d, 3042d, 3048d, 3054d, 3060d, 3066d, 3072d, 3078d, 3084d, 3090d, 3096d, 3102d, 3108d, 3114d, 3120d, 3126d, 3132d, 3138d, 3144d, 3150d, 3156d, 3162d, 3168d, 3174d, 3180d, 3186d, 3192d, 3198d, 3204d, 3210d, 3216d, 3222d, 3228d, 3234d, 3240d, 3246d, 3252d, 3258d, 3264d, 3270d, 3276d, 3282d, 3288d, 3294d, 3300d, 3306d, 3312d, 3318d, 3324d, 3330d, 3336d, 3342d, 3348d, 3354d, 3360d, 3366d, 3372d, 3378d, 3384d, 3390d, 3396d, 3402d, 3408d, 3414d, 3420d, 3426d, 3432d, 3438d, 3444d, 3450d, 3456d, 3462d, 3468d, 3474d, 3480d, 3486d, 3492d, 3498d, 3504d, 3510d, 3516d, 3522d, 3528d, 3534d, 3540d, 3546d, 3552d, 3558d, 3564d, 3570d, 3576d, 3582d, 3588d, 3594d, 3600d, 3606d, 3612d, 3618d, 3624d, 3630d, 3636d, 3642d, 3648d, 3654d, 3660d, 3666d, 3672d, 3678d, 3684d, 3690d, 3696d, 3702d, 3708d, 3714d, 3720d, 3726d, 3732d, 3738d, 3744d, 3750d, 3756d, 3762d, 3768d, 3774d, 3780d, 3786d, 3792d, 3798d, 3804d, 3810d, 3816d, 3822d, 3828d, 3834d, 3840d, 3846d, 3852d, 3858d, 3864d, 3870d, 3876d, 3882d, 3888d, 3894d, 3900d, 3906d, 3912d, 3918d, 3924d, 3930d, 3936d, 3942d, 3948d, 3954d, 3960d, 3966d, 3972d, 3978d, 3984d, 3990d, 3996d, 4002d, 4008d, 4014d, 4020d, 4026d, 4032d, 4038d, 4044d, 4050d, 4056d, 4062d, 4068d, 4074d, 4080d, 4086d, 4092d, 4098d, 4104d, 4110d, 4116d, 4122d, 4128d, 4134d, 4140d, 4146d, 4152d, 4158d, 4164d, 4170d, 4176d, 4182d, 4188d, 4194d, 4200d, 4206d, 4212d, 4218d, 4224d, 4230d, 4236d, 4242d, 4248d, 4254d, 4260d, 4266d, 4272d, 4278d, 4284d, 4290d, 4296d, 4302d, 4308d, 4314d, 4320d, 4326d, 4332d, 4338d, 4344d, 4350d, 4356d, 4362d, 4368d, 4374d, 4380d, 4386d, 4392d, 4398d, 4404d, 4410d, 4416d, 4422d, 4428d, 4434d, 4440d, 4446d, 4452d, 4458d, 4464d, 4470d, 4476d, 4482d, 4488d, 4494d, 4500d, 4506d, 4512d, 4518d, 4524d, 4530d, 4536d, 4542d, 4548d, 4554d, 4560d, 4566d, 4572d, 4578d, 4584d, 4590d, 4596d, 4602d, 4608d, 4614d, 4620d, 4626d, 4632d, 4638d, 4644d, 4650d, 4656d, 4662d, 4668d, 4674d, 4680d, 4686d, 4692d, 4698d, 4704d, 4710d, 4716d, 4722d, 4728d, 4734d, 4740d, 4746d, 4752d, 4758d, 4764d, 4770d, 4776d, 4782d, 4788d, 4794d, 4800d, 4806d, 4812d, 4818d, 4824d, 4830d, 4836d, 4842d, 4848d, 4854d, 4860d, 4866d, 4872d, 4878d, 4884d, 4890d, 4896d, 4902d, 4908d, 4914d, 4920d, 4926d, 4932d, 4938d, 4944d, 4950d, 4956d, 4962d, 4968d, 4974d, 4980d, 4986d, 4992d, 4998d, 5004d, 5010d, 5016d, 5022d, 5028d, 5034d, 5040d, 5046d, 5052d, 5058d, 5064d, 5070d, 5076d, 5082d, 5088d, 5094d, 5100d, 5106d, 5112d, 5118d, 5124d, 5130d, 5136d, 5142d, 5148d, 5154d, 5160d, 5166d, 5172d, 5178d, 5184d, 5190d, 5196d, 5202d, 5208d, 5214d, 5220d, 5226d, 5232d, 5238d, 5244d, 5250d, 5256d, 5262d, 5268d, 5274d, 5280d, 5286d, 5292d, 5298d, 5304d, 5310d, 5316d, 5322d, 5328d, 5334d, 5340d, 5346d, 5352d, 5358d, 5364d, 5370d, 5376d, 5382d, 5388d, 5394d, 5400d, 5406d, 5412d, 5418d, 5424d, 5430d, 5436d, 5442d, 5448d, 5454d, 5460d, 5466d, 5472d, 5478d, 5484d, 5490d, 5496d, 5502d, 5508d, 5514d, 5520d, 5526d, 5532d, 5538d, 5544d, 5550d, 5556d, 5562d, 5568d, 5574d, 5580d, 5586d, 5592d, 5598d, 5604d, 5610d, 5616d, 5622d, 5628d, 5634d, 5640d, 5646d, 5652d, 5658d, 5664d, 5670d, 5676d, 5682d, 5688d, 5694d, 5700d, 5706d, 5712d, 5718d, 5724d, 5730d, 5736d, 5742d, 5748d, 5754d, 5760d, 5766d, 5772d, 5778d, 5784d, 5790d, 5796d, 5802d, 5808d, 5814d, 5820d, 5826d, 5832d, 5838d, 5844d, 5850d, 5856d, 5862d, 5868d, 5874d, 5880d, 5886d, 5892d, 5898d, 5904d, 5910d, 5916d, 5922d, 5928d, 5934d, 5940d, 5946d, 5952d, 5958d, 5964d, 5970d, 5976d, 5982d, 5988d, 5994d, 6000d, 6006d, 6012d, 6018d, 6024d, 6030d, 6036d, 6042d, 6048d, 6054d, 6060d, 6066d, 6072d, 6078d, 6084d, 6090d, 6096d, 6102d, 6108d, 6114d, 6120d, 6126d, 6132d, 6138d, 6144d, 6150d, 6156d, 6162d, 6168d, 6174d, 6180d, 6186d, 6192d, 6198d, 6204d, 6210d, 6216d, 6222d, 6228d, 6234d, 6240d, 6246d, 6252d, 6258d, 6264d, 6270d, 6276d, 6282d, 6288d, 6294d, 6300d, 6306d, 6312d, 6318d, 6324d, 6330d, 6336d, 6342d, 6348d, 6354d, 6360d, 6366d, 6372d, 6378d, 6384d, 6390d, 6396d, 6402d, 6408d, 6414d, 6420d, 6426d, 6432d, 6438d, 6444d, 6450d, 6456d, 6462d, 6468d, 6474d, 6480d, 6486d, 6492d, 6498d, 6504d, 6510d, 6516d, 6522d, 6528d, 6534d, 6540d, 6546d, 6552d, 6558d, 6564d, 6570d, 6576d, 6582d, 6588d, 6594d, 6600d, 6606d, 6612d, 6618d, 6624d, 6630d, 6636d, 6642d, 6648d, 6654d, 6660d, 6666d, 6672d, 6678d, 6684d, 6690d, 6696d, 6702d, 6708d, 6714d, 6720d, 6726d, 6732d, 6738d, 6744d, 6750d, 6756d, 6762d, 6768d, 6774d, 6780d, 6786d, 6792d, 6798d, 6804d, 6810d, 6816d, 6822d, 6828d, 6834d, 6840d, 6846d, 6852d, 6858d, 6864d, 6870d, 6876d, 6882d, 6888d, 6894d, 6900d, 6906d, 6912d, 6918d, 6924d, 6930d, 6936d, 6942d, 6948d, 6954d, 6960d, 6966d, 6972d, 6978d, 6984d, 6990d, 6996d, 7002d, 7008d, 7014d, 7020d, 7026d, 7032d, 7038d, 7044d, 7050d, 7056d, 7062d, 7068d, 7074d, 7080d, 7086d, 7092d, 7098d, 7104d, 7110d, 7116d, 7122d, 7128d, 7134d, 7140d, 7146d, 7152d, 7158d, 7164d, 7170d, 7176d, 7182d, 7188d, 7194d, 7200d, 7206d, 7212d, 7218d, 7224d, 7230d, 7236d, 7242d, 7248d, 7254d, 7260d, 7266d, 7272d, 7278d, 7284d, 7290d, 7296d, 7302d, 7308d, 7314d, 7320d, 7326d, 7332d, 7338d, 7344d, 7350d, 7356d, 7362d, 7368d, 7374d, 7380d, 7386d, 7392d, 7398d, 7404d, 7410d, 7416d, 7422d, 7428d, 7434d, 7440d, 7446d, 7452d, 7458d, 7464d, 7470d, 7476d, 7482d, 7488d, 7494d, 7500d, 7506d, 7512d, 7518d, 7524d, 7530d, 7536d, 7542d, 7548d, 7554d, 7560d, 7566d, 7572d, 7578d, 7584d, 7590d, 7596d, 7602d, 7608d, 7614d, 7620d, 7626d, 7632d, 7638d, 7644d, 7650d, 7656d, 7662d, 7668d, 7674d, 7680d, 7686d, 7692d, 7698d, 7704d, 7710d, 7716d, 7722d, 7728d, 7734d, 7740d, 7746d, 7752d, 7758d, 7764d, 7770d, 7776d, 7782d, 7788d, 7794d, 7800d, 7806d, 7812d, 7818d, 7824d, 7830d, 7836d, 7842d, 7848d, 7854d, 7860d, 7866d, 7872d, 7878d, 7884d, 7890d, 7896d, 7902d, 7908d, 7914d, 7920d, 7926d, 7932d, 7938d, 7944d, 7950d, 7956d, 7962d, 7968d, 7974d, 7980d, 7986d, 7992d, 7998d, 8004d, 8010d, 8016d, 8022d, 8028d, 8034d, 8040d, 8046d, 8052d, 8058d, 8064d, 8070d, 8076d, 8082d, 8088d, 8094d, 8100d, 8106d, 8112d, 8118d, 8124d, 8130d, 8136d, 8142d, 8148d, 8154d, 8160d, 8166d, 8172d, 8178d, 8184d, 8190d, 8196d, 8202d, 8208d, 8214d, 8220d, 8226d, 8232d, 8238d, 8244d, 8250d, 8256d, 8262d, 8268d, 8274d, 8280d, 8286d, 8292d, 8298d, 8304d, 8310d, 8316d, 8322d, 8328d, 8334d, 8340d, 8346d, 8352d, 8358d, 8364d, 8370d, 8376d, 8382d, 8388d, 8394d, 8400d, 8406d, 8412d, 8418d, 8424d, 8430d, 8436d, 8442d, 8448d, 8454d, 8460d, 8466d, 8472d, 8478d, 8484d, 8490d, 8496d, 8502d, 8508d, 8514d, 8520d, 8526d, 8532d, 8538d, 8544d, 8550d, 8556d, 8562d, 8568d, 8574d, 8580d, 8586d, 8592d, 8598d, 8604d, 8610d, 8616d, 8622d, 8628d, 8634d, 8640d, 8646d, 8652d, 8658d, 8664d, 8670d, 8676d, 8682d, 8688d, 8694d, 8700d, 8706d, 8712d, 8718d, 8724d, 8730d, 873

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From My Memories, 1830 1913

LADY JULIA FOLLET, MYSELF, AND DICK GOODALL WITH THE QUEEN'S BUCKHOUNDS
(From a painting, at Ginton)

OF THE IMITATION OF CHRIST.

Fræ Latin Intil Scots By HENRY P. CAMERON, M.A.
With Foreword by W. M. METCALF, D.D. 2S 6d net
(Gardner, Paisley)

As, unfortunately, we have many persons, with hearing upon this literary curiosity who are restrained to fall back upon those expressed in Mr. Metcalf's foreword which he speaks very highly of the manner of Mr. Cameron Scots and the difficulty of writing that "Mr. Cameron," he says, "has written in as pure Scots as it is perhaps possible to write. Perhaps, too, he has shown us how Scots ought to be written. If so his version may become of standard value. At any rate, he has done a piece of work which for most Scotsmen has a charm of its own which can scarcely fail to ensure its popularity and success. One feature of the volume ought to be mentioned, and that is the exhaustive glossary at the end."

POLICE WORK FROM WITHIN.

By HARGRAVE L. ADAM Illustrated 6s. (Holden & Hardingham)

A capital account of the elaborate machinery used to safeguard life and property, to investigate crime, and detect and punish its perpetrators. The reader is introduced to the leading men in the "Council of Seven," that informal committee comprising the heads of the various departments at the "Yard," and hears many inside facts concerning the great cases of present and past days. Hitherto unpublished details are given regarding, amongst many others, the "Jack the Ripper" horrors of 1888, the strange case of James Canham Read, the Moat Farm mystery, and the Clapham Common murder. The photographic work, the process of detecting forgeries, and the marvellously efficient system of finger print recording, are explained, as well as the method, founded on years of experience, of discovering and following-up clues. A part of the book which will prove as absorbing as any, perhaps, is that devoted to a description of the Black Museum, the most peculiar museum in London. Mr. Adam discusses, in addition to police work proper, the relative positions of the sexes, marriage and crime, the receiver of stolen goods, and solitons and crime.

INGATESTONE AND THE ESSEX GREAT ROAD, WITH FRYERNING.

By F. I. WILDE Illustrated 10s 6d net (Humphrey Milford)

We thought when we opened "Ingatestone and the Essex Great Road, with Fryerning," that we had come upon a book of purely antiquarian lore, but we had not read far before we realised that it was this and something of far wider and more deeply human import. It is the sort of book that ought to be written; we want more of them; it is history and the romance of reality in their most alluring guise. The real history of England is not made up wholly of the record of noisy national events and the biographies of the people's pushful leaders and rulers; the simpler, quiet, intimate annals of the common life of the people are an integral part of it, and in unfolding a story of the everyday lives of mostly unimportant persons, who lived and laboured in the two Essex parishes of Ingatestone and Fryerning, from before the days of the Saxons down to about a century ago, Mr. E. E. Wilde has vividly epitomised the changing manners and customs and general inner or under-life of the nation. He has dredged up curious facts out of old Church registers, ancient MSS. at the British Museum, and elsewhere, State papers, out-of-the-way memoirs, and documents of various sorts, and, in the result, you have a many-coloured local history that is of national significance.

From Police Work from Within (Holden & Hardingham).

POLICE DOGS, PARIS.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From The Cornish Coast and Moors
(Greenish)

DISTORTED STRATA
GULL ROCK

MY RECOLLECTIONS AND REFLECTIONS

By YOSHIO MARKINO Illustrated G. not (Chatto & Winhus)

Mr Yoshio Markino is a great man at least he is doing a great work. Both as a punter and a writer he is a man of charm, talent and charming temper with a kind of feminine receptiveness and grace. Partly by reason of his qualities of character but mainly by a chapter of happy accidents he has become a figure of higher importance than his artistic talents alone would have made him. He has succeeded Iascadio Heurn as the chief interpreter between the Japanese and the Anglo-Saxon nations, and he is we think better equipped for his work than Heurn was. Let Heurn was at first obliged to admit that the depths of the Oriental mind remained a mystery to him. Mr Markino can unveil this mystery in a very delightful way. He has a passion for talking about himself and revealing the racial elements in his culture. Pure friendliness towards his English acquaintances is the motive of these interesting revelations. He wants them to understand him as clearly and as fully as he understands them. So in an outburst of confidence he talks about himself and his Japanese friends. After a long and bitter struggle for both food and knowledge he has assimilated most of the best elements in our civilisation and this enables him to talk to us in our own language and adopt our point of view when explaining his own native ideas and feelings. His language as is well known is more remarkable for expressiveness than for correctness for he has so entirely devoted himself to the study of Western art that he has never yet had time to master any part of our literature. He thinks out his sentences in Japanese and then looks word by word for an English equivalent. Hence the naïveté the grotesque charm and curious freshness of phrase of his writings. But in spite of all that he has absorbed in the Western world, his mind is that of an Oriental. His father was a famous student of Chinese literature even in childhood Mr Markino had many of the Chinese classics off by heart and they still form the grand elements in all his ways of thinking and feeling. On this base of Chinese culture is built the Japanese tradition and now Mr Markino is trying to understand himself in the later light of his English ideas. The process is extraordinarily interesting to an English reader.

TRAVELLING PALACES.

By J. A. JEFFERIES Illustrated G. not (Pitman)

This book deals in an interesting style with the development of the passenger accommodation of the steamship from the earlier days to the present time. It bears a subtitle Luxury in Passenger Steamships and the illustrations relating to such vessels as the Imperator Aquitania, Mauretania Olympia and Victor Hugo go far to prove that the word luxury is no overstatement when applied to modern steamship travel. The author in an interesting manner traces the development of the passenger liner from quite early times down to the present day showing at first very gradual development of comfort accommodation speed and the means of ensuring safety which things of late years have advanced much more rapidly. It is indeed very difficult for us to understand how uncomfortable ocean travel was even half a century ago. Three quarters of a century back when it may be said to

From Travels in the Pyrenees
(Long).

IN A CATALAN VILLAGE.

NISBET'S CHRISTMAS BOOKS

NOW READY

PHIZ AND DICKENS

By EDGAR BROWNE. Royal 8vo With many Illustrations, some hitherto unpublished in colour and black and white 15s. net

Limited edition Demy 4to of 175 copies 32s. net

"Full of good things—a pot pourri of reminiscence, criticism and anecdote. One of the most successful and entertaining volumes of recollections that have been published for some time past. —Liverpool Courier

THE EMPRESS FREDERICK: A Memoir

Nothing could be more delicate than the manner in which the tragic element in the Empress Frederick's life is brought out in this memoir. Times

A deeply interesting and convincing study. —Daily Telegraph

Free from all suspicion of whitewashing. —Morning Post

15s. net

PILLARS OF SOCIETY

By A. G. GARDINER. With over forty photographs.

7s. 6d. net

It may be said at once that the book is excellent in its readable, most suggestive, most just and most true. —Sir

WILLIAM ROBERTSON NICOLL in The British Weekly

IN MY STUDY

By CANON ANTHONY DEANE. Extra Crown 8vo

5s. net

I can imagine few more suitable volumes to read than this. —Piccadilly

AFRICA IN TRANSFORMATION

By REV. NORMAN MACLEAN, Author of Can the World be Won for Christ? With many Photographs. Demy 8vo 5s. net

The recent visit of Mr Maclean to Africa as a representative of the Churches in Scotland to the Mission field has resulted in a volume of impressions and criticism of the utmost importance.

ESSAYS IN REBELLION

6s. net

By H. W. NELVINSON. Author of Essays in Freedom. With Portrait. Post 8vo

GREEK ART AND NATIONAL LIFE

7s. 6d. net

By S. C. KAINLS SMITH. Illustrated. Demy 8vo

STUDIES IN CHARACTER

3s. 6d. net

By the late Rev. WILLIAM WATSON D.D. With Portrait

THE PROWLERS

By F. S. MARS. Author of On Nature's Trail. Illustrated by WALWICK REYNOLDS

6s. net

THE NEW FORESTERS

5s. net.

By WILLIAM CAINF. Second Impression in the Press

COMMON SENSE AIDS IN ILLNESS

2s. net

By Sister JENNINGS GOODLEY. Crown 8vo

ATTIC SALT

2s. 6d. net

By Rev. SILBY HENRLY

GIFT BOOKS AND JUVENILES

THE CORAL ISLAND

10s. 6d. net

By R. M. BAILLANTYNE. With Preface by SIR JAMES BARRIE.

Illustrated in Colour by SIR RIMUS SCOTT

This edition is a truly sumptuous one and well worth the half guinea at which it is priced. —Sunday Times

THE SWORD OF DELIVERANCE

6s. net.

By Captain CHARLES GILSON. Illustrated in Colour. Large Post 8vo

A BRAVE LITTLE ROYALIST

5s. net

By DOROTHEA MOORE. Illustrated in Colour. Large Square Demy

Write for NISBET'S AUTUMN LIST, 22 Berners Street, London, W.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From My Recollections and Reflections
(Chatto & Windus).

MY NEW STUDIO.

have become a serious problem, what with weak engines, small steamers, paddle wheels instead of screws, and execrable accommodation, travelling was indeed a trying and even harassing performance. The Liverpool Mercury, giving an account of the Liverpool in October, 1838, speaks of the "main or after cabin" as a splendid apartment, 58 feet, in length, 28 feet 9 inches in width at one end, slightly narrowing to 22 feet 4 inches at the stern, and 8 feet in height. From the old "liner de luxe" of those days to the Olympic dining-room 92 feet in width and 114 feet in length, is indeed a far cry. Not merely because of the difference of the dimensions, but from the fact that this dining-room is of course only one of many rooms of almost similar size on the same steamer. The first vessel to cross the Atlantic, the Sirius, took seventeen days for the voyage. She was only a little coasting steamer, and made her trip under steam and sail. Nowadays Atlantic voyagers think themselves hardly dealt by if they are six days from shore to shore. Whilst Mr Fletcher's book will be of interest to the travelling public and that large class who do most of their travelling by the fire-side by means of maps and travel books, we cannot help feeling a little disappointed that he has not given more information regarding the early days of ocean travel. There are many excellent illustrations which add materially to the value of the book, and we can quite recognise the difficulties by which the author naturally was beset when seeking to deal with so large and important a subject within a comparatively brief space. Should a second edition of the work be called for, it would be a happy thought for the author to add a chapter dealing a little with the romance of travel across the Atlantic Ferry.

SOCIAL AND POLITICAL REMINISCENCES

By the LADY SOUTHWARK With Illustrations 12s 6d. net
(Williams & Norgate.)

"In the following pages I claim only, with few exceptions, to record small events, but, after all, life is principally made up of trifles."

In recording the "small events" of half a century spent in interesting social and political circles, Lady Southwark has given us a volume not only entertaining, but of some more serious value. Historians know that not infrequently some "trifle" recorded in an old diary, has proved a fact, and settled a question of important historical worth. And who will deny, either, that in the great "Diary" of Samuel Pepys, the trifles there recorded make often the best reading?

Lady Southwark is a daughter of the late Thomas Chambers, elected Common Serjeant in 1857, and the wife of Lord Southwark, formerly Mr. Richard Causton, M.P. for Colchester and, later, for West Southwark, at one time Junior Whip, then Junior Lord, and Paymaster-General. Lord Southwark has worked hard and faithfully for his party, and his wife has worked well and discreetly for him. From the early days of her marriage she has been well known and popular in political circles, but never a frequent of the House of Commons. "I was never a note of the Ladies' Gallery, nor did I constantly seek out my husband at the House, as some M.P.'s wives did, thereby evoking considerable comment. I doubt if I sat in it more than a dozen times during the thirty years that Richard spent in Parliament. I am also old-fashioned enough to dislike the development of tea on the Terrace, which has turned that spot, sacred at one time to our legislators, into a species of restaurant."

It is because the author is, as she says, old-fashioned, that we get such vivid and charming pictures of mid-Victorian scenes and ways of life. "In those days," she writes of her childhood, "my mother always spoke of going 'into London,' when she wanted to do any shopping in Regent Street. Holland Park was only just being cut up for building purposes, and I remember my parents' surprise at finding bathrooms in the new houses, and Petersham Terrace, where I went to children's parties at an Alderman Allen's, had fields facing it. The Arcade, in Regent Street, I fancy, was a shopping centre in those days, and I once at Christmas time saw Tom

From Travelling Palaces
(Pitman).

SWIMMING BATH ON S.S. "INFERATOR"
(By permission of the Hamburg America Line.)

CONSTABLE'S XMAS GIFT BOOKS.

THE TWO CHIEF BIOGRAPHIES OF THE YEAR

THE LIFE OF HENRY LABOUCHERE

By ALGAR LABOUCHERE THOROLD. With Frontispiece in Photogravure 18s. net.

"A vivid portrait of the man and an enlightening record of his work."

"A book of high historical value"—PUNCH.

THE LIFE OF JOHN BRIGHT

By G. M. TREVELYAN. Second Impression, Illustrated, 15s. net.

Author of "Garibaldi's Defence of the Roman Empire," etc

"The book, fully commensurate with the fame of its subject, will take its place with the standard lives of statesmen"—THE DAILY TELEGRAPH.

SUPERB CHRISTMAS GIFT BOOKS.

THE RUSSIAN BALLET

By A. E. Johnson

With 16 Illustrations in Colour and numerous Black and White Drawings by René Bull 21/- net.

Edition de Luxe, already sold out

"This beautiful book, by its vivid, simple methods of explaining each tale, aided by the wonderful, almost dazzling, pictures by the well-known artist, it must take its place as a standard work on the subject"—THE ACADEMY

HANS ANDERSEN'S FAIRY TALES

Illustrated in Colour and Black and White by

W. Heath Robinson 10/6 net

Edition de Luxe, already sold out

"The best book I have seen for the Christmas season. The charm of this particular edition is in its coloured illustrations"—SPRING

BILL THE MINDER

Written and Illustrated in Colour and in Black and White by

W. Heath Robinson 10/6 net

"A handsome exterior is a fitting, indeed, the only suitable setting for a richly imaginative original book. It would be a delicious book even without its decorations in the way of coloured plates and drawings"—ATHLETIC

Limited Edition de Luxe, 10s. net. Signed by the Author

THE ARABIAN NIGHTS

Illustrated with about 150 Illustrations, including 20 Coloured Plates by René Bull 10/6 net.

"This is a sumptuous edition, and should rejoice the heart of any child lucky enough to be presented with it"—ATHLETIC

Beautifully illustrated in colour and numerous fine drawings by the Japanese Artist in London

YOSHIO MARKINO.

A LITTLE PILGRIMAGE IN ITALY

6/- net. By Olive M. Potter

Square crown 8vo. New and cheaper Edition

NEW POETRY.

ODD NUMBERS

3/6 net. By Dum-Dum

Author of "Rhymes of the East," "The Cracking of Thorns," "A Fool's Paradise." Crown 8vo

MOODS AND METRES

By Charles Newton-Robinson

With a Biographical Note and a Portrait of the Author in Photogravure 400 Copies, Imperial 8mo., 8s. net. 1000 Copies, large paper, 7s. 6d. net

PEACOCK PIE

2/6 net. By Walter de la Mare

"Will assuredly delight the little people. It is a book in which the sheer nonsense of Edward Lear or Lewis Carroll is combined with something of the tenderness of Stevenson"—THE DAILY TELEGRAPH

A DOME OF MANY-COLOURED GLASS

5/- net. By Amy Lowell

"These poems show the influence of the Modern French School in the careful and delicate quality of their technique and in the subtle and sophisticated emotions with which they deal. But they are also infused with a very rare and unusual quality of emotion, which is lacking in so much of the work of to-day. 'The Road to Avignon' is one of the best lyrics of recent years."

J. M. SYNGE AND THE IRISH LITERARY THEATRE

7/6 net. By Maurice Bourgeois

Demy 8vo. Fully Illustrated

Mr. JOHN MAWHILL writes: "I let me congratulate you on a very remarkable piece of a rising, valuable and stimulating, just in its criticism and wonderful in its research and care. I am sure that you will find a great and general reward from all over the world wherever good work is known."

THE LIFE OF CHARLES ELIOT NORTON, from his letters and Note-books.

21/- net. Extra crown 8vo. 2 Vols.

"This is a book to enjoy and to cherish. In 1889 he (Norton) wrote the most interesting book—new book—that I have read in FitzGerald's 'Letters'. Readers of good taste and judgment will, we are sure not hesitate to apply these words to Norton's new letters."—THE TIMES

MEMOIRS OF LI HUNG CHANG

10/6 net

Being a selection from the Journals of the Viceroy, now first put into English and chronologically arranged. With a Frontispiece in Photogravure

MAS'ANIELLO A Neapolitan Tragedy

6/- net. By Marie Hay

Illustrated Frontispiece

Author of "Winter Queen," "German Poupardour," etc

TEN MORE PLAYS OF SHAKESPEARE

By The Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, MA., LL.D.

7/6 net

"The words one finds oneself using of Dr. Stopford Brooke's gift of appreciation are such words as 'inspiration' and 'insight'."—THE TIMES

"Sound, illuminating, distinguished work"—OBSERVER

NEW 6/- FICTION.

HAGAR

By Mary Johnston

Author of "The Old Dominion," "The Long Roll," etc
"The publication of a new story by the author of 'By Order of the Company' must be an event to a very large number of readers, and as 'Hagar' Miss Mary Johnston has produced a novel as remarkable as any that she has before given us."—THE DAILY TELEGRAPH

THE JUDGMENT OF THE SWORD

By Maud Diver

Author of "Capt. Desmond, V.C.," "The Hero of Ilcat," etc
"We have read the book with the greatest pleasure and admiration"—PALL MALL GAZETTE

THE DREAM SHIP

Cynthia Stockley

Author of "Poppy," "The Claw," etc

SECOND IMPRESSION

"The Dream Ship has, like all the writer's novels, the prime virtue of vitality. It is undeniably vivid."—THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN

NO PLACE LIKE HOME

John Trevena

Author of "Lura the Cruel," "Sleeping Waters," etc

OTHERWISE PHYLLIS

Meredith Nicholson

Author of "The House of a Thousand Candles," etc.

CONSTABLE & Co Ltd LONDON

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From Social and Political Reminiscences
(Williams & Norgate)

SKETCH BY THE LATE SIR
FRANK LOCKWOOD

Thumbs crack with its tiny bones passing down Regent Street. Every shop had holly and mistletoe and evergreens displayed in its window and Christmas cards with robins and snow scenes.

Glances of Queen Victoria driving by with Prince Albert and the Royal children of the late Princess Royal on her wedding day. Of Queen Alexandra as a bride elect entering London and captivating all hearts, and of later events of historical interest are given in these pages. We see election campaigns and scenes in the House. We have impressions of the reception of the news of Queen Victoria's death and of the end of the South African War. We get glimpses of Courts and of notable men. We realise party hopes and fears but we get nothing controversial.

The volume is enhanced by many clever portraits of celebrities drawn by the author's pencil and many anecdotes brighten its pages if they do not make them actually brilliant.

JIMMY GLOVER AND HIS FRIENDS

By J. M. GLOVER Illustrated 7s 6d net (Chatto & Windus)

What Jimmy Glover does not know of the Bohemian side of London life no one else will. Of the strange wild land of adventure between Drury Lane and Leicester Square he is now the uncrowned king. A talent for music, the most genial of temperaments and a gift for good fellowship have enabled him to win a position which he has further fortified by a genius for good stories. He has known every body worth knowing and he has a string of amusing tales about each historic figure of old London. His powers of memory are really enormous, and without the slightest effort he has filled his new book full of good things. It is all done in haphazard prodigality, and in the same jolly manner as if Jimmy were talking about old times over a glass and a cigar to the son of one of his numerous friends. Characters are sketched in brief and vivid flashes and a story or two is given by way of illustration. It is a splendid entertainment but Jimmy himself has grown tired of writing his reminiscences. He has found a more interesting task in collecting popular songs from the Victorian era to the near Georgian age. But we hope that when this labour of love is finished he will find time to give us still more chat and anecdotes.

OLD TESTAMENT LEGENDS

By M. R. JAMES Little D. with 10 Illustrations by H. J. Forster 3s 6d net (Longmans)

True scholarship underlies the excellent simplicity of this welcome book and the scholarship and simplicity combined have made it a book for readers of all ages. The legends which Dr. James tells in these pages are stories out of some of the less known Apocryphal books of the Old Testament and their interest is wide whether we look at them from the historical, the ecclesiastical or the romantic side. In a very delightful Preface the author explains the nature of his material and incidentally tells several other short legends which grew up by reason of somewhat difficult passages in the Bible. The legends in this volume are concerning the life and death of Adam and Eve, Abraham, the story of Joseph's wife, Asenath, Job, Solomon, the story of the death of Jeremiah and of Ahikar. They will prove real and fascinating to children, and will probably send them to their Bible with fresh interest. Mr. Ford is as ever in complete sympathy with his subject and his faithful delicate workmanship is a constant pleasure.

From Jimmy Glover and his Friends
(Chatto & Windus).

JAMES GLOVER
(By J. L. Dale)

Cambridge University Press

Collected Literary Essays, Classical and Modern. By A W VERRALL, Litt D Edited by M A Bayfield, M A, and J D Duff, M A With a Memoir and a portrait in photogravure Demy 8vo 10s 6d net

Collected Studies in Greek and Latin Scholarship. By A W VERRALL, Litt D Edited by M A Bayfield, M A, and J D Duff, M A Demy 8vo 10s 6d net

Forgiveness and Suffering. A Study of Christian belief written in the hope of indicating a new point of view, at which the author himself has arrived, but which he has not seen elsewhere described By DOUGLAS WHITE MD Crown 8vo 3s net

The Interregnum. Twelve Essays on Religious Doubt By K A P HILL, B A, M D Crown 8vo 4s 6d net

The Land of the Blue Poppy. Travels of a Naturalist in Eastern Tibet By I KINGDON WARD B A F R G S With 40 plates and 5 maps Royal 8vo 12s net

Desert and Water Gardens of the Red Sea. Being an account of the Natives and the Shore Formations of the Coast By CYRIL CROSSLAND, M A B Sc, I L S, I / S 91 maps and illustrations, 12 diagrams Royal 8vo 10s 6d net

Kindred and Clan in the Middle Ages and After. A Study in the Sociology of the Teutonic Races By BLRTHA S PHILLPOTTS, M A Demy 8vo 10s 6d net

The Puritans in Power. A Study in the History of the English Church from 1640 to 1660 By G B LATHAM, M A Demy 8vo 7s 6d net

The Publishers will be pleased to send post free to any address their new Illustrated List of Books suitable for presentation and also their Bulletin of new books which is published three times a year

London

Cambridge University Press

Fetter Lane

Ideal Christmas Gifts.

FRANK PALMER'S VELLUM PERPETUAL CALENDARS.

These well-known Calendars are artistically printed in Two Colours, bound in Simili Vellum, with Portrait 1/- net each

Also in Velvet Calf Bindings boxed, 3 6 net each

G B S (G Bernard Shaw)

OSCAR WILD

H G WELLS

ARNOLD BENNETT

NAPOLEON

ROBERT BLATCHFORD

WALTER PATER

IBSEN

FIELDING

J M BARRIE

SIR ARTHUR PINERO

GEORGE MOORE

NIETZSCHE

THOREAU

ANATOLE FRANCE

HILLAIRE BELLOC

MARIE CORELLI

BISMARCK

WILLIAM BLAKE

THE CALENDAR OF PHILOSOPHY

NATIONAL PROVERBS SERIES.

Printed throughout in Two Colours, with attractive Pictorial Covers by W H CAFFYN, bound in Vellum boards, 1/- net each

Also in special Limp Morocco finished Leather with Inlays, boxed, 2/6 net each

ENGLAND SCOTLAND

IRELAND
RUSSIA ARABIA

CHINA
JAPAN

SPAIN In Two Languages FRANCE ITALY

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

LITTLE WARS } by H G Wells, 2/6 net each.
FLOOR GAMES }
MAIDA'S LITTLE SHOP, by Ines H Gillmore 3/6 net.

From all Booksellers or from

FRANK PALMER, 12, Red Lion Court, London, E.C.

AUTHORS' AGENCY The SURREY LITERARY AGENCY place MSS. promptly and obtain the best possible terms, because it is conducted on literary lines and business principles. SPECIAL FACILITIES FOR PLACING NOVELS, Etc. Prospectus free on application to "Strathmore," Westbury Road, New Malden, Surrey (Kindly note new address.)

BOOKS (Secondhand) Catalogues post free. Thousands of books in stock, moderately priced R ATKINSON, 97, Sunderland Road, Forest Hill, London.

TYPEWRITING BY EXPERTS—Authors' MSS., etc., executed on the shortest notice Estimates free Southern Typewriting Co, 160, New Road, Portsmouth

Educated Woman (age 24) desires responsible post as Secretary Literary tastes, five years' business experience Address D. E. R., c/o The Bookman, 20, Warwick Square, London, E C

AUTHORS' MSS. TYPEWRITTEN accurately and promptly 9d. 1,000 words. (Postage inclusive). Excellent testimonials. Miss Doyle, 16, The Steyne, Worthing, Sussex.

GLAISHER'S CHRISTMAS CATALOGUE AND THE DECEMBER REMAINDER LIST (No. 400) of Book Bargains now ready

ALL BOOK LOVERS SHOULD APPLY FOR THESE LISTS WHICH CONTAIN MANY EXCELLENT BOOKS FOR CHRISTMAS PRESENTS

Wm GLAISHER, Ltd, Booksellers, 265, High Holborn, London

All books are in new condition as when originally published the secondhand books kept

From The Mounted Police of Natal
(Murray).

ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-SIX PRISONERS ON TRIAL FOR TAKING PART IN A FACTION FIGHT.

THE MOUNTED POLICE OF NATAL

By H. P. HOLT, V. an Intro-
SIR J. C. DARTNELL on Vol. I

To those who know that the Natal Police have a fighting record second to that of no similar body of men in any part of the world, the title of this book will sufficiently indicate its contents. It is full of the romance of adventure in the outlands of the earth. When General Sir John Dartnell formed the corps in 1874, he arranged that all officers were to be promoted from the ranks. The result was that the Natal Police offered an open career to any man of ambition, and lovers of adventure, eager for the chance of winning distinction, flocked to the leader of the small corps from our universities and public schools. They were trained till they were as tough as leather and hard as iron, for the Zulus under Cetewayo were preparing for battle, and the police force had to make up in efficiency what it lacked in numbers. In 1879 the troopers showed the stuff they were made of. Some of them faced slaughter and fought to a rush under the shadow of Isandhlwana, their horses were bucketed close to them, but making no attempt to retire from the overwhelming Zulu impi, they used their last cartridge and fell beneath the assegais. Some of them also helped to hold Rorke's Drift. At Majuba, the troopers were held in reserve as cavalry, and could only help the fugitives breaking and pouring down the lost height. They took a very active part in the last South African War, but being split up into small detachments they were unable to win distinction as a body. Acting as both soldiers and policemen, they have had their full of adventure among the black tribes, and often save a big war by a mixture of tact and bluff and intrepidity. Now they are losing their identity by being absorbed in the South African Constabulary, but their fine history as related by Mr. Holt will never be forgotten. He has told their story in exactly the right way; not unduly emphasising the romance of it—there was no need to do that—but making us realise it as it was in reality. This is a book to be read.

Winter Sports in Switzerland
(Allen).

CHURCH LEAP, GRESTA RUN.

THE BOOKMAN
CHRISTMAS
SUPPLEMENT

FICTION
AND
MISCELLANEOUS
LITERATURE

A black and white photograph of a woman sitting in a chair, wearing a light-colored dress, with a large, patterned curtain in the background. The image is grainy and has a high-contrast, vintage feel.

From The Eagle's Talon
(P 1 1)

THE BLACKSMITH BUYS PETER'S FIRST ROSE

A curious conviction of the modern publisher is that the novel reader prefers to indulge in his favourite pastime when the weather is unpleasant. Even in a cosy corner by the fire-side the wind howling in the chimney rain or and a Month<sup>1</sup> used to amuse himself between dinner and bed time by dozing sometimes by sleeping in a repulsively unromantic manner. If he had had the sense to read a novel—aloud if he were a good reader—or to do something there can be very little doubt that his wife would have got on with him better. Even if you are silent you are more companionable awake than asleep, and besides it is silly to be rude to your wife, as in Theodora's case it led to tragedy. For after five years of married drudgery she had a month's holiday away from home fell deeply in love with another man and returned to find her husband if possible more callous and unpleasant than ever. Perhaps it was just as well that she took and died pretty quickly afterwards though I cannot see any artistic reason for killing her off and feel quite certain that in actual life she would have probably

SHE MANAGED TO GET INTO MY ARMS ALTHOUGH THEY COULD NOT HOLD HER

I notice that the husband of Theodora the heroine of Five Years

<sup>1</sup> Five Years and a Month By Fanny Morris Wood 6s
(Duckworth)
<sup>2</sup> The Rut By J Hamilton Moore 6s (Erskine Macdonald)

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

very good one. Dolly Armitage, the heroine, is forty-three and her children are grown-up. She has grown so thoroughly accustomed to the rut of the title that her comfortable, dull narrow mode of life has become almost second nature to her. Almost but not quite, for, though she is unaware of it, she is naturally romantic and of course the rut is exactly the reverse of that. So when a philanderer comes along—well, the publisher tells you that with "a little more imagination she might have been a second Madame Bovary." But she wasn't, which is precisely her tragedy. For her husband found her out and "forgave" her in the brutally uncompromising manner peculiar to his class and the philanderer ran away with her pretty daughter. So Dolly's case is a good deal autobiography in novel form. This is to serve as his new book and the one condition which he makes with himself is that the truth shall be told throughout in the most rigorously legal manner. Fortunately and rather refreshingly this does not entail a very large amount of

GEORGE WASHINGTON
AND MARTHA CUSTIS
(From a drawing by Clara M. Burd)
Frontispiece to Threads of Grey and Gold
(Putnam)

From Adam Bede
(Chambers)

SHE COULD NOT PREVENT HIM FROM SEEING HER FACE

worse at the end than it was at the beginning. There is some really excellent drawing of character in this book and in the figure of Dolly's lover, pretentious, cautious and selfish Mr. Hamilton Moore scores a triumph. Few readers will remain unmoved by the tragic development of "The Rut."

Mr. William Hewlett's new book is another realistic novel, very carefully and convincingly worked out but containing perhaps almost more promise than performance. His hero Hugh Middlecomb having reached a certain point in his development as an author has determined in the most approved modern fashion to write his

* "Telling the Truth" By William Hewlett 6s (Becker)

her life's unfulfilled desire and travel in the East. So for a start she goes to

The Unconscious Quest By J. Reid Matheson 6s (Sidgwick & Jackson)

uninteresting detail, Mr. Hewlett is too clever a writer for that. But it does mean that a good number of the most important incidents would shock Mrs. Grundy. After all I suppose the absolute truth about a good number of people would be rather alarming though I feel still that Mr. Hewlett lays too much stress upon Middlecomb's merely sexual experiences and that there are far too many of them for such a clever man. Nevertheless, "Telling the Truth" is a very honest and capable piece of work and I have a good deal of admiration for it.

Mr. or more probably Miss E. Reid Matheson's "The Unconscious Quest" is of rather a different type and is decidedly difficult to place. Mrs. Lang, an English girl in the fifties with a couple of grown-up girls, likes at last to indulge

From the paper jacket of "Avanti!"
(Revell)

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

Cairo, where she makes the acquaintance of a young Turkish gentleman, introduced to her by a fellow-passenger on board her boat. For some reason or other beyond my comprehension she finds him immensely fascinating, and after a long struggle with herself she has just consented to marry him when she is forced to return to England on account of the illness of one of her daughters. So far as the plot goes, that is the whole of this book, which interested me more as a guide to Egypt than as a novel.

Another sentimental guide-book of this kind is Miss Anna Fuller's "A Venetian June,"

* "A Venetian June" By Anna Fuller With 16 Illustrations in Colour by Frederick S. Coburn 10s. 6d. net (Putnam)

From The Chow Chow (Putnam)

From My Dog (Allen).

"THE ONLY BEING THAT HAS FOUND AN INDUBITABLY TANGIBLE GOD."

which Messrs Putnam have just published in an elaborate and beautiful form, with excellent illustrations in colour by Frederick S. Coburn. There is some good work here, though I cannot help feeling that Miss Fuller would have done better if she had made up her mind definitely as to whether she was or was not writing a novel. But on this point the reading public obviously does not agree with me, or there would have been no demand for this édition de luxe. Yet another volume of a very similar type is Miss Augusta Gordon Watson's "In Spain with Peggy." Here are two love stories, with complications, both of them ending satisfactorily, and here, too, is an excellent superficial guide to the principal "sights" in Spain. It is all quite pleasantly and apparently fairly efficiently done, and it reminds me of nothing so much as a Williamson book without a motor interest.

"A British Dog in France" is quite out of the usual run. While not exactly a novel, it is obviously fiction, and I have no hesitation in including it here. Fox, the hero, writes his autobiography, and recounts a series of adventures that are uncommonly varied. I should think, even for those of a truant dog in a foreign country. However, Mr Harrison Barker may be warmly congratulated upon a successful piece of "characterisation," and his story should bring vividly home to the public the cruelty with which performing dogs are nearly always treated. The humorously fanciful illustrations of Mr Brightwell are in themselves worth the price asked for the book.

Returning to the novel proper, a batch of well-known authors deserves more lengthy notice than, unfortunately, I have space for here. Of "Writ in Water" I can only say that it exhibits all Miss Grier's accustomed skill in the telling of her story and the firm handling of character. This tale of a rising of negroes on the Island of Lovodic—in the "Amerindian" Ocean—is very probably founded upon some

* "In Spain with Peggy" By Augusta Gordon Watson With 12 Illustrations from Photographs by Francis Anderson, 7s. 6d. net (Laurie)

* "A British Dog in France" By E. Harrison Barker With 12 Full-page and 31 Text Illustrations by L. R. Brightwell 6s. net (Chatto & Windus)

* "Writ in Water." By Sydney C. Grier. With 4 Illustrations by A. Pearce, 6s. (Blackwood.)

From The Chow Chow (Pisman)

episode in our colonial history with which I am unfamiliar. But this is not a matter of great moment, for, whether or not it be the case, the historical and political aspects of the book are relegated to their proper place in the background, where they happen also to be most effective. The plot is equally intriguing and thrilling—in fact, "Writ in Water" is unquestionably one of the best books with which I deal in this article. Admirers of Miss Grier's talent, by the way, will be able to classify it when they are told that it is included in the author's "Century" series.

Mr John Oxenham is one of those authors who may be described best as "reliable." If you have liked his other books you may be quite certain that you will like his new one. "Red Wrath"<sup>9</sup> deals with life in the curious little Isles of Chausey (which are no great distance from our own Channel Islands) and in Paris during and after the Franco-Prussian War. It is an exciting story, with no dramatic detail omitted, and in the graceful figure of Alette Mr Oxenham has added another to his long list of plucky, faithful, and altogether charming heroines. The illustrations, from photographs, are interesting rather than beautiful, but they may have the effect of enticing some visitors to what must be, I am sure, a little-known part of France. Anyhow, I want to go to the Isles de Chausey.

Miss Arabella Kenealy's work is always good, but she seems to be a little tired in "The Painted Lady"<sup>10</sup> which is interesting chiefly as a tour de force. The main plot is of the most ancient order of melodrama. The mystery of a birth, rival claimants to a title, the impostor successful for a time, but virtue triumphant in the end, and all the rest of it. The interest comes in with the variations and complications, as numerous as they are varied, with which the author's fertile imagination is able to invest this well-worn theme. The more serious aspect of the book is comprised in the clever study of the effect upon an ill-balanced character of a sudden accession to riches.

The heroines of "Weeds"<sup>11</sup>—a remarkable book in its way—are of a different type. They are perfectly harmless, and their only wish is to be allowed to make their living in as honest a manner as possible. But owing to force of circumstances and lack of training they find it exceedingly difficult to do so. It is a long book, full of realistic and convincing detail, and it should prove an admirable teacher of the lesson the authors wish to inculcate. Take a lady, give] her a thoroughly unpractical education, allow her to spend money very much as she likes, and then cast her adrift upon the world. Don't you think the case of such a woman would be desperate? Yet it is what happens with comparative regularity. "London," says Mr. Sladen, "is full of gentlewomen without these advantages (youth, good looks, and personal charm), waiting to do any honest work, but in danger of actual starvation. . . . 'Weeds' shows how the unfortunate victims of these circumstances are put on the rack of anxiety, privation and humiliation." Everybody ought to read this strong and convincing book, and take its lesson to heart.

Turning to America, one finds that Mr Robert Chambers has not been idle during the past year. "The Business of Life,"<sup>12</sup> his long autumn novel, is thoroughly typical of its writer. The plot is simple, sentimental, and not strong enough for its very lengthy development, the setting is American "smart" society, the characters are

<sup>9</sup> "The Business of Life" By Robert W Chambers With 33 Illustrations by Charles Dana Gilson 6s (Appleton)

Frontispiece to A British Dog in France (Chatto & Windus).

"WHO ARE YOU?" SAID THE POODLE.

<sup>9</sup> "Red Wrath" By John Oxenham With 16 Illustrations from Photographs 6s (Hodder & Stoughton)

<sup>10</sup> "The Painted Lady" By Arabella Kenealy 6s (Stanley Paul)

<sup>11</sup> "Weeds" By Olive Potter and Douglas Sladen 6s (Hart & Blackett.)

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

drawn in the regulation pattern, and the dialogue is crisp, bright, and amusing. Honestly, I prefer Mr Chambers in any manner but this, but those people who like this sort of thing will be sure to find that "The Business of Life" is the sort of thing they will like. "The Gay Rebellion,"<sup>13</sup> I was relieved to find, is not a society story. It is a whimsical extravaganza, humorously and brightly written, dealing with a possible development of the feminist movement. It would be wrong to give away the really excellent idea underlying the book, which is just the thing for an evening's amusement.

Another very popular American writer is the late Myrtle Reed, a delightful collection of posthumous papers by whom is presented in "Threads of Grey and Gold."<sup>14</sup> About half the contents are poems, and the essays which make up the remainder of the book cover all sorts of subjects, from "The Technique of the Short Story" and "One Woman's Solution of the Servant Problem" to "Romance and the Postman" and "The Courtship of George Washington."

<sup>13</sup> "The Gay Rebellion" By Robert W Chambers With 4 full-page and many text illustrations by Edmund Frederick 6s (Appleton)

<sup>14</sup> "Threads of Grey and Gold" By Myrtle Reed With a Coloured Frontispiece by Clara M Burd and a Portrait 6s (Putnam)

From Rambles among the Flowers
(Partridge)

IRIS AND WATERLILY
AT HOME

Mr. John Ayscough has also made a collection of his short stories<sup>15</sup>—some of them, I must say, very slight indeed—which ought to attract his admirers; and yet another popular writer, Miss Macnaughtan, has already scored a success with a charming tale of Indian life,<sup>16</sup> written in the best manner of the author of "Christina M'Nab" and the "Lame Dog's Diary."

Lovers of the sensational will find their demands satisfied in Mr. Harris-Burland's "Grey Cat"<sup>17</sup> or Mr. Hornung's "Thousandth Woman,"<sup>18</sup> both of which are murder mysteries, the latter book being considerably the better of the two from a technical point of view. Or, in a different style of sensation, Mr. Reginald Hodder's "The Vampire"<sup>19</sup> could hardly be bettered, though I must say that I found the more profoundly mystical parts a trifle bewildering. But there are some real shudders in it for all that.

For the central idea of

<sup>15</sup> "Prodigals and Sons" By John Ayscough, 6s (Hart & Windus)

<sup>16</sup> "Snow upon the Desert" By S Macnaughtan With 8 illustrations by Gordon Browne 6s (Hodder & Stoughton)

<sup>17</sup> "The Grey Cat" By J B Harris-Burland 6s (Chapman & Hall)

<sup>18</sup> "The Thousandth Woman" By L W Hornung With 4 illustrations by Frank Snapp 3s 6d net (Nash)

<sup>19</sup> "The Vampire" By Reginald Hodder With Coloured Frontispiece 6s (Rider)

The Salmon Rivers of England and Wales
(Kegan Paul).

THE JUNCTION AT CHRISTCHURCH.

From The Rose Book
(Cassell)

ROSE MADAME ANTOINE
MARI
(A charming tea rose for the garden, of lilac rose shade.)

The Rose Book
(Cassell)

ROSE AMATEUR J
TEYSSIER (H.T.)
pretty rose, white with lemon yellow centre

his extraordinary tale, "Up Above,"<sup>20</sup> Mr John N Raphael acknowledges his indebtedness to M Maurice Renard's "Le P ril Bleu." Briefly it is that, invisible to the dwellers upon earth, a strange race inhabits the upper atmosphere, to whom our air takes the place of water. When the Shadow People take it into their heads to collect specimens from the earth much as we collect them from the depths of the sea, employing a 'submarine' for this purpose, it must be clear to you that things begin to happen. Admirers of Mr. Wells' earlier work should be especially attracted by "Up Above."

From The Herbaceous Garden
(Williams & Norgate)

Reviewed in a recent number of THE BOOKMAN

YEW HEDGES AND TRELLIS, HURST COURT

the author has done all that can be expected of him to make it accurate and attractive. There is a good deal to be said for this manner of presenting history, which is followed to some extent by Mr. Schumacher also in "Nelson's Last Love."<sup>22</sup> a companion volume to

The historical novel usually commands a fairly large public in this country, one that ought to be delighted with the very sound and painstaking piece of work that comes

<sup>20</sup> "Up Above" By John N Raphael 6s (Hutchinson)

<sup>21</sup> "His Magnificence" By A J Anderson With Coloured Frontispiece and Illustrations in the text 6s (Stanley Paul)

<sup>22</sup> "Nelson's Last Love" By Henry Schumacher With 34 Illustrations (one in Colour) and 2 Facsimiles 6s (Hutchinson)

From The Rose Book
(Cassell)

ROSE AVOCA (H.T.)
(A variety of brilliant red colouring)

From The Rose Book
(Cassell)

ROSE LIBERTY (H.T.) (One of the best of the red varieties)

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From The Merchant of Venice
(Greening)

"DO YOU NOT REMEMBER,
LADY, A VENETIAN, A YOUNG SOLDIER?"

These two books tell the life-story of Lady Hamilton in a way that is a good deal pleasanter than that of the ordinary biography, and is also, so far as I can tell, no less accurate. Both are fully—and very well—illustrated.

"Ashes of Vengeance"<sup>22</sup> is of a much more ordinary type, but it is at least a well-written and spirited story of France at the time of the Huguenot massacres. As a first book it shows a good deal of promise, which, I am told, has been recognised by the public already. And while on the subject of the historical novel I must draw your attention to the very cheap re-issue of Messrs. Chambers's illustrated edition of "Lorna Doone."<sup>24</sup> Mr. Gordon Browne has seldom done better work than in the adornment of this old favourite.

With its snake charmers, beautiful women, dramatic story, and Burmese atmosphere, "Fascination"<sup>25</sup> is a story that is quite amusing to read, and another part of the British Empire, the Transvaal, appears in "The River of Dreams,"<sup>26</sup> which is a good, but not wildly exciting, story of diamond mining.

In conclusion, I find that I still have to mention "The Thunderhead Lady,"<sup>27</sup> a slight but pleasing love-story told in letters, "The Paupers of Portman Square,"<sup>28</sup> a very effective tale worthy of far more praise than I have space for, in which Miss Wylie makes her bow in a novel of English life, and the "Indiscretions of Dr Carstairs,"<sup>29</sup> a readable but rather amateurish collection of the "cases" of a society doctor. The rumour that this last book is founded on fact adds to its interest.

L. T. S.

<sup>22</sup> "Ashes of Vengeance" By H. B. Somerville 6s. (Hutchinson)

<sup>24</sup> "Lorna Doone" By R. D. Blackmore With 13 Coloured Plates and 61 Text Illustrations by Gordon Browne 6s net (Chambers)

<sup>25</sup> "Fascination" By Cecil Champain Lewis 6s (Lane)

<sup>26</sup> "The River of Dreams" By William Westrup 6s (Hurst & Blackett)

<sup>27</sup> "The Thunderhead Lady" By Anna Fuller and Brian Read With 44 Picture Headings by William J. Wilson 3s 6d. net (Putnam)

<sup>28</sup> "The Paupers of Portman Square" By I. A. R. Wylie. With Frontispiece in Colour by A. C. Michael 6s (Cassell)

<sup>29</sup> "Indiscretions of Dr Carstairs" By A. De O. 6s. (Heinemann)

From The Business of Life
(Appleton).

"—I beg your pardon," said Jacqueline.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From Snow upon the Desert
(Hodder & Stoughton).

"I COULD DO WITHOUT CONTRAST
FOR THE SAKE OF PEACEFUL GREY DAYS."

means for a fair trial of his uncle, who has been apprehended for treasonable practices. How the hero's quest proved a mare's nest and plunged Denis into a vortex of rascality in which his uncle was the biggest rascal of them all, and how he met the fair Idonia and rescued her from the toils in which he found her, it would be unfair to the reader to tell here. Suffice it to say that the love story of Denis and this beautiful, high-spirited, and wholly adorable girl is cleverly woven into a narrative as full of adventures as the most exacting lover of high romance could desire. Eventually the happy pair are married, and the story ends in some beautifully-written pages, with the death of Denis's father. The day on which he died he sits chatting with them, watching the ships that were to scatter the Armada passing up the Channel, and his last words include this fine motto for Englishmen "In what estate soever we be found, we be neither angry nor afraid." An author who can write thus needs no recommendation.

THE CHOW-CHOW.

By LADY DUNBAR of MOCHRUM. Illustrated.
(Pitman.)

One of the principal breeds of dogs which have come into fashion recently is the Chow-Chow (or, as he is now generally called, merely the Chow). However, he is not a particularly easy dog to breed or to rear, though he is well deserving of his popularity when he can be obtained—and kept—in good condition. The present attractively produced volume, therefore, which tells, in a manner very easy to understand, everything that anybody needs to know about the Chow, should make a strong appeal to owners of the dog, while it may also do a good deal to enhance his popularity.

THE MERCHANT OF VENICE.

By a Popular Novelist. With 8 Illustrations in Colour by AVERIL BURLEIGH 6s (Greening.)

"The Merchant of Venice" is the first volume of the "Novels from Shakespeare" series, in which "A Popular Novelist" retells in the form of fiction a number of the principal plays. The books, of course, are written in prose of the most modern variety, and the story is naturally entirely lacking in the poetic atmosphere. But the result is not at all a bad modern novel in its way, and "A Popular Novelist" shows that his is a skilled hand, although the reason why it is necessary to "popularise" Shakespeare in this way is rather beyond our powers of comprehension. The kindest way in which to regard the book is to look upon it as an ordinary new historical novel—when you will find it quite up the mark. The clever grouping and brilliant colouring of Miss Averil Burleigh's illustrations makes them very effective.

IDONIA

A Romance of Old London

By ARTHUR F. WALLIS. Illustrated by C. E. BRUCK 6s
(Sampson Low, Marston & Co.)

This delightful story more than fulfils the expectations aroused by its secondary title, Mr Wallis having achieved something very near perfection in his portrayal of the conditions and fascination of London in the stirring days of Queen Elizabeth. This he has done in accordance with the best traditions of historical fiction, avoiding all exaggeration in his manner of making distinctive the period with which he deals, with the result that he has given it a true and romantic resurrection in his reader's mind. Denis Cleeve, a callow West Country youth, possessed, however, of a certain stubborn grit, comes to London with five hundred pounds of his father's money to provide the

From Idonia (Sampson Low).

From Samplers and Tapestry Embroideries (Longmans)

EMBROIDERY PICTURE CHARLES I AND HIS QUEEN.
Dated 1663 Lord Montagu.

A PROPER NEWE BOKE OF COKERYE.

Edited by CATHERINE FRANCES FRERE
With 3 Illustrations (Heffer, Cambridge)

This most quaint and original of cookery books was originally owned by Matthew Parker, Archbishop of Canterbury (during the reign of Queen Elizabeth) and his wife Margaret. It is interesting perhaps less from a culinary point of view - though a number of the recipes would be well worth trying - than for its historical value. After all, the consumption of food played quite as important a part in the lives of the Elizabethans as it does in ours, and there are many people who would find it difficult to tell you, for instance, what sort of things Shakespeare ate and others. Mrs Frere contributes a long introduction

From A Proper Newe Boke of Cokerye (Heffer, Cambridge).

PORTRAIT OF MATTHEW PARKER,
ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY, 1572.
(From the Book of Statutes, Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. Photo by Mr. Mason, Cam.)

(over 160 pages) to the book, as well as notes to each recipe, and a glossary. The result is quaint and queerly fascinating reading.

HIS LITTLE BIT O' GARDEN.

By MILDRED HILL
With Frontispiece
18 6d net (Allen Lane)

["A good story for a Sunday-school prize is not so easily come by as to be worth neglecting when there is a chance of getting one. And so there should be a large public for this charming little missionary story by Miss Mildred Hill, in which tenderness, sentiment and homeliness, though clever, characterisation are admirably combined. (its kind "His Little Bit o' Garden" is as good as anything we have read for a long time.)

THE EAGLE'S TALON.

By GEORGES OHNET. Adapted from the French by HELEN MAYER. With 16 Illustrations by A. DE PARVY. 6s
(Putnam)

"The Eagle's Talon" is an interesting novel dealing with the Couan rising during the Consulship of Napoleon Bonaparte. In Brittany the conspiracies of Cadoudal and his followers have been thwarted and betrayed by the Countess de Montmorlan, and when they transfer the scene of their operations to Paris she is again the cause of their ruin. However, the balance is made more even by the fact that the beautiful spy is herself murdered in tragic fashion by one of the Chouans. Many notable and notorious people pass through the pages of a novel which gives a vivid picture of Parisian life—and, incidentally, retells in an interesting manner many of the intrigues of the high society of the Revolution period.

AVANTI!

A Tale of the Resurrection of Sicily

By JAMES M. LUDLOW. 4s 6d net (Revell)

Dr James M. Ludlow has been very popular in the United States as a writer of historical romances, many of which deal with the lands of the Mediterranean. His tale of the Garibaldian uprising in Sicily in 1860 has all the elements of a popular success. There are colour, movement and excitement in abundance. The villains of the Bourbon Court are painted with gusto, charming men of great beauty set out on daring adventures. There is all that a hero should be. The general effect is to give the reader a clear and picturesque view of a fine and stirring event in modern history, about which most persons have little knowledge. The drawing of the characters is of the bold, summary melodramatic kind, but it is all very well done in its way.

MY DOG.

By MAURICE MAETERLINCK. Translated by A.
TEIXEIRA DE MATTO. With Illustrations in Colour by CECIL ALDIN. 3s 6d net (George Allen & Co)

There are just a few persons who can write of a dog, and M. Maeterlinck is one of them. He has observed his little bull-dog, Pelléas, minutely from the outside, human point of view, but, also, he seems able to see life through the eyes of Pelléas and his kind. "I have lost," he says, "within these last few days, a little bull-dog. He had just completed the sixth month of his brief existence. He had no history. His intelligent eyes opened to look out upon the world, to love mankind, then closed again on the cruel secrets of death." With kindly, intimate charm M. Maeterlinck shows us the thoughts, the youth, the days and the nights of little Pelléas—it is all so simple, so natural, so unadventurous, yet so delightfully written. He says, and truly, "We are alone, absolutely alone, on this chance planet, and amid all the forms of life that surround us, not one, excepting the dog, has made an alliance with us." The book is a little gem, and Mr Cecil Aldin has enhanced it by his bold, clever effective coloured plates of Pelléas at intervals in his short life. The plump little bull-pup lives for us, author and artist have given him personality. Our only quarrel is with the fact that this book, published with coloured illustrations seven years ago, should be presented again now with no word to say that it is a reprint.

From Tom Brown's School Days
(Sidgwick & Jackson)

QUEEN ADELAIDE AT THE FOOTBALL MATCH AT RUGBY, OCTOBER, 1888.

From Tom Brown's School Days
(Sidgwick & Jackson).

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE
FROM THE GLOBE.

From Railway Wonders of the World
(Cassell)

THE "FAST DENVER LIMITED," CLIMBING SOLDIER
SUMMIT IN THE WASATCH MOUNTAINS, UTAH.

RAILWAY WONDERS OF THE WORLD.

By FREDERICK A. TALBOT With 12 Coloured Plates and many Illustrations from Photographs 10s 6d net (Cassell)

"No invention," says Mr Talbot, "since the march of civilisation began has changed the way of the world so completely as that of George Stephenson. No other production of the human brain has introduced such a powerful force of conquest, development, expansion, and settlement as the railway." These are big words, no doubt, but there can be little question as to their truth—and even less so after you have read this book. Mr Talbot is an authority upon subjects of this nature, and he has always written particularly well about railways. In them, indeed, is embodied the new Romance—a fact which, for some reason or other, boys seem to appreciate more readily than their seniors. And, perhaps, it is to boys that this book will make its strongest appeal. The production of the volumes is most elaborate, and the photographs—of which there are a very large number—are both interesting and exceedingly well printed.

THINGS TO MAKE.

By ARCHIBALD WILLIAMS With Frontispiece and 193 Illustrations in the Text 9 6d (Nelson)

Perhaps nobody knows better how to write a book of this sort than does Mr Archibald Williams. His directions are always so clear, so concisely worded, and so

From Things to Make
(Nelson)

LARGE MODEL LOCOMOTIVE BUILT FOR
ONE OF THE ROYAL PRINCES OF SIAM
BY MESSRS. BASSETT-LOWKE, LIMITED.
(The "Daily Mirror")

admirably simple, that the veriest tyro has no difficulty whatever in understanding them. In the present volume, Mr Williams suggests the manufacture at home of an enormously varied number of objects, from a handy book-stand and a house ladder to wrestling puppets and a self-supplying matchbox, or from an electric alarm clock to a miniature gasworks. It is all very wonderful! And wonderfully well explained.

THE BOYS' BOOK OF STAMP COLLECTING

By DOUGLAS B. ARMSTRONG With many Illustrations 6s (Grant Richards)

The youthful philatelist will find Mr Armstrong a thoroughly experienced and entertaining guide, and his well illustrated volume an invaluable handbook on a fascinating hobby.

From The Worker's Daily Round
(Routledge).

THE SIGNALMAN.

THE WORKER'S DAILY ROUND.

By CHARLES WATNEY and JAMES A. LITTLE 5s. Illustrated. (Routledge)

It was a happy idea which inspired the authors of this nicely-produced book, and the volume might be read with profit not only by children, for whom it is apparently intended, but also by the vast multitude of people who go about their daily work blind to the romance which really invests even the most commonplace objects and incidents of life. The authors had to take a journey one day from London to the North, and they decided to look a little below the surface of things, and enter, by enquiry and imagination, into the lives of each of the many different types of workers whom they encountered on the way, from the taxi-cab driver who drove them to the station, and the porter who hurled their luggage into the van, to the ploughman at his toil upon the sunny uplands along which their train speeded, and so at length to the pleasant little waitress who gave them the warm and refreshing cup of tea at their journey's end. Altogether the lives of twenty-four different workers are depicted, with just enough information to instruct without tediousness, and in a manner calculated to awaken in the young that sympathy with all types of humanity which, more and more, will come to be regarded as the first essential in any campaign of social reform.

THE GAME FISHES OF THE WORLD.

By CHARLES FREDERICK HOLDER, LL.D. Illustrated. 20s. net (Hodder & Stoughton)

Dr. Holder has written a most fascinating book. At first glance we supposed it was purely "fishy," in the sense that only anglers would be attracted to it. But on

Frontispiece to Lightships and Lighthouses
(Hesemann)

From Astronomy Simplified (James Clarke).

JUPITER.
Showing belts of cloud, Red Spot (on left), and Black round shadow of satellite (on right).
Photographed at the Lick Observatory.

the whole we are satisfied that it will also greatly charm the general reader, whose tastes are catholic. The survey is wide—no fewer than ninety-two rivers and fifty-five lakes are mentioned—and though the vogue of the book will naturally be greater in the United Kingdom and the United States than elsewhere, it must find a place on the shelves of the educated angler in whatever part of the world he resides. For us in Great Britain it is a matter of pride that so great an authority should find the British angler no less admirable than his rivers are beautiful. But, after all, Dr Holder is almost one of us. Though he dates from Pasadena in California, the frontispiece shows him salmon-fishing on an English river, as becomes a good fisherman whose seventh great-grandfather was a fighting parson in the army of Cromwell. It was on the Tweed, too, that Dr Holder cast his first salmon fly:

"O the Tweed! the bonnie
I weed!

"O' rivers it's the best,
Angle here, or angle there,
I foots are coming everywhere,
Angle east or west."

Or he is on the Bible, and recalling the quaint old custom of "Salmon Sunday" (about November 20th), when thousands of people make a pilgrimage to watch the last run of the salmon under Poythorne Bridge, to the delight of the inhabitants, and the joy of the innkeepers. Again, he is talking of India, the mahseer and the hibernating murrel; or taking us in spirit on the Florida reef at night with the tarpon. To the swordfish of Santa Catalina he gives the palm as the finest big game fish in the world, all things considered—strength, endurance, and spectacular characteristics. But the tuna is marvellous, and in the last fifteen years not more than seventy men in the world have succeeded in taking a leaping tuna of

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From Where He Dwelt
(Sampson Low)

THE RIVER JORDAN

From Where He Dwelt
(Sampson Low).

THE GOLDEN GATE
AND TEMPLE WALL

WHERE HE DWELT. MIND PICTURES OF PALESTINE.

By ALFRED I. SCHOFIELD Illustrated by Views taken for this Book 1s 6d net (Sampson Low, Marston & Co.)

We have seldom met a more vivid picture of the Holy Land than Mr Schofield has given with pen and illustration in this volume. It is not by self-conscious word-painting that he has achieved this result, but by his quiet descriptions of scenes, and comparisons with the Bible stories. His simple sentences become arresting, the years seem to fall away, and the life of both Old and New Testaments seem to move before us.

"Jaffa is entered by a slit in the wall about six feet square, through this small opening, tourists, pilgrims, Pashas, negroes, Arabs, to say nothing of camels, mules, and asses, and every sort of produce, have passed in and out from time immemorial." "We climb the foothills dividing Philistia from the Holy Land, the country of Samson from that of Christ. The whole gorge is gay with the rock-cystus, the Rose of Sharon, which, curiously enough, is white, while the lily of the valley is a scarlet anemone. Here we take a last look at the gorgeous scene we are exchanging for the barren hill-country of Judaea." As I stood in Rahab's room, I could see where she bound the scarlet cord as evidence of her faith in Jehovah and where she let the spies down into the moat from her window. The illustrations in the volume by their actuality increase the impression of reality and nearness of the

Stories of Elizabethan Heroes - SIR RICHARD GRENVILLE (Seeley) AND THE "REVENGE"

From The Great Armada
(Nelson)
(Drawn from the tapestry hangings in the Old House of Lords.)

THE FLAGSHIP OF THE GUYPUSCOAN SQUADRON FIRED AND TAKEN BY THE ENGLISH.
The rest of the Armada continue their course in the form of a half-moon. Off the Isle of Portland, both fleets come to an engagement.

Bible scenes. Mr. Schofield in his first chapter speaks of the amazing fact that so many travellers spend months within a few hours of Palestine yet return home without visiting it. His book is excellent in idea and its idea is so well carried out that it should do much to end that neglect of Palestine to which it refers.

THE SALMON RIVERS OF ENGLAND AND WALES.

By AUGUSTUS GRIMBLE
Illustrated 75 6d net
(Kegan Paul)

Mr Grimble is a prolific and well-known writer upon sporting subjects, and he has produced an interesting, and we

Red Wrath (Hodder & Stoughton).

ES BETWEEN BROW AND CHEEK"

From A Venetian June
(Putnam)

"MAY WATCHED THE WATER-LOGGED CRAFT
AS IT VANISHED UNDER A DISTANT BRIDGE."

think, a useful book upon the subject. Salmon fishing it must be admitted is a sport which can be indulged in by comparatively few, at least in this country. We remember a friend who is a great salmon fisher once telling us that every fish that he landed during one season, when he had rented a small portion of a well-known salmon stream, cost him £10. Mr Grimble has dealt in his book with the history of the different rivers for a period of more than fifty years past, and he draws particular attention to the fact that a large number of fishermen yearly seek sport at heavy expense in Scotch or Irish streams only to find their hopes of a big catch or even an interesting time unfulfilled, whilst within a few hours travel of their own doors better sport might have been obtained at far less cost in the, perhaps, less-famous streams of England and Wales. The author has done his work systematically and with praiseworthy thoroughness. This no doubt accounts for the fact that two editions of his book, first issued in two volumes in 1904, have been called for, although the subject is one of interest to a somewhat limited public. One of the most interesting chapters in the book is devoted to the famous Hampshire fishery in the Avon and the Stour. Christchurch salmon is known all over the kingdom for its excellence. It is perhaps a pity that the tables in this chapter, as in some others, do not come down to a later period than a decade ago, and more care should have been taken with the proof sheets. We cannot imagine that Mr. Grimble spells Poole, without the "c" from ignorance, to mention only one slip. The book will be both useful and interesting to salmon fishers, and the numerous reproductions from photographs add to its value.

STORIES OF ELIZABETHAN HEROES.

By EDWARD GILLIAT Illustrated 5s (Seeley)

I suppose that "Stories of Elizabethan Heroes" ought properly to come under the heading of that class of improving literature which stern parents present to their boys from wrong-headed motives. But this would be far from a fair estimate of this really admirable volume, which gives boys exactly what they like. There are no heroes like the Elizabethan heroes. Even Nelson—perhaps because of his somewhat dramatic vein—is not so much beloved as Drake, and Hawkins, and Frobisher, and Sir Richard Grenville. And here in this book the author

From Flagships Three (Aldon Rivers).

THE SECOND FLAGSHIP
(H.M.S. "POWERFUL")

*Frontispiece to Shakespeare's Hamlet—The Cinema Books, No. 1
(Stanley Paul).*

"GIVE O'ER THE PLAY."

makes these heroes live again. A sense of historical perspective causes him to throw in now and again a remark which lets the reader see that it is not always easy for him to figure these Elizabethan giants as untarnished heroes, but his boy readers will probably miss these allusions, and worship as they always have worshipped. He deals altogether with ten of the heroic figures, telling the story of their lives and adventures in good, vivid style, and he has a most excellent chapter on the Elizabethan world, which depicts the scene in which these great parts were played. His story of the Armada, which has necessarily to be told more than once, is exceedingly well done.

SHAKESPEARE'S HAMLET:

The Story of the Play. With 55 illustrations taken from the Cinematograph Film showing Sir J. Forbes-Robertson and Miss Gertrude Elliott and their Company from the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, 18 net (Stanley Paul)

The interest of this

From In Spain with Peggy (Lawrie).

THE GYPSIES. "THEY WERE SEVEN IN NUMBER."

re-telling of the story of Hamlet lies in the fine series of photographs that illustrate it. As a record of acting the cinematograph film is interesting but curiously unconvincing. After having seen both the film and this book we have come to the conclusion that there is more passion in a stationary than in a moving photograph. Why this should be it would be very difficult to say and the explanation is entirely beyond our powers. In fact, for our part, we would much rather have this book than see the film again. But that is only a personal opinion. Anyhow, both book and film have value in that they indicate the methods—though neither can give the remotest hint of the charm—of the most distinguished Hamlet of our generation. The text which accompanies the pictures is quite harmless; there is not enough space for it to be anything more. The picture is the thing in this book, and each one of the fifty-five is a very good thing, too.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

Whose Christmas novel The Honourable Mr. Lawwash is revs
(Photo by W. Hornby Morris)
(Sampson Low)

FIGURE SKATING IN THE ENGLISH STYLE.

By HENRIETTA H. COBB (Ivelagh Nash)

We were about to maintain that the skater is born and not made, but without going quite so far as that, perhaps we may venture the proposition that no one can attain to real proficiency who has not acquired the art in very early years. Thus acquired, it would seem to be an art that never can be quite lost again. After years of abstinence put on a pair of skates once more and you strike out instinctively with the swinging balance familiar to you in the days of old youth skating days of yore in bonnie Scotland when the ring of the steel woke the echoes over the frozen lowland waters! Old folk used to take winters as they could get them home grown the country wrapped in its mantle of snow the cheery music of the steel and merry laughter from the lake where the darkness was swept clear the grey winters lay the keen cold air the exhilaration and the gay vitality. To day young folk fare forth to Switzerland for winter sports. Let them take in their American grips Mr Cobb's guide to Figure Skating! They will find it a manual strictly business like, admirably illustrated and entirely to the purpose.

RAMBLES AMONG THE FLOWERS

By T. CARRERAS With 4 (coloured and 1 Black and White Plates and 14) Illustrations in the text (Jarrold)

It is the purpose of the present volume says the author to give the young Rambler in the country some insight into the details of the lives of the floral treasures of the land in which he lives, and by causing him to examine them with care and thoughtfulness make his walks abroad of greater interest than otherwise would be the case. No writer is better fitted to fulfil this purpose than Mr Carreras whose admirable work we have often had occasion to praise before this, and we can recommend Rambles among the Flowers very strongly. It is an excellent piece of work well and remarkably fully illustrated.

THE SCOUT'S BOOK OF BIRDS.

By OLIVER G. PIKE F.R.S. FR.P.S. With 1 frontispiece in colour and 42 illustrations from Photographs by the Author 2s 6d net (Jarrold)

Mr Oliver G. Pike the distinguished naturalist, here turns his attention to the needs of the Boy Scouts and teaches them a series of charming little

From Figure Skating in the English Style
(Nash)

FORWARD OUTSIDE THREE (C TURN) (RIGHT FOOT)
(Photo W. H. Cadby)

Whose new book of essays Confessions of a Book Lover, was reviewed in last month's BOOKMAN
(Kelly)

MR E. WALTER WALTERS

lessons about birds and their ways. The Scout's Book of Birds is admirably adapted for its purpose, but at the same time it will be a pity if the general public cannot be brought to realise that the book is just as suitable for their reading as for that of the Boy Scouts. It is in fact an excellent and handy guide to the most important British birds and it is extremely well illustrated with photographs from life of the kind that only Mr Pike knows how to take.

CASSELL'S NATURAL HISTORY

By I. MARTIN DUNCAN F.R.P.S.
I.R.M.S. Illustrated 2s net (Cassell)

The aim of this elaborate and imposing volume is to set before the reader in simple and on the whole non-technical language the wonderful story of the evolution of animal life from the simplest unicellular organism to the most complex type It is a broad survey of the animal kingdom, the most typical creatures and characteristic phases being considered. In itself it is a fascinating study, raising profoundly interesting considerations. It is obvious that Mr. Duncan feels the fascination from first to last, though he suggests rather than expresses his enthusiasm for the most part, keeping steadily to his avowed object of widening the way of knowledge in an ordered and helpful way. The work, which is eminently clear and straightforward, has manifold attractions, as indeed a spacious romance of nature, and ought to find a host of friends, especially amongst young readers for whom it opens gates of wonderland.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

Cassell's Natural History
(Cassell)

YOUNG MALE AND FEMALE CHIMPANZEE.

handy Lotus Library. Our purpose in writing this brief note is more to call attention to the Lotus Library than to one of the best of the several excellent romances that have been issued under its aegis. The Library consists almost entirely of translations of books which have had a success on the Continent and which therefore seem to warrant translation. We are glad to hear that the format of the Library is to be retained and that no increase will be made in the price.

COUNT BRÜHL.

By JOSEPH KRASZLWSKI. Translated by the COUNT DE SOISSONS. With Frontispiece. 15. 6d net and 25 net (Greening.)

Of course, "Count Brühl" is already pretty widely known, and we understand that a large number of copies of it have been sold since it was issued in Messrs. Greening's

THE CORNISH COAST AND MOORS

By A. G. FOLHOTT-STOKES. New and Cheaper Edition. With 162 Illustrations. 5s net (Greening.)

Enthusiasm is a fine thing, even in guide-books. Mr. Folhott-Stokes has written a guide-book, a veritable "Key to the Wild," and imbued it with enthusiasm. The work is one that can be read at one's ease by the cosy winter fire, meanwhile one makes plans for one's next tour of the Duchy, finding stimulus not only in the narrative but also in the photographs, which are admirable in themselves as they are admirably chosen. Lovers of Cornwall will be grateful for this edition which is cheap in but one sense—the price is quite remarkably small. There is a full glossary of Cornish names, together with a capital index.

From The Scout's Book of Birds
(Jarrold)

LITTLE GREBE SETTLING DOWN UPON ITS NEST.

Frontispiece to Count Brühl (The Lotus Library)
(Greening).

"THEY PUSHED ON AT A 'SMART TROT.'"

From Wild Animals of Yesterday and To-day
(Partridge)

THE LION'S DEATHBED.
'His last days are rendered miserable by the skulking brutes which eagerly to pass in review the animals which have been exterminated completely since the dawn of history; to say something about our fight with the other animals, and their more or less inevitable defeat and expulsion, and also, on the other hand, to give humanity due credit for its action as preserver and distributor, by domestication or otherwise, of certain creatures." Mr Finn has something to say about the future, as well as about the past and present. It is intensely interesting to learn clear, well-told details of the Mammoth, the Sea-Cow, the Megatherium and the Quagga, for instance, but it is even more interesting to read Mr Finn's remarks upon the preservation and increase of the animals not yet extinct. This book is written in vigorous style, and plain criticism is given of people who grieve over the extermination of species, yet take no steps to prevent it, and even disapprove if someone else tries to do so. The illustrations are good and help us to realise some of the creatures we have lost for ever as well as those that are still with us.

INSECT BIOGRAPHIES WITH PEN AND CAMERA.

By JOHN J. WARD, F.E.S. With End Papers, 12 Plates, and 139 other Illustrations from Photographs and Photo-Micrographs by the Author 6s net (Jarrold)

We hope we are not belittling Mr Ward's powers as a writer unduly by saying that this book probably owes its existence to the remarkable series of photographs which it contains. Not only are these latter given in unusual abundance, but almost every one of them is extraordinary. Even more eloquently than the text do they bear witness to Mr Ward's patience and his devotion to the science of entomology. Every one of them, we are assured, was taken out-of-doors with the insect which forms its subject in its natural conditions—and this we can well believe. The book is remarkable value for its pictures alone. The text is naturally less striking, but Mr Ward knows his subject most thoroughly, and is always clear, concise and interesting.

WILD ANIMALS OF YESTERDAY AND TO-DAY.

By FRANK FINN B.A., F.Z.S. Illustrated in Colour and Black-and-White by C. L. SWA (Partridge)

The scope of this well-written book is, to use its author's own words, to have "a sort of popular zoological stock-taking, as far as the higher land animals are concerned

Reduced from The Coloured Plate presented with Pears' 1913.

"APPETISING."
From the Painting by E. Ladell, in the possession of Messrs. Pears.

THE SPIDER'S BEAUTIFULLY-CONSTRUCTED SNARE.
From Insect Biographies with Pen and Camera (Jarrold).

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

AN ENGLISH GIRL IN TOKYO.

By TERESA EDEN RICHARDSON Illustrated in Colour.
2s net (Heath, Cranton & Ouseley)

Certain books, from start to finish, would seem to have been constructed solely under the dictates of that nebulous Young Person who presides over the destinies of English literature. Of course, the interests of the school-girl, flapper, backfisch, call her what you will, predominate in nearly all that we peruse, but the author of "An English Girl in Tokyo" has adopted, throughout, the plane and point of view peculiar to the maiden of bashful fifteen, and none other. Miss Richardson has provided for that damsel in three-fold manner: first, by a little information as regards Japanese history, politics, and educational methods; secondly, by a dum religious flavouring. Thirdly, by the mildest and most impersonal love-story that ever was depicted by a brush dipped in heavily-diluted Payne's-Grey or some such innocuous pigment. To be serious, this little book is too unabashedly didactic on the one hand, and too vaguely uneventful on the other, to appeal to any grown-up reader. Yet the Young Person aforesaid will not only derive instruction from its pages, but will probably pronounce it "a sweet tale" by reason of its prodigal sentiment. At any rate, it has the merit of some novelty in mise-en-scene and the immense success of such Japanese studies as "Little Sister Snow" and "The Lady of the Decoration," does not preclude the possibility of a minor success for books of a less notable calibre.

LET ME EXPLAIN.

By ARCHIBALD WILLIAMS Illustrated 6s (Wells Gardner)

Until Mr Archibald Williams' book has been seen and read, it seems difficult to believe that so much useful information can be packed into less than four hundred pages. Almost everything a boy could wish to know may be found in "Let me Explain." There is exhaustive information on a host of subjects— aeroplanes, motor cars, wireless telegraphy, the kinematograph, steam engines, and many other things than seem so bewilderingly mysterious and wonderful to the uninitiated—and are

From Let Me Explain
(Wells Gardner)

FELLING A GIANTIC FIR
IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

From An English Girl in Tokyo
(Heath, Cranton and Ouseley).

indeed every bit as wonderful as they seem. The author gives detailed descriptions of works and mechanisms and his explanations are as clear as they are concise, providing, with over 150 sketches, diagrams and photographs, one of the most interesting, as well as the most instructive of this season's publications. It is a veritable mine of knowledge, and every ordinarily intelligent and healthy-minded boy will revel in the task of digging out the many remarkable and helpful facts embodied in the pages of "Let Me Explain." For reference it will prove an invaluable friend to keep always handy, and boys will not need the novel competition with its substantial prizes, to urge them to read the contents of the book from start to finish.

RUBBER AND RUBBER PLANTING

By R. H. LOCK, Sc. D. With 10 Plates and 18 Illustrations in the Text 5s net (Cambridge University Press.)

In this particular case it is decidedly unfortunate that THE BOOKMAN is not a financial paper. If it had been, our special expert would have been turned loose upon Mr. Lock's book—much to the edification of our readers. But as it is, "Rubber and Rubber Planting" has come into the hands of an ignoramus, who, however, has at least read it with much interest. It is quite easy to understand, and, in its way, it seems to be unusually well written, while some of the illustrations are quite fascinating. It is topical, and it seems probable that a book of this description, written by a gentleman of an unbiassed turn of mind, has been wanted for some time. That, we fear, is about all that we can say. Except that there is probably one harmless reviewer who knows as much about rubber as any stock jobber who has not read "Rubber and Rubber Planting."

NOVEMBER JOE.

By HESKETH PRITCHARD.
6s. (Hodder & Stoughton)

November Joe is a Sherlock Holmes of the woods, and this volume of his exploits in the wilder parts and among the wilder inhabitants of Canada has in it a quality of freshness and mental alertness that lifts it easily above the current stream of detective fiction. When you hear November Joe's name for the first time you may easily fall into the same error as Linda Peterham, who had a vision of "a wintry-looking old man, with a grey goatee and piercing eyes." This however, was not the man she was destined to fall in love with, for November Joe proves to be a youthful woodman of fine features and proportions, somewhat illiterate, and addicted to the drinking of tea and the crooning of sentimental songs. His powers of observation and deduction are

Frontispiece to November Joe
(Hodder & Stoughton)

NOVEMBER JOE.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

little short of marvellous. Take for example the murder at Big Tree Portage, which Joe is investigating in the company of Quaritch, a wealthy sportsman. The two have struck the site of a deserted camp, and while Quaritch can only suggest that two men had slept there under one tent cover, Joe's swift eye and brain are making the following deductions "That the man who killed Lyon is thick-set and very strong, that he has been a good while in the woods without having gone to a settlement, that he owns a blunt hatchet, such as we wood chaps call 'toma-hawk, No 3', that he killed a moose last week, that he can read, that he spent the night before the murder in great trouble of mind, and that likely he was a religious kind of chap." Of course, and here is the baffling charm of the book, the clues are "plump simple" and obvious enough once they are illuminated by the clear

From Rubber and Rubber Planting
(Cambridge University Press).

TAPPING WILD "HEVEA"

From With Hunter, Trapper, and Scout
(Holden & Hardingham)

"TWIXT BLOOD AND FIRE."

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From Ulster Folklore
(Illustration 1)

GREY MAN'S PATH FAIR HEAD
(Illustration 1 with)

From the story of A Muslim Sir Galahad
(Illustration H R C C)

SELIM

thinking and native cunning of November Joe. A wide variety of crimes are investigated in the course of the novel ranging in character from the blackmailing of a millionaire to the killing of a fox farmer's island. Mr. Hesketh's Irish readers will rejoice to learn that neither the love of a woman nor the lure of a thousand dollars a month offered by the New York police can tempt November Joe to forsake his beloved will. We must be a more of this original and fascinating hero.

ULSTER FOLKLORE

By ELIZABETH ANDREWS
Illustrated (Illustration 1)

Fables of the little people possess a perennial charm but few who revel in them know that these stories have descended to us from days when a dwarf race of troglodytes similar to the Pygmies of Central Africa or the Lapps or Finns of Northern Europe was in existence in these islands making raids and carrying off men women and

1. in Rome versus Jesus
(Illustration 1)

ST PETER
Bronze statue of the fifth century in the Basilica of St Peter Rome children captives. Many primitive beliefs have gathered round the furies, their magic power of rendering themselves invisible, of bringing disease to cattle and human beings. Belief in the fury changeling has led to terrible acts of cruelty one occurring in the South of Ireland quite recently. The tales here told of the wee folk are not peculiar to Ulster or Donegal. In slightly different guise they are familiar in various localities and various countries. Stevenson in one of his poems relates the tragic tale of the last two Picts, father and son with whom pushed the secret of the heather ale. The same legend is current in Down, Antrim Londonderry and Kerry but in these places the makers of the heather ale were Dances. The authoress writes in the most interesting fashion of fauns and their dwelling-places Dances and Pechs, rats and souterrains, the folklore connected with Ulster and Donegal giants and dwarfs and devotes a chapter to the traditions of dwarf races in Ireland and Switzerland.

LOHENGRIN

After the Drama of Richard Wagner, by T W ROLLSTON
With 192 pages reproduced by Off-set Lithography in two Colours, including numerous Auto Lithographs in Colours and in Black, together with 8 Plates reproduced by the Three and Four Colour Processes by

WILLY FOGANY

Size 11 x 7½ in Bound in Cloth Extra Price 15s net, boxed Bound in Full Velvet Cloth Price 21s net, boxed

LIMITED EDITION.—Printed on Hand made Paper Limited to 525 copies for England and America, signed and numbered by the Artist
Each copy includes an Original signed Etching specially drawn and executed for the Limited Edition Bound in full leather Price £2 2s net boxed
This is the third of the presentations of Wagner's great Operas undertaken by Willy Fogany like its predecessors it is printed upon a tinted paper—in this case a peculiarly attractive shade of grey which enables the Artist to introduce more harmonious colour effects—and it is as strikingly original as was the first of these noteworthy productions of the famous Hungarian Artist

Cover of Ordinary Edition

Myths of the Hindus and Buddhists

By SISTER NIVI DIJA and ANANDA COOMARASWAMY

Cloth 15s net

With 32 Illustrations in Four Colours (some in Four Colours and Gold) by NANDA JAI BOSU A N TAGOR K VEN KATAIPA and other Indian Artists under the direction of ABANINDRO NATH TAGOR

Size 6½ x 9½ in 400 Pages Letterpress Bound in Cloth Extra Gilt top Price 18s net Bound in Full Cloth appropriately Decorated and Toolled Boxed Price 25s net

LIMITED EDITION—75 Numbered Copies printed on Japanese Vellum Bound in Full Vellum Price £5 5s net

This volume is a genuine product of the East. The gifted authoress Sister Nivedita had long been so intimately associated with Hindu life and sentiment that at the time of her sudden death at Calcutta in 1912 when she was engaged upon this task she was regarded by natives throughout India as all but one of themselves. Her book was completed by the distinguished Ceylonese scholar Dr. Coomaraswamy and has been illustrated by Native Artists whose work will decidedly amaze European lovers of art.

CLAIRDELUNE

and other Troubadour Romances

Told by MICHAEL WEST Illuminated and Illustrated by LUCY PAUL Music by ALFRED WYLLER

Size 10 x 7½ in Bound in Cloth extra Gilt top Price 10s 6d net Bound in Antique Brown Leather in original style to represent Handwork Boxed Price 17s 6d net

LIMITED EDITION—75 Numbered Copies printed on Japanese Vellum in unique Binding Boxed Price £3 3s net

These stories are not translations of Troubadour Romances but have been inspired by them. They contain the simple tenderness and deep sincerity of feeling characteristic of the Medieval Romance but emphatically they are far more than imitations. It is not often that an author is fortunate enough to have his first book presented to the world in this luxurious manner but the publishers believe that the beauty and charm of these stories fully justify the setting which has been provided.

Antique Brown Leather 17s 6d net

The Story of Edinburgh Castle

By LOUIS WILKINSON B.A.

With Introduction by PROFESSOR PATRICK GILDER

Illustrated by the Author with Sixteen Drawings of the Castle reproduced by Collotype and with an Etched Frontispiece, Mr. MONRO S. ORR has also contributed eight Drawings illustrating important episodes in the History of the Castle and the End Papers were designed by Dr. OTTO SCHULTZ of Edinburgh University
Size 12½ x 9 in 56 Pages Letterpress Bound in Cloth Extra Gilt top Price 20s net Bound in Full Leather Boxed Price 30s net

The 1913 Volume of the Famous Myths Series

The Myths of Mexico and Peru

By LEWIS SPENCE M.A.

With Sixty Full page Illustrations in Four Colours only by C. L. M. JAMES and WILLIAM S. W. L.

Demy 8vo 384 Pages Cloth extra (Itt) 7s 6d net Full Leather Bound (Itt) 12s 6d net Full Leather Bound (Itt) Gilt top Boxed 15s 6d net Full Leather Bound (Itt) extra Gilt top Boxed 18s 6d net Full Leather Bound (Itt) extra Gilt top Boxed 21s 6d net

UNIFORM WITH THE ABOVE

1. The Myths of Greece and Rome
2. Myths and Legends of the Middle Ages
3. Myths of the Norsemen
4. Hero Myths and Legends of the British Race By M. J. PARSONS M.A.
5. Myths and Legends of the Celtic Race By T. W. R. LEWIS
6. Myths and Legends of Japan By T. HADLAND DAVIS

Forty-Four Turkish Fairy Tales

Cloth 10s 6d net

Selected and translated by Dr. I. V. KARADAGLI and Prof. I. KARADAGLI Decorated and illustrated by WILLY FOGANY

Size 9 x 7 in 144 Pages printed throughout in Two Colours With full page Colour Illustrations engraved by the Artist upon thin leather Bound in Cloth extra Gilt top Price 10s 6d net Bound in Full Leather Boxed Price 15s net

NEW VOLUME

The Golden Book of English Sonnets

Selected by WILLIAM ROBERTSON M.A. Fished Frontispiece and Ornaments by WILLY FOGANY

Each book is printed in a distinctive font types Size 7½ x 5½ in

The frontispiece to Nos. 1, 2 and 3 is a charming Hand-coloured lithograph Binding 1—Cloth extra Gilt top Price 3s 6d net 4—Full Leather Price 5s 6d net Boxed

EARLIER VOLUMES

1. An Anthology of Humorous Verse By HELEN and LEWIS MELVILLE
2. Sweet Songs of Many Voices Compiled by KATE A. WRIGHT
3. In the Garden of Delight For all lovers of the Open Air Compiled by JOHN RICHARDSON

GEORGE G. HARRAP & CO 3 PORTSMOUTH STREET KINGSWAY W.C.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

Frontispiece to His Magnificence
(Stanley Paul)

"THE LAST TWELVE MONTHS HAD AGED HIM"

A MUSLIM SIR GALAHAD.

By HENRY OTIS DWIGHT
Illustrated. 3s 6d. net
(Revell)

This is a true story of Islam in Turkey, of the "man with a black hat and a white life," who bears the gospel message to the Eastern world. Selim is the son of a Kurdish chief, with a soul which spurns the paternal request that he should take to night robbery for a trade, and be rich. His resolve is made after he has witnessed a man searching for a lost sheep and leaving his father to die alone on the road. "Betterment," said Selim, "cannot spring from such people as ours. Somewhere other believers must have received wisdom from God to know how they ought to behave. I cannot stand hesitating between Try and Give up. Somewhere there must be those who will not think it wrong for me to seek God's wisdom. I will search until I find." The parents vainly think to divert him by offering him a wife. Selim's quest is arduous. He becomes a student in a seminary, joins an order of Dervishes, is left stripped on a mountain road, he is in turn a teacher and a public scribe; his father curses him, his tribesmen gnash their teeth at his name. But, aided by the Protestant deacon Suleiba at Mosul, he wins through, and we leave him in a snug little room in Constantinople, translating the Bible, which is one day to go forth to his kinsmen in the fastnesses—the first Kurdish book to be printed. The story is marked by a fine sincerity, as well as unconventionality of treatment.

ROME VERSUS JESUS.

By ELYSTAN M BEARDSLEY With 10 Illustrations.
3s 6d net (Melrose)

"Rome versus Jesus," is an inquiry into many of the institutions of the Roman Catholic Church. Mr. Beardsley's appeal is to history and the Roman tradition alike, and it is upon the result of his enquiries that he bases his attack upon the Romish system. Although we are inclined to believe that he lays too much stress upon the corruption of the Roman Church, we must confess that his book seems to us to be strongly and reasonably worked out. It is well illustrated.

THE LEAGUE OF ST LOUIS

By DAVID WHITELAW. 6s (Hodder & Stoughton)

The teller of this story is a journalist who is interested in the period commencing with the year 'eighty-two and covering the Terror. Strolling down the rue Victor Masse one cold April night he was the means of saving Edouard Clun Gressier from death

Frontispiece to The League of St. Louis (Hodder & Stoughton).

GAY & HANCOCK'S GIFT BOOKS

THE MOST POPULAR GIFT BOOK THIS SEASON

THE JACKDAW OF RHEIMS

Illustrated by CHARLES FOLKARD

Twelve humorous Coloured Plates and many Text Illustrations. Size 13½ in by 10 in Cloth gilt extra, bound 10s 6d net postage 6d Edition de Luxe (100 Copies only) bound in best vellum, 31s 6d net

Clasp Evening News — A superb edition. The artist displays excellent draughtsmanship and a fine sense of humour.
Athenaeum — Very little of a book has a fraction with as this with humour and well written.
Sphere — A beautiful book. Mr. Folkard's illustrations are delightful. He has kept the spirit of the popular legend better than any previous artist we think.
The Woman — A record edition of a book.
Spectator — Full of life and humour.

NEVER WAS HEARD SUCH A TERRIBLE CURSE
 Original printed 8½ in by 7 in in four colours

THE MOST POPULAR BOOK FOR PRESENTATION DURING 1912-1913

Size 11½ in by 9 in 30p
 15s net 1 stage

POEMS OF PASSION POEMS OF PLEASURE

By ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

With 20 Coloured Plates by DUDLEY TENNANT

Edition de Luxe (about 50 left) signed by Author and Artist
 Bound in best vellum gilt extra 52 2s net

Sphere (Ch 5) 2312 Not only is Mrs. Ella Wheeler Wilcox the most popular poet of America but she has a large audience in this country where Messrs. Gay & Hancock are her very successful publishers. The crowning point of her popularity has been reached by a volume entitled Poems of Passion and Pleasure which in France has already been made in Le Sphère. This volume of Mrs. Wilcox's verse has been splendidly illustrated by Mr. Dudley Tennant and the result is a handsome quarto which everyone interested in Mrs. Wilcox's poems will be glad to possess.

CREATING REPRODUCED ILLUSTRATION

A POPULAR SELECTION FROM

JAMES WHITCOMB RILEY'S POEMS

TWO BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED ANTHOLOGIES
 Edited and Illustrated by ALFRED RAWLINGS

A SEA ANTHOLOGY

A FLOWER ANTHOLOGY

Uniform with above Limp cloth 2s. 6d net postage 3d Vellum
 Permanent 5s net

NEW SERIES OF COLOUR BOOKS FOR CHILDREN

The 'STORY HOUR' SERIES

- 1 BIRD'S NEST CAROL By KATE DOUGLAS WIGGIN
- 2 THE GREEN DOOR By MARY E. WILKINS
- 3 THE GOLDEN DOG By CLARA LOUISE BURNHAM
- 4 FLOWER LEGENDS By BERTHA STANLEY

Size 6½ by 5½ in 96 pp Four Colour Illustrations Cloth gilt picture wrapper 1s 6d net each postage 2d

A MOST LAUGHABLE VOLUME ALLITERATIVE ANOMALIES

By W. HAMMOND, B.A. and JOHN LOWIE, B.A.

An amusing Alphabet with Alliterations on Little and large facing Humorous Drawing on right Size 9 in by 7½ in With 26 full page Illustrations in 4 Colours 2s 6d net Postage 3d

151211 The Golden Dog reduced

Crown 8vo with 4 Coloured Illustrations Cloth gilt 2s. 6d net Postage 2d.

The STRANGER on the AVENTINE

By LETTICE MILNE RAE

A charming story lifting the veil on Roman Society life during the time of St. Paul's visit. The chief interest centres round the life of a little blind boy.

BEAUTIFUL AMERICAN WOMEN

68 Illustrations Demy 8vo 454 pp cloth gilt 7s 6d net Postage 5d.

ROMANTIC DAYS IN THE EARLY REPUBLIC

By MARY CAROLINE CRAWFORD

Athenaeum, Oct 18 — During the early days of the Republic American cities were famous for the beauty of their women and the hospitality of society and round the life and customs of various of these cities Miss Crawford has written an interesting and delightful book.

LONDON GAY & HANCOCK, Ltd., 12 & 13, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden EDINBURGH 34, North Bridge.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From The Complete Amateur Boxer
(Methuen)

"THE STRAIGHT LEFT AT
THE HEAD IS THE BEST OF ALL BLOWS"

at the hands of an Apache. This fortunate happening leads to the journalist being permitted to read the manuscript left by Edouard's grandfather, Raoul Gressier, in which he set down his adventures during those troublous times. The story moves with a splendid swing, and high interest is sustained all through. When the storm clouds begin to gather over France, Raoul Gressier is studying medicine in London. Recalled by his friend Lucien Dareau, he safely crosses the Channel, to find the family château at Abreville sacked by the peasants under the direction of citizens from the faubourgs and the slums of Paris, and his uncle's head stuck on a pike. Between the hero and Citizen Legros, the leader of the band, begins a deadly duel. Baron Dareau, Lucien, Bastien Fourcadelles, the only surviving priest of the massacre in the Church of the Carmelites, and Raoul form the League of St. Louis, with headquarters at Monsieur Hasque's scent shop in Paris, to wreak vengeance upon the enemies of their country. Then is discovered a Terror within a Terror. Those who had taken the principal parts in the carnage at the prisons, the most active servants of the Commune, were found mysteriously done to death. Raoul is traced by Legros and imprisoned, but escapes. His next exploit is to convey Lucille Dareau, the object of his affections, to Cornwall. The emissaries of the Revolution find them. Raoul, however, once again comes off scatheless, returns to Paris, rescues the Baron from the National Guard, and squares accounts with Legros. It is a breathlessly exciting romance, and we are at the end left longing for the half-promised sequel. Mr. Whitelaw has given us several excellent novels, but in imaginative power and dramatic force of narration "The League of St. Louis" touches his highest level of achievement.

THE COMPLETE AMATEUR BOXER.

By J. G. BORUN LYNCH. With Preface by the EARL OF LONSDALE, and Two Chapters on Army Boxing by J. H. W. KNIGHT-BAUCE. With 17 Illustrations. 5s net. (Methuen)

One remembers Mr. Lynch as one of the pluckiest and best boxers who have represented either Varsity for several years, and this excellent book shows that he is as skilled in writing as in fighting. "The Complete Amateur Boxer" is what it says it is in the title, every aspect of boxing from the amateur's point of view being clearly and carefully treated. Sporting readers will find it a most valuable addition to their libraries, and to them we unreservedly recommend it.

FOUNDED ON FICTION.

By LADY SYBIL GRANT. Illustrated by GEORGE MORROW. 3s 6d. (Mills & Boon)

Lady Sybil Grant has written a collection of very amusing nonsense verse, and the book is illustrated by Mr. George Morrow, which in itself would have been a sufficient justification for it. Many artists have their types, but Mr. Morrow's types are unique. The Morrow face--and what reader of Punch does not know it?--is a work of genius. It is as great as the "Silent Fool" in "The Diary of a Nobody," who is never known to say anything else, but the one comment, "That's right." His workmen and his middle-class representatives of suburbia have never been equalled by any other artist, and the humour of his drawing is as quaint as the legends which he writes under them in Punch.

From The Complete Amateur Boxer
(Methuen).

A RIGHT HAND BODY BLOW.
In this one extra force is given owing to the recipient coming forward with a straight right.

From T. WERNER LAURIE'S LIST.

WET MAGIC.

By Mrs E NESBIT Crown 8vo Fully Illustrated
Cloth gilt 6s

In this latest book by F Nesbit, the children's own story teller, the Author takes for the scene of her drama the depths of the sea.

FIRST STEPS IN COLLECTING.

By Mrs GRACE VALLOIS, Author of 'Antiques and Curios in our Homes' 64 Illustrations Picture
Cover 6s net

ALL ABOUT POSTAGE STAMPS.

By FRANK J MELVILLE President of the Junior Philatelic Society Crown 8vo Fully Illustrated 6s net

STORIES FROM THE OPERAS.

By GLADYS DAVIDSON The three volumes, entirely reset in one volume together with a number of additional modern operas Very fully Illustrated Crown 8vo picture cover in Colours 450 pages 6s net

THE HANDY BOY. A Modern Handy Book of Practical and Profitable Pastimes.

By A NIELLY HALL Author of 'Handicraft for Handy Boys' With nearly 600 Illustrations and working Drawings by the Author and NORMAN P HART Crown 8vo Cloth 6s net

MRS. EDWARDS' COOKERY BOOK.

A volume of Economical Cooking Recipes
Picture cover in Colours Crown 8vo 6s net

LOVE AND LOVERS.

By ORVILLE BALIOW Crown 8vo 3s 6d net

HOW TO WIN AT AUCTION BRIDGE.

"Royal Spades"
By C. L. (AVINDISH) (IDWYN ANTHONY)
Author of 'The Complete Bridge Player' How to Win at Bridge etc etc Crown 8vo with the rules and specimen hands 4s 6d net Also in handsome Leather binding for Bridge Tables 7s net

LOVE AND $200 A YEAR.

By Mrs ALICE D PRAGA A Housekeeping Story for Young Married Couples Picture Wrapper in Colours
Crown 8vo Cloth gilt 2s net

Illustrated Christmas list post free 1 application

CLIFFORD'S INN, LONDON

Lynwood's New Books.

A MADONNA OF THE POOR, and other Stories. By Olive Holland 14s 6d

PRINCE JOHN OF STREPLITZ.
A Romance By Major F A Symonds 2 14s 6d

THE TAMING OF THE TERROR.
A Story of a Feud By H Caulton Weeks 12 14s 6d

EXCEEDING PLEASANT, and other Sketches By L Oulton 10s 11s 12s 13s 14s 15s 16s 17s 18s 19s 20s 21s 22s 23s 24s 25s 26s 27s 28s 29s 30s 31s 32s 33s 34s 35s 36s 37s 38s 39s 40s 41s 42s 43s 44s 45s 46s 47s 48s 49s 50s 51s 52s 53s 54s 55s 56s 57s 58s 59s 60s 61s 62s 63s 64s 65s 66s 67s 68s 69s 70s 71s 72s 73s 74s 75s 76s 77s 78s 79s 80s 81s 82s 83s 84s 85s 86s 87s 88s 89s 90s 91s 92s 93s 94s 95s 96s 97s 98s 99s 100s

LACHLAN'S WIDOW. A Scottish Romance By Mrs Disney Leith 14s 6d

SPARKS THAT BROOD. A Novel. By Noel Fleming 12s 14s 16s 18s 20s 22s 24s 26s 28s 30s 32s 34s 36s 38s 40s 42s 44s 46s 48s 50s 52s 54s 56s 58s 60s 62s 64s 66s 68s 70s 72s 74s 76s 78s 80s 82s 84s 86s 88s 90s 92s 94s 96s 98s 100s

AT THE BACK OF THE WORLD.
Wanderings Over Many Lands and Seas
By George and Jennie Fugh 3 14s 6d

THE FORDINGTON TWINS. A Novel. By E Newton Bunney 20 pages 6s

AN INDIAN MYSTERY. A Romance of India. By M Kenniker Andrews 10 14s 6d

THE MYSTERY OF JEANNE MARIE. By Ellare Barlow 11s 14s 6d

LESLIE. By Ada M M Hales 6s

THE STRUGGLE FOR THE CROWN.
A Romance of the 17th Century By E Holland 32s

OSCAR WILDE: A Study. By E Thurston Hopkins. Second Edition revised and enlarged. Introduction by Sir T. Macdonald Williams, M.A. Portrait 2s net

* Authors are invited to send their manuscripts which receive careful consideration and whenever possible an offer is made for publication

Complete Catalogue Post Free
LYNWOOD & CO., LTD., PUBLISHERS.
12, PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

BOOKS RECOMMENDED By Critics that Count.

EGYPTIAN ART

By SIR GASTON MASPERO With over 100 Illustrations.
Cloth 21s net

The Times says "Mr Maspero's call to students to look into the details and to note the varied treatment of Egyptian works of art is especially useful. We are supplied with splendid photographic illustrations to enable us to follow the textual descriptions of typical masterpieces"

THE ROMAN CAMPAGNA

By ARNALDO CERVESATO With 407 Illustrations.
Cloth 21s net

The Times says "An attractively written study by a well known Italian author both of the scenery and of the people. The illustrations are both from their excellence and their number a conspicuous feature of the book"

CHRISTMAS In Ritual and Tradition, Christian and Pagan

By C A MILLS With 20 Illustrations Second Edition
Cloth 10s 6d net

The Times says "This well written book a mine of knowledge can fully details all the traditions attached to each feast in every part of Europe—all the superstitions, the forebodings of the future, the mumblings, the maskings, and the wavings"

HOW FRANCE IS GOVERNED

By RAYMOND POINCARÉ President of the French Republic (Second Impression) Cloth 7s 6d net

The Spectator says "A most interesting and valuable account of the whole train work of French Administration packed full of information not easily obtainable elsewhere and conveyed in language of remarkable and attractive simplicity"

FABRE Poet of Science

By Dr C V LFGROS Cloth 10s 6d net

The Bookman says "With a fervour which commands our admiration the biographer has brought out all the most salient points the most pictures que revelations the most pregnant discoveries of Fabre and at the same time has revealed for us a character of rare charm"

MODERN RUSSIA

By G AILXINSKY Cloth 15s net

The Bookman says "Mr Alexandrovsky is a model of his kind. It is more than informing—it is fascinating, and it should do much to open the academic or melodramatic horizon from the English popular mind"

LUXEMBOURG

By GFORGE RENWICK FRGS With 34 Illustrations and a Map Cloth 10s 6d net

The Globe says "The most charming description of the little Duchy of Luxembourg that can be imagined"

JAPAN'S INHERITANCE The Country, Its People, and their Destiny

By F BRUCE MITFORD FRGS With a Map and over 70 Illustrations Cloth 10s 6d net

The Observer says "Has quite considerable claims to being the most interesting work on Japan Mr Mitford's freshness of vision makes every page valuable"

A COURT PAINTER & HIS CIRCLE

Francois Boucher (1703-1770)

By Mrs BLARNE With a Coloured Frontispiece and 32 other Illustrations Cloth 15s net

The Sphere says "Mrs Blarne's new book gives a delightful picture of a social epoch which was undoubtedly picturesque and artistic. It is admirably illustrated"

MONOLOGUES

By RICHARD MIDDLETON Author of 'The Ghost Ship' etc Cloth, 5s net

The Times says "Their criticism is sound and sane, and their abundant humour does not conceal the fact that they are the work of an artist who was jealous for the honour of his art"

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1 ADELPHI TERRACE, LONDON

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

"RENOUNCING WISELY TO ASPIRE TO LOOK LIKE —, —, —"
From Founded on Fiction
(Mills & Boon).

[ For : A Flutter in Feathers
(Wells Gardner)

"HE HAD SEEN A HAWK"
THE DAY YESTERDAY"

"YOUR COMPLEX
MODERN SPIRIT
LOOKS A FRAME OF CURLLED BARONIAL
LOOKS."
From Founded on Fiction
(Mills & Boon).

A FLUTTER IN FEATHERS.

By GEORGE CHATER With 51 Illustrations by GEORGE MORROW 6s (Wells Gardner)

Mr George Chater is a humorist, and a new one, which is always refreshing, in view of the rarity of the breed.

And he has, moreover, had a good idea on which to build up his novel. His heroes—there are three of them—and heroine, finding that London life does not agree with them, decide to start a poultry farm in a remote part of the country. They do so, and, being quite ignorant of the business at the start and having bad luck afterwards, eventually they fail. However, the two brothers and sister fortunately come into small legacies, while the fourth partner has a certain amount of money of his own. So, after the sister has married the last-mentioned gentleman they all go off to New Zealand, where, presumably, a greater measure of success awaits them. That is all. No, decidedly a résumé of the plot does Mr. Chater less than justice. But it is not for the plot that his book will be read, but rather for its clever characterisation and its rapid succession of amusing incidents, which last are made funnier by the able co-operation of Mr. George Morrow, whose peculiar talent has seldom been seen to better advantage. In fact, "A Flutter in Feathers" is very well worth reading. It may not make you laugh, but it will give you a succession of most gratifying smiles.

SALLY CASTLETON, SOUTHERNER.

By CRITTENDEN MARRIOTT With 6 Illustrations (1 in Colour) by N. C. WYETH. 6s (Lippincott)

Sally Castleton and her sister Gene are left in charge of their Virginian home while their father is away fighting for the South. One day there comes to them, wounded and almost at death's door, a Lieutenant Philip Byrd, carrying important dispatches from General Breckenbridge to General Lee. He has only just time to pass them on to another messenger ere the Northern troops surround the house and the sisters are forced to hide him in a stove. Here begins all the trouble for the sisters, for if Philip had not been hidden in that stove, he would not have heard Captain Radcliffe talk over his plans for securing information from a Southern spy. And when you know that Sally falls in love with Radcliffe and is forced by her loyalty to the South to spy upon him and to try to gain his confidence, you will understand what very intriguing situations result from this condition of things. Besides, this is a book that grips the imagination and has a love interest so strong and so finely told that you really cannot leave it until you have finished it. Mr. Marriott is to be congratulated upon a very stirring romance, and one that will assuredly add to his reputation. We must add a word of special praise for Mr. Wyeth's spirited illustrations; they are a distinct acquisition to the book.

From Behind the Beyond
(Lane).

THE PARISIAN DOG.

D. APPLETON & CO.

THE BUSINESS OF LIFE ROBERT W. CHAMBERS

With Gibson Pictures

A love-story of fashionable Society. A plea for a life unspoiled by luxury and a warning against low moral standards for men and women. 6/-

DEGARMO'S WIFE

David Graham Phillips

Studies of the modern American Woman by the Author of "The Husband's Story." 6/-

THE SILENT BATTLE

George Gibbs

The dramatic and powerful story of a young man's struggle to overcome an inherited falling. 6/-

TWO ON TOUR IN SOUTH AMERICA.

ANNA WENTWORTH SEARS Coloured Inlay on Cover and 30 Illustrations, cloth, 8vo, gilt top 7s. 6d. net
A bright and breezy account of a journey to the Panama Canal, to Ecuador, Peru and Chib, through South America to Madeira. A jolly travel book of exceptional interest

25 BEDFORD ST., COVENT GARDEN, LONDON.

JAMES CLARKE & Co.

Publishers, 13 & 14, FLEET STREET, LONDON.

A Chronicle of the Archbishops of Canterbury

By A E McKILLIAM, M.A.

16 Portrait and 16 Illustrations.
Demy 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top 7/6 net and concisely written, the book will undoubtedly be, especially for the lives of the period—after the Restoration—which was not included in the voluminous work of Dean Hook "

Things that Matter

Most. Short Devotional Readings
By J H JOWETT, M.A., D.D.
Author of "The Transfigured Church," &c. Handsomely bound in cloth, gilt edges, with headband and marbled paper, 8/6 net; leather, 5/- net.
"Will be found of great value."
—Sheffield Telegraph

Religion and To-day

By J BRIERLEY
Author of "The Secret of Living," &c. Large crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top. 8/6 net.
"Just like its predecessors, but is as vigorous and original as if none of them had been published."—Prof W T Davison, in The Methodist Recorder

Christian Union in Social Service

By J C. CARLILE
Author of "The Story of the English Baptists," &c. With an Introduction by the Bishop of Caernarfon. Crown 8vo, cloth boards. 3/6 net.

The Rosebud Annual The Ideal Book for the Nursery

Four Coloured Plates, over 200 Pictures, and numerous Stories, &c., by the children's favourites. Printed in colour throughout. Pictorial boards, varnished, 8/6, cloth boards, with design in gold and colours, 4/-
"A treasure of fun and interest."—Birmingham Daily Mail any other important works,

FROM PITMAN'S GIFT BOOK LIST.

You will be GLAD to hear that in speaking of

POLLYANNA

THE GLAD BOOK

By ELEANOR H. PORTER

The most successful book in many a year

* The Daily Telegraph says "Surely never before was a story with a purpose so engagingly and so pleasantly presented. She is an incorrigible little optimist, and radiates optimism about her as the sun radiates light."

The Lady says "Everyone who appreciates L. M. Montgomery's popular novel, 'Anne of Green Gables,' should read 'Pollyanna,' a really delightful book."

Illustrated.

Coloured Portrait.

6s.

Another Strikingly Clever Novel

PIERROT IN TOWN.

A Fantastic Comedy on the subject of Youth & Age.

By HELEN ASHTON.

6s.

The Liverpool Courier—"An arresting work... the haunting charm, the feeling for the dramatic, the sympathy and insight which the work reveals... a story conceived with a real originality of motive and freshness of design. 'Pierrot in Town' is a clever, even brilliant, piece of work. It stands well out above the mass of fiction which is being poured from the Press. If Miss Ashton can write a better novel than this—and 'Pierrot' is full of promise as well as of achievement—her name as a novelist is destined to some celebrity."

PRINCE CHARLES EDWARD:

His Life, Times, and Fight for the Crown.

By J CUIHERBERT HADDEN. Illustrated. Demy 8vo 7s 6d net

"What a tale it is that he has to tell!... he has a real talent for selecting the vivid and appealing points of history."—Guardian "A lively popular life by a practised litterateur."—Times. "A lively and entertaining book... It is hardly too much to say that of all the many historians of Prince Charles this is the one best adapted to meet the needs of the general reader. We heartily recommend this fresh and spirited narrative."—The British Weekly

TRAVELLING PALACES, Luxury

in Passenger Steamships By R A FLETCHER.

54 Illustrations. Demy 8vo 10s 6d net

An absorbingly interesting volume in which the development of the modern passenger steamship is graphically described by one who has travelled extensively, and whose practical experience of conditions afloat has enabled him to write with first hand knowledge.

THE MOST HONOURABLE ORDER OF THE BATH. A

descriptive and Historical Account By the Rev

JOCELYN PERKINS, M.A., Sacrist and Minor Canon of Westminster Abbey. 40 Illustrations. Demy 8vo 7s 6d net

An exceedingly valuable history of this great Order of Knighthood by an author who has had peculiar opportunities for obtaining access to documents relating to the proceedings of the Order, and for making accessible to the general reader information hitherto contained in partly voluminous long since out of print.

THE FRANCO-PRUSSIAN WAR AND ITS HIDDEN CAUSES.

By the late EMILE OLLIVIER Translated, with

Introduction and Notes, by G BURNHAM IVES.

Illustrated. Demy 8vo 8s 6d net

INSECT LIFE: ITS WHY AND WHEREFORE. By H G STANLEY, F.R.S

Illustrated 2s. 6d net.

THE NEW MAN. A Portrait Study of the latest type By PHILIP GIBBS 3s 6d net

In this book Mr Philip Gibbs, the well known novelist and journalist, presents an intimate psychological study of a new type in English life. Not dogmatic, it presents a tremendous moral, drawn from the new social phenomena of our time, which differentiates this generation from its predecessors.

LONDON SIR ISAAC PITMAN & SONS, LTD.,

1, ABINGDON CORNER, E. C.

From Some Sporting Dogs (Jarrold)

COCKER SPANIELS

SOME SPORTING DOGS

Plates by G. VERNON STOKES Letterpress by F. TOWNSEND BARTON M.R.C.V.S. 4s. 6d. net (Jarrold and Sons)

We took up this book to look at its pictures and very beautiful they are but not till we turned the pages did we realise the serious usefulness of the volume as well as its artistic value. In the dozen plates which Mr. Stokes has given we have what one might rightly call "portraits" of the main varieties of sporting dogs: Foxhound, Otterhound, Bloodhound, Harrier, Greyhound, Basset, Beagle, Setter, Labrador, Retriever, Clumber and Field spaniels, Cocker spaniel, Scottish terriers. Fine specimens they are, alert, well bred. But the plates are even more than that for with his able handling of his subject Mr. Stokes has proved

From Cassell's Natural History (Cassell)

YOUNG SOMALI HYENAS

DOGS THEIR SELECTION, BREEDING, AND KEEPING

By FRANK I. BARTON M.R.C.V.S. With 32 Illustrations (one in colour) 3s. 6d. net (Jarrold)

Mr. F. I. Barton is one of the best known authorities upon everything that has to do with dogs and a further book of advice is certain of a welcome. In the present volume the writer deals in a clear and concise manner with the various points of importance which have to be noted by the beginner in dog keeping but he touches also the more important and more difficult questions which are bound to arise when owners are anxious to breed and show their dogs. Some brief medical notes at the end of the book will also be found to be of much value, while a number of excellent illustrations add to the beauty and usefulness of the book.

From Dogs, their Selection, Keeping, and Breeding (Jarrold)

AIREDALE TERRIER DOG

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From Thistledown
(Alex Gardner Paisley).

'I'm a fisher too,' remarked the minister broadly, 'but a fisher of men,' the latter words were delivered with great unction.
'Oh, indeed,' dryly responded the angler,
'I had a keek into your creel yesterday, ye didna seem to ha'e caught ing the best from the old gleaners,

has added to them
lavishly from his own abundant store. There is not one but what is worth retelling
many times. Dealing as he does with the humour of old Scotch divines, the pulpit and the pew,
the old Scotch beadle and precentor, dramdrinking, the thistle and the rose, of the humour
'tween Bench and Bar, the Scottish poets, rural life and Scottish superstitions, he has drawn for the Southerner a picture of Scottish life vastly different from the one usually put before that worthy. The fine coloured illustrations deserve
special mention,
they not only reflect cleverly the humour of the jests they illustrate, but are handsome adornments to a hand-
somerly got up book

THE HON MR JUSTICE DARLING,
JUDGE OF THE KING'S BENCH
DIVISION (Photo, C Vandyk.)
From Law and Laughter
(Foulis).

Head-piece from The Thunderhead Lady (Putnam).

THISTLEDOWN.

By ROBERT FORD 53 net (Alex Gardner)

This is described as a book of Scotch humour, character, folklore, story, and anecdote. It will be remembered that Sydney Smith held but a poor opinion of the Scotsman as a humorist. "The only idea of wit which prevails occasionally in the North," he wrote on one occasion, "and which, under the name of 'wut,' is so infinitely distressing to people of good taste, is laughing immoderately at stated intervals." After reading the admirable compilation by Robert Ford we are forced to conclude that,

From The Provost THE DOMINIE.
(Foulis)

in this instance, the witty Canon knew nothing about his subject, for it would be hard to find a country which could produce such a plentiful crop of anecdote, racy of the soil, tinctured by the life and religion of the people, so pungent, and withal so genuinely humorous. Mr. Ford has gone beyond Dean Ramsay for some of his examples, and, whilst retain-

From Thistledown
(Alex Gardner, Paisley).

'MAN, I HAVENA GOT A FARDEN IN THE HALE TOON.' 'NA, I'M NO
THINKING YE WAD! YE SEE, WE DO A' OUR'AIN WHISTLIN' REE-EE-EE'

ST.

A WOMAN'S WINTER IN AFRICA. By CHARLOTTE CAMERON. Demy 8vo Cloth gilt, Illustrated with about 150 Photographs taken by the Author and printed throughout on art paper, 10s 6d net

THE QUEENS OF ARAGON: Their Lives and Times By E. L. MIRON. Demy 8vo Illustrated, 16s net

PRINCESS AND QUEEN OF ENGLAND: Mary II By MARY F SANDERS Demy 8vo Illustrated, 16s net

MAXIMILIAN, THE DREAMER. Holy Roman Emperor, 1459-1519 By CHRISTOPHER HARE Demy 8vo Illustrated with Photogravure Plates 12s 6d net

A VAGABOND COURTIER (Baron von Pillnitz) By EDITH E. CUTHELL, FR Hist S Two volumes, demy 8vo Illustrated, 24s net

THE ROMANCE OF AN ELDERLY POET. A Hitherto Unknown Chapter in the Life of George Crabbe By A. M. BROADLEY and WALTER JERROLD Demy 8vo. Illustrated, 10s 6d. net

FAMOUS ARTISTS AND THEIR MODELS. By DR ANGELO S RAPPOPORT Demy 8vo Illustrated, 16s net

A WINTER IN INDIA. By ARCHIBALD B SPENS Large crown 8vo With 100 Illustrations, 6s net

AUGUST STRINDBERG: Studies and Impressions by L. LIND-AR-HAGBY Crown 8vo Illustrated, 6s net

TORQUEMADA AND THE SPANISH INQUISITION. By RAFAEL SABATINI Demy 8vo Illustrated, 16s net Second Edition

SAINT AND GEORGE GROSSMITH. By STANLEY NAYLOR Crown 8vo 50 Illustrations, 5s net

MORE ABOUT COLLECTING. By SIR JAMES YOXALL, M P Large crown 8vo Cloth gilt, with about 100 Illustrations, 5s net

PAUL'S SIMPLICIODE. Crown 8vo Cloth, 1s net A simple and thoroughly practical code for the use of Travellers, Immigrants, etc A sentence in a word

THE LIFE OF CESARE BORGIA. By RAFAEL SABATINI Third Edition (Essex Library) Demy 8vo Illustrated, 5s net

FEODOR DOSTOIEFFSKY. By J A T LLOYD Second Edition (Essex Library) Demy 8vo Illustrated, 5s net

SHAKESPEARE'S "HAMLET." The Story of the Play concisely told (Cinema Books), produced in conjunction with the Cinematograph Film, showing Sir J Forbes Robertson and the full Company from Drury Lane Theatre, with 55 Illustrations taken from the film 1s net

THE LIFE AND REIGN OF VICTORIA THE GOOD (Cinema Books), produced in conjunction with the Cinematograph Film "Sixty Years a Queen" With 54 Illustrations taken from the Film 1s net.

THE INSANITY OF GENIUS and the General Inequality of Human Faculty Physiologically Considered By J T NISBET Sixth and New Edition with an Introduction by Dr BERNARD HOLLANDER, (Crown 8vo 5s net

A TOUR THROUGH SOUTH AMERICA. By A S FORKES Demy 8vo Cloth gilt, 150 Illustrations, 10s 6d net.

SIX SHILLING NOVELS

YOUTH WILL BE SERVED (5th Ed)	DOLF WYLLARDE
THE EYES OF ALICIA	CHARLES E PEARCE
THE WINDS OF GOD	HAMILTON DRUMMOND
THE PAINTED LADY (3rd Ed)	ARABELLA KENALY
QUADRILLE COURT	Cecil ADAMS
THE WATERED GARDEN (2nd Ed)	MAUD STEFFNEY RAWSON
HIS MAGNIFICENCE	A J ANDERSON
FRIVOLE	KATE HORN
DEFIANT DIANA	E EVERETT-GREEN
THE PIT OF CORRUPTION	WINIFRED GRAHAM
HUNT THE SLIPPER OLIVER MAUDSLIFF (JANE WARDLE)
A WIFE OUT OF EGYPT (4th Ed)	NORMA LORIMER
BECAUSE	MAUD YARDLEY
THE STRENGTH OF THE HILLS (2nd Ed)	HALLIWELL LUT-CLIFF
THE HONOUR OF THE CLINTONS (2nd Ed)	ARCHIBALD MARSHALL
THE REDEEMER	RENE BAZIN
THE FRUIT OF INDISCRETION	SIR WILLIAM MAGNAY
CASSERLEY'S WIFE	ESTHER MILLER
THE CLOAK OF ST MARTIN	ARMINE GRACK

CAKES AND ALES. By EDWARD SPENCER. ("NATHANIEL GUBRINS") Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s 6d. net Fourth and New Edition

THE FLOWING BOWL. By EDWARD SPENCER ("NATHANIEL GUBRINS") Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s 6d. net Fourth and New Edition

A GARLAND OF VERSE FOR YOUNG PEOPLE. Edited by ALFRED H MILES Handsome cloth gilt, 2s 6d net

THE CORNISH COAST AND MOORS. By A G HOLLIOTT-STOKES Demy 8vo With Maps and 150 Illustrations from Photographs, cloth, 5s net

THE A B C SERIES

An Exceptionally Fine Series of Books Large crown 8vo Fully Illustrated 5s each net

A B C OF ARTISTIC PHOTOGRAPHY. By A J ANDERSON With Photogravure Plates and Half-tone Illustrations in Black and Sepia 5s net Third Edition

A B C OF COLLECTING OLD CONTINENTAL POTTERY. By J F BLACKER In large Crown 8vo With over 250 Illustrations in Half-tone and Line Cloth, 5s net

A B C OF ENGLISH CERAMIC ART. By J F BLACKER. With Coloured Frontispiece and over 1,200 Illustrations in Half-tone and Line Large Crown 8vo Cloth, 5s net Published originally at 10s 6d net as "Nineteenth Century English Ceramic Art"

A B C OF JAPANESE ART. By J F BLACKER 460 pages 150 Line and about 100 Half-tone Illustrations

A B C ABOUT COLLECTING (Third Edition) By Sir JAMES YOXALL, M P China, Clocks, Prints, Books, Pictures, Furniture, Violins, etc Profusely Illustrated

A B C OF COLLECTING OLD ENGLISH CHINA. By J F BLACKER Numerous Line and 64 pages of Half-tone Illustrations

A B C OF COLLECTING OLD ENGLISH POTTERY. By J F BLACKER 400 Line and 32 pages of Half-tone Illustrations

A B C GUIDE TO MYTHOLOGY. By HILLMAN CLARKE Profusely Illustrated

A B C GUIDE TO MUSIC. By D GREGORY MASON Illustrated

A B C GUIDE TO PICTURES. By CHARLES H CAFFIN Illustrated

THE "EVERYDAY" SERIES

Each book contains a Recipe for every day in the year, including February 29th In crown 8vo, strongly bound, 1s net each

The Everyday Vegetable Book. The Everyday Soup Book. The Everyday Economical Cookery Book.

The Everyday Pudding Book. The Everyday Savoury Book.

THE DINER'S-OUT VADE-MECUM. A Pocket "What's What" on Manners and Customs of Society's Functions, with Hints on Etiquette, Dress, After-Dinner Speaking, Story-telling, Toasts, etc By ALFRED H MILES In cap 8vo (6½ x 3½), cloth bound, round corners, 1s 6d net

DRAWING-ROOM ENTERTAINMENTS. New and Original Monologues, Duologues, Dialogues and Playlets for Home and Platform use 1s net

A GREY LIFE (6th Ed)	"RITA"
THE STROLLING SAINT (4th Ed)	RAFAEL SABATINI
CHEERFUL CRAFT	R ANDON
THE CURSE OF THE NILE (4th Ed)	DOUGLAS SLADEN
THE SHE-WOLF	MAXIMÉ FORMONT
COLUMBINE AT THE FAIR	KATE HORN
THE UNWORTHY PACT	JEROTHEA GERARD
BRAVE BRIGANDS	MAY WYNNE
THE ADVENTURES OF MORTIMER DIXON	ALICIA RAMSEY
THE SPLIT PEAS	HEADON HILL
THE PASSION OF KATHLEEN DUVLEN	L T MEADE
WHEN SATAN RULED	C RANGER GULL
THE SECRET OF THE ZENANA	MAY WYNNE
LOVE TIDES	CAPT FRANK H. SHAW
BLACK HONEY	C RANGER GULL

AN IDEAL XMAS PRESENT.

THE MERCHANT OF VENICE. A Novel, written by a popular Novelist, founded on the Comedy With 8 beautiful Coloured Plates Crown 8vo 6s ("Novels from Shakespeare Series")

Complete descriptive list gratis from—

STANLEY PAUL & Co., 31, ESSEX STREET, LONDON.

From The Hungarian Fairy Book (Unwin).

HILDA'S EXPERIENCES.

With Illustrations

By MAY BALDWIN 3s. (W. & R Chambers.)

An English girl must necessarily meet with disillusion as well as pleasant surprises on her first visit to an unknown land, and so it is with Hilda de Trafford who goes to stay with her relations in Australia. At first she is too homesick to gain anything but unhappiness from her holiday, and is inclined to dislike and disapprove of everything. She thinks the Australians too rough and ready, is horrified at the scarcity and independence of servants and considers the country too socialistic altogether. But the author shows in her bright, interesting way how the girl's opinion gradually changes, and how she grows to love Australian people and Australian ways before the end of her visit, and how the Australians, who at first think she is stiff and prim, grow to love her and to understand her in return. Miss May Baldwin certainly has the gift of making her readers familiar with the country which she chooses as background for her story, she is very careful over details, and calls up vivid pictures of places and people with an extraordinarily realistic effectiveness. Hilda's experiences do not lack excitement, the bush fire, among the various other incidents crowded into the book, makes a particularly strong appeal. The story will leave its youthful readers with a feeling that they too have been for a holiday to Australia, like Hilda de Trafford, and have witnessed strange customs and seen strange animals and learned many things they did not know before.

Endpapers to The Wonderland Series (Jarrold).

From The Swiss Family Robinson
(Henry Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton).

MACLEAN AND PLUNKET STOP LORD EGLINTON'S CARRIAGE

From The Strange Story Book (Longmans).

THE STRANGE STORY BOOK.

By Mrs ANDREW LANG Edited by ANDREW LANG
6s (Longmans)

This is the last of the twenty-five children's books with which Andrew Lang has delighted two generations of lovers of fairy tales and adventure stories. In a beautiful preface Mrs Andrew Lang tells her little friends about the brilliant scholar whose "Blue Fairy Book" and its numerous sequels have been the delight of some hundreds of thousands of young readers. And a charming set of Lang's verses written for the first of his fairy books is given in the last.

"And you once more may voyage through
The forests that of old we knew,
The fairy forests wet with dew

"Where you, resuming childish things,
Shall listen when the Blue Bird sings
And sit at feasts with fairy kings"

The Strange Stories start excellently with the tale of Wolfert Webber that R. L. Stevenson said was one of the finest treasure-seeking stories in the world. Then comes Voltaire's "Zadig," who anticipated the detective methods of Sherlock Holmes and the Dupin of Poe's tales. There are also real Red Indian stories told by the Red Indians themselves, and a store of strange and exciting tales about highwaymen and other figures of romance.

THE WONDER BOOK OF SHIPS.

Edited by H. GOLDING With 12 Coloured Plates and 320 Illustrations 3s 6d (Ward, Lock)

This volume is said to be for boys and girls, but there are very few adults who would not derive immense pleasure and a great deal of information from it. For each section is written by an expert, and no subject connected with ships is left untouched. Liners, men-of-war, lighthouses, life in the Navy, flags and signalling, the building of the monsters, the training of the boys and men who man the vessels, are all dealt with in interesting and convincing fashion and the diagrams and sectional drawings are most clear. One can almost hear the riveting at Harland and Wolff's and take part in the deck sports. The book is a companion to the similar volume on Railways.

THE STORY OF GREECE.

By MARY MACGREGOR. With 19 Plates in Colour by WALTER
CRANE, and a
Map. 7s. 6d.
net. (Jack.)

When you think of it, it is rather a wonderful feat to confine within a matter of 350 pages a complete history of Ancient Greece from the earliest times (including a good deal of mythology) down to the deaths of Alexander and Demosthenes. Yet this is what Miss

Macgregor has done - and with success. It was inevitable, of course, that she should have been compelled to use the cinematograph method, in which a series of the leading events are presented one after another with only a few

From My Own Fairy Book (Arrowsmith).

"HERR SCHMIDT WENT DOWN ON HIS KNEES."

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

words of connection. But in this case there could have been nothing else to do, and in spite of it Miss Macgregor has achieved her effect with really striking success. The book is also written in a clear and simple style, which will be understood very easily by the readers for whom it is designed. And it has the inestimable advantage of a number of coloured pictures by Mr Walter Crane

NORAH OF BILLABONG.

By MARY GRANT BRUCE With Illustrations by J. MACFARLANE 3s 6d (Ward Lock & Co)

Many persons, more fortunate than ourselves, have already met the young heroine of this story in a former book. For them the pleasure will be doubled when they meet her again in these pages. We ourselves gather easily, from the opening chapter of the present volume, that Norah and her surroundings have had a great charm in the past, and we can speak enthusiastically of the charm that continues. We meet Norah, now aged fifteen, on the breaking-up day at the school to which she had been sent to give her some of the learning and polish impossible to be obtained for her at her own beloved home at the Bush Station of Billabong, Australia. On this day her devoted father and brother, and brother's friend Wally, come to see her take her prize, and then whisk her and her girl-chum off for their holidays at the old home. The girls are wild with delight, and the author, with her deft skill and knowledge of girlhood, gives us a chapter or two of exciting town life—a dinner at a big hotel, a visit to the pantomime, a morning at a children's hospital, and so forth, and then—home. After that, incident follows closely upon incident, and at the end of this cheery, natural, sympathetic story we leave Norah and her party—the old home having been burnt down by a revengeful servant—happily camping out in the Bush. The story is very brightly written, and full of attraction for girls—and even for boys.

When she was not in the land of make-believe, she lingered in the paradise of books.

introduction to An Imaginative Child (Allenson).

AN IMAGINATIVE CHILD

Studies in the Child's View-Point. By AGNES AUBREY MILTON 1s. 6d. net (H. R. Allenson)

This is a day in which the old standards and ideals of education are being weighed in the balance of popular opinion and found wanting; and this little volume, with its dainty sketches, bears fresh evidence to the fact that more and more the truth is being realised that the child can only be reached through the imagination. The charming little stories which the book contains will appeal to all children, and they should serve to impress upon the adult mind that those who undertake the training of the young must first become themselves "as one of the least of these little ones."

TWENTY-FOUR TURKISH FAIRY TALES.

Collected and Translated by Dr. IGNÁ CZ KÚNOS With 16 Coloured Plates and many Illustrations and Decorations in Black-and-White by WILLY POGÁNY. 10s. 6d. net. (Harrap.)

The tales which comprise this collection do not come from literary sources, for the Turks have practically no literature of their own; but among typically Turkish institutions is that of the story-teller, from whom Dr. Kúnos has in every case obtained his material. The collection is one that will appeal alike to the folk-lorist and to the ordinary lover of fairy-stories, and Mr. Pogány was exactly the right man to illustrate it. The result of his collaboration with Dr. Kúnos is a book that is in every way striking and effective.

From the Story of Greece (Jack).

"SWEET, PIERCING SWEET WAS THE MUSIC OF PAN'S PIPE."

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From Wet Magic
(Laurie)

THE CHARGERS OF THE HORSE MARINES

THE GREAT AIRSHIP

By CAPTAIN F. S. BRERETON With 6 Illustrations in Two Colours 5s (Blackie)

The modern writer of adventure stories for boys above everything else must be up to date and Captain Brereton's latest volume is no exception to the rule. The great airship of the title was built in nine months as the result of a challenge to the hero by the villain of the piece. It was to be capable of encircling the world and to be in every material point superior to the Zeppelin. The young Englishman who is thus challenged naturally succeeds in his task but the main interest of the book lies in the remarkable series of adventures which befall the hero. As a descent into Adrianople during the bombardment is included among these readers need have no reason to hesitate about Captain Brereton's book. It is a real thriller.

WET MAGIC

By E. NESBIT Illustrated by H. R. MILLAR 6s (Laurie)

The girl or boy who gets a copy of E. Nesbit's new book given to them this Christmas will indeed be fortunate. Wet Magic is enthralling. And it is told with all the charm and sympathy and delicious humour that have endeared its writer to countless children and countless child-lovers. The children in her stories are so well worth meeting such wholesome imaginative natural children. In the present story there are four of them and two of them buy an aquarium (eight and ninepence they give for it in the Old Kent Road) and are greatly disappointed at not being allowed to take it away to the seaside with them to fill with sea water and put anemones in. They are not even allowed to fill it with water from under the tap so they have to be content with making it look as much like an aquarium as they can with a few clinkers from the rockery a little sand shells a tin gold fish and several dahlias (to look like anemones). Then quite unexpectedly through the murmuring of a few chance words the magic begins. But it is all so mysterious that they are not sure that anything that really was anything could be said to have happened—for after all what Francis said he had seen might have been just fancy. But whether it was fancy or not and what happened when they arrived at the sea-side and paddled out on the rocks must be left for all those children who will be reading Wet Magic this Christmas to discover for themselves. The book is delightfully illustrated by H. R. Millar as usual.

MARGARET'S BOOK

By H. FIELDING HALL With 12 Coloured Plates 37 Illustrations in the text and numerous Decorative Drawings by CHARLES ROBINSON 7s 6d net (Hutchinson)

The trouble with many children's books is that if they are beautiful to look at they are silly to read while if they are good reading their production has been badly scamped. Margaret's Book belongs to the select class which is neither of these things. It is a beautiful book to look at illustrated with some of the most dainty and effective drawings that Mr. Charles Robinson—that prince among artists for children—has ever made and produced with the utmost lavishness. It is also really good to read—a fairy story of the first water. The idea of the book is simple. Margaret is a discontented little girl who induces a fairy to give her four wishes so that she may change her surroundings when she wants to. She becomes in turn a fish a flower and a bird and finishes with a visit to Fairyland. The result is naturally that her return to ordinary life is welcome. But in the meanwhile the adventures through which she passes are not only good reading but they are instructive. The author guarantees the accuracy of these portions of his book in which he touches upon natural history. The result is an ideal book for children in which fantasy and fact are combined in a manner most original and effective.

From The Seven Champions of Christendom
(Wells Gardner)

ST. GEORGE DREW HIS SWORD, AND CUT THE BONDS"

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

THE NURSERY RHYME PICTURE BOOK

By L. LESLIE BROOKE. 2s. 6d. (Freck. Warne and Co.)

It has lately been the fashion to write books of nonsense verse, presumably for children. As a rule, these books are simply portrayals of the child mind. The child cares nothing for them, the humour passes him by, and they are read largely by his elders. Mr. L. Leslie Brooke clearly believes that there are no rhymes like the old rhymes; at any rate, in his "Nursery Rhyme Picture Book," he has attempted no modern verse, and his illustrations are wonderful. The pig in "To market, to market," is an animal to have known, and the poor man whom the robbers came to rob when he had nought, and who subsequently ran fifteen miles in fourteen days and never looked behind him, will delight any nursery. His treatment of colour is excellent, especially in the two full page illustrations of "Humpty Dumpty." It is certainly one of the best books of its kind, and cannot fail to be a source of endless pleasure to thousands of children

"SHE ... ONLY LAUGHED BECAUSE BUTTERFLY TICKLED HER CHEEK."
From Margaret's Book
(Hutchinson)

by keeping a poultry-farm, and finding that they ate more poultry than they could rear, they hit upon the bright idea of keeping a boarding-house by the sea. Larder Lodge they called it, and the guests who came in answer to the advertisement included the Pig family, the Dog family, Widow Hedgehog, Dinah Brown, the baby bear, and Miss Duck. It was a terrible risk Miss Duck ran in going to such a house as that of the Slims, but then, of course, she did not know the danger which lay there. She did not meet any danger, either, at first, on the contrary she had as good a time as any of the others, and, indeed, a better time on the occasion when the young Slims left the taps running and flooded Larder Lodge. Miss Duck was the only one who really enjoyed herself then. But when all the other boarders left the

From A Nursery Rhyme
Picture Book (Warne).

"TO MARKET, TO MARKET, TO BUY A FAT PIG;
HOME AGAIN, HOME AGAIN, DANCING A JIG."

damp house, and Miss Duck could not, alas, settle her little account—well

"What happened you can guess, of course,
I'll only whisper, 'apple sauce'."

The adventures are brightly told in verse easy to repeat and remember; and the illustrations, large full-page coloured ones, and numberless small ones, double the joy of every experience

LARDER LODGE

Verses by B
PARKER. Illustrated by N
PARKER.
3s. 6d. net
(W & R
Chambers)

This large, gay volume contains the exciting experiment of the Slim family. The Slims were foxes, and after trying to earn their livelihood

From Hans Andersen's Fairy Tales (Melrose).

From The Queen of Hearts (Warne).

From Three Jovial Huntsmen (Warne).

From Sing a Song of Sixpence (Warne).

From Elegy on the Death of a Mad Dog (Warne).

Drawings by Randolph Caldecott.

A BOY SCOUT IN THE BALKANS.

By JOHN FINNEMORE Illustrated by W. H. C. GROOMS 5s (W. & R Chambers)

All the buoyant and exciting adventure, promised by such a title as the above, is amply provided in the course of Mr. Finnemore's rattling tale. Take a healthy lad about seventeen, who (by a singular streak of luck) is living with his father near Kirk-Kulisse when the Balkan League declares war upon Turkey: pepper to taste, with gypsies, Albanians, saptiehs, Redifs, Komitajis, and Bulgar regiments, and you have a complete recipe for a racy and invigorating boys' book. It is of remarkable length, yet will never be found tedious for one moment, breathless situation, deadly peril, and hairbreadth 'scape tread hard upon one another's heels. Tom Yorke, the youthful hero, not only emerges comparatively unscathed from his various ordeals by water and fire—or rather rifle-fire; but we leave him, in the last chapter, the proud proprietor of a fine estate in that most distressful country, the vilayet of Adrianople. And as Tom Yorke begins his chequered career

From Three Jovial Huntsmen (Warne).

From Turkish Fairy Tale
(Harrop)

HE CHOSE THE WOODEN BRIDGE

by slaying a bear in Chapter Three and by smashing a Turkish Irregular in defence of a child in Chapter Four it will be seen that the author loses no time in unnecessary pilfer but plunges at once into the thick of things. Mr Finnemore knows exactly how to cater for the schoolboy taste and this energetic and enjoyable production will be pronounced top hole by many a cracking voice. A manly wholesome tone pervades it and upon every ground the parental purchaser can hardly do better than get A Boy Scout in the Balkans. It breaks new ground and weaves one of the most spirited and glamorous of romances out of matters of quite recent history. Both author and artist are to be congratulated.

From Queer Creatures
(Blackwell, Oxford)

THE FUG

THE STOLEN CRUISER.

By PERCY F WESTERMAN.
With Frontispiece in Colours
by CHARLES NORMAN and 8 Illustrations by J DE
WALTON 3s 6d (Jarrold)

When the Impregnable one of the earlier Dreadnoughts, was scrapped and sold to a Dutch contractor who had promised to break up the ship a gang of pirates made a successful descent upon the vessel captured it and ran away with it. They were hotly pursued by the hero of the tale in command of a torpedo boat destroyer. Here is a good beginning to a rattling story of adventure by sea and you may be sure that Mr Westerman—a writer whose popularity is rapidly on the increase—loses no chance of getting the utmost out of the many dramatic situations which follow so quickly upon the heels of each other in this attractive book. It is the sort of thing that you really can't put down until you have finished.

MY OWN FAIRY BOOK.

By ANDREW LANG Illustrated 6s (Arrowsmith)

Mr Andrew Lang's fairy stories have a rare quality and a quaint humour that is all their own. There are three in this book that Messrs Arrowsmith reissue "Prince Prigio,"

"Prince Ricardo" and "The Gold of Fairinlee." Children who love fairy stories—and what child does not?—will find plenty to amuse them in these profusely illustrated pages.

NELSON'S BOOKS for Presentation

Reduced Specimen Illustration (see C to W) from Cousin Betty

3/6 Florence Nightingale. By ANNIE MATHESON Beautifully illustrated with reproductions from Portraits and Photographs

3/6 Things to make. By ARCHIBALD WILLIAMS Fully illustrated with useful diagrams drawn exactly to scale

3/6 The Fight at Summerdale. By JOHN GUNN This battle forms the centre of an historical romance of the sixteenth century With 6 Coloured Illustrations

3/6 Cousin Betty. By GERALDINE MOCKLER With 6 Coloured Plates

2/6 each

The World's Romances. New Volumes

The style of reproduction of these books is that usually associated with a much higher price. Each is beautifully printed bound in canvas with picture cover and illustrated with 8 reproductions from drawings by a well known artist. The stories are simply but vigorously told from the best available sources

Dante and Beatrice.

By W E SPARKES
With 8 Coloured Plates

Kilhugh and Olwen.

By ETHEL M WILMOT BUXTON
With 8 Coloured Plates

2/6 each

Beautifully Illustrated in Colours

7/6 NET The Marquis of Montrose. By JOHN BUCHAN With 16 full page illustrations in Photogravure and 11 Maps and Plans
Mr Buchan has produced a careful study of the career of one who was probably the greatest Scottish man of action and certainly the greatest Scottish soldier

6/- NET The Fairy Book. By Mrs CRAIK With 32 reproductions from Drawings by some of the best Artists
This is a juvenile edition de luxe of the best collection of fairy tales ever issued in this country

5/- NFT Story of the Great Armada. By RICHARD HALE With 8 Plates in full colour 8 in Monotone and 10 Sketch Maps
In this new volume the author makes a careful historical study of the origin progress and defeat of the famous expedition which Philip of Spain launched against England in the Spacious times of the Great Elizabeth

5/- NFT A Book of Palestine. By RICHARD PENLAKE With 24 Coloured Plates and numerous Black and White Illustrations
This attractive volume is the record of actual journeys undertaken in the Holy Land a short time ago

3/6 The Girl's Budget. Edited by JEAN MINTOSH With 16 reproductions of Water colour Drawings by first class artists
This attractive Annual now in its second year contains a capital collection of short stories suitable for girls from fourteen to twenty

3/6 Beyond the Dragon Temple. By ROBERT HUDSON With 6 Coloured Plates

NELSON'S CHILDREN'S ANNUALS

3/6 each Cloth 2/6 each Paper boards

The Jolly Book. This popular Annual contains 32 Coloured Plates and numerous Black and White Illustrations Suitable for Children aged 8 to 11

The Chummy Book. A Junior Jolly Book 32 Coloured Plates and numerous Black and White Pictures

Complete Catalogue post free on application to

THOMAS NELSON AND SONS,

35 & 36, Paternoster Row, London, E.C., or Parkside, Edinburgh

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From A Boy Scout in the Balkans
(Chambers)

"FLOURISHED THE YATAGHAN
TO GAIN POWER FOR THE LAST DREADFUL STROKE."

From Buccaneers' Island
(John Long)

"THE DINGHY WAS ALMOST BETWEEN THE CLIFFS WHEN UP ROSE THE MIGHTY FORM OF HOOD WITH THE ROCK
POISED ABOVE HIS HEAD."

From English Officers of the Nineteenth Century
(Routledge).

THE STORMING OF CIUDAD RODRIGO.

From The Stolen Cruiser
(Jarrod).

HALF-A-DOZEN BEAMEN HEADS
BY THE RENEGADE ENGLISHMAN BURST INTO THE ROOM."

J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY'S

Edited by HORACE HOWARD FURNESS, Ph.D., LL.D., Litt.D.

BEING THE EIGHTEENTH VOLUME OF

A NEW VARIORUM EDITION OF THE WORKS OF WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

Royal 8vo. Cloth, gilt top, uncut edges. Price, 15s. net.

This volume was the last work from the pen of the late Dr. Furness, who was known the world over as the greatest Shakespearean scholar of our time. In the Variorum Edition he left a monumental work unrivalled in its particular field. The continuance of it is fortunately assured under the editorship of Horace Howard Furness, Jr., whose many years' association with his father in the work has well equipped him for the task of editing the remaining plays.

The value of this edition to lovers and students of Shakespeare, to the teacher and the theatrical profession, is plainly evident, but it is also a work which should grace the library of every editor, every author, and every cultured man or woman on account of its incalculable value as a work of reference and a storehouse of stories, plays, references and criticisms which any one who desires a thorough knowledge of English literature cannot be without.

The SEVENTEEN VOLUMES of the Variorum Edition which have thus far appeared are:-

Romeo and Juliet	Hamlet (2 vols.)	King Lear	Othello
The Merchant of Venice	Antony and Cleopatra	Macbeth	As You Like It
The Tempest	A Midsummer Night's Dream	The Winter's Tale	Much Ado About Nothing
Twelfth Night	Love's Labour Lost	Richard The Third	Julius Caesar

Revised Edition by HORACE HOWARD FURNESS, JR.

Edited by HORACE HOWARD FURNESS, JR.

A ROSE OF OLD QUEBEC

By ANNE HOLLINGSWORTH WHARTON, author of "In Chateau Land," etc. Frontispiece by M. J. Spero, and seven illustrations in double-tone. 12mo. Beautifully bound in blue, white and gold. 5s. net.

This charming romance, produced in attractive holiday style, is written in Miss Wharton's inimitable and entertaining manner. She has made use of the historical love affair between Lord Nelson, then a young captain, and a Quebec beauty.

OF SPECIAL INTEREST AND VALUE

The Curious Lore of Precious Stones

Being a Description of Their Sentiments and Folk-Lore, Superstitions, Symbolism, Mysticism, Use in Medicine, Protection, Prevention, Religion and Divination. On Crystal Gazing, Birth Stones and Royal Jewels.

By GEORGE FREDERICK KUNZ, A.M., Ph.D., D.Sc. With numerous plates in colour and double-tone. 8vo. Cloth, decorated in blue and gold, gilt top. Boxed, 21s. net.

The author, Dr. Kunz, is the gem expert in one of the largest jewelry houses in the country and has written numerous books on Precious Stones. The object of this work is to indicate and illustrate the various ways in which precious stones have been used at different times and among different peoples, and more especially to explain some of the curious ideas and fancies that have gathered around them. It is a remarkable volume containing much of human interest and is replete with information of a curious and unusual kind. It is a wonderful reference book on the subject of superstitions and fancies connected with precious and semi-precious stones.

Handy Book of Curious Information

By WILLIAM S. WALSH. Crown 8vo. Half Morocco, gilt top. 12s. 6d. net.

For many years Mr. Walsh has been collecting the curious and out of the way information contained in this volume. These facts, stories, and bits of knowledge have never before been presented in this form, and could only be obtained by search through documents, letters and papers not accessible to the general reader. Like Mr. Walsh's former books, "Curiosities of Popular Customs," and "Handy-book of Literary Curiosities," it is an invaluable as well as entertaining work of reference.

FOR LOVERS AND STUDENTS OF THE DRAMA THE DRAMA TO-DAY

By CHARLTON ANDREWS. Cloth back, imported paper sides, with paper label. Uncut edges. 12mo. cloth. 6s. net.

Interest in the drama as a distinct art has never been greater than at the present time, and the desire to study it seriously and intelligently has never before been so widespread. In spite of this fact, however, there exists no compendium of the authors and the plays with which the active theatre now concerns itself—of the drama to-day, as it is practised, not only in England and America, but also upon the Continent. It is to supply the need of such a manual that the present treatise has been written.

The author gives in small compass accurate general information as to the leaders of the modern stage and their work, and also presents some opinions as to the prospects and tendencies of dramatic art. It is an entertaining and valuable survey.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY,
DURHAM HOUSE, 16, JOHN STREET, ADELPHI, LONDON.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From Just Forty Winks (Blackie)

JUST FORTY WINKS.

By HAMISH HENDRY Illustrated by GENTRUDE M. BRADLEY
28 (Blackie)

Here is a jolly little Christmas book for the child of from six to ten, after the fashion of "Alice." Davie Trot is shut in the schoolroom for kicking Elsie during the Bible lesson. After looking out of window and thinking how nice it would be to be a cow, and envying the little girl and boy who swing on a gate, he falls asleep over his arithmetic book. His dream adventures begin on the Frontispiece to Down the Snow Stairs (Blackie).

THE TWO WAYS.

steep bank of a lane, when an old squirrel takes up his book and reads out queer things in it

"Multiplication is vexation,
Division is as bad,
Pea soup for tea doth guzzle me,
But pudding makes me glad."

Then he encounters a Bee, Three Fiddlers (mice), Old King Cole, the Gamekeeper in gaiters; becomes caddie in waiting to the Queen, and so on, no end of fun. Here and there, as in the reference to income-tax, the author perhaps goes beyond the child. The pictures are as good as they could be, and a great attraction

"'NO, NO, MAM! CRIED JO, 'LET HER GO'"
From Jo Maxwell, Schoolgirl (Chambers)

"'LADIES, AS I WAS CROSSING THE HALL I SAW A MOST WEIRD AND WONDERFUL SIGHT'" From Rosely's New School (Chambers).

"'WELL, I'LL KEEP AN EYE ON YOU,' SAID THE GADDIE. 'KEEP UP YOUR NERVE, AND DON'T LET HER PLAY YOU NO TRICKS.'"
From The Chesterton Girl Graduates (Chambers).

New Books by L. T. MEADE.
GIRLS FROM KING'S ROYAL
 8 Coloured Illus L. T. Meade, 6/-
 A charming story of a Quaker family of girls and their friends

Chesterton Girl Graduates
 6 Coloured Illus L. T. Meade 5/-
 In this story Mrs Meade brings together a set of girl graduates of varied interests and ambitions

GIRLS OF ABINGER CLOSE
 6 Coloured Illus L. T. Meade 3/6
 Poppy Abinger dedicates her life to a sacred trust which her father has committed to her. Right nobly does Poppy fulfil her task

New Books for Boys & Girls.
BOY SCOUT IN THE BALKANS
 6 Coloured Illus J Finnemore, 5/-
 Through a multitude of stirring incidents Tom Yorke brings into service the disciplined pluck of a staunch Boy Scout

A HERO OF THE MUTINY
 6 Coloured Illus Escott Lynn, 5/-
 A story of the Mutiny in which Merrut Dault Caspore and the ruler of Locknow are worked in

ROSALY'S NEW SCHOOL
 4 Coloured Illus Elsie Oxenham, 3/6
 The story tells how Rosaly finds new friends and gets into trouble through the restrictions placed on her freedom

JO MAXWELL, SCHOOLGIRL
 4 Illus Izzie C Reid 2/6
 An exceptionally strong story of school life

PAM, ROBIN, AND STUMPS
 Daintily Illus Gertrude Doughty, 2/6

CHAMBERS'S GIFT BOOKS.

10/6 net (Per Post, 11/1).
ADAM BEDE.
 By GEORGE ELIOT.
 The exquisite touch and delicacy both of the humour and the pathos I have never seen the like of —Charles Dickens
 A Choice Presentation Edition of this masterpiece of fiction, with 16 Original Drawings in Colour and 60 Dainty Pen-and-Ink Sketches by GORDON BROWNE

From Adam Bede

CHAMBERS'S XMAS LIST, illustrated in Colour, will be sent post free on application to W & R CHAMBERS, Ltd., 38, Soho Sq., London, W. and Edinburgh.

From Lorna Doone

6/- net (Per Post, 6/5).
LORNA DOONE.
 By R. D. BLACKMORE.
 A Charming Edition, with 12 Original Drawings in Colour and 60 Pen-and-Ink Sketches by GORDON BROWNE
 The artist is in his element with fair Lorna and honest John and the wild and reckless folk of Doone and I will be rendered into line and colour their characters as his imagination pictures them for his ready brush Truly a charming and lovable volume —Globe

New Books by MAY BALDWIN.
HILDA'S EXPERIENCES
 6 Coloured Illus May Baldwin, 5/-
 This story is the outcome of a visit which Miss Baldwin paid to Australia and she depicts in her usual bright and humorous style the difference between English and Australian schoolgirls

MOLL MEREDYTH, MADCAP
 6 Coloured Illus May Baldwin, 3/6
 A story of the Straits Settlements Moll keeps her parents and others continually in hot water but manages to have a rattling good time herself

TROUBLESOME TOPSY
 6 Coloured Illus May Baldwin, 3/6

Children's Picture Books.
 3/6 net each (Per Post 3/11)
Larder Lodge. B and N Parker
 A thorn of Frolic Farm Full of splendid Coloured Pictures of Animals and gay and humorous verses about the Silms (Foxes)
 The Silms were some free from harm Who tried to keep a poultry farm But all their labour met defeat They could not get enough to eat

Buster Brown the Fun Maker
 R F Outcalt
 The only book for 1913 containing new illustrations by R F Outcalt the originator of the inimitable Buster

1/6 net each (Per Post, 1/10)
Bunnykins. Grace & Drayton
 The new Kitty Fuss volume This is the latest of cock that the little ones will love almost as much as their Teddy Bears

The Browns. A Book of Bears B and N Parker introduces The Browns who

PAPER BAG COOKERY.

SOYER'S "KOOKERA" (Regd.) BAGS, Etc.

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O

6 1/2 x 4 1/2
8 1/2 x 7 1/2
9 1/2 x 8 1/2
14 1/2 x 1 1/2
16 1/2 x 1 1/2
19 1/2 x 1 1/2
20 1/2 x 1 1/2
26 1/2 x 2 1/2
28 1/2 x 2 1/2
32 1/2 x 2 1/2
36 1/2 x 2 1/2

20 per 20 20 20 20 20 20 20 20 20 20

The OLIPS for Sealing Bags can be had separately 6in long 2d each 10in 3d
 12in 4d
 14in 5d
 16in 6d
 18in 7d
 20in 8d
 22in 9d
 24in 10d
 26in 11d
 28in 12d
 30in 13d
 32in 14d
 34in 15d
 36in 16d
 38in 17d
 40in 18d
 42in 19d
 44in 20d
 46in 21d
 48in 22d
 50in 23d
 52in 24d
 54in 25d
 56in 26d
 58in 27d
 60in 28d
 62in 29d
 64in 30d
 66in 31d
 68in 32d
 70in 33d
 72in 34d
 74in 35d
 76in 36d
 78in 37d
 80in 38d
 82in 39d
 84in 40d
 86in 41d
 88in 42d
 90in 43d
 92in 44d
 94in 45d
 96in 46d
 98in 47d
 100in 48d

Complete Soyer Kookera Outfit containing M Soyer's Bags Book
 Clip Grid and Tray 4/- each
 Soyer's Paper Bag Cookery 1/- per post 1/11
 Use the "Soyer" Oven Thermometer, 2/6 each

Name Genuine without Monsieur Soyer's facsimile Signature

GRIDS.

To ensure source of much disappointment and loss as they imagine the bags and can be used for a considerable time, or experiments produce satisfactory and safe Grids and v offer the Soyer Grids to the trade. None genuine unless they bear Monsieur facsimile signature stamped on every Grid. The Soyer Grids are during process of cooking and dishing up

GRID B

Tray to hold same
 6d each

SPECIAL SIZES WILL TO ORDER

USE "SOYER" GRIDS AND RUN NO RISK OF FAILURE

IF ANY DIFFICULTY IN GETTING SUPPLIES, APPLY DIRECT TO

JAMES SPICER & SONS, LTD., SOLE MAKERS.

80, Upper Thames Street London E.C.
 Edmund Street, Birmingham
 North Frederick Street, Glasgow

Rodeross Street London E.C.
 Whitworth Street West Manchester
 Wellington Street Leeds

Nelson Street Bristol

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

"TOPAZ AT ONCE SAT UP ON HIS HIND LEGS."
From The Golden Dog
(Gay & Hancock)

JO MAXWELL, SCHOOLGIRL.

By LIZZIE C. REID With Illustrations by PERCY FAR
RANT 2s 6d (W & K
Chambers)

This is a bright story for girls, with plenty of incident, a good moral tone and a happy ending. The young heroine comes from Jamaica to an English school for girls, and she falls into bad favour with the meanest girl in the school. Added to this trial poor Jo is a day girl and has

from Cousin Betty (Nelson)

"'BACH!' SAID BETTY, 'AND
THE CHACONNE IN D MINOR.'
SHE ADDED WITH A LITTLE INWARD GASP."

to live with an aunt who is very stern. So there are many things she has to put up with both in school and out of it. Nevertheless Jo's frank, honest ways win her many friends, and she comes out of her adventures with honour. All young schoolgirls will revel in the excitement of this story and the natural style in which it is told.

"MOLL SET HER TEETH, AND TRIED TO DISENTANGLE HERSELF."
From Moll Meredyth, Madcap
(Chambers).

From Trixy and her Trio
(Jarrod)

"GRACE, STANDING BEHIND A LAUREL
BUSH, HAD HEARD EVERY WORD THAT KIT HAD UTTERED."

From Inchfallen
(Ward, Lock).

"JESSIE WOULD LOOK ON FROM AN UPPER WINDOW, HER FACE WORKING WITH ANGER AND ENVY."

BOOKS FOR PRESENTS

Books are the best presents, and you can hear of the best books by writing to Messrs. Methuen for their new Christmas Catalogue. Please ask your bookseller to show you Messrs. Methuen's books.

A Gift for Children.

THE CHILDREN'S BLUE BIRD. By Georgette Leblanc (Mme. M. Maeterlinck) Translated by A. Teixeira de Mattos, and Illustrated by A. Rothenstein. F'cap 4to 5s net

A Romantic Story.

MY LIFE IN SARAWAK. By the Rance of Sarawak. With 27 Illustrations and a Map Demy 8vo 12s. 6d net

How to Aviate.

AVIATION. By Algernon E. Berri-man. With many Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10s 6d net

A Gift for Booklovers.

THE BOOKLOVER'S LONDON. By A. St. John Adcock. With 20 Black-and-White Drawings by Frederick Adcock. Crown 8vo 6s.

Another Gift for Children.

THE WIND IN THE WILLOWS. By Kenneth Grahame. With 8 Illustrations in Colour Wide Crown 8vo. 7s 6d net

A Gift for Garden Lovers.

A NATURALIST IN WESTERN CHINA. By E. H. Wilson. With an Introduction by Prof. C. S. Sargent. With a Map and 101 Illustrations Two Volumes Demy 8vo 30s net

A Gift for Mourners.

OUR ETERNITY. By Maurice Maeterlinck. Translated by A. Teixeira de Mattos. With a Photogravure Frontispiece after G. F. Watts' "Hope" F'cap 8vo 5s net

A Gift for the Devout.

THE LIFE OF THE BLESSED HENRY SUSO By Himself. Translated from the original German by T. F. Knox. With an Introduction by Dean Inge. Crown 8vo 3s 6d net

The Gift of Gifts.

THE POEMS OF RUDYARD KIPLING.

Barraack-Room Ballads. Departmental Ditties. The Seven Seas. The Five Nations. Each Volume Crown 8vo 6s ; F'cap 8vo, Leather, 5s net, Cloth, 4s 6d net

Three Great Novels.

THE WAY OF AMBITION. By Robert Hichens. Crown 8vo 6s [5th Edition]
THE REGENT. A Five Towns Story of Adventure in London. By Arnold Bennett. Crown 8vo. [4th Edition]
THE JUDGMENT HOUSE. By Sir Gilbert Parker. Crown 8vo 6s [145,000 copies sold]

A Sumptuous Gift.

RUBÁIYÁT OF OMAR KHAY-YÁM. Translated by Edward Fitzgerald. With a Frontispiece in Colour and 75 Illustrations in Monotone by E. J. Sullivan. Crown 4to 15s net

A Gift of Letters.

THE LETTERS OF ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. Edited by Sir Sidney Colvin. In Four Volumes Each F'cap 8vo. Cloth, 5s, Leather, 5s net.

The Novel of the Thrill.

THE LODGER. By Mrs. Belloc Lowndes. [3rd Edition] Crown 8vo. 6s.

No Nobler Gift.

THE OPEN ROAD. By E. V. Lucas. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by C. A. Shepperson. Crown 4to 15s net

Art and Poetry.

THE BLUE BIRD. A Fairy Play in Six Acts. By Maurice Maeterlinck. Translated by A. Teixeira de Mattos. With 21 Illustrations in Colour by F. Cayley Robinson. Crown 4to 21s net [3rd Edition]

A Superb Historical Novel.

THE GOVERNOR OF ENGLAND. By Marjorie Bowen. Crown 8vo 6s.

Charming Gifts.

TWO POPULAR BOOKS BY E. V. LUCAS.
LONDON LAVENDER. F'cap 8vo 5s each LOITERER'S HARVEST.

E. V. Lucas's Gifts for Wanderers.

A WANDERER IN HOLLAND. [15th Edition] A WANDERER IN PARIS. [11th Edition]
A WANDERER IN LONDON. [15th Edition] A WANDERER IN FLORENCE. [5th Edition]
 Each Volume Illustrated in Colour Crown 8vo 6s

The Gift for Golfers.

HOW TO PLAY GOLF. By Harry Vardon. With 48 Illustrations Sixth and Cheaper Edition Crown 8vo 2s. 6d net.

The Gift of a Great Poet.

SELECTED POEMS OF FRANCIS THOMPSON. With a Biographical Note by Wilfrid Meynell. With a Portrait in Photogravure F'cap 8vo. 5s. net

Gifts of Comfort and Hope.

A LITTLE BOOK OF LIFE AND DEATH. Selected and Arranged by Elizabeth Waterhouse. With a Frontispiece in Photogravure Small Pott 8vo. 1s 6d net, Leather, 2s. 6d net. [14th Edition]

DAILY STRENGTH FOR DAILY NEEDS. By Mary W. Tileston. Medium 16mo 2s. 6d net. Also superior binding 6s

METHUEN & CO., LTD., 36, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From Peter Pan's ABC
(Henry Frowde and Hodder
and Stoughton)

U FOR THE UNDERGROUND HOUSE
IN THE WOOD,
WHERE WENDY TOLD STORIES WHEN THE BOYS HAD BEEN GOOD.

Reduced from The Coloured Plate presented with Pears'
Annual, 1913.

"PETER."
From the Paintings by G. Sheridan
Keeble, in the poem of
Mr. J. P. P. P.

THE CHESTERTON GIRL GRADUATES

By L. T. MEADE. 3s. (W. & R. Chambers.)

Christmas has brought us another book from the gifted and apparently inexhaustible pen of Mrs. L. T. Meade; and it is really hardly necessary to write words of recommendation about it since her name on the cover is all the recommendation her many girl readers require. "The Chesterton Girl Graduates" is a fresh, vivacious, wholesome story, dealing with the college life of a young Irish girl, Tara O'Donnell, she has the misfortune to be so beautiful and clever that she awakens the fierce jealousy of a dangerous Russian girl, who, determined to wreak vengeance on her for a supposed injury, goes about it in a meanly malicious way. After causing her victim considerable unhappiness she professes contrition and tries to become Tara's friend. Tara has a fine, trusting character and cannot believe the girl would betray the faith she puts in her, and so is innocently led into a trap, with almost fatal results. The college life is vividly, skilfully

From The Girl's Budget of Short Stories
(Nelson)

"ONCE MORE SHE WAS ADRIPT ON THE WIDE, OPEN SEA."

drawn, and the Russian girl's genuine repentance at the end is touchingly recorded; while the beautiful heroine secures not only the sympathy and admiration of her fellow-students, but of the reader too. Her misfortunes and triumphs, told in Mrs. Meade's happiest vein result in an excellent story, and a splendid gift-book for Christmas.

PETER PAN'S A B C.

Illustrated in Colour by FLORA WHITE. 3s. 6d.
(Henry Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton.)

No Christmas is nowadays complete without some compilation dealing with Peter Pan. What Alice was to a past generation, Mr. Barrie's great creation is to the present one. "Peter Pan's A B C" is everything it should be—that is to say the rhymes are quite good and the coloured illustrations entirely admirable. The picture of Wendy and Peter in their tree top house and the illustration to "V for the Vessel, the Pirates have got, The House of old Hook and his villainous lot," are perhaps the best, but a selection of this kind where everything is so good is invidious. By way of preface to the "A B C" the story of Peter Pan is given in the simplest nursery language, so that a child can read the great tale and then study his alphabet.

Uniform with "Sailing Ships."

SHIPS & WAYS OF OTHER DAYS

By E. KESSEL CHAFFERTON With over 200 Illustrations in designed cover, cloth gilt and Coloured Frontispiece by CHARLES DIXON R.I. Extra royal 8vo 16s. net

The Greatest School Story ever Written

TOM BROWN'S SCHOOL DAYS

A new edition with Introduction and Notes in which new interesting light has been thrown on the identity and personalities of various characters who figure in the book. Illustrated from contemporary prints and portraits and with colour plates photographs and drawings. Square 8vo boxed, 10s. 6d. net

A revised edition of a great book at a moderate
price

EDINBURGH REVISITED

By JAMES BOND With Drawings by HANSLEY FLETCHER.
It is a remarkable book. We have read Stevenson and Chambers and have in mind Mr Walter Scott and yet we can honestly say that we know of no book which gives in so few words as this so satisfying a complete and so graphic a picture of Edinburgh. If you want to understand the heart of Edinburgh you can read it here better than in a hundred guide books.
—Spectator Extra crown 8vo, cloth gilt 5s. net

An Anthology of Irish Verse.

THE WILD HARP

A Selection from Irish Poetry By KATHARINE TYNAN Printed with Decorative Borders of Celtic Design and a title page designed in a Celtic style.
Medium 8vo designed cloth gilt 7s. 6d. net

Presentation Editions of

THE EVERLASTING MERCY

By JOHN MASFIFIID Trap 8vo lambskin full gilt 5s.
Fcap 8vo velv binding 3s. 6d. net
Illustrations in
Also cr 8vo cloth edition 3s. 6d. net

A Charming Xmas Gift Book

OLD CHINATOWN

A Book of pictures, by ARNOLD GENTHE With Text by WILLIAM OR Photographs of life in the Chinese quarter of Shanghai. Who has not been fascinated by the great mass of the busy life in the 7s. 6d. net

UMBRIA, PAST AND PRESENT

By MARY LOVETT CAMFRON With 26 Drawings by C.
G. ... and by ...
h gilt 6s. net

THE COCKATOO. A Public School Story

By MAX RITZINBERG Illustrated Crown 8vo 4s.
"A tale that every healthy schoolboy will devour with delight."
—Literary World

A NEW BULLETIN'S Well known Anthologies
LYRICS FROM ELIZABETHAN SONG BOOKS

AND LYRICS FROM ELIZABETHAN DRAMATISTS
Vapp leather 11s. 12s. 6d. net cloth 1s. net ea

THE GLORY THAT WAS GREECE AND THE GRANDEUR THAT WAS ROME.

By J. C. BLOMFIELD With these books in which the art has made the dry bones of history live in an enthralling manner are profusely illustrated in colour photograph, half tone & line. Cloth gilt extra royal 8v 30s. net each

COLOMBINE A Fantasy and other Verses.

By RICHARD ARKFLI With Illustrations by FREDERICK
CARTER 1s. net

"It possesses just that delicate sense of the borderland between tears and laughter which many poets strive to capture and very few attain." —Academy

ADELPHI SIDGWICK & JACKSON LONDON

WASHBOURNE'S LATEST BOOKS.

The Catholic Diary for 1914. Edited by a Priest 400 pp
Art linen, 1s net Leather, gilt, 2s net

The Westminster Hymnal. The only collection authorized by the Hierarchy of England and Wales Edited by RICHARD R. TERRY, Mus. D. Cloth, 3s 6d net.
Leather, gilt, 6s net Complete Words, 2d net.
Cloth, 4d and 6d Leather, 1s

The "Summa Theologiae" of St. Thomas Aquinas in English. Literally translated by the Fathers of the English Dominican Province Part I in 3 vols and Part 3
"Vols 1 and 2 Now ready 8vo, cloth 6s net each
A prospectus of the whole work will be sent on application

The Interior Life Simplified and Reduced to its Fundamental Principle. Crown 8vo 5s net

The Seventh Wave and other Soul-Stories. By CONSTANCE
E. BISHOP 3s 6d net

Saints and Festivals. A Cycle of the Year for Young People By Mother Mary SAOML Illustrated by Gabriel Pippet 3s 6d net

Jesus Christ, Priest and Victim. By FRÉDÉRIC GIRAUD 5s net
On Prayer and the Contemplative Life. By ST. THOMAS
AQUINAS 3s 6d net

The Blessed Sacrament Book. By FR. LACANCE 1,200 pp
Cloth, 5s net Leather 7s 6d net

Short Sermons on the Saints. By FR. HICKLEY, O.S.B. 3s 6d

The Roman Curia as it now Exists. By Rev M. MARIN,
S.J. 6s net

The Catholic Student's "Aids" to the Old Testament. By Very Rev H. POPE, O.P. 520 pp, with Maps 3s 6d net
God or Chaos. By Rev ROBERT KANL, S.J. Author of
The Sermon of the Mount, etc 5s net

Tolerance. By Rev A. VERMILLEN, S.J. Doctor of Laws and Administrative Science 5s net

Christian Social Reform. Bishop von KETTLER'S Programme 5s net

Daily Reflections for Christians. By Very Rev C. COX, O.M.I., Administrator Apostolic of the Iranvaal 2 vols
10s 6d net

The Way of the Heart. Letters of Direction by Mgr
D. HUISI Edited by Mgr BAUDRILLART 5s net

Mystical Contemplation. By Père LAMBALLE, Ludist
3s 6d net

The Chief Sufferings of Life and their Remedies. By the Abbe DUHAUT 3s 6d net

The Orchard Floor. With a preface by Michael Field suggestive Messages for every day in the year from the words of a great Catholic preacher 2s 6d net

Spiritual Progress. 1 FROM DARKNESS TO FERVOUR
2 FROM FERVOUR TO PERFECTION 2s 6d net each

The Unbeliever: A Romance of Lourdes. By a Non-Catholic With eight illustrations 3s 6d

The Love story of Guyard Dace. By KIRKI BRAMITON 5s

THE ANGELUS SERIES OF DAINTY BOOKS. Art linen, gilt, with engraved vignettes twelve vols now ready 1s 3d
net each, leather, gilt, 2s 6d net each

FATHER GARROLD'S BOOKS.

The Black Brotherhood and Some of its Sisters. Illustrated 5s

A Fourth Form Boy. Illustrated 5s Cheap Edition, 2s 6d

The Boys of St. Batts. Illustrated 2s

The Man's Hands and other Stories. Six coloured illustrations 2s net

THE ST. NICHOLAS SERIES OF BEAUTIFUL BOOKS.

16 vols Six coloured illustrations in each vol 2s net per vol

THE "SAINTS" SERIES.

Scarlet Art Vellum Gilt lettered, gold top, 2s 6d net each,

The Psychology of the Saints.

St. Augustine

St. Vincent de Paul

St. Clouds

St. Ignatius of Loyola.

St. Louis

St. Ambrose

St. Francis of Sales.

St. Jerome.

St. Nicholas I

Blessed Jean of Arc.

St. Dominic

St. John Chrysostom

St. Anthony of Padua

St. Cajetan

St. Teresa

St. Peter Fourier

Blessed Thomas More.

Blessed John Vianney: Curé

d'Am

St. Thomas à Becket.

St. Patrick

St. Margaret Mary.

Further volumes will be announced in due course

Our Intelligence of New Books sent free

PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON.

MANCHESTER BIRMINGHAM GLASGOW
74, Bridge Street 30, John Bright Street 248, Buchanan Street.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From Helmet and Cowl
(Wells Gardner)

SAINT GIOVANNI GUABERTO
AND THE MURDERER

ROSALY'S NEW SCHOOL.

By ELSIE JEANETTE OXENHAM With 4 Coloured Illustrations by T. J. OVERNELL 3s 6d. (W & R Chambers)

A rattling, animated story of life on the Yorkshire moors, with a Manor, and a secret, and lots of things girl readers will enjoy. Perhaps one may regret the amount of slang, quite harmless slang, in the dialogue, but it cannot be said that it is not true to life. The fact is, perhaps, that it does not look so well in cold print as it sounds on the lips of breezy, healthy school-girls.

From Jim Crow's Trip to Fairyland (Sheffington).

"COME ALONG, PRETTY BOY," SHE SAID."

From Helmet and Cowl
(Wells Gardner).

THE AVENUE OF THE ENCOUNTER, SAN MINIATO.

THE GOLDEN DOG.

By CLARA LOUISE BURNHAM With 4 Illustrations in Colour by FRANK AVELINE. 1s 6d net. (Gay & Hancock.)

Gabriel was a little boy whose father cared only for money and whose brothers spent most of their time in quarrelling. Besides, his stepmother was "a sorry woman." And so Gabriel had only the wild things in the woods for his companions, and one day found the Golden Dog which was to alter all his life. It was only an ugly little brown dog when he saw it first, and hailed it as a friend, and it was only when its glorious golden colour began to show that Gabriel realised that it was an animal of no ordinary kind. The story develops as soon as Gabriel's father turns his son away from home because he is too stupid to earn money, and with Topaz, the golden dog, and a little brown book—the Book of Life—as his companions, the boy journeys to the city to find the owner of the Golden Dog. Such is the beginning of the fresh and original little allegory that Miss Burnham has written—a story delicately conceived and effectively told. As an inexpensive gift book for the more thoughtful child it stands almost without rival this year.

From The Little Duke
(Bell).

"OSMOND LED RICHARD'S HORSE BY THE BRIDLE."

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

Oxford Historical and Literary Studies

Issued under the direction of C H FIRTH and WALTER RALEIGH

I. Elizabethan Rogues and Vagabonds and their Representation in Contemporary Literature

By FRANK AYDELOTT 7s. 6d. net

II. Anglo-Roman Relations, 1558-1565

By C G HAYNE 8s. 6d. net

III. The House of Lords in the Reign of William III.

By A S TURBERVILLE 8s. 6d. net

English Historical Literature in the Fifteenth Century

By C L KINGSFORD 8vo, 15s. net

Genesis of Lancaster, or the Three Reigns of Edward II., Edward III., and Richard II., 1307-1399.

By SIR JAMES H RAMSAY, of Bamff With Maps and Illustrations 2 vols 8vo, 30s. net

With the above volumes the SCOTTISH HISTORY OF ENGLAND is now complete. Full Prospectus on application.

The Rise and Fall of the High Commission

By ROLAND G USHER 8vo 15s. net

The King's Council in England during the Middle Ages

By J F BALDWIN 8vo 18s. net

Essays in Legal History

Read before the International Congress of Historical Studies held in London in 1913 Edited by PAUL VINOGRADE 8vo, 21s. net

England's Parnassus

Compiled by ROBERT ALCOCK, 1600 Edited by CHARLES CRAWFORD Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net, on Oxford India Paper, 10s. 6d. net

The Oxford Book of Spanish Verse

By J FITZMAURICE-KELLY 7s. net, on Oxford India paper, 9s. net Uniform with the "Oxford Books" of English, French, German, and Italian Verse

Life of Miguel de Cervantes

By J FITZMAURICE-KELLY With a Collotype Reproduction of the newly-discovered Portrait thought to be of Cervantes 8vo, 7s. 6d. net

Collected Papers of Henry Sweet

Arranged by H C WYLD 8vo, 18s. net

Maritime Enterprise, 1485-1558

By J A WILLIAMSON With 15 Plates 8vo, 14s. net

A Companion to Classical Texts

By F W HALL With 7 Plates 8vo, 9s. 6d. net

The Archaeology of the Anglo-Saxon Settlements

By E I LEEDS With 13 Plates and 14 Illustrations in the Text 8vo, 5s. net

A History of Chess

By H J R MURRAY With 100 Illustrations Royal 8vo, cloth, 38s. net, morocco back, 42s. net

The Primitive Church and Reunion.

By DR W SANDAY Leather back, 8vo, 4s. 6d. net

The Christian Platonists of Alexandria

Being the Bampton Lectures of the year 1886 By the late CHARLES BIGG Reprinted with some Additions and Corrections by F E BRIGHMAN, and with new Indexes 8vo, 10s. 6d. net

THE OXFORD POETS

Large crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. each, on Oxford India paper, from 5s., and in superior bindings Each Volume contains a Photogravure Portrait

NEW VOLUMES

The Poetical Works of William Blake

Including "The French Revolution," and The Minor Prophetic Books, with Selections from "The Four Zoas," "Milton," and "Jerusalem," with 15 facsimile title pages Edited after the original manuscript, engraved, and printed texts, with Introduction, Appendix and Glossary of Blake's Mythological Nomenclature, by JOHN SAMPSON

A Century of Parody and Imitation

Edited by W JERROLD and R M LEONARD Being Parodies of upwards of eighty Authors, beginning with "Rejected Addresses" published in 1812 Chronologically arranged With Notes and Indexes

THE OXFORD EDITIONS OF STANDARD AUTHORS

1s. 6d. in t, and 2s. per volume, and in various superior bindings.

NEW VOLUMES

Kingsley's Heroes: Greek Fairy Tales for my Children

With Coloured Illustrations

Kingsley's Poems (1848-70)

Macaulay's Essays

2 Vols (one of Historical and one of Literary Essays)

William Morris's Prose and Poetry (1856-70)

Dante Gabriel Rossetti's Poems and Translations, etc. (1850-70)

A Century of Parody may also be obtained in this Series

THE WORLD'S CLASSICS

Cloth boards, extra, gilt back, 1s. net, sultan-red leather, limp, gilt top, 1s. 6d. net lamb-skin, limp, gilt top, 2s. net, and in other bindings
A Pocket Edition, each with a Portrait, printed on thin paper, limp cloth, gilt back, and top, 1s. net, sultan-red leather, limp, gilt top, 1s. 6d. net

NEW VOLUMES

William Morris's Defence of Guenevere, Life and Death of Jason, and other Poems

Christina Rossetti's Goblin Market, The Prince's Progress, and other Poems

Dante Gabriel Rossetti's Poems, Translations, etc.

Whittier's Selected Poems

Wordsworth's Selected Poems

Mrs. Gaskell's Round the Sofa

With Introduction by C SHORTER

The Lord of the Harvest

By M BIHAM-EDWARDS With Introduction by FREDERIC HARRISON

Selected English Letters (XV XIX. Centuries)

Edited by M DUCKITT and H WRAGG

Selected English Speeches, from Burke to Gladstone

Edited by EDGAR R JONES, M P

All the Volumes of Poetry in the WORLD'S CLASSICS can now be obtained in the

OXFORD POCKET POETS

In special bindings, cloth, 1s. net per volume, leather, from 2s. net

An Introduction to English Church Architecture

By FRANCIS BOND With 1,400 Illustrations 2vo Vols 4to, 52 2s. net ("Church Art in England" Series)

OF ALL BOOKSELLERS

London: HUMPHREY MILFORD, OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS, AMEN CORNER, E.C.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From *Sultan Jim
Empire Builder*
(Henry Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton)

"JIM GATHERED SPEED AND TOOK THE JUMP"

SULTAN JIM EMPIRE BUILDER

By HERBERT STRANG (Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton)

Father Christmas brings many good things in his train, but it is doubtful if he brings anything better in its own way than a new story by Mr Herbert Strang. The multitude of his youthful readers are likely to find their most insatiable thirst for adventure satisfied by this new volume. Jim Sahoun, the dashing young hero, who finds the University very tame and goes in quest of gold into the middle of Africa, will win his way at once into the heart of every true British boy, and very few of Mr Strang's readers, it is safe to say, will close the book until they have followed Jim's career to its triumphant consummation, when, after many tough fights with cannibals, he at length, like some modern Moses, leads a downtrodden and peculiar tribe out of the wilderness of danger into a promised land of protection beneath the British flag. Mr Herbert Strang has an enviable capacity for writing thrilling stories, full of clean, healthy adventure, and true to the best traditions of British sportsmanship and patriotism, and it is to be hoped that it will be a long time yet before Christmas fails to bring with it his welcome addition to the boy's library.

HERBERT STRANG'S ANNUAL.

Illustrated in Colour and Black and White. 6s.
(Henry Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton)

Christmas, with its wealth of good things, has brought again Mr Herbert Strang's very welcome annual, and this year, again, it is a veritable treasure trove of such stories and articles as bring delight to a boy's heart. In its profusely-illustrated pages there is something for every kind of young reader, it is hard to believe that a boy exists who could not find something to please him between its covers. There is a fine school mystery story, by Harold Avery, with pictures by H. M. Brock, an article by J. Saxon Mills, which tells all there is to be told about the Panama Canal, with photographs and a map, and a thrilling, vividly imagined Maori tale by Tom Devan. "Launching a Liner," written and illustrated by Frank H. Mason, R.B.A., cannot fail to interest, while Ray Paget's "A Landsman's Night on a Destroyer," illustrated by Cecil King, and "The Perils of the Air," by Grahame-White and Harry Harper, are full of just the information on those glamorous subjects that boys will relish immensely. It is impossible to give any adequate idea of the contents of this luxurious volume. The articles are written by men who are sure of their subjects, the stories of adventure by those who know how to write an exciting story, and are thoroughly familiar with the kind of thing a boy wants. With these, and with many able and clever artists who have enlivened the pages with numerous black-and-white drawings, and provided excellent colour plates, the volume maintains its high standard of previous years.

From Herbert Strang's Annual (Henry Frowde and Hodder
and Stoughton).

HE CAME UPON STARKEY KNEELING IN
THE LOW GRASS, WITH THE MUZZLE OF HIS MAUSER PISTOL PRESSED BE-TWEEN THE EYES OF THE DUTCHMAN.
(Drawn by Cyrus Coseo.)

H. R. Allenson's Books and Booklets.

JOHN MASON NEALE.
SACKVILLE COLLEGE SERMONS
By the late Rev. J. M. Neale, D.D. Vol. 1: Advent to Lent. Thirty-one Sermons. New edition, unaltered. 2s. 6d. net. By post, 2s. 10d. These sermons have long been out of print.

RICHARD HOLLS OF HAMFOLK.
THE MENDING OF LIFE
By RICHARD HOLLS of Hamfolk. Edited by the Rev. DUDMAN HAMFOLK, M.A. Handsome cloth, 8s. 6d. net. By post, 10s. 6d.

VINE NEW MISSIONARY STORY.
HIS LITTLE BIT O' GARDEN
By ELIZABETH HILL. Large crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

DAILY MESSAGE FROM MANY MINDS
Thoughts for the quiet hour, from St. Augustine, Pascal, Jeremy Taylor, Wordsworth, Robertson, Phillips Brooks, Markham, etc. India paper, paste grain, 2s. 6d. net. Velvet calf, 3s. 6d. net.

"A PRAYER FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR."
GREAT SOULS AT PRAYER
Famous Centuries of Prayer, P. also, and Aspiration from St. Augustine to Christian Science and St. L. Stevenson. Edited by M. W. TUCKER. India paper, pasted Turkey Morocco, 2s. 6d. net. Velvet calf 3s. 6d. net. Russian Morocco, 2s. 6d. net. Paste grain leather, 2s. 6d. net.

THE LITTLE FLOWERS OF ST. FRANCIS OF ASSISI
Uniform with "Great Souls at Prayer." 94mo, 416 pages. India paper. Paste grain, 2s. 6d. net. Velvet calf, boxed, 3s. 6d. net.

TWO BEAUTIFUL GIFT BOOKS.
NOBLE THOUGHTS FOR DAILY LIVING
Compiled by J. G. WHEAT. Cloth or Morris boards, 1s. net. Paste grain, 2s. net. Velvet calf, 3s. 6d. net.

THOUGHTS WORTH THINKING
A Day-Book of Remembrance and Thought. Compiled by H. R. ALLENSON. Cloth or Morris boards, 1s. net. Paste grain, 2s. net. Velvet calf, 3s. 6d. net.

"PERFECT LITTLE GEMS."
THE GOLDEN WINDOWS
Fables for Young and Old. By L. M. RICHARDS. Handsome cloth, 2s. 6d. net. Twenty-second edition.
The HUMOR OF LONDON says "I was very much struck with a beautiful story in a book called 'The Golden Windows.' I should like to leave this as my last picture on my mind."

Please write at once for our new CATALOGUE, 46 pages, post free.

London: H. R. ALLENSON, Ltd., Racquet Court, Fleet Street, E.C.

THE SANCTUARY SERIES.
Cloth, 6d. net. Leather, 1s. net. Velvet calf 1s. 6d. net.
Practices of the Presence of God
By Dr. LAWRENCE.

Practices of the Presence of God
By Dr. LAWRENCE.
Practices of the Presence of God
By Dr. LAWRENCE.

Practices of the Presence of God
By Dr. LAWRENCE.

Practices of the Presence of God
By Dr. LAWRENCE.

Practices of the Presence of God
By Dr. LAWRENCE.

Practices of the Presence of God
By Dr. LAWRENCE.

Practices of the Presence of God
By Dr. LAWRENCE.

Practices of the Presence of God
By Dr. LAWRENCE.

Practices of the Presence of God
By Dr. LAWRENCE.

Practices of the Presence of God
By Dr. LAWRENCE.

Practices of the Presence of God
By Dr. LAWRENCE.

Practices of the Presence of God
By Dr. LAWRENCE.

Practices of the Presence of God
By Dr. LAWRENCE.

Practices of the Presence of God
By Dr. LAWRENCE.

Practices of the Presence of God
By Dr. LAWRENCE.

Practices of the Presence of God
By Dr. LAWRENCE.

Practices of the Presence of God
By Dr. LAWRENCE.

New Editions of SAMUEL BUTLER

The HUMOUR of HOMER
(Butler's complete Kompos), with a Photostatic Frontispiece. Portrait, and a sketch of the life of Butler by M. P. JONES. 2s. net. Postage 6d.
"It can give some of Butler's best work in a way of insight and trenchant irony."—Manchester Telegraph

THE FAIR HAVEN
A newly new re-edition, with Preface by M. A. SPENCERFIELD. 2s. net. Postage 6d. Post not.
"The attractive volume completed by these two volumes is rare of success."—Lithium

"The wickedly caustic and original 'Note Books'."—Observer.

THE NOTE BOOKS OF SAMUEL BUTLER
2s. net. 6d. Impression. With Portrait. Postage 6d.

"Yes, there is no doubt of it."

'ALPS AND SANCTUARIES'
"A book to buy a book to checkle and brood over."—Observer
By SAMUEL BUTLER. 2s. net.

"THE WAY OF ALL FLESH" (2s.) is now in its 6th impression. "NEWBORN RE-VISITED" (2s. 6d. net) in its 4th impression. "Butler is a man whose range of influence is spreading wherever deep thought and deep laughter are preferred to gravity and superstition."—The Observer

"A most notable and remarkable book."—London

THE LITTLE WICKET GATE. "A NOVEL OF IDEAS"
By ALGERNON FETTERWORTH. Cloth, gilt top. 2s.

"His description of an ideal state is extraordinarily fascinating. It introduces us to a group of people quite outside our experience and yet beautifully human. The author has gone to the root of things."—Observer
"It is as realistic as fiction's 'The Coming of Age,' and more beautiful."—Review of Reviews

ON THE TRUTH OF DECORATIVE ART
By LIONEL DE FONSECA. Cloth gilt. 2s. 6d. net.

"An extremely valuable study of the contrast between Art of the East and of the West."—Observer
"A book of astonishing originality combining the poetic in style with the epigrammatic in thought."—London Portent

HENRIK IBSEN: Poet, Mystic and Moralist
By HENRY ROSE. Cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net. Postage 6d.

"An interesting study of the spiritual development of Ibsen."—Lithium.

THE WELL BY THE WAY. A fine substitute for Xmas Cards.
By ELIZABETH GIBSON. 400 beautiful thoughts. Vellum wrappers, with greeting page. 6d. net.

THE BROOM FAIRIES. By H. M. GATE. 1s. 6d. net.
Eight delightful fairy tales which should on no account be missed.

LONDON A. C. FIFIELD, 13, CLIFFORD'S INN, E.C.

RIDER'S CHRISTMAS LIST.

A SHORT HISTORY OF MARRIAGE.

Marriage Rites, Customs, and Folklore in many Countries and all Ages.
By ELLIOT LURLIN. Crown 8vo 268 pp. Cloth gilt. 3s. 6d. net.
A sketch of the evolution of Marriage Rites and Customs from the earliest days to the present time. A most entertaining volume on a subject of universal interest.

4 BOOK OF GHOST STORIES.

ANIMAL GHOSTS.
By ELLIOT LURLIN. Author of "Highways of the Mind," etc. Crown 8vo, 300 pp. Cloth gilt. 3s. 6d. net.
PART I.—DOMESTIC ANIMALS AND THE UNKNOWN. PART II.—WILD ANIMALS AND THE UNKNOWN. PART III.—BIRDS AND THE UNKNOWN.

This Volume contains some of the most remarkable Ghost Stories ever recorded.

THE GROWTH OF A SOUL.

By AUGUST STRINDBERG. Author of "The Father," "The Son of a Servant," etc. Translated by CLAUDE FIFE. Crown 8vo. Cloth 3s. 6d. net. One of the most vivid and enthralling books of "Confessions" from the pen of this famous Swedish genius.

THE VAMPIRE. An Occult Romance.

By REGINALD HODDER. Author of "A Soldier of Fortune," etc. Crown 8vo, cloth 6s.
"The story is really exciting."—The Times

THE SECRET DOCTRINE IN ISRAEL.

A Study of the Zohar and its Connections. By ARTHUR EDWARD WAITE. Med. 8vo. About 350 pp., with Four Plates. Cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net.

KABALA OF NUMBERS—Part II.

By "SEPHARIAL." Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.
A practical study and application of the principles of Kabbalah to the problems of daily life.

THE OCCULT ARTS.

An examination of the claims made for the existence and practice of supernatural powers, and an attempted justification of some of them by the conclusions of the researches of modern science. By J. W. FRING. Crown 8vo, 236 pp., cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net.

POPULAR PHRENOLOGY.

By J. MILLOTT SEVERN. Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. net. Illustrated.

CARD-READING.

Practical Methods of Divination by Cards, clearly explained by MINETTA. Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. net, with Four Plates and Diagrams.

Rider's Occult and New Thought Catalogue will be sent Post Free to any address.

WILLIAM RIDER & SON, Ltd., 8-11, PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

THE LIFE OF FRANCIS THOMPSON

BY EVERARD MEYNELL

With 7 Portraits in Photogravure and 5 other illustrations. Demy 8vo. Buckram gilt. 15s. net.

FROM THE FIRST REVIEWS

"This intensely fascinating book," Pall Mall Gazette "The supreme interest of this biography," Daily Telegraph "We close the book with a feeling that is half reluctance and all gratitude," Observer "Perfect in its sympathy, perfect in its understanding, perfect in its selection," Daily Express "Rich in details which help towards our realization of the man," Evening Standard

Second Impression

BURNS AND OATES

Publishers of The Works of F. Thompson, Three Volumes, price 6/- net each volume

28 ORCHARD STREET, W

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

From The Mystery of Markham
(Black)

"WE'VE GOT A SCHEME. COME OUT HERE AND WE'LL TELL YOU ABOUT IT."

MOLL MEREDYTH, MADCAP.

By MAY BALDWIN 35 6d net (W & R
Chambers.)

Moll Meredyth, a mischievous, vivacious school-girl, is suddenly transplanted from her peaceful English school to her father's bungalow on a rubber plantation in Malaya. In that strange country, surrounded by a jungle, and with only a handful of white people in reach, Moll has plenty of scope for her naughty pranks, and Miss May Baldwin has made her many adventures the subject of a very interesting story for girls. Where Moll is it is inevitable that incident and excitement should be also, and she brings fresh life and unceasing merriment to that isolated corner of the world which knows her presence for a brief half year. Her father's young assistants on the plantation fall under her spell in spite of the trouble and anxiety she is constantly causing them, and to one of them, at least, she is like a breath of fresh air in that heavy, sultry climate, that is usually such a foe to energy and life spirits. With a very full knowledge of the country she has chosen as a back-ground for Moll's happy-go-lucky experiences, the author has sure skill in characterisation and in creating atmosphere, and to read "Moll Meredyth, Madcap," is to take a trip to the far east and to be initiated into many of the strange manners and customs existing there, as well as to be entertained by the amusing doings and sayings of its lovable young heroine.

THE MYSTERY OF MARKHAM.

By R S WARRIN BELL 35 6d (A & C Black)

The scene of this captivating school tale is called Tarport College, but every boy who is lucky enough to read the book will soon find himself substituting his own college for Tarport, with such faithful cunning and broad realism does the author line in the school atmosphere and the schoolboy types. The keen joys and rivalries of "footer" and cricket, and the annual sports, are set down here in glowing terms, and he must be a strangely-built young person whose blood does not run the quicker for following the fortunes of Tarport, in the field of sport. A boy with a mystery about him is pretty certain to be an unpopular boy, and Markham has the misfortune to be regarded as "mysterious" by his fellows. A fine sportsman and one that Tarport can ill afford to spare, Markham nevertheless declines to play regularly for the school and gives no adequate reason for his frequent conspicuous absence. Markham's mother is forced to keep a boarding-house owing to straitened circumstances, and further elements of mystery and entertainment are afforded by the strange boarders in her establishment, who include among their number a member of the Secret Service and the proprietor of a picture theatre. The sequel involves the arrest of a foreign spy, and is made all the more thrilling by the tunnelling operations of the amusing family that live next door to Markham. The author writes as usual with a thorough understanding of boys and their wiles and ways. It is easy to make a boy homesick, but here is a writer with the rare gift of making him feel "school-sick." Who, for example, can feel otherwise when he reads of the summer term "full of sunshine, the joy of life in the open, playing cricket or watching it, or sprawling in the long lush grass with books. Why are boys sometimes in such a hurry to be men? For they will be men such a long time, boys only for a little."

From Schoolboy Grit
(Nisbet).

"SOMETHING PASSED QUICKLY FROM THE BOY'S HAND TO THE MAN'S."

JOHN LONG'S NEW LIST

GENERAL LITERATURE

Bohemian Days in Fleet Street

By a JOURNALIST Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
 The Evening Standard says—"The author has delineated with no little charm and lucidity phases of a Bohemianism that has to a large extent passed away. His book is a quarry of anecdote, amusing and illuminating."
 The Globe says—"Full of good things well told—a delightful book, which is something more than a collection of good stories."

Rose Bertin:

The Creator of Fashion at the Court of Marie Antoinette.

By EMILE LANGLADE English Version by Dr. A. S. RAPPOPORT. With Photogravure and 24 Portraits.
 Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

The Saturday Review says "Dr Rappoport has done a good literary deed in translating Mons Langlade's highly amusing and charming work"

Eugène de Beauharnais:

The Adopted Son of Napoleon.

By VIOLETTE M. MONTAGU, Author of "Sophie Dawes, Queen of Chantilly," "The Scottish College in Paris," &c.
 With Photogravure, 24 Portraits and Illustrations Demy 8vo, 15s. net.
 The Globe says "Mrs Montagu is to be congratulated alike in her subject and on the manner in which she has treated it. She has an easy, agreeable style and an admirable sense of proportion"

Robespierre and the Women he Loved

By HECTOR FLEISCHMANN. English Version by Dr. A. S. RAPPOPORT. With Photogravure and 19 Portraits.
 Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net

Those who have always regarded Robespierre as the austere and incorruptible—a sort of Nero or Claudius—will be astonished to learn that, in spite of his utter lack of physical attraction, he was always surrounded by a crowd of worshipping women was, in truth, the idol of the women of the Revolution

The Purpose:

Reflections and Digressions

By HUBERT WALES With Portrait of Author in Photogravure Crown 8vo, 5s. net

Mr Hubert Wales's object in this book is to discuss serious subjects in a style and within a compass compatible with modern exigencies and habits. He draws aside the curtain, appears in his own person, and talks familiarly with his readers upon such absorbing and vital topics as Life and Death, Ethics, Sex and Beauty

Gun Dogs

By FRANK TOWNEND BARTON, M.R.C.V.S. Author of "Terriers Their Points and Management." With 46 Illustrations from Photographs Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Invaluable to all who are interested in the branch of rural pastime As far as can be ascertained, it is the only work which is exclusively devoted to dogs expressly used and bred for work in connexion with the gun

Engineering as a Profession

By A. P. M. FLEMING, M.I.E.E., and R. W. BAILEY, Wh.Sc. Crown 8vo, 288 pages, 2s. 6d. net

The Times says:—"Gives a general outline of the field of engineering activity, and sets forth the present facilities for obtaining satisfactory training and employment, with conditions of entry to the leading engineering institutions"

Home Exercise and Health:

Five Minutes' Care to the Nerves

The Rational System of Exercising for Health rather than mere Strength By PERCIVAL G. MASTERS, B.A. Cantab.
 With 32 Illustrations Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net [2nd Edition]

A System of Exercises devised to promote health, and not muscle development only. It particularly aims at building up the nervous system

Looms of Silence

By ADELE WARREN A Volume of Verse Royal 16mo, 2s. 6d. net.

Airs of the Harp

By JOHN GEOFFREY HOLLINS A Volume of Verse Royal 16mo, 2s. 6d. net.

FICTION. Crown 8vo, 6s.

LOVE ON SMOKY RIVER (3rd Impression)

THE ELUSIVE WIFE

THE VAUDEVILLIANS

A VICTIM OF CIRCUMSTANCE

A SOCIAL INNOCENT

LOT'S WIFE

THE EURASIAN

THE PARAMOUNT SHOP

YOUNG EVE AND OLD ADAM

GREEN GIRL

SOWING CLOVER

THE WISDOM OF THE FOOL

ETELKA

A HANDFUL OF DAYS

A FORTUNE AT STAKE (2nd Impression)

LOVE'S SENTINEL

AN OFFICER AND A—

MAZE OF SCILLY

THEODORE GOODRIDGE ROBERTS

R. PENLEY

ANONYMOUS

CHARLES LOWENTHAL ("Low Lathen")

RICHARD ST. JOHN COLTHURST

A. M. JUDD

HENRY BRUCE

H. MAXWELL

TOM GALLON

Mrs. HENRY TIPPETT

GEORGE WOULF

By "CORONET"

STANLEY FORD

HAL D'ARCY

NAT GOULD

FLORENCE WARDEN

E. D. HENDERSON

E. J. TIDY

JOHN LONG, Ltd., 12-14, Norris Street, Haymarket, London

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1913

INCHFALLEN.

By E EVERETT-GREEN 2s 6d (Ward, Lock)

The story of a young step-mother who has to fight and win through all the old prejudices built up against step-mothers—this is the substance of Miss Everett-Green's new book, "Inchfallen." Inchfallen is the name of a beautiful old mansion "with one very large central hall and two great wings flanking it on either side, so that it can be made into a double house quite easily, for each separate wing has rooms enough for a comfortable and commodious dwelling." It is to this house that Christabel Farquhar goes as a bride. Her husband is a widower with three children. His first wife's aunts—the two elderly Misses Murchison have taken the children under their care and are residing in one of the wings at Inchfallen. Christabel is a loving, motherly little soul and when she arrives she is longing to make friends with the children and their aunts. But the latter are incensed at Reginald Farquhar's second marriage, and the children are hostile and prejudiced against step-mothers. "No. I won't kiss you," says one of the little girls defiantly. "I know all about step-mothers, thank you. We don't want any at Inchfallen. You can keep to your house, and we'll keep to ours!" And so Inchfallen becomes a divided house, the aunts and the children occupying one wing, and their father and the poor little step-mother the other wing. The father blames the aunts for the ill-feeling, although he is quite as much to blame himself. Then Christabel goes quietly to work, just because she loves him and loves all children, and how she wins through all the bitter prejudice slowly but surely, makes an interesting and charming story. Miss Everett-Green has written many capital stories for girls, but none perhaps quite so poignant and tenderly human as this. It will confirm her in the place she holds as one of the first of living novelists for younger readers. To anyone seeking a story to give to a young girl of fourteen to eighteen we emphatically recommend "Inchfallen."

Fronts piece to The Bounty Boy
(Holden & Hardingham).

From The Coral Island
(Nisbet).

"COME ON, AND DO YOUR WORK"

AN UPHILL GAME.

By HARRY HUNTINGDON (Warne & Co.)

Books for boys may be divided into two categories—those that the boys like, and those that the parents, in their superior wisdom, would sooner the boys liked. Under the latter heading may be included, I think, nearly all those works of lofty moral tone and doubtful history which have cast a depressing shadow on so many boys' Christmases. It was as a protest against this class that Mr Chesterton, I believe, always ready to strike a blow for the claims of the romantic imagination, put forward a defence of the penny dreadful with its jolly collection of scalpings, murders and sudden deaths. There is, however, a medium between this class of literature and the improving gift book, and this medium is happily struck by Mr Harry Huntingdon in "An Uphill Game," which is as good and healthy a public-school story as was ever written. The book belongs to a tradition established by one of the most famous of all school stories "The Fifth Form at St. Dominic's," published originally in the Boy's Own Paper and issued in book form for the first time a few years ago. If I have any quarrel with the author it is because he makes one of his characters say, "He's been reading 'The Fifth Form at St. Dominic's,' or some of those old back numbers. They're not half bad in their way, but they're not up to date." This seems almost to smack of ingratitude, for the note of all successful school romances was given in that justly celebrated story and its successor "The Willoughby Captains." Apart from this I can conceive of no better book as a present to a boy than "An Uphill Game." It strikes just the right note, and is admirably constructed and written.

From ROBERT SCOTT'S List.

By the Right Rev. G. H. S. WALPOLE, D.D.
BISHOP OF EXETER.

THE SHRINE and THE PRESENCE.
NOW READY. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

LIFE'S CHANCE. 4s. 6d. net.
A complete List of Works by Bishop Walpole, free on application.

THE GIFT BOOK OF THE SEASON.
Commended by the BISHOP OF EDINBURGH

Apples of Gold.

A COMMONPLACE BOOK OF SELECTED READINGS.
Intended to suggest Thoughts, Lay Foundations, and Build up Character. By the Rev. W. B. TREVILLYAN, M.A. With Introduction by the Very Rev. H. C.
Bancroft, D.D., Dean of Norwich. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net

LOVE'S LONG CAMPAIGN.
By the Rev. CAMPBELL N. MOODY, M.A. Cloth, 5s. net

FOR A CHRISTMAS OR BIRTHDAY PRESENT
THE HOLY LAND of the HINDUS.

By ROBERT L. LACEY.
"Of fascinating interest and delightful candour."—Evangelical Christendom.
"Admirably fitted to be a gift book."—Baptist Times
Attractively Illustrated. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net

Write for Catalogue (106 of New Books, sent post free)

ROBERT SCOTT, Publisher, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

The latest Works by ARCHDEACON WILBERFORCE, D.D.
SPIRITUAL CONSCIOUSNESS.

(Cloth, 2s. net)

JUST PUBLISHED

THOUGHTS FOR CHRISTMAS.

Royal 8mo. Bound in artistic boards, silk register, with gilt and colour design, and an illustration of the Holy Family. Printed in sepia 1s. 6d. net. A most acceptable and sermons-like gift

ULSTER FOLKLORE.

By ELIZABETH ANDRÉWS, F.R.A.I. With 12 Illustrations and Plans. Cloth, 5s. net

"A very suggestive and valuable volume."—Daily Telegraph

A VISIT TO VENICE, and Other Sketches.
By WILLIAM WOODROOFE. Illustrated. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

Now Ready—The New Volume of

BOOK-PRICES CURRENT.

Volume XXVII for 1911. Edited by J. HERBERT SLATER.
Demy 8vo, buckram gilt, 7s. 6d. net. Detailed Prospectus of "Book Prices Current" post free on application

ELLIOT STOCK, 7, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

W. HEFFER & SONS, Ltd., Autumn Publications.

Just Published.

CAMBRIDGE POETS, 1900-1913. An Anthology
Chosen by ARLFRIDA ILLYARD. With an Introduction
by SIR ARTHUR QUINER-LOUCH. Crown 8vo, xvi
+ 226 pp. 5s. net (Postage 4d.)

This Anthology contains selections from the work of thirty-eight authors. The book has been very attractively "got up," and forms an excellent present

Just Published.

PROPER NEWE BOOKE OF COKERYE.

A reprint of an interesting XVI Century Cookery Book. Edited with Notes, Introduction and Glossary, with some account of domestic life, cookery and feasts in Tudor days, and of the first owners of the book—MATHEW
PARKER, Archbishop of Canterbury, and MARGARET
PARKER, his wife—by CATHERINE FRANCES FRERE.
Demy 8vo. Photogravure Frontispiece, clxiv + 124 pp.
Handsomely bound in cloth, gold blocked with a
Grotesque design by the authoress. 7s. 6d. net
(Postage 4d.)

Ready early in December.

EARLY COLLEGIATE LIFE AND OTHER

PAPERS. By JOHN VENN, Sc.D., F.R.S., President of Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo, pp. 300. Probable price, 6s. net

Contents: Chapter I. A College Biographer's Nightmare. Chapter II. The Memory of our Benefactors.
Chapter III. Motives and Ideals of the Early Founder.
Chapter IV. The College Benefactor. Chapter V.
Pre-Reformation College Life. Chapter VI. Monks in College. Chapter VII. An Elizabethan Episode in English History. Chapter VIII. Dr Caius. An Appreciation. Chapter IX. The Early Undergraduate.
Chapter X. Academic Sports. Chapter XI. Undergraduate Letters of the 17th Century.

Appendix: College Life and Ways Sixty Years Ago

Cambridge: W. HEFFER & SONS, Ltd.
London: Simpkins, Marshall & Co., Ltd.
And from all Bookshops.

MAUNSELS' LIST Heroes of the Dawn

By VIOLET RUSSELL.

With Illustrations in Colour and Black and White by BEATRICE ELVERY.

Large crown 8vo., gilt. 5s. net.

[30th Nov.

A collection of mysterious and adventurous stories dealing with the great Irish hero, Donn mac Cumall, and band of hero hunters, the Fianna Eireann. We have here, told in plain, yet delicately fashioned, prose, the deeds of mighty men who lived and moved long ago on the "grass-green plains" and round the "blue stream-d shores" of ancient Ireland.

A DICTIONARY OF IRISH
ARTISTS, deceased Painters, Sculptors, and Engravers, and of those of Irish birth who have worked in England and elsewhere, with Lists of their Works and an Account of the Art Institutions in Ireland. By WALTER G. STRICKLAND, Registrar National Gallery of Ireland. 150 Portraits. Super royal 8vo, buckram. 2 Vols. 30s. net. Prospectus on application

In the somewhat neglected field of Irish biography no book exists dealing with the lives and works of Irish artists. It was the experience of the want of any available source from which a knowledge of our native artists and their works could be obtained that led to the undertaking of this book. For some years every means has been taken to collect facts and to bring together materials, and the results are now embodied in this Dictionary of Irish Artists.

A TWENTIETH CENTURY HERO
By The Hon. GEORGINA O'BRIEN. Crown 8vo.
Cloth 6s.

A novel of absorbing interest by the Author of "The Heart of the Prison."

PAUL VERLAINE. By STEFAN ZWEIF.
Translated by O. F. THEIS. With Portrait. 2s. 6d. net

A study of once comprehensive and detailed, intimate, yet touched with a fine sense of discretion, of the greatest French poet of recent years.

EIGHT O'CLOCK and other Studies
By ST. JOHN G. ERVINE. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

"Distinguished by humour, quick observation, and effective and economical writing."—Daily News and Leader

CHILDREN OF THE HILLS. Irish
Stories by DERMOT O'BYRNE. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net

IRISHRY. Poems by JOSEPH CAMPBELL,
Author of "The Rushlight," "The Mountain Singer,"
"The Gilly of Christ," &c. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

MADGE LINSEY and other Poems. By DORA
SIGERSON SHORTER. Cap 8vo. 1s. net

BROADSHEET BALLADS. Being a Collection of Irish Popular Songs, with an Introduction by PADRAIC COLUM and a Frontispiece by JACK
B. YEATS. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

POEMS. By SUSAN L. MITCHELL. In 2 Vols.
Fcap. 8vo. Quarter parchment. 2s. 6d. net each. Sold separately.

I. The Living Calicles
II. Aids to the Immortality of Certain Persons in Ireland

THE SAGA OF KING LIR. A Poem
by GEORGE SIGERSON. Crown 8vo. Hand-made paper, parchment gilt. 3s. 6d. net. Antique paper, boards. 1s. net.

THE ADVENTUROUS YEAR.
Poems. By MARTIN KINDER. Crown 8vo. Boards.
2s. 6d. net.

THE PURSUIT and other Poems. By ISOBEL
HUME FISHER. Fcap. 8vo. 1s. net

THE SECRET HILL. Poems by RUTH and CELIA DUFFIN, with a cover design by E. S.
DUFFIN. Fcap. 8vo. Boards. 1s. net

A JACK YEATS PICTURE BOOK LIFE IN THE WEST OF IRELAND

Drawn and painted by JACK B. YEATS. Large 8vo.
5s. net. Special edition, with an original sketch on fly leaf, limited to 150 signed copies. 21s. net

"A score of written books could not give you so intimate and wide a knowledge of the everyday lives of the common people in the West
Ireland as you may gain from a study of this series of unique drawings.
At five shillings it is a miracle of cheapness."—The Bookman

J. M. SYNGE'S WORKS

LIBRARY EDITION in 5 Vols. (sold separately). Large crown 8vo. Finely printed on antique paper. Sets, 25s. 6d. net.
POCKET EDITION in 8 Vols. Fcap. 8vo. Quarter parchment. 2s. 6d. net each.

Complete Catalogues will be sent on application.

MAUNSEL & CO., LTD.

96, Middle Abbey St., Dublin; Oakley House, Bloomsbury St., London.

A delightful Gift for lovers of the Beautiful

The Splendid Wayfaring

by Haldane Macfall

Author of "The Masterfolk," "The Wooings of Jezebel Pettyfer," "The History of Painting" (8 vols.), "Beautiful Children," etc. Illustrated by GORDON CRAIG, LOVAT FRASER, M II M. GAUDIER BRZFSKA, and the Author. Crown 4to

price 10s 6d net

Here we have the Author's now famous challenge to criticism, written in precise and definite terms—we see its origins and discover the deep foundations upon which the edifice of his writings upon art have been built. Most writers upon art seem to accept some dogma out of the blue, and to build an elaborate æsthetic, as in the case of Ruskin, but here we have the ruthless search into its very origins—the rousing challenge to all æsthetic whatsoever—and the triumphant belief in the brotherhood of man being wholly dependent upon the arts, growing out of the arts, and impossible without the arts. For the Season of Goodwill, no book could be more appropriate than one which heralds the Brotherhood of Man as the supreme weapon of Man's "forward adventure."

Ask your Bookseller to show you this sumptuous Gift Book

LONDON. SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co LTD.

---

Telephone 2048 Central.

Telegrams "Press, Newcastle-on-Tyne."

THE NORTHUMBERLAND PRESS

Specialists in Publishers' Printing.

WATERLOO HOUSE,

THORNTON STREET,

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

Test Estimates on Application.

